More Interest Shown In Student Elections

student elections than those of a year ago is an indication that the to join the Allies forces. student body in general has developed more concern in the matter of selecting leaders. The vote cast in the major elections was the largest in several years. Most of the credit for the new impetus made a concerted drive to get students to the polls, in addition to urging them to vote their convictions. Each method used by the masses organization in bringing the seriousness of voting before the studetn body was fair to each candidate involved. The elections were conducted both honestly and adequately.

One of the best arguments for not voting appears to have come from students who did not have classes in Austin Building, where the elections were conducted. Many of them suggested that there be more than one place of voting, similar to the system used by municipal governments. The only argument for such a system in this school is that it would more convenient. This year, as in other years, there was little congestion at the polls, those who really were concerned with the type of leaders they were to follow made it a point to go to the polls and vote, and since the polls remained open all day, it is likely that nearly every student had an racket of news transmission? Well, maybe . . . opportunity to vote.

lieve the present system of voting is all right. If students were big-time news game: allowed to vote at a different booth for each candidate it stands as valuable as another.

An Argument For Progressive Education

Honesty is the most sterling quality an individual can possess. It conquers evil and gives one the moral stamina necessary for a report we're hearing. well-rounded personality and agreeable associations with others. Last quarter a plain case of cheating prevailed in a composition The fellow behind the mike has been looking at the clock on the tapers inward from the top of try it on our best friend—Mother—and then she might in the composition to the last quarter a plain case of cheating prevailed in a composition. The fellow behind the mike has been looking at the clock on the last quarter a plain case of cheating prevailed in a composition. The fellow behind the mike has been looking at the clock on the last quarter a plain case of cheating prevailed in a composition. course that is required of all students. The students did wrong in cheating. Failure would have been better. Below the surface, however, is a problem confronting educators of today.

As we understand it the trend in progressive education places more emphasis on creating an appreciation for the subject than invovled in the cheating, but there must have been a reason for George Fielding Eliot, CBS military analyst, making notes on a ed better than he is able to do their doing it, although it was wrong. In the first place the course was required and there was no way to evade it. Perhaps these students did not know how to write, had made failing grades throughout the quarter, and had to turn in a good finished product in order to pass. The matter of making a good grade apparently was more important to them than honesty. If there is a practice in our educational system that causes sudents to feel this way, then something should be done about it.

Students who can do good or fair work in composition find it to be most enjoyable. Many of them would choose such a course if it were elective instead of required. But provisions should be made for the unfortunates who are required to do work they never have been able to do, and could never make a passing grade regard- at it. less of how long they took the course. It is this type of student that is encouraged to cheat.

The matter of deciding what shall be required and what subjects the student will be allowed to elect is a problem that confronts every educational institution. If obtaining a good grade is more important to a student than honesty, and the course itself developed his attitude, then some changes should be made in the school curriculum.
