RHEUMATISM AND NEURALGIA.

Among humanity's ailments none have more completely baffled medical skill, and few, if any, cause their victims more excruciating tortures than Rheumatism and Neuralgia. Science has in some degree explained their causes, but it has done almost nothing to allay their agonies. It is now very generally admitted that these diseases arise from a poisoned condition of the blood, and this explains why outward applications are entirely futile.

The discoverer of Athlophoros was long tortured by Rheumatism which the best physicians could not relieve. His sufferings impelled him to a search for their cause. Persuaded that his affliction could only be relieved by a remedy which would deal with the obstructive acid which poisoned and inflamed his blood, he devoted himself to study and experiment, aided by the best scientific help, to find such a remedy, the result being the discovery of Athlophoros. Happy in his own cure he supplied its means to friends similarly afflicted. The success of his remedy was invariable, and so prompt and remarkable, that the demand for it has compelled him to give his entire time to its preparation. Sufferers from Neuralgia—Rheumatism's twin sister—also sought eagerly for the new and potent cure, and were promptly relieved. By its expulsion of rheumatic and neuralgic acid from the system, its invigoration of the muscles and healthy lubrication of the joints, Athlophoros has triumphed in every instance.

This wonderful specific for hitherto incurable diseases is compounded with the utmost care, and contains nothing whatever that can injure the most delicate organism. None have used it who have not afterward recommended it, and so its circle of friends has rapidly widened until the demand for it has made it already a staple among medical preparations. It is manufactured only by
