We are still in business and expect to sell our share and sell as high as any one. Having the misfortune to lose our house we have made arrangements with Rountree, Brown & ('o. to handle our trade on their floor (The Star.) We are in a condition to get as much, if not more for your tobacco, than we could before and hope our friends will stand by us in this our misfortune and we guarantee to get as much if not more for your tobac 30 than any other house or market. Remember two distinct firms on the same floor, both doing all in their power to sell your stuff high-an advantage that no other house in the State has. Come and see for yourselves and we will convince you it is to your interest to sell with us. Combined together we control more capital than any house in Eastern Carolina. Come and we will stand by you and appreciate your favors.

HOG KILLING IN THE SOUTH.

A Momentous Event In the Households the Plantations.

Some persons are prejudiced against the flesh of the hog. Scientific men hint of bacteria; physicians pronounce against pork, and disprimipating fathers and mothers debar it from their tables. Down south, however, no such prejudices obtain. There it is still the custom to eat liberally of backbone stew, hog's head cheese, soused pigs' feet, scrapple, brain souffle and other delectable dishes, with a reckless disregard of consequences. Yards and yards of linked black puddings and sau. sages are prepared and eaten there, and the people pronounce them good. Rows on rows of sides, hams and shoulders are swung from the raft. ers of dim smokehouses, there to be cured with the wholesome fumes of a carefully tended corncob fire, alternately burning and smoldering, in accordance with the undeviating rules.

Hog killing on the plantation is an event attended with ceremony and excitament. Even housewives arrange their social engagements with reference to its demands.

"We can't come next week because we are going to kill," a soft voiced matron will say.

"It may thaw and you can't kill," somebody suggests, but the mistress shakes her head, contending that it is the right time of the moon, and all will be well.

The excitement begins in the kitchen when the aged pig sticker, imbued with a sense of the importance of his office, goes to interview the cook as to the particular knives, pails and dishpans she can spare for an indefinite time. In the beginning she tells him that she can't spare any, and in the end she lets him have everything he wants, but he acquires each article with a distinct struggle and after a promise to bring it back when he is done with it, a promise which she knows of old he will not fulfill. Possessed of the murderous weapons, he is ready for the killing.

A veil may be drawn over the excontion and the attendant ceremonies. The next day brings with it more excitement. The scene is the same corner of the yard. The sausage grinder is got out, scrubbed up and screwed down firmly to the big deal table, where strong black arms are severing the fat from the lean, pink meat, carving it into long strips, and cutting its white pulpiness into smooth, equal squares, to be rendered into lard. The long handled stuffer, black and shining, is set up on a stand of its own, and a has certain unlucky days, on which round faced maid and experienced maumer are appointed to manipulate it, the mistress superintending are other sibylline utterances to the delicate task of seasoning.

The big black pot is filled with pay heed. She must know that "to bubbling squares of white, and a change the name and not the letter thick waisted, handkerchief turban- is to change for the worse and not ed negress stands near, armed with the better;" also that to marry and a big strainer to drain off the lard yet "to keep her own name is to and preserve the precious cracklings. keep her condition forever the The sable high priest who shed so same. much blood at the killing is again on hand, his head bound up in ap. overcome, a bride in arraying herproved fashion and his hands busy self for the ceremony must be sure scraping the pink toed feet. In both these cases it is probable that the rats were frightened by the settling of the beams of the house or of the pillars and earth in the mines. It is probable, that their senses are much more acute than those of men, and the noise made by the settling of the earth and rocks in a mine would be observed by them long before it dd be norcentible to the miners.

Faid the Peasity of Stupidity.

The late Lord Exeter's father was a Tory of the most bigoted and intolerant type, and he worked irrep. arable harm to his family by his fatuous opposition to the Great Northern railway.

It was intended to earry the main line through Stamford, but Lord Exeter's senseless pertinacity in obstinately rejecting all proposals caused the directors to change their plans. The line was therefore taken through Peterboro, to the great advantage of that city, which reaped all the benefits that Lord Exeter had declined for Stamford.

The end of the matter was that in few years Lord Exeter was obliged to construct at his own expense a branch line from Stamford to Essen dine on the Great Northern, but this has not proved a lucrative speculation, nor has Stamford or the Burghley estate derived much benefit from
