

Thousands March in D.C. to Decry Failure of Justice Department to Prosecute Hate Crimes

Date: Monday, November 19, 2007

By: Sherrel Wheeler Stewart, BlackAmericaWeb.com

National Action Network leaders say they will prepare a manifesto detailing what black America wants the federal government to do about hate crimes and unequal justice, then present it to the U.S. Justice Department as a follow up to Friday's march in Washington, D.C. Nearly 30,000 people gathered at Freedom Plaza in the march led by the Rev. Al Sharpton of NAN, chanting "No justice, no peace. What do we want? Justice. When do we want it? Now!" Civil rights hymns rang out as thousands of men, women, children and elderly made the trek around the U.S. Department of Justice.

"We're going to keep applying the pressure," the Rev. DeVes Toon, national field director for NAN, told BlackAmericaWeb.com. "We are in the process of developing the manifesto, and we will request a meeting and present it to the new U.S. attorney general," Toon said.

He estimates that 25,000 to 35,000 were present for the march organized by Sharpton, because of what he calls the neglect of the federal government to protect black people from hate crimes.

Among those in the crowd was Marcus Jones, whose son Mychal Bell, is one of the Jena Six. Those young men in rural Louisiana faced felony charges after beating a white school mate. The incident in December 2006 came after months of racial tension sparked by the hanging of nooses in August of that year. Those who hung the nooses were suspended from school and also given in-school suspension. They were not charged with state or federal offenses.

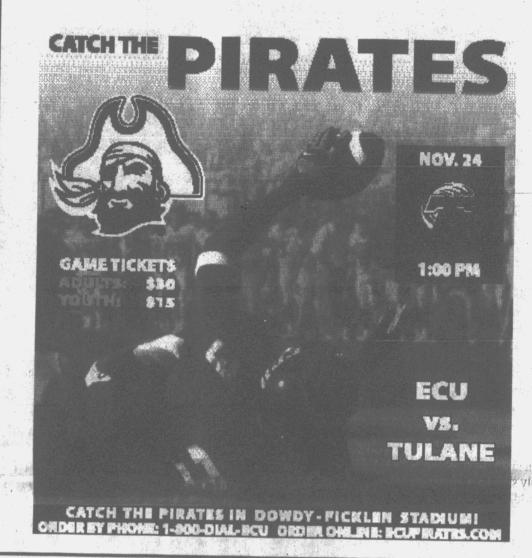

Also among the crowd was Debbie Farrow, whose 12-year-old son was killed this summer in West Memphis, Arkansas by police who thought he had a gun. Family members said he had a soda and a bag of chips in his hand.

"The federal government must intervene in these cases," Sharpton has said.

Larry Young, president of the Baltimore chapter of National Action Network, said he gathered with 250 people and rode buses to D.C. for Friday's march. The local NAACP chapter also worked with them to fill the buses, he said.

"It reminded me of the Million Man March," Young told BlackAmericaWeb.com. "It gave me encouragement. But I think we may have to do it again.

"This administration is either asleep, stupid or it has adopted a determination of benigning feet;" when it comes addressing justice for blacks, he said.

"QUITTING IS NOT AN OPTION"

by Elaine W. Smith

Determined, confident, self-assured, and a relentless never-saynever drive are all characteristics ascribed to E. D. Arrington by her closest friends. If she had any fears, she didn't show them. If she had any wounds, she didn't reveal them. If she had any doubts, she held them close to the vest, giving no one reason to suspect them. So few, not even those closest friends, knew the whole story...until now.

At first glance, Arrington's life journey mirrors thousands of African Americans raised in the rural South by a loving, nurturing, patient grandmother and a devoted grandfather who provided for his family off the meager earnings as a sharecropper. At second glance, Arrington's life journey mirrors thousands of African Americans who lifted themselves out of poverty to a comfortable middle class existence — an existence that she, throughout her childhood, had seen on a black and white television set that only occasionally spotlighted people with her skin color. But it was enough to ignite her hope, to fuel her inherent drive, and to give reason for a third glance at the road Arrington traveled.

"I was born in Greene County, North Carolina, the fourth of seven children. mother died when I was seven years old -that day I remember clearly. Until his death, my father never publicly acknowledged me as his daughter, though I met him once. I was adopted by my grandparents, Tom and Eva Brown-Arrington, when I was in the fourth or fifth grade - maybe younger. Though the date didn't matter as long as I could remain with them - not shuffled off to a foster home as was strongly urged by a social worker. My grandparents were so giving, so loving, so very committed to me. I never experienced the emotional void of not having biological parents until after they were gone. My grandfather died in 1966. My grandmother died in 1968. That's when I realized how big this world was. I was fifteen years old and didn't have a clue how I was going to survive. All I had to draw from was the well of steel determination instilled in me by my grandmother. She was incredible. One of her favorite sayings was: 'We've gotta keep moving forward. No matter how, tough times git, we've gotta keep moving forward.' And that's what I did. It was all I knew how to do. But I didn't know where I was going. I would end up at a place and make the most out of it. Sometimes things worked out. Sometimes they didn't."

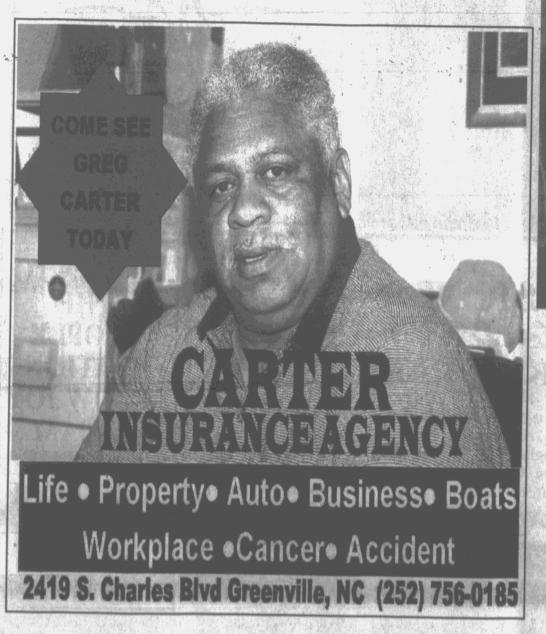

In 1992, Arrington, a woman whose worst sick days were battling a week-long bout of the flu, was stricken with a neurological disorder that baffled and continues to baffle doctors, (and she has been treated by the best – Mayo Clinic, Georgetown Hospital, Suburban Hospital, Duke University Medical Center, and the list goes on). If there was a perfect time to give up, life had handed Arrington a good excuse. Blinding nystagmus, an unstable gait, and dizziness forced her to live within the confines of her Silver Spring, Maryland home. Yet, instead of throwing in the towel, Arrington decided it was time to write.

"I didn't accept what doctors told me ... that most people they had treated with my condition only got worse. But just in case they might have gotten it right... this time, I wanted to tell my daughter my story in my words. I didn't want to make my exit leaving her with as many unanswered questions about her parents as I had about mine. So, I moved into my den next to my computer and began to write everything I could remember about my life [that I would put on paper].

"Opening my eyes hurt so badly, I cried the entire five-minute stints at the computer. [Constant fatigue required frequent rest periods.] Because I knew the keyboard as well as the back of my hand, I wrote with my eyes closed. It took me eight months to finish my story, The Road We Traveled. [I only shared it with family.] But what I discovered was that writing transported me to another world. A world where I wasn't sick. A world where I could run, jump, and dance. And I wanted to go back to that world. Since there was nothing more to write about me, I made up a story, and another story, and another story."

Arrington did more than make up stories. She wrote book-length sagas. In 2000, she moved back to her roots – Wilson, North Carolina, not far from her birthplace. In 2004, Arrington published her first novel, Stay The Course, to an overwhelming positive response. In March 2006, Arrington released her second novel, On The Edge, and Words Of Comfort, her first collection of poems and inspirational writings. I didn't have to ask Arrington how she managed to chronicle three different genres of books while living with her ailment, because I am not just her publicist. I am one of those close friends who witnessed firsthand, more than thirty years ago, the determined, confident, self-assured, young woman with unrelenting never-say-never drive.

"We gotta keep moving forward... I can't count the number of times in my adult life I heard my grandmother ("Ma") whisper those words to me," Arrington said, "and each time I was inspired to try a little harder. Once I told my best friend that I wanted my gravestone to read: 'Ethel Made The Most Out Of Every Day. She Loved To Live And She Lived To Wnte. "You see, for me, quitting is not an option." Consider the Possibilities

Greenville native, Gwendolyn Sherrod is no stranger to considering the possibilities. As a young girl, Gwen often fantasized about meeting Mr. Right and having the town's most talked about wedding. She also imagined making a name for herself as a radio show host or maybe coordinating some of the most successful political galas and social events in the country. Another dream of Gwen's was to be able to use her gifts to impact her community and the world.

Earlier this year, the opportunity for using her gifts and impacting the community proved to be more than just a fantasy. Today, Gwen is the proud owner of The Christopher Agency, LLC (TCA). TCA specializes in providing quality assurance support to mental health providers, within Pitt County and surrounding areas. Services offered include, but are not limited to, a review of agency files and policies. TCA also conducts internal audits, staff training, as well as constructs and implements plans of correction to ensure the success of TCA's clients.

Having worked within the health care, health insurance and mental are highly regarded around the state for their mental health experience and expertise. If you missed it, shame on you!

So, what about Gwen's fantasy of meeting Mr. Right? Of having her own radio show of hosting gala events? To that Gwen responds with God's Word — "that the steps of a good (wo)man are ordered by the Lord (Psalms 37:23) and with God all things are possible (Mark 10:27). As far as Gwen is concerned, this story is just beginning.
