SUPPOSITIONS

Suppose, for the novelty of it, we make a few suppositions. Suppose you are a person of considerable ambition, and want to score a few good hits in the world [of course you do.] Suppose, further, that you are favored with a fair stock of brains, are educated in your calling, and possess abilities which deserve to win. Suppose, however, that though admirably equipped in most other respects, you are not in proper condition physically. Suppose, for instance, that your appetite is poor, and that the food you eat is feebly or only partially digested; or suppose that your blood is thin and weak, showing possibly symptoms of scrofula; or suppose that you suffer from some affection of the liver or kidneys; or suppose that your nervous system is unstrung, or that you are pestered with fits of dejection, [generally signs of disease]; suppose that you are run down in health, yet really do not understand why it is; SUPPOSING any of these things to be the case, we therefore very naturally SUPPOSE that you are in need of a good medicine. Let us go on and SUPPOSE that you have tried medicines already, that you have used bottles upon bottles and have gotten no benefit—that you are disappointed and utterly discouraged. Then if this last SUPPOSITION is correct you are exactly the person to try Burdock Blood Bitters. We do not simply SUPPOSE they will relieve you; we know they will. Thousands troubled with the maladies above enumerated have attained health and comfort by the use of these Bitters; you need not be excepted.

DEAR SIR: I had suffered for 15 years with dyspepsia and tried almost every known remedy to effect a cure. Last summer I grew so bad that I had given up all hopes of living. A friend of mine persuaded me to send to J. E. Kennedy's Drug Store in Cobourg for a bottle of Burdock Blood Bitters. The third day after using I began to feel better. Before I finished the first bottle, was able to be up and around at work. After taking three bottles perfectly cured and am now in better health than for 20 years. You have my permission to publish this.
