COMMENCEMENT AND CONSUMMATION

Eloquent speeches of which little was heard; auditoriums jammed to capacity, which is vaguely remembered; sweetest music rendered by the best your community could produce, wasted on inattentive ears: faces of parents, relatives, and friends beaming with pride and love, dimly recollected—these and thousands of other impressions all lie confusedly in your memory, and the one definite fact is that in your hand you hold a parchment certifying that "having satisfactorily completed" certain courses in education, you have been knighted, as it were, to go forth and serve humanity.

Your number is legion, embracing as it does the immigrant youngster who has learned his trade, studied the Constitution and become acquainted with the institutions and laws of his newly-found land; the sunburned lad and buxom country lass who, in freshly starched linen, sat on the stage of the one-room school or town hall while the dignitaries of the village recited their annual speeches; the pretty maids and smartly dressed chaps who figured nervously while the governor, mayor, or well known citizen addressed you from the platform of the municipal auditorium or high school rostrum; the sedate college graduates, charmingly collegiate in black caps and gowns, who listened perhaps just as inattentively while learned men discoursed on weighty subjects; from all these to the more mature men and women who stand with definite accomplishments already on their record and receive the higher degrees and honorary awards from chosen institutions. A mighty host in whose hands lies America's hope and in a measure, the future destiny of the world!

Platitudes without number will be given these graduates, countless precepts will be quoted, heroic and worthy examples will be held up to them for emulation; and the gates of oratory will be opened wide to admit the flood of eloquence that deluges the country upon the occasion of the annual closing of school sessions. These do great good and often strike responsive chords among the listeners. However, no matter what rank, or from what grade of institution, every graduating group is divided roughly into two classes—those for whom the occasion is really the beginning of a new life, and those whom it is not "commencement" but a "consummation."

From the latter, will come that self-satisfied type of person, proud of his own little achievements, smugly complacent and pursuing his own ends with avidity. He is contented with the present and does not worry about the future and gives little thought to others. To some of these, their birth might be said to have been the consummation for when they shake off this mortal coil, despite their academic equipment, they will have made little progress since their first advent into this world and passed on no lasting contribution by which their friends might proudly or gratefully remember them. Those in the grades who belong to this group will go no further but will make up that class of workers who plod through life. This type in high school thinks that his secondary school education is all-sufficient and will launch out on what will probably be a career of little service. That same type among graduates of higher institution will become either just as ordinary citizens wasting his educational sustenance, or one of those obnoxious "college graduates" whose vulgar display of learning reflects little credit upon his respective Alma Mater.

The first group is the hope of humanity. It is they who, in the lower institutions, consider that particular "graduation" but a stepping-stone to greater heights, but a mile in the long path to complete mastery of a subject or an idea. It is they who have initiative, courage to overcome obstacles, zeal for whatever cause or ideal they hold dear, and who will become the leaders in their respective walks of life. To them every "graduation" will be but a "commencement" and every honor or achievement but a signal to render yet further service or seek new worlds to conquer. True it is that some of this class will become those that the great dramatist had in mind when he wrote of "vaulting ambition which o'erleaps itself," but even in their excesses, these often do great good.

With these words, bid them God-speed and wish them success in their chosen futures. Let them pause awhile with the thought and contemplate whether "graduation" is going to be in fact a "consummation" or is it really "commencement!"—Scottish Rite News.

RESOLUTIONS OF RESPECT.

At its regular meeting held June 3rd, 1925, the Board of Eighth Street Christian Church was forcibly reminded of the distinct loss by the recent and sudden death of Mr. J. L. Carper, a most faithful and conscientious member. He has been a member of this board for many years, during which time he attended regularly, with the exception on such occasions his health would not permit. He was always interested in the matters coming up for attention and his views always received careful consideration, for the other members had a high regard for his judgment on any question of church affairs.

Therefore, the following resolutions were offered and carried unanimously:

Be it Resolved: First. That in what we consider the untimely passing of our faithful member, we cannot, but keenly realize the heavy loss that has come to us, as we shall miss his sincere and wise counsel in the future meetings of our board.

Second: We shall also be deprived of the pleasant association of a high class christian gentleman who had the kindest feelings for the rights of others, and a man who carried a pleasant expression whether in church affairs or in his daily social and business relations.

Third: While we know his place cannot be filled, we are thankful that we have, had his life for example, and we are thankful too for the high principles that he stood for and the noble service that he has rendered.

Fourth: That we extend his wife and daughter our sincere sympathy in this sad hour, and join them in the sincere belief that he is now being rewarded for his well spent life while on earth.

Fifth: That a copy of these resolutions be inscribed in our minutes, a copy be sent to his family, and a copy be handed to the local press for publication.

Respectfully submitted,
W. H. WOOLARD,
W. E. HOOKER,
MRS. H. H. SETTLE,
Committee.
