By JACK ANDERSON and JOE SPEAR

WASHINGTON - President Reagan came up with a simple solution to the unemployment problem a few days ago when he suggested that every employer in the country just hire one additional worker. Maybe some employers, he said, could even hire more than one.

It happens that the nation's biggest single employer takes its orders from Reagan. So we checked with several federal agencies to find out if they've taken the president's message to heart.

They haven't. They've been laying off workers, not hiring them. The only exception we could find was the Labor Department, which hired 158 people in November. But most of these were replacements who were merely filling vacancies.

Spokesmen for several agencies said they thought it was a good idea to hire one additional worker. But the personnel officers said they haven't received any instructions from the White House to that effect.

We did find one Reagan stalwart who has apparently taken the president at his word. Attorney General William French Smith wants to hire a new employee. Smith would like a new assistant cook — a "sous chef," as they say in his circle.

According to the attorney general's help wanted notice, the new sous chef will not only have to cut salad and stir soup: He must also know how to set the table properly for the attorney general's guests and serve the food without spilling it in the laps of the mighty.

The job won't be all glamour. The new man in the kitchen must also be proficient at washing dishes and, says the helpwanted notice, he must have "the ability to use sanitary food handling procedures.'

The job will pay $6 or $7 an hour — considerably higher than the minimum wage. The new sous chef will share the kitchen with three other employees who are cheons for the attorney general.
