SU president chosen

By RICKI GLIARMIS News Editor

Charles Sune, chairperson of the Student Union Major Attractions Committee, has been named president of the Student Union for the 1979-80 school year. The announcement was made by the Student Union Board of Directors, Wednesday.

Sune, a junior political science major from Raleigh, will officially take office on April 6. According to Sune, until that time he will be preparing and organizing for next year's.

Sune explained that he will be reviewing the positions of committee chairpersons, and the Student Union budget.

"Hopefully by the time April gets here we will said. be all set up for the next year," said Sune. "This is a good transition period for the new president. At least I'll know what's going on."

Sune speculated on some of his general plans for next year. He said that his most important objective for next year will be to make the students aware of what the Student Union really is. Sune said the the Student Union has a definite identity crisis on campus and he hopes to adjust that problem.

"A lot of people don't realize what the Student Union is," Sune explained. "Some people think that the Student Union is just another name for Mendenhall Student Center."

Sune said that the Student Union works closely with the Mendenhall organizations but that the two groups are two distinct organizations. Sune also said that the Student Union is often confused with the Student Government Association (SGA). "At one time the Student Union was a part of the SGA but now they are two separate organizations," said

According to Sune, the Student Union has already made a few attempts to straighten out the confusion. For instance, the Student Union printed semester calendars which were distributed to the students.

Sune said that there will be an advertising campaign to take care of the problem. He also said that there has never been an effort to solve that problem and he plans to end the confusion.

Another of Sune's plans while in office is to maintain the present programming offered by the Student Union but to expand on that effort. Sune said that he would like to see the film area of programming expand to Thursday nights as well as the weekends.

"I don't want to make any changes in the committees. We have 11 committees now and I don't see any changes that need to be made," Sune Sune reported that the Student Union plans a survey of the student body soon. He said that the random survey will be made to find out the entertainment needs of the students.

"We haven't been keeping in contact with the students like we should," said Sune. "We plan to find their needs in entertainment so we can possibly accomodate them."

The survey will be made either before the end of this semester or the beginning of next fall.

Sune has been involved with the Student Union for the past two years. He first served as chairperson of the Popular Entertainment Committee. This year he is serving as chairperson of the Major Attractions Committee which was responsible for bringing such name acts as Styx, Arlo Guthrie, Chuck Mangione, Firefall, Brother's Johnson/ Mother's Finest, and Pablo Cruise.

"I do have an interest in the Student Union because I have been involved in it for two years. I guess that explains why I was interested in the office of president," said Sune. "I think I've done alot in the area of concerts and I hope I can do alot in the area of president."

Oh, dem blue law blues

On March 10, 1966, the concept of a separate church and state suffered a setback when the Greenville City enacted a "blue" outlawing the sale of almost everything except food, medicine, and gas on Sunday. There is absolutely no justification for a law of this sort. What right does any government have to say what can be sold when (alcoholic beverages excepted)?

Granted, many people sincerely believe that Sunday should be a day of rest and that it is sinful to work on the Sabbath, but such beliefs have no place in a legal argument. The blue law serves only to inconvenience consumers and subject merchants to the constant threat of fines for selling Sunday contraband. The irony of it all is that you can buy all the beer and wine you like, but you can't buy a pot to fix lunch in.

To further complicate the problem, represents the to what can and cannot be sold. For repeal this stupid law.

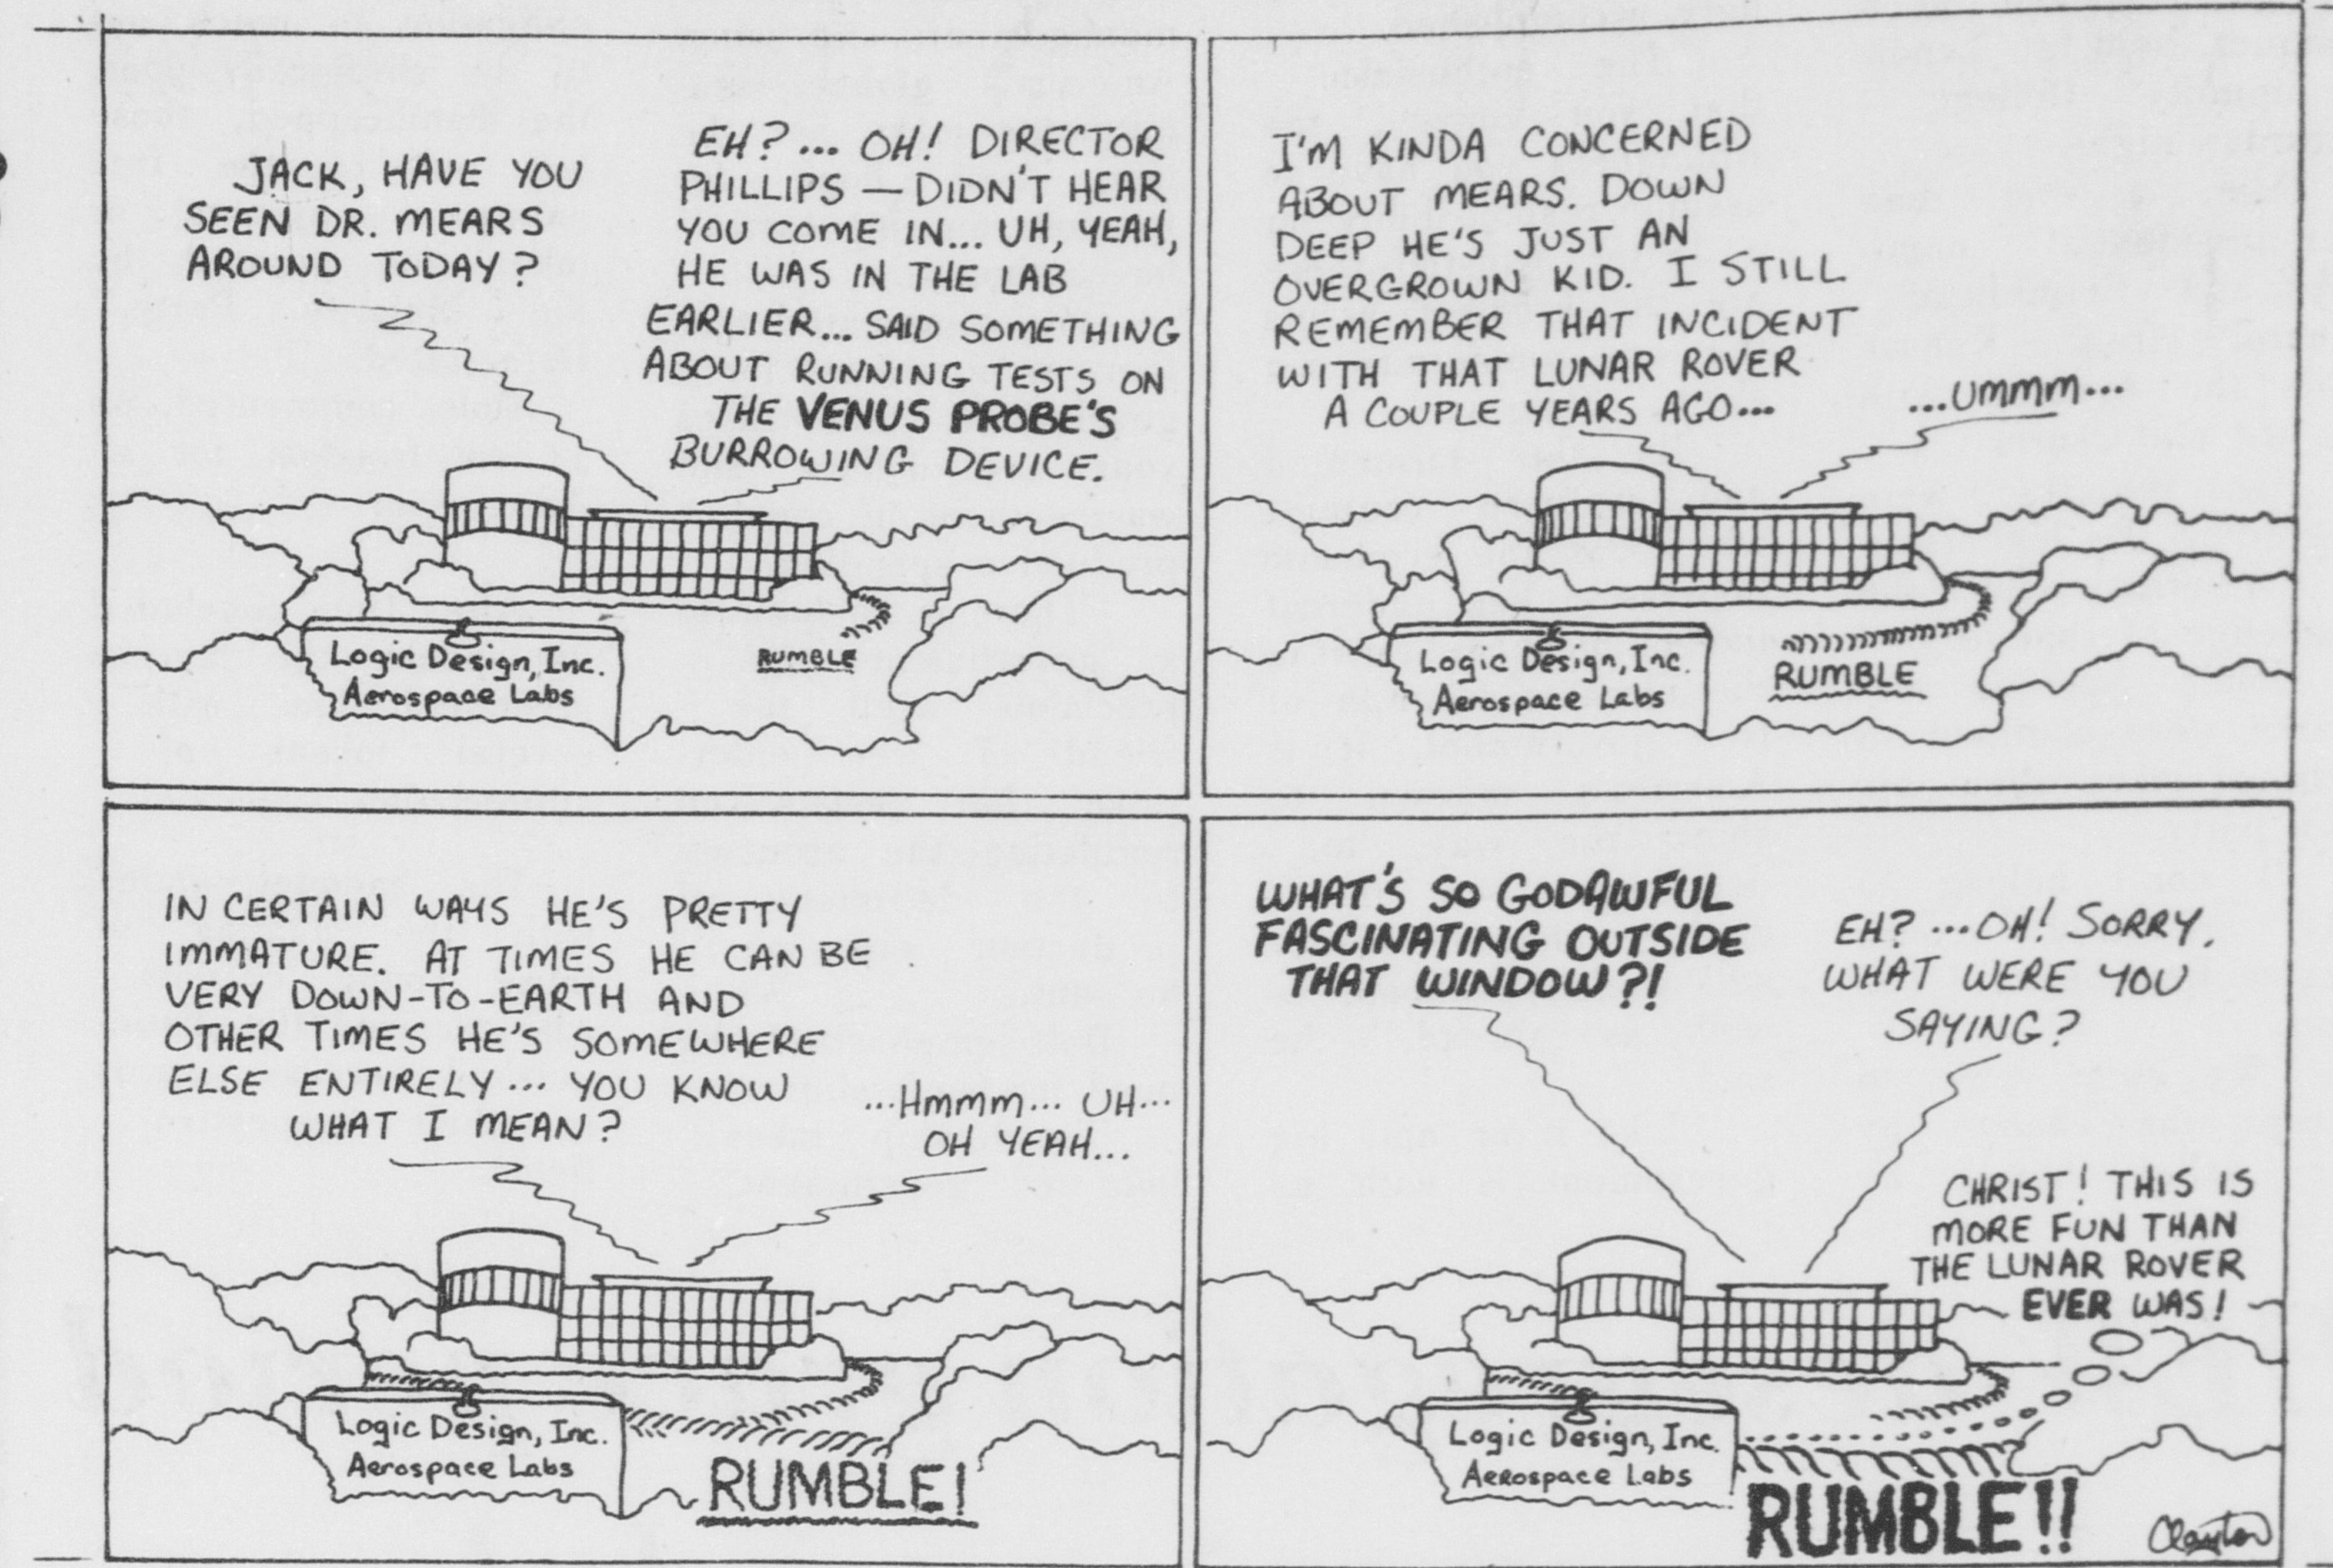

example, one local storekeeper, charged with illegally selling a box of tacks on Sunday asked the judge to list what could and could not be sold.

The judge replied that he didn't know exactly what couldn't be sold, but he knew you couldn't sell tacks. The storekeeper and the cashier who made the sale were fined $50 each.

The law has been amended three times to allow more items to be sold, but there are still gross inconsistencies. For instance, you can't buy men's or boy's socks, but you can buy women's panty hose.

What does the city have against its merchants and consumers that it would inflict such ridiculous restrictions on trade? Are odd-numbered Tuesdays to be next? If we didn't know better, we'd think we were in the kingdom of Freedonia, right out of Duck Soup.

Uppity Women

Fish detector helps clear air

By CHARLENE CARTER Staff Writer

You may recall from last week's article that, in honor of the New Year, certain "blessings" were recounted, which were then observed to retain "the definite odor of ancient salmon fried in lard and served with caviar."

This description was an attempt to show that (1) the practices described had strong roots in the past; (2) these practices were steeped in greed (pigginess); and (3) someone was definitely benefitting from them.

In summary, the "blessings" in question are these: women are now "allowed" to own property, to vote, to obtain bank loans on their own credibility, to retain their earnings, to obtain a divorce, to obtain a college education equal to a man's, to earn wages equal to a man's, to spend more time outside of the home, to not be subject to corporal punishment at their husbands' discretion.

Those who did not detect fish odors from the first reading were requested to re-read the statements, and after each one, to ask the question "why?". The answer to all of them, with the exception of one, is this: women are allowed these "privileges" because of legal provision. In case there are some of you who didn't know, women haven't always been allowed as much freedom as they have these days.

The constitution on which our nation is based states that "all men are created equal," and have inalienable rights to 'life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Therefore, men's rights are provided for in the basic constitution.

The basic constitution (and the men's rights contained within it) are not subject to repeal.

There will doubtless be some who will argue with this viewpoint, but if a constitutional amendment is required to make something law, this hardly leaves any question as to whether it was legal before the amendment was passed.

that it has been unacceptable for a woman to spend her time in whatever pursuit she chooses; or, more specifically, it has been unacceptable for a woman to venture out of the bounds which have been set for her by male standards."

Therefore, the basic concept is not one of sexual equality. Considering the financial realities of 1979 that make it imperative for a large segment of the human-rights standpoint, it is anitquated.

Let's feed the fish detector another statement: It is still a woman's responsibility to take care of home and children, even if she is employed outside of the home.

Fish detector response: "The basic concept of this statement is that of a 'woman's place,' so to speak, which must be maintained, regardless of the amount of energy which has to be expended in other areas. It is not based on a concept of sexual equality, because there is no provision for the sharing of home and child-raising responsibilities on the man's part even though there is sharing of responsibility for bringing in income on the woman's

It would seem logical, therefore, to conclude that the basic concept would be a male concept, since it is advantageous to the male. There is little question as to whether it is applicable to present-day reality, or whether there is any concept of human rights

Please allow me to present you with your very own fish detector. If you want it, then you got it. It doesn't take up any space (except in your head,) and is guaranteed to work for as long as you want to use it. It's really much healthier for you to breathe clean air, you know.

Since I'm such a nostalgia freak, the next article will deal with the "good old days" (as far as women are concerned,) and a brief overview of how we got here from there. The cigarette-ad men say

Warner Bros.' Superman 'gamble right on target'

By STEVE BACHNER Production Manager

This is a high stakes gamble business, and 'Superman' is just the biggest roll of dice in history. Make it and you make it beyond your wildest dreams. Miss and it's the pits."

American Film Magazine

Only a poorly packaged film of this caliber could be called a gamble. Star Wars was a gamble. Director George Lucas intended that the film be served up as a kiddish serial to be shot in the new genre of "space western." His space opera is today the most lucrative undertaking in the history of the movies. It is an international success that stands the test both critically and commercially on the basis of its own merits. Star Wars succeeded without a plethora of pre-release merchandising and managed enormous popularity and some of the most innovative special effects to date on an $18 thousand budget. It fostered its own cult following.

Superman, the movie, can only be considered a high risk if the sloppiness of the production, not the packaging, is taken into account. So far, the cost of the film has been estimated at somewhere between $45 million and $60 million. Producer Ilya Salkind and son Alexander originally planned to keep it around $15 million. What a joke that projection must seem like now.

Allow me to further contort your face. Over 1.25 million feet of film was exposed to shoot not one but two feature length films as well as some thirty hours of behind the scenes material to be aired in conjunction with other hype. It is hard to imagine a building big enough to even house that much stock.

Warner Communications, the conglomerate that owns Warner Bros., blasted the public with over 6 billion media shots before Superman's premier this past December.

Further hype involves the branding of the Superman logo on one thousand sundry items including bubble-bath decanters, house slippers, and even underwear (in case you're caught with your pants down).

All told, the kickoff knicknacks and estimated costs make Superman bigger than King Kong and more affluent than Gatsby.

Was it all worth it? The answer is no. No ten films are worth $60 million dollars in production, advertising, and publicity. Is the film worth seeing? The answer is a resigned yes.

Superman is worth a look for the same reasons that Star Wars and Close Encounters are. It is a celebration of like-minded special effects (supervised and directed by Colin Chilvers), optical visual effects (Roy Field), creative mattes and composites, breathtaking photography, quixotic production designs, and resounding, inspirational music. It features only the best known, save for its star, and most likable players that the dream factory still has to offer. It offers a first-rate script (care of Godfather author Mario Puzo; and that's still tough to figure out) that's replete with rooting interest, love interest, and every other brand of formula interest. The players all seem to be enjoying themselves and for those of us who find it difficult to swallow pep talks on "truth, justice, and the American way" there is plenty of camp to revel in.

The dynamic score is already a hot item in the soundtrack department. It has even been deemed worthy of a disco interpretation that grates the refrain "Do it to me Superman" or "Let's get it on in the sky, big guy" or something equally puerile.

[see SUPERMAN p.6] "SUPERMAN" IS WORTH a look for the same reasons that "Star Wars" and "Close Encounters" are. It is a celebration of like-minded special effects..."

It seems that filmmakers are still trying to find somebody with the equivalent scoring ability of Bernard Herrmann (Hitchcock's favorite composer) whose music is rooted in traditional tonalities. The best they have come up with so far is composer John Williams (Jaws, Close Encounters, Academy Award for Star Wars). The transition for Superman was no transition at all. Instead of scoring for a flying saucer his orchestra merely accompanies a flying man. The music for Superman surges and swells but William's courtship with the doctrinal symphony orchestra gives us another theme that sounds like the most hackneved of fanfares.

The screenplay for the film strays little from the familiar comic book saga which, since its inception forty years ago, has a circulation of some thirteen million in the United States alone and has been translated into fifteen languages.

Superman, or Kal-El, as he was named, was born on the planet Krypton, the son of that society's leading scientist, Jor-El, and his wife Lara (played in the film by Susannah York). When Jor-El discovered that Krypton was doomed to explode, he worked against time, building a spaceship to save his infant son.

The opening scenes on Krypton comprise some of the most imaginative representation in the film. Not long before some standard disaster movie footage, which accompanies the baby's launch and the subsequent destruction of Krypton, three intergalactic evildoers are tried by the Kryptonian' Council of Elders and exiled into the Phantom Zone. They are banished by means of a projection ray, interpreted by visual effects man Field as a beam of light atop which rests a mirror-like vehicle that is to house the villians until their inevitable escape which is to be dealt with in the sequel.

The pacing of film once the superbaby lands on earth is slow and deliberate. Glenn Ford makes it tolerable with his rendition of Superman's earthly father, Jonathan Kent. These scenes depicting the voung Clark Kent move methodically and are devoid of the run-of-the-mill, dazzling special effects save for a couple: notably, Clark out-distancing an express train; something his dense molecular structure affords him the ability to do. Still, it is hard not to squirm when you're in Smallville, Clark's hometown, after sitting through production designer John consumer society Brando is still a standard label. Barry's vision of the futuristic marvels of the planet Krypton and the crystallographically rendered Fortress of Solitude, the Man of Steel's secret sanctuary. The scenario for the Smallville sequences reinforces a serious tone that is sportively shattered as soon as the film lands us in mythical Metropolis: New York City, where else? Here we meet Gene Hackman, who won his Oscar as Popeye, the compulsive narc in The French Connection, seen as Lex Luthor, the evil genius who pits cunning against Superman's strength. Hackman portrays Luthor with a restrained dopiness that is his basic comic resource, useful in other parts, it works just

The Surrealist techautomatic writing and collage were not calculated to disrupt or challenge meaning. They were a vehicle for arriving at meaning, at a hidden reality capable of adding a new dimension of meaning to man's perpetual self-questioning. Picon notes that "Man should find here the regenerating revelaevery other direction."

fine here, too. Ned Beatty plays Otis, Luthor's bumbling sidekick, with unrestrained dopiness. The powerfully sexy Valerie Perrine is perfect as Luthor's moll, Miss Teschmacher. Margot Kidder sets women back 50 years with her portrayal of reporter Lois Lane. Screenwriters Puzo, David and Leslie Newman, and Robert Benton see Lois as a modern day Lucy; a bit more involved, and single. Honorable mention goes to veteran Jackie Cooper for his performance as Daily Planet editor Perry White. But just about all performances in character roles are funny, and, what is especially gratifying, relaxedly so.

The roles that have been causing the most commotion are those of Superman and his Kryptonian father Jor-El. After producers Salkind and Salkind had approached just about every leading man in Hollywood (Robert Redford was their first choice), they came to the conclusion that the presence of an established star would only distract the viewer from the Superman role. They set out in search of a blank slate and wisely chose virtual unknown Christopher Reeve.

Reeve gracefully underplays the role. He does a neat job without turning on any excess charm. Reeve is an imposing white whale of a man, solidly built with jet black hair and blue, blue eyes that could stop a bullet in its tracks. And since this film CORRECTION invites petty speculation, let me raise the question whether any filmed eyes, however meltingly or mysteriously black, could ever compete in close up bum Take A Look At with the blue ones of Gabin, or O'Toole, or even a Brando? I speak of male eyes; women's seem to function differently on screen. To this blueness, Geoffrey Unsworth's impeccable color photography appeared under Marvin contributes handsomely.

The controversy surrounding prima dona Marlon Brando's casting as Jor-El is not without warrant. Brando gets top billing and an incredible $3.7 Miller in the Jan. 17 million, against 11.3 percent of the gross, for his issue. Mr. Miller felt fifteen days on the set in Rome. Is he really that the Brown album Hollywood shelves, to be discarded by obsolescence as soon as the fashion changed. But the Brando magic lingers on and on. In Superman, one wonders what his method is — or if there really is a method at all.

Still, no other actor has ever gone in roller-coaster fashion from such pinnacles of success and praise to such an abyss of bitter railing; and survived unscathed. Brando has been declared finished with monotonous regularity. He has risen again to prove that he is still with us, the most resourceful, inventive, daring, annoying, contradictory, and brilliant actor in America. It is awfully hard to put a price on his divination.

What is destined to be the single most important aspect in the super-selling of the Man of Steel will not be the casting or performances or even the impossible-to-ignore packaging of the film, but the technique of spectacle: the special effects. The thousands of takes and re-takes have honed illusion to near perfection. Whether Superman is straightening a Boeing 707, battling a natural disaster, changing the course of human history, or just taking Lois for a ride, the special effects people are sustaining the illusion of flight throughout.

He can still be identified instantly on the cluttered Director Richard Donner (The Omen) does not attempt to capture the feel, texture, and rhythm of reality, but instead creates a facsimile, an independent entity which will give the illusion of being true while in fact obeying the laws of audience involvement. In place of reproduction of life, we have life turned into a spectacle, that is to say, made visual, public, dramatic.

Unfortunately, special effects cost money, big money. But special effects draw the biggest crowds and while $60 million is certainly going overboard, it is hard to imagine a film shot on a Superman scale weighing in at any less than $15 million. The realist cinema of yesterday involves a rejection or at best a simplification of technical possibilities. Today's endeavors are tied up with the industrial and technological progress of the cinema.

Despite the haphazard and in many ways unsatisfactory manner in which this technical progress occurs, it is genuine progress, for, as it becomes more complicated, the industry achieves one of its ideal aims. Superman is right on target. It has evolved into a spectacular form of high camp entertainment that unites action and size of image, sound and music, depth and color. It is much more than an historical accident.
