Their Burial Customs Prevailed Until

Mound builders of the Mississippi valley in the manner of burial of their dead were in close touch with those of the valley of the Ohio and had something in common with them, embracing the ideals displayed in the ancestor worship of the oriental as well as antedating the custom of setting a granite shaft as our departed at the present time. Formerly mound builders were supposed to have become an extinct race, occupying the territory in which these numerous burial mounds are found prior to its occupancy by the North American Indians, but in the light of more retion, writes Richard Hermann in "Records of the Past," it has been wants it to wear, shown that burial of the dead in ke you use it up mounds has been practiced by the Muskawakies of the Foxes, who occupied the territory up to and inciuding some of the time when the first white people settled in the up-
