ACKNOWLEDGEMENT

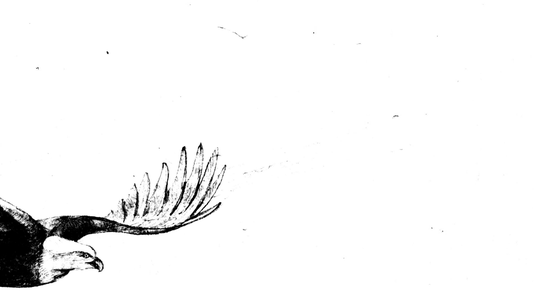

It is most probable that this part of the chart would never have been completed had it not been for a great great grand-daughter of EUGENE WASHINGTON PETRIE RIVERS; who entered the picture after ordering prints of the original chart.

MRS. WILLIE MAE MOTES a genealogist from Jacksonville, Florida, advised that she had information covering many of the descendants of her great great grand-father EUGENE. She generously gave this information and her advise for the preparation of this chart.

Before his marriage in 1823 EUGENE moved from James Island to Sumter, S.C. where he married and raised a family of eight children. His son FRANCIS moved to Shreveport, La. For a while. By 1861 he was living in Alachua County, Florida. This and other moves of members of The Family to this area estabilised this branch of the Rivers Family in Florida.

A Planter of sea Island cotton on James Island at Centerville Plantation For most of his life.

The idea of breeding to resist disease was FIRST tried a few years before 1900. selection of seed from superior plants has been practiced for centuries, but the earliest record of systematic selection for resistance to disease began in 1895, on James Island across the Ashley River south of Charleston, S.C. This work was done by Mr. Rivers, Plantation owner in an effort to develope a strain of cotton resistant to wilt, a soil-borne disease.

He was unable to combine disease resistance with yield and quality; so in 1899 he called on the U.S. Department of Agriculture For help. A young Department Scientist From Vermont, who had never seen a cotton field was sent. Together these two men made history by deliberately planting selected on wilt infested soil and saving plants that survived. From this work several new varities were eventually developed.

The above information was taken From a reprint of a number of reports on various subjects entitled, RESEARCH AND RELATED SERVICES IN THE UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE. Published Dec. 21, 1950.
