Like the forces of the physical world, the human emotions, it is said, vary with the distance from their origin.
It however greatly depends upon the depth of these emotions, or the extent of the enjoyment whether this be true. Certainly, in my case, though quite a distance from your home there has been no decrement of appreciation of the courtesies extend me, nor has the time that has since elapsed dulled in the least, the recollections of my keen enjoyment of your hospitality. Permit me furthermore to again express my thanks and also the hope that if business or pleasure should
