LEAD SOFTLY.

Of few and tender years; Give him your smiles, nor yet demand

The trouble of his tears.

His knowledge of the "right and wrong"
Is but an outline yet,
To be filled in by love's soft hand,
That he may not forget.

Lead softly through the pleasant paths
That skirt life's garden fair;
There's time enough for doubt and fear,
There's time enough for care.
Show him the bud and blossoms sweet,
That every field adorns;
There's time enough for little feet
To find the crue, thorns.

Lead softly through fair childhood's gate

And up the steps of time, The little child God gave to you,

Till, in his manhood's prime He turns, with benediction fond

Upon his grateful tongue, For those who clasped with tenderness His hand when he was young.

The purpose of the Montgomery convention was to secure the united and harmonious action of the Southern States in the matter of "added population and capital for the South." Much has been accomplished, and the prospects are that the move made at Montgomery will result in the speedy development of the South's great resources. So important will be the influence of this second convention upon the prosperity and growth of the South, that it should impel every official to whom this call is directed to take such prompt and effective action as will result in a grand and influential convention.
