These expenditures which are fixed by legislation continue from year to year and ordinarily are not subject to change.

There has been recent discussion of the possibility of abandoning for a time the annual appropriation of around $430,000,000 for retirement of the public debt.

In setting up the sub-committee Byrns said that interest on the debt and the retirement of appropriations should doubtless be continued.

CUPID ACTIVE ON SATURDAY

Eleven Couples Apply for Licenses to Wed Here During Christmas Eve.

The holiday siege of Dan Cupid in Pitt County shattered a three-year-old record and set up a new mark for the young god of love to shoot at in future years.

This fact was revealed today in the records of marriages in the office of Register of Deeds J. C. Gas-kins. After a week of intense activity among the lovers, the mythological god of love sent eleven couples to obtain licenses to marry Saturday, Christmas Eve. Over two-score licenses had been issued several days prior to the time.

Six of those applying for licenses Saturday were white and the remainder colored. They came from many parts of the county, but Greenville led the list with Farmville taking second place and Chocoma and Winterville vying for third position.

With the "love fever" still in the air, employees in the office of the Register of Deeds were expecting numbers of others to venture "into the unknown realm of bliss" between now and the first of the year. In fact, that period between Christmas and January is usually an active one in this county, and with the past record as a marker, this year was expected to prove no exception.

Those obtaining licenses to wed Saturday, follow:

Fred Barber to Miss Larine Caton, of Chocoma; Elbert Elks to Miss Louise Lawrence, Grimsland; Furney Tripp to Miss Mabel McGown, Greenville; Christ Katsoner to Miss Novella Jones, Greenville; Jefferson Jones to Miss Ruth Hardee, Greenville; Seabrook Smith to Miss Pattie Dudley. ABOUT TOWN

The Yuletide passed pleasantly in Greenville and found men and women in every walk of life striving to do something just to make the lives of others happy.

This pertained especially to benevolent organizations and their members who put forth unusual efforts this year to carry cheer to the firesides of those who would have known little of the joy of the season without such aid.

Through the Salvation Army,
the Welfare Department and other organizations, hundreds of gifts were distributed among the indigent and men and women who wondered where the next meal would come from were overjoyed when they were presented with well-filled baskets of foodstuffs.

Many children who had been told that Santa Claus would not come because of hard times found their dreams of his coming fulfilled, and many a fire-side was made happy and joyful by presents distributed through various funds for this purpose.

The city is to be congratulated on the way it came through with gifts for the poor. The spirit of humanitarianism speaks great things for the future and shows men and women, despite reverses in life, still are striving to do their best to make others happy at this season of the year. And is not this the thing that really makes Christmas what it should be?

New Year is just around the corner and men and women who make a habit of keeping a check upon themselves will turn their attention to inventory. This will not only mark those who constitute the business world, but countless others who wish to know what they have done to improve their own lives.

Inventorying is a very important thing. It shows what one has to carry over into the new year, and that carried over represents largely achievements of the past year.

Some of us probably did not achieve as much as we would have liked. In fact, many of us were not able to make desired progress in a material way because of unusual business conditions, but we still have the same physical resources and possibilities to carry over into the new year, and if used properly, the close of another year should find us considerably farther than we are today.

The spiritual side of life should not be forgotten as we bring the inventory to an end. It is one of the most important factors in respect and if given the consideration which it so surely deserves, should strengthen us for the great task ahead: causing us to reach new heights of achievement.

The people of this section of the state are to be congratulated upon the splendid record set on the highways during the Christmas holidays. Of course, we had numbers of minor accidents, but only one, or two serious ones.

Had not driving been more careful this customary, the story from hospitals and morgues would have been an entirely different kind. The value of human life apparently is being more keenly appreciated and the lack of accidents shows that people who previously were willing to take chances at the expense of life and property are doing their best to cut down the holiday toll.

seaman having died here previously of his burns.

Buying Barbara

by Julia Cleft-Addams • Author of "YOU CAN'T BUY IT"

SYNOPSIS: Farrell Armitage is determined to win Barbara Quentin, although Barbara is to be married to the cruel (and crippled) Mark Lodely in five days. Lella Cane had expected Farrell to propose to her;
when he confesses his love for Barbara, Lella agrees to help him. So Farrell tangles Barbara's wedding plans by persuading Mark to visit him in London the day set for the ceremony. Now, in a cupboard of Mark and Barbara's new home, Farrell and Barbara find a portrait of Lella and Mark. She is wearing the handsome emerald Mark just has given Barbara.

Chapter 13

BARBARA DESPERATE

"That's an interesting—quite an interesting piece of work. Isn't it?"

The words came clearly—Farrell thought that Barbara Quentin, whatever her extremity, would always speak with that chiselled clearness; but the lingering softness of voice had gone. It was the voice of a woman, harsh with fear and grief, that said carefully and clearly how very technically interesting was this revealing portrait. A heart-wrenching voice. . . . Armitage dared not take his eyes from the floor.

that she had taken off the pendant and that it dangled, at the end of its chain, from her half-open hand.
As he approached her, the hand relaxed entirely and, with a colling gleam of platinum, the jewel slid on to the boards beside her chair.

"What about a cup of coffee in that efficient-looking kitchen?" he suggested. "I make extremely good coffee."

She looked up, faintly smiling. Her face was stained with tears and there was a mark on her lower lip where she had bitten it nearly through;
but her gaze was candid, grateful—fundamentally uninterested in him as a man. It was evident that she had not heard what had been jotted out of him by the first uprush of her misery. She said:

"I make excellent coffee, but I'm afraid I haven't any here. I suppose cocoa wouldn't do?"

Farrell, looking down at her, shook his head no. He was afraid that he might shatter this first moment in which she knew a need of him, however slight. She pointed to a corner.

"There are deck chairs over there.
Perhaps you'll bring one nearer the fire?"

He fetched it, installed her in it and took the chair she had vacated.
He sat astride it, his arms folded across the back as hers had been,

member how good you've been."

Chapter 14

BARBARA EXPLAINS

"You'll go Mark's way? I wonder if you can tell me why?"
Barbara was startled.

"But—" She gestured round the room and the gesture was, to Farrell, pathetic. "We are to be married," she said simply. "I thought I had told you."

"Oh, yes, you told me. And I know you will tell me next that you love each other. But what you feel for Mark isn't love."

She lay back in the chair, her heavy lids closed, her hands exhaustedly upon her knees.

"Someone else has told you so already," she exclaimed. And, as she nodded—"Well, whoever it was didn't make you see sense, so I'm going to. And I'm adding this bit of news—Mark doesn't love you."

"Ah, but, you see," she said, un-stirring, "he does. He does love me."

"I think not. A man who loves a woman—Armitage took breath for the brutality of it—"doesn't put off his wedding-day for a jaunt to Town."

A quiver ran through her and the faint color that had crept into her face, drained away again; but she did not open her eyes.

"Has he—done that?"

"Yes. Next Thursday he's coming to stay with me for a bit, to meet some people who may be of use to him. . . . Don't pretend that although it went against the grain, he felt he owed it to you, or anything like that, because—"

"I wasn't going to pretend. He has postponed our marriage before and no even for such a good reason as a visit to London."

Bewildered, astonished, Armitage could only give a quick laugh.

"All the same," she went on, cutting into his excitement, "he does love me. I know it, beyond any manner of doubt; in his own way, he always has and—in his own way —he always will. As for me, whatever you call that feeling that I have for him, it's the strongest I've ever known. The strongest, the clearest, the most unchanging."

"Rot! It's nothing but a habit of mind—a fixation, don't they call it?
—a childish misconception—"

"No. I didn't cultivate pity for Mark because I promised his father I would. I was able to promise because of my pity."

"Pity! Pity isn't love."

"With me, it is. And it isn't only pity—it's—it's—there's a sort of honor in being desperately needed. I fulfill a need in Mark."

He wheeled abruptly upon her.
"I want you, Barbara Quentin, to forget Mark for a few minutes, and think of me."

She gave her faint, frank little smile.

"I am thinking about you already. I was just going to ask you why you invited Mark to stay with you on a day which you knew was his wedding day."

He had hoped for this.

"Because I don't want you to marry him on Thursday. Or at all."

Her smile vanished.

"I want you to marry me," he said.

Her heavy lids flew open. She struggled up in the chair and he put out a hand to draw her to her feet. But she ignored it.

"You aren't joking," she said half to herself, staring up at him.

"No. Oh, no, I'm not joking. I've waited all my life for you and now that I've found you I don't feel a bit like joking; though I warn you that I may presently break into song. . . . My dear, if you felt for Lodely what you are capable of feeling for the man you love, I'd bow myself out and wish you well—I'd do more, I'd ransom Europe for a doctor who would make Mark walk. I'd get his cleverness acknowledged, marketed; I'd never let him go you want—"

"Oh, could you do all these heavenly things for Mark?"

"Damn Mark!" he shouted. "Yes, of course I could—what's the good of wealth if it doesn't stretch to things like that? But for the moment I'm telling you that you're deluding yourself. Your pity is for Mark—all right, I don't deny that.
But your love is for me."

She put her hands up to her temples as though they throbbed.

"Am I made or did you and I meet this evening for the first time, when you helped me with Mark?"

He sat down again on the wooden chair and faced her across the mean little fire.

"The point is that I have found you and you are not yet married to anyone else. You may think I have played a trick upon you by taking Mark away next Thursday but you'll admit it was my only means of gaining a short time; a short chance to make you see that if you would allow yourself, you could love me."

"I don't know what to say to you."

"There's no need to say anything.
In a way, the definite things were said when we were born—"

"You must please let me speak! I meant, of course, that I don't know what to say because I should terribly like to snub you. But—"

"It's quite useless for you to turn me down. Or rather, I've allowed for the probability of your turning me down again and again—"

"In that one respect then," she said very crisply, "I shall not disappoint you."

She dragged herself out of her chair and turned away. He considered that she looked lovelier in her anger than in any other mood, her face stung to the pale rose color and her eyes dark and bright and cold.

He watched her go, without a glance at the portrait on the floor, to where she had laid aside her coat.

"You'll take me back now, please?" she requested, shaking out the furs.

"Oh, yes, I'll take you back," Ar-mitage sighed sharply. "I'll let you drive, too, if you want to. My generosity of spirit is an aspect of me that I particularly want you to study."

He could not see her face as she bent over the furs, but he sensed that again her mood was veering.

"We will resume our discussion," he said, carefully flippant. "And we shall yet go to Bogey Cove by moonlight and either be devoured or permitted to drown."

"Have you told Mark why you insisted on Thursday?"

"No. You'll do that."

She still kept her face averted, but she put aside the coat.

She stood there for a few minutes, by the door, and gazed back at the fire she had left; she gave the curious suggestion that it was telling her something—frightening her to leave it until—unless—? Then she walked back to it very slowly and as though magnetized.

She dropped again into the deck chair and sat leaning forward, her hands clasped and drooping, her mind utterly withdrawn from him.

He, too, had returned to the fire.
He stood with an elbow on the narrow ledge above it and waited. She was now so many fathoms deep in herself that he knew the humiliation of non-existence; and yet he was afraid to make any noise than would shatter the delicate world into which she had gone.

All his life, he was to remember these slow minutes—these fascinating, inexplicable, maddening minutes—in which he waited motionless for her to come back.

The quality of their silence had nearly mesmerised him also, when suddenly she spoke. Only her voice, he thought, could float out like that,

so low, so clear—one with the firelight, the stillness, the night hurrled.

"Is it possible," she said, "to make a bargain with you?"

He stilled waited.

"If I promised to marry you without loving you, without even liking or admiring you very much, would you make Mark well?"

"No," he said politely. "No, I'm afraid that wouldn't be at all possible."

He was so angry with her that he dared not move.

Laurinburg, Dec. 26.—(AP)—Police here last night said no arrest had been made, but that they expected positive results shortly as a result of their investigations of the shooting last night of C. D. Smith, a flour mill superintendent. Smith was called from his home early in the evening and, as he opened his door, a shotgun charge fired from the darkness struck him in the upper part of the face. The wounds were painful but not serious. Just after the first charge, Smith ducked and as he did, a second charge passed over his head. He said a man then jumped into an automobile and fled. The superintendent said he knew of no reason for the attack or for the sending of a threatening letter he said he received several months ago.

Manger Scene Attracts Visitors

The miniature Nativity group in front of the Catholic Church has drawn many visitors since it has been put on display Christmas eve. In a straw thatched stable are seen the infant in the manger, Mary and Joseph, their visitors the shepherds—and also the wise men from the east. The setting is laid in a cluster of long leaf pine and illuminated at night by varied colored lights. A much larger and complete group are to be found in the church. Visitors are welcome any time of the day. The church will be kept open every evening this week until nine o'clock.

Two Minor Fires Here On Sunday

The fire department was able to spend the Christmas holidays in comparative quiet with exception of two minor fires Sunday. My Beauty Hint.

By BARBARA PEPPER (Stage Actress)

In making a "cupid's bow" on their lips, I think too many women, especially actresses, carry the lines of the lipstick too far.

An attractive "cupid's bow" is possible by confining the lines entirely to the lips. There is no necessity to carry the coloring to such extremes that one seems to have twice as large lips as they really are.

Even the best permanent leaves little locks of hair at the nape of the neck, which are so worrisome to a bobbed head.

My way of thwarting these wisps as to saturate a small bit of cotton with an oily hair dressing and with an upward stroke collect them.

Then with the middle finger I fasten the locks with a small invisible hairpin. The hair dressing seems to dry them in this position.

NEW INLET IS SHIFTED

Nature Accomplishes Another Feat to Water Line in County of Dare.

Raleigh, Dec. 27.—(AP)—Forces of nature have shifted the new inlet near the Pea Island Coast Guard station in Dare county several hundred feet. W. H. Riley, assistant engineer of the Department of Conservation and Development, reported today.

The inlet from the sea to Pamlico Sound was cut by a severe storm last March.

Changes in the new inlet section, which is near the location of the channel dredged across the banks in 1924, but which subsequently was closed by the force of the winds and tides, were reported by Riley as being of great significance.

The storm-cut channel has shifted gradually southward with a recent disturbance accentuating this action, said the engineer. Along the principal radius of the opening, its shift prior to the storm was reported at about 400 feet and during the storm, about 300 feet, a total movement of about 700 feet.

Investigations by the engineer disclosed a tendency of the inlet toward closure which had been predicted after its breach by the storm. At one point in the inlet, the depth and width were reported, as being about the same as immediately after its opening, but the sound end revealed a tendency for the formation of shoals, making it almost impossible to trace a channel.

The fishing interests of the coastal section have been greatly concerned over the future of the new inlet, which is believed to have been a factor in increasing the supply of migratory fish reported in the area last season.

Hints on Contract Bridge Up-to-Date

LET THE ENEMY ERR By Tom O'Neill

One distinguishing mark of the expert is ability to discern how a difficult contract can be fulfilled.

When a hand has been bid to the hilt, perhaps overbid, he will study the dummy a long time as soon as it goes down and think of the possible lay of cards in the adversaries' hands which would enable success with perfect defense. If so such combination occurs to him he will try to give the adversaries opportunity to err to his advantage.

If only one possible pattern of favorable card holdings suggests itself, the expert will conduct his offense on the assumption that the favorable condition exists.

Here was a difficult game contract fulfilled in the American Bridge League's national championship by Waldemar von Zedtwitz, who knows all systems of bidding and is friendly with the proponents of each:

MORE NORTH
♠ K64	♥ 84
♦ Q1092	♣ 876
WEST
♠ Q72	♥ 109
♦ 93	♣ QJ1075
♠ 8643	♥ A75
♦ Q532	♣ AJ4
SOUTH
♠ A853	♥ AK62
♦ K	♣ K109
REALER

The bidding was: East one heart; south double; west pass; north two diamonds; east pass; south two spades; west pass; north three spades; east pass; south four spades. West led the ten of hearts, which held the trick, von Zedtwitz taking pains not to cover. A second heart was trumped by declarer.

It occurred to von Zedtwitz that there might be many ways the contract could be set, but if the adverse trumps were divided three and two and east held the ace of clubs, as the opening bid would seem to indicate, and west held the queen of diamonds, the hand might be made. South led the ace and king of spades, then a low spade, which east had of take with the queen, west discarding a diamond, an error. This scheme enabled the adversaries to make only one heart, one trump and the ace of clubs, von Zedtwitz finessing He also probably will do his own the diamond knave after leading the "Berkeley Square"

Washington Daybook

By HERBERT PLUMMER

Washington, Dec. 27.—Opinion in Washington, as Congress moved in to the Christmas holiday recess, was pretty well agreed that only a miracle can save President-Elect Roosevelt and the Democrats from an extra session after next March 4.

The hopes and plans of the leaders to make of this, what now appears to be the last "lame duck" session of Congress, a constructive one just seem to have not been realized up to now. Whether more speed will be shown after Christmas remains to be seen.

The Senate for example, spent day after day wrangling over the Philippine independence bill. Finally, a bill was passed, but at the moment the senators were voting senate spokesmen usually close to the White House were warning that a presidential veto might be expected.

Work Moves Slowly In the House high hopes were entertained by Chairman Byrnes of the appropriations committee that at least three of the big government supply bills would be out of way by Christmas.

The representatives were purposefully given two or three days to "let off steam" and Speaker Garner expressed it, so that they would settle down to work. Little progress was made, however.

The time limit alone on this short session is enough to clog the house calendars. Any outside interference makes progress almost impossible.

And indications are that there will be plenty of outside interference in the future.

Beer Bill Takes Up Time The beer bill, for instance, even if it passes both house and senate, must still run the presidential gauntlet. And there are many who believe such a bill is contrary to Hoover's views on prohibition.

Further evidence of conflict between capitol hill and the White House is seen in the senate's refusal to consider confirmation of Mr. Hoover's appointments.

TAR HEELS TO MAKE ANOTHER TITLE BATTLE

Chapel Hill, Dec. 27.—Barely nosed out in the Southern Conference race last year by Georgia, the University of North Carolina quiet appears determined to make another valiant effort to capture the coveted title this year.

The Tar Heels won the Conference Tournament in 1922, 1924, 1925 and 1926. No other institution has ever turned the trick more than once; one year the Tar Heels did it without a coach.

Another year, 1928, found them the favored team, but two leading stars sprained ankles in the last game before the tournament.

Carolina's basketball fortunes got a fall after that, but Coach Sheppard, coaching his first varsity team, came along last year and sent them soaring up again.

Unseeded dark horses, the Tar Heels upset two of the favorites—Kentucky and Auburn—and fought their way brilliantly to the finals, only to lose the title 26-24.

The Tar Heels have their eyes and hearts set on the title this year, but the upward path looks hard, rocky and tortuous.

Carolina has eight lettermen, including three of its regulars, back with prospects of another good team but Coach Sheppard will have a big job replacing Tom Alexander, captain and All-Southern guard, and Paul Edwards, his center.

Coach Sheppard, however, has a knack of getting many things done well, and he and his team will be watched closely for the power and the color that they pack and for the basketball tradition at Carolina against which they will be playing.

Coach Sheppard, who is from Wilmington, is still in his twenties and was mistaken several times for a player at last year's journey.

He attended Carolina as a freshman, went to Army a year and made All-Eastern guard his first season.

Returning to Carolina to finish up his work for a degree, he also worked on the side and became successively Assistant Graduate Manager, Director of Intramural Athletics, Freshman basketball coach, and Varsity basketball coach.

He made a fine record in each capacity and still handles the duties of all these jobs except freshman coach. Charles T. Woolen, the Graduate Manager, says he is "as good an assistant as he is a coach."

SPORT SLANTS

By ALAN GOULD

Bill Cunningham, of the Boston Post, didn't cast a ballot in the 1932 Associated Press poll, which may or may not interest some two hundred others who did so.

In fact, Bill couldn't find his ballot and didn't even hear about it, but the two hundred or so others who did find them and reported their version will join me, no doubt, in enthusiastic rejection of the Bostonian's implication there was something very mysterious, as well as unsatisfactory (to him) in the results which rated the performances of Gene Sarazen and Ellsworth Vinn.

No. 1 and No. 2 for the year in all sporting activities.

Of a more rugged and two-fisted school which seemingly resents the prominence of such sports as golf and tennis, the former Dartmouth football player and team-mate of Gus Sonenberger, says of Sarazen: "Call him the greatest golfer of 1932. Even call his feat of its sort the most amazing, but in an Olympic year that saw such historical performances as American athletes turned in, in a year that saw some pretty rugged individual feats turned in by college football players, pause a little before you make it unanimous on this 'greatest American athlete' question."

Track Stars Named

Notwithstanding Mr. Cunningham who personally paused too long before acquainting us with his views, it was not unanimous in this year's poll. In fact Sarazen's margin of leadership was much smaller than Pepper Martin's in the 1931 poll, but it was also clear-cut.

Moreover, it wasn't that the boys overtook our Olympic track stars. Far from it. Toland, Bausch and Carr were well up in the first ten and totaled 86 votes altogether, more than any other sport.

What is a Sport?

Sarazen in particular and golf in general do not require an elaborate defense. Neither does the poll, which seeks merely to set forth the views of the country's sports observers on the outstanding performers, performances and developments of the year.

If there wasn't room for argument there would be no necessity of conducting these annual examinations of opinion. If there were no differences of opinion, the sports pages would be dull reading indeed.

It happens, however, that in the U. S. A. sport has developed an enthusiasm for skillful performance, for super-talent in any sphere of competition, whether the well known "body contact" element is involved or not.

The prime requisite nowadays is not based upon brute force. There are many, indeed, who do not consider wrestling or weight-lifting a sport, though both flourish and have their place. Who is there who can competently weight the factors involved in sport, combative and non-combative, with an answer as to which carries the highest measure of skill, courage and stamina?

NEGRO HELD FOR CRIMINAL ATTACK ON WHITE WOMAN

placed in custody, but officers said footprints from the Waters' home were identical with those found at the negro's house. Mrs. Waters was also said to have identified the voice of the negro as that of the man who attacked her. Sheriff's officers also said they found at the home of the negro a wet pair of overalls believed to have been used at the time of the alleged attack.

Mrs. Rogers, mother of four children, and a tenant on the Harrington farm, said the man came through a window in another section of the house from which she was sleeping, made his way to her room, threw her out of a window and attempted to attack her. She resisted him so vigorously that he gave up the attack at this point and dragged her to an outbuilding where it was said the crime was committed.

Officers were immediately notified of the assault, and picking up the footprints at the scene of the crime, tracked the negro to his home where he was arrested and held for court action.

Officers said Mrs. Waters is about 30 years of age and had been employed on the Harrington farm for some time. Although she is married, it was said she had not been living with her husband for some time. She was alone with her children when the negro was alleged to have entered the building.

YULE SEASON IS OBSERVED QUIETLY HERE

of the county principal thought was centered around providing for the unfortunate of the citizenship. The Salvation Army, co-operating with firemen and various other organizations distributed between a hundred and two hundred Christmas dinner baskets last Saturday afternoon.

Last night the organization gave a Christmas tree at the hall on Dickinson Avenue, and hundreds of those who would have gone giftless during the holidays were made glad with gifts and fruits and candies.

The final Christmas musical program was rendered by the choir of Memorial Baptist Church Sunday evening. The cantata was presented under the direction of Mrs. Lula Fleming and was one of the outstanding of the season. Various other programs were rendered by other city churches preceding Christmas and all of them were largely attended.

As Christmas Day fell on Sunday, was observed as a general holiday throughout the city. Stores, banks and other public buildings were closed during the day and the entire citizenship turned its attention to real observances of the Yule season.

While there was considerable shooting of fireworks in all sections, no injuries from this activity were reported today.

Scores of people visited relatives in other communities, but those staying at home confined their attention to disposing of the usual amount of Christmas goodies and attending Christmas parties given in various homes.

About NEW YORK

By WILLIAM GAINES

New York, Dec. 23.—If there were a race of Lilliputians exant, they could send their envoys to this nation's "toy capital" on Fifth Avenue and buy themselves the mechanical devices of a civilized state, ready made.

So faithfully do the playthings of today mirror their larger models, which we use in our workaday world, that a race of people a few inches tall could duplicate nearly all of our comforts and conveniences by adapting the toys to their ends.

Of course the Lilliputians would have to plug into electrical current somewhere, for so many of the wondrous toys on the counters are electrically operated. But that problem could be solved readily enough, and it would be much more advantageous for the tiny people than winding springs to move their machines.

They could get all of the necessary transport facilities, from trains to automobiles, right off the shelves of the toy capital. Diminutive engines would run their industrial plants, made from the improved blocks and structural steel sets.

Modern doll houses would make luxurious dwellings for them. They could clothe themselves in the height of fashion from the doll wardrobes and from the doll accessory stocks get everything they needed from furniture to knives and forks.

And if the Lilliputians were of a mind to, they could slay each other quite efficiently and work devastation in their toy civilization with the guns from the pawnshop counters.

"The toy capital" is a grouping of the display rooms of top manufacturers. About 150 makers are represented.

To this center the buyers for retail shops come from near and far at any time of the year to order their "toy stocks." How they get away without buying more than they possibly sell I can't see (and actually, some of them don't.)

Daring Constance

Constance Bennett, here with her marquis, the former Mr. Swanson, showed New York a new adaptation of the long bob which had the girls panting.

The big ballyhoo which built la Bennett into such a style paragon still keeps feminine eyes aflutter to see what she "has on," how her hair is fixed, what shade her nails are tinted.

But the sad truth is that not many women can get by with duplicating the Bennett effects, which the star herself confesses are "accentuated." Bizarre Joan Crawford once told me that even she could not dress in the "daring" manner of Constance.

Speaking of Coiffures

A hairdresser to fine ladies, with a salon in the East Fifties, speaks six languages. Like many another hairdresser, and barber, he keeps up a line of chatter at his work (pardon me, his art), shifting from one language to the other.

This fascinates the ladies, but gives some of them suspicious moments. After flattering them in words they can understand, why, my dear, does he sputter those things in some strange tongue?

After telling madame she is very lovely does he, in Russian, Hungarian or something else, add: "Like a big fat pig?"

New York Cotton

New York, Dec. 27.—(AP)—Cotton futures opened steady, three points lower to two higher on Southern selling and late buying.

Prices held within range of three or four points during the first half hour with the market ruling net unchanged to two points lower.

Trading continued very light later in the morning. Small offerings were absorbed by trade buying and prices held steady. At midday March was around 5.91 and July 6.16, about net unchanged to one point higher.

Stock Market

New York, Dec. 27.—(AP)—Stocks trading rose lazily into the late dealings today with prices of most leading shares down fractionally. Transfers approximated 700,000 shares.

Trading was resumed listlessly in the stock market today and the holiday week-end failed to bring any new stimulus.

American Tobacco turned nearly two points and Lorillard dipped moderately.

Recession of industrial fractions appeared in American Telephone, Radio, Westinghouse and General Foods.

The steel issues eased slightly, while Allied Chemical and Continental Carbon were a shade higher.

In the oil seaboard, which has been a poor favorite, was bid up a point.

Two Held for Murder

Raleigh, Dec. 27.—(AP)—Mrs. E. B. Forsythe, Raleigh woman, today was ordered held with privilege of bond following the death in a hospital here last night of Miss Myrtle Gardner, 29, Four Oaks teacher, from what doctors said was a criminal operation.

Bond was set at $10,000 for Geo. Clifton, of Coats, ordered held as an accessory before and after the fact.

Miss Gardner, formerly of Angier, was removed from the home of Mrs. Forsythe to the hospital yesterday, Chief of Police Barbour said.

Mrs. Forsythe and Clifton had been arrested previously on charges of being accessories of the criminal operation but the more serious charge was lodged after the young teacher's death.

The warrant charged Mrs. Forsythe with murder. Police said she tried to escape when they went to arrest her, declaring they overtook her in a car.

Sheriff Numa Turner said Miss Gardner made a deathbed statement to two doctors and a nurse and it was upon this information the charges were brought against the man and woman.

Held for Attacking Wife

Laurinburg, Dec. 27.—(AP)—Dr. W. C. Caldwell, well-known veterinary surgeon, was bound over to Superior Court today after a preliminary hearing on charges of assaulting his wife with intent to kill.

Holdup at Rocky Mount

Rocky Mount, Dec. 27.—(AP)—William Parrish and Mervin Barnes, employees of a theatre here, were held up and robbed of $485 late last night in the hallway of a bank building.

Parrish and Barnes had gone to the bank to deposit the theatre's receipts and told police a man with a handkerchief over his face stuck a pistol in their faces and forced them to hand over the bag with the money. Police are without clues.
