Left to himself, now spurned, and now at least endured by his growing companions, Jacques Cocast made a friend of his book, and found the exceeding reward of such friendship. He could read, write and cypher, to the shame of many of his seniors. Jacques Cocast's father took sudden pride in his own misshapen flesh, and Cocast's wife stormed at her stepson with increasing vigor.

The notary wanted a clerk. All eyes were turned upon Jacques as the very lad for the office. The notary himself condescended to canvass the pretensions of Jacques to the dignity. Already Jacques felt himself installed, when a slim, fair-haired, pink-complexioned youth was preferred to Cocast, the notary's wife having pithily informed her obedient husband, that his house should be no dwelling place for a hunchback.

Jacques Cocast sighed as he turned from the notary's door, and his heart beat heavily as he crawled to his paternal home. In two or three days, however, the hunchback smiled and laughed as before, and the clerkship was forgotten in sweet communings with his book.

Some four years passed on—when oh, shame to the notary's wife—shame to the fair-haired youth—the faithless woman fled from the bosom of her husband, taking with her her husband's clerk. Great was the consternation throughout the village—loud and deep the revilings of every honest spouse.—Jacques Cocast joined in no abuse but with a fine charity for the inexperience of youth, with even a tenderness towards the sin of the unfaithful wife, and considering within himself the subtle powers of the tempter, he felt grateful for his escape, and breathed his gratitude in his wonted syllables,

"Thank God for my hunch!"

Jacques Cocast was now a painstaking, philosophic tailor; and from no higher elevation than his shopboard, could look down on many of the vanities of human life. He was now twenty, and increasing years had only served to mellow his rich heart and make him feel a lessening load upon his shoulders.—Jacques would make one at all village holidays, led thereto by his own light-heartedness, and of late, furthermore urged to each festival by the blue eyes of Felicite, the baker's daughter.

Luckless Jacques Cocast! Fly the sweet perdition! You know not the falsehood of those azure lights—the venom of that pouting, pulpy lip. Felicite laughs with a witch's laugh at the love of the hunchback—whilst he, poor innocent—exalted, sublimated by his passion, lives in an atmosphere of balm and sun—vaults like a grasshopper about the earth, and gives his heart and soul to the tyranny that rejoices him. Jacques Cocast knew not vanity. He would clothe himself in the humblest weed, and then think that the best wardrobe which drew to itself the least notice. Now was it otherwise. The eyes of Felicite had smiled upon the tailor, and Jacques Cocast should henceforth be the best and the most critical customer to Jacques Cocast. If Felicite had looked with favor on his body, he would take the hitherto despised article under his future care, and habit it worthy of her who elected it as her own. As for his hump, that was gone, yea, vanished, melted in the sunlight of Felicite's eyes. With these rejoicing thoughts, Jacques Cocast would array himself finely as the finest caterpillar: his vestments now barred, and spotted, and burnished with a hundred hues.—And as he basked in the smiles of Felicite, the baker's wicked daughter would laugh in her hollow heart, and the folks of the village would confidentially clap their fingers to their noses, and wink towards the tailor.

For a month or more was Jacques Cocast the blissful Adam of this fool's paradise. For a full month did he breathe Elysium. At length the eyes of Jacques Cocast were opened and he saw his forlornness. It was the day of a ducasse. In the pride of his heart, and in all the glory of his trade, did the hunchback array himself to dance with Felicite, the baker's daughter. She had of late been so loving, so complying, so tender. The next dance may be at their wedding. At all events, how they would dance on the coming holiday. He, the hunchback, buoyed by his own loving heart, would foot it so lightly, that not a blade of grass should bend beneath him—not a dew-drop be scattered by his mercurial toe.

The dancers are assembled. The fiddlers sound. Jacques Cocast, in all the glories of a new suit, burning like a peacock in the conflict of colors, and in the triumph of a gladdened soul, advances to lead out Felicite, the baker's daughter. Already he has his hand upon her hand, when a gigantic thumb and finger, with vicelike power, gripes the nose of Jacques Cocast and whirls him from his partner. A laugh that drowns the fiddles burst upon the merrymakers. Jacques Cocast, with lightning in his eyes, and all the blood in his body rushing to his nose, looks for his assailant.

Hercule Grossetete, a rival of six feet, French measure, with fierce eyes, and parrot nose, glaring and protruding from between raven whiskers, with arms a-kimbo, stands before the tailor. Nevertheless, the soul of Jacques Cocast is mighty, and he is meditating how he may best spring upon the giant, and tear his iron heart from his body, when—oh, ye daughters of Eve! oh, ye rosy wickedness, ye honeyed poisons! Felicite, the baker's daughter, advanced to Hercule, and curtseying, and putting her hand in his—yet warm from the outraged nose of her doating lover, signified that she was ready to dance, that she had looked with eyes of favor on the punishment of the tailor. Then sank the heart of Jacques Cocast. He quitted the scene of his past agony of despair and wandered a very lunatic.

Foolish Jacques Cocast! Who would pity the despair of a hunchback? Who compassionate a love-broken heart, if accompanied by over-laden shoulders? What is a beautiful sentiment with a straight-backed, comely man, is a thing for a jest, an excellent joke with a hunchback. And so, Jacques Cocast, go home. Sleep not in the fields at night. Lie not under the window of the baker's daughter, and waste not away until, as you complain your head has grown too little for your hat—but up, man, and to your comfortable abode. Shave yourself, change your linen, leap upon your shop-board, thread your needle, heat your goose, and defy love. A friendly Genius whispered some such advice to Jacques Cocast, for, ere a month had passed, the tailor had once more taken to his sober attire, was seated smiling at his work, and if a thought of the cruel baker's daughter would sometimes intrude, he would banish the unwelcome guest by the very vehemence of stitching.

Months passed away, and the time of drawing for the conscription arrived. Mothers looked anxious—plighted maidens would frequently sigh and look with tender gaze upon their future husband—the young men would laugh, laugh louder than was their wont, to hush the secret care that preyed upon them. But what was the conscription, with the banishment, the danger, the wounds and death combined in the word, to Jacques Cocast? He was a hunchback.—His shoulders were exempt by nature from a knapsack. He was not a comely morsel for glory: he was not worthy the powder and shot bestowed upon prettiest men. No, he was secure in his deformity: his heart started not at the muttering of the beaten sheepskin. Hence Jacques Cocast, without one throb, save for the fate of some old acquaintance, might linger about the town hall of the arrondissement, and learn the fortune of his follow villagers.

The day of drawing came. There was the shriek of triumph as one sprang into his mother's arms, as his sister clung about his neck—as his plighted wife, and now their wedding day is certain—there were bursts of joy and tears of happiness as the exempt sprang among the crowd; and there were cries of despair, and sobbings as among breaking hearts, as the new conscripts told the fate that tore them from their homes.

"Thank God for my hunch!" cried Jacques Cocast, twenty times, as he saw the wretchedness of the conscript soldier.

Among those drawn to wear future laurels was Hercule Grossetete. He looked savage as a snubbed ogre: and the baker's beautiful daughter hung on his arm, and was crying her heart out and vowing between her sobs, that for the sake of her dear Hercule, she would try to live and die a maid; and Hercule, with his fancy listening to the whistling bullets, smiled vacantly on the magnanimity of Felicite, and bade Heaven help her in all her trials.

And did the heart of Jacques Cocast rejoice at this? By no means—he felt no triumph at the calamity of Grossetete—no pleasure at the grief of his fair, false baker's daughter: but with a gush of gratitude he exclaimed,

"Thank God for my hunch!"

Hercule Grossetete went to the wurs. Fortune who had heaped such obloquy upon the shoulders of Cocast, had fitted Grossetete for the dignity of a grenadier. He quitted the village, left the baker's daughter, and was soon marching, and perhaps, day-dreaming of his pilgrimage and epaulettes. We know not what struggles Felicite endured to keep her pledge to Hercule; they must have been severe and manifold; for it was at least six months after the departure of her grenadier that she wedded the son of the village grocer, the grocer father opportunely dying and leaving his stock and business to his only son. All the world, that is all the village, believed in the conjugal bliss of the grocer and his wife. Pierre Chandelles was so meek, so gentle a soul, any woman must be happy with him.

Again Felicite was always the sweetest-tempered girl; there had been curious tales of her sudden passion, but such tales had been trumped up by the ugliest girls of the village.

Three months had passed since Pierre and Felicite were one: and Jacques Cocast—for, in the magnanimity of his soul, he did not withdraw his custom from Pierre on account of his wife; besides Pierre's was the only shop in the village—modestly tapped a son on Pierre's counter, it being the intention of the tailor to dispense that coin for bees-wax. Suddenly there was a noise within; Jacques recognized the voice of Felicite, albeit he had never heard it at so high a pitch. Another minute and Pierre rushes into the shop, followed by his wife, who, heedless of the wants of a customer, heedless of the cries of her husband, demolished an earthen pipkin, unluckily in her hand, upon her lord and sovereign's head. No sheep ever bled with more meekness than did Pierre Chandelles, the grocer.

"What did you want?" asked Pierre, with still a vigilant eye to business.

"I'll call again when your wounds are dressed," said Jacques Cocast; in the mean time, "thank God for my hunch!"

Years went on, and Jacques Cocast gathered about him the small comforts of the world, and keeping the spirit of his youth, was blithe as a bird.

One autumn evening, wandering a mile or two on the road from the village, and thinking he knew not upon what, Jacques Cocast was suddenly startled in his reflections by a loud voice. "For the love of the saints, if you have it, give me a pinch of snuff."

The prayer proceeded from a poor blind soldier, seated on a tree, felled near the roadside.

"With all my heart," cried Cocast. "Here, empty my box."

"Alas, good sir," said the soldier, "look at me again."

Cocast looked and saw that he had lost both his arms.

"You must, indeed, give me the snuff," said the soldier.

"With all my heart, I say again," cried Cocast, and with the most delicate care he supplied the nostrils of the mutilated veteran. "Good Heaven!" suddenly exclaimed Cocast, "why, you are Hercule Grossetete."

"I am," answered the soldier. "And what have you to say to that?"

"What!" Jacques Cocast looking at the eyeless, armless victim of glory, could only say,

"Thank God for my hunch!"

Almost all men have a hunch of some kind. Let them, with Jacques Cocast, thank God for it.

THE FATAL PICTURE.

BY ABRAHAM ELDER, ESQ.

At the age of twenty-two, Fritz Bartholm returned to his father's house, after having finally completed his education at the university of Heidelberg. During the whole period of his residence there, he had studied with that depth and enthusiasm that appears to be almost peculiar to Germany. The only relaxation he allowed himself from his mathematical and other abstruse labors, was in running over the legendary lore of German superstition, now dipping into an absolete work upon astrology or magic, and then returning to the lighter and more amusing accounts of the "Wild Horseman of the Black Forest," or similar goblin tales. Of the world that surrounded him, he knew nothing, he cared nothing; and, except that he received from it the necessaries of life, he had little connection with mere earthly and corporeal matters.

When he did walk out, it was not to enjoy the fresh air and the sunshine, or even for wholesome exercise; but, after he had crammed his head so full of some difficult subject that it would hold no more, he found he could more easily arrange the ideas with which he had filled his brain by walking than by sitting still. When he was seen strolling along the public streets, with his lips moving, but his eyes observing nothing, he seemed like one walking in his sleep. Even though he had arrived at that susceptible age when youth has ripened into manhood, he never knew what love was. But this was not from want of susceptibility. The mind—the mind was gradually consuming the body. From his books, indeed, he had occasionally received some impressions of female beauty, vague, fantastic ideas of angelic princesses, and of fair virgins, in whom the quintessence of every beauty and every virtue was included. These occasionally visited him in his dreams, and even had been known to intrude themselves upon his thoughts during the hours of study; but, strange as it may appear, it never occurred to him to open his eyes, and look around him, and satisfy himself whether female beauty really did exist in this every-day world.

Well, Fritz, the student, returned to his father's house. Old Bartholm was a dry, sarcastic, business-like man; but, notwithstanding their total difference of character, their meeting was cordial. The room where they met was the old gentleman's small private room, in which he generally sat when alone.—It contained no books, for Bartholm was no reader; but there were hung up round the walls an old rusty rifle and a game-bag, which he used to carry when he was younger; his meerschaum and tobacco-pouch; and, standing upright upon a table, was the picture of a beautiful young lady, apparently about eighteen years of age. The colors of the painting were so fresh, that it appeared to have been newly painted, or, at any rate, newly varnished. The color of the cheek was redolent of youth and happiness, which, with the modest, downcast eye, appeared to be blushing with the consciousness of her own beauty.

The conversation soon flagged; for, between two such opposite characters, it may be well supposed that there were not many ideas in common.

After a pause, old Bartholm turned to his son and said, "Did you ever see anything more beautiful than that, such a heavenly painting of such a beautiful face?"

Fritz looked at the picture, and, for the first time in his life, he appeared to feel the tender influence of female beauty.

While he was gazing intently at the picture, his father asked him whether he could trace any likeness between the portrait and any of his acquaintance?

Fritz, without being able to take his eye from the canvass, replied in the negative.

"Do you trace any likeness between that lady and old Baron Von Grunfeld? for it is one of his family."

Fritz appeared almost to shrink back at the very idea of the relationship; for the Baron was what might be termed a most grotesque-looking man. The profile of his face might be described as a perpendicular straight, with a large triangular nose projecting from the centre of it. Every part of his features and of his figure was composed of straight lines and sharp angles; in short, his form was as far removed from the lines of beauty as could well be imagined; add to which, his manner was as stiff and formal as his personal appearance.

"Related to the Baron von Grunfeld?" said Fritz, in astonishment.

"Yes, so he says," dryly remarked old Bartholm, taking a pinch of snuff.

Why, I do not know, but taking a pinch of snuff at the end of a sentence, adds considerable to the dryness of a remark; and in the present instance it effectually deterred Fritz from making any further inquiries respecting the beautiful form before him.—Presently old Bartholm quitted the room, and left his son alone to his reflections.

"Old Baron von Grunfeld's daughter! Impossible! He might, however, have been united to a beautiful wife," (for he had been a widower for many years:) "and what woman, with anything short of the virtue of an angel, could have remained constant to such a caricature of a man?" His father's remark, and the dry way in which he uttered it, appeared to favor such a suspicion. He paused, and stood revelling, as it were, in the beauty before him. Such elegance of attitude!—that soft, gently-blushing cheek, that appeared almost to shrink from the caresses of her own auburn tresses, that hung in negligent profusion down her neck—the daughter of Baron von Grunfeld!

"Forbid it, oh ye gods!" he exclaimed, and then walked up and down the room several times in great agitation. "And is it true that such heavenly creatures really do walk the earth, and are not solely the invention of poets and painters? It must be so, it must be so:" thought he, reasoning to himself.—"How can a painter draw what he has never seen? How can a poet describe what he has never felt?"

Thus he continued agitating himself with his fluctuating thoughts; but every moment the beauty of the image before him was impressing itself more deeply and indelibly in his heart. At length the student became so much excited, that he lit his pipe, and sallied forth to try the soothing effects of tobacco, and the influence of the fresh air. He could not refrain from inquiring for the residence of the Baron, who was only a temporary resident in the neighborhood, but without any settled intention of calling upon him. His excitement was indeed such that he scarcely knew what he was about. Several times he passed the door, without making up his mind whether he should visit him or not. Their acquaintance, indeed, was but slight, and they had not met for many years; still there would have been nothing embarrassing in calling upon the old gentleman, had it not been for the intense agitation occasioned by everything in any way connected with the object of his adoration.

A person hackneyed in the ways of the world, will not, perhaps, be able to appreciate these feelings, nor understand the trifles that will stir up emotions in the mind of a youth so long secluded from the ordinary intercourse of mankind, and whose mind had been for a length of time feeding, as it were, upon his own imaginings. He did not know how, but it was possible that his visit might turn out to be injurious to his hopes. Again, he might meet her there, standing before him in all her bewitching loveliness. This thought, the dearest object of his wishes, was also an object of his dread. There is no intense love without a certain fear and tremor in the presence of the object beloved; and in a mind constituted like Fritz's, all these feelings would be increased a hundred fold.—In the state of agitation he was then in, thought he, he might not be likely to make a favorable impression upon her. He let go the door-bell, that he then actually held in his hand, and took another turn; but the further he retired from the door, the higher his courage mounted, and the more his desire, to see with his own eyes this angel upon earth, increased. Again, as he approached the door, his courage fell, and he passed it by. Again and again his mind went through the same process, and with the same result. At length, ashamed of his own cowardice, he made a vow that, when next he passed the door, whatever his state of mind might be, he would ring, and ask admittance. He did so; the Baron was at home.—He received Fritz with extreme kindness and civility, such as is often shown by dull, prozy old gentlemen, who begin to find themselves laid upon the shelf as bores, when they are visited by a man many years their junior. Fritz inquired after his health. He ducked, and bowed, and jerked, and returned the compliment in due form. Fritz, then, with a wonderful effort, mustered up courage to hope that his family were quite well.

"All quite well, with many thanks," was the sweeping, and yet unsatisfactory reply.

They talked of the weather, they talked of the crops, they talked of the wars; but nothing was elicited that bore any reference to the object of Fritz's adoration.

"Had he a daughter? was he quite sure of that?" thought Fritz to himself, as he left the house. He made inquiries among the neighbors; for he was too much afraid of the sarcastic humor of his father to inquire of him.

He had a daughter.

About what age?—Eighteen.

Fritz's heart leaped within him, and bumped, and bumped, as if it would have knocked out one or two of his ribs. Little did he sleep that night, and the next day his father found him a very uncongenial companion. Should he call upon the Baron again? It did not appear likely that such a course would advance his hopes. It might do him harm. Besides, the Baron's formal, priggish manner, acted like a wet blanket to his romantic day-dreams.

He passed the day in wandering about, by himself, seldom, however, going out of sight of the Baron's door. Hour after hour passed, and no female foot crossed the threshold, except one middle-aged woman, who had the appearance of being a servant.—As, however, the dusk of evening began to close in, the Baron's door was gently opened, and a slender female form glided forth. There appeared to be a kind of bashful timidity in her manner as she came forth into the street. Her waist was slender, and exquisitely turned, and all her movements were graceful; but her features, alas! alas! the darkest, thickest, closest veil, concealed her countenance. Fritz felt confident that it was the lady of the picture. Who else could it be? so graceful, so elegant, so bashful. An attentive listener might have heard his heart beat at the other side of the street.

Should he venture to address her? Alas! his nerves were in such a state of agitation, that the attempt would have been impossible; besides, how alarmed the timid girl would have been to be thus accosted. She would, doubtless, have shrieked, and rushed back into her father's house for protection. He ground his teeth together in a kind of despair, to think that he should be so near the object of his adoration, and yet make no effort to advance his suit. The lady, however, appeared not to notice her admirer, who was standing under the shadow of a wall; but tripped across the street, and disappeared in a shop. Fritz contrived to be near the door when she came out. The dark veil, however, still concealed every feature of her face; but, happily, one ringlet, one long, slender, auburn ringlet, had escaped from its confinement, and waived gracefully its spiral form as she glided by.

Fritz clasped his hands, and squeezed them violently together in the ecstacy of his feelings. The lady soon re-entered her father's door, and Fritz returned unwillingly home, to his sarcastic and matter-of-fact father. The next day Fritz strolled about, as the day before, keeping as much in the neighborhood of the Baron's as he could do without exciting observation. In the dusk of the evening the Baron's door opened, and the same elegant, slender-waisted female emerged into the street. But the same dark, close veil, shrouded every feature of her countenance. She did not cross over to the shop this time, but walked to nearly the end of the street, and then turned down another, as if she was going some distance.

Fritz followed her a little apart, taking care not to attract her attention. What his object was in following her, he could hardly tell, for he felt that he could not muster up courage to address her. What should he say to her? He had never addressed a lady in his life without a formal introduction; and then the lady generally began the conversation. But, then, it was possible that some sort of adventure might arise. She might be attacked by robbers, and he might rush in to her rescue; or some prince in disguise might attempt to seize upon her, and carry her off, with no virtuous intentions.

Fritz's studies in the old German romances told him that such things used to be of frequent occurrence; and Fritz was better acquainted with German romances than with real life. The lady, however, without molestation, passed up two or three streets, and at length knocked at a door, which was opened by an elderly female, whom she followed in.

What was to be done now? Should he wait till she came out, and follow her back again, in hopes of some adventure turning up? Although, in the romances that he read, a young lady seldom left the portal of her father's castle by herself without some attack being made upon her, particularly when her own true knight was near enough to her to come to her rescue, still he could not recollect any instance of such things happening in real life. And if such an adventure did not occur, the occasion so opportune for making an acquaintance with his beloved one, might be lost—for ever lost.

At length it struck him that he might accost her, and tell her the risk she ran in exposing herself, thus unprotected to every danger, and assure her that he would be near her in case of danger. He clapped his hands together in delight at the idea. The only difficulty was the mustering up courage sufficient to accost her.

The lady came forth again, to return to her father's dwelling; but Fritz felt his trembling again come over him. He pinched himself to give him courage, a curious expedient! but which appeared, in the present instance, to be successful. He did accost her; he told her that numerous robberies had been committed of late; but that he would continue to be near her to afford her protection in case of need. She started, and seemed frightened at being spoken to by a strange man in that lonely spot; for the streets were beginning to be deserted.

Fritz's courage, it must be confessed, rather to his own surprise, rose with the exigency. He begged her not to be afraid of him; that he was the son of the Count von Bartholm, an old friend of her father's. That, if she wished it, he would follow her upon the other side of the street, and still keep his protecting eye over her. The lady expressed herself highly indebted to him for his kindness in thinking of her, and thanked him fervently for his offer of seeing her safe home.

Fritz continued to walk close by her side; but not a word could he muster to ingratiate himself with his fair one; indeed, so great was his agitation, that his tongue absolutely clave to the roof of his mouth. At length they came to a crossing, which was dirty, and impeded by heaps of rubbish. Fritz offered his arm; it was accepted; but, when they had passed the difficulty, he did not withdraw it.

Presently a drunken man came reeling down one of the side streets; the lady seemed to be frightened, and pressed closer to him for protection. Fritz at that moment felt the thrilling joy of perfect happiness. He squeezed her arm closer to his, to re-assure her. He felt his courage rise within him. He told how he had seen her go into the house, and how he had waited for her, that she might not be obliged to return home unprotected.

She expressed her gratitude by a gentle pressure of the arm, which Fritz gallantly returned with a slight squeeze; and in this manner they returned to the Baron's dwelling. She again thanked him for his attentions, and retired. During the whole of this walk with Fritz, her veil was never, for a single moment, raised, or allowed to fall the least on one side. Not a feature of her countenance had her admirer been allowed to see! "What could be her object," thought Fritz, "in keeping herself always so closely veiled?" There was a mystery attending her, that he in vain attempted to dive into. But this very mystery made her tenfold dearer to the romantic German student

The next evening Fritz contrived to fall in with her during her evening walk. The third evening he was not contented with protecting her home, but he walked out with her also. This continued evening after evening. Sometimes they even walked for a mile or two into the country together. But, notwithstanding all this growing kindness between them, the veil was never for an instant removed.

At length, emboldened by this constant intercourse with his fair one, he ventured an attempt to persuade her to lay aside her veil.

"Why will you," he said, "always keep yourself veiled? you, who are so far more beautiful than the rest of your sex?"

No sooner had he uttered the word "beautiful," than the lady stopped short in her walk, snatched her hand suddenly from his arm, and apparently was going to say something in anger to Fritz. He, however, prevented her by begging a thousand pardons for his conduct, protesting that he had not the slightest intention of giving her the smallest offence. In the midst of his protestations, she extended her hand to him, saying,

"I see you did not intend it; let us forget it."

He took her arm again, and they walked on together. The lady heaved a deep sigh, that seemed to come from the bottom of her heart; and, after walking on for some little time in silence, Fritz heard a half-suppressed sob—another, and another! At length a tear fell upon his hand. They reached her home. She pressed his hand at parting, and retired into the house, without speaking another word.

Fritz returned to his father's house, pondering in his mind the present curious position of affairs. No sooner does he tell his mistress that she is beautiful, than she, the meekest of the meek, draws herself up, as if she had received an insult. But, no sooner does he beg pardon, than she cries all the rest of the way home. Neither his knowledge of the world, nor his reading of romance, taught him to expect such results as these. The mystery that hung over the lady appeared to be deeper than ever.

Little did Fritz sleep that night; but lay awake, thinking of this mysterious love. But, the more he considered the matter, the less could he understand it. The next evening they walked together as usual; but the lady appeared to be very melancholy. Sometimes he thought he heard a suppressed sob. She spoke but little; and their walk was much shorter than usual. When they had returned to her father's door, she pressed his hand as she wished him good-night, and then added, with a deep sigh,

"If we should not meet again on this side of Eternity, think sometimes of the unfortunate daughter of the Baron von Grunfeld!"

Fritz returned home very sorrowful. Long did he lay awake that night; and at length—for the truth must be told—he sobbed himself to sleep. The ominous, foreboding words, and the deep sigh, had sunk deep into his heart. But what could be her meaning? What did her words forebode? he knew no more than the dead. In the morning he went into his father's little room to take one more look at the picture, as of an object that he might never, never see again. The picture was gone. When he met his father, he asked him what had become of it. His father said that it had been packed up to be sent to the Baron's country-house; it had only been left with him to get cleaned and new-varnished.

"And was it really," asked Fritz, "the portrait of his daughter?"

"The portrait of his daughter!" said old Bartholm, diving to the very bottom of his snuff-box, and then heaping up a small pyramid of snuff upon his thumb, he crammed it up his nostrils, and then, sniffing it up with a long-drawn breath, as if he were enjoying it amazingly, he repeated—"The portrait of his daughter! it is a picture by Titian, more than two centuries old! a portrait of the Baron's great-great-grandmother, at least, so he says. By the way, did you ever hear the account of his unfortunate daughter?"

Fritz shook his head; his heart was too full to reply.

"Well! his daughter was rather an amiable, agreeable girl; and, considering who was her father, she had rather a pretty figure than otherwise. But her face, unfortunately, was the very image of the Baron's: the same rectangular features, the same carroty hair."

Fritz twisted about uneasily. But old Bartholm, who was looking at the lid of his snuff-box, did not perceive it.

"Well," continued he, "this was not misfortune enough; for, last year, she was attacked by small-pox, which destroyed one eye and scarified her face to a dreadful extent: now this, added to an erysipelas, or some eruptive complaint, has made her appearance so horrible that she never appears before strangers; and seldom walks out before dusk, and then closely veiled. But the queerest part of the story is to come. I received a letter from the Baron just now, stating that they left this place at five o'clock this morning, and that his daughter is going to take the veil; and has made him solemnly promise never to tell where the convent is situated, or even the direction in which they are now travelling. Why, she does not really suppose that any one is likely to fall in love, and try to run away with her!"

Here he broke out into a chuckling laugh, and finished with another long-drawn pinch of snuff. Here old Bartholm left the room. Fritz struck his hand against his forehead, staggered, and then fell senseless to the ground.

How dreadful were his sensations when he came to himself! The object of his intense adoration, the only object that he had ever loved, was, as it were, split into two parts. The beautiful features he had almost worshipped, belonged to one who had died more than two centuries ago. The gentle mind and elegant figure of his beloved, were immured in a convent nobody knew where. He could not mourn over the remains of her whom he loved, for there were no remains to mourn over. The very dust of one portion of his beloved must long ago have been resolved into the elements, even if the place of her sepulture was still remembered. The other half, not having died, had left no remains at all. Her, that is, the more recent half of his beloved, he could not even follow, had he so desired; for the place of her retirement was unknown. Nor had he that relief common to all the rest of the afflicted, of telling his grief, without becoming an object of ridicule. He allowed the sense of his unheard-of misfortune to prey inwardly upon his mind.

A fortnight passed—and from the steeple of St. Peter's tolled the knell of death. The miserable student was no more. His mind had destroyed his body.

Let his fate be a warning to all young men, never to fall in love with the beauty of a lady before they have seen her face

THE BALL;

Or, The Moral Consequences of a Single Passion.

BY PROFESSOR INGRAHAM.

"My dear Mrs. Wendall," cried a very beautiful girl to an equally lovely woman, not more than two-and-twenty years of age, whom she met one morning in Chesnut street, "I am so fortunate in meeting you! I was just going to your house. There is to be a magnificent military ball on Thursday of next week, and brother Harry, who is one of the Managers, has given me tickets both for myself and a friend. So I was hastening to you to ask you to go. Will you go?" repeated enthusiastically the animated girl, taking her young married friend by both hands.

"You are so kind, Julia," said Mrs. Wendall, surveying the handsomely ornamented ticket which her friend had handed to her. "Did Henry desire you to invite me as the other lady which his ticket was to admit?" she asked with a smile, and slightly coloring.

"Yes—no—that is he said when he gave it to me: 'perhaps, Julia, Mrs. Wendall might like to go!' That is all."

"He is very kind, and so are you, my dear; but you know I never have attended balls since I was married."

"And were before marriage the belle of all. What a bore it must be to have such a steady body for a husband as your Edward. I am sure if I have to sacrifice parties and balls to matrimony, I prefer remaining single. What do you let him rule you for?"

"He does not, Julia—it is my sense of duty that rules me. But I would like to attend this ball," sighed the lady.

"And you shall! It is wrong for Mr. Wendall to keep you from enjoying yourself. I will go and talk with him."

"No—he will not yield, and might be angry."

"Angry! So you are afraid of him, Oh! Annette, how I do pity you. Won't you go then? I know you can persuade your husband, unless he is a bear."

"Don't talk so, Julia! Edward is very kind and is devotedly attached to me. No husband could be more kind and indulgent. But he has decided and immovable objections to my attending balls. He never attends them himself; and as I can't go without him, it would be the same whether he was willing or not."

"No, it isn't," said Julia, with eagerness. "If he will let you go, Harry will be your escort as well as mine. He can trust you with Harry, whom you have known and loved from a boy, certainly; and then there's me, myself!"

"You yourself, would nicely and gravely patronize me, I dare say," said Mrs. Wendall, blushing; and then smiling at her friend's anxiety to induce her to attend the ball; "but there is no use in urging me, Julia; I cannot go!"

"I will send Henry to urge you! I know he has more influence with you than I have," she said, archly.

"Not for the world, Julia! Edward is already—no not exactly jealous; but he don't like to have him call at the house so often with you; and sometimes too alone. He says it is not consistent with propriety for a married woman to entertain a young gentleman in her parlour with the piano, chatting and singing together, when her husband is away at his place of business."

"How ridiculous! What is a poor lone wife to do all day, then?"

"He thinks there are duties enough as a housekeeper and mother, to employ her. Indeed, Edward is peculiar in his notions! I wish he were not quite so particular."

"Horrid!" cried the beauty, holding up both her hands. "But I suppose he is really jealous of Harry—for he is a fine, dashy fellow, and I dare say he knows you and he had desperate flirtations before you were engaged to him. It's jealousy! He is afraid you'll meet him or some of your old beaux at balls, and dance with them!"

"The idea of my dancing with any gentleman would shock Edward," said Mrs. Wendall, smiling, and half persuaded that her husband was a petty tyrant."

"Don't he allow waltzing, even?"

"Waltzing, Julia? He would as leave have a man take me in his arms and kiss me as to have me waltz."

"The divine waltz! Oh, who with any taste can think evil of this embodiment of grace? Any body that hates waltzing is a—a—a"—

"Stop, Julia! Edward loves, nay idolizes me, and can't endure the thought of another's sharing for a moment the person that his heart worships."

"What monopolizers these husbands are! I am surprised Mr. Wendall doesn't make you wear goggles lest men should see your sweet eyes, and catch a passing glance, and make doe-skin covers for your lips! Oh, well, I see you will never go to the ball then with his leave. Can't you manage to go without?"

"Without my husband's knowledge?"

"Yes."

"No, never—what put such a wild idea into your head?"

"I am surprised at your submission, Annette. You have been married but two years and a half, and are become a perfect cypher—surrendering your independence to your husband like a slave. I am resolved I never will marry! There is Mary Otis coming out of Fletcher's—I'll invite her in your place. You have no idea how sorry I am. To tell you a secret, I promised Harry you should go."

"Did your brother then desire you to ask me?" asked the beautiful and strongly tempted Mrs. Wendall, a glow of pleasure lighted up her face while the rose on her cheek deepened its tone; "you did not say so."

"Because he bid me not mention it. Oh, how I do wish you had married Harry instead of that grave lawyer, Edward Wendall. Harry always loved you, Annette, and if you had been married to him, how nice it would have been. I think poor Harry's dissipation is owing to his grief at your refusal of him. He had no profession like Wendall, it is true, and was something wild, but you would have soon turned him. Well, good morning, dear; I pity you—and shall think of you at the ball with sorrow."

Thus parted the two ladies in whom boarding-school friendship had been preserved longer than such intimacies are accustomed to survive. Mrs. Wendall had, as has been intimated, formerly been a belle, and the life of gay assemblies. Dancing and waltzing were her passion. She had been much attended by Harry Wilder, a young man of fashion and of rather dissolute principles—his sister's intimacy with her favoring his attentions. He regarded her with the eyes only of gallantry, while he succeeded in awakening an interest in her heart. She became attached to him, and might have married him. But one day under the influence of wine, he offended her by rudeness, and she forbade him her presence. He subsequently, through Julia's intercession, obtained forgiveness; but in the meanwhile Edward Wendall, a young lawyer of excellent principles, and in fine practice as well as heir to a fortune, became enamored of her, and after due time offered himself.—His powers of pleasing were great and the qualities of his heart and mind had recommended him strongly to her admiration, while his attention and love awakened her regard. When he addressed her she accepted him, though she felt she did not love him quite so well as she had done Henry Wilder. Nevertheless she loved him and respected him, and their union was a happy one.

At the period we introduced her to the reader, she had been married two years and a half. Her husband loved her devotedly; and though he did not attend balls nor wish her to go, he left her to her own sense of duty. Every indulgence a young wife could here was extended to her; all that money could purchase was at her command; public assemblies were alone the forbidden tree of the paradise of domestic happiness in which she and her husband dwelt. The self-denial she had to practice on the occasions of large assemblies was trying to her, and many were the hours she sat weeping alone in her chamber for the scenes of gaiety and dissipation from which Edward's wishes excluded her. Julia Wilder had often been her confidante and was ever ready to console her under her privations. Harry, also, when he met her with his sister or at his father's, was not backward in offering her his disinterested sympathies; and then would she look at Wilder and in her heart contrast him with her husband and almost sigh that she had not married him. Poor Annette! When a wife once suffers herself to listen to the sympathies of another gentleman for any domestic restraint or fancied wrong, she that moment gives him command of her weaknesses and puts in jeopardy her happiness for the future! and when a wife makes a confidante (her husband the theme) of any unmarried female friend, she puts indignity upon the husband she has pledged herself to "honor," destroys all that love and confidence which should be his just and honorable due, and brings herself into merited contempt!

The papers were filled with notices of the approaching ball, and of the anticipated splendor of the occasion. Mrs. Wendall sighed as she read them, and really began to dislike her husband, to whom, however, she had yet said nothing about the assembly. He could not fail discovering the change in her, and one day finding her in tears in her room, just after Julia had called upon her, he wished to know the cause. After some hesitation, she told him that she had met Miss Wilder three days before in Chesnut street, who had informed her of a military ball that was to take place the ensuing week, and that she was regretting she could not attend. "See, Edward," she added, "the papers are full of it!"

"You may attend if you wish, Ann," he said, quietly.

"Are you really in earnest?" she asked, with doubtful joy.

"Yes."

"But will you go, too?" she inquired, her voice suddenly falling at an expression of his face.

"I never attend balls you know, dear," he answered, in the same quiet manner.

Mrs. Wendall darted an angry glance at her husband, and covering her face with her hands, burst into a paroxysm of tears of disappointment. He remained patient until she recovered, and then asked her if Miss Wilder were going?

"Yes."

"With whom?"

"Her brother."

"Will you go with them, Ann?" he asked, without lifting his eyes, that she might discover nothing to guide her answer by their expression.

"Oh, yes yes!" she exclaimed, and then she instantly dropped her eyes with embarrassment, as she saw a glow of displeasure on her husband's brow.

"You see, Ann, how your passion for assemblies leads you into indiscretion. You know it would be improper (aside from my peculiar feelings towards Mr. Wilder) for you to go without your husband to so public a place. Neither, if you had loved me, would you have pained me by putting yourself under the protection of one who was your suitor before I knew you. A truly virtuous wife will never carry beyond the altar the memory of a lover!"

"You are jealous, Edward. Henry Wilder is nothing to me;" answered Mrs. Wendall, weeping freely, while her back was turned from her husband.

"Be it jealousy, if the feelings I have expressed be considered so," he said, without any warmth.—"But it is time we should be apart for a few hours when accusations begin to be bandied. Good morning, dear Ann. I trust you will be more composed by dinner time."

"Yes, as Julia says, he is a tyrant—a jealous tyrant! To try me if I would go with her, and then twit me for liking Henry Wilder! This is the way to make me like him! I have a good mind to take him at his word, and go with them! I have not had a ball dress made since I was married! One can never tell whether their beauty is preserved except in full dress." And Mrs. Wendall cast a gratified glance into her mirror, which reflected a face very beautiful, notwithstanding it wore a cloud of ill-humor, and was moist with tears.

About one o'clock, Mr. Wilder was announced, and Mrs. Wendall, with a throbbing heart and flushed cheek, went down to see him, contrary to the warnings of her conscience, and her sense of duty to her husband's feelings. But she wanted to hear about the ball—and this was excuse enough in her petulant mind.

"Ah, my dear Mrs. Wendall," said Henry Wilder, as she entered; and approaching her and taking her hand, with an air of gallantry, he led her to a seat. "How charmingly well you look to-day! You eclipse your maiden loveliness! Ah, me! well, I must be-r my lot with becoming stoicism. What a lovely hand!"

"Have done, Henry," said Mrs. Wendall, half in anger, half smiling, as he attempted to lift her jewelled hand to his lips. "Tell me about the military ball."

"It is to be a splendid affair, and highly fashionable. None but the right sort of people will be there. Galaxies of beautiful women will glitter like stars there—but the sun of beauty, alas! will not be in its zenith to dazzle all beholders!"

Mrs. Wendall slightly coloured as she acknowledged the flattering of his lips and eyes.

"What a vexation that you should have to stay away to please Wendall," added Henry, imputingly. "Julia tells me you can't go."

"I should like to attend. Indeed, I have done nothing but think about it ever since I heard of it."

"Way not go? 'Sis says you told her Wendall would give you permission if you chose to ask him, and that you only stay away from a foolish notion of duty. Don't humor husbands so! You wives always spoil them. I don't know a married man but what is so spoiled and petted, that other people can't get along at all with him. You humor Wendall's whims too much."

"He told me this morning I might go—but in such a way that it offended me."

"Then go. He can say nothing. If he is angry, let him alone and he'll get over it. Come, my queen of beauty—say yes. I will be here in the carriage for you with Julia at nine o'clock Thursday evening."

"I havn't time to get ready."

"Plenty. This is only Monday."

"The dress-makers are all engaged."

"Give me permission, and I will find you one that will throw by every thing else for you," said the young gentleman, touching her cheek with his finger-tip. "Do now promise! It will make Julia so happy. As for myself, I—— but you need not be reminded, Annette, how intimately all my happiness in this life is interwoven with you."

"This is imprudent, Mr. Wilder," said the beauteous wife slightly withdrawing from him, but looking rather surprised and confused than angry. "Do not address me in such language again, I entreat of you. If Edward——"

"Pshaw! what have I done that is so very wicked! Is it sinful to love?"

"Harry, I must leave you."

"Then I am done. Will you go to the ball?"

"I dare not."

"You will enjoy yourself so much. It will be all life and novelty to you, it is so long since you attended one."

"Two years and eight months."

"An age! You must have forgotten your waltzing."

"No. I was trying the step when you rang."

"You did waltz like a fairy. Have you waltzed since I danced the gallopade with you at the New Year's Assembly in '40?"

"No."

"Then I was your last partner," he said, with a tone and look which he meant should call up tender reminiscences. He was successful. She turned away her head, directed her heavy-lidded eyes to a figure of the carpet, and sighed. His face fully expressed the triumph he enjoyed at this slight evidence of remaining regard for him. But Wilder did not know that a woman may sigh over the past, without any feeling with the present.

The remainder of the interview was brief and rather formal, and he took his leave without drawing from her any decided promise to attend the ball under his auspices.

At three o'clock Mr. Wendall came home, and found his wife by no means improved in humor since he left her in the forenoon. He was vexed and annoyed, but said nothing to her that would lead her to suppose he noticed it. Domestic happiness all this time was receiving a severe and lasting injury. During a silent dinner, the subject was not touched upon. He left the table and was about going out with his hat, when Mrs. Wendall abruptly said—

"What makes you so sullen, Mr. Wendall? I am sure I have done nothing to offend you."

When a man who has been playing the passive part, suddenly finds himself accused as the active quarreller, he naturally feels surprise, and for the moment knows not what to answer. It was thus with Edward Wendall. His wife's gloom and discontent had for some days thrown a shadow over his spirit, and made him silent and thoughtful. But some wives have a peculiar tact in putting saddles on their husbands' backs, and making the poor men get into them themselves, a feat very difficult to be executed, but which the good dames manage to have performed very frequently, and with wonderful success.

Edward had had experience, and was silent. Mrs. Wendall continued—

"If you don't want me to go to balls, you needn't make my house like a prison, and you looking so like a jailer."

"I have given you permission to go to the ball, Ann; but I cannot go."

"You give me permission because you know I can't go without you. You mock me."

"I made a resolution when I married not only not to attend assemblies myself, but forbid my wife going."

"Forbid!" she repeated sneeringly, her beautiful lip curling with Byronic haughtiness; "so you began to contemplate commanding a wife before you had one, sir."

"You are greatly changed, Annette, within a few days," said Edward, feelingly. "This ball has bewitched you."

"Then let me go to it. What use is there in a woman having good looks, if she can never display them?"

"I am a miser in my love, dearest," he said, smiling.

"Yes; and fear to carry me abroad lest you will be robbed. This is your confidence in me. If I thought you would not let me attend parties for fear I should see some gentleman I might like better than you—or lest some fine beau should fall in love with me—fearing to trust me any and every where as a virtuous wife should be trusted, I would!"——

"That will do, Ann. You need not proceed any further. Go to this ball if you will! but do not ask me to accompany you."

"This is equivalent to forbidding me to go. I wish you to be there too, to watch me and see that I do not the whole time flirt with any one—for if you are not there, you will torment me with jealous surmises and suspicions of it, that will make me miserable enough to counterbalance the pleasures of the ball."

"You are a most provoking creature, Ann," he said sharply.

"And you are most shockingly jealous."

At this moment the street door bell rang, and a note was brought in to Mrs. Wendall. Instantly on seeing the hand-writing, she exclaimed "Julia!" and tore the seal:

Dearest Annette—

I have seen Harry and learned the issue of his visit. If your husband wont go, and you must go without him, then you must make him go. Where there is a will, there is a way. I have heard of a wife who had a cross bird, who always went into hysterics when he refused her any thing, and so always got it. I communicate the hint.

Yours, truly, JULIA.

P. S. Brother Harry has found out a fashionable dress maker, who fortunately can undertake your ball dress. You will yet go I know, so do not despair. Let me hear if you succeed. J.

Mrs. Wendall read this note, and then folding it up, quietly put it into the parlor grate. The husband betrayed no desire to know its contents, and she no wish to communicate them to him.

"So you are resolved not to go with me?"

"Yes."

"Then you are a brute," she said, angrily.

"What, Ann?" he demanded in surprise.

"An unfeeling brute. You are so jealous you dare not trust me out of your sight."

"I gave you permission to go."

"Which was mocking me. I will not live with such a man."

"You act very absurdly, Annette."

"You are a tyrant, and would, if you dared, lock me up and keep me from every eye but yours. I wonder you are not jealous of the baby."

"You are provoking."

"I mean to be. Will you go with me to this ball?"

"No."

Upon which Mrs. Wendall, filled with spite and vexation, burst into an uncontrollable fit of unnatural laughter.

"What means this wild laughter?"

The peals continued, but occasionally interlarded with such ejaculations as—thoroughly bewildered, and confounded between anger and alarm, Edward flew to his wife, who seemed going into convulsions. She thrust him away from her, with a gesture of detestation, and shrieked till her voice sunk in her chest, and her whole frame became violently contorted. He rang the bell for assistance, and despatched a servant for a physician. In the meanwhile her symptoms partook of the character of the most alarming hysteria, and when the doctor arrived he found her almost lifeless, supported by her husband on a sofa, and uttering a low moan. The physician pronounced her in a violent fit of hysterics, and immediately commenced a remedial process. It was three hours before she was brought out of the fit, and when she returned to partial consciousness, she found herself in bed, her husband tenderly watching over her, the physician by a table preparing a prescription, and a nurse heating leaves for dressing a blister upon her neck. Poor Mrs. Wendall had over-acted her part. Once giving the rein to her real feelings of anger and disappointment, it was not easy to restrain them, and she became the victim of the deceptive ruse she intended practising upon her husband.

It was three weeks after "the ball," which had done so much mischief, before Mrs. Wendall was able to sit up, and six weeks before she was entirely restored to health. The true secret of her illness Julia Wilder never knew. Her brother was greatly disappointed at this contre-temps, for he had laid a plan, if he could have got her to attend the ball, to have sought revenge for the mortification he had always felt for the preference she had given in marrying Wendall. She, however, never knew the snare that was laid for her, until confirmed to her, in a brief note written on his death bed, which Julia placed sealed, ignorant of its contents, in her hands. The lesson she had learned through her punishment, by a real and dangerous illness, was deeply graven in her soul; and the kind attention and unwearying tenderness with which her husband watched over her, filled her with true penitence, and won her whole heart. She confessed to him, with tears of grateful affection and shame, her intended deception, and acknowledging the appropriate justice of her punishment, asked to be restored to his confidence and love.

THE FIRST HONOR.

BY MRS. SARAH J. HALE,
ONE OF THE EDITORS OF "THE LADY'S BOOK."

"I was a dull boy," said Judge B——, in answer to some remarks of Mrs. Wentworth, referring to the usual poverty of genius, and hinting at the display which the learned and celebrated Judge must have made in his juvenile studies. "I was a very dull boy. Till I was full ten years old, I dreaded the sight of a book and the name of school. It is true that I had made some progress in the first rudiments of English, and had begun the Latin grammar, but this was wholly owing to the constant instruction and personal influence of my mother. It was only in obedience to her that I attended school or opened a book. I would have willingly submitted to a severe whipping every day of my life, if by that means I might have escaped the task of study. I was the dunce of the school."

"Impossible! I should exclaim, if any other person had told me this," said Miss Blandford. "It seems impossible that Judge B—— should ever have been averse to study."

"I presume you must have grown very fast," said Mrs. Wentworth. "I have observed that healthy, active, growing boys, are often loath to be confined in school."

"No, madam, I do not think such an excuse would serve me," replied the Judge. "I disliked study, because I could not learn as the other boys could. My intellect was slow. I could not comprehend an idea until I had, as it were, gone round it and surveyed it on every side. And then I had no verbal memory. I can recollect now my feelings, when my school-mates were reciting their lessons with the ease and rapidity with which a wild bird sings his notes. It seemed to me that all which they repeated was in my own mind, but I could not bring it out. I could not find the clue. And then I rubbed my forehead—my invariable practice over my books—till I was the jest of the school. I suppose a phrenologist might have prophesied from that habit that my brain was not wholly inert; but, oh! he could never imagine the sensation when the hot blood first rushed through it, with the throb of hope and ambition!"

The eye of the speaker flashed with triumph, as though some bright memory of the past had come over his mind; and then a shade of sorrow contracted, for a moment, the usual placid expression of his noble brow.

The ladies did not, by word or movement, interrupt his train of thought. They felt he was communing with his own heart, and what a blessing it is to be indulged in our silent meditations at such moments.

In a short time he resumed the conversation, but in a low, subdued tone of voice. "I never think of my childhood without regret that my mother was called to her rest in heaven before I had fulfilled, in some degree, those hopes which she, notwithstanding my dullness, persisted in cherishing. She was so happy when I received my first honor!"

The ladies looked at each other; at last Mrs. Wentworth ventured to request that he would give them the history of his first success. "It would be such a favor," she said—and Miss Blandford echoed, "such a favor!" He could not resist the request of the ladies. Few men can resist them when they make their petitions viva voce. If the ladies who send petitions to Congress would take this hint, and when they have another grievance to bring before the nation, go themselves to Washington, and fill the halls of the Capitol with their sweet voices—then, if not successful, they should, for the future, assert their dignity in expressive silence. What is the use of wasting good sentences on those who are determined not to give heed?

"I have said I was a dull boy," proceeded Judge B——, "but that does not convey a true idea of my character. It was not so much stupidity, as a sort of stupor, which kept me constantly at the foot of my class. I recollect that I was often reasoning, in my own way, on the various objects of study pursued by the higher classes; and yet I could not learn the given lessons, even in the lowest. And so I was called a complete dunce. Nor would this reproach have moved me in the least, for I had not one kindling of ambition, only I felt that my mother would so rejoice to see me a good scholar; yet the effort to be one was beyond my ability.

"My faithful monitress often set before me examples of great and good men. I recollect she one evening told me of Patrick Henry, the man whose eloquence shook the foundations of British power in the American Colonies, and the fire of whose patriotism lighted the first grand torch on the altar of our national liberty—and, my dear mother added, "he was an idle, dreaming boy!" And then she bent her face to mine, and I heard her pray that I too might be a worthy son of my redeemed country.

"The earnest, fervent prayers of a good mother, are never lost. If I have been what the world calls a useful man, it is to the instructions and prayers of my mother, that my country is indebted. Would that her life had been spared till this day!"

The voice of the Judge trembled; his firm tones, which had often hushed the tumultuous crowd, had awed the boldest criminal, had swayed the proud minds of his brother legislators, now trembled with the emotions of love and grief that thronged on his memory at the thought of his mother. True it is, that the noblest minds are the most deeply susceptible of the sacred ties of domestic affection. Do you know a good, great man? He is a good son—a good husband—a good father. There is little trust to be reposed in the talents, the patriotism, the religion of any man who is cold in his domestic affections, who has no heart.

"I am oftened astonished," resumed the Judge, "when I reflect on the apathy of my own sex with regard to female education. It is the influence of the mother which fashioneth the character of the son. This we know and feel when we are men.—Why, then, you may ask, do we not exert our influence in private life, and our power in legislation, to give to females that opportunity of acquiring the knowledge needful to qualify them for their most important duties, the training of their sons? To woman, God has, in an especial manner, committed the guardianship of the young immortal; his heart is, we may say, almost of her forming, for she first awakens and directs its affections—the soul from her smile receives its first impulse of intelligence. God has endowed her for her task, with moral feelings of the highest and purest order which belong to our nature; but man, to whom she was, physically, made subject, refuses her that participation in mental culture which is required to inform her reason, strengthen her judgment, and thus endow her with that dignity of knowledge which will command respect. Till this is done, we shall in vain look for the moral renovation of society. But I am making my story a lecture."

"And one to which no woman can listen unmoved," said Mrs. Wentworth, as she dried the tears from her bright eyes. "How I wish all our countrymen held your principles!"

"They will in time, if the ladies are but true to themselves," he replied, with quickness. "Allow me to say, Madam, that part of the blame rests on your sex. The proverbial weakness, mental I mean, of females, is made matter of belief with men, not so much from observation, as from the reports of women themselves. You are not true to your own order, as Lord Brougham would express it. Women will betray the weaknesses of women, and this to men. You do not often find our sex thus unguarded. I have heard ladies, very young ladies, whose hearts should be overflowing with kindness towards their associates, when an absent companion was named, immediately commence some disparaging observations, usually hinting at faults or foibles which a man would never have thought of, or never, from her appearance, have suspected she indulged. Perhaps the individual named is admired for her fine complexion; it is cautiously hinted that 'she paints.' If she has a beautiful form, it is 'artificial.' Should she be praised for her taste in dress, 'Ah, she devotes all her time to fashion.' Let her accomplishments be the theme, and some rival will whisper, 'Yes, she is accomplished, how I wish she was amiable!' But should a man praise the mind and intellectual graces of a woman, then her own sex are armed against her on every side. We hear of her 'oddity,' her 'sluttishness,' 'want of taste,' 'ill-temper,' or bad 'domestic management.' In short, every disagreeable if not evil association, is awakened in our fancy with the name of 'learned lady'—a bas bleu! And this has been done, in a great measure, by female agency. Believe me, the ladies will never enjoy, fully, the respect of men, until they claim esteem for the sex as well as the individual. Woman must be true to the interests of woman. She must seek to elevate the standard of female education. She must dwell with pride on the genius of those women who have done honor to the sex. She must encourage female talent. She must repel, with dignified severity, the pretensions and sarcasms of those shallow coxcombs,

Of man's mental ascendancy over the fair.'

Let woman do this, and good men will uphold her upward and onward course. She will rise. Her superior moral endowments will be more and more appreciated, and the divine precepts of Christianity become better understood. And when, aided by mental culture, her mind shall be directed to its proper sphere, the domestic, social, moral and religious improvement of society, then will her genius be worshipped as among the brightest as well as best gifts to our race."

"Oh! how I wish every woman in our land could hear you," exclaimed Miss Blandford. "They surely would practice what you so eloquently recommend."

"You pay me a great compliment. Such an effect would be a mightier victory than any mere mortal can ever hope to achieve. It requires the agency of Him who brought 'Peace and good-will on earth,' to bind together the hearts of women in the bonds of charity with each other. There is a natural rivalry among you, which reason and even Christian precepts find it hard to overcome. But why should I limit this rivalry to your sex? Neither men nor women have yet learned the first principles of happiness and greatness—that we must seek to make others happy—that we must raise ourselves by elevating our kind. Men pursue their ends by associating more with each other, and hence it is that they succeed in engrossing wealth and knowledge. Let women, therefore, I repeat, be true to their sex, and to the duties of their sex, and they will, eventually, gain that full companionship with man which they were created to hold and enjoy."

"Thank you, sir, most gratefully, for your good opinion of women," said Mrs. Wentworth, earnestly. "You see I am practising on your maxim of sustaining my own order," she paused, and then added in a tone of deep feeling, "We are still more earnest to learn the manner of your early training from thus becoming acquainted with its influence on your mind. Your mother must have been the model from which you have formed your standard of female excellence."

"You are right," he replied, "and from the few incidents I have now to relate you may judge if I have not reason to honor her memory. She began my education very early. I was her only child, and she was a widow, (my father dying before I was born,) therefore you may imagine how devoted she was to me, and how eagerly she sought for my improvement. She tried every means that love and reason could suggest, that faith and patience could perform, to instruct me in my lessons and in my duties. In the latter she was not disappointed. I may say, without boasting, that I was an obedient boy, for I loved my mother so well that it was a pleasure to do her bidding. But I could not learn my book; the fountain of knowledge was, to my taste, bitter waters, and all the devices which ingenuity has invented to make learning easy failed in my case. I had to wear the dunce cap at school, and so sluggish was my mind that I did not care one straw for the disgrace, till I found it made my mother weep when she heard of it. Indeed, I preferred being at the foot of my class, for then I had no trouble of trying to keep my station. At the opening of the school I always took my place at the foot; it seemed to fall naturally to me, and I was as contented as Diogenes in his tub.

"Thus the time passed till the winter of my tenth birthday. The schoolmaster was preparing for a famous exhibition; as he knew how solicitous my mother was for my improvement, he called on her to ascertain if she thought it possible I could take a part. She did think it possible—what mother would despair of her only child! She undertook to teach me the piece I was to speak. The teacher had selected the pithy little poem, so appropriate for the young tyro, beginning—

'You'd scarce expect one of my age
To speak in public on the stage;
And if I chance to fall below
Demosthenes or Cicero,
Don't view me with a critic's eye,
But pass my imperfections by.'

"Those six lines were my first lesson, and often has my mother sat down to the task of teatching it; telling me that I must learn to recite those six lines during that and the following evening. You smile, ladies, but it seemed an Herculean task to me, and it was only my strong affection for my mother that would have induced me to undertake it. The teacher had promised me a silver medal, if I spoke my piece well. I cared nothing for that, however, till my mother drew me to her side, as she put back my hair and wiped my forehead in her loving manner, and said, "Oh, Robert, how happy I shall be when I see you come home with the medal on!" I thought then I would try to obtain it. So I sat cheerfully down to my task.

"I recollect the scene as though it were but yesterday. My mother read the lines to me a number of times over, and then she explained the meaning of the words. She told me of Demosthenes, and the efforts he made to overcome his natural defects. I recollect asking her if I should get some pebbles to hold in my mouth, whether it would do me any good? —and how happy her laugh rang out at what she considered my witticism.

"Then she told me of Cicero, and of the great services he rendered to his country, by his learning and oratory,—thus endeavoring to awaken my mind to an effort of imitation. I liked to listen to stories, and it was in this manner I had been taught the little I knew. I could not comprehend words; I wanted images, and these my mother, by her manner, and the simple comparisons she would draw from familiar things, could often succeed in picturing to my imagination. In books I found nothing but words, and those I could not remember. But I am growing tedious as that evening's lesson was to my mother and myself. For two long hours she patiently taught me. I read over the lines many, many times; I recited them after her, very much in the manner that Nicholas Nickleby taught poor Smike his treadmill lesson. Sometimes I would repeat two or three consecutive words, and then her face would brighten with hope. But, alas, when she took the book for the last recitation, after I had been studying most intently for a number of minutes, I could not repeat a single word.

"I recollect even now my sensations at the time. It seemed to me that I knew all my mother wished me to say; but there was a kind of waving shadow would come between me and my lesson, and make all the words indistinct—and my will had no power to control these fancies.

"When my mother had vainly tried every possible method to make me recollect the two first lines, she was quite overcome. I believe her hope of my intellect was extinguished, and that she felt, for the first time, what all who knew me had predicted, that I would prove a dunce. It must be a terrible trial for a sensible mother to feel that her only child is a fool. She burst into a passion of tears, covered her face with her hands, and sunk on her knees beside the sofa where we had been sitting. I started up in amazement at her grief, for I had never seen her thus agitated; she was usually calm as a summer morning. But now her sobs and groans seemed bursting her heart. My knees trembled and a burning heat rushed over my frame. At that moment something seemed to open in my head, and a sunbeam, I can compare it to nothing else, was let into my brain. I saw, or felt, will perhaps be the more proper, every word of the lesson I had been learning, as though it were graven with a pen of fire. I knew that I could repeat my lesson; and many others, that I had vainly tried to learn, were now present to my memory in perfect arrangement. I stood, as it were, in an entrancement of delight, as these new and clear ideas came before me, till my mother arose from her kneeling posture and stretched out her hand to draw me to her. Her face was deadly pale, but perfectly calm: I have it now before me, as it then appeared, mild and beautiful as an angel's. She had given up her hope of my mind, but her love was deeper and tenderer, perhaps that her pride in me had been so utterly humbled. Oh, there is no earthly passion so disinterested as a mother's love! She doubtless thought, from the singular expression of my countenance, that I was frightened, and drawing me to her, she caressed me, and murmured—

"'My son—my dear son!'

"I can say my lesson, mother—I can say my lesson now," I broke out; and immediately repeated the six lines, and then the whole poem, which I had heard her read several times over, but had never read myself. She was astonished; but when I went on to recite poems and hymns which she had vainly tried to teach me for months and years, her joyful exclamations were raised to Heaven in thanks to God, while her tears flowed like rain. I do not think she retired that night at all; for she was kneeling beside my bed when I went to sleep, and when I awoke in the morning, she was bending over me. Probably she feared I might lose my memory, and watched my first wakening to confirm her hopes. She was gratified. I remembered all. I had even tried to learn more clearly that morning than even on the previous evening. My whole being seemed changed. Every object looked brighter—every word sounded with a new meaning."

"Do you believe that any new faculty of mind was communicated to you?" asked Miss Blandford.

"No—surely not. But my intellect was aroused and enlightened. How this was effected, I do not pretend to say; the phrenologist and the physiologist may conjecture: but it seemed to me, at the time, that something in my head had opened or enlarged.—However that might be, I have never since found any difficulty in my literary pursuits; the exercise of my mind is my most pleasurable employment. I gained the medal with great applause; but my sweetest reward was the praises and kisses of my mother. How happy she was—too happy for this world! I fear these alternations of grief and joy had an injurious effect on her delicate frame. She passed away soon, and left me an orphan indeed. But her memory can never pass from me while my reason remains. To her I am indebted for all my enjoyments of intellect. I have no doubt that had a severe and chilling discipline been pursued with me at home as it was at school, I should have continued a dull and ignorant, or imbecile being all my days. To a good, faithful, intelligent mother, what gratitude and respect are due! I shall always advocate the cause of woman."

EVENING PRAYERS IN A PRISON,

AT WETHERSFIELD, CONN.

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

All researches into the history of earlier ages, result in giving prominence to prisons, as among the strongest engines of tyranny. Despotic princes found them convenient retreats for the conquered foe—the noble, whose estates they wished to confiscate—or the rival, whose eye was upon their throne. The legends of baronial dungeons, sleep in the darkness of feudal times. In every age, the oppressor hath, at his will, "held the body bound;" and none may compute the number of the souls whose only liberator was death. Though the progress of civilization and refinement mitigated the savage features of these penal institutions, yet it was long ere humanity dreamed of making their discipline salutary. Disregard to the moral health of those who as a gangrene had been divided from society, still prevailed; and promiscuous association rendered the novice in guilt, as hardened as the hoary offender.

For the praise of modern times, and for the mild nature of our own government, has been reserved that benevolence, which, in sequestrating the criminal, keeps before his eyes the bright image of returning virtue, and baptizes his place of punishment with the hope of heaven. If to appease the anger of an offended community, Justice must purge, as it were, with fire, the soul that hath sinned, Mercy forgets not to sit by as a refiner, pronouncing when the dross is fully separated, and in the sacred words of inspiration, "counting the law as a schoolmaster, that bringeth unto Christ." How would Howard have rejoiced had such a prospect dawned upon him, while hazarding his life, to "dive into the depths of dungeons, to plunge amid the infection of hospitals, to survey the mansions of sorrow and pain; to take the gaze of misery, depression and contempt, to remember the forgotten, to attend to the neglected, to visit the forsaken, to compare and collate the distresses of all men in all countries."

The pens of some of our distinguished writers have enforced the feasibility of making prisons adjuncts in the reformation of vice, and in several of our States buildings have been erected on this principle, and theories in some measure reduced to practice.—Among these institutions, that at Wethersfield stands conspicuous in the opinion of foreigners, as well as natives, for the adaptation of its structure, the wisdom of its policy, and the results of its discipline.

It was at the close of a long, cloudless summer's day, when I first attended, with a small party of strangers and friends, its hour of evening prayer.—The richness of the surrounding landscape, the beauty of the prospect from its elevated, mural promenade, the broad, quiet river, the distant, gliding sails, the waving foliage, the hallowed spire, embosomed amid graceful elms—all seemed to soothe the mind into calm delight, rather than prepare it for painful contemplation. But the harsh sound of locks and bolts, convinced us that guilt was near, guilt which defaces both the fair creature, and the immortal soul.

A bell struck, and the convicts came from their respective work-shops, and arranged themselves in lines in the spacious, and strongly enclosed area.—There they underwent a strict examination from the guard, who ascertained that none had secreted about his person, any weapon of destruction and offence.—It was humiliating to see powerful and athletic men, holding out their arms for their search, with the subdued look of a helpless child. Methought salutary lessons might here be gathered for the young and tempted, and they be taught to wage a firmer warfare with Vice, after thus witnessing its degradation and misery.

Then, each prisoner placed his hands upon the shoulders of the one who preceded him, and all marched rapidly, with the lock-step, toward the chapel. There, seated side by side, were seen the man of full strength, the boy of fourteen summers, and him of hoary hairs, who, sentenced for life, surveyed, motionless and passionless, objects to which his dim eye and seared heart had been long inured.—I bent a scrutinizing glance upon the mass of heads and faces in this prison-home, to discover, if possible, some indication of talent, or nobleness; for we know, that the whirlwind of passion hath too often driven into crime, those whom nature and education had fitted for a higher destiny. But there was an absence of those lineaments which reveal the higher developments of intellect, or the promptings of a heaven-ward soul. Sin had been there with its levelling process, effacing mental elevation and spiritual beauty.

Every brow was raised to the chaplain, as he simplified a portion of that Book, which is a "light to them that sit in darkness," and lifted up his prayer to him who "blotteth out transgression." In that prolonged gaze, was there not some shadow of hope, that "where sin had abounded, grace might much more abound?" How impressive was the supplicating voice of that man of God, standing, as it were, like the prophet, with his censor, "between the living and the dead," that the plague might be stayed.

At the close of the devotional exercises, the prisoners passed out in order, to their several ranges of dormitories, each taking in his hand, at the proper depository, a wooden vessel containing the coarse, but nutritious evening repast. These movements were made with such regularity and celerity, that one moment they might be seen, each standing at the door of his solitary cell: the next, all had vanished, and the spring of more than a hundred locks was their vesper-tone, their sad "good-night."

Among the trains of thought that these scenes excited, was the consciousness, that each of these fallen beings had once a mother, to whom his infancy was inexpressibly dear. When she pressed his velvet lip to her's, or lulled him to rest upon her bosom, surely, her visions of delight had no imagery like this. Yet, could we read the secret soul of the erring tenants of this abode, might we not discover some maternal precept still maintaining a place in their memory, perhaps striving to neutralize the black and bitter elements of evils?

Among the inmates of this institution, is one who has plunged into many varieties of sin, and been a wanderer over the face of the earth. Retribution met him in appalling forms, disgrace and suffering became his portion, but he passed through all with a hardened mind. Nothing, he affirms, in his whole life, has ever made him feel serious, but the last words of his mother. When a boy of twelve years old, he was summoned to her bed, to receive her dying counsel. In feeble, and tender tones, she told him that she was about to leave him, and earnestly enjoined him to seek the Saviour, to take care of his soul, and to meet her in heaven. She continued clasping his hand, until her own was cold in death.—For nearly a half a century afterwards, this miserable being was pressing on through a course of crime too revolting for description. Still he was never able utterly to drive from his mind the admonitions of his mother, nor to think of them, amid his deepest obduracy, without emotion.

Is not this a peculiar point of view from which to contemplate maternal influence? The good and the wise take pleasure in expressing their obligations to this hallowed source. Bacon traced back to it, as to a shaded fountain, his intellectual eminence. Washington acknowledged it as the teacher of his self-control, that rudiment of his greatness. Edwards referred the germ of his piety to the prayers of the saintly one who gave him birth. But here is a different suffrage, a voice as from the lower parts of the earth, bearing concurrent testimony. Such a disclosure gains force from its rare occurrence. Virtue and purity are willing to reveal the origin of their principles which have guided them, but it is difficult to extort from wickedness commendation and honor for the precepts which it has violated.

Here is an instance of a man plunging into the vortex of guilt, and laboring to dismiss from his mind every thing just and holy. Still, by his side has walked, to his soul has clung, with his conscience has wrestled, the voice of a dying mother. It has prevailed sometimes to soften a heart, which was like a "piece of nether mill-stone." May it not yet prove like the rod of Moses, to the flinty rock of Horeb?

Mother! who, with ineffable tenderness, art bending over the babe that Heaven hath [illegible] thee, knowest thou what shall b[illegible] world? Parents, who gaze [illegible] of the fair boy w[illegible] what may be hi[illegible] your effor[illegible] the ex[illegible]

THE STOLEN MELON.

PARENTAL REPROOF.

[The following extract is from a beautifully written little prize tale in the Mother's Assistant, entitled "My Early Home," from the pen of H. C. C. Knight, of Plymouth, N. H.]

It was vacation, and Eben and Robert had accompanied our father to the city. During their absence, the boys proposed a pic-nic at Clark's Point, a mile or two up the river. It was given in honor of two old associates, now Collegians, on a vacation visit home. I was the youngest guest, and therefore proud of my invitation. Much talk was there among the boys, what they should eat and what they should drink, and how the affair should be conducted in the grandest style. My mother baked me a cake, buttered crackers, and cut large slices of ham, for my contribution to the feast. Walking in the garden, I espied Eben's large, round, ripe water-melon. It was earlier ripe than its fellows, for it had been the object of Eben's special care. Again and again had he turned it over to the warm sun, and just before he left he had raised it upon a smooth flat stone, to enjoy every advantage of warmth and air. "O, if I only had that melon," thought I; "none of the boys have got a melon to carry; if I only had it!" This was not wished once, twice, or thrice, but many times, until it grew to my very mind.

"What are you thinking of?" asked Bill Parsons, as I walked silently beside him in the street, an hour after.

"Something," replied I, significantly.

"Tell me, now, I won't tell," said he coaxingly.—After some slight demur, I told him how I desired Eben's melon for the pic-nic.

"Capital!" exclaimed Bill, who was very fond of melons, "let's have it!"

"Why, mother will not let me have it, because it is not her's to give, and Eben has not come home," replied I.

"O, never mind that! You know what the college boys tell us about their sprees. They make nothing of robbing hen-roosts and carrying off whatever they lay they hands on. It's all in a joke, you know.—Now let's have Eben's melon."

Many words passed between us, and at last it did not seem so very bad a joke, for in that aspect could I alone persuade myself to see it. I went home.—That night, or never, must the melon be secured. Evening stole on, and Bill Parsons no longer near to urge his dangerous sophistry, I was the victim of doubts and hesitation. About the garden I hung, and often toward the melon I advanced, and as often tremblingly receded. It grew darker and darker.

Bill says, "it would be so capital! And, after all, it's only a joke!" I rushed forward, and seizing fast hold, snapped it from the stem! The deed done, I hastened to secret the treasure in the barn.

The next morning, I arose at an early hour, for no sound sleep had visited my pillow that night. After breakfast, my mother tied up the eatables she had prepared for me, in a nice white bag, and kissing my cheek, bade me be a good boy. I ran out the front door, and then stole around into the barn. There lay the melon. Hastily did I strive to thrust it into the bag, and loth was it to go, so small the bag, so large the melon. Succeeding at last, I slung the bag upon my shoulder and hastened away. The melon was heavy on my back, but a heavier load was on my heart. Tugging to the place of rendezvous, before half there, in a little cross street, I sat down upon a log, hot and weary.

"I cannot carry this melon," said I, opening the bag and looking in with a remorseful spirit. "I cannot carry this poor melon." Out came the melon; and, tossing it over the fence, I scampered off with all the speed I was master of.

The day passed off wearily enough to me. Bill Parsons called me a coward, when he beheld no melon, and his bitter taunts rankled in my heart all day.

What wonder, what regrets, attended the discovery of the theft!

"That beautiful melon stolen!" exclaimed Eben, refusing to believe it possible.

"That you took such pains with!" said Robert.

"What an ugly thief!"

"I am very sorry, my son," and father looked so regretfully.

"You will have another soon, Eben," said our mother encouragingly.

"But it will not be like that, mother. I did nurse it so carefully."

Poor Eben! I cannot describe the misery, the fear, the wretchedness which tore my heart during the days which followed. Where was the happy independence of conscious integrity? I cringed before the affectionate caresses of my brothers. Appetite fled, and my spirits forsook me. When my mother, with anxious look, feared I was sick, I coldly answered, and rudely fled from her inquiries. Every object I beheld seemed to reflect but one dreadful image—caused to my [illegible] a most mortified, as that I was a thief. I bore it until I could bear it no longer. It was Saturday afternoon, and turning distastefully away from all Saturday afternoon frolics, I sought my father's counting-room.

"Father, are you alone?" I asked, the door being ajar.

"Yes, my son, walk in, I am happy to see you," and he put aside his newspaper.

In I went, and shut the door firmly behind me.—Planting myself courageously before him, while the life-blood seemed oozing from my heart, "Father," I began, "it was I who stole Eben's melon! I stole it in the night."

I shall never forget the grief-expression which came suddenly over my father's face as he looked at me. I fell on my knees before him and hid my face, but I could not cry.

He laid his hand upon my head. "Ralph, did you forget that God beheld you?" The sad earnestness of the inquiry penetrated my inmost soul. With quick and broken utterance, I rehearsed the story of my guilt.

"Father! father, can you forgive me? Shall I ever be happy again? What shall I do?" were the impetuous questionings of my hot and aching heart. He did not speak for a moment, and then his voice quivered. Had he sternly sent me from his presence, had he whipped me, I could have borne anything better than his sad quivering voice. My father! how I bless thy memory!

"My son," he at length said, slowly and distinctly, "you have broken a great law of your God. You have betrayed the affection of a brother. You have violated the confidence of your family." I felt as if I wanted to die then. "But, my son, I thank God you have confessed this great sin. It shows you are penitent, and, penitent, you may be forgiven and restored, my child." How did my aching, pent-up feelings then find relief in tears, as bitterly I wept at my father's feet. "Tell mother, tell Eben," I sobbed out, "let them not cast me off—ask them to forgive me."—My father lifted me up and sat me on his knees, great boy that I was, but I dared not look in his face. "Yes, they must know this, Ralph, painful story as it must be." "Now, father," I exclaimed, interrupting him, "tell them all, I have been so afraid to look them even in the face. O, I would hide nothing any longer." There was a long, sad pause. "Will you go and tell mother?" I asked. "Yes, Ralph," he answered sorrowfully. I then went away into a little closet adjoining the counting-room, and sat down upon an old trunk of papers, there, alone and unobserved, to await my father's return from the house. In an hour's time, and it seemed ages, he came back and unfolded to me the result of his sad consultation with my mother, in the requirements of which I humbly and heartily acquiesced. There I remained until supper time, when he took me by the hand and led me home, without speaking, but there was a pitying tenderness in his manner, which went to my very heart. I could not appear at supper, but sought the solitude of my father's chamber. How thankful did I feel, humiliating as was the situation, that the great wall of partition, which guilt had made between me and my family, was at least broken down, and I had no longer to bear in secrecy the dreadful burden.—In an hour's time my father called me to the sitting room. It was the season for evening devotions, and my mother, sister and brothers, were already seated at their accustomed places. Near my father was an empty chair, in which he motioned me to sit. The doors were closed, and the stillness of death pervaded the room. One hasty glance I stole toward my mother's face, and beheld a paleness on her cheek, and a dimness in her eye, which I shall never forget. "I have something to say," began my father, in a low, sad voice, and he related all I had told him, without either blame or extenuation. In striking and forcible language did he represent the danger and guilt of disguising any sin under harmless and innocent names. "Sin is no joke," said he impressively, "and a prophet of God, in stern and strong language, has denounced a woe against them who call evil good, and put light for darkness,"—every eye was fixed upon him—"and now I hope Ralph is penitent; he feels he can never be happy again until he is forgiven. Eben, if you forgive your brother for this great wrong, come and tell him so." That dear brother flew towards me, weeping and broken-hearted as I sat, and, clasping my hand in his, exclaimed, "From my heart I forgive you, Ralph," while the great tears glistened in his eyes. He would have fell on my neck but my father motioned him away.

"Now we must carry this matter before God," said my father, solemnly, and the family knelt in prayer. He placed his hands upon my head as he clearly and distinctly laid open my guilt to the God of Heaven; then humbly did he pray for my forgiveness. How earnestly did he plead for my soul! How he besought that I might be cleansed by the blood of Christ, and dedicate myself to the service of my Heavenly Master! Then how did he plead for us all, that we might so live upon earth as to become a re-united family around the Eternal Throne! That agonizing, earnest prayer, will follow me down to latest life. Did I not then realize, that sin must be no light thing, albeit committed in darkness and alone, which could bring such terror and wretchedness to myself, cause tear with grief a parent's heart, and which required the blood of Jesus Christ to wash away? I had known the peace of well-doing, had I not reaped the bitter fruit of wrong-doing? My father saw this, and said, as we arose, "Let this matter never be alluded to or mentioned henceforth."

Then little Alice came to me, and unpinning the blue kerchief at her side, she lovingly clasped one arm about my neck, for I resumed my seat, and with the other tenderly wiped by face. "Dear Ralphy, I love you dearly, and Fanny does too; she says she loves you better than she loves George, if he is her brother." Precious little comforter! How dear was your tender and child-like sympathy, in that hour of humiliation and repentance!

Often, in later years, have I envied the blessed gift of a sister. Ministering spirits sweet sisters are, in the household band, hovering with their quiet and glad affection round the pathway of their brothers, strengthening their better principles, and drawing them into the hallowed paths of domestic enjoyments.

Sacrifice of Marcus Curtius.

A Legend of the Early Days of Rome.

BY H. W. HERBERT,

AUTHOR OF "THE BROTHERS," "CROMWELL," ETC. ETC.

Rome was still young, and though increasing rapidly in name and power, could scarcely yet be spoken of as great or glorious. The Kings had, near a century before, been banished from the city; and the wars had not long been ended, by which the exiled race of the Tarquinii, leagued with the ancient Latins, had shaken the foundations of the State, and oftimes threatened its annihilation.

The straw-built cottages of Romulus had long since disappeared from the streets of the Palatine; the Cælian mount had been included in the fortified pomarium, with Oppius and Cispius, the twin summits of the Esquiline; and the low regions circumjacent to the Palatine, Cermalus, Velia and Faqutal, had already been built thickly. The Capitoline and the Quirinal hills had been comprised the last within the limits of the city proper; and in the open space between the two, was situate the far-famed Roman Forum, a vast oblong area, surrounded with shops, porticoes, and spacious halls of justice, or basilicæ, as they were termed, and containing the golden milestone, from whence, in after days, all distances were calculated, and all roads measured, beyond the Rhine and Danube, and even to the frozen ridges of the Swedish Thyle-mark, ultima Thule of the Romans, and the umbrageous wilds of the great Caledonian forest. Here likewise flourished yet the celebrated ficus ruminalis, the sacred fig-tree, whose time-honored branches had overshadowed the slight ark which bore the mighty sons of Mars and Ilia, safe o'er the waters of the refluent Tiber. Here stood the brazen statue of the wolf, suckling those rescued twins, made holier by the lightning which had, in the opinion of the superstitious ancients, set it apart by fiery baptism, as consecrate to the most mighty gods. Hence rose the hundred steps which led to the great Capitol, temple alike of Jupiter omnipotent, and citidel of the young brave republic, one day to be the mistress of the world. It must not be, however, fancied for a moment, that at the time of which I write, the great and gorgeous monuments, whose wonderful remains exist to the astonishment of modern ages, had been erected in the growing city, devastated as it had been so recently by the overwhelming force of the Gauls under their leader Brennus, and afterward rebuilt so hastily that the very direction of the principal streets had been altered, and the lines of the great sewers and watercourses covered by masses of irregularly built and mean houses.

The architecture, except here and there, in some temple erected for the worship of a more popular god, in some commemorative arch of triumph, or votive column, was of the commonest and most rustic order. A few small Tuscan colonnades, a few mean fountains, scattered here and there, with rude, and for the most part, indelicate sculptures, were at that time the only ornaments of Rome, uncivilized as yet, or as the later Romans would have it, unpolluted by the soft arts and intellectual polish of the Greeks. The men of Rome were still the tillers of the ground, hardy, and rude and sunburned; with uncombed locks and stalwart limbs; staunch hunters of the boar in the deep Pontine marshes—of the gaunt wolf in the dark dingles of the Appenines; indomitable warriors in the field, as many a deadly fight had proved already to vigorous Latin and fierce Samnite—to the Etruscan, skilled in augury and mystic lore—to Marsian infantry, the steadiest and best on Italian soil; but ignorant of letters, careless of art, contemners of all elegance and polish, as things unworthy of stout man. Nor were Rome's women far more feminine than their robust and warlike lords. They only knew, indeed, to spin and to be chaste. The singing of harsh ballads in celebration of great deeds of old—the exploits of the antique Patrician heroes—their sole accomplishment, their only solace; the care of their households, the education of their hardy boys, their chiefest care and proudest boast. Not for them was it to pore languidly over the luxurious, enervating strains of enamored poets—to move their delicate limbs in the voluptuous measures of the Ionic dance—to strike the tinkling strings of the soft Lydian lute, to light lascivious tunes! Not yet were these things other than an abomination and a loathing to the unsullied maidens, the proud matrons of undegenerate Rome! The lessons that they taught their sons, inculcated forever the one Roman virtue, worth all the rest beside, and without which all the rest were nothing—valor! Valor to do, and fortitude to suffer! No tears had they for the dead son, or sire, or spouse, or lover, who died with his wounds before him, his face heavenward, his feet towards the foe! No pity had they—no! nor mercy, for the weak heart that faltered—the coward feet that fled!—Proud mothers and stern nurses, meet to bear conquerors, to train up heroes! Rome's very virgins sighed not for fair form, or comely face, or honeyed accents; they listed not the voice of the charmer, charm he never so wisely; they were won not by gentle words, but by stout deeds and patriot daring! And happier the maid in her own, in Rome's estimation, who scattered flowers upon the corpse of the cold lover bedecked with mural or with civic crown, and followed by the Consuls and the Senate to his proud grave, publicly buried, since he had died for the public—than she who clasped the living form of the youngest, noblest, richest bridegroom, distinguished by no exploits, ambitious of no honors!—Such were the men, the matrons and the maids of the Republic. Paternal, poor, brave, patriotic, was Rome's aristocracy; frugal and just and wise, careless of profits, but insatiate of glory, were her magistrates; pious, industrious and loyal, frank to their equals, haughty to their foes, humble, and yet affectionate withal to their superiors, martial and honest, and contented, was her people.

For gold had not yet invaded the Republic, nor the lust of it pierced and polluted the hearts of her citizens. Commerce had not yet introduced her effeminate luxuries, her low and grasping cares, her sordid and dishonest means, her foul and avaricious ends, into the bold and patriotic agricultural commonwealth. Glory, not gold, was their ambition.—Freedom, not gain, their idol. Wealth was not then all power—nor to be rich, come how they might the riches! the only road to distinction—the only title to respect or honor! These things were, afterward, even in Rome—but were not then; else would this legend never have been handed down to this far generation;—and when they were, Rome had begun to fall. Nor shall that nation ever rise, ever be morally and truly great, in which avarice shall stand for ambition, and gold for glory!

But now there was dismay in Rome, voiceless and cheerless consternation. Such terror was not in the streets when Porcena won the Janiculum, and would have carried the Sublician bridge, and so possessed the city, but for the resolute determination of Cœles and his bold companions;—such terror was not in the streets when the ferocious Gauls poured in, with their bare limbs and many-colored plaids, huge claymores glittering in the pure Italian sunshine, when all the people fled and left the streets deserted, save the stern senators who sate upon their chairs, each with his toga folded decently round him, each with his ivory sceptre in his hand, to await the death which he would not avoid by the disgrace of flying from a foe, and that foe a barbarian. Such terror was not in the streets when Brennus flung his broadsword into the balanced scale, and cried VÆ VICTIS! For now the terror was not of any human foe, nor to be combated by any mortal weapon. The Gods, the Gods had spoken in their wrath! the solid earth had shuddered, had yawned ominous of Rome's sudden desolation. Right in the centre of the Forum, between the spot where now stands the sublime arch of Severus and the old figtree, there had appeared during the night a vast gaping chasm, accompanied by sounds as of subterraneous thunder, by vivid flashes of volcanic lightning, and by a strange convulsive motion, the earth rocking like the billows of an angry sea, and the most massive buildings tottering to their bases. Three days had passed, and still that black unfathomable gulf yawned horribly, with a thin sulphurous vapor seething up like the steam of some vast caldron during the day from the gloom of its invisible abysses, and a strange lurid light flickering over it in the darkness of the night, sufficing only to render its vast depth discernible without revealing anything of its contents or suffering the eye to reach its bottom.—Thousands of yards of the strongest rope with heavy weights attached had been run out in the vain attempt to reach the bottom, but had in every case given way from the strain of their own weight without reaching anything palpable. Vast stones had been hurled down that men might judge from the sound of the profundity, and of the nature of the chasms—they had been heard to bound and thunder down the rocky side, plunging from crag to crag, and dragging down with them fresh masses, till the whole gulf was filled with the dull echoing roar, that outvied the strongest thunder, and the din gradually passed away, and a dead silence again reigned in those awful caverns.

For three whole days the altars had smoked every where throughout the city and the suburbs; the air was laden with the perfume of Sabaac gums, myrrh, larch, and frankincense. Hecatombs had been offered to the celestial, and holocausts of coal-black lambs to the infernal deities. Processions had marched to and fro, from shrine to temple, wearying the ears of the mighty Gods with supplications hitherto impotent and fruitless. On this, the third day, had been holden a sacred and most solemn convocation of all the colleges of priests and augurs, to seek out if so might be the meaning of this dreadful prodigy.—Fasting before the dawn of day, had they all come together in the grand temple of Olympian Jove, upon the Capitol. There sat the greatest pontiff in his grand robes, presiding over his venerable brethren, the noblest, wisest, and most virtuous of Rome's nobility—these were the Saliar priests of Mars, with their strange mitred helms and flower-inwoven tunics, the brazen plates and shields of purest gold, among which was the fateful orb of the divine ancile—there were the Gallic flamens of old Cybele, with robes of purple, and Perecynthian drums, and brazen cymbals—there were the Potitii and Pinarii of Hercules—the vestal virgins, pure, passionless and spotless as their white robes and sacred fire—then the Ambarvalia brothers—then the Etruscan augurs, wisest of men in the occult and awful sciences, first learned by the Chaldean Magi far up on the cloud piercing top of Baal's towering temple, and thence transmitted through the dread sages of the Egyptian labyrinth, who watched the transit of the planets from the deep passages of Cheops' and Cephrenes' pyramids, to their descendents, the Tyrrhene Pelasgi of Etruscia—there were the wise Haruspicas, and last, not least, the Quindecemviri, elected guardians of those three Sibylline volumes, where might be read by the initiated the fates of Rome henceforth and for ever—preserved in a stone chest; deep in the central vault below Jove's statue in the Capitol.

Many a mystic rite had been performed, many an awful invocation had been uttered, but so far all had failed—spells more puissant far than those by which Iamblichus cooked the phantasies of Eros and Anteros at Gadura, had been resorted to in vain. Dread charms and periapts with which Medea had insphered the moon in Colchis, and drawn compelled responses from the unwilling Hecate, had called up no dread form from the abyss of Hades, had wrung no answer from the intelligences of the viewless world. But one course was now left, the consultation of those solemn volumes. Fasting, and vigil through the livelong night, purificatory sprinklings of water from boughs of the green bay trees prepared the quindecemvirs for the dread undertaking, and as the fourth day dawned, they wound in slow procession through the dim vaulted aisles, and down the central staircases, hewn in the living rock, five hundred toilsome steps, lighted by one dim torch to the Sibylline vault. Some entered there, but they, high priest and pontifex, augur and soothsayer, flamen of Mars and Vestal, paused mute, and pale, and shivering with the horror of their awe-stricken expectation, without the iron door of that mysterious cell. Long did they pause, and weary did they wax with watching, before the fifteen guardians of the volumes, staggered forth, pale, and haggard, and exhausted, with bristling hair and glaring eyes, and lips ashy and quivering with dread—then smitten, all at once, with a wild frenzy, they hurried up the stairs, trembling and stumbling in the dark, while ever from that secret vault came deep and solemn voices, greater than human, uttering unknown sounds in mysterious cadences, and loud, heart-rending sighs, and shouts of horrid laughter! Such terrors must be brooked by those who would read things beyond the ken of wisest mortals, who would peruse the book of doom and pierce the secrets of eternity. Ere long they stood in the Forum before the assembled people to speak the destinies of Rome. The loud, clear voice of the great pontifex proclaimed the truth to the quaking and awe-stricken multitude.

"Until that chasm shall close, there shall be war famine, and pestilence, and woe, and ruin!—blood in the streets, blood at the hospitable board, blood on the sacred hearths! Dishonor and defeat to Roman arms, captivity and servitude to Roman citizens! The Gods, deserting their time-honored thrones, until the former shall be a pasture for the wild beasts of the forest—the Capitol a desolat on!"

And wild and frantical arose the cry of the despairing populace, the groans of strong and bearded men, blent with the shrill wail of women, and the weak, shivering cries of infancy. And then loudly the question was proposed—

"How shall it close—what must we do to avert this ruin?"

"This also," answered the priest, "this also the great Gods have deigned to tell; not willing that Rome utterly should perish, but after suffering awhile and making due atonement, rise still and wax more glorious. Ye shall cast into the abyss whatever is most precious, whatever is most valuable to the State—and instantly, that done, shall the gulf close for ever!"

"What?" exclaimed all at once; "what shall it be—what shall we do? What is most precious?"

"That have they not revealed," replied the priest. "It is for ye to solve the mystery. devoting that ye deem most precious, until the closing of the chasm shall prove them satisfied!"

No more was spoken, but with a simultaneous shout, the mighty crowd dispersed: each rushing to his home in wild excitement. Then was a wondrous sight to be seen: every man, every woman, nay, every child, hurrying from the doors of every dwelling, palace or hut alike, bearing the costliest and most valuable articles that they possessed—the very articles, perhaps, to gain which they had passed years of toil and self-denial; to win which they had shed the blood of other, yea! shed their own upon the battle-field; to keep which, under ordinary circumstances, they would have risked everything but life; but which, as it would have seemed to any casual observer, now smitten with wild frenzy, they were bent on destroying. Misers brought forth their hoarded gold. their gems more dear to them than life itself. Trophies and arms and standards, were hurled into that inexorable gulf. Widows devoted to its remorseless jaws, the precious tokens of their early love, the very inurned ashes of their dead husbands—maidens gave up their spousal pledges; childhood laid down its toys. The scholar might be seen bringing forth from his lone sanctum the priceless rolls of parchment, by which he had hoped to gain immortality—the minstrel's lyre and hard worn wreath of bays—the artist's pencil, and the tablets covered with sketches, rude indeed, and inartificial, but still the best of the age and nation—the sculptor's chisel and half-finished statue of God or God-like hero, fell side by side, into that gloomy gulf, which yet closed not, nor shewed a sign of closing over the vast piles of wealth, which were plunged into it—altars smoked round it, on all sides, and virgins sang the deprecatory strains that were wont in other days to turn aside the wrath of the great subterranean Deities—but all was fruitless! Hours passed away and with their flight the hopes of all waxed fainter, and their hearts sadder and more desolate. Now a vast herd of snow-white oxen, the choicest from the rich pastures of Clitumnus, came bellowing and jostling up the sacred way, from the field of Mars—the offering of some wealthier patrician, driven up for that fatal purpose, from his near Sabine farm—five hundred snowwhite steers, without stain or blemish, with gilded horns, and flowering garlands round their necks, and fluttering fillets streaming from their curled brows. Loud were the acclamations of the multitude, as with hopes now somewhat restored, they looked upon that splendid piece of devout munificence.

It might well be, they thought, that since Rome was at that time a State purely agricultural, this might be the most precious thing! the thing most valuable to the State! the thing that should close the gulf, and appease the powers of Hades. High surged the volumed dust from beneath the hoofs of the affrighted brutes, as goaded almost to madness by the sharp lances of the mounted herdsmen, they came thundering along, with blood-shot fiery eyes, and tongues lolling out, smarting and bellowing between fear and fury. Dogs bayed, and women shrieked, and men clamored. Now, at accelerated speed they reached the brink of the abyss—the front rank raised a fearful roar of terror, and recoiled for a second's space on the headlong verge—but the pressure from behind overpowered their resistance: they were crushed down in masses, and plunged headlong!—Words cannot paint the din, the hubbub, and the hellish tumult. For as the herd grew thinner that every individual beast could note its destined end, now that none were left in the rear to urge them, their struggles to escape their doom became fierce and frantical—they charged the crowd with hoof and horn, and broke once and again through it—but still each time they were foiled and turned, and brought up again at the pike's point, and goaded into the abyss, or slaughtered on the verge with sacrificial axe, and consecrated, and then cast downward.

The roar at length subsided—of those five hundred magnificent and stately creatures, so full of life and power, and vigorous motion, nothing remained to be seen but pools of gore, and slime and offal, with here a shattered horn and there a tuft of snow-white hair from the manes of the noble steers—while frustrate in their hopes, disconsolate and growing fast into despair, the people gathered round the brink, and gazed with blank visages and quaking limbs, into the shapeless gloom that veiled with its impenetrable curtains the bottom of the fateful pit. Still it yawned wide and vast; that insatiate maw, which had devoured already so much of Rome's dearest wealth; and still seethed up the thin blue sulphurous smoke, as if to call for fresh victims. Devices of all kinds were proposed and tried—the last sacrifice had given a new impetus to the ideas of the populace—they thought that perchance the right plan had indeed been adopted, but that the sacrifice had been made by a hand too niggard to appease the dread anger of the fiend enemies of Rome. Fresh herds were driven in from the neighboring pastures—oxen and cows and heifers, and unbroke, neighing steeds, from the wide plains that skirt the Pontine Marshes, prancing in all their blythe and glorious majesty—and flocks of sheep, and goats, and swine—thousands and thousands of heads—till it was but too evident that, although every beast that cropped the pastures of broad Italy from Umbria to the mouth of the Tiber, from the far Julian Alps, named from Æneas' son to southerly Tarentum, were plunged down that black precipice, it would avail Rome nothing!

Night fell, thick and tempestuous, and swart as Hades. But the despairing multitude returned not homeward, but sat voiceless except to wail and moan, and motionless except to wring the hands and tear the hair, throughout the livelong hours of darkness in the streets, in the forum, on the steps of the temples; yea, on the brink of the abyssm, in very desperation of expectancy. It seemed to them that this was not all—that the doom of Rome was indeed sealed—that greater woes were yet to come—more full and certain ruin! Some fancied that they heard strange voices, deeper and more majestical than human lamenting, in the inmost places of the shrines and temples; and sounds as of vast viewless multitudes going tumultuously forth from the gates of the holiest groves, from the most solemn altars. And then would a great convulsion shake the crowd, even as a spasm shakes the body of a strong man, and a wild cry would go up to the darkened heavens!

"Let us die now! let us die all! the guardian gods have gone from their chosen places! the gods have deserted Rome!"

It was a night indeed of terror and despair! No lamps were lighted in the streets, or in the houses; no boards were spread for the gay evening meal; no fires were kindled on the hearths! Yet in one house—one house alone in all that wide and wretched city—a taper was seen burning in the porter's chamber by the gate, and in the atrium a cheerful party was collected about a clear wood fire that blazed merrily in a low brazier, surrounded by brightly polished images of the house-gods, wrought in the old Etruscan model! A small round table stood near the impluvium, or shallow tank, which in all Roman houses occupied the centre of the hall, or principal apartment, indeed the only apartment in which the family at that early day were wont to dwell. On this were placed two or three lamps of bronze, with several burners, a flask or two of wine, with many drinking cups of silver, a platter full of grapes, and a tray covered with cakes and other light refreshments. And round it sat four persons—one a tall, stately matron, with superb features of the old Roman mould, a figure which had not yet lost all its youthful graces, and hair as white as snow, braided above her splendid brow. The second was a young man of about twenty-five years, dressed in the full patrician habit, well-formed, and powerful, and tall, with an eye clear and piercing as an eagle's, and an expression of undaunted bravery and determined resolution, imprinted legibly on the thin lips, and in the outlines of his strong square cut jaws. The other two were girls of some seventeen or eighteen years, both of uncommon beauty, one with dark hair, and the black flashing eyes of her country, the other with long curled auburn tresses, and those soft liquid eyes of azure, which are so rare and so much admired in Italy. Every one of these three persons were engaged in some occupation, differing, it is true, slightly, each one from that of the other, but all having, it would seem, connexion with some common object. There were, moreover, at the farther end of the hall, several slaves, likewise occupied in the usual manner, although with coarser implements, and about materials of a heavier nature. Thus the young man himself was burnishing a brazen casque, richly engraved with sculptured gryphons on the crest, and attaching a quantity of horse hair, dyed with the richest crimson, to the extended wings. The matron was engaged in the shaping of a sagum, or fine cassock, commonly worn above the armour, of crimson cloth, while one of the sisters was winding the studs and frogs which were to ornament it, with bright golden threads. The other was weaving a triumphal chaplet of bays, intermixed with myrtle. The slaves were busy with the phalera, or horse trappings of a battle charger, binding the frontlet of the bridle with gay scarlet fillets, fringing the housings with gold tassels, and making, as it would seem, equipments for some great military festival.

The younger of the girls would, it is true, at times wipe away a tear, and choke down a rising sob, as she looked on her brother; but the expression of the other was that of an enraptured martyr, confident of heaven after brief suffering, calm and serenely fearless, while on the proud face of the mother there sat fixed permanently a gleamy radiance, full of ecstatic triumph, and pride more than gratified. The son, on the other hand, worked on at his light and pleasant task, with something more of thought than usual, something perhaps of solemnity, and of something not wholly different from awe, mixed with the set determination of his bold, speaking features.—Their converse was on ordinary matters, connected with the work in which they were engaged, the colors of the brightly-tinctured wool, the shape of the golden ornaments; but it was cheerful, and at times even gay; and it was evident that the mother required a mighty effort to keep down the outward demonstration of her proud pleasure.

Those were strange times indeed! When mothers could equip their sons, not merely for the chances of the field, the casting of the die for death or glory, but of the certainty of an appalling and uncertain doom—equip and send them forth with laughter on their lips and tears of gladness in their eyes—to perish awfully and serve their country.

That was the house of Marcus Curtius—that was the last night that thenceforth on earth for ever, he should sit in that old familiar hall, and hold pleasant converse with the dear home-friends—that was the last night that the mother should look on her first-born—the sisters clasp their brother. Yet they talked cheerfully, and even jested, and supped with no allusion to what must befal to-morrow, except one brief hint by the mother, at the eternal glory which should encircle the old Curtius house through endless ages. And then, when their labours were concluded, they arose and embraced each other tenderly, but without tears or lamentations, and parted for the night, and slept and dreamed of fame, of patriotism, of eternal honour.

Curtius had heard the words of the high priest, and pondered them in silence, and found their enigmatic sense, but he spoke word to none, lest any one should rob him of his honor. Homeward he turned, and councilled with his mother—ever best councillor in time of trouble!—and she felt sure that he was right in his conjecture, even as she knew that he was firm and noble in his gallant purpose; and she dissuaded him not. No! not she!—true Roman mother!—but blessed him, and commanded him, "Increase more in thy virtue! and win everlasting glory! and live in song with Brutus, and the Horatian brothers, Clelia, and Scævola, and Corles, the great immortal heroes of the old Roman time, eternal and undying!" And then she called her fair girls and her slaves about her, to make the noble victim most noble preparation to die nobly.

The morning came, and the assembled myriads still shook and groaned in the streets and the market place, around the gulf which they had now ceased to hope ever to see closed. The very priests despaired, and some half doubted their oracular gods, and some believed, but all trembled.

Suddenly rose on the dead silence—for now despair had frozen up the tears of all and stilled their lamentation—the blast of a clear clarion. All eyes turned suddenly, and there in a brazen casque, shadowed with crimson plumes, and brazen corslet glancing like gold to the new-risen sun, and crimson overcoat, and most gorgeous trappings, on a superb white battle charger, sat a proud warrior. Had there been two, the people had cried out a portent, and deemed that the twin brethren, Castor and Pollux, had once more ridden down from their Olympian holds, to save their favored city. He spoke!—and all knew Marcus Curtius!—

"Ye conscript fathers," he exclaimed, "and ye great consuls, and thou, Roman people, why dread ye, and despair?—and ye wise priests, why doubt ye? What thing can be more valuable to a State, than valiant men and generous steeds—than noble arms, and hearts and hands to wield them? Lo! I am here mounted, and armed, and fearless! Sing, priests and vestals, sing! Loud let the skies resound the Io shout, the high, triumphant Pæan! Shout, Roman people! Rome shall be safe and glorious! For I—I, Marcus Curtius, devote myself to her weal and glory—devote myself to the vengeance of the gods—Heavenly, and Terrestrial, and Infernal! Temples, and towers, and town—altars and hearths of Rome—tombs of our great forefathers, statues of our old gods—farewell, and grow ye great, and wax ye more and more and forever! So shall your son die not in vain, but live indeed forever!"

And with the words he touched his proud horse with the spur, and slacked the bridle rein. The people cleared broad the way before him, shouting in admiration and anticipated triumph, while loud the averruncal Hymn of priests and vestals went up to the clear, cloudless skies—while erect in his seat, his high face bright with ecstatic inspiration, waving his battle sword on high, Curtius charged the gulf, as he had charged a band of Samnite spearmen. The horse—the noble horse—partook of his dauntless spirit, and needed neither rein nor spur to urge him. The people cried out that fire streamed from his nostrils as he thundered on his fatal path, and a strange glory from his eyes. Fire did flash from the pavement under his armed hoofs, as with unblenching eye he galloped to the verge and took the plunge unhesitatingly.

One moment they were seen glancing down the abyss—the next the viewless gloom embraced them!

A broad flash of electric flame glared from the cloudless skies, and momentarily filled the whole heaven with dazzling lustre.

A long, loud roll of thunder charged simultaneously on the right hand—the Fate was fulfilled! The Expiation finished!

With a slow, oscillating movement, the earth shook for a moment, and ere the burst of acclamation which hailed the omen had sunk into silence, the gulf was closed, and no trace of it remained, save a small pool of deep, clear water, which bore still its name—the Lake of Curtius—when the bold victim's wish was complete, and his loved city was indeed Queen of the Universe! Nor while her citizens were men, did they forget that Curtius died that they too might be Romans!

THE WILDREDGES;
Or, The Two Pictures of Life.

BY EZRA HOLDEN.

"No, Henry, you are altogether wrong."

"How so, Elizabeth?"

"Because you are too extensively in business to hesitate now."

"But I sometimes fear the consequences."

"That is a foolish fear. How do others manage? Don't they make one debt with which to pay another? You must do the same."

"Would you advise me, then, to buy the block of stores which Mr. Whitwell seems so anxious to sell?"

"Certainly—he asks but little cash down, and it will keep up your credit."

"That, thank fortune, has never been doubted; but these heavy operations oppress me. I was far more happy in the little store in Congress street, and even when I worked at my honest trade—"

"Yes; you are forever harping about your mechanic trade. I hate it, Harry. I don't see the necessity, when people have risen in the world, to be eternally talking about their origin."

"Perhaps it may check us, wife, from going too fast in our new career."

"There is far more fear of its serving to keep us down in the world. You know Julia is to be brought out at our great party on Wednesday evening, and the Whitneys, Parleys, and Gardiners, would not be of the jam if they knew her father started life in a smutty and filthy machine shop."

"But, Elizabeth, it was an honorable business and gave me a start in the world."

"What if it did? You're a merchant and capitalist now, and should deport yourself accordingly."

"Well, well, it is of no use to discuss this point with you. Besides, the hour has nearly arrived when I was to meet Mr. Whitwell, and say yes or no about the block of buildings."

"Say yes, husband—for it was only last week that Whitman Johnson made his great purchase in Bowdoin Place; and I am sure, at the party of the Shaws, every body was saying how rich he is becoming."

"But Whitman has been a bold operator and a most fortunate one also."

"Yet he started life when you did, Harry, and has done all by courage in great speculations."

"And I shall not deny that I have entered into many heavy operations in real estate, from the daring example he has set."

"That was right, Harry. Were I a man, I would not let my old school-fellows run away from me in the race of fortune, if adventure and courage would prevent it."

Harry Wildredge was an enterprising young man. Commencing life with nothing but his own hands, he had, after a few years of very successful business, married Elizabeth Woodbridge, the daughter of one who had been a wealthy merchant ere reverses somewhat changed his business condition. To live in a style corresponding with the expectancy of the family into which he had been received as a son-in-law, required him to set up a very expensive establishment; and the new associates he formed, with the dazzling whirlpool of society into which he was thrown, soon caused him to lose sight of the prudential habits of trade, which had, by dint of devotion to business, placed him, at the period of his marriage, in the possession of a fortune which was regarded as most ample. Legitimate trade was now abandoned for what was regarded as a shorter road to an enormous fortune.

His young wife, ambitious to eclipse others, was ever his counsellor to push forward in the career of rapid fortune-making; and when he went to the counting-house to meet Mr. Whitwell, for the purpose of giving an answer in regard to the block of buildings, his mind was not a little swayed by what she had that morning urged.

"Yes," said he to himself, "what she says is all true. I must not hesitate now. My career must be onward. I must keep pace with the bold adventures of my friends. A few more great operations, and fortune may so smile upon me that I shall be able to retire altogether from active pursuits. I will purchase the block of buildings in Summer Place, and any others which may offer under such favorable auspices."

The purchase was accordingly made; and it appeared as if this were a new starting point in the adventurous career of Henry Wildredge. There was evidently a powerful impulse at work in his mind. He never looked back again. The heaviest operators were eclipsed; and for years he was regarded as one of the greatest as well as one of the boldest adventurers who appeared on 'change.

Elizabeth Wildredge was in her glory. The greatest splendor prevailed both at her town and country house, and when she appeared upon the fashionable drive in her magnificent carriage, it cannot be denied that she was not unfrequently the envy of those who had to content themselves with a less costly turn out. As a devotee of fashion, none were more ardent than Mrs. Wildredge; and, as a consequence, she could find but little time to devote to the guidance of Julia's mind. Indeed, her daughter had been completely turned over to the care of others, and she was educated only as one who would become the heiress of an immense estate, and have about her, all her lifetime, others to attend to her most trifling wants.

Her father, completely lost in the extent, bewilderment and distractions of an enormous business, had neither time nor thoughts to bestow in the counsel or guidance even of his only daughter; and thus, at a period when, above all others, she most needed parental sympathy, watchfulness, and control, the expectant heiress was literally left to her own will. She was surrounded constantly with a train of suitors, from among the gay, unoccupied and thoughtless gallants of society; and among all, a young nobleman from abroad, Count Delande, was most frequently her attendant whenever she appeared in the public promenades.

It was the custom of Mrs. Wildredge, every Summer, to commence the fashionable season at the watering places, by spending a few weeks at the White Sulphur, in Virginia, and then to proceed, as the warmer season advanced, to the thronged resorts of the North. But as several families of their acquaintance were, in two weeks, to proceed to Niagara, Julia, who was always permitted to do as she pleased, expressed a desire not to accompany her mother to the White Sulphur, but went with the friends of the family directly to the Falls. It was six weeks before Mrs. Wildredge reached Niagara, and then she met the surprising intelligence that Julia was not there. Count Delande had arrived the week previously, and the last that had been seen of either, they went out in the family carriage to ride. A letter was despatched to Mr. Wildredge, who made immediate preparations to go in pursuit of the runaways, but the evening before he was ready to start, he received another letter, couched in the usual terms of pretended repentance, asking forgiveness for the elopement, and a parent's pardon that Julia had become "the Countess Delande."

This mortifying event at once put an end to Mrs Wildredge's season at the watering-places.

On the evening of her return home, she was seated in the parlor with her husband. It was evident enough that he was deeply affected by the elopement of Julia. There was, too, a shade of momentary depression on the countenance of Mrs. Wildredge, but, rallying herself, she endeavored to rally her husband also.

"We must write at once to have them return home. If the Count has run through with his whole fortune, we are told he is of good family, and we must provide them an establishment suitable to the rank his extraction will give him in society."

"Well, Elizabeth, there does not now appear any other course to pursue; but, to me, this is the most painful occurrence of my life."

The runaways were accordingly written for. They returned at once; and, so soon as convenient, proper steps were taken to settle them in a costly and elegantly furnished house in Beekman Square. Agreeably to the wishes of the mother, there was nothing neglected to set them out in magnificence, splendor, and show, and they started life with nothing to do but to participate in all the luxuries which wealth could purchase, and indulge in whatsoever their caprice might dictate.

With such a start, the Count felt he had nothing to care for but to go forward in a career of extravagant leisure, and this was so perfectly in coincidence with his taste and disposition, the future soon showed that he was not to be eclipsed in brilliancy of expenditure, even by the most extravagant of the city.

For several years, Mr. Wildredge continued to extend his business. He had become largely concerned in manufactures, and was also extensively engaged in commerce. Indeed, there were few vast adventures even at the adventurous period in which he was operating, wherein he did not have an interest. It appears to be a law of hazard that the more great risks are taken the more anxious and willing to strike boldly and widely becomes the hazardous adventurer. From dealing in thousands, men come to deal in hundreds of thousands, and millions, with as little consideration as they at first made contracts for a few hundred. It was truly so with Mr. Wildredge. Urged on, as we have constantly seen he was, by the great ambition of his wife, the condition of the business in which he was now so unboundedly involved did not allow him to look back or stand still in his adventurous and exciting career.

A few years previous to the period of which we are speaking, Whitney Farnsworth, an intimate acquaintance, departed this life, appointing Mr. Wildredge the executor of his last will and testament. He left a large estate, bequeathed to his estimable widow and two children: a little girl and boy.

The property, with the exception of what was necessary to the support of the widow and her children, remained in the care of Mr. Wildredge. It was the wish of Mrs. Farnsworth that it should do so, and, at each annual exhibit, he had shown a very prosperous advance, which increased the already unlimited confidence she had in his management of the estate. Such was the relation which Mr. Wildredge bore to the family of his deceased friend, when Mrs. Farnsworth was taken suddenly and seriously ill. It was but a few weeks from the commencement of her indisposition, when her physician gave up all hopes of her recovery. She accordingly made every preparation for so solemn an event, and, confirming the selection of her departed husband, she solicited Mr. Wildredge to become the guardian of her dear children. He accepted the sacred trust, and, in a few days afterward, standing at the death-bed of the devoted mother, as he raised little Mary and Edward in his arms to receive the last kiss of affection from her trembling lips, he gave her the most solemn promise that he would be as a father unto them. She raised her eyes to heaven, and, with a smile of angelic delight, said, with her last breath, "Then I die in peace."

Acting on his own devoted feelings, at the time of their mother's decease, it would have been the wish of his heart if he could have received the orphan children to the bosom of his own family. But he had his fears that his wife was so engrossed in the fashionable world, such an arrangement would be wholly repugnant to her wishes; and this he found was the case, when, a few evenings afterward, he suggested it to her. The only alternative now left, was to place them under the care of the nearest relative, Mrs. Susannah Sprague, a young widowed cousin of their deceased mother, and whose circumstances were such that the receipt of a salary for devoting herself to the orphan children, would not be unacceptable.

This arrangement was accordingly made, and, for two years after the death of widow Farnsworth, both the devoted guardian and the kind-hearted widow, under whose immediate care they were placed, seemed only to rival each other in kindness and attention to the orphan children.

It was the first week in August, during the third year after the decease of Mrs. Farnsworth, that Mr. Wildredge was sitting in the back parlor of their country house, which overlooked the beautiful parterre, from which there seemed a rivalry among the fruits and flowers of almost every clime, to delight the senses of every recipient. But they seemed to have no charms for the master of that delightful mansion. It was obvious that some painful event was weighing heavily upon him. Mrs. Wildredge, who had just returned in her carriage from the country house of the Kitterages, even entered unperceived. She could not fail to observe the altered appearance of her husband, and, with the utmost gayety of her feelings, she remarked,

"Well, by your looks, husband, one would fear you were utterly ruined."

"I fear that my looks are but the index of the fatal truth I must tell you. Draw your chair nearer, Elizabeth—Delande is a forger! I have this day been compelled to draw upon the funds of the orphan children, and pay sixty-eight thousand dollars of their money to save Julia from disgrace by the world's knowing that her husband is a forger and a gambler!"

"Gracious heavens, you astound me!"

"But how shall I tell you all? During the last year and a half, I have been compelled to pay such vast sums for the extravagance of Delande, that, coupled with the great losses I have experienced in business, it will be impossible for me longer to meet my payments. I have passed a year of the most unparalleled misery. But I can endure it no longer. I must make immediate provision to repay the money of the orphan children, and then failure is inevitable."

It would be useless to attempt to picture the emotions with which both husband and wife passed that night.

In the morning, Mr. Wildredge drove to the city at the usual business hour, bent upon one all-absorbing determination to provide means to replace the trust funds of the orphans, ere the final wreck of his fortunes should place it beyond his power to do so. But it seemed as if the fates were against him. Delande had taken a packet which sailed that morning for France. And it had been discovered on 'Change that forgeries, to the amount of forty or fifty thousand dollars more, had been perpetrated by him. As is ever the case in such an emergency, rumor had been busy with her thousand tongues. It was immediately known that Mr. Wildredge had drawn upon the trust funds of the orphans to pay former forgeries. Many of the enormous sums he had previously paid for Delande's defalcations were circulated about with all the exaggeration and coloring such an excited curiosity is ever sure to produce. To add to the agony of his misfortunes, Mr. Wildredge had large sums to pay that day, to meet bills; but, with the tide of exaggerated rumor which was rushing through the city, it was utterly impossible for him to do so; and he was compelled to submit to the dishonor of his paper, without being able to make any previous provision for the replacement of the funds belonging to the orphan children.

It was now at a period of commercial depression, and too soon was it ascertained that the failure brought utter ruin to the fortunes of the Wildredges. It was a sad fall. Who can paint the touching reverse of such a picture? It seemed as if their former high standing, and the troops of world-admirers who had attended their glittering career, were the most ardent of the causes now that pointed out the shortest route to escape the fallen family, in their utter ruin and desolation.

It has been truly said that woman has more fortitude than man, under the most trying emergencies. Not much over a year elapsed, after the failure, when this truth began its illustration in the wife of the ruined merchant. We have seen Elizabeth Wildredge as the gay, thoughtless, fashion-seeking and ambitious member of the world of show, glitter and mistaken rivalry. But how changed now! At first, the unexpected failure of her husband struck her with consternation. But soon she began to be aroused. She looked back upon the past. Oh, what a history was it for her! Upon its every page she saw the bitter rebukings of her own career, and the true woman was inspired. She saw that there was nothing left to them now. False friends had all flown away. Her husband was dispirited. In his career of prudential business, she had ever urged him to push forward, to rival the most dazzling adventurers, and now she felt certain she had been deeply to blame. Her father, who had been, of late years, overburthened with an expensive and extravagant family, brought up to do nothing, was now wholly unable to assist to recover her fallen fortunes.

For the first time in her life, she saw the world as it really was. It had been a most bitter experience to come to it, but she felt convicted they had been entirely upon a wrong route. From that hour, she was a resolved woman—stimulated with the true pride of making all the amends for her great fault, which any womanly effort would in an honorable way permit her to achieve.

A half year more had passed away. Mr. Wildredge was now offered a situation as book-keeper in the mercantile house of Mr. Gray. He was glad to accept it; the salary was not large, to be sure, but it was most acceptable in the present condition of the fallen family.

They had taken a neat little cottage in the suburbs of the city, for the purpose of squaring their expenditures to their scanty income. Mr. Wildredge was more cheerful, now that he had regular employment. He began to feel, too, the happy change that had come over the wife of his bosom. Besides, Julia was with them, and had been ever since the sad developments in regard to her worthless husband. She had been a deep sufferer from the disgrace, mortification and awful change which had followed the profligate and wicked career of Delande. But her mother was now a real mother to her. By her example of resignation, affection and devotion, Julia gradually became a changed being. With a good heart naturally—a pernicious and false system of education—the neglect of parental counsel in early life, and an almost total abandonment to her own wishes and will, had permitted Julia to grow up a thoughtless, untrained and unreflecting aspirant, in the false and delirious ways of the most artificial society even of the great metropolis itself. She had never been, in former days, the companion or confidante of her own mother. But that mother had seen the great error she had committed, and, yielding to no persuasion but that of the most fixed determination to repair, if possible, the deficiency of the past, she clung to her only daughter, with that warmth of zeal and purity of devotion which the true mother is alone capable of displaying. They were inseparable friends and companions now, and both had come to know that there is an inexhaustible mine of unalloyed happiness springing from the true relations of the mother and her daughter, and which unfolds its richest jewels only where there is an unceasing correspondence to develope the productive and priceless treasures of reciprocal affections.

It was now most obviously the single purpose of the mother not only to implant correct views of life in the mind of Julia, but, what was best of all, to carry out those principles into practical life, by her own example.

The labors of Mr. Wildredge were, likewise, most cheerfully yielded to, but, with his small salary, it was soon seen that they had no prospect of bettering their pecuniary situation. One evening, about a year after he had taken his situation as the book-keeper of Mr. Gray, they were sittting in the parlor of the sweet little cottage, which had now become the abode of real happiness. The conversation turned upon the excessive application which the observant and affectionate wife declared was too severe for her husband to perform.

"Now, Harry," she quickly added, "I hope you will not oppose us, for Julia and her mother have, for some time, been forming a plan to see what they can do toward earning their own pin-money."

"And what, pray, do you propose to do more than you now so faithfully accomplish?"

"Why, husband, we are going to set up a school, and we have already the daughters of six of our friends engaged to commence with."

"That you would find far more confining than is my situation as book keeper, and I——"

"No, no, father, you cannot vote against us now, it is altogether too late for that. We are to be inaugurated next Monday, to begin our seminary in due form, and shall expect you to make the opening address on the occasion. You must make a virtue of necessity, therefore, and cast your vote in the affirmative."

The school was accordingly opened. Small as it was in the beginning, its successful progress soon proved what the determination of a persevering wife and her devoted daughter can accomplish. Their hearts were in it—and that is always the way to victory in any thing.

After the close of the first year, "Rose Hill School" progressed rapidly to fame. The acquaintances of the Wildredges, seeing the consecrated energy of Julia and her mother, were proud to aid forward their worthy and useful exertions. They appeared to join their daughters to the seminary as a privilege to themselves; and not six months of the second year passed away before Mrs. Wildredge was delighted that the number of her pupils required her to rent an adjacent and much more spacious dwelling, to accommodate the school. From that time forward, it went gradually upward with wide-spread success, usefulness and fame, until it was but comparatively a few years more, when, in point of profit and respectability, there were few young ladies' seminaries in the country that would at all compare with it; and that was a proud moment for the active mother and her daughter.

It is a source of true happiness to win success in any worthy enterprise in which we feel that our talents are usefully and advantageously employed. If this truth was ever fully developed in any two individuals, their friends felt it was most triumphant in the felicity which reigned at "Rose Hill Cottage."—By the gains of the successful seminary, they had this year purchased the abode in which they first commenced trying their womanly energies—and, by a judicious expenditure in architectural ornaments and taste, it was justly regarded now as one of the sweetest cottages which the delightful suburbs of the city afforded. The grounds were delightfully laid out and ornamented; and if there was not so much richness, splendor and show as were to be seen at the magnificent country residence in which they resided in former days, there was incomparably more happiness. They had true and devoted friends now—those who loved, cherished and admired. There was no false show or artificial pride; but there were reality, simplicity, honest hearts and smiling faces. Few, indeed, are the fathers and husbands who are not made most happy by the proper devotion of their wives and daughters; and, as for Harry Wildredge, he was the happiest man living.

"We have taken two new children to-day, husband, remarked Mrs. Wildredge, as they were sitting under the balcony, one delightful summer's eve, inhaling the sweet perfume given out by the clustering honey suckles that had entwined themselves around and above.

"Come, father," added Julia, "can you guess who they are—when I tell you that in our young ladies' seminary, by especial privilege of the school, one of our new scholars is a boy—and we are determined to keep him permanently, too?"

"I think I shall not be able to conjecture, in that dilemma, my daughter, and so I will wait till your school assembles in the morning to ascertain."

"No, husband," said Mrs. Wildredge, as she came forward, leading in either hand a sweet little girl and boy; "I think your curiosity must not be so long postponed, and so may I introduce the orphan children of your deceased friend, as our future pupils?"

"God bless you, my wife and daughter!" exclaimed Mr. Wildredge, as a tear of gratitude stole down his happy face. "In this, you have indeed filled up my cup of human felicity."

"Yes, my husband, with God's blessing, if devotion can do it, will we endeavor to educate aright the widow's children—we will be a father and mother to them. From the first hour we commenced our school, we had the determination to receive them into it, the moment they should be old enough to come. That period has arrived—and it is, indeed, one of the happiest moments of my life."

Years rolled away, and most faithfully did they fulfil the pledge of that night.

The seminary continued to progress most prosperously, until it had again become indispensable to extend the dimension of its edifices, and multiply the number of assistant teachers, in almost every department.

To the fortunes of Mr. Wildredge there had come, likewise, an unexpected flood of success. Mr. Gray had for many years been pursuing commercial operations with unprecedented advantage. His business had greatly widened this year upon his hands, and, loving Mr. Wildredge as he would a brother, he proposed to receive him as a partner in his concern, giving him a third of the profits of the entire business.

We have not named before that Mr. Gray was a bachelor, but it is far more gratifying to write it now, especially as we have a right to suppose the reader has become not a little interested in the fortunes of the devoted Julia. Almost from the time they removed to the neat little villa at "Rose Hill," Mr. Gray was a constant and intimate visiter there. The maker of his own fortunes, by prudence, straightforwardness and commercial integrity, he had, from the outset, taken a deep interest in beholding the delightful revolution which had come over the family of his early associate. But none had conjectured—not even the ancient maidens of their acquaintance—that his purpose was to propose for Julia, and in this, acting like the prudent merchant that he had ever shown himself, he kept his own secret of intended negotiation, until the proper moment arrived. Then he first asked the consent of his partner in business—the next day, that of the principal of "Rose Hill Seminary," and last, "though not least," the same evening, that of her confidential adviser and associate. Julia said, "I have no objections, Mr. G , to the matrimonial copartnership, provided my dear parents, this time, approve the choice;" and to this the straight-forward merchant was prepared promptly to reply: "Then we may as well seal the contract at as early a day as will suit your convenience, for I first obtained the approval of your father and mother."

The following morning, the whole family assembled to consult upon so important a change as the removal from office of the vice-presidentess of "Rose Hill School."

"I have only one objection, Mr. Gray, to the proposed change," said Mrs. Wildredge, "and that is, I hardly know how I am to submit to a separation of my children, for to me the departed widow's children are the same as my own. To them I owe a debt which I feel I never can repay, but, with such means as Providence has blessed me with, I shall, through my whole life time, do all in my power to make amends."

"Oh, my dear mother, I cannot find words to tell you, but this pestering old bachelor has anticipated us all. Would you believe it, last evening he insisted upon it—as a codicil to our marriage settlement, I suppose—that I was to become the mother of the orphan children, and they shall live with us as our children."

"That can never be, my dearest Julia, unless you take your mother with them—for, in my natural life, I shall never be separated from the orphan children."

"Nor shall you, my mother," quickly retorted Mr. Gray, "because I am never going to be separated from you. We are to live together. So be kind enough to make arrangements, as quickly as may be, to surrender your authority as presidentess of 'Rose Hill Seminary,' for you are henceforth to live with us, and act as the presidentess only of our household."

Never was there a family more united than the one which grew out of this propitious marriage.—In ten years from the wedding-day, Mr. Wildredge had deposited with Mr. Gray the funds of the orphan, which he had expended in an hour of wild speculation and commercial embarrassment; and that night, as he gathered the whole family around him, in the sweet cottage of "Rose Hill," which had never been deserted, he kneeled before the altar of his God in devout thankfulness, feeling and acknowledging that this was indeed the happiest moment of his earthly existence.

A WHISPER TO THE GIRLS.

On a certain occasion, in France, the oldest of two sisters was promised, by her father, to a gentleman, possessed of a large estate. The day was appointed for the gentleman to make his visit, he not having, as yet, seen either of them, and the ladies were informed of his coming, that they might be prepared to receive him. The affianced bride, who was the handsomest of the two, being desirous to show her elegant shape and slender waist to the best advantage, clothed herself in a dress, which sat very tight and close upon her, without any lining or facing of fur, though it was in winter, and exceedingly cold. The consequence was, that she appeared pale and miserable, like one perishing with the severity of the weather; while her sister, who, regardless of her shape, had attired herself, rationally, with thick garments, lined with fur, looking warm and healthy, and ruddy as a rose. The gentleman was fascinated by her who had the most health, the most prudence; and, having obtained the father's consent to the change, left the mortified sister to shiver in single blessedness.

THE COQUETTE.

The coquette expresses herself by caresses and bold freedom. She is determined to charm, cost what it will; and, passing over the line of beauty, defying the good and appropriate, she passes into the world of the senses, and, employing only empty enchantments, she loses successively her power, her charm, the respect of true men, and her own peace of mind, and beauty's holy heaven closes its doors against her.

An elevated desire to please may pass into coquetry; but we do not see every where in life that the white may become gray, and the gray continually darker, until the color of innocence is quite obscured by the black? Yet is the white there, and may lie next the black in stainless purity, just as truth may beam brightly by the side of the darkness of falsehood.—There is an innocent and lovely desire of pleasing; would that every woman possessed it, and would despise its caricature!—[Miss Bremer.

THE RIVALS.

BY B. HINCHMAN.

Several years have elapsed since the marriage of Adelia B——. She was then beautiful. She has still traces of her former beauty; yet time, or care, or both combined, have marked some furrows on her brow, and a close observer may notice that her dark eye beams with a fitful expression of anxiety: betokening a mind not quite at ease. I have said that she was beautiful; I would attempt to describe her: but I am certain I shall not be able to convey to the mind of my reader an adequate idea of that bright picture which even now, after the lapse of years, presents itself to my imagination, as vivid and glowing as though it were but yesterday that I gazed on the original. She was of middle size; her form was faultless; but it was not the elegance of her figure that fixed the attention of the beholder, it was the gracefulness of her movements—the life, the animation, the speaking beauty of her countenance. But why should I endeavor to delineate in my prosaic manner that which has been better depicted by a son of song, (who himself at that time among her suitors,) thus writes to a friend:—

Such is Adelia—young and fair:
With eyes of jet, and teeth of pearl;
With ruby lips and raven hair,
That needs no art to make it curl.
Her cheek the roseate hue of health;
Her neck of finest Grecian mould:
Her mind an intellectual wealth,
More precious far than India's gold.
Her heart affection's crystal fountain,
From which love's streams pellucid flow,
As rills which gushing from the mountain,
Refresh the verdant plains below.
Her manners cordial, frank, and free,
Not formal or in look or word;
Her voice of warbling melody,
Like tones of some Æolean chord.
Unpractised in the ways of guile,
A stranger to coquettish art:
Unused to wear that worldling smile,
Which speaks of hollowness of heart.
Her ev'ry look the mirror where
Her soul is pictured in her face,
As if her soul that face so fair,
Had chosen for its dwelling place.

Still Adelia was not perfect—(alas! that perfection should be denied mortality!)—yet her imperfections were attributable to an erroneous education. Her father was a wealthy merchant, and had early impressed upon the mind of his child the great value of riches; and as she grew near the age of womanhood, had frequently spoken of wealth as an indispensable accompaniment of any who would gain the hand of his daughter. Can it be wondered that impressions thus early made should be lasting? That maxims, falling from the lips of a beloved father, should be received without doubting, and treasured up in the memory as rules of action for future years?

Amongst the number of Adelia's suitors—for beauty and wealth will always find admirers—were two who will claim somewhat more than a passing notice at our hands. Alfred T—— was the son of respectable, though not affluent parents. They moved in the "middle walks of life." He was, at the time of which we are speaking, twenty-two years of age, and engaged in the study of law. He was a young man of an interesting appearance, though not to say decidedly handsome. He was a little above the average height; his lofty brow, slightly marked by the lines of thought, was partly concealed by a profusion of chesnut hair that hung in careless curls, which if they did not betoken absolute neglect, gave but little evidence of that care and arrangement which never fail to mark the fashionable dandy. His large hazel eye, full of expression, was at times eloquent, with meaning, when (as was occasionally the case,) forgetting for the moment his native diffidence, he would for a brief period hold his listeners entranced, as discoursing on some interesting theme he almost unconsciously exerted those conversational powers with which he was so highly gifted, and which (now that having been admitted to the bar, he has become the eloquent advocate of the rights of man,) have so materially assisted him in gaining that dignified position he at present occupies. His complexion was rather pale, the result of close confinement and intense study. Alfred was not of that number who are calculated to attract the admiration of strangers; to have appreciated the better qualities of his heart you must have been well acquainted with him. There was much in his character to admire. Adelia thought so, and without venturing to ask herself the reason, felt an increasing interest in his conpany: when he was present time winged his flight with more than usual rapidity. In the happiness of the present, she hardly thought of the future, and when she did, 'twas but to depict it in the rainbow coloring of hope. But the hour was to come when she was more fully to realize her situation.

The rival of Alfred was Edgar G——, a young man of high parentage and wealthy connexions. He himself was known to be heir expectant to a large estate. He was tall and well-proportioned, and by many considered handsome, yet his eye wanted that expression of intellectual brightness which formed so marked a feature in the countenance of the young lawyer. His dress was of the most costly materials; a gold guard-chain was carelessly suspended from his neck, which, together with a diamond breast-pin and gold finger-rings, appeared to indicate that to their possessor such toys were objects of easy attainment. His manners were free, indeed overmuch so, for they seemed devoid of that delicate respect towards strangers which always characterizes true breeding.—Though not to say entirely dissipated, Edgar yet frequently attended the theatre, and spent a considerable portion of his time at balls and parties, and thither Adelia sometimes attended him. His visits to her parents' house—where he was always received with marked attention by the old gentleman—became more and more frequent. Alfred also called more often than formerly, and by Adelia, at least, was always made welcome. Her father—being as I have before intimated, a very prudent man—judged it expedient to enquire into Alfred's pecuniary circumstances, and upon due enquiry, found—oh! horrible—that he was poor;—true, he had a profession at which many have enriched themselves, but then he might not succeed—and the startling fact was undeniable, that he had but a small amount of ready cash. He of course imparted this information to his daughter, and hinted to her the necessity of discouraging Alfred's attentions. Educated as she had been, she agreed with her father as to the propriety of his suggestions. She had never before thought of Alfred's pecuniary prospects, and now that she heard he was poor, her respect for her father's wishes, and her own ideas of the absolute necessity of wealth, determined her to treat Alfred with a degree of coldness to which, to do her justice, her heart was a stranger.

The next time they met, the change in her manners was immediately noticed by him. She marked the enquiring glance of his eye—the compression of his lips—the more than usual paleness of his countenance. The evening passed heavily away, and long ere his accustomed hour, Alfred, taking up his hat, and wishing her good night, retired to his home. Adelia went to her chamber, where the conflicting emotions of her bosom found vent in a flood of tears. Reader, would'st thou analyze those tears? They were tears of love—of disappointment—of pride, and of filial duty. Why did she weep? The affections of her heart had gone forth to one who she felt was worthy of her love; the dark clouds of disappointment had overshadowed the bright future; pride forbade that she should marry the heir of poverty, and filial duty enjoined her to seek, or rather to accept, the hand of wealth. This was her first deep sorrow, and, inexperienced in the affairs of the heart, she perhaps imagined that time would soon obliterate from the tablet of memory the thoughts of the past. Vain imagining! the blighting of our fondest hopes—the rude tearing away of our heart's tendrils from the loved object around which they have been clinging—is not so easily to be forgotten. When in life's dreary pilgrimage we meet with a congenial spirit—one calculated not only to secure our friendship, but to win our love—should stern necessity, should relentless destiny, separate that loved one from our embrace, think you that the empty void is soon filled? that the impression then made is quickly effaced? No—no. We are not thus constituted.—We may mingle in the scenes of gayety by which we are surrounded;—we may turn us to drink at the fountain of what the world calls pleasure—but the past we cannot, we would not forget!

> "Time but the impression stronger makes,
> As streams their channels deeper wear."

I had almost forgotten to mention, that the morning after the visit of Alfred, to which I have alluded, Adelia received a note from him requesting an explanation, which, by her father's advice, she did not answer. He never called again. Edgar continued his attentions, and, encouraged by her parents, soon led the fair Adelia to the bridal altar. The wedding was magnificent. I need not dwell on the various items—the jewelled coronet of the bride, or the costliness of her apparel; in which, notwithstanding she looked beautiful, she would have looked full as much so clad in more simple attire, for loveliness and beauty need not the adornments of art to attract our admiration or to win our love.

A few weeks after their marriage, which interval was spent in receiving and returning visits, (fashionably styled bridal calls,) they removed to the country. Edgar became more and more dissipated, until at length, entirely neglecting his business, his creditors divided his estate among them, leaving him what Alfred was—a poor man. From the attention of her father, Adelia has never been suffered to feel the keen blasts of poverty, having always had every pecuniary want supplied. Still, she is far from happy, and if I read aright the page of her history, it is not the loss of wealth that preys upon her mind—there is a more sufficient reason why the rose has left her cheek, and care ruffled the placid beauty of her brow.

But where is Alfred—the heir of poverty—he who was deemed unworthy of her hand? Having been admitted to practice at the bar, he rapidly outstripped many more showy competitors, and he is now Judge of one of our circuit courts, with every prospect of further advancement. He is respected for his legal attainments, honored for his stern impartiality, and beloved for the urbanity of his manners, and the exercise of those benevolent feelings which, having characterized him in his early days, seem to grow with his growth and strengthen with his strength. He is, gentle reader, still a bachelor.

SHE HAD THAT CHARMING LAUGH.

She had that charming laugh which like a song,
The song of a spring bird, wakes suddenly
When we least look for it. It lingered long
Upon the ear, one of the sweet things we Treasure unconsciously. As steals along
A stream in sunshine, stole its melody,
As musical as it was light and wild,
The buoyant spirit of some fairy child;
Yet mingled with soft sighs, that might express
The depth and truth of earnest tenderness.

The Mysterious Strangers.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

"What a tempestuous evening it is," said Mr. Vernon to his wife, as he took the tongs and stirred the coals into a brighter glow.

"Tempestuous enough," she replied; and, as if to give emphasis to what they said, a violent gust of wind drove the sleet and rain against the windows, and passed with a shrill, hollow moan, through the leafless branches of half a dozen old chestnut trees that grew near the house.

Soon afterwards, the rattling of wheels was heard. The noise abruptly ceased, and it was evident that some vehicle had stopped near the door.

"I am sure," said Mrs. Vernon, "I didn't think of our having company such a stormy night as this."

The next minute, several smart, quick raps, with a whip-handle, were heard against the outer door. Mr. Vernon hastened to open it, and beheld a man in a thick, dun-colored great coat, buttoned up to his chin, and an oil-cloth hat, from which the water was running in streams.

"Can you give shelter to two ladies for the night?" said he.

"We cannot refuse," said Mr. Vernon, "on such a night as this."

"Certainly not," said Mrs. Vernon, who now approached the door.

As the man left the door-way, a weather-beaten coach, such as is usually kept for hire at livery stables, to which was attached a pair of horses, too tired to resent the buffetings of the storm, was revealed to view. In a few minutes, the two ladies were in the parlor, and Mrs. Vernon assisted them to divest themselves of their bonnets and large plaid shawls, which they wore over their travelling dresses.

"I guess you couldn't accommodate me and my horses," said the driver, addressing Mr. Vernon, who still remained at the door, in the true Yankee phraseology.

"We not only can, but I think we must," replied Mr. Vernon, "as there is no tavern within six miles of here."

During the time consumed in putting the coach and horses under shelter, Mrs. Vernon had opportunity to observe her stranger guests. One of them, a middle-aged lady, was well though plainly dressed, and there was something in her demeanor, that showed that no incident of a trivial nature could shake her fortitude, or rob her of her self-possession. Her features presented a firm and somewhat bold outline, and her rather sallow complexion was relieved by a pair of black eyes, singularly brilliant.

Her companion must have been twenty or more, for her figure, of rare symmetry and loveliness, was fully developed. Her features, though they bore a perceptible resemblance to the other lady's, were perfectly beautiful, from the large, dark eyes, to the finely-curved lips, which were the reddest and the freshest that ever parted to reveal teeth like orient pearls. Her hair, of a rich shining black, too redundant to be kept in order by the small gold comb intended to restrain it, on removing her bonnet, streamed in many a long and flowing curl far down her shoulders. Yet, though young and beautiful, and though she had evidently been nurtured in the lap of luxury, it was plain to perceive that she was oppressed by some deep and harrowing sorrow.

All that the driver of the coach knew of them, which tended to excite, rather than gratify curiosity, he communicated to Mr. Vernon, before they returned from the stable. He said that they had, the day previous, arrived at the city where he resided, in the steamboat, and had hired him to convey them to some retired country town.

When the ladies had partaken of the refreshment that had been prepared for them, the eldest, after first holding a short consultation with her companion, remarked, that it had been their intention to pursue their journey for, at least, one day more, but that, as strict seclusion was their only object, they thought it might possibly be attained in the town where they then were, as likely as in any they should be able to find.

"We should like," she added, "if you will consent, after hearing our conditions, to remain in this house, provided you can accommodate us with a decent apartment, where we can at all times remain, if it be our choice. We shall be compelled to claim the privilege of not only concealing our former place of residence, but our names, and unless it can be understood by the inhabitants that we are friends of yours, come to spend a few months with you, it will be unsafe for us, at any time, to leave the house. I am aware that startling inferences must naturally be drawn from such a statement. You will probably think that one, or both of us, have been guilty of some crime. It will, perhaps, be too much for us to expect that you will give full credit to my assertion, when I tell you that we are perfectly innocent. Circumstances of the most unfortunate and painful nature, have made it necessary to adopt the course we have."

Seeing that both Mr. and Mrs. Vernon hesitated to reply, the younger lady, with eyes streaming with tears, implored them to suffer them to remain.

"We can assure you of one thing," said the elder lady; "we have the means of compensating you most liberally for all your expense and trouble."

"It was not on account of the compensation I hesitated to answer," said Mr. Vernon; "but because I could think of no method by which our house could be made the safe asylum you deem necessary."

"You know," said his wife, "that we have for some time been expecting Mrs. Allen and her daughter to make us a visit, and that this very morning we received a line from them to let us know that something had occurred which would prevent them from coming. I have been thinking that, if you have no objection, we will do our best to accommodate these ladies, and as there must be some name to designate them by, we will, with their concurrence, call them Mrs. and Miss Allen, which will prevent the neighbors from either expressing or entertaining any impertinent curiosity."

It was finally settled, greatly to the relief of the strangers, particularly the younger, that the plan proposed by Mrs. Vernon should be carried into effect.

The stormy night was succeeded by one of the brightest of March mornings, and the robin and bluebird were abroad in the balmy air. The driver of the coach was astir at early dawn, in order to see to his horses; and, having done justice to a good and substantial breakfast, was on the road a little after sunrise. By the time the two strangers had risen, a neat and convenient apartment, on the second floor, comfortably furnished and rendered cheerful by the bright sunshine and a good fire, was ready for their reception.

Time passed on, but nothing transpired to clear away the cloud of mystery which hung over them. The elder lady at all times maintained the same composure and equability of manner that had at first characterized her; while the younger, still melancholy and unhappy, was at times afflicted with such extreme nervous agitation, that her health was seriously injured. There were intervals, however, when the buoyant spirits of youth would rise above the secret cause of misery which seemed crushing her to the earth, and then her voice might often be heard, clear and melodious as the song of the birds that revelled amid the old chestnuts, now in full foliage. As no one seemed to suspect that they were not really Mrs. Allen and her daughter, all passed on quietly enough, except that Mrs. Vernon was occasionally tormented by the close and prying questions of an inveterate gossip, who had received the appropriate cognomen of "Pudding-stick," being always ready to stir up the little community whenever it seemed likely to settle down into a state of too much apathy and repose.

Though three months had elapsed since their arrival, they expressed no intention of departing. As the only son of their host and hostess had now completed the study of the law in the office of an eminent barrister in a distant city, he was daily expected home. Mr. and Mrs. Vernon had hoped that their boarders would find themselves in a situation to change their residence previous to his arrival, as they dreaded to have him exposed to the influence of a person possessing such fascinating beauty and manners as the younger, who, they could not help fearing, if she had not actually been guilty of crime, had widely deviated from the path of moral rectitude.—At length, Mrs. Vernon took courage to hint to them, that as their son was expected home, it would be difficult to accommodate them longer, as he would need the apartments now occupied by them. The bare suggestion, however, threw the young lady into a state of such agitation, that Mrs. Vernon at once withdrew her objections to their remaining, and said she would do her best to prepare some other apartment for their son. The next point to be settled, was one between Mr. and Mrs. Vernon. They were at a loss to determine whether it would be best to let him entertain the impression that prevailed in the neighborhood, relative to the ladies, or to inform him of all they themselves knew. They decided in favor of the latter course, as the doubts which it would involve as respected her character, might act as a check upon the dangerous effect to be apprehended from the superior attractions which distinguished the younger.

It was about the middle of June, near the close of a day of uncommon loveliness, that Lionel Vernon drove up to the door in a private chaise, as no public vehicle came nearer than the inn, which was six miles distant. There were few young men who possessed a handsomer face or a form of greater elegance, and his parents welcomed him with as much pride as joy. The younger lady, who beheld him when he arrived from her window, determined within herself to remain in the seclusion of her own chamber while he continued at home, as she had sufficient discernment to be aware, that it would be the course most agreeable to his parents. As soon as the affairs which related to their son, personally, had been satisfactorily discussed, they adverted to the mysterious strangers; their parental fears unintentionally prompting them to dwell pretty strongly upon the probability that guilt of some nature had urged them to the measures they had adopted, in the hope that they should be enabled to escape detection. They made allusion to the younger lady's extreme beauty, and as it is rather natural to associate a repulsive exterior with a character so deeply stained as from the incidents detailed, he concluded hers must be; while the pleasure of finding himself at home, after a long absence, was still fresh, he felt little or no curiosity to see her.—But when the gloss and novelty of a country life began to wear off, he began to feel a keen desire to behold one who, as he had found on several occasions when he passed her chamber-door, could sing finely and was a most admirable reader. His curiosity increased the more from there being no prospect of its being gratified. At last, his patience became entirely exhausted, and he asked his mother if the strangers never attended church.

"They have formerly," she replied, "when the weather would permit."

"And what has induced them to discontinue going?"

Mrs. Vernon hesitated to answer.

"I suspect I know," he resumed. "It is because they think they shall see me. It is not impossible but that they formerly resided in the same city where I studied my profession, and they may be afraid that I shall recognize them. I cannot think of their being kept such close prisoners on my account, as their health must necessarily suffer, and I shall certainly take measures to leave home much sooner than I intended, unless they can be induced to occasionally take exercise in the open air." It is due to him to mention that the benevolent sentiments, which he expressed, were not assumed, but were really mingled with his intense curiosity though unaided by this stimulus, it might not have occurred to him, how much they were undoubtedly suffering from want of air and exercise.

Mrs. Vernon, who was loth to lose the company of her son sooner than she had, at first, anticipated, promised to go to them immediately, and advised them to walk out that very evening.

"I think we shall not reject your advice," said the elder stranger, "for I find by my young friend's pale looks, that her health begins already to suffer."

"She does look pale," said Mrs. Vernon, "and I wonder I have not minded it before. Come, ladies, put on your bonnets, and we will all three walk out together."

They assented: the younger lady first doubling her thick green veil, which she carefully drew over her face. Lionel Vernon happened to be sitting at an open window as they passed, but, owing to the veil, was, of course, unable to obtain a sight of her features. He could see, however, that her form was one of the finest he had ever beheld. There was, moreover, a stray curl which, in her haste, had escaped being put up under her bonnet, so very beautiful, that he would certainly, as a fresh breath of air waved it towards him, have clipped it off without the least remorse, had he possessed an invisible pair of scissors.

From this time the two ladies walked out daily, generally in the fields, and Mrs. Vernon being ready to join them. Lionel, who had intended at some time to meet them by mere accident, was foiled in his intentions. They likewise attended church, but the younger lady's thick veil, which was never drawn aside, screened her features so thoroughly that Lionel could scarcely have told whether she was black or white.

One day, while taking their usual walk, Mrs. Vernon, in attempting to reach some berries that grew on the opposite side of a walk, threw off a large rock, which fell on her foot and injured it so severely, she found that it would be impossible for her to reach home without assistance. Her two companions attempted to aid her, but they soon found, as much of the way was rough and broken, that their strength was altogether unequal to the task they had undertaken. The younger female, therefore, hastened to the house to procure the assistance of Mr. Vernon, whom, when they had commenced their walk, she had noticed was in the garden. He had left the garden, and, entering the house, thinking she might find him there, she beheld not him she sought, but Lionel. In her agitation and hurry, she had thrown back her veil, and exercise and excitement had imparted to her features a glow and radiance that rendered her beauty almost dazzling. Lionel threw down the book he held in his hand, and, hardly knowing what he did, sprang forward to meet her. She informed him of what had happened, and requested his assistance. Fortunately, they encountered Mr. Vernon on their way, and were thus enabled to accomplish their object without difficulty.

In Mrs. Vernon's present helpless situation, there were many little things which the ladies would do to promote her comfort, which frequently drew them from the seclusion of their apartment. They did every thing, too, with such a peculiar grace, and so much cordiality, particularly the younger one, that an observer might have imagined they were receiving rather than conferring benefits. By this new turn affairs had taken, they and Lionel were often thrown together, and he soon found that the younger was rapidly gaining a power over his mind and affections altogether irresistible. A close observer might have inferred, by some almost imperceptible indications, that she did not regard him with indifference, but she evidently exerted herself to the utmost to keep a strong and constant guard over all her actions while in his presence. She so sedulously avoided him, unless some other person was present, that it was impossible for him not to be aware of it, and he soon found that it must be either by chance or stratagem, if he obtained an interview with her. Fortune, at last, favored him with the opportunity he desired. Imagining him to be absent, for he had mentioned in the morning that he should be obliged to leave home on business, she ventured to walk out alone, her companion not being disposed to accompany her. Lionel, who had gone no further than his own chamber, saw her, as with hasty steps she bent her course towards a shady and secluded spot, as entirely shut out from the observation of any person in or near the house, as if it had been in the heart of a wilderness. He doubted the delicacy or the generosity of intruding himself into her presence, but the thought that the opportunity, which he had so long and so ardently coveted, might not again occur, overruled his scruples, and he determined to follow her. When he arrived at the spot she had sought, he beheld her seated on the gnarled roots of an old oak, with her face buried in her hands, and in an attitude of deep and overwhelming sorrow. Exceedingly disconcerted, he was going to withdraw, but she had heard his approach, and looked up. In a moment she was on her feet, and attempted to rush by him, for he stood at the only place of egress from the sheltered retreat. Gently, but firmly, he opposed her purpose.

"'Daughter of Nuath,'" said he, quoting the words of Ossian, and assuming a playfulness which he by no means felt—"'Daughter of Nuath, why dost thou fly from Gaul? Do my eyes send forth the flame of death? Or darkens hatred in my soul? Thou art to me the beam of the east, rising in a land unknown. But thou coverest thy face with sadness, daughter of high Dunlathom?'"

"Suffer me to go," said she—"I cannot, must not remain."

"First listen to me only two minutes," he replied, "and you shall be obeyed—for I have neither the fortitude nor patience to longer endure the suspense which has tortured me for a week past."

Having thus broken through the cold reserve which till now had marked his demeanor towards her, in words of impassioned eloquence, he declared his love and begged a return.

"I would have willingly spared both of us the pain of this," said she, "for a barrier, strong as death, must ever separate us."

"Not so," he replied, "for my love is stronger than death. Only tell me what this barrier is, and I am certain that I can cause it to yield."

"You would undertake an impossibility," she replied; "and now, I implore you by all you hold dear, not to force me to listen longer to what it is a crime for me to hear."

"Are you not generous enough then to explain this mystery before we part? Must I still longer be tortured with suspense?"

"Spare me now," said she: "to-morrow, I will tell you all."

"Where shall we meet?"

"At the large rose-bush, where I gather your mother's favorite roses. I shall be there early in the morning. Leave me now. I must have a few minutes to compose my spirits, before I appear in the presence of others."

They met at the appointed place, but just as she was going to commence her promised explanation, she suddenly threw up her arms with a convulsive motion, and with unutterable agony depicted in her countenance, exclaimed—"I am lost!"

Lionel perceived her eyes were rivetted upon some object with a look of the greatest terror, and looking round, he beheld a man in the gravel walk, coming towards them. He was of low stature, and as he drew nearer, he could see that his complexion was swarthy, his features coarse and repulsive, and that his small, restless eyes seemed almost to emit sparks of fire from beneath their coarse, shaggy eye-brows. While the predominating expression of his countenance was a low cunning, there was a boldness and audacity in his manners, evidently assumed for the occasion.

"Well, madam," said he, "so I have found you at last, and shall take the liberty of escorting you home."

As he spoke, he made an effort to loosen the hold with which she clung to Lionel's arm with almost preternatural strength. Lionel, as he very unceremoniously pushed him aside, enquired by what right he presumed to control the lady then under his protection.

"By the rights of a husband," he replied.

"Is it possible?" said Lionel, appealing to the beautiful girl at his side, ready to sink to the earth with excessive agitation.

"It is too true," she replied. "Leave me to my fate—I must obey his commands."

"What say you to that, most gallant sir?" said the man, with a malicious laugh.

"That unfair means must have been resorted to, or she never would have accepted a person like you for a husband."

"I dare say she has been fabricating some plausible story, by which she hoped to deceive you."

"She has told me nothing," replied Lionel; "yet I am none the less certain of the truth of what I have said, and until you can prove to the contrary, she does not leave this place."

"That is more easily said than done," said the man: "for, though you are disposed to dispute my authority, you may find it less easy to defy that of a civil magistrate, who is near at hand, ready to obey my summons."

"Suffer me to go, Mr. Vernon, I beg," szid she in a voice scarcely audible. "By detaining me you only add to my distress."

"I will never yield you to his custody," he replied, "till I am compelled to."

The man commenced an angry remonstrance, which was broken short by the appearance of the elder lady, who now entered upon the scene. Her habitual composure had, for once, forsaken her, but though she trembled with agitation, there was a look of determination in her countenance, which partook of an air of defiance, as she turned her black, piercing eyes upon the person whose presence had occasioned her young friend such distress and terror.

"Good morning, Mrs. Dormer," said he, addressing her. "As I thought that you and your neice had ruralized a pretty reasonable length of time, I have come for the purpose of escorting you home."

"I regret exceedingly, Mr. Norcross," she replied, "that you should have given yourself so much unnecessary trouble, as I have not the most distant idea of accepting you as an escort for myself—neither shall I permit my niece."

"Quite cool, upon my honor," replied Norcross, "but as I am of the humble opinion that the authority of a husband supersedes even that of an aunt, I shall compel my wife to go—you may do as you please."

"Miscreant!" said she, "Agnes Dormer is not your wife."

"She does not pretend to deny it herself," he replied.

"Because she has not yet been undeceived. I have just received a letter from a certain Mr. Whiffleton, who seems to have been favored with a liberal share of your confidence, which unfolds the whole of your base and iniquitous plot."

"And which is of equal value to a clean piece of paper," replied Norcross; "for he has long since, by perjury, fully and distinctly proved against him, been disqualified from taking his oath, which will, of course, prevent the letter he has favored you with, from having any weight in a court of justice."

"But what say you to a note bearing the signature of Abel Norcross, which he on a certain occasion wrote to this same Mr. Whiffleton?"

"No such note can be produced, for no such one is in existence."

"It is true," replied Mrs. Dormer, "that you commanded him to destroy it, and that he seemingly complied, but it was another letter, adroitly exchanged for the one in question, which he threw behind the grate. He was too cunning to destroy that. He imagined that, at some future time, it might prove the means of putting money in his purse, and the result shows that his imagination was far from being a vain one."

Mr. Vernon, whose curiosity had been excited by seeing Norcross in the garden, now joined the group.

"I at length, have the happiness," said Mrs. Dormer, addressing him, "to inform you that the two strangers, you and Mrs. Vernon have so long and kindly entertained, asking no questions, have no longer anything to conceal. I have this morning obtained possession of facts which have laid bare one of the most villainous transactions ever undertaken by a being wearing the form of humanity. The man you see before you, by some means, obtained the unlimited confidence of the late Mr. Dormer, who was my brother, and the father of Agnes, so that in prospect of his decease, he appointed him his daughter's guardian, as well as his son's, who was two years older. Shortly afterwards, Norcross lost his wife, when, after a great deal of opposition on his part, Agnes came to reside with me. One morning she received a message from him, requesting that she would come to his house without delay, as he was unable, on account of indisposition, to leave home, and had something of great importance to communicate to her. She obeyed with reluctance, as he had of late persecuted her with the most importunate solicitations to marry him.

" 'Have you heard what befel me last night?" said he, the moment she entered the room where he was, 'as I was passing through the piece of woods that lies between here and H——?'

" 'I have not,' she replied.

" 'That is strange. I expected it was all over the city by this time,' said he. 'I was waylaid by a couple of villians, who robbed me of all the money I had about me, and intended to murder me; but after a desperate struggle, during which I received a pistol shot through my hand, I made my escape.'

"As he spoke, he removed a bandage, and exhibited to her a small perforation in the fleshy part of his hand.

" 'One of the villains,' said he, resuming his account, 'I knew.'

" 'Knew?' repeated Agnes.

" 'Yes, and you know him, too.'

" 'Who can it possibly be?' she enquired.

" 'His name is Philip Dormer.'

" 'O no,' said Agnes, turning pale, 'it could not have been my brother.'

" 'It was your brother,' he replied; 'his voice is as familiar to me as my own. Besides, as there was a bright moon, I obtained a distinct view of his features.'

" 'What will be the penalty of such a crime?' said Agnes, gasping for breath.

" 'Death!'

"He paused a moment to observe the agony depicted in her countenance, and then added, 'but as the name of the culprit is as yet a secret between ourselves, I can, and will save him on one condition.'

"Agnes implored him to name it.

" 'It is what I have often already solicited. Marry me, and your brother is safe.'

" 'Must his life be purchased at so dreadful a price?' said she. 'Will not my property—the whole of it—answer instead?'

" 'Compliance with the condition I have named, is the only thing that will save him. I place his life in your hands. Marry me, and, as I have already said, he is safe—refuse, and before the expiration of another hour, I will deliver him up to justice.'

" 'Say no more,' she said, 'his life must be saved.'

"The moment the words had escaped her lips, he entered an adjoining apartment, and gave directions to some person in a low voice.

" 'A clergyman,' said he, when he re-entered the room, 'will be here in a few moments to perform the ceremony.'

"Agnes uttered not a single word, but in a state of mind more painful than if death itself had been before her, awaited the fulfilment of her doom. In the course of fifteen minutes, the clergyman arrived. The housekeeper was called in as a witness, and the ceremony was commenced. As he was pronouncing the concluding words, I entered the apartment. Alarmed at her protracted absence, I went in pursuit of her. Confounded at the scene passing before me, for a few minutes I had no power to utter a word. The clergyman avoided my eye, and appeared to be in a great hurry to depart. When he took leave, Norcross accompanied him to the outer door, where they stopped for some conversation. In the mean time, Agnes in a hurried manner informed me of all that had taken place. I knew at once that the story implicating her brother was a base fabrication, devised by Norcross to entrap her into marrying him; for in less than half an hour after he had left me, letters were brought from him; one for me, the other for her, by which I found that nearly a week previous he had embarked for Europe in company with a gentleman of his acquaintance. The moment she found how basely she had been deceived, she determined on effecting her escape. 'We will at least make the attempt,' said I—and begging her to be calm, I opened a door that led to the back part of the house. I told her to follow me. We passed rapidly through several apartments, without encountering a single person, and soon found ourselves in the open air. I conducted her to the house of a friend, then proceeded immediately home, and, as I had anticipated, found Norcross already there. He sternly questioned me as to the place I had secreted her, and finally had recourse to threats. He found, however, that I was not easily to be intimidated. I made an effort to persuade her to remain where she was, but I soon found that the constant apprehension she suffered lest Norcross should discover her, was seriously affecting her health, which caused us to adopt the plan of seeking some distant and retired place in the country, where we hoped to elude his search. I thought at the time I so providentially entered upon the scene, that the countenance of the person who performed the marriage ceremony was familiar to me, but it was impossible for me to remember when or where I had seen him. It was not till I had arrived here, and felt somewhat more at ease, that I so far collected my thoughts, as to feel sure that it was either a person of infamous character, whose name was Whiffleton, or some one who closely resembled him. I immediately addressed a letter to Whiffleton, under cover of one to my lawyer, in which I boldly accused him of performing a mock ceremony of marriage between Norcross and my niece. An answer from him, addressed, according to my instructions, to Mrs. Allen, was soon received, in which he plead guilty to my accusations, and offered, for a certain sum, which he named, to send me the letter of Norcross which I have already alluded to. He at the same time intimated that if I chose to withhold the bribe, he should destroy the letter. I of course did not hesitate to comply with his requisition, but his character on the score of veracity being such that I could place little confidence in him, I forbore to mention a word of what was going on to Agnes, lest it should prove that for the sake of extorting money he had been misleading me. By the letter of Norcross, in which the whole plan is minutely detailed, it seemed that he was afraid to engage a real clergyman to perform the ceremony, lest the distress of Agnes, and the undisguised abhorrence with which she regarded him, should lead to enquiries that would frustrate the whole iniquitous scheme."

The foregoing narrative, though rather long, had proved highly interesting and satisfactory to her auditors, with the exception of Norcross, who, at a moment when he imagined himself unobserved, left the garden, with quite a crest-fallen air. It was not until fairly out of their hearing, that he ventured to pour forth a few deep imprecations upon the whole human family, and upon maiden aunts in particular.

The little party, that had all this time been gathered round the great rose-bush, as if it were a thing of human feelings and sympathies, now proposed to return to the house, that Mrs. Vernon might no longer remain in ignorance of what had made them all so happy.

If space only permitted, it would be a great pleasure to describe the rich and becoming bridal dress which Mrs. Dormer soon afterwards ordered for Agnes, as well as the excellent pies and puddings, which in retired country places, no less than the loaf of plum-cake, are considered requisite for the wedding feast. It is certain, however, that all present were satisfied with their entertainment, and unanimously agreed that Lionel and Agnes were by far the handsomest couple that ever came to the honor of being married by their minister, though he had been their pastor more than five and twenty years. All, too, were in raptures with their neat cottage, which happened to be for sale at precisely the right time. It was, likewise, situated precisely in the right spot, as Mrs. Vernon could, at any time, by only going to the window, see it gleaming through the trees and shrubbery by which it was surrounded. This was a great comfort to her when the weather was stormy and unpleasant, or when she was too busy at home to take her sewing or knitting, and run in for a few minutes to chat with Mrs. Dormer and her daughter-in-law. And on long winter evenings, though ever so cold and tempestuous, Mr. and Mrs. Vernon could see a light beaming from the cottage, and the thought that it cheered the fireside of a son and daughter they loved, made their own seem more pleasant. All this might have been considered trifling by some, but nothing is trifling that feeds and cherishes those affections which might otherwise be wasted in earnest but vain yearnings, and still vainer regrets.

SWEET POEMS.

[From Godey's Lady's Book for February.]

THE EVENING SKIES.

BY MRS. AMELIA B. WELBY.

Soft skies! amid your halls to-night
How brightly beams each starry sphere!
Beneath your softly mellowed light
The loveliest scenes grow lovelier!
How high, how great, the glorious Power,
That bade these silvery dew-drops fall;
That touched with bloom the folded flower,
And bent the blue sky over all!

I love to glide in these still hours
With heart and thought and fancy
When bought but stars, and waves, and flowers,
May give me their sweet company!
When far below the waves outspread
Glide softly on with liquid hue;
When winds are low—and skies o'erhead
Are beaming beautifully blue.

Oh, what a heavenly hour is this!
The green earth seems an Eden-home,—
And yet I pine, amid my bliss,
For purer blisses yet to come!
How can my spirit gaze aloft
Upon your deep delicious blue,
And float to those far realms so oft,
And never sigh to flutter through!

And yet this spot, so still, so lone,
Seems formed to suit my mournful mood—
The far blue heavens seem all my own,
And all this lovely solitude!
A voice seems whispering on the hill
Soft as my own—and on the sea
A living spirit seems to thrill
And throb with mine deliciously!

Yet, though my thoughts from care seem freed,
And a soft joy pervades my breast,
That makes me almost feel indeed
That hearts on earth are sometimes blest!
There is a spell in those hushed skies—
A something felt in this lone spot,
That makes my very soul arise
With longings for—it knows not what!

Beneath such skies I sometimes doubt
My heart can e'er have dreamed of sin—
The world seems all so calm without,
And all my thoughts so pure within!
Such dreams play o'er my folded lid!
Such heavenly visions greet my view!
I almost seem to glide amid
The angel-bands, an angel too!

LIZZY.
A THRILLING STORY.

BY L. MARIA CHILD.

[The following story is founded upon facts which occurred during the latter part of the eighteenth century. The leading incidents are still in the memory of many of the inhabitants of Chester county, Pennsylvania].

Elizabeth Wilson was of humble, though respectable parentage. From infancy she was remarked for beauty, and a delicate nervous organization. Her brother William, two years older, was likewise a handsome child, with a more sturdy and vigorous frame. He had a gentle, loving heart, which expended its affections most lavishly on his mother and little sister. In their early years Lizzy was his constant shadow. If he went to the barn to hunt eggs, the little one was sure to run prattling along with him, hand in hand. If he pelted walnuts from the tree, she was sure to be there with her little basket, to pick them up. They sat on the same blue bench to eat their bread and milk; and with the first jack-knife he ever owned, the affectionate boy carved on it the letters W. and E., for William and Elizabeth. The sister lavishly returned his love. If a pie was baked for her, she would never break it till Willie came to share; and she would never go to sleep unless her arms were about his neck.

Their mother, a woman of tender heart and yielding temper, took great delight in her handsome children. Often, when she went out to gather chips or brush, she stopped to look in upon them, as they sat on the blue bench, feeding each other from their little porringers of bread and milk. The cross-lights from a side-window threw on them a reflection of lilac bushes, so that they seemed seated in a flowering grove. It was the only picture the poor woman had; but none of the old masters could have equalled its beauty.

The earliest and strongest development of Lizzy's character was love. She was always caressing her kitten, or twining her arms about Willie's neck, or leaning on her mother's lap, begging for a kiss. A dozen times a day she would look earnestly into her mother's eyes, and inquire, most beseechingly, "Does you love your little Lizzy?" And if the fond answer did not come as promptly as usual, her beautiful eyes, always plaintive in their expression, would begin to swim with tears. This "strong necessity of loving," which so pervades the nature of woman, the fair child inherited from her gentle mother; and from her, too, inherited a deficiency of firmness, of which such natures have double need. To be every thing, and do every thing, for those she loved, was the paramount law of her existence.

Such a being was of course born for sorrow. Even in infancy, the discerning eye might already see its prophetic shadow resting on her expressive countenance. The first great affliction of her life was the death of her mother, when she was ten years old.—Her delicate nerves were shattered by the blow, and were never after fully restored to health. The dead body of her beloved mother, with large coins on the eye-lids, was so awfully impressed on her imagination, that the image followed her every where, even into her dreams. As she slept, tears often dropped from her tremulous eye-lashes, and night-mare visions made her start and scream. There was no gentle voice near to soothe her perturbed spirit; none to throw an angel's shining robe over the hideous spectre that lay so cold and stiff in the halls of memory.

Her father fed and clothed his children, and caused them to be taught to read and write. It did not occur to him that anything more was included in parental duty. Of clothing for the mind, or food for the heart, he knew nothing; for his own had never been clothed and fed. He came home weary from daily toil, ate his supper, dozed in his chair awhile, and then sent the children to bed. A few times, after the death of his wife, he kissed his daughter; but she never ventured to look into his eyes and ask—"Does you love your little Lizzy?" Willie was her only consolation; and all he could do was to weep passionately with her, at everything which reminded them of their mother.

Nature, as usual, reflected back the image of the soul that gazed upon her. To Lizzy's excited mind, everything appeared mysterious and awful, and all sounds seemed to wail and sigh. The rustling of the trees in the evening wind went through her, like the voice of a spirit, and when the nights were bright, she would hide her head in her brother's bosom and whisper—

"Willie, dear, I wish the moon would not keep looking at me. She seems to say something to me; and it makes me afraid."

All susceptible souls have felt thus, particularly when under the influence of grief:

"The snow of deepest silence
O'er everything doth fall,
So beautiful and quiet,
And yet so like a pall—
As if all life were ended,
And rest were come to all."

Such a state of feeling, long indulged, could not be otherwise than injurious to a bodily frame originally delicate. The sensitive child soon became subject to fits, the severity of which at times threatened her life. On coming out of these spasms, with piteous tones, and bewildered looks, she would ask—"Where is my mother?"

At the end of a year an important change came over the lonely household. A strong, active step-mother was introduced. Her loud voice and energetic tread, so different from her own quiet and timid mother's, frightened poor Lizzy. Her heart more than ever turned back upon itself, and listened to the echoes of its own yearnings. Willie, being old enough to work on the farm, was now absent most of the day; and the fair girl, so richly endowed by nature with all deep feelings and beautiful capacities, so lavish of her affections, so accustomed to free outpourings of love, became reserved, and apparently cold and stupid. When the step-mother gave birth to an infant, the fountains of feeling were again unsealed. It was her delight to watch the babe, and minister to its wants. But this development of the affections was likewise destined to be nipped in the bud. The step-mother, though by no means hard-hearted, was economical and worldy-wise. She deemed it most profitable to employ a healthy, stout niece of her own, somewhat older than Elizabeth, and to have her step-daughter bound out in some family where she could do light labor. It was also determined that William should go to service; and his place of destination was fifty miles from that of his sister.

The news of this arrangement was very bitter to the children. Both answered their father, very meekly, that they were willing to go; but their voices were deep, sad, and almost inaudible. Without saying another word, the boy put on his hat, and the girl her sun-bonnet, and taking each other by the hand, they went forth, and roamed silently to their mother's grave. There they stood for a long time, still, still—and their tears dropped fast on the green sod. At last Elizabeth sobbed out—

"Oh, if dear mother was alive, Willie, we should not have to go away from home."

But Willie could only answer by a fresh outburst of grief. A little clump of wild flowers nodded over the edge of the mound. The affectionate boy cut two of them, and said—

"Let us keep these, Lizzy, to remember mother by."

The flowers were carefully pressed between the leaves of Lizzy's Testament, and when the sorrowful day of parting came, one was nicely folded in a paper for Willie.

"Now, dear sis, give me that nice little curl," said he, putting his finger on a soft, golden-brown ringlet that nestled close to her ear, and lay caressingly on her downy cheek. She glanced in the fragment of a glass that served them for a mirror, and with eyes brimful of tears, she answered—

"Oh! Willie, I cannot give you that. Don't you remember how dear mother used to wet my head all over with cold water, to make my hair curl? She used to laugh when I shook my head, and made the curls go all over my forehead; and she would kiss that little curl in particular. She said it was such a darling little curl."

Thus childishly did the innocent ones speak together. The brother twisted the favorite curl round his finger, and kissed it too; and a bright tear fell on it, and glittered in the sunshine.

William left home a few days earlier than his sister, and bitterly did the lonely one sob herself to sleep that night. She shuddered in the dark, and when the moon looked in at the window, its glance seemed more mournful than ever. The next morning, she fell from the breakfast table in a fit more severe than usual. But as she soon recovered, and as these spasms now occurred only at distant intervals, her step-mother thought she had better be in readiness to depart at the appointed time.

The wagon was brought to the door, and the father said to her—

"Lizzy, put on your bonnet, and bring your bundle. It is time to go."

Oh, how the poor child lingered in her little bedroom, where she and Willie slept in their infant days, and where the mother used to hear them say their prayers, and kiss them both, as they lay folded in each other's arms. To the strong step-mother she easily said good bye; but she paused long over the cradle of the babe, and kissed each of his little fingers, and fondly turned a little wave of sunny hair on his pure white forehead. Her heart swelled, and she had to swallow hard to keep down the sobs; for it was her cradle, and she was thinking how her mother used to sing her to sleep. Her father spoke to her in a tone of unusual tenderness, as if he too remembered her infancy, and the gentle one who used to rock her in that cradle.

"Come, Lizzy," said he, "it is time to go. You shall come back and see the baby before long."

With blinded eyes she stumbled into the wagon, and turned and looked back as long as she could see the old elm-tree by her bed-room window, where all the summers of her young life she had watched the swallows come and go.

It is a dreary fate for a loving and sensitive child to be bound out at service among strangers, even if they are kind-hearted. The good woman of the house received Lucy in a very friendly manner, and told her to make herself at home. But the word only sent a mournful echo through her heart. For a few days she went about in a state of abstraction that seemed like absolute stupidity. Her step-mother had prepared them for this, by telling them there was something strange about Lizzy, and that many people thought her fits had affected her mind. Being of coarser and stronger natures, they could none of them imagine that the slow stagnation of the heart might easily dim the light of intellect in a creature so keenly susceptible. But, by degrees, the duties required of her roused her faculties into greater activity; and when night came, she was fortunately too weary to lie awake and weep. Sometimes she dreamed of Willie, and her dreams of him were always bright and pleasant; but her mother sometimes fondled her with looks of love, and somtimes came as the pale, cold spectre. Thus the months passed slowly away. Her father came to see her at distant intervals, and once in a great while a letter came from Willie, in a large, stiff hand. Unaccustomed to writing, he could not through that medium tell much that was passing through his heart. That he wanted badly to see his sister, and often kissed the flower they plucked from the dear mother's grave, was the substance of all his epistles.

In the mean time, Lizzy was passing into womanhood. Childhood and youth kissed each other, with new and glowing beauty. Her delicate cheeks mantled with a richer color, and her deep blue eyes, shaded with long fringes of the darkest brown, looked out upon life with a more earnest and expressive longing. Plain and scanty garments could not conceal the graceful outline of her flexile figure, and her motions were like those of some pretty timid animal, that has always stepped to sylvan sounds. She was not aware of her uncommon loveliness, though she found it pleasant to look in the glass, and had sometimes heard strangers say to each other, "See that pretty girl!"

There were no young men in the immediate neighborhood, and she had not been invited to any of the rustic dances or quilting frolics. One bashful lad in the vicinity always contrived to drive his cows past the house where she lived, and eagerly kept watch for a glimpse of her, as she went to the barn with her milking pails. But, if she happened to pass near enough to nod and smile, his cheeks grew red, and his voice forsook him; and she could not know or guess that he would lie awake long that night, and dream of her smile, and resolve that some day or other he would have courage to tell her how handsome she was, and how the sight of her made his heart throb. She did not yet know that she could love anybody better than she had loved Willie. She had seen her darling brother but twice, during their three years of separation; but his image was ever fresh and bright in her memory. When he came to see her, she felt completely happy. While he gazed on her with delighted eyes, her affectionate nature was satisfied with love; for it had not yet been revealed to her in the melting glance of passion. Yet the insidious and unquiet power already began to foreshadow itself in vague restlessness and romantic musings. For she was at an age,

"To feel a want, yet scarce know what it is;
To seek one nature that is always new,
Whose glance is warmer than another's kiss;
Such longing instinct fills the mighty scope
Of the young heart with one mysterious hope."

At last, an important event occurred in Lizzy's monotonous existence. A young girl in the village was to be married, and she was invited to the quilting party. It was the first invitation of the kind she had ever received, and of course it occupied her thoughts day and night. Could she have foreseen how this simple occurrence would affect her whole future destiny, she would have pondered over it still more deeply. The bridegroom brought a friend with him to the party, a handsome, dark-eyed young man, clerk of a store in a neighboring town. Aware of his personal attractions, he dressed himself with peculiar care. Elizabeth had never seen anything so elegant; and the moment his eye glanced upon her, he decided that he had never seen anything half so beautiful. He devoted himself to her in a manner sufficiently marked to excite envy; and some of the rich farmers' daughters made critical remarks about her dress, which they concluded was passably genteel for a girl that lived out at service. However, Lizzy was queen of the evening, by virtue of nature's own impress of royalty. When the quilt was finished, romping games were introduced, according to the fashion of the times; and the young men took care that the forfeits paid by the pretty girls should generally involve kissing some of their own number. Among the forfeits required of the dark-eyed stranger, he was ordered to beg on his knees for the identical little curl that Willie had asked of his sister.—In the midst of her mirthfulness, this brought a shadow over her countenance, and she could not answer playfully. However, this emotion passed away with the moment, and she became the gayest of the gay. Never before had she been half so handsome, for never before had she been half so happy. The joyful consciousness of pleasing everybody, and the attractive young stranger in particular, made her eyes sparkle, and her whole countenance absolutely radiant with beauty. When the party were about to separate, the young man was very assiduous about placing her shawl, and begged permission to accompany her home. But little was said during this walk; yet enough to afford entrance into both hearts for that insidious and unquiet passion which tangles the web of human life more than all the other sentiments and instincts of our mysterious being. At parting, he took her hand, to say good night, but he continued to hold it, and leaning against the gate, they both stood, for a few moments, gazing at the clear silvery orb of night. Ah, how different the moon seemed to Lizzy now! Earth's spectral robe had changed to a veil of glory. Her bonnet had fallen back, and the evening breeze played gently with her ringlets. In soft, insinuating tones, the young man said—

"Will you not give me that little curl I asked for?"

She blushed deeply, and answered, in her child-like way—"I cannot give you that, because my mother used to kiss it so often."

"No wonder she kissed it," he replied; "it looks so roguish lying there on the pretty cheek."

And before she was aware of it, he had kissed it too. Trembling and confused, she turned to open the gate, but he held it fast until she had promised that the next time he came she would give him one of her curls.

Poor Lizzy went to bed that night with an intoxicated heart. When she twisted her hair at the glass, next morning, she smiled and blushed, as she twined the favorite ringlet more carefully than ever. She was so childishly happy with her pretty little curl! The next Sunday evening, as she sat at the window, she heard the sound of a flute. He had promised to bring his flute; and he had not forgotten her. She listened—it came nearer and nearer through the wood. Her heart beat audibly, for it was indeed the handsome, dark-eyed stranger.

All summer long, he came every Sunday afternoon; and with him came moonlight walks, and flute-warblings, and tender whisperings, and glances, such as steal away a woman's heart. This was the fairy-land of her young life. She had somebody now into whose eyes she could gaze, with all the deep tenderness of her soul, and ask—"Do you love your own Lizzy?"

The young man did love, but not as she loved him; for her's was a richer nature, and gave more than he could return. He accompanied her to her father's, and they were generally understood to be betrothed. He had not seen brother William, but he was told a thousand affectionate anecdotes of his kind, good heart. When they returned from the visit to the homestead, they brought with them the little blue bench marked W. E. Lizzy was proud of her genteel lover; and the only drop which it now seemed possible to add to her cup of happiness was to introduce him to William. But her brother was far off, and when the autumn came, her betrothed announced the necessity of going to a distant city, to establish himself in business. It was a bitter, bitter parting to both. The warmest letters were but a cold substitute for those happy hours of mutual confidence; and after awhile, his letters became more brief and cool. The fact was, the young man was too vain to feel deeply; and among his new acquaintance in the city was a young, good-looking widow, with a small fortune, who early evinced a preference for him. To be obviously, and at the same time modestly preferred, by a woman of any agreeable qualities, is what few men, even of the strongest character, can withstand. It is the knowledge of this fact, and experience with regard to the most delicate and acceptable modes of expressing preference, which, as Samuel Weller expresses it, makes "a widow equal to twenty-five other women." Lizzy's lover was not a strong character, and he was vain and selfish. It is no wonder, therefore, that his letters to the pretty girl, who lived out at service, should become more cool and infrequent. She was very slow to believe it thus; and when, at last, news reached her that he was positively engaged to be married to another, she refused to listen to it. But he came not to vindicate himself, and he ceased to answer her letters. The poor deluded girl awoke to a full consciousness of her misery, and suffered such intensity of misery as only keenly sensitive natures can suffer. William had promised to come and see her the latter part of the winter, and her heart had been filled with pleasant and triumphant anticipations of introducing to him her handsome lover. But now the pride of her heart was humbled, and its joy turned into mourning. She was cast off, forsaken; and, alas, that was not the worst. As she sobbed on the neck of her faithful brother, she felt, for the first time, that there was something she could not tell him. The keenest of her wretched feelings she dared not avow. He pitied and consoled her, as well as he could; but to her, it seemed as if there was no consolation but in death. Most earnestly did he wish that he had a home to shelter her, where he could fold her round with the soft wings of brotherly love. But they were both poor, and poverty fetters the impulses of the heart. And, so they must part again, he guessing but half of her great sorrow. If the farewell was sad to him, what must it have been to her, who now felt so utterly alone in the wide world? Her health sank under the conflict, and the fits returned upon her with increased violence. In her state of gloomy abstraction and indifference, she hardly noticed the significant glances and busy whispers of neighbors and acquaintance. With her, the agony of death was past. The world seemed to her too spectral for her to dread its censure. At last she gave birth to a dead infant, and for a long time her own life trembled in the balance. She recovered, in a state of confirmed melancholy, and with occasional indications of impaired intellect.

"A shadow seemed to rise
From out her thoughts, and turn to dreariness
All blissful hopes and sunny memories."

She was no longer invited to visit with the young people of the neighborhood; and the envy excited by her uncommon beauty showed itself in triumph over her blighted reputation. Her father thought it a duty to reprove her for sin, and her stepmother said some cutting words about the disgrace her conduct had brought upon the family. But no kind Christian heart reminded her that weakness is not always crime, or strengthened her with the assurance that one false step in life might be retrieved. Thus was the lilly broken in its budding beauty, and its delicate petals blighted by harsh winds.

Poor Lizzy felt this depressing atmosphere of neglect and scorn; but fortunately with less keenness than she would have done, before her brain was stultified and heart congealed by shame and sorrow. She no longer showed much feeling about anything, except the little blue bench marked W. and E. Every moment that she could steal from household labors, she would retire to her little room, and, seated on this bench, would read over William's letters, and those other letters which had crushed her loving heart.—She would not allow any person to remove the bench from her bedside, or to place a foot upon it. To such inanimate objects does the poor human heart cling in its desolation.

Years passed away monotonously with Elizabeth; years of loneliness and labor. Some young men, attracted by her beauty, and emboldened by knowledge of her weakness, approached her with a familiarity which they intended for flattery. But their profligacy was too thinly disguised to be dangerous to a nature like hers. She turned coldly from them all, with feelings of disgust and weariness.

When she was about twenty-three years old she went to Philadelphia, to do household work for a family that wished to hire her. Important events followed this change, but a veil of obscurity rests over the causes that produced them. After some months residence in the city, her health failed more and more, and she returned to the country. She was still competent to discharge the lighter duties of household labor, but she seemed to perform them all mechanically, and with a dull stupor. After a time it became obvious that she would again be a mother. When questioned, her answers were incoherent and contradictory. At last she gave birth to twins. She wept when she saw them; but they seemed to have no power to withdraw her mind from its disconsolate wanderings. When they were a few months old she expressed a wish to return to Philadelphia; and a lad belonging to the family where she had remained during her illness, agreed to convey her part of the way in a wagon. When they came into the public road she told him she could walk the rest of the way, and begged him to return. He left her seated on a rock, near a thick grove, nursing her babes. She was calm and gentle, but sad and abstracted as usual.—That was in the morning. Where or how she spent the day was never known. Towards night she arrived in Philadelphia, at the house where she had formerly lived. She seemed very haggard and miserable; what few words she said were abrupt and unmeaning; and her attitudes and motions had the sluggish apathy of an insane person.

The next day there was a rumor afloat that two strangled infants had been found in a grove on the road from Chester. Of course, this circumstance soon became connected with her name. When she was arrested, she gave herself up with the same gloomy indifference that marked all her actions. She denied having committed the murder; but when asked who she supposed had done it, she sometimes shuddered and said nothing, sometimes said she did not know, and sometimes answered that the children were still living. When conveyed to prison she asked for pen and ink, and in a short letter, rudely penned, she begged William to come to her, and to bring from her bed-room the little blue bench they used to sit upon in the happy days of childhood. He came at once, and long did the affectionate couple stand locked in each other's arms, sobbing, without the power to speak. It was not until the second interview that her brother could summon courage to ask whether she really committed the crime of which she was accused.

"Oh no, William," she replied, "you could not suppose I did."

"You must, indeed, have been dreadfully changed, dear Lizzy," said he; "for you used to have a heart that could not hurt a kitten."

"I am dreadfully changed," she answered, "but I never wanted to harm anything."

He took her hand, played sadly with the emaciated fingers, and, after a strong effort to control his emotions, he said, in a subdued voice—

"Lizzy, dear, can you tell me who did do it?"

She stared at him with a wild, intense gaze that made him shudder. Then, looking fearfully towards the door, she said, in a strange, muffled whisper—

"Did what?"

Poor William bowed his head over the hand that he held in his own, and wept like a child.

During various successive interviews, he could obtain no satisfactory answer to the important question. Sometimes she merely gazed at him with a vacant, insane expression; sometimes she faintly answered that she did not know; and sometimes she believed the babes were still alive. She gradually became more quiet and rational under her brother's soothing influence; and one day, when he had repeatedly assured her that she could safely trust her secrets to his faithful heart, she said, with a suppressed whisper, as if she feared the sound of her own voice—

"He did it."

"Who is he?" asked the brother, gently.

"The father," she replied.

"Did you know he meant to do it?"

"No. He told me he would meet me and give me some money. But when I asked him for something to support the children, he was angry, and choked them. I was frightened, and felt faint. I don't know what I did. I woke up and found myself on the ground alone, and the babies lying among the bushes."

"What is his name, and where does he live?" inquired the brother. She gave him a wild look of distress, and said—

"Oh, don't ask me! I ought not to have done so. I am a poor sinner—a poor sinner. But everybody deserted me: the world was very cold; I had nobody to love; and he was very kind to me."

"But tell me his name," urged the brother. She burst into a strange mad laugh, picked nervously at the handkerchief she held in her hand, and repeated, idiotically, "Name? name? I guess the babies are alive now. I don't know—I don't know; but I guess they are."

To the lawyer she would say nothing except to deny that she committed the murder. All their exertions could wring from her nothing more distinct than the story she had briefly told her brother. During her trial, the expression of her countenance was stupid and vacant. At times she would drum on the railing before her, and stare round on the crowd with a bewildered look, as if unconscious where she was. The deranged state of her mind was strongly urged by her lawyer, but his opponent replied that all this might be assumed. To the story she had told in prison, it was answered that her not telling of the murder at the time, made her an accomplice. After the usual display of legal ingenuity on both sides, the jury brought her in guilty of murder, and the poor forlorn creature was sentenced to be hung at Chester.

The wretched brother was so stunned by the blow that at first he could not collect his thoughts. But it soon occurred to him that the terrible doom might still be arrested, if the case could be brought suitably before the governor. A petition was accordingly drawn up, setting forth the alienation of mind to which she had been subjected, in consequence of fits, and the extreme doubtfulness whether she committed the murder. Her youth, her beauty, the severe sorrows of her life, and the obviously impaired state of her reason, touched many hearts, and the petition was rapidly signed. When William went to her cell to bid her adieu, he tried to cheer her with the hope of pardon. She listened with listless apathy. But when he pressed her hand and with a mournful smile said, "Good bye, dear Lizzy, I shall come back soon, and I hope with good news," she pointed tearfully to the little blue bench and said, "Let what will happen, Willie, take care of that for my sake." He answered with a choked voice; and as he turned away, the tears flowed fast down his manly cheeks. She listened to the echoes of his steps, and when she could hear them no longer, she threw herself on the floor, laid her head on the little blue bench, kissed the letters carved upon it, and sobbed as she had not sobbed since she was first deserted by her false lover. When the jailer went to carry her supper he found her asleep thus. Rich masses of her glossy brown hair fell over her pale, but still lovely face, on which rested a serene smile, as if she were happy in her dreams. He stood and gazed upon her, and his hard hand brushed away a tear. Some motion that he made disturbed her slumber. She opened her eyes from which there beamed for a moment a rational and happy expression, as she said: "I was out in the woods, behind the house, holding my little apron to catch the nuts that Willie threw down. Mother smiled at me from a blue place between two cloads, and said, 'Come to me, my child.'"

The next day a clergyman came to see her. He spoke of the penalty for sin, and the duty of being resigned to the demands of justice. She heard his words as a mother hears street sounds when she is watching a dying babe. They conveyed to her no import. When asked if she repented of her sins, she said she had been a weak, erring creature, and she hoped that she was penitent, but that she never committed the murder.

"Are you resigned to die if a pardon should not be obtained?" he asked.

"Oh yes," she replied, "I want to die."

He prayed with her in the spirit of real human love, and this soothed her heart. She spoke seldom, after her brother's departure, and often she did not appear to hear when she was spoken to. She sat on the little blue bench, gazing vacantly on the floor, like one already out of the body.

In those days there was a briefer interval between sentence and execution than at present. The fatal day and hour soon arrived, and still no tidings from the governor. Men came to lead her to the gallows. She seemed to understand what they said to her, and turned meekly to obey their orders. But she stopped suddenly, gazed on the little blue bench, and said, in a gasping tone, "Has William come?" When they told her no, a shudder seemed to go over her, and her pale face became still paler. A piece of looking-glass hung on the wall in front of her, and as she raised her head, she saw the little curl that had received her mother's caresses, and the first kiss of love. With a look of the most intense agony, she gave a loud groan and burying her face in her hands, fell forward on the shoulder of the sheriff.

Poor William had worked with the desperate energy of despair, and the governor, after brief delay, granted a pardon. But in those days the facilities for travelling were few, and it happened that the country was inundated by heavy rains, which everywhere impeded his progress. He stopped neither for food nor rest, but every where the floods and broken roads hindered his progress. When he came to Darby Creek, which was usually fordable, it was swollen too high to be crossed, and it was some time before a boat could be obtained. In agony of mind he pressed onward, till his horse fell dead under him.—Half frantic, he begged for another at any price: mounted, and rode furiously. From the top of a hill he saw a crowd assembled round the place of execution. He waived his handkerchief, he shouted, he screamed. But in the excitement of the moment he was not heard or noticed. All eyes were fastened on the gallows; and soon the awful object came within his own vision. Father of mercies! There are women's garments floating in the air. There is a struggle, a quivering—and all is still.

With a shriek that pierced the ears of the multitude, the desperate rider plunged forward; his horse fell under him, and shouting "A pardon! A pardon!" he rolled senseless on the ground. He came too late. The unhappy Elizabeth was dead. She had gone to "Him who made the heart,

And who alone decidedly can try it
Then at the balance let's be mute—
We never can adjust it.
What's done we partly may compute,
But know not what's resisted."

Pale as a ghost, with hair suddenly whitened by excess of anguish, the wretched brother bent over the corpse of that beautiful sister whom he had loved so well. They spoke to him of resignation to God's will. He answered not; for it was not clear to h[im] that the cruelty of man is the will of God. Reverently and tenderly he cut from that fair brow, the favorite little curl, twined about with so many sacred memories, and once a source of girlish, innocent joy to the yearning heart that slept so calmly now. He took the little bench from its cold corner in the prison, and gathering together his small personal property, he retired to a lonely cave in Dauphin county. He shunned all intercourse with his fellow men, and when spoken to, answered briefly and solemnly. There he died, a few years ago, at an advanced age. He is well remembered in the region round about, as WILLIAM the HERMIT.

THE SELECT PARTY.

BY "A LADY OF MARYLAND."

"Mary," said Susan Maxwell to her cousin, "do you not mean to call on the strange lady at Mrs. Campbell's, and invite her to your party?"

"Indeed I do not! I intend that my party shall be very select, and of course I don't mean to ask every body."

"I suppose not," said Susan, "but you ought surely to pay some attention to a stranger, and to one whose appearance and manners evince that she is a perfect lady."

"Really, you can see further into a mill-stone than any one else, Susan! pray, how did you discover that Miss Brandon is a perfect lady? Have you been to see her?"

"No, but I met her at poor old Mrs. Wood's cottage, and the kindness of her manner to the old woman, and the perfect ease and self-possession with which she met my embarrassed efforts to commence a conversation convinced me at once of the goodness of her heart and of her familiarity with refined society."

"Well, I have no doubt that you are an excellent judge, but as I happen to know something about the family of this lady, I believe I shall adhere to my own determination, and not invite her to a party which I intend shall be particularly select."

"Why, what do you know about Miss Brandon's family, Mary?" said her brother, who had been a silent but not inattentive listener to the conversation of the cousins.

"Why, George Benson told me that he had good reason to believe that her father was a mechanic, and that he knew she had a brother who at one time was a school-master."

"George Benson is a fool, and really, Mary, though I do not wish to speak harshly, I must say that your conversation does not do much credit to your understanding. I have the pleasure of Miss Brandon's acquaintance, and I assure you that if I could flatter myself that you would ever resemble her, I should be more proud than I have yet had reason to be of my sister."

Mary Spencer curled her pretty lip and tossed her head in disdain as her brother ceased to speak, but she did not reply, and to change the conversation, Susan enquired of Henry when Mr. Wilmot was expected in the village.

"It is probable that he will be here this afternoon."

"Oh! I am so glad," said Mary, forgetting her anger. "He will be here in time for my party."

"But, Mary," interrupted her brother, "how do you know that Wilmot is sufficiently genteel to make one of a party which is to be so very select?"

"Pshaw! Henry, have done with your nonsense—you know as well as I do, that he is one of the most distinguished men in the State, and that his society is courted by all the first families."

"Well, I expect he will arrive in the stage this afternoon, and if he is not otherwise engaged, I will bring him here to pass the evening, and you can then judge of his pretensions to be ranked among the elite."

Mary Spencer was the belle and the beauty of the village in which she resided. Her mother being a widow in easy circumstances, and having but two children, had adopted the orphan niece of her deceased husband, who was nearly of the same age as her own daughter. Pleasing, though not beautiful in her person, and of a disposition to shun rather than court observation, Susan Maxwell was completely eclipsed by her brilliant cousin. The natural diffidence of her character being increased by her dependant situation, it required more than ordinary penetration to discover the refined and cultivated mind, the fervid, affectionate nature which were concealed by her unobtrusive and somewhat cold manner.

Westville is a beautiful little village, and its inhabitants are respectable, and for the most part wealthy. It contains, besides, a mineral spring, which, though not celebrated enough to render the village a place of fashionable resort, is sufficiently so to attract those who are willing to escape the dust and heat of the city, without the eclat of a visit to the springs.

No visitor, however, had ever yet appeared of so much importance as the one who was now expected. Charles Wilmot, though still a young man, had distinguished himself in the counsels of the nation, and won a name and reputation among the great men of the day, which rendered him an important personage in a far more extended circle than that of Westville. No wonder, then, that the little village was in a flutter of expectation, when it was announced in the newspaper "that the Hon. C. Wilmot having declined a public dinner tendered him by the inhabitants of ——, would arrive in a few days at Westville, where he would remain for some weeks for the benefit of his health." The excitement caused by this paragraph was partaken of by the family of Mrs. Spencer, all the members of which, though for different reasons, were anxious to see the distinguished stranger. Henry, who had known Mr. Wilmot the the preceding winter at Washington, was anxious to renew an acquaintance from which he had derived both pleasure and instruction. Mary wished for an opportunity of trying the power of charms, which she believed required only an opportunity of display to prove irresistable. Her motto was—

"Let me be seen, could I that wish obtain
All other wishes my own power would gain."

Mrs. Spencer was desirious of seeing the man of whom she had heard so much, and Susan Maxwell, who had been an attentive reader of the debates in Congress, was gratified at the prospect of becoming acquainted with a distinguished orator and statesman. Mr. Wilmot was therefore received with great cordiality by Mrs. Spencer's family, with whom he spent the first evening of his sojourn at Westville.—He was a fine-looking man, about thirty-five years of age, with brilliant eyes, splendid teeth, and a countenance expressive at once of fine feelings and of the highest order of intellect. His manners, too, were so polished, so refined, so full of graceful deference to the opinions of those with whom he conversed, that, added to his rare colloqual powers, they could not fail to make a favorable impression. Henry was in raptures: Mrs. Spencer was much pleased. Even Mary, in contemplating the attractions of her visitor, forgot to calculate the effect of her own; while Susan hardly dared trust herself to speak of one who, only of all his sex she had ever seen, realized all her conceptions of the dignity of human nature. Wilmot remained all the evening at Mrs. Spencer's, and his opinions of the family may be gathered from the following letter, which, on his return to his lodgings, he addressed to his friend, Col. Liston:

My Dear Liston—

I cannot sleep, and there is no one here with whom I can converse so freely as with you. Therefore I have concluded to "bestow my tediousness" upon you. Oh, Liston, I verily believe I have met my fate in the shape of an angel! You know I have always ridiculed the idea of love at first sight, but who can control their destiny? I have this evening seen a creature so surpassingly lovely that if her mind correspond with her person, and if she will look with an eye of favor upon your friend, he will forswear ambition and devote his whole future life to love and happiness. But I will endeavor to give you a methodical account of my introduction to the beautiful being who has well nigh bewitched me. You remember Henry Spencer, the clever youth who visited Washington last winter, and with whom we were both so much pleased? Well, he lives here, and he met me immediately on my arrival, and invited me to pass the evening with his mother and sister. He pressed the invitation so earnestly, that I could not decline it, and though somewhat fatigued, after spending an hour with dear Julia, I repaired to Mrs. Spencer's, more indeed with a view to gratify Henry than with any expectation of pleasure to myself. I had not, however, been in the house ten minutes before my fatigue was forgotten, and I remembered only that I was in the society of the most beautiful creature I have ever seen. Mary Spencer cannot be more than seventeen, for she has all the brilliant bloom of extreme youth, yet there is in her deportment all the dignity which belongs to more mature years. But I cannot describe her. Some day, perhaps, you may see her, and you will then own that if your friend has lost his reason, he has, at least, a fair excuse for his folly. Mrs. Spencer, the mother of Mary, is a fine, respectable looking old lady, and there is a pretty looking girl, a relation of the family I presume, whose dark gray eye, and pale high forehead, give promise of intellect; but her manners are reserved, and I did not make much progress in her acquaintance. Julia's health is much improved. She does not know Mrs. or Miss Spencer, but has met with Miss Maxwell the gray-eyed maiden I have spoken of, and is quite pleased with her, a circumstance which prepossesses me in her favour. You know my confidence in the judgment of my sister, and how much I am disposed to love all to whom she is attached. I have written you a long letter, but I cannot conclude without telling you that Miss Spencer is to give a party in a few days, and that your sober, sedate friend, who eschews the follies and vanities of fashionable life, is as impatient for this village fete as a youth of eighteen. Write soon, and direct to Westville. I shall be here for some weeks.

Yours, &c., C. WILMOT.

"May I ask who is the fair lady with whom you were riding, this morning, Mr. Wilmot?" said Mary Spencer, as that gentleman entered Mrs. Spencer's parlour.

"It was my sister," he replied; "her health is delicate, and she is ordered by her physicians to ride every day."

"Indeed, I was not aware that your sister accompanied you. Why did you not inform us that she was in the village, and allow us the pleasure of making her acquaintance?"

"Julia has been here for several weeks; but her feeble health confines her much to the house, which is the reason, probably, that you have never met."

"I regret very much that I was not aware of her being in town; but I hope now to have an opportunity of repairing my involuntary negligence. I seldom visit strangers unless I know who they are, for there is a risk, in this place, of making very improper acquaintances. I am sure, Mr. Wilmot," she added, "you approve of young ladies being very particular in their associations?"

"Certainly, Miss, but I did not suppose that any but respectable persons would attempt to enter into society at Westville."

"Oh, they are respectable in a certain sense, but what I mean is, that they are not the first people."

"The first people! I do not understand the meaning you affix to that expression."

"I will then give you an account of a very narrow escape I made from forming an extremely improper acquaintance, and you will then understand what I mean by the first people. Among the visitors here this summer is a Miss Brandon, who, I am told, is extremely pretty and genteel in her appearance—Susan here was quite charmed with her, and I was on the very point of calling on her, when fortunately I learned that her father was a mechanic, and that she had a brother who had kept a country school. Of courée, I declined to visit her, for mechanics have certainly no business in good society; and as to school-masters, if there is any thing upon earth for which I have a perfect contempt, it is a country pedagogue."

Mary had been so occupied with her subject that she did not perceive the look with which Wilmot regarded her, until, as she ceased to speak, he advanced to the sofa on which she sat, and bowing profoundly, said—

"If such are your sentiments, Miss Spencer, I owe you an apology for having intruded myself upon your acquaintance. Miss Brandon is my half-sister, and both her father and mine were mechanics!—Moreover, I am the identical country school-master of whom you have heard. I have the honour to wish you a good morning." And, again bowing to all the ladies, Mr. Wilmot quitted the apartment, leaving his hearers almost petrified with amazement and consternation.

A few days after, Wilmot again wrote to Colonel Liston.

My dear Liston—

Mortified self-love is a sovereign panacea for a wounded heart. Miss Spencer has completely dissolved the enchantment which her beauty had created, simply by expressing her opinion that the daughters of mechanics are not entitled to mix in good society, and by her unqualified contempt for country school-masters. You know it is not many years since I quitted the profession of teaching. To do the lady justice, she did not mean to mortify or offend me by expressing her sentiments. She did not know to whom she was speaking; nor was she aware, from the difference in the names, that Julia was my sister. About an hour after I had left Mrs. Spencer's house, where the conversation I have alluded to occurred, Henry came to me greatly distressed by what had taken place, and full of apologies for what he called his sister's folly. A little reflection convinced me how idle it would be to take offence at the silly expressions of a young lady, so I complied with Henry's request to spend the evening at his mother's, and even induced Julia to accept Miss Spencer's invitation to her party, which took place last night. And now, you will say, having recovered from my brief love fit, I will be in no danger from a second attack of the same malady. You are mistaken. The spell which mere beauty had cast around me being broken, I am at leisure to be attracted by the more powerful charms of a cultivated intellect, and a noble and generous heart. To be serious, I think I have found in Susan Maxwell a being formed to constitute the happiness of my future life, if I can succeed in gaining her affections. She and Julia have become exceedingly attached to each other, and I am encouraged by the latter not to despair. I shall remain here till Autumn, when I hope to bring my wooing to a happy conclusion, and to have the felicity of introducing you to Mrs. Wilmot.

Yours, truly, C. WILMOT.

The summer months glided rapidly and pleasantly away at Westville, and early in autumn the village newspaper announced the marriage of the Hon. C. Wilmot, and Susan, only daughter of the late James Maxwell, Esq.

The moral of our story he that runs may read. Mary Spencer realized, when too late, the correctness of Pope's conclusion—

"Worth makes the man—the want of it the fellow—
The rest is all but leather or prunella!"

MIRZA.

BY JAMES W. BUNTING.

In the delightful region of Arabia Felix, that country so dear to the imagination of youth, the birth-place of genii and romance, resided the shepherd Mirza. He was born on the side of a mountain, which is seen to rise abruptly from the ocean, and whose rocky base often resounds to the waves, as they break in idle fury at its foot. Here, occupied in the care of his flocks, that were often seen by the mariner skipping with airy levity from rock to rock, Mirza tasted all those solid enjoyments which health and nature ever bestow. He drank the water as it rolled in crystaline purity from the hill side; his food was gathered by his own hand from its parent tree. Content was the companion of his daily rambles, and health watched every night over his slumbers.

Happy would it have been for Mirza had he been permitted to enjoy the pleasures of his lot. But one of those malignant genii, who are always on the watch to thwart the happiness of the followers of the Prophet, and look with envious eyes on those enjoyments they are for ever debarred from tasting, infused into his mind a feeling of disgust, which, gaining strength from indulgence, at length poisoned every moment of his life. Mirza was taught to believe that the life he led, in comparison with that of those who lived at a distance, in the cities, was desolate and forlorn, and precluded from those ravishing delights which constitute the true charm of existence. This thought, cherished for a time, at length generated a repining spirit; every hour increased his discontent; and now his only pleasure consisted in indulging his imagination in sketching exaggerated and fantastic pictures of every untried mode of life, and of every enjoyment that was out of his reach.

One evening he sat on a jutting rock, that projected far into the sea, indulging in those dear but fatal reveries, and listening to the dashing of the waves, which, returning at regular intervals, increased his abstraction, and threw over his soul an exquisite feeling of musing melancholy. Here, while wrapt in visionary pleasures, his eye was suddenly arrested by the appearance of a little island, that seemed just risen from the depths of the ocean, with all the freshness and bloom of youth. It appeared like a new Eden, floating upon the waves. Orange, citron, and all the spicy growth of the East, flourished luxuriantly on its borders, that gracefully sloped down to the level of the sea; and as the breeze passed, lingering over the flowery meads and vocal groves, it gathered a thousand odors, and wafted the melody of a thousand birds. Mirza gazed on this scene, over which the last rays of the sun threw a glorious lustre, with a pleasure that thrilled to his heart. He stretched forth his trembling hands to grasp the distant blessing, and exclaimed, with youthful enthusiasm:

"Happy, thrice happy, O, fair island! must be the shepherds that sport in thy green fields, and rest in thy spicy groves. The toil of ascending the rugged precipice, of pursuing their flocks over flinty rocks, and through briary dells, is unknown to them; for their path is over genial plains, enamelled with flowers, while mine—"

As he said this, Mirza turned towards the rude and barren hills of his nativity, and contemplated them with increasing disgust.

He remained with his eyes rivetted towards the happy island, until it vanished in the mists of evening; and, when he could no longer discern a vestige of its existence, he returned, disconsolate and miserable, to the simple home of his parents.

Every day Mirza came and placed himself on the spot whence he had first caught a view of the little island, and there indulged his glowing fancy in a thousand dangerous and delusive reveries. As he contemplated its beautifully-fringed borders, his horror of his native home, and his disgust for the sober enjoyments of real life, increased every hour, and every night he returned with his flocks diminished.

One morning, as he sat on the accustomed spot, musing, as usual, on the possibility of passing over to this delightful region, a little painted boat, gaily and fantastically decorated with flowers, floated towards him, and bounded ashore just at his foot. It was guided by a female of exquisite beauty. Her figure was so light and ethereal, that she seemed self-balanced in the air. Her face was marked with an expression so singularly, yet so beautifully wild, and there was such an inexpressible grace in every motion, that the heart of the delighted and amazed youth was ravished with transports. In tones sweeter than echo, and more seducing than the voice of whispered love, she addressed him:

"Mirza, I have seen and sympathised in thy regrets, and am come to relieve them. Follow me, and exchange this dull and dreary abode for one where nature and man are dressed in smiles of immortal beauty. All that thy imagination has painted of happiness shall be thine, and all that experience has shown thee of misery shall be excluded."

Saying this, she extended her hand, and clasped that of the eager Mirza. At that touch, a thrill of trembling transport darted through his frame, and struck at his heart. The sensation was like that of the youthful genius, when touched by the finger of Fancy; he feels the inspiration of the divinity, and pours forth a torrent of glowing thoughts, that secure him immortality.

The little painted boat carried the young adventurer and his guide with inconceivable swiftness, and in a few minutes they approached the island. The nearer they came, the more transcendent appeared its beauties, and when they arrived at the fringed border, a troop of nymphs, clothed in all the splendors of the rainbow, advanced to welcome Mirza, and chant the glories of their queen. They sung the praises of fancy, and the happiness of those who live under her enchanting reign.

"Here, in this chosen retreat, the pale form of Misery never disturbs the blissful dreams of the happy subjects of the empire of Imagination. Here, free from the inexorable tyranny of dull reality, they sport in flowery regions of ever-blooming beauty, while round their brows float airy forms of love and rapture. Here the sad soul, sated with sensual joys, or pressed down with a load of worldly cares, will find a refuge, where suffering is divested of its pangs, and joy comes to the soul unalloyed with those attendants which, in the real world, turn it into all the bitterness of sorrow. Hither, O, mortal! turn thy erring and doubtful steps, for here only wilt thou find that heaven which is fabled in the skies!"

Mirza listened to this delusive rhapsody with breathless impatience, and, falling at the feet of his conductress, thanked her for having at length brought him to a spot that realized all his anticipations.

Conducted by his charming guide, he wandered about through all the mazes of visionary enchantment, and his senses became bewildered in a tumult of delight. It seemed as if Nature had selected this little region from the whole world, to display the charms, the wonders, and the powers of her creative hand. The grass was greener and more luxuriant than was ever beheld before, and softer than Persian silk. Groves of myrtle, orange, and citron, whose branches intertwined in social harmony, foliaged the landscape, and the birds that sang in these delightful shades were birds of Paradise, whose plumage and whose song are the delight of the immortals. Beautiful transparent streams meandered, in graceful curves, among the meadows, and with their low murmuring lulled the heart of Mirza, which was tumultuous with admiration, into a feeling of languid felicity, more luxurious than all his former sensations. The air too possessed a seductive power, whose balmy influence disposed the mind to reverie, and, while it relaxed the body to a state of delicious lassitude, quickened the imagination into the most glowing conceptions. At length, having exhausted himself in wandering and admiring, Mirza laid himself down at the foot of a spreading tree, beside a little stream, and fell asleep.

When he awoke, he for the first time since his abode in the happy island, felt a sensation of hunger; for, though the imagination sometimes conquers our reason, it cannot overcome the wants of our nature. The visionary, who wastes his time in the idle indulgence of abstraction, and permits his fancy to transport him whither she pleases, will soon be brought to the sense of suffering reality by some of those inevitable wants which are the common lot of humanity. Seeing the oranges waiving luxuriantly above his head, Mirza stretched out his arm, and essayed to pluck one from its branch; but it eluded his grasp.—He tried another, and a third: but still as his hand approached, they vanished from his view. In wonder and disappointment, he contemplated the delusion, and, faint with hunger, laid himself down, to slake his thirst in the stream that murmured at his feet. As he approached his lips towards it, the water retired, and though its murmurs still continued, the bottom became dry. A dire and horrible apprehension that his senses had been deluded, now rushed over his mind, and the prospect of starving in the lap of seeming plenty, struck a cold damp upon his heart. In hopeless distraction he wandered through vocal groves and verdant vallies, in search of something to alleviate his wants; but, wherever he came, the fruits eluded his grasp, and the waters receded from his lips.

At length, faint, weary, and exhausted, he arrived at the spot where he first landed, and sinking down upon the ground, waited in gloomy and hopeless resignation the consummation of his fate. As his last hour approached, raising himself with a desperate effort, he beheld afar off the smoke of his native cottage curling above the blue hills, and presenting an image of peaceful tranquility. The thought of his youthful home, now forever forsaken—of his aged parents, now forever abandoned—of their tenderness in his boyhood, and their sorrow for his loss, came over his soul, and darkened it with gloomy horror.

The wretched being who is suffering the penalty of his imprudence or his crimes, seldom places it to the charge of his own weakness or wickedness, but rails against the disastrous chance that allured, or the vile tempter that persuaded him to err. So Mirza cursed the airy and deceitful being that had seduced him to destruction, and in the bitterness of unjust crimination, impiously dared to arraign the holy Prophet himself.

In the midst of his complaints, the figure that guided the little boat again appeared. She was still gay and beautiful, but to the eyes of Mirza, she seemed a deformed and malignant being.

"Mirza," said she, "I, who listened to the complaints of thy erring and querulous spirit, when enjoying on yonder mountain as high a state of happiness as is consistent with the nature of thy frail being; have heard the wailings of thy misery, and the reproaches of thy despair. Blame not, O wretched mortal! the decrees of the Most High, for thy own discontented spirit was thy ruin—nor load me with reproach, for thou voluntarily deliveredst thyself into my power. Hadst thou not murmured at thy situation, and slighted thy comforts, because thou thoughtest those of others greater, my spells would have had no power, and my influence could not have harmed thee. Know, Mirza, that there is no other happiness in this world than a contented mind, and no misery but a repining and discontented spirit."

So saying, she disappeared from his view; and when in the evening the last rays of the setting sun vanished from the hills of his youth, the spirit and the body of Mirza parted forever.

WOMAN'S CHARITY.

That was a beautiful idea of the wife of an Irish schoolmaster, who, whilst poor himself, had given gratuitous instruction to poor scholars, but when increased in worldly goods, began to think that he could not afford to give his services for nothing:

"Oh, James, don't say the like o' that," said the gentle-hearted woman—"don't—a poor scholar never came into the house that I didn't feel as if he brought fresh air from Heaven with him—I never miss the bit I give them—my heart warms to the soft, homely sound of their bare feet on the floor and the door almost opens of itself to let them in."

HOW TO RUIN A SON.

Let him have his own way—allow him free use of money—suffer him to do what he pleases, and rove where he pleases, especially on the Sabbath day—give him free access to all sorts of companions—call him to no account for his evenings, or for his conduct generally—furnish him with no stated employment. Pursue any one of these ways, and you will experience a most marvellous deliverance if you do not have to mourn over a debased and ruined child.

THE GRATEFUL HUNCHBACK.

[FROM THE FRENCH.]

There once lived in a small town in France, a little, old hunchback, who, in his youth had, by some accident, lost both his legs, his name was Caro. Caro was not rich; at least he would not acknowledge that he had anything more than his mule, a pack saddle, and a pair of crutches.

To gain a livelihood he made himself useful in the village. He took letters to the post-office—brushed dusty clothes—polished boots and shoes; indeed, he did every thing to gain an honest living. He would sometimes get six cents—sometimes more—sometimes less—at other times he would receive an old hat or coat, some bread or some meat—in a word, he always received something for his trouble. Caro was so good—so attentive—so honest—every body loved Caro. In the morning early (for Caro never was lazy) he would go out to seek for something to do. In good weather he would take his crutches and walk—or rather crawl on his knees—but when the weather was bad he would ride on his mule—and in this way offer his little services. In the evening he returned to his hut to talk with Colas.

Colas was a young gardener, honest, laborious, and kind, who gave a corner of his cabin to poor old Caro. Caro loved Colas as a father loves a child; and when Caro was sick, Colas was his nurse and physician. Colas made his soup—Colas made his bed—Colas took care of the mule. In all the good things that Colas enjoyed, Caro shared.

Every day, at noon precisely, Caro repaired to the house of the rector of the parish. This good man was a worthy parson who, in former days, had received some important favors from the hunchback, and in gratitude, he had ordered his servant to give him, regularly, his dinner at this hour.

The name of the servant was Rosette, she was an amiable, pretty and sensible young girl. Colas loved the pretty Rosette, and Rosette loved the good Colas. But they were both very poor—too poor they thought to be married, and both hoped and looked for better times.

The situation of the poor hunchback interested the tender-hearted Rosette. As soon as she heard the sound of his crutches at the door she would exclaim, "It is Caro,"—she would then assist him to descend from his mule—give him a chair near to the fire—inquire about his health—and, indeed, she did all for the poor, decrepit little hunchback to make him happy. Caro loved the good, the kind Rosette with all his heart. It is so natural to love those who try to make us comfortable and happy.

And when the hunchback had eaten his soup, Rosette always found some nice delicacy: "Father Caro, put these nuts in your pocket;—father Caro, eat this apple;—father Caro, take this glass of wine."—Every day the same kindness was shown, and every day old Caro would say:—"God will reward you, my beautiful Rosette," and thus he would depart muttering blessings on the good girl.

One day Rosette's friend did not come. The hour had passed; no one knocked.

"Alas!" she exclaimed, something has happened to Caro. He never would forget his good dinner. He must be sick. Can he be ——?" She dared not finish the sentence—the thought would break her heart. Suddenly some one knocked at the door. "Ah, it is not Caro,—that is not the knock of Caro's crutch!"

With a heart full of grief she opened the door. It was Colas. Colas, his eyes filled with tears, had come to tell the good rector that Caro was no more! An attack of apoplexy had suffocated him during the night. Tender Rosette, and honest Colas, simple and pure souls, mingled their tears over the cold remains of poor Caro.

In the pockets of the poor Caro was found a paper containing his last will. This is what was written:

"I leave to Rosette my pack-saddle: and I leave to Colas my crutches, on condition only that he marries Rosette. As for my poor mule, that has served me so faithfully, I leave to the good rector, that it may be taken care of during its old age."

Every body regretted old Caro: but Rosette and Colas, his two best friends, were for a long time inconsolable.

But, in time, sorrow for the Hunchback gave place to funny sayings about his strange bequest.—The peasants of the village found great pleasure in teazing Colas and Rosette.

"It is to beat thy wife," one would say to Colas, "that Caro left you his crutches."

"No doubt," another would reply, "it was for this purpose that the old man left the pack-saddle to Rosette, as every body knows it is the symbol of patience."

Every one had his little jest, and the poor young people hardly knew what to say. However, in respect to the memory of their old friend, they kept sacred the modest heritage.

One day, a long time after the death of Caro, Colas was sitting at the door of his hut, when he saw a large hog in his garden, destroying all his nice vegetables. He went into his chamber to get a stick, but in his haste he picked up one of the crutches of the old hunchback, with which he did beat the animal so hard upon the back, that it broke into fifty pieces. What was his surprise, on seeing strewed all about him many pieces of gold! Honest Colas could not believe his eyes—but he felt the different coins, and turned them over and over again, until he could doubt no longer. He then got the other crutch—and wondered that he had never before remarked how heavy it was. and when he had broken it, he found it too filled with gold pieces. Colas was overjoyed—he danced under his humble roof—he wept—he laughed—he blessed the memory of his benefactor. A thousand agreeable ideas crossed his imagination; he thought of what the paper said about his marriage with Rosette; he counted again his treasure, and then, swiftly as he could, he ran to the house of the rector.

"Here, Rosette!" cried he, as soon as he perceived her, "come, behold our good fortune!"

Rosette opened her large black eyes as she listened to the happy Colas. "Oh," she exclaimed, "and where is my pack-saddle? They came together."

The ugly thing was decaying in a corner of the stable. But they found it. They opened it—and it was stuffed with pieces of gold!

Colas and Rosette were married. They bought a pretty little farm, and lived comfortably and happily for a great many years. And to the end of their lives, cherished with gratitude the memory of the affectionate Caro, who, by his wise economy, acquired means to reward, after his death, those who were his disinterested and honest friends during his life.

THE BROKEN PITCHER.

FROM HEINRICH ZSCHOCKEE.

I.—MARIETTE.

True, La Napoule is only a very small place on the gulf of Cannes: yet is it well-known throughout the whole of Provence. It lies in the shade of tall ever-green palms and dark orange trees. This, indeed, if it were all true, had never given it its celebrity. But they say here grow the finest grapes, the sweetest roses, and the loveliest girls. I know not, yet gladly believe it. What a pity La Napoule is so little, and cannot by possibility produce enough fine grapes, sweet roses, and lovely girls, to spare some of them for us.

If all the girls of La Napoule have been beauties ever since its foundation, without doubt little Mariette must have been a wonder of all wonders, because even their chroniclers speak of her. True she was called little Mariette, yet she was no smaller than a child of perhaps seventeen years usually is, whose forehead reaches exactly to the lips of a grown up man.

The chroniclers of La Napoule had good reasons to mention Mariette. Had I been the chronicler I would have done the same. For Mariette, who had been residing with her mother, Manon, at Avignon, when she again returned to her birth-place, almost turned it inside out; not exactly the houses, but the people and their heads; nor yet in truth the heads of all the people, but particularly of those whose head and heart are always in danger in the neighborhood of two beautiful soul-speaking eyes; a matter by no means to be joked about.

Perhaps Mother Manon had better have remained in Avignon. But she had received a small inheritance in La Napoule; a little property with some vineyards on it, and a comfortable house which lay in the shadow of a rock, among olive trees and African Acacias. No poor widow was Mother Manon, and in her own opinion, as rich and happy as were she the Countess of Provence.

So much the worse for the good La Napoulese.—They had not dreamed of any mischief brewing, and had never read in Homer, how a pretty woman had roused all Greece and Asia Minor to arms and war.

II.—HOW MISFORTUNE CAME.

Hardly had Mariette been a fortnight in the cottage among the olive trees and Acacias, before it was well known to every young La Napoulese; and they knew, moreover, that all Provence could not shew forth a lovelier girl than dwelt in that same cottage.

Whenever she went through the village, graceful and beautiful as an angel, in rustling frock and pale green boddice, orange flowers on her bosom, and roses and ribbons waiving from her pretty straw hat, the old men became eloquent, while the young ones were struck dumb with admiration. Every where, right and left, windows and doors might be seen to open, and a kind "Good morning," or "Good evening, Mariette," would greet the lovely stranger.

If she went to church, all hearts (that is the young men's) were turned from holy things. Their eyes looked not longer upon the Cross, and their fingers wandered idly among the pearls of their rosaries.—It was indeed a great scandal to all pious souls.

Without doubt the young girls of La Napoule were very piously disposed at that time, for they were the most offended. And they were hardly to blame; for since Mariette's arrival, more than one admirer had become cool—more than one worshipper severed from the object of his devotion. Every where there was scolding and reproaching; weeping and heart-burning. There was no more talk of weddings, but of separations. Pledges of love, rings and trinkets, were returned. The parents took part in the quarrel of their children. Bickerings and contentions ran high in every house. It was lamentable indeed.

"Mariette is guilty of all," said the good pious young girls. The mothers said the same; then the fathers; and finally all were agreed, even the young men.

But Mariette, protected by simplicity and innocence, as the bursting rose bud by the dark green petal which surrounds it, had not the slightest idea of the universal misery, and continued friendly with all. By such conduct, first of all the young men were moved. "Why," said they, "why grieve the harmless pretty child? She has done no harm." The fathers said the same; then the mothers; and, finally, all were agreed, even the pious young girls. For whoever spoke with Mariette could not choose but love her; so that before six months were passed every one had again spoken to her; all were her friends. But she dreamed not that she was now so beloved; neither had she before dreamed that she was so hated. What thinks the lowly violet how valued she is!

So every one tried to make amends for the injustice Mariette had received. Sympathy was added to the tenderness of affection. Mariette found herself every where more kindly greeted; more kindly smiled upon; more kindly invited to the amusements and dances of the neighborhood.

III.—WICKED COLIN.

But all men do not overflow with sweet sympathy. Some have hearts as "dry as summer's dust." This springs, without doubt, from the natural wickedness of man since the fall, or perhaps because something went wrong at the baptizing of the wicked one.

A remarkable example of such hard-heartedness was shown in young Colin, the richest farmer and land-holder in La Napoule, whose flourishing vineyards, and groves of olives, citrons and oranges, it would take you a full day to look at. What better evidence of the natural wickedness of his disposition can we give, than the fact that he was now almost twenty-seven years old, without having even asked the question, whereto a maiden was created?

And yet every body (more particularly the females of a certain age, in which they are merciful in the forgiveness of sins,) held Colin to be the best young fellow under the sun. His fine figure, his natural frank manner, his beaming countenance, had the good fortune to please those who, in case of need, would doubtless have given him absolution for one of the sins that cry out to heaven. But there is no confidence to be placed in the opinions of such judges.

While old and young in La Napoule had become reconciled and friendly with the innocent Mariette, Colin alone showed no mercy to the dear child. If the conversation turned on Mariette, he became as dumb as a fish. If he met her in the street, he cast piercing glances on her, while his face turned red and white with anger.

So if the young people of the village met at the old castle ruins, on the sea shore, for frolicsome games or country dances, or to raise the alternating song, Colin was sure to be there. But, as soon as Mariette arrived, the spiteful Colin became quiet, and all the gold in the world could not have induced him to sing again. And what a shame it was for one with such a charming voice, and such inexhaustible talent!

All the girls liked Colin, and he was kind to them all. He had, as we have said, a roguish countenance, which the pretty creatures feared and admired; and when he smiled, he was beautiful to look upon. But, naturally enough, the often injured Mariette hardly took any notice of him; and in this she was quite right. Whether he smiled or not, was a matter quite indifferent to her. She cared not to hear them speak of his roguish countenance; and herein, too, she was quite right. When all gathered round him to listen to his stories, of which he knew so many, she teased her neighbors, threw cherry-stones now at Peter, now at Paul, laughed, chatted, did any thing, in fact, but listen to Colin. Then the proud young gentleman would rise in disgust, break off his tale, and retire, melancholy, from the crowd.

Revenge is sweet. The triumph of the beautiful daughter of Mistress Manon was then complete. But, after all, Mariette was a very good child, and her heart quite too weak. Did he become quiet, she was filled with sorrow; was he melancholy, she became sad; did he depart, she remained not long after him; and when she was alone, at home, she weeped as lovely tears of sorrow as Magdalen, and yet had not sinned half so much.

IV.—THE PITCHER.

Father Jerome, the priest of La Napoule, an old man of seventy, had all the virtues of a saint, and only this single failing, that by reason of his great age, he was exceedingly hard of hearing. With so much the more edification, on that account, did he preach to the ears of the children of his baptism and confession, and they all heard him gladly. True, he discoursed only on two traits, as though his whole religion lay therein; either "Children, love one another," or "Children, the ways of Heaven are wonderful." Yet, in these discourses, there breathed so much of faith, love and hope, that one might well be contented with them. The children obediently loved one another, and lived in hope of the Providences of Heaven. Only Colin, with the flinty heart, obeyed not. Even when he seemed kindly, doubtless he had the worst intentions.

The Napoulese are very fond of visiting the neighboring town of Vence, at the time of the annual fair. There is always much gaiety there, and if there is not much money to buy them with, there are always plenty of pretty things to be bought. So lovely Mariette and Mother Manon determined to go to the fair. When they arrived, Colin was there too. He bought all sorts of delicacies and trifles for his maiden friends; but for Mariette nothing. And yet, he was ever at her heels. But he spoke not to her, nor she to him. It was plainly to be seen he was brooding some mischief.

"Oh, Mariette!" said Mother Manon, as she stopped before one of the stalls. "Oh, Mariette, see this beautiful pitcher!—a queen might not be ashamed to touch it with her lips. See, the edges are of bright gold, and the garden flowers bloom not more prettily than these, which are, after all, only painted. 'Tis Paradise, too. Only see how smiling the apples hang upon the tree. One almost longs to eat them. And Adam cannot resist his beautiful Eve as she offers him one to taste. And see, too, how affectionately the lamb gambols round the old lion, and how the snow-white dove, with the golden-green neck, seems ready to bill and coo with the hawk there."

Mariette could not satisfy her delighted curiosity. "Had I only such a pitcher, mother!" she said. "It is much too beautiful to drink out of, but I would put my flowers in it, and gaze continually into its Paradise. Here we are at the fair of Vence, yet as I look, it almost seems as though we really were in Paradise."

So spoke Mariette, and called upon her female friends to join in her admiration. Soon these last were joined by their male friends, and presently half the inhabitants of La Napoule had clustered round the beautiful pitcher. And as they gazed on the exquisite transparent porcelain, the golden handle and edges, and its rich painting, in fear and trembling they asked the price of the merchant. "A hundred livres, at the very lowest!" he answered. Their countenances fell, and they departed. After they had gone, Colin crept silently to the merchant's stall, threw a hundred livres upon his table, had the pitcher packed in a box filled with cotton, and carried it away. Not a soul knew his wicked purposes.

It was already dark, when, as he was about to enter La Napoule on his way home, he met old Jacques, the Judge's servant, returning from the fields.—Jacques was an excellent old fellow, but hopelessly stupid.

"I will give you a treat, Jacques," said Colin, "if you take this box and leave it at Mistress Manon's. And if any one should ask you whence it comes from, say a stranger gave it to you. But mention my name on no account, else I will never forgive you."

Jacques promised, took his treat-money and the box, and started straighway towards the cottage that lay among the olive trees and African Acacias.

V.—THE CARRIER.

Before he reached his destination, his master, Judge Hautmartin, met him in the way, and asked him what he was carrying under his arm?

"A box for Mistress Manon. But, sir, I cannot say from whom."

"Why not?"

"Because Master Colin will never forgive me."

"Is is very proper you should be silent then. But it is already late. I shall go in the morning early to Mistress Manon's and will take the box with me; of course saying nothing about its coming from Colin. You will be spared a walk, and I will be gratified."

Jacques gave the box to his master, whom he was accustomed always to obey without contradiction.—The Judge carried it to his chamber and scrutinized it with intense curiosity. On the top was delicately written with red chalk "To the lovely and beloved Mariette." Judge Hautmartin knew well, however, that this was only a ruse on Colin's part, and that some spiteful trick was at the bottom of it. He opened the box, therefore, very carefully to see whether some cat or mouse did not lay concealed within it. But as his eyes fell upon the very same beautiful pitcher which he had himself seen at Vence, his very heart beat with fright. For Judge Hautmartin was just as experienced a man in his judgment of the right as of the wrong, and knew well that the heart of man is evil from his youth up. He perceived immediately that Colin meant to bring some misfortune upon Marriette by means of the pitcher; perhaps to say it was the gift of some favored lover from the city, and thus alienate all of Mariette's friends. Judge Hautmartin concluded, therefore, to frustrate so wicked a design, and to proclaim himself the giver of the present. Besides, he was in love with Mariette, and much would he have rejoiced had Mariette been better inclined to follow, as far as he was concerned, Father Jerome's instruction "Little children, love one another." True, the Judge was a little child of fifty years, and Mariette was of opinion that the text had no application to him. But, on the other hand, Mother Manon discovered that he was a very sensible little child, rich and respected in all La Napoule, from one end of the village to the other. So that when the Judge spoke of marriage and Mariette ran away frightened, Mother Manon sat quite calm in the presence of the very respectable gentleman. He had a very good body of his own; and though Colin was the handsomest man in the village, yet there were two points in which the Judge excelled him—length of years and length of nose. Yes, his nose, which always preceded him like a satellite, to herald his approach, was a very snout among human noses.

Accompanied by this satellite, his good intentions, and the pitcher, the Judge went, on the following morning, to the cottage that lay among the olive trees and Acacias.

"Nothing is too expensive for the beautiful Mariette," said he. "You admired, when at Vence yesterday, this pitcher. Allow me to lay it, with my heart, at your feet."

At the sight of the pitcher, Mariette and Manon were delighted and astonished. Manon's eyes sparkled with joy. But in a moment, Mariette, turning to the Judge, said "I can neither accept your heart nor your pitcher."

Mother Manon became angry, and cried out—"But I accept both heart and pitcher. Oh, you foolish girl! how long will you despise your good fortune. What are you waiting for? Are you expecting the Count of Provence to make you his bride, that you thus reject the Judge of La Napoule? But I know better what is for your good. Judge Hautmartin, I reckon myself proud to accept you as my son-in-law."

Whereupon Mariette left the room weeping bitterly, and hated the beautiful pitcher from the bottom of her heart. But the Judge stroked his long nose and spoke the words of wisdom thus:

"Mother Manon, hurry nothing. The little dove will be better contended when it knows me better. I am not impetuous. I understand woman's heart, and before three months have passed, I shall steal into Mariette's."

"Your nose is quite too large for that," said Mariette to herself, as she stood listening outside of the door. In fact, three months did pass away, and Judge Hautmartin had not accomplished a step towards his success with Mariette.

VI.—FLOWERS.

For fourteen days long nothing was talked about in La Napoule but the pitcher. All agreed that the wedding with the Judge was a settled matter. And when Mariette solemnly declared she would rather give her body to the bottom of the sea than to the Judge, her companions only teased her the more, saying "Ah! how happy will you rest under the shadow of his nose!" This was the first trouble.

Then, cruel Mother Manon compelled Mariette to carry the pitcher every morning to the spring by the rock and fill it with fresh flowers; thereby hoping to reconcile Mariette to the pitcher and its giver. But she only hated gift and giver the more, and her duty at the spring was but a punishment. This was the second trouble.

Then, as she went to the spring, she found twice every week in the rock near by, the loveliest flowers, beautifully arranged for the adornment of the pitcher; accompanied with a slip of paper, whereon was written "Dear Mariette." Enchanters and fairies are no longers in the world; consequently the flowers and the soft message could be left by none other than Judge Hautmartin. So Mariette, though she kept the flowers for their beauty, would tear the paper into a thousand pieces and throw them upon the spot where the flowers were laid. But Judge Hautmartin could never be made angry, for his love was as incomparable in its kind as his nose. Trouble the third.

After a while, however, she discovered from the Judge's conversation, that he was not in reality the giver of the flowers. Who then could he be? Mariette was astounded at the discovery, and from that time forward received, with more pleasure, her present from the unknown stranger. Mariette had, what girls rarely have, much curiosity; so she made enquiries among her companions of the village; but none knew the mysterious giver of the flowers. She listened and watched early and late; but nothing could she hear or see. And regularly twice a week in the morning the flowers lay upon the rock, and regularly did she read with a sigh, from the paper which enveloped them, "Dear Mariette." Such a circumstance might well excite the curiosity of the most indifferent, but unsatisfied curiosity brings at last burning pain. Trouble the fourth.

VII.—MISCHIEF AFTER MISCHIEF.

On Sunday, Father Jerome once again preached a sermon on the text, "The providences of Heaven are wonderful;" and little Mariette thought to herself, "Perhaps, then, in the course of its providences, I shall discover the invisible giver of my flowers. Father Jerome is never wrong."

Very early one warm summer's morning, Mariette awaked from her slumber. Being unable to sleep again, she sprung from her bed at the first streak of dawn, and having dressed herself, ran down to the spring to bathe her face in its clear, cool waters. When this task was finished, she took a fancy into her head to walk upon the sea shore; but as she turned into the path behind the rock, which led to the sea, she saw under the young tender palms a graceful young man lying in sweet slumber, and near him a nosegay of the loveliest flowers. A slip of paper enveloped it, on which was written the oft-repeated sigh, "Dear Mariette."

"Dear Mariette" stood trembling with fright. She started to return homeward; but she took only a few steps, and then turned round again to gaze upon the sleeper. She had not been able to see his face. Now or never was the opportunity to solve a mystery. She crept gently back into the palms. But he appeared to move. She ran again towards the cottage. After all, the fancied motion was only the imagination of Mariette's fears. She returned again towards the palms. Perhaps his sleep was only a pretence. Again she ran homewards. But who would fly away for a perhaps merely! She returned boldly to the palms.

In this fluctuation between timidity and curiosity, in this hurrying to and fro between the cottage and the palm bushes, gradually Mariette approached nearer to the sleeper, and meanwhile curiosity began to triumph over timidity.

"What have I to do with him? My path leads me by where he is now lying, and I shall go on whether he sleeps or wakes."

So thought Manon's daughter—she resolved boldly to advance, but remained standing. She must have a peep at the flower-giver's face. Meantime, the unknown slept as though he had not rested soundly for four weeks. And who was it? Who could it be but the arch-villain Colin?

So he it was, whose irreconcileable enmity had brought the good girl into such trouble by means of the pitcher; had caused the disgusting affair with Judge Hautmartin; had teased her with secret gifts of flowers to excite her curiosity. And why? Because he hated Mariette. His conduct towards the poor child, in every society, was unpardonable. To all the other girls of La Napoule, he was more friendly and agreeable than to Mariette. Could it be believed, that he had never asked her to dance, and yet she danced more beautifully than any of her companions.

And there he lay, caught, betrayed. A spirit of revenge was aroused in Mariette's breast. What disgrace should she put upon him? She took the nosegay, and having unloosed the flowers, scattered them over the sleeper. But the paper on which the ejaculation "Dear Mariette" was written, she thrust into her bosom; intending to preserve this proof of his handwriting for future contingencies. Cunning Mariette! She now prepared to depart; but her revenge was not yet gratified. She could not leave the spot without repaying his wickedness. She tore the violet coloured ribbon from her bonnet, and having as gently as possible fastened one end to the sleeper's arm, tied the other in three hard knots to a palm tree near by. Wicked Mariette! How would he be astonished when he awaked; how would he be tortured with curiosity to know who played such a trick upon him! He could never guess. So much the better. It served him right.

After all, Mariette seemed quite too merciful.—When she had finished her work, she seemed to repent of it. Her bosom heaved with agitation. I believe even a few tears found their way into her eyes, as she gazed in feverish compassion upon the malefactor. Slowly, frequently turning round to gaze back into the palms, she left the spot and returned home.

VIII.—THE BONNET RIBBON.

On the very same day, Colin practised fresh rascality. He would publicly disgrace Mariette. Ah! she had never reflected that her violet colored ribbon was known in all La Napoule. But Colin knew it only too well! He tied it proudly to his hat, and wore it before all the world, as though it were the pledge of success. And the world of La Napoule said, "He got it from Mariette:" and all the girls cried angrily, "rascal;" and all the lovers of Mariette cried "rascal."

"How is this, Mother Manon?" said Judge Hautmartin, and he screached so loud, that the echo reverberated throughout every chamber of his nose; "do you allow this! my bride give her bonnet-ribbon a present to the young farmer Colin? It is quite time our wedding were over. When that happens, I shall have a right to speak in the matter."

"You're right enough," replied Mother Manon; "if matters have come to this pass, the wedding must not be postponed. When that is over, all is over."

"But Mother Manon, your daughter still refuses me her consent."

"Only do you get ready for the wedding."

"But she will not even look at me, and if I ever attempt to place myself near her, the wild creature immediately flies away."

"Judge, do you only get ready for the wedding."

"But if Mariette resists?"

"We will over-reach her. We will go to Father Jerome, and early on Monday morning, the wedding shall take place in private. We can easily arrange the matter with the priest; for I am the mother, and you are the first officer of justice in La Napoule, and she must obey. Yet Mariette need know nothing about it. Early on Monday morning, I shall send her to Father Jerome's on pretence of a message.—The priest will address her upon the duty of obedience. A half hour afterwards we two will arrive. Then, directly to the altar. And if Mariette cries "no;" what matters? The old man cannot hear a word. But say you nothing of this to a soul."

The matter was arranged. Mariette dreamed not of the good fortune which was in store for her. She thought only of Colin's wickedness which had made her the conversation of the whole village. How did she repent of her folly in thus exposing herself to ridicule; and yet, in her heart she forgave the rascal his guilt. Mariette was entirely too good. She said to her mother and to all her companions, "Colin has found my ribbon, I never gave it to him. And now he will use it to injure me. You all know that he has always taken every opportunity to show his dislike of me."

Ah! the poor child! she knew not what new mischief the wicked man was planning in his heart.

IX.—THE BROKEN PITCHER.

Early next day, Mariette went to the spring with the pitcher. Yet no flowers lay upon the rock. Perhaps it was too early, for the sun had scarcely risen above the sea.

She heard steps; and Colin with the flowers in his hand, stood before her. Mariette's face was read blood. Colin stammered, "Good morning, Marie But the greeting came not truly from his heart; he could scarcely bring it to pass his lips.

"Why do you wear my ribbon so openly, Colin?" said Mariette, as she set the pitcher upon the rock. "I never gave it to you."

"You never gave it to me, dear Mariette!" said he, and he grew pale with suppressed rage.

Mariette repented of her deceit, and casting down her eyes, said, after a pause, "Well! I did give it to you; but you should not wear it for a show. Give it back to me."

Slowly he unfastened it. His anger was so great that he was unable to strifle his sighs and tears.

"Dear Mariette," said he, gently, "give me the ribbon."

"No," she answered.

His secret rage now became desperate. Now he sighed and looked heavenward; now gazed sadly on Mariette, who stood quiet and innocent by the spring, her eyes downcast to the earth.

He wound the violet-colored ribbon round the flowers: "Take all together," said he; and threw them so mischieviously towards the beautiful pitcher, that it was upset, and broken to pieces. Having thus satisfied his malice, he ran away.

Mother Manon, meanwhile, had been listening from the window of the cottage, and had heard and seen all. But as she saw the fate of the pitcher, her sight and hearing deserted her. She could hardly even speak for anger. And to crown all, as she pushed open the window-shutter, to scream after the rascal, she tore it from its rotten hinges, and it fell with a great crash to the ground.

Such a complication of misfortunes had quite upset the brain of any other woman; but Mother Manon soon collected herself. "How lucky that I was a witness to the act," said she. "He shall answer for this before the Judge; and weigh out his solid gold, to pay for my pitcher and window-shutter. It will be a pretty present for Mariette on her wedding day." When, however, Mariette picked up the pieces of the ruined pitcher—and Manon saw Paradise destroyed, good Adam without a head, and Eve with nothing remaining but her legs—the snake triumphing uninjured—the lion, too, unhurt, but the lamb abridged to its tail, as though all the rest had been swallowed by the lion—as she saw all this, Mother Manon broke out in howling invectives against Colin, as a very child of the evil one.

X.—THE JUDGMENT.

With the pitcher in one hand, and Mariette in the other, Mother Manon proceeded, about the ninth hour, to the place where Judge Hautmartin was accustomed to sit in judgment. She set forth her complaint at the top of her voice, showing as evidences the broken pitcher and the lost Paradise. Mariette wept bitterly.

As the Judge saw the pitcher broken and Mariette all in tears, his just rage against Colin was excited to such a degree, that his nose turned as violet as Mariette's noted ribbon; and he commanded his constable to bring the delinquent before him immediately.

Colin came, bearing himself very sadly. Mother Manon repeated her complaint, with great eloquence, before Judge, Constables, and Clerks. But Colin heard nothing. He stepped to the side of Mariette, and whispered in her ear—

"Forgive me, dear Mariette, as I forgive you.—Your pitcher, only, have I broken, and that by accident; but you—you have broken my heart."

"What means that whispering there," cried his judicial highness, Hautmartin. "Listen to the complaint which is made against you, and defend yourself."

"I have no defence to make," said Colin. "I broke the pitcher, but unwillingly."

"I believe he speaks the truth," said Mariette, sobbing. "I am as much to blame as he, for I had offended him and made him angry, and without due care he threw me the ribbon and flowers. He is not responsible for it."

"Tut!" cried Mother Manon, "will the girl become his advocate? Decide, Judge. He has broken the pitcher—that he does not deny, and I, through his fault, the window-shutter—will he, can he deny that?"

"As you make no defence, Master Colin," said the Judge, "I order you to pay three hundred livres for the pitcher, for that is its value; and for the——"

"No!" said Colin, "it is not worth so much—for I myself bought it for Mariette, at the fair at Vence, for a hundred livres."

"You bought it, you shameless impudent!" shrieked the Judge, his whole face becoming like Mariette's bonnet ribbon. He neither could nor would say more, for he feared to create any further discussion of the matter.

But his reproach had excited Colin's anger, and he continued:

"I sent the pitcher to Mariette on the evening of the fair, by the hands of your own servant. There stands Jacques at the door. Let him be my witness. Jacques, say: did I not give you the box to take to Mother Manon's?"

The Judge attempted to avert the blow, but the simple Jacques said—

"Recollect, Judge, you yourself took the box away from me, and carried what was in it to Mother Manon's. There it lies now among the papers in the corner."

Of course, simple Jacques was speedily ejected from the room by the constables; and the judge signified to Colin that he might depart and wait till he was called for again.

"Very well, Mr. Judge," observed Colin; "but this shall be the last exercise of your authority in La Napoule. I know full well that you would have ingratiated yourself into Mistress Manon's and Mariette's favor by this disgraceful use of my property. If you want me again you will do well to ride over to Grasse, and you will find me at the Lord Lieutenant's." So saying, he departed.

Judge Hautmartin's perplexity and confusion almost turned his brain. Mistress Manon shook her head. The whole affair looked dark and suspicious.

"Who will now pay for the broken pitcher?" she asked.

"As for me," said Mariette, her face suffused in blushes, and her eyes beaming with delight, "I am already repaid."

XI.—WONDERFUL PROVIDENCES.

The same day Colin went to the Lord Lieutenant's at Grasse, returning to La Napoule early next morning. Judge Hautmartin, meanwhile, smiled maliciously, and quieted all Mother Manon's fears by swearing that he would agree to cut off his nose if Colin did not pay up the three hundred livres.

Mistress Manon spoke to Father Jerome about the wedding; and gave him particular instructions to impress upon Mariette's mind the necessity of obedience to the will of her mother. The good old gentleman, although he heard not the half of what was screamed in his ear, promised faithfully to do so.

When the Monday morning came, Mother Manon said to her daughter, "Dress yourself prettily, Mariette, and take this wreath of myrtles to Father Jerome; he wants it for a bride."

Mariette arrayed herself in her Sunday's best, took the wreath without suspicion, and wended her way towards the priest's.

On the way, she was met by Colin, who greeted her kindly and modestly—and when he heard whither she was carrying the wreath, intimated that he was going the same way, as he had to pay Father Jerome his church tithes. As they went along together, he gently seized her hand, whereupon both trembled as though they meditated some monstrous crime against each other.

"Have you forgiven me?" whispered Colin, sorrowfully. Ah! Mariette, what have I done that you should treat me so cruelly?"

She could reply nothing but, "Be not distressed, Colin—you shall have the ribbon again, and I shall keep your pitcher. Did you really give it to me?"

"Ah, Mariette! can you doubt it? Every thing that I have would I gladly give you. Will you not, in future, treat me kindly, as others do?"

She answered not. Only as they entered the priest's house, and looooking up she saw his beautiful eyes in tears, she whispered to him, "Dear Colin;" whereupon dear Colin stooped and kissed her hand. Here the door of an apartment opened, and the priest, dressed in his robes, stood before them. The young people, as if seized with dizziness, clung affectionately to each other; but I know not whether it was the effect of the kissing, or arose from awe in the presence of the venerable father.

Mariette handed him the myrtle wreath. He placed it upon her head, and commencing with the text, "Little children do you love one another?" impressed upon her in the most eloquent and touching manner the necessity of loving Colin. For the old man, through his hardness of hearing, had not heard the bridegroom's name, or else Mother Manon had forgotton to mention it.

Mariette's heart gave way under the eloquence of the old man, and weeping and sobbing, she cried, "Ah! I have long loved him but he hates me."

"I hate you, Mariette!" said Colin. "Since you came to La Napoule, I have loved you alone. Oh, Mariette! how could I hope that you loved me, when all La Napoule was at your feet?"

"Why did you avoid me, Colin, and prefer all my companions?"

"Oh, Mariette! whenever I saw you I was overcome with fear and trembling, sorrow and love. I had not the courage to approach you when you were near, and yet when you were absent I was still more unhappy."

While this conversation was going on, the old man supposed they were quarreling; so joining their hands together, he said again, "Little children, love ye one another?"

Here Mariette sank on Colin's breast, while Colin threw his arms around her, and their countenances beamed with joy. They forgot the priest, the whole world. Colin pressed his lips on Mariette's. Distracted in mind they unconsciously followed Father Jerome into the church.

"Mariette?" sighed he.

"Colin?" sighed she.

There were several worshippers in the church.—They witnessed with astonishment the marriage of Colin and Mariette. Many ran out even before the ceremony was concluded to spread the news in La Napoule.

When all was over, Father Jerome, rejoicing that he had so well succeeded in his persuasions, led the bride and bridegroom into his house.

END OF THIS REMARKABLE HISTORY.

Manon came running in out of breath. She had long waited at home for the appearance of the bridegroom, but he had not arrived. Out of patience, she had at last gone to Judge Hautmartin's. Here terrible news was in store for her. The Lord Lieutenant had arrived on a commission of inquiry into the conduct of the Judge, who had been arrested and thrown into prison.

"That rascally Colin is surely at the bottom of this," she thought; and ran hastily to the priest's house to explain the cause of the postponement of the wedding. The priest stepped forward proudly to meet her, with the bride and bridegroom at his side.

But when the true state of the case dawned upon Mother Manon, she was deprived of mind and tongue. But Colin's mind and tongue seemed all the more powerful. He spoke eloquently of his love, of the broken pitcher, of Judge Hautmartin's treachery, the reasons of his having been brought to justice, and finally asked Mother Manon's blessing.

Father Jerome, when after a considerable time he was made to understand the nature of the case, folded his hands together piously, and consoled himself by repeating, with uplifted eyes, "The Providences of Heaven are wonderful." Colin and Mariette kissed his hands; and Mother Manon, out of sheer respect for the Providences of Heaven, gave the young pair her blessing—remarking at the same time, that she hardly knew whether she was standing on her head or her heels.

"And am I really a wife?" asked Mariette; "and really Colin's wife?"

Mother Manon nodded her head, and Mariette, leaning on Colin's arm, departed for his dwelling.

"See here, Mariette," said Colin, as they passed through the garden; "see the flowers which I cultivated so carefully for your pitcher."

Colin, who had not dreamed of so happy an ending to his unhappy love, invited all the neighborhood to a great feast at his house. It lasted two days. Who could describe Colin's joy and the splendor of the entertainment? Even Mother Manon rejoiced in her son-in-law, as she now first became fully aware of his wealth, and particularly as Judge Hautmartin, in company with his nose, lay imprisoned in Grasse.

To this day, the BROKEN PITCHER remains in the family, and is respected as a sacred relic.

THE BENEVOLENT RUSTIC.*

BY MRS. EDWARD THOMAS.

I have no stain upon my mind—
Upon my name no ban—
I am the happiest of my kind,
A calm contented man.

I envy not the rich and great,
But pity much the poor;
And never penury doth wait
Unheeded at my door.

Mean my repasts, but very sweet,
Enjoy'd with grateful zest;
While, O! my bed is a retreat
Which sleep would choose for rest.

The soaring lark springs not more blithe
To hail Apollo's rays,
Than I, with limb and sinew lithe,
Arise, for work and praise.

To labor on till set of sun,
Unwearied even then;
Yes, when my daily task is done,
I can aid weaker men.

What more could gold bestow on me?
Or empty-sounding names?
Temptation to iniquity,
And thousand blushing shames?

I've not a want—I've even more
Than asks necessity,
And often from my garner'd store
A prodigal can be.

When the pale widow only looks
The need she cannot speak,
While tears, like gushing water-brooks,
Course down her hollow cheek;

Or, when the grief-snubb'd orphan-boy,
In sobbing anguish'd tone,
(At that sweet winsome age when joy
Should thrill his heart alone,)

Tells how his mother and himself
Nor food nor firing have,
I load the pretty wond'ring elf
With more than he doth crave.

If thou would'st know a bliss indeed,
Oh! mark the glad surprise
(When Charity assists its need)
Illumine Famine's eyes!

Though thus I give her handsel free
To all within my ken,
I ever feel most signally
I am blest among men.

My little garden-plot ne'er fails,
My corn-swath still is doubled,
And, then, my body never ails,
My soul is never troubled.

It is but LENDING to the Lord
What to the poor is GIVEN;
On earth what Pity can afford
Bears INTEREST in heaven!

THE PAINTER'S WIFE;

OR,

LEGAL REVELATIONS.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "STORIES OF WATERLOO."

To man, woman is ever an object of deep interest, and circumstances enhance it. The noontide of brilliant beauty arrests the fancy—but its sunset, when clouded by sickness or by sorrow, touches the best feelings of nature, and strikes directly to the heart. I have ridden unmoved across a battle-field—death had been busy there—"the horse and his rider had fallen"—and heaps of human carrion, utterly denuded by the wretches who hang upon the footsteps of an army, exposed to nightly dews and ardent suns, had become offensive equally to sight and smell.—The green tint which announces putrescency, the swollen proportions of forms, three days before admirable for their symmetry—the tainted air—the brutal vultures, gorged but dissatisfied, and flagging lazily away, but only far enough to let the column pass—the ribald jests of ruffian soldiers—and of that foulest thing—savage woman—at these, all combined, the lip curled in disgust, but they evoked no softer sympathies.

* * * Years passed, and with an invalid relation I visited an English watering-place. There were others there in search of health; and one, from the hour when I saw her, excited a peculiar interest.

Harriette Beresford was not yet nineteen. The flower was faded—but in health how beautiful it must have been! I loved her—not with the love man gives the living, but—the dead.

"The autumn leaf will wither on her grave," said the doctor, in answer to my hurried inquiry, as he left the chamber of his patient, and hastened from an examination which confirmed his worst fears, and told him that hope was over.

"And yet she looked so much better last evening. The rose coloured her pale cheek, and—"

"Hectic, sir," was the reply. "Mere gilding on the sepulchre. A consumption—and one more deadly and more rapid I have never witnessed during a long practice of thirty years. One brief month, and—"

He did not finish the sentence—there was no occasion—I understood the rest too well.

Harriette that day did not join the dinner party—but when I retired to the drawing-room I found her on the sofa, and her mother seated beside her with her daughter's hand embraced in her's.

"Captain, does not Harriette look so much better?" and the smile of hope accompanied the question.

She was indeed perfectly beautiful; the eye was singularly brilliant, and the cheek tinted with the very flush of loveliness. I sat down beside her, and took her hand in mine. In man's attentions to a woman, there can be little mystery, and her mother read mine correctly—deep, anxious, ardent sympathy—without one particle of earthly love. Harriette turned her soft and sparkling eye on mine.

"Captain," she said, "I will repay your delicious grapes and your sweet bouquet. You shall be my first partner at my first ball; and in a month, I will claim the promise of your arm, and walk with you daily on the heath."

A shudder crept over me. I recollected the doctor's prognostic in the morning. A month!—her partner would be the worm. She would cross the heath, not on my arm, but in a coffin. I became agitated, and fortunately the roll of a carriage gave an excuse for rising abruptly from the sofa.

"Oh! some fresh arrival." I sprang up and hurried to the window. It was a hearse with white plumes, and a dozen idle scoundrels seated on the top, smoking cigars, and driving at a long trot home, after what they call, in undertakers' slang, "performing a funeral." In one short month that carriage bore the sweet and patient sufferer "to that bourne from which no traveller returns."

* * * * *

"But, my dear captain, what has all this to do with the sub-sheriff and the pretty girl?"

Gentle reader! be patient—or if you will hurry other people's cattle, I will stop short in my narrative, and leave you miserable for life.

"Well, astore!" said Mr. Egan, "whether is myself or the captain here, the gentleman you seem to have some business with!"

"You—you," was the hurried reply.

"And what do you want with me?"

"To save me from despair," she replied, clasping her hands together in an agony of distress. "Yonder horrid men are waiting to arrest my poor, broken-hearted husband. Oh! as you hope for mercy hereafter, save Henry from a gaol!"

"The request is easy made," returned Shawn Cruchadore; "but it's rather a hard job to keep some gentlemen out of one."

The entreaty of the girl caused me to look round at the persons she had alluded to. One was a man far advanced in years, who had the appearance of a hedge schoolmaster, or priest's clerk. The expression of his face was sly and quiet, submissive and passionless—indicating a disposition that neither praise nor abuse could rouse. He wore a dingy black coat, and a brownish wig, which was so dried and furzy, that if constructed of human hair, which seemed doubtful, it must have passed the winter in a baker's oven.—He had the stump of a pen stuck behind his ear, and a hat above it, that looked as if it had been erstwhile the property of a quaker. His companion was a young man—and look, air, and manner bespoke him a thorough-bred blackguard.

"Who are these fellows?" I enquired.

"Two gentlemen, at present on my establishment," returned Mr. Egan.

"The old one looks a cunning knave—the young one a superlative scoundrel."

"'Pon my conscience! you have hit their characters to a T. Ned's beautiful at the book. He's the best hand at an alibi in Connaught; he'll swear that the night before he was in company with a man who, at the same time, were snug and warm in Jamaica."

"The younger gentleman—is he equally accomplished?"

"Quite a different line of business his. He's no use at the primer, for nobody would believe him upon oath. But then he has other good qualities which make him invaluable. He'll serve a writ when another dare not venture within musket-shot of the premises. It was Patsey that brought mad Burke to the hammer. Not a writ could be served, good nor bad; they were all desperadoes at Kinsallagh—the master never stirred an inch without a brace of pistols, nor the men without a pitch-fork in their fists; and the only choice a bailiff had, was between an ounce of lead and six inches of cold iron. Well, what did Patsey do? Pretends he was going across the mountain to buy Connemara stockings, and asked liberty to step in and take a coal for his pipe out of the kitchen fire."

"'Ye have no paper about ye?' says one fellow, suspiciously, coming up with his pitch-fork in his hand, and followed by another scoundrel with a flail.

"'Arrah! the deuce a scrap,' says he 'only this wee bit to light the dhu deeine with."

"So he takes the copy of the writ out of his pocket, and lights the tobacco with it. Well, after he drew the pipe awhile, not to show that he was in any hurry, up he gets, puts on his hat fair and easy, bade—'God bless all there, barrin the cat,' and left the house unsuspected. In a month or two, down comes the execution—and you may guess Mr. Burke's astonishment, when, one morning, with twenty police and half-a-score of drivers, I cleared out cloot and horn, not leaving behind as much as would supply milk for the tea-pot."

"What a scoundrel—a deliberate perjurer!"

"Not at all," said Mr. Egan. "Didn't he leave the writ in the house, or the ashes of it—and that's all as one."

"I'm afraid I can't agree to your theory of serving writs. I suppose the scoundrels are well rewarded for their infamous executions?"

"At times they do get a trifle to encourage them—but it's a slavish life—one day half murdered by the women, and the next whole murdered by the men. Dragged through a bog-hole here—flung out of a window there—besides tossing in a blanket, and eating the original—"

"Stop, for Heaven's sake! Eating the original—what's that?"

"And you don't know the difference between an original and the copy?" and he crossed himself piously. "Och! murder! how your education has been neglected," ejaculated Shawn Cruchadore—"or Ca, sa, from a Fi, fa."

"As much as I know which is the most fashionable hotel in Timbuctoo."

"You're not too old to learn," said the sub-sheriff.

"I fear I am."

"Not if you take the short process that I'll recommend you."

"I am all attention," I replied.

"Have you a book? as the turf people call it."

"No."

"Make one immediately."

I shook my head.

"Do you?" and Mr. Egan described, by a movement of his wrist and elbow, the shaking of a dice-box.

"I never tumble the ivory by any chance," was the reply.

"They'll give you instructions in any club-house—and, if you wish to hurry matters, set up shop, and take an opera girl for your housekeeper. In a couple of years, I'll engage under any penalty you name that you shall understand the difference between a 'green one' and a 'knowing one' as well as if you had served five years to an attorney."

"But have you no qualms of conscience, Mr. Egan? That old sinner is hurrying to the grave, and the young scoundrel preparing for the gallows."

"Troth, I agree with you in opinion, that if Patsey hasn't the best of luck he's likely to spoil a market."

"Spoil a market!" I exclaimed; "what do you mean?"

"Why, in the good old times, when a man was to be hanged, the judge always fixed a market day for the execution. If the people had anything to buy or sell they could do it, and have a little pleasure into the bargain—it was a mixture of business and innocent amusement. I have strapped up eleven men at one assizes, and never reckoned the hanging money then under a hundred a year."

"That branch of your business is not so lucrative at present," I remarked.

"Pish!" said the sub-sheriff, contemptuously, "it's not worth a ten pound note. A burglary and two murders in a twelvemonth! Arrah! my dear captain, what's that to pay rent and taxes with?".

"But could you not carry on business without the assistance of those brace of scoundrels?" I inquired.

"Impossible," returned Shawn Cruchadore. "We are liable now and then to make a bit of a mistake—a wrong caption or an illegal distraint,—grip one Jack Blake instead of another, or drive Shemus More instead of *Shemus Beg—and nothing gets us out of trouble like a smart affidavit."

"And that is done by the old villain in the wig," I said, inquiringly.

"And in that very wig lies Ned's respectability."

"To estimate the value of one by the other, I should hold both very cheap," I observed.

"Indeed," said Shawn Cruchadore, "I admit the wig is not constructed upon mechanical principles, and, like an ill-fated saddle, it's always shifting forward. I'll recommend Ned to put a crupper to it, as an improvement."

"You admit, however, that the old gentleman is pretty certain of a warm corner, you know where—and that the younger scoundrel will be hanged?"

"I think not," returned Mr. Egan. "Patsey Lynch has an antipathy to the rope, and he'll hardly venture on anything beyond fourteen years' transportation. Indeed, only his friend in the wig there swore as pretty an alibi for him last assizes as ever was heard in court, Patsey would be able now to tell you how sea air agreed with his constitution. It would be a pity, too. He's an industrious devil in his way, and sooner than be idle he would transport his own brother for half a crown."

"Good Heavens!" muttered a feeble voice, "and is my unfortunate husband in the power of such a wretch?"

While Shawn Cruchadore has been detailing the respective merits of his aids-de-camp, I had been examining with attention the countenance and figure of the poor supplicant beside us, and both were so favorable, that before I knew aught of her story or her sorrows, my feelings were warmly engaged. She was young—probably two-and-twenty—and pale and faded as her features were, you still might trace beauty in their ruin. No color was in the lip—no brightness in the eye—but the mouth small and pretty, and the eyes soft and expressive. The attenuated outline of her person still showed enough to prove that once it had been of excellent proportions—and she had a profusion of that classic hair, whose hue "in olden time" was termed by poets "paly gold." To give to her distress additional interest, there were matronly appearances incident to married life, which, to use Scott's words, announced that "she now required from man a double care."

As Mr. Egan descanted on the merits of his staff, the color faded from her cheeks, and convulsive witchings agitated her pallid face, until startled by the broken observation, Mr. Egan turned around, and exclaimed, "Mona-sindiaoul! captain, the poor girl's fainting!"

Fainting she was. She reeled a step forward and would have fallen, had I not sprang forward and caught her in my arms. A public house was immediately beside us, and there we conveyed her, half carried and half supported. In the little parlour we placed her on a settle; water and wine were administered, and in a few minutes she had perfectly recovered. During this short scene, I was struck with the warm solicitude that Mr. Egan exhibited, and I began to suspect he was one of those personages—and they are not rare in society—who affect indifference to the sufferings of others which in reality they do not feel, and, under an assumed insensibility to human sorrow, conceal from public view a heart teeming with benevolence.

I was not wrong in my suspicions, and a more extended knowledge of Shawn Cruchadore proved, they say in Ireland, that "his heart was in the right place."

While I was still offering the invalid my assistance as she recovered, Mr. Egan had stepped out. He returned presently with a paper in his hand, and turning to me he observed—

"It's only a decree for five pounds. Don't be uneasy," he continued, addressing the poor stranger. "Let your husband keep out of my way, and I'll not send to look for him—and *tiggum thu!—the sooner he's out of my bailiwick the better."

"Alas!" said the poor girl, comprehending Mr. Egan's intimation that it would be necessary to quit the county, "we have not the means to travel.—Henry set out early this morning to finish a miniature for a lady in the neighbourhood. He will get a guinea for it, and—" she sighed heavily, "we postponed breakfast till he came back. I heard by accident that he would be arrested, and—"

"Oh, d—n arrests!" exclaimed the sub-sheriff, jumping up. "Poor soul! fasting at one o'clock;" and in English and Irish he called hastily for breakfast.

Tea was speedily brought in, and I suggested that we should leave the stranger to herself, and take a turn or two in the public walk. Mr. Egan assented—rose—went to the window—fumbled with some papers he took from his pocket—took out what by a side look I saw was a bank note—crossed to the table, threw an under glance towards me to see that he was not observed, and then, as if he were slipping a billet-doux to a ward of Chancery, he threw the crumpled note across the table, and hurried away like a man who had abstracted one of the silver spoons.

In a quarter of an hour we returned. The assurance that her husband was safe from arrest, and a comfortable breakfast, had in a great degree restored the poor unknown; and, with great modesty, but in the language of a gentlewoman, she returned thanks for our attention—and a hint from Mr. Egan, whose curiosity had been powerfully excited, produced the following disclosure. It was occasionally discursive, or interrupted with bursts of agony, as the happiness of the past was placed in painful contrast with the misery of the present. The narrative ran thus:

"I am the only child of a baronet. The family ancient, the estates small. My father had an only brother; he had made a fortune in the Indies, and, strange coincidence, he too had an only son. From infancy our parents had betrothed us, and from our earliest years, we were informed that we were destined for each other. I have no remembrance of my mother; she died soon after my birth, and I was brought up in total seclusion, for my father is a man of gloomy and retiring habits. My education was strictly private, and at eighteen I had never been seven miles from Lewisham Abbey. My cousin, and intended husband, was plain and very delicate, and younger than myself by a year. An intimacy between us was encouraged; but I sincerely believe that our feelings towards each other were reciprocated, and that each was thoroughly indifferent to the other.

"With the exception of the clergyman's family, my uncle, and my destined husband, the abbey received no visitors. The advances of the neighbouring gentry were politely repelled. I mixed not in society—knew nothing of the world—and at eighteen years of age, had never slept beneath a roof except that under which I had been born.

"Circumstances, prospectively connected with my cousin starting for the county, changed suddenly my course of life. A few of the neighbouring families were invited to our house, and were visited by us in return. With much reluctance my father yielded to the solicitations of a lady resident within a few miles, and permitted me, under her surveillance, to attend the county ball.

"That was the fatal epoch of my life in poverty and suffering—and yet, were the deed to be done again, my heart tells me I would do it.

"It was an ordinary county ball, but to me it seemed the most brilliant fete imaginable. The gentry for miles around had collected: and as the town was the head-quarters of a cavalry regiment, their officers and band were present. One—a young lieutenant—was particularly attentive to me. He danced with me, sat beside me at supper, conducted me to the carriage, and, in a word, made a first impression on a heart, that hitherto had never seen nor fancied the object it might love.

"He strove to gain an introduction to my father, but that was peremptorily refused; and from my cousin's report—who had witnessed the attentions of the young dragoon—my father again retired into seclusion, and barred his doors against the world anew.

"One morning I was called down to his study unexpectedly, and there found him engaged in a conversation with a stranger.

"'My dear Caroline,' said my father, 'this young man is an artist, and he has persuaded me to have a likeness taken; I shall also have a miniature of you. He says he can execute both in a few sittings—and he shall commence with you.'

"I bowed an assent to my father, and for the first time turned my eyes to the window where the artist was standing. He turned his face suddenly—and, heavens! in the painter I recognised my admirer at the county ball—the young dragoon!

"I felt the blood rush to my very brow—my limbs trembled—and my agitation could not have escaped my father's observation, had not a servant at the moment called him from the apartment.

"The door had scarcely closed until my lover was kneeling at my feet, with my hand clasped in his, imploring pardon for the deceit he had practised—and his excuse was hopeless love. His natural taste for painting was fine, and it had been cultivated. He had brought with him all that was necessary to support the imposture—my father had no suspicions—and the artist remained in the house. I, ignorant as an infant of the world, listened, loved, and consented to a fugitive marriage; and on the fifth night we eloped, reached the Scottish border, and were married at the bridge of Coldstream.

"A few short weeks of happiness were followed by three long years of misery. Henry had only obtained leave between returns, when he madly eloped, violated military rules, and with difficulty was permitted to sell his commission. His guardian had robbed him—and the £1000 his commission had produced, was all on which we could place dependence. I wrote to my father—the letter was returned with an unbroken seal. Again, and again, I appealed to him for pardon. Through the clergyman, at last my letters reached him, but he was obdurate—every thing, clothes, trinkets, even my childhood's toys, were transmitted to me—and that with a minute precision which seemed to bespeak an anxiety that no souvenir should be left behind to remind him of his unfortunate daughter, and to recall to memory that hapless being whom he had once loved so well, and had now torn from his heart."

She paused, and wept bitterly. I had not listened unmoved, and Mr. Egan's glistening eye showed, that his boasted insensibility was not proof against the softening influence of woman's tears.

"Arrah! bad luck attend him, the ould Turk!" ejaculated Shawn Cruchadore—"couldn't he make allowance for poor creatures that had neither sense nor discretion. Troth, the same lad, tho' he is your father, will get an air of the fire in a warmer corner than ever his own kitchen had."

"Henry indulged in no expensive pleasures or pursuits, but he was careless in the management of his limited resources, and I knew no more the use of money than a child. Gradually, our small dependence dwindled away—at last, not a shilling remained undrawn at the banker's. My husband kept the sad secret to himself, and by disposing, one after another, of every saleable article, the means of support were, for a time, obtained. The birth of a child added to our expenses—the abject poverty to which we were reduced could be concealed no longer—every trinket in my possession disappeared—my baby died—I was driven to despair, and my poor husband's state of mind was bordering upon madness. In this state of utter destitution, it occurred to us that our talents might be turned to advantage. In drawing, Henry excelled—and I am really a good musician. Without friends or introduction, I could obtain no pupils; and all that he could earn, merely prevented us from perishing from starvation."

The door flew open suddenly, and a young man rushed into the apartment, and caught the pale girl in his arms. There was no difficulty in recognising the portrait-painter in the wan and melancholy stranger. Want and sorrow marked his despairing countenance, and the threadbare remains of what had been once a fashionable costume, evidenced the poverty of the wearer.

"Are you better, dear, dear Caroline—cheer up—see—I have brought you two pounds. They were hardly earned. I did not tell you, love, but I had many a weary mile to walk—and a heavy heart makes a long road, they say."

"Poor Henry!" she said, patting his pale cheek, "I am now quite well, thanks to these kind strangers."

For the first time the painter looked round, and when his eye fell on the portly proportions of Shawn Cruchadore, the hectic flush died on his cheek, and he muttered,

"Ruined!—ruined! It is the sheriff!"

"Arrah! avournesine! the devil a harm the said sheriff will do you," returned Mr. Egan, drily.

"No, no, Henry—so far from injury he forced—"

And she exhibited the one pound note which Shawn Cruchadore, as he supposed, had conveyed to her so cunningly.

"Good God!" exclaimed the painter. "I am grateful to you, sir. Alas! I never thought at one time, that the only daughter of Sir Philip Lewisham—"

"The daughter of who?" demanded Mr. Egan, hurriedly.

The painter repeated the name.

"Mona sindisoul! Isn't this quare?" continued the sheriff. "This morning I found a Times newspaper in the post-office—devil's luck to the lad that sent it to me! I opened it, and what do you think I saw? There was a long paragraph about a fellow who was badly hanged—and to call my attention to it particularly, there was a pen and ink sketch of myself drawn on the margin, with a writ in one hand and a halter in the other. Musha! bad luck to him that drew it, every day he sees a paving-stone, and every day he doesn't! Do you know Frederick Lewisham?"

"My cousin!" replied the painter's wife. "What of him?"

"He's dead, that's all," replied Mr. Egan.

"Dead! Impossible!"

"They have taken the liberty of burying him at all events," continued the sheriff. "At the end of the halter the scoundrel has stuck into my fist, you'll see the account of the way he broke his neck."

With a trembling hand the painter took the paper.

"You'll see it with my flattering portrait," observed Mr. Egan, "at the bottom of the other page."

The painter's eyes remained fixed, however, as if under the power of fascination, on an advertisement which topped the newspaper.

"I can not—dare not—credit the evidence even of my own senses. Pray, sir, read that notice," he said, with evident agitation.

I obeyed the wish expressed.

"If this should meet the eye of C. M. S., or that of the gentleman to whom she was married at Coldstream, on Tuesday, the 27th of October, 184—, they are earnestly requested to write to the father of the lady, and are hereby assured that the past is forgiven and forgotten.

"Any draft on Messrs. Mosley, Dixon & Wright, Furnival's Inn, London, will be duly honored."

A second time the wanderers were locked in each other's arms.

"Henry," murmured the pale girl, as she sobbed convulsively on the bosom of her husband, "the love which stood the stern test of poverty and sorrow, as our's has done, will now render unhoped prosperity doubly sweet. Come, love! we will re-occupy our humble lodging for a few days longer."

"Arrah! the devil a foot you'll put in the same, but to remove your traps—and I suppose it won't require a horse and cart to carry off your goods and chattels," said Mr. Egan.

"What, sir—am I, then, to consider myself a prisoner?" inquired the painter.

"Why that depends upon yourself," returned Shawn Cruchadore; "you have two choices—my house or the county goal."

"Let me understand you, sir."

"I'll try and do so," replied Mr. Egan. "That sketch I got by post this morning is not a flattering one, and I have taken a sort of fancy to have my countenance transferred decently to canvass. I would rather be painted plain, with neither rope nor writ in the picture; but if I must have something in my fist, let it be something gentlemanly and christian-like—I'll not object to a tumbler of punch or a pack of cards—but for the love of God! leave out both hemp and parchment."

* * * * * *

Two months passed, and I read in the Gazette that Henry Arthur Staunton, formerly of the —th light dragoons, had obtained the royal assent, "to assume the name and bear the arms of Lewisham."

Another moon waned—and the Times announced the safe accouchment of "the lady of H. A. Lewisham, of Lewisham Abbey, of a son and heir."

THE RECLAIMED WIFE.

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

Marianna Worthington had long reigned the belle of her circle. From the moment she had quitted her boarding-school, an accomplished and beautiful girl of seventeen, she had been besieged by admirers and suitors without number. Yet at twenty-three she had made no choice. Time had only unfolded in her new beauties of person, and new graces of mind; and at twenty-three, with all the ripe charms of womanhood, her admirers were not diminished. Do you ask why she so long remained callous to their prayers? Perhaps the answer can be best gathered from her own reflections, as she reclined upon a rich lounge, in her pleasant boudoir, one warm afternoon in the spring of 1830. She was habited in a single loose robe of white, and her position of careless ease developed, to good advantage, the outline of a most exquisitely moulded form, and displayed a finely turned foot and ankle, which, with the little satin slipper, seemed barely escaped from the folds of the robe. The dress, for comfort, was loosed about the shoulders, and sufficiently open to leave bare the whole of the graceful neck. Her features, even in the calm repose of thought were beautiful; they were regular and even as the chiseled marble; but when the "fringed curtains of the eye" were raised, and the dark orbs poured forth their radiance, lighting up the face with animation and intelligence, they were more than beautiful—they were almost divine. But in dwelling upon her beauty, we are forgetting the reflections we are to disclose.

"Why is it," she mentally exclaimed, dropping listlessly at her side the book upon which she had been vainly endeavoring to fix her mind—"why is it that I, who for years have been followed, and flattered, and courted, by the handsome, the talented, and the wealthy, not only of this, my native place, but I verily believe of almost all the States in the Union, have never loved. They say I am proud—that is not so; for I am sure I have given them all a fair chance; my heart has been a fair mark, and if it has been so far untouched, if all their efforts have failed to make an impression upon it—it is not because I would not, but I cannot love. I say I am not proud, because, although I have dismissed their suits, I have treated none haughtily or with scorn. And yet, after all, pride may have something to do with it. Their flattery and their homage has spoiled me, and caused me to look down upon them—whereas if they had approached me differently—approached me with a little more confidence in themselves—a little manifestation of consciousness of their own equality, perhaps even superiority—I might have learned to have looked up to, to have admired: yes, loved some one them. Well, mother and father, think it is h time I were well married, and to say the tru have not much inclination myself, to a life of celibacy—it will be so lonely, when one grows old and wrinkled, and has no admirers, to be amused with; besides, I may be standing in the way of my dear younger sisters. Dear! dear!—I think I could love, if I could find a proper lover. I've plenty of wooers—will nobody win me?" And she rose, laughing at her own silly thoughts—proceeded to her toilet, and commenced a variety of little arrangements; a detail of which would not perhaps be interesting. She was going to an evening fete.

The next morning, about ten o'clock, or a little after, the fair Marianna, attired in a plain but costly riding-habit, sat in her drawing-room, waiting for the servant to announce that her horse was ready, for her morning ride. She was seated pensively by a polished table, one arm resting upon it, and her eyes cast down, while one fair hand absently twirled the handle of her riding-whip among the elastic curls which dropped down from beneath the velvet cap. We will again expose her thoughts.

"Well, am I in love at last? Really, I am half inclined to think I am—my heart palpitated when his clear, cold eye rested upon me, and I'm afraid that for once in my life my face glowed with a guilty blush. Guilty of love?—no, no; I despise him! It is only that my vanity is wounded by his indifference, that my thoughts thus dwell upon him. Not a compliment, nor a languishing glance, nor a tender word!—and then how leisurely he sauntered for his hat when I was ready to leave! It is plain he considered it no very extraordinary honor to be permitted to escort Miss Worthington to her home. And have I been fool enough to fall in love with a man who manifests no disposition to fall in love with me?—fool! where is my pride?" At this moment, the clatter of a horse's feet in the street, attracted her attention, and looking up, she beheld the very person, to whom her soliloquy had reference, riding past the window. He paused at the door. "Ah! then, I have made an impression," she exclaimed; "yet, no—how vain I am! After waiting upon me home, and knowing that I was unwell, how could he, in common courtesy, do less than call this morning to inquire of my health? Well, I shall soon know what material his heart is made of."

"Mr. Sydnor!" said a servant, putting his head into the room. She nodded assant; the door was thrown open, and a man, of twenty-eight or thirty, with a high, thoughtful brow, and a mien in which easy dignity was blended with that confidence which denotes both physical and mental energy, entering, made his obeisance in a manner at once graceful and free from embarrassment. She rose to receive him, and returned his salutation with her sweetest smile.

"You are for a ride?" said the gentleman.

"I did intend to gallop a little way into the country," she replied; "but it is now rather late, I fear."

"Do not let my presence detain you."

"No, no—the sun is already too high for comfort."

"But the forest roads are shady."

"My brother, too," continued the lady, "is an unwilling escort—I will forego it."

"I shall be happy to relieve him of the duty," said the gentleman. "Your cheek is pale—indeed, you have need of the morning air. Pray, allow me"—

She could not refuse his offered hand, and leading her forth, he assisted her into her saddle. The atmosphere of the city was soon exchanged for the pure, fresh breath of the woody country.

Mr. Sydnor was reputed wealthy. His profession was the Law, and though young, there were few names more distinguished at the Bar of his country. His inclination had but recently led him to settle in ——, the native city of our heroine, and the capitol of one of the Western States, which, for reasons of our own, shall not be specified.

One month after the morning ride above referred to, our heroine was spending an evening with a select company at a friend's. Mr. Sydnor was present.—His attentions to the ladies were general, and one could scarce have detected in his manner a preference for any particular one: but during the evening, a single sentence which escaped him revealed a secret to all who heard it. Several of the ladies had been singing, and when it became Miss Worthington's turn, he approached her and said—

"Marianna, will you favor us with that pretty boat song of yours?"

Of all her admirers, none had ever before presumed to address her by a more familiar title than that of "Miss Worthington." Significant glances were exchanged among the company, and it was soon whispered that the haughty beauty was "engaged." So, in truth, she was. In less than a year, she became Mrs. Sydnor.

The first year succeeding her marriage we shall pass over in silence. At the end of that period we shall introduce the reader into an apartment of Mr. Sydnor's dwelling. It was about ten at night, and the young wife was sitting at her workstand. A piece of embroidery, at which she had been amusing herself, was cast carelessly aside, and with a gloomy and troubled brow she was glancing over the morning's Gazette. She was unhappy. She had married the only man she had ever admired—not that she had truly loved him, though she had endeavored to persuade herself she did—but because she thought she ought to marry; and she had met with none who promised to be more "endurable" as a husband, than Richard Sydnor, Esq. He was eminent as a lawyer, eminent as a politician, eminently wealthy—how could she have made a better choice? She was ambitious—and here was a proper husband for her;—who knew what post of honor in his country he might fill? and who would be more respected than the great statesman's lady? These visions which she had indulged before marriage, seemed destined after it to be wofully disappointed. Her husband, though possessed of a truly great mind, in her estimation, lacked energy—lacked ambition. She ceased to admire—then what was left to bind her to him? Alas! nothing. She had never known real love—that sacred feeling of the human heart—undefinable, inexplicable—but once known, deathless.

The paper she was reading contained the proceedings of a political convention held the previous day, for the purpose of nominating a candidate for the Gubernatorial chair of the State. Mr. Sydnor had received the unanimous vote of the meeting, and in a short but eloquent speech, had respectfully declined the nomination. Marianna's eye flashed with indignation.

"It cannot be that he does not covet the honor," thought she; "but the contest is expected to be an arduous one, and his timid spirit shrinks from the encounter. Oh, how I have been deceived in him!"

At this moment her husband entered. He did not observe her angry looks, but laying some Bank bills upon the table before her, said—

"Marianna, I shall be out of town to-morrow. Here are one hundred dollars, fifty of which I wish you to give to the trustees of the poor, who will call in the morning. If you go out during the day, I wish you to leave the other fifty at Mr. Bradshaw's, for the Mechanics' Library Association. And, stay—I promised to give something toward erecting the new Academy. If the commissioners call, set down a hundred dollars to my name. I will pay it when I return."

"Some men," said the wife, and her beautiful lip curled with an expression of bitter sarcasm, "acquire popularity by the use of their intellects—others are contented to buy it."

The husband's countenance plainly exhibited the pain her words occasioned, as he replied—

"You wrong my motives, my dear; I do not desire popularity; I am only trying to do what little good in the world my means enable me to do."

"Very plausible," she returned; "I wonder your philanthropy did not induce you to accept the nomination yesterday, as in case of your election you would have had an opportunity of carrying out those political measures which you hold to be so essential to the good of your country."

"Marianna, it is your silly pride which prompts you to speak in this strain;" replied he, regarding her with a look of mingled sorrow and reproach.

"Your are insulting!" exclaimed the wife, and with a step of offended dignity she hastily left the room.

It would be difficult to say whether Sydnor was most pained or astonished at this demonstration of her temper. Scarcely knowing how to act, and not caring to exasperate her further, he did not follow her, but taking off his coat, threw himself upon a sofa, where he passed a night of sleepless and feverish solicitude. This was the first angry scene which had occurred between them; it proved but the precursor of others, and more lamentable ones. In a few months more they separated, and Marianna returned to her father's house. To Sydnor, the separation was distressing enough, for notwithstanding all her faults, he loved her. Yet he saw her affections were not his, and he thought it better they should part than live in discord. So beautiful as she was, with all the advantages of an excellent education, and a well-cultivated mind, he could not believe her entirely devoid of those gentler feelings of the heart which render the sex worthy of the love and honour which men accord them.

"She does possess those better feelings," thought he, "but they are swallowed up in her girlish pride. If that were once cured, she would then become what my fancy believed her; divested of her vanity, she is not, cannot be the heartless being she seems. It must be left to time—I will hope for the best."

We will not dwell upon the rumors and suspicions which the separation gave rise to among the scandal-loving of the little capital, or upon the misery and unhappiness of which these rumors were the source to the deserted husband. He met them all, however, with an undisturbed front; his life went on in its wonted course, and he went about his daily pursuits with his usual composure. Whatever his sorrows, he hugged them close in his own breast, or only indulged them in solitude. In the society of his friends, he never countenanced or permitted any allusion to the subject. Marianna was equally prudent in keeping counsel, so that, notwithstanding all the speculations of very worthy gossips, the cause of the separation, and whether he or she was in fault, remained a profound secret.

Although Mrs. Sydnor retired to her father's house, she did not altogether withdraw from the world. She occasionally graced her former circles, and the consequence was that her old admirers again crowded around her. Some of them, indeed, saw in her present position a peculiar attraction, which rendered them doubly zealous to court her society; but self-respect taught her prudence, and she held them all at a respectful distance. Among her own sex, she renewed the closest intimacy with many of her old companions, married and unmarried, and her drawing-room soon became their favorite resort, to which, of the other sex, very few indeed found access, and those of the most unexceptionable reputation. Yet, among that few, there was one who was destined to prove a dangerous foe to her peace.

In Raymond Devoe, were united a brilliant, if not a deep mind, and personal attractions of no common order; he possessed an almost intuitive faculty of reading human character, and combined consummate hypocrisy with a versatility of talent and fluency of speech, which enabled him to adapt himself to any and every society he might fall into. At the time of Marianna's separation from her husband, he was, or feigned to be, paying serious attentions to one of her younger sisters, and was thus thrown much into her company. To whatever degree his feelings might have inclined toward the younger sister, they soon became converted into a new channel, and the young wife became the object of a passion as violent as it was reprehensible. He had discernment enough to foresee that his game would be a desperate one, but he resolved to try the hazard, and accordingly premeditated a course in which all the refinement of subtilty he was master of was brought to bear. He discreetly discarded the ordinary love-tactics—sighs, tender glances, impassioned tones, and graceful compliments—and approached her with that most delicate of all species of flattery which can be addressed to a sensible woman—an affectation of profound and distant respect,—practising in her presence a reserve which she could not fail to construe into tacit admiration. If she broached a favorite topic, he knew, too, just when to grow eloquent, that it might seem he was warmed by her words, unconscious to himself, into enthusiasm, yet never betraying a thought or sentiment which a Penelope herself could have taken exception to. By this course, he effectually prevented any suspicions in her mind, and soon gained her confidence. In short, he acquired, in a brief time, a power over her mind, which was not less than his anticipations, and of which he was not slow to take advantage, by invidiously introducing into their conversations the subject of platonic affection. In the hands of a skilful libertine, there is no more dangerous weapon than this same doctrine of platonic love. Once infused into a woman's breast, it becomes an impenetrable screen which hides from her inward eye the workings of her own heart, and behind it the embryo passion quickly grows to hideous maturity.

Raymond Devoe discoursed winningly of platonic love—Marianna listened and smiled. He became bolder, and declared that he entertained such an affection for her. She frowned—but he knew that she was inly pleased. Very calmly and dispassionately, to enforce precept by example, still maintaining his distant respectfulness, he dwelt upon the purity, the innocence, and the unselfishness of the feeling. Her imagination caught inspiration from his words. She did not promise to reciprocate it—neither did she forbid him to cherish it. He now felt that his triumph was already half complete, and already he was happy in the anticipation of the success that would soon crown his perseverance.

A few weeks elapsed, and Raymond's machinations were progressing gradually to the desired consummation. So confident had he become that his victim was in his power, that he only waited for a favorable opportunity to disclose his unholy passion, when, unfortunately for his design, Marianna's inclination led her to spend some days with a relative in the country.

About ten miles distant from the city, near the banks of the beautiful little river ——, stood the old-fashioned residence of Mrs. Sydnor's relative.—The country around it was uneven and picturesque, with alternate contrasts of forest and arable land. From the rear of the house a handsome garden extended some hundred yards to the river, and here, upon the high bank, was erected a pleasant little arbour, from whence, the opposite country, for miles up and down the stream, afforded a delightful prospect. In this arbour, toward the decline of a clear day in September, Marianna was seated alone. She had repaired thither, not so much to enjoy the scenery, as to indulge some melancholy reflections that had for a few days past occupied her mind, and the nature of which we must explain. The relative, whose guest she was, was a childless uncle, who, when she was quite young, had taken a fancy to her, and prevailed upon her parents to allow him partially to rear and educate her. Thus her early years had been divided between her paternal roof and her uncle's, and her attachment to the latter was little less than to the former. The old man dearly loved her. Upon one of his late visits to the city, he had heard some scandalous whispers of her intimacy with Devoe, and upon the occasion of her present sojourn with him, he had thought it his duty to inform her of them, and admonish her of the consequences of her indiscretion. His counsels had set her to thinking. To whatever extent her vanity might have been gratified by Devoe's admiration, she was as yet innocent of harboring a thought that could sully her virtue, and her first knowledge that she was an object of such suspicions, was harrowing enough. Her eyes became opened to her real position, and she began to see her error. When we can bring ourselves to acknowledge one error, there is hope for us. One error will convince us of another, until at length we begin to "see ourselves as others see us." Having once become conscious that her conduct had been wrong since her separation from her husband, and that her vanity had been the source of it, Marianna could not conceal from herself the truth that she had also been wrong in the dissensions which had led to that separation, and that all her subsequent errors had sprung from the same thoughtless source. The limits of our story will not allow us to pursue all the workings of her mind in its salutary change; but it will not be difficult for the reader to conceive how remorse followed conviction, and with it came a yearning of the heart toward the husband she had injured and deserted. This was the state of her feelings as she sat gazing out from the little arbour we have mentioned.

Upon the opposite side of the river stood a splendid new edifice, the grounds adjoining which were laid out in a style of modern elegance. This was the country seat of the newly-elected Governor of the State. He was a member of the same party with Sydnor, and it was said that only by the influence of the latter had he been enabled to carry the election. From the Governor's house along the gravelled coach road which led to the turnpike bridge, some distance down to the river, Marianna beheld three figures leisurely moving. A spy-glass lay upon a table near her, and applying it to her eye, by its aid she recognised in turn, the Governor himself, her own husband, and a graceful female, whom she presumed to be the Governor's wife. The two former were engaged in close conversation, the subject of which did not seem to be of much interest to the lady, for she presently quickened her pace, and proceeded a little way before them. At the distance of about a quarter of a mile from the house, the road approached to within a stone's throw of a cliff which overhung the river. Intersecting this cliff, at right angles to the water, was a long narrow ravine or chasm, over which the road was extended by a wooden bridge. The lady pursued her way over the bridge, but Sydnor and the Governor were so intent upon the theme they were debating, that they had diverged from the road, apparently unconsciously to themselves, and were nearing the angle of the cliff. When they discovered their mistake, they turned toward the bridge. As if startled by something, they both suddenly wheeled again, and the Governor threw up his arms with an extravagant gesture. Sydnor started to the verge of the chasm, with a desperate leap barely cleared it, and rushed onward. Marianna, in excitement at the scene, had risen to her feet, and following him with her eyes, soon perceived the cause of alarm. The Governor's wife, upon the other side of the ravine, had approached the verge of the cliff, and probably to obtain a better view of some distant point, had laid hold of one of the branches of an old tree, which grew vertically from the steep bank, and leaning over too far, lost her balance; the bough, yielding with her weight, had swung outward, and she was thus suspended by her hands, above the water, with her feet upon the edge of the cliff, but without sufficient strength to regain her former position. Reaching the spot, and seeing at a glance she could not be recovered to the top of the cliff, Sydnor threw himself over, seizing the bough with one hand, and with the other arm securing the lady. The weight of both upon the pliant branch, at once bore it down, letting them drop gently upon a narrow ledge near the water. Here his foothold was not too secure, but the gallant rescuer managed to sustain himself and the lady, by inserting the fingers of one hand into a crevice in the bank. Marianna could not restrain a cry of admiration at her husband's intrepidity, nor could she suppress a pang of momentary jealousy, as she beheld him standing thus with one arm around the slight form of the lady, while she, with hers thrown around his neck, clung in terror to his breast. Some persons in a fishing boat at a little distance, who had witnessed the scene, now hastened to their relief, and a few minutes afterward, the lady being restored to the arms of the half-frantic Governor, the party were re-crossing their steps back to his mansion.

When Marianna retired to her couch that night, it was with feelings towards her husband far different from any she had ever before entertained. Her mind irresistibly dwelt upon his noble conduct that evening, and she could not help drawing a comparison between it and the behaviour of the timid Governor. Her mind was now disposed to do him justice, and reverted with painful self-condemnation to his many acts of disinterested benevolence, for which she had wrongly charged him with selfish motives—with a desire to buy popularity. She remembered, too, all his kindness and affection to her, and his patience in bearing with her uncalled-for rebukes, until forbearance was no longer a virtue. Bitterly she repented the step she had taken, and she now felt that she loved Sydnor as she had never before loved. Her heart was softened, and she wept. She would have given worlds to have been restored to him at that moment, to have heard his voice speaking kindly to her, and to have returned his affectionate caresses, as she had once. But her pride was not yet conquered. When she became calmer, her haughty spirit revolted at the thought of returning humbled to ask his forgiveness. Perhaps, too, he no longer regarded her with the same affection, and would receive her coldly. No—she would not now return—he should never have an opportunity to retaliate, and repulse her. The trouble she had brought upon herself, she would bear in silence, and none should ever know of her penitence, to taunt her with it. Thus ever, when our better genius is building up some little of good in our hearts, does the arch demon, Pride, steal in to mar the fair fabric.

Two days after the incident above stated, the Governor was expected during the afternoon to visit Worthington-place on some matter of business with Marianna's uncle. Knowing her husband to be the Governor's guest, our heroine resolved to avoid meeting the latter, for she was fearful the subject of her separation might be alluded to by him; and this, in her present state of mind, she could not bear without an agitation she cared not to betray. After having dined, therefore, taking her bonnet, and not neglecting to provide herself with a favorite poet, she issued forth to spend a few hours "under the shadow of melancholy boughs." A short walk across the fields brought her to a strip of wood, which, from the absence of undergrowth, its fresh green carpet of short grass, the grateful shade the spreading oaks afforded, and the solemn music of the deep murmuring breeze, that rustled through the leafy canopy, was a delightful and inspiring retreat. She had not rambled far into this wood, when a slight sound behind her, as of the snapping of a dry twig beneath the weight of a footstep, startled her, and turning, she beheld a man approaching her, whose face, above all others, was certainly, at that moment, not one she could have desired to see. It was Raymond Devoe. However loth she might have been to meet him then and there, he was so close she could not, without a breach of civility, have avoided him. Extending her hand in some confusion, as he gained her side, she exclaimed—

"Mr. Devoe, really! You come very unexpectedly!"

"Not unwelcome, let me hope," he replied, pressing her hand to his lips with a warmth and fervor so far exceeding his usual platonic demeanor, that she became alarmed, and withdrew it hastily.

"May I ask," said she, with an effort to recover her composure, "to what accident this meeting is attributable."

"O, not an accident," said Devoe, taking her hand again. "I knew this was your favorite ramble, and I have watched for you."

"Watched for me!" ejaculated Marianna, in a tone of unfeigned astonishment.

"Even so, dear Marianna," he returned, his eye brightening with the vehemence of passion. "And hear what I can no longer conceal. Though it were death to utter it, I can no longer control my heart. I knew not, till your absence convinced me—till your soft, bright glance no longer met mine, and the magic tones of your sweet voice no longer fell upon my ear; O, I knew not till then the spell that had grown upon my soul. Existence, when your presence—"

"This is madness, Devoe—you have abused the confidence I reposed in you."

But Devoe, little dreaming of the change that had taken place in her mind, seemed to think that the moment had come when the mask of prudence was no longer necessary. Knowing that women often, "in modesty, say no to that which they would have the profferer construe to ay," and acting upon the strength of the adage that "faint heart never won fair lady," he forcibly retained the hand she was struggling to release from his amorous clasp, and drawing closer to her side, continued—

"Marianna, I love, I adore you!"

"Release me, you are a villain!" cried she. "Release me, or I will call for help! Leave me! or I will make those hear me, who will chastise your insolence."

The energy with which she spoke was not to be mistaken, and the discomfitted lover, stepping back a pace, regarded her with a look which betrayed that he was as much surprised and mortified at the reception of his visit, as she had been by his avowal. At this moment, Devoe beheld a man's face peering at him from behind a neighboring tree. A suspicion that he was supplanted by a more recent admirer flashed upon his mind, and bowing low, with a smile of scornful sarcasm, he said tauntingly—

"Pardon me, madam; if I had known your favors were already enjoyed by another, I should have spared you this intrusion." With these words, turning upon his heel, he soon disappeared among the trees.

Marianna, with her feelings wrought up to a painful state of excitement; her brow burning with distress and shame, from the consciousness that her own unguarded conduct had brought this insult upon her; and more than ever deprecating the first false step which led her from that home she should have rendered happy; tremblingly retraced her steps toward the house. The Governor—for it was his face Devoe had beheld—hastened after her. Hearing his step, and fancying it to be Devoe, again following her, she accelerated her pace, and flew as fast as her trembling limbs would bear her, across the fields to the house. Entering the room where the family were seated, she sank exhausted and agitated upon a chair. To the anxious inquiries of her aunt, she only faltered —"O, my poor husband, why did I ever leave him?" Despairing to learn from her, until she became calmer, the source of her agitation, and as she appeared to be ill, she was taken to her chamber and placed in bed. The Governor entered immediately after, who informed them of the scene he had just witnessed. Ere he took his leave, Marianna was suffering with a high fever, which the over excitement of that hour, together with other causes, had brought on. Through the long night that succeeded, her fever did not abate, and she passed the hours in a state of wakeful restlessness that bordered upon delirium. Towards morning she fell into a fitful slumber, broken by startling dreams, among which, not the least unhappy, were those of returning to her husband and being cast away from him with words of anger. Now she pillowed her head upon his bosom, and his kindly tones fell upon her ear, as of old—anon, he spurned her from his arms; his brow grew dark, as she had never seen it before; he glared upon her with haggard looks, and accused her of having destroyed his peace, and rendered his home a torment. At length these troubled visions ceased, and for some hours she lay in a sound, unbroken sleep. When she awoke her fever had somewhat subsided, and her calmness was, in a measure, restored. The curtains of her bed were close drawn; but she soon became conscious, from the whispering of low voices, that there were persons in the room. She listened, and heard one voice say, "She sleeps." "Then," said another, "I may look upon her without disturbing her." His voice!—she recognized it, even in that half-suppressed whisper. Then a soft step approached the bed. She closed her eyes—she dared not meet his gaze. She felt a thrill, she knew not whether it was of pleasure or pain, hope or fear—perhaps it was a mixture of them all—as her ear caught the rustling of the parting curtains; the mantling blood burned upon her brow, for she knew that he was bending over her. His warm breath reached her face—it came closer, and closer—his lips softly touched hers, and a tear fell upon her cheek. He loved her still, as ever! O, the wild emotions that gushed in her bosom that moment! It cost her a trying struggle to maintain her feigned slumber—to suppress the joy with which her heart seemed bursting. She could have thrown her arms about his neck, and confessed her deep penitence and her new-born love; but very ecstasy made her timid. She heard again the rustling of the curtains as they closed, and then his receding footstep. She could bear it no longer; she stretched forth her feeble hand, parted the drapery, and exclaimed—

"Richard, return!—forgive me!—I am changed!"

In an instant he was again at her side—in another she was clasped in his arms. She could only weep upon his breast. No medicine like joy to the sick in mind and body—no physician like rewarded love! In less than a week, Marianna was restored to health and hope; and her noble husband, fonder and kinder than ever, led her back to his forsaken home, as happy and as beautiful as a new made bride.

WORSTED WORK.

BY MRS. ABDY.

Oh! talk not of it lightly in a tone of scornful mirth,
It brings to me glad visions of the calm and quiet hearth,
Of seasons of retirement from the world's obtrusive eyes,
Of freedom from absorbing toil, of dear domestic ties.

When I view the tasteful ottoman, or richly fancied screen,
I ever picture to my mind a sweet and social scene—
A group of sisters; young and fair, rejoicing to unite
In bringing every blooming flower, and vivid fruit to light.

Perchance in time they separate, the world's false joys to share;
And half forget their father's house, and all the dear ones there;
Then, on a brief and passing stay, how tenderly their gaze
Shall rest upon the common work of girlhood's sunny days!

Perchance dissensions have prevailed; cold envy may have cast
A bleak and withering blight upon the pure and peaceful past;
Then may not these mute witnesses such changeful love confirm,
Bearing a record in each leaf, a lesson in each stem?

May they not think in sadness, on the swiftly fleeting hour,
When, like Hermia and her gentle friend, each bussed on one flower,
They warbled some familiar air, and plied their skilful art,
Owning a happy unison of voice, and hand, and heart!

Perchance some fragile girl who shared that cheerful task of love,
Hath left her cherished home on earth, and gone to rest above;
Then how her fond surviving friends shall gaze in pensive thought
On every graceful tendril that her fairy fingers wrought!

How shall they scan the chaplets that she fancifully planned,
To trace the individual buds that grew beneath her hand;
Feeling in softened grief, that she who once these flowers
prizeth,
Is taken from a world of change where "all that's bright must fade!"

The scoffer may on vain pursuits and wasted moments jest;
Alas! the highly gifted mind is most in need of rest;
Exhausted, faint, and over-wrought, the thoughts may passive lie,
While actively the fingers their ingenious duty ply.

There is language in the blossoms of the meadows and the bowers,
To me the lifeless canvass has its own sweet speech of flowers;
Its gay and glowing garlands have a moral in their bloom,
They tell of household quiet, of the tranquil joys of home.

MANAGEMENT; OR, THE OLD BACHELOR.

BY CAMILLA TOULMIN.

"When the cat's away,
The mice will play."—[OLD PROVERB.

Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy was a single gentleman of a "certain age;" not a certain age in the figurative and common acceptation of the term, which is the most uncertain of all, but literally and truly fifty-two years and three months old, by the parish register, as every body in the parish knew—for thus it fell out. Thirty years before we introduce him to the reader, he had, in a moment of unsuspecting confidence, mentioned the year in which he was born, fixing—branding it on the memory of a gossip who was present, by observing it was the year of some remarkable event, either the flying visit of a great comet, or the fleeting glory of a great victory—I am sure I forget which: but whatever it was it proved a landmark from which to measure; or "data," I believe, is the favorite word with practical people, who deal only with facts. Fifty-two, and single! though rich enough to lavish every luxury on a beloved object: and more—far more than this—generous, kind, affectionate, endowed with every quality that forms that noblest work of God—"an honest man." To be sure he was a little bit crotchetty and eccentric, but

"E'en his failings lean'd to virtue's side."

At thirty years of age he had adopted an infant nephew, as a sort of compensation for the injury he had inflicted on him, by happening to be his father's elder brother, and heir to the family estate. And having loved in his youth "wisely and well," but wept over the early grave of the true mate his heart had found, he had resolved never to profane her memory by making a second choice; and we see how well his resolution had been kept.

But Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy was not an unhappy man; for however crushing at the time such a misfortune, as that of his youth, it is one which leaves no sting behind. The discontented old maid and querulous bachelor repining at their lot, be sure are those who have never been—perhaps have never deserved to be—truly loved. But the memory of a destiny fulfilled can satisfy the aching void in the heart, and if fate does not accord a second reality of happiness, will be the next best charm to keep the intellect unrusted by the breath of value longings and disappointed affections. Years passed swiftly with our hero, who was a little bit of a poet, and a great deal of a philanthropist. His greatest weakness was to believe himself very learned as a botanist and entomologist; and I am afraid he had the vanity, in his own heart, to add two or three other ists to the list of his acquirements. Only a week since he had read the advertisement of an intended sale in London of a private collection of curiosities, and Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy immediately determined on visiting the metropolis, with the hope of enriching one particular shelf in his cabinet of butterflies. He proposed remaining a week in London, as he wished to spend one day with an old friend, and—to visit the museums. Leaving strict injunctions with Frederic Mountjoy and the old housekeeper, to be quiet and orderly in his absence, and to take care that the servants did not run riot, he departed by railway for town, encumbered only with a small carpet-bag; for, as he justly observed, his old friend would excuse his travelling costume, and he should not even offer an apology for thus presenting himself to the hortus siccus and impaled insects he should also visit.

Arrived in London, he was disappointed at hearing his friend was on the Continent, and that one of the most interesting collections was closed. Still he might have killed time by visiting each of the others twice or thrice, and so have passed away the week; for Mr. Mountjoy had usually a great objection to depart from any intention he had once expressed; but his anxiety to spread out his newly-acquired treasure on the one beloved shelf, overruled his objection; and really a little surprised at his own want of faith, he found himself once more behind the hissing, groaning, mighty engine, two days before he had intended to return. On, on sped the train, "like a thing of life," indeed, but "life" indued with a mighty spirit-power whose essence shall bless and regenerate. Daily is the benignant power of steam becoming more and more felt and appreciated; the humanizing effect of rapid communication and frequent intercourse of man with man, becoming more recognized and understood. Who shall foresee the end? The man of Science, whose steady gaze already looks so far into the future triumphs of mind over matter; or the Poet-philosopher, who hath greater faith and wider pinions, and who, leaving to minds more fit to grasp the details to prepare the material way, cheers them in their course with the bright revealings of that promised land his eye is permitted to view?

On, on sped the train through hill and through dale;—now beside the pleasant meadow, and now raised aloft, it dashes past a manufacturing district, peeping in upon the busy artisan in his high and narrow dwelling. It was a balmy August evening when Marmaduke Mountjoy alighted at the station, and being but a mile and a half from his home, he left his carpet-bag to be sent for next morning, and set off to walk across the fields. Scarcely, however, had he proceeded a hundred yards, when he encountered two ladies, intimate friends, and what, in the country, are called neighbours. These were Miss Campbell, a spinster lady of an uncertain age, and her adopted child and relative, Helen Campbell, a beautiful girl of about eighteen. Miss Campbell was as well preserved and interesting a "specimen" of an old maid as Marmaduke Mountjoy was of an old bachelor. She, too, had loved in early life; but then she was portionless, and her cousin Hector, to whom she was betrothed, parted with her, to join his regiment in a foreign land, with vows of constancy it is true; but—in one little year he wedded another. Soon after this event, the wronged and forsaken Helen (Hector's daughter had been named after his forsaken love—such are the inconsistencies of man's nature) inherited an independence of a few hundreds a year, and then, when her early lover sank beneath the burning skies of India, and his volatile widow married again, Helen offered to educate and provide for his child; an offer which the slenderly-dowered lady most gladly accepted, observing to her intimate friends, that it was a much more natural thing for Miss Campbell to do than to pet spaniels and canaries. The young lady's heart, however, (for she was young then) was sufficiently capacious for all these purposes, as the tenants of the cottage ornee in which she resided fully testified. Mr. Mountjoy had also a penchant for pets, as in some degree almost all kind-hearted people have; and here was another bond of union between the bachelor and spinster. In fact, they were the best friends in the world, and living, as they both did, far away from the busy idleness of gaiety, they had time enough, and sympathies to spare, for entering with interest into the engrossing pursuits of each other, whatever, for the time being, these might be.

"Oh! my dear friends," exclaimed Mr. Mountjoy, shaking the ladies cordially by the hand, "I have such a treasure to show you; to be sure, I did not mean to introduce the precious dears till they were neatly arranged on the shelf, which I think you, Miss Campbell, first called nonpareil. But I am afraid, with the case in my pocket, I can never be your escort for ten minutes without drawing it forth."

"I propose," said the lady, "that you return home with us to tea, instead of going direct to the Lodge, where I dare say they do not expect you, and then we can examine the butterflies at leisure."

"There are some beetles, also," interposed Mr. Mountjoy.

"Do come," said the voice of Helen, the younger, "they would blow about in the open air. Besides, I have quite learned 'Auld Robin Gray' while you have been in London, and I want to sing it to you."

With such a double inducement, there is no wonder he acceded; and, perhaps in the whole county, there was not that evening a happier man than Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy. Happiness and real enjoyment are such quiet things, that we—ungrateful mortals that we are, and ever more prone to hope for the future, or grieve for the past, than enjoy the present—are too apt to let them pass unchronicled, till, like the bird with the brilliant plumage, we see their radiance when flying from our grasp. Nevertheless, there was a something made up of hospitality, sympathy, and—shall we say it?—yes, affection—that like an atmosphere pervaded the spinster's establishment, which always went home to the heart of Mr. Mountjoy; evincing its presence by raising his spirits, brightening his intellect, and elevating his feelings. As he entered the gate, the dogs bounded forward to meet them, greeting their mistresses and the visitor by turns, with the peculiar and most eloquent bark, or cry of joy; as they neared the house, a feathered favourite, confined only by a long chain, cried "pretty Polly," and stooped her head till it touched her perch, as she sought attention and caresses from her party; and, as he entered the hall, with what a silent welcome, and sweet smile, did the neat "parlour-maid" take his stick and hat, and usher in Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy. The hissing urn, too, and sociable tea-table, which two at least of our truest poets have deigned to honour in their verse; then the "treasure" displayed, with all the interest his fair hostess evinced in his entomological pursuits, an interest which he returned in kind, by judiciously admiring Miss Campbell's old china, a love of which was that lady's reigning "vanity." Indeed, I think it was on that memorable evening, that he promised to add to her store, by presenting her with a certain antique dish, which usually rested on the cabinet of curiosities, regretting there was a slight flaw, but I believe the fair collector thought it rather more valuable on that account.

Then came the old ballads, rich in their intrinsic merits—perhaps richer still in their associations to two of the party; and in such singing Helen was not ashamed to excel; as, from some unacknowledged reason, it would appear almost all youthful amateurs are, seeing that they so seldom accomplish the feat, and usually express some contempt for those who do. The supper-tray—almost, if not quite, as sociable as the tea equipage—broke in upon the music; and then Helen, who had accompanied some friends to the theatre at R——— the previous evening, begged to retire to rest, as she was quite fatigued with such unusual dissipation. The bachelor and spinster grew even more than commonly confidential: somehow or other, the young people became the subject of their conversation; and, while Mr. Mountjoy marvelled at the docility of the youthful Helen, and was fain to ask some hints which might be useful in the management of Frederic, he candidly confessed the boy (he was six-and-twenty) was really at times beyond his control. Now filling the house with noisy sporting companions; then, perhaps, the next month, Shakspeare mad, flying about the country, more like a courier than anything else, to follow some provincial theatrical star. Thus emboldened, Miss Campbell confided a secret: she "feared dear Helen would be very angry with her for mentioning it, but she felt it was only the act of a friend to do so—would he promise to pardon his nephew this time?"

"Dear Madam!" exclaimed Mr. Mountjoy, "what is it he has done? Pray, pray let me know the worst. Nothing, I hope, to tarnish our name—imprudence, extravagance, I can forgive anything but dishonour."

"Nothing very dreadful," returned Miss Campbell, "only—that is—Helen is almost sure that he acted one of the principal characters at R——— last night, under an assumed name, of course."

"Good gracious! Miss Campbell, my nephew an actor!—without my knowledge—or even a suspicion of such a thing! I do not deserve this from him.

And, perhaps, if Frederic Mountjoy had been the pale and agonized expression of his uncle's countenance at that moment, and the tremor which shook his frame, he would have run over in his mind the long catalogue of kindnesses for which he was indebted, and would have exclaimed with true penitence, "He does not deserve that I should have attacked one of his prejudices, and wounded him by deception."

But Frederic was not there to soothe with promises of obedience for the future, or expressions of regret for the past; so Miss Campbell used all her eloquence to make Mr Mountjoy view the affair as a youthful error, a repetition of which would surely be prevented by a firm, but affectionate remonstrance with the offender. The result of all this was to raise Miss Campbell, if possible, yet higher in the old bachelor's estimation, although he had long regarded her as a miracle of good sense, and female excellence. Strange it is, that with all his admiration of the lady, never till that night had the thought flashed across his mind, that it might not have proved an unwise thing, a dozen years before, to have consulted Miss Campbell more intimately on the "management" of his nephew; for with that simplicity which, as regarded worldly matters, was the idiosyncrasy of his mind, he did not perceive the different sort of "management" a high spirited young man—restless from mere want of legitimate occupation—required, from one of that gentle sex, whom the discreet, we must hope, always find most manageable!

In such conversation, however, time passed swiftly away, and it was nearly midnight when the friends separated. Being a very dark night, Mr. Mountjoy was provided with a lantern, by the aid of which he could more easily find his way down the short lane, and across the one field by which the cottage was separated from his residence. The outer gate of the Lodge yielded to the latch-key its master always carried; and this put it into his mind to try a similar experiment on a certain side-door, which would lead him near his own private apartments. As this also offered neither bolt nor bar to impede his entrance, his first thought was that his nephew and the servants were still up, but the total silence which prevailed induced him, after a few moments, to judge the contrary; a hasty murmur at their carelessness escaped him, but his good nature prevented his rousing the establishment; so, making all fast himself, he hastened to his chamber.

Mr. Mountjoy was soon asleep, for though annoyed at the account he had heard of his nephew, he was thoroughly fatigued, and the mind succumbed to the tired body. Whether he dreamed of Frederic in Hamlet's "inky cloak," the Victoria butterfly, Miss Campbell's pattern protegee, or the surprise his own appearance would occasion the next morning, his biographical memoirs declare not; but they positively affirm that he was startled from a deep slumber, just at day-break, by a combination of sounds to which he was quite unaccustomed. His first idea was—probably the remnant of a dream weaving itself with his first-waking thought—that all the articles of glass in the house, startled from their sobriety, had assembled to dance Highland reels in the chamber beneath him—that room made sacred by the presence of The Cabinet! His next belief was that The Cabinet itself, with open doors, had embraced the round table, and was whirling with it in the giddy waltz, the embroidered table-cover sweeping round, after the fashion of a lady's robe, to the utter discomfiture of their brittle companions! Then he fancied there was a loud accompaniment of human voices (the orchestra for the dancers); and by the time he was thoroughly convinced of this fact, our Old Bachelor was wide awake! If the party were thieves, they were such merry ones, that he was sure they would not molest him; but he did not think they were thieves, neither did Puck and Tray, who—faithful creatures!—had found out their master's return, and planted themselves at his door; and to their opinion he gave due weight. Following, therefore, his canine pioneers, who seemed to assure him, by their manner, that he had nothing to fear, and would certainly have the best of the joke, whatever it might be, he descended the stairs and found himself at the door of his sanctum. It was not even fastened, for Puck thrust it open, and so little did the four-footed intruders disturb the revellers, that Mr. Mountjoy had time, before making his presence known, to look upon the merry scene.

The truth was, that Frederic Mountjoy had taken the opportunity of his uncle's absence to convert so large a portion of the house into a private theatre, that really there was no other room than the sanctum left for the necessary refreshment of himself and a select few, after the audience had departed. Had Mr. Mountjoy gone around to the principal entrance, he might, probably, have been allowed the gratification of witnessing some of his nephew's histrionic exertions; for it afterwards appeared that he must have entered the house during the last scene but one, in which a great deal of mystery and apprehension were expressed by very eloquent dumb show, which, of course, rivetted the attention of the audience; and, most probably, the master of the mansion was fast asleep when, at the fall of the curtain, "thunders of applause" proclaimed the success of the young actor. The select few who met, with "champagne and a chicken at last," consisted of the manager of the theatre of R——, who had lent several of his properties for the occasion; his daughter, and the star of the company; they having, with Frederic, sustained the principal characters. We rather think, from pure love of the art, they were rehearsing a favorite scene at the moment they were so unceremoniously broken in upon by Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy.

With the consternation or lecture which followed we have nothing to do; we shall but observe that the event gave birth to a desperate resolution in the mind of the Old Bachelor, towards the realization of which his first step was a visit to Miss Campbell before mid-day. He found her giving the last touches to a miniature, which Helen had been copying, of her father, whom she could not remember. But Miss Campbell pronounced the likeness of the lover of her youth excellent, and unclasping the bracelet from which it had been taken, compared the original with Helen's performance, and appealed to Mr. Mountjoy for his opinion. This little accident, and thoughts of the handsome, youthful soldier that was thus presented to his view, might have shaken many a one from his intention, but not so Mr. Marmaduke Mountjoy, who came that morning to offer his hand to the spinster! He was fully aware she had only a half a heart to give him—what then?—it was his own case precisely; and, as he afterwards told her—while looking over some of her china pets—their broken hearts had matched capitally, and he trusted the rivets which bound them together would last for the term of their lives. Miss Campbell asked three days before making her decision—and yet she had not been so very much surprised at the offer; at the end of which time it was arranged that the marriage should take place in the course of the winter.

Weeks passed away, and startled—steadied as Frederic had been by his uncle's decision, there had, perhaps, never been a moment of his life in which he had more thoroughly appreciated the high and excellent qualities by which his guardian and benefactor was ennobled. He could no longer smile at his marvellous simplicity of character; nay, he even began to entertain for it a sort of respect which he had never felt before. At a glance, he saw what opportunities of ministering to his uncle's happiness he had lost; in fact, it seemed that the rough shock which the first rumor of the projected marriage had been to him, had shaken off the foibles of his character. It was in such a mood as this that he sought an interview with Mr. Mountjoy, and bravely acknowledging the time he had lost in youthful follies, expressed his desire to study for the bar, owning candidly that his mind must be employed, and that if he did not provide worthy occupation for it, he should certainly get into mischief again, or folly at best. Our Old Bachelor, who had lately become wonderfully keen-sighted, immediately acceded, though he had his own opinion about the probability of Frederic ever becoming a fagging student. According, it was arranged that he should go up to London to commence his studies, with the stipulation that he should return home in January, to report progress, and be present at the wedding.

It was a clear frosty morning, when the earth's winter aspect was spread, and the leafless branches were garlanded with snow-wreaths. But the sun shone cheerfully, and the bells rung merrily, as the bridal party left the old church of R——. It was a gala-day in the neighborhood, and among the poor there was loud talk of huge oxen, and gigantic spits, and Brobdignag plum-puddings, such as the youthful part of the community had never before witnessed. And many were the grateful beings—grateful for more solid services than one good meal—who lined the avenue, as Mr. and Mrs. Marmaduke Mountjoy departed on their wedding excursion. Frederic was to remain at the Lodge during their absence, as he had brought some headache-giving-looking law books from London, to study in this chosen retirement, preparatory to his formally entering himself as a tudent for the bar. Helen still lingered at the cottage, which was advertised to let, under the protection of an intimate friend, a widow lady, who had come to pass the time with her. We may just observe that Helen also professed to be very busy, as she had undertaken to pack the real china for removal with her own fair fingers, and had arrangements to make before her cousin's return home, far too numerous to particularize.

We cannot tell how it was that such very busy people found time for anything besides their several occupations. Perhaps, however, on Helen's part, packing china—and selecting books instead of reading them, proved but dull work, and she required the relaxation of a little agreeable society in the evening; while we know Frederic could not be studying law all day. However this might be, he soon formed the habit of dropping in at the cottage, sometimes of a morning, sometimes of an evening; and though at first the dogs barked, and the parrot screamed on his arrival, long before he had heard half Helen Campbell's songs, old and new, they had become quite used to him. Thus emboldened, he occasionally offered himself as an escort to the ladies in their walks and rides; so that, before three weeks had elapsed, it would have seemed wonderful not to meet at least once in the day; and, in truth, now that they were relations, as Frederic said they were, the greater part of their time was spent together.

But want of space warns us to avoid detail. We shall only hint that Frederic Mountjoy discovered that the law was not his vocation, and that to have applied himself to it with any reasonable hopes of becoming Lord Chancellor, he should have done so at least ten years earlier. Upon second thoughts, too, he began to think he should find occupation for his mind, even in the country, without studying Blackstone, or murdering Macbeth; more especially after a certain event had taken place, of which his uncle must approve, as it would be but following that uncle's good example. Helen loved Shakspeare as much as himself; so at least they could read together, if they did not act. She proved an amateur composer, for she arranged some words he had written (to her) after a winter morning's walk:—she was a painter too, as we have heard,—so was he; for though in the likeness he painted of her, her bright eyes certainly did not look exactly the same way, a child might have known for whom it was intended; and though the complexion was rather cadaverous, the arm-chair in which she sat was wonderfully like. After all the dilletanti have many resources against ennui.

It was a bright May morning, when the church-bells of R—— again rung merrily; but now the young flowers, swayed by a gentle breeze, shook their delicate bells in unison, as they sent forth their odorous greeting to the youthful pair. May! bright May!—the type of their years, with the summer of life before them. As the cavalcade passed The Cottage, it might have been observed that the place was full of work-people, who even on that day could not rest, so much had they to prepare in the next few weeks—for that was to be the residence of Frederic and his wife.

Only one word more—and it is whispered as a secret. They do say that the young people quite manage "dear uncle and aunt."

THE LOST ONE.

Calm thy deep grief, my gentle love,
Nor waste thy bloom in fruitless tears;
Our darling babe, our meek-eyed dove,
Hath gone in his first spotless years.

While we are toiling here below,
No care disturbs his peaceful breast;
Life's various ills he'll never know,
Nor be again by pain distressed.

Methinks our lovely boy I see,
The brightest in that cherub band,
Whose hymns of holy harmony
Ring sweet in heaven's eternal land.

And we, when life's swift sands have passed,
May meet our darling on that shore,
Where find the weary, rest at last,
Where pain and death can come no more.

JANE A. ROSS.

THE FIRST WRONG STEP,
OR,
THE YOUNG MOCKING BIRD.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE FORTUNE TELLER."

"Large streams from little fountains flow."

"Dick."

"Sir?"

"I want a young mocking bird. Do you think you could get me one?"

"I d'no, sir."

"Don't you think you could try?"

"I d'no sir. P'r'aps I might."

"Well, see if you can't. I'll give you half a dollar for one."

"Will you? Then I'll try."

And off Dick started for the woods, without stopping for any further words on the subject."

The two individuals introduced are a good-natured farmer in easy circumstances, and a bright boy, the son of a poor woman in the neighborhood.

As Dick Lawson was hurrying away for the woods, his mind all intent upon finding a nest of young mocking birds, and despoiling it, he met a juvenile companion, named Henry Jones.

"Come, Harry!" he said, in an animated voice, "I want you to go with me."

"Where are you going?" asked the friend.

"I'm going to look for a mocking bird's nest."

"What for?"

"To get a young one. Mr. Acres said he would give me half a dollar for a young mocking bird."

"He did?"

"Yes, he did so!" was the animated reply.

"But don't he know that it's wrong to rob birds' nests?"

"If it had been wrong, Harry, Mr. Acres wouldn't have asked me to have got him a bird. He knows what is right and wrong, as well as any body about here."

"And so does Mr. Milman, our Sunday School teacher; and he says that it is wicked to rob birds' nests. You know he has told us that a good many times."

"But Mr. Acres knows what is right as well as Mr. Milman, and if it had been wrong, he'd never have asked me to get him a bird, I know. And then, you know, he says he'll give me half a dollar for a single bird."

"I wouldn't touch a bird's nest for ten dollars," rejoined Henry Jones, warmly.

"I would then," replied Dick, from whose mind the promised reward had, for the time, completely dispelled every tender impression received both from his mother, who had been very careful of her child, and his teacher at the Sunday School. "But come," he added, "you'll go with me, any how."

"No, not if you are going to rob a bird's nest," firmly responded Henry. "It is wicked to do so."

"Wicked! I don't see any thing so very wicked about it. Mr. Acres is a good man, so every body says, and I know he wouldn't tell me to do a wicked thing."

"I'm sure it is wicked," persevered Henry Jones, "for isn't it taking the poor little birds from their mother? Don't you think it would be wicked for some great giant to come and carry your little sister away off where you could never find her, and shut her up in a cage, and keep her there all her life?"

"No, but birds arn't little children. It's a very different thing. But you needn't talk, Harry; for it's no use. If you'll go along, you shall have half of the money I get for the bird,—if not, why I'll go myself and keep the whole of it."

"I wouldn't go with you for a hundred dollars," said Harry, half-indignantly, turning away.

"Then I'll go myself," was Dick Lawson's sneering reply, as he sprung forward and hurried off to the woods.

He did not, however, feel very easy in mind, although he attempted first to whistle gaily, and then to sing. The remonstrance of Henry Jones had its effect in calling back previous better feelings, induced upon him by the precepts of a pious mother, and the instructions of a judicious Sabbath School teacher. To oppose these, however, was the direct sanction of Mr. Acres, towards whom he had always been taught to look with respect, and the stimulating hope of a liberal reward. These were powerful incentives,—but they could not hush the inward voice of disapprobation, that seemed to speak in a louder and sterner tone with every advancing step. Still, this voice, strong and appealing as it was, could not make him pause or hesitate. Onward he pursued his way, and soon entered the woods and old fields he had fixed in his mind as the scene of his operations.

An hour's diligent search terminated with the discovery of a nest, in which were two young ones, with the mother bird feeding them. This sight touched Dick for a moment, but the strong desire instantly awakened to possess the prize for which he had been seeking, caused him to drive off the old bird, who commenced fluttering about the spot, uttering cries and showing signs of deep distress

These, although he could not help feeling them, had not the effect to cause him to desist. In a few moments he had one of the birds safely in his possession, with which he bounded off in great delight.

"Well, Dick, have you got me my bird?" said Mr. Acres, as Dick came puffing and blowing into his presence.

"Yes, indeed!" returned Dick, with a broad smile of pleasure, presenting the bird he had abstracted from its warm, soft nest.

"You are a fine smart boy, Dick, and will make a man one of these days!" said Mr. Acres, patting Dick on the head, encouragingly. Then taking the bird, he toyed with it for a while, fondly—fed it, and finally placed it in a cage. The promised half dollar, which was promptly paid to the lad, made him feel rich. As he was about leaving the house of Mr. Acres, the latter called to him:

"Look here, Dick, my fine fellow, don't you want a dog? Here's Rover, the very chap for you."

"May I have Rover?" eagerly asked Dick, his eyes glistening with delight.

"Yes. I've more dogs now than I want."

"He fights like the mischief!" ejaculated Dick, surveying the dog proudly. As he did so, the animal, seeing himself particularly noticed, walked up to Dick, and rubbed himself against the lad familiarly.

"He'll whip any dog in the neighborhood," Mr. Acres said.

"And you'll give him to me."

"O yes. I've got too many dogs now."

"Here, Rover! Here, Rover! Here! Here! Here!" cried Dick in an animated tone, starting off. The dog followed quickly, and in a few moments both were out of sight.

"A smart chap that!" Mr. Acres remarked to himself, as Dick bounded off. "He'll make something before he dies, I'll guarantee."

The possession of the dog and half dollar, especially the latter, was strongly objected to by Dick's mother.

"How could you, my son, think of robbing a poor bird of her little young ones?" she said seriously and reprovingly.

"But, mother, Mr. Acres wanted me to get him a bird, and of course I could not say 'no.' What would he have thought of me?"

"You never should do wrong for any one."

"But if it had been so very wrong, Mr. Acres never would have asked me to have done it, I know," urged Dick.

Mrs. Lawson would have made her son take back the money he had received, if almost any other one in the village but Mr. Acres had been concerned.—But he was well off, and influential; and, moreover, she rented from him, and was behindhand with her rent, which he never took the trouble to ask for. The dog, too, would have been sent back, if any one but Mr. Acres had given it to her son. As it was, she had to content herself with merely reprimanding Dick for robbing the bird's nest, and enjoining on him not to be guilty of so cruel an act again for any one.

About three days after this event, Dick, accompanied by Rover—now his inseparable companion—met his young friend, Henry Jones, who had with him his father's large house-dog, Bose.

"Whose dog is that?" asked Henry.

"He's mine," replied Dick.

"Yours!"

"Be sure he is."

"Why that is Mr. Acres' Rover."

"Not now he isn't Mr. Acres gave him to me."

"What did he give him to you for?"

"For getting him a young mocking bird."

"I thought he promised you half-a-dollar?"

"So he did; and, what is more, gave it to me, and Rover into the bargain."

"Well, I wouldn't have robbed a bird's nest for a dozen Rovers," Henry Jones said, warmly.

"Wouldn't you, indeed!" returned Dick, with a sneer.

"No, I would not. It's wicked."

"O, you're very pious! But Rover can whip your Bose, any how."

"No he can't, though," replied Henry, quickly, who could not bear to hear his father's faithful and favorite old dog's courage called in question.

"Yes, but he can, ten times a day. There, Rover! There—sic!—sic!—sic'em him!" At the same time pushing Rover against Bose.

Both dogs growled low, and showed their teeth, but that was all.

"Rover's afraid to touch him!" Henry said, a good deal excited.

"No he isn't, though!" returned Dick, his face glowing with interest; and lifting up the fore feet of Rover, he threw him full against old Bose, who received the onset with a deep growl, and a strong impression of his teeth on Rover.

This brought on the battle. Bose was nine or ten years old, and somewhat worn down by age and hard service, while Rover had numbered but two years, and was full of fire and vigor. Still the victory was not soon decided. During the fight, each of the boys entered into the spirit of the contest almost as much as the dogs. First one would interfere to secure for his favorite the victory, and then the other, until, at last, Dick struck Henry; and then they went at it likewise, and fought nearly as long, and certainly with as much desire to injure each other as did the dogs themselves. The result was, that both Henry and Bose had to yield, and then the parties separated, indulging against each other bitter and angry feelings. But with Dick, there was an emotion of cruel delight at having triumphed over his friend. As he was crossing a field, on his way home, he met Mr. Acres.

"Why, what's the matter with you and Rover?" the farmer asked.

"Rover's had a fight," replied Dick.

"Ah! Who with?"

"Mr. Jones' Bose."

"Well, which whipped?"

"Rover of course," replied Dick, with a smile of triumph; "and I can make him whip anything."

"You're a keen chap, Dick," Mr. Acres said, patting the boy on the head, "and are going to make a man one of these days, I see plain enough. So Rover whipt. I knew there was prime stuff in him."

"There isn't another such a fellow in these 'ere parts," was Dick's proud answer.

"But you look a little the worse for wear, as well as Rover. Have you been fighting, too?"

Dick held down his head for a moment, and then looking up into Mr. Acres' face, said,

"Yes, sir," in rather a sheepish way.

"Ah! Well, who have you been fighting with?"

"With Harry Jones. He didn't want to give Rover fair play; and once, when he had Bose down, he kicked him."

"And then you kicked him for kicking your dog?"

"Yes, sir."

"That was right. Never permit a friend to be imposed upon. And after that you had a regular fight?"

"Yes, sir."

"Which whipped?"

"I gave him a bloody nose; and shouldn't wonder if he had a black eye into the bargain. And, what is more, made him cry 'enough.'"

"That was right. Never fight but in a good cause, and then be sure to whip your man."

"It'll take a smarter boy than Harry Jones to whip me," Dick said proudly.

"And you think Rover can whip any thing about here?"

"Yes, indeed. And I'm going to make him do it, too."

"You'd better not try him against Markland's old Nero."

"He'll whip him in ten minutes."

"I'm not so sure of that. Nero is a great deal bigger and stronger."

"I don't care if he is. I'm learning Rover a trick that'll make him whip a dog twice his size."

"What is that?"

Dick called Rover, and the dog came up to him wagging his tail.

"Give us your paw," said the boy in a tone of authority.

The dog instantly lifted one of his fore feet, which Dick took in his hand, and began to squeeze gently at first, and then, by degrees, harder and harder, ejaculating all the while, in a quick, distinct tone—"Leg him! leg him! leg him!" until the dog, from first indicating signs of pain, began to whine, and then to yell out as if in agony. At this, Dick dropped the foot, and looked up into the farmer's face.

"Well, Dick, what does all that mean?" asked Mr. Acres.

"I'm learning him to catch hold of the foot," replied the boy.

"The mischief you are!"

"Yes, sir. And when he's fairly up to it, he can whip any dog, if he's as big as an elephant."

"But can you learn him?"

"I made him catch Jones' Bose by the foot this morning, and it would have done your heart good to have heard him yell. If he isn't lame for a month, then I don't know anything about it."

"There's no fear of you, I see," was Mr. Acres' encouraging reply to this, again patting Dick on the head.

In about two weeks from that time it was pretty well known through the neighborhood that Dick Lawson had given out that he could make his Rover whip Markland's Nero, a noble animal that had never been matched by any dog around. Markland's son, Bob, felt his pride in his dog touched at this, and challenged Dick to a battle. The time was set, and the place, a neighboring old field, chosen. Old and young seemed to take an interest in the matter, and when the time arrived, and Dick appeared on the ground with his dog, there were assembled, men and boys, at least one hundred persons, and among the rest, Mr. Acres, who began to feel somewhat drawn towards his protege, Dick.

The two dogs were brought forward, by the two lads, whose parents knew nothing of the affair, and by pushing them against, and throwing them upon, each other, irritated and angered until they finally went to work in real earnest, greatly to the delight of the lookers-on. Rover fought bravely, but he was evidently no match for his larger and stronger antagonist, who tore him savagely, while he seemed unable to penetrate Nero's thick, yielding skin. The shouts that arose from the group around were all in favor of Nero, who was a general favorite—as he was one of those large, peaceable, benevolent fellows, believing his name, whom all like, while there was something of the churl and savage about Rover, that caused him to have but few friends.

The contest had waged about ten minutes, fiercely, and Rover was evidently getting "worsted," when Dick, who had been constantly encouraging his dog, stooped close to his ear, and spoke something in a low, quick, energectic tone.

Instantly Rover crouched down, and, darting forward, seized the fore paw of Nero in his mouth, and commenced gnawing it eagerly. The noble animal, thus unexpectedly and basely assailed, found the pain to which he was suddenly subjected, so great as to take away all power of resistance. But he would not utter a cry, but sat down and permitted the other dog to gnaw away at his tender foot, without a single sign of suffering. As the cry of pain, the dog's "enough," was to terminate the battle, the fine fellow was permitted thus to suffer for several minutes, before the bystanders came forward and pulled Dick Lawson's dog off. Nero would have died before a sound could have been extorted from him.

As Nero had not cried enough, Bob Markland contended, afterwards, that his dog had not been whipped, to settle which difference of opinion he and Dick had several hard battles, in which the latter, like his dog, always came off victor. The upshot of all these contests was, the expulsion of Dick from the Sabbath school, into which he carried the bickerings engendered through the week. Another reason for his expulsion was the frequency with which he played truant, and of his having, in several instances, enticed other boys away from the school for the same purpose.

Except Mr. Acres, nearly every man, woman, and child, in the neighborhood sincerely disliked, and some actually hated Dick Lawson, for there was hardly a family some member of which had not been annoyed by him in one form or another. But Mr. Acres liked the spirit of the lad, as well as his thorough independence in regard to the opinions of others.

This man, who had first thrown temptation into the lad's way, and encouraged him to persevere in conduct which nearly all condemned, was not a willfully bad man. By most people he was called a good-hearted, benevolent person. The truth was, he was not a wise man. When young, he had indulged in such amusements as catching young birds, fighting dogs and cocks, and attending horse races, and all the exciting scenes to which he could get access. But none of these things corrupted him so far as to make him a bad man in the community. As he grew up, he gradually laid aside his boyish follies; saved up his money; bought himself a small farm, and, in time, became quite a substantial man, so far as worldly goods were concerned.

Contrasted with himself were several lads whose parents had been exceedingly strict with them, who had, as they grew up and shook off the trammels of childhood and youth, run into wild extravagances of conduct, and some into wicked and vicious habits, from which they were never reclaimed. Contrasting his own case with theirs, his short-sighted conclusion was that boys ought to be allowed as much freedom as possible, and this was why he encouraged Dick, who was an exceedingly bright lad, in the course he had been so willing to pursue. He knew nothing at all of the different hereditary tendencies to evil that exist in the mind. His observation had never led him to see how two persons, raised in precisely the same manner, would turn out very differently—the one proving a good and the other a bad citizen. His knowledge of human nature, therefore, never for a moment caused him to suspect, that in encouraging a feeling of cruelty in Dick Lawson, he might be only putting blood upon the tongue of a young lion. That there might be in his mind, hereditary tendencies to evil, that encouragement to rob a bird's nest, or to set two dogs to fighting, by one occupying his position and influence, might cause to become so active as to ultimately make him a curse to society.

And such, in a year or two, Dick seemed becoming. He had, in that time, although but fourteen years of age, got almost beyond his mother's control. His dog and himself were the terror of nearly all the dogs and boys in the neighborhood, for both were surly, quarrelsome, and tyrannical. Even Mr. Acres had found it necessary to forbid him to appear on his premises. Rover having temporarily lamed, time after time, every one of his dogs, and Dick having twice beaten two of his black boys, farm hands, because of some slight offence. To be revenged on him for this, he robbed a fine apricot tree of all its fruit, both green and ripe, on the very night before Mr. Acres had promised to send a basket full, the first produced in the neighborhood that spring, to a friend who was very much esteemed by him.

Though he strongly suspected Dick, yet he had no proof of the fact, and so made no attempt to have him punished.

Shortly after, the boy was apprenticed to a Tanner and Currier, a severe man, chosen as his master, in the hope that his rigid discipline might do something towards reclaiming him. As the Tanner had as many dogs as he wanted, he objected to the reception into his yard of Dick's ill-natured cur. But Dick told his mother that, unless Rover were allowed to go with him, he would not go to the trade selected for him. He was resolute in this, and at last Mrs. Lawson persuaded Mr. Skivers, the Tanner, to take him, dog and all.

In his new place, he did not get along, except for a very short time without trouble. At the end of the third month, for neglect of work, bad language, and insolence, but particularly for cruelties practised upon a dog that had got the mastery over Rover, Mr. Skivers gave him a most tremendous beating. Dick resisted, and fought with might and main, but he was but a boy, and in the hands of a strong and determined man. For a time this cowed Dick, but in the same ratio that his courage fell when he thought of resisting his master single-handed, rose his bitter hate against him. Skivers was a man, who, if he had reason to dislike any one about him, could not let his ill feelings remain quiescent. He must be doing something all the while to let the victim of his displeasure feel that he was no favorite. Towards Dick, he therefore maintained a most offensive demeanor, and was constantly saying or doing something to chafe the boy's feelings. This was borne as patiently as possible, for he did not again wish to enter into a contention in which he must inevitably come out second best. Skivers was not long in perceiving that the way to punish Dick the most severely was to abuse his dog; and he therefore commenced a systematic process of worrying Rover. This Dick could illy bear. Every time his master would drive Rover from the yard, or throw sticks or stones at him, the boy would make a new and more bitter vow of retaliation in some form.

One day, Rover and a large dog belonging to Skivers, got into a fight about something. Dick's interest in his dog brought him at once to the scene of action. His master, seeing this, ordered him in a harsh, angry tone, to clear out and mind his own business. As he did so, he took up a large club, and commenced beating Rover in a most cruel manner. Dick could not stand this. His blood was up to fever heat in an instant. Seizing a long, heavy pole, used for turning and adjusting hides in the vats, he sprang towards Skivers, and giving the pole a rapid sweep, brought it with tremendous force against his head, knocking him into a vat half full of a strong infusion of astringent bark, to the bottom of which he instantly sunk.

So incensed did the lad feel, that he made not the slightest attempt to extricate his master from a situation in which death must have inevitably ensued in a few minutes, but walked away to another part of the yard. Two or three journeymen, however, who witnessed the whole affair, were on the spot in a moment, and fished out the body of Skivers. He was completely insensible, and the blood flowed freely from a large wound on his head. A physician was immediately called, who bled him profusely. This brought him back to consciousness. In a day or two he was out again, and apparently as well as ever. In the meantime, both Dick and his inseparable companion, Rover, had disappeared, and gone no one knew whither. No effort was made to discover the place to which the boy had fled, as every one was too much rejoiced that he had left the village, to care about getting him back. About twelve months after, his mother died; her gray hairs brought down to the grave in sorrow. Year after year then passed away, and the memory of the lad was gradually effaced from the minds of all, or retained only among the dim recollections of the past.

Mr. Acres, who had first placed temptations in the way of Dick Lawson, continued to prosper in all external things, and to hold his position of influence and respectability in the neighborhood. He, perhaps, more than others, thought about the lad in whom he had once felt a good deal of pride and interest, as exhibiting a fair promise for the future. But he never felt exactly easy in mind when he did think of him. Something whispered to him that, perhaps, he had been to blame in encouraging his wild habits. But, then, how could he have dreamed, he would argue, that the boy had so strong a tendency to evil in him as the result had proved. He had once been just as fond as Dick had shown himself to be, for birds'-nesting, dog-fighting, &c.; but then, as soon as he had sown a few wild oats, he sobered down into a steady and thrifty farmer, of regular habits. And he, of course expected to see Dick Lawson do the same.

"And who knows but he has?" he would sometimes say, in an effort at self-consolation.

It was some five or six years from the time that Dick left the village, that Mr. Acres was awakened one night from sleep by a dream that some one had opened the door of the chamber where he slept. So distinct was the impression on his mind that some one had entered, that he lay perfectly still, with his eyes peering into the darkness around, in order to detect the presence of any one, should the impression on his mind really be true. He had lain thus, with every sense acutely active, for only a moment or two, when a sound, as of a stealthy footstep, came distinctly upon his ear, and at the same moment a dark body seemed to move before his eyes, as if crossing the room towards that part of it where stood a large secretary, in which was usually contained considerable sums of money.

Mr. Acres was a brave man, but thus suddenly awakened from sleep to find himself placed in such an emergency, made him tremble. He continued to lie very still, straining his eyes upon the dark moving object intently, until the figure of a man became perfectly distinct. The robber, for such the intruder evidently was, had now reached the secretary, where he stood for a few moments, quietly endeavoring to open it. Finding it locked, he moved off, and passed around the room, feeling every chair and table that came in his way. This Mr. Acres could now distinctly perceive, as his eyes had become used to the feeble light reflected from the starry sky without.—At last his hands came in contact with a chair upon which the farmer had laid his clothes on disrobing himself for bed. These seemed to be the objects of his search, for he paused with a quick, eager movement, and commenced searching the ample pockets of a large waistcoat. The slight jingle of the farmer's bunch of keys, soon explained the movement. Before the robber had fairly gotten back to the secretary, Mr. Acre's courage had returned, and with it no small share of indignation. He rose up silently, but, unfortunately, as his foot touched the floor, it came in contact with a chair, which was thrown over with a loud noise. Before he could reach a large cane, for which he was making, a heavy blow from the robber laid him senseless.

When again conscious, Mr. Acres found himself still in total darkness. On attempting to move, there was an instant almost intolerable pain in his head, as if from a violent blow. On lifting his hand and placing it upon the spot where the pain seemed most severe, it came in contact with a cold, slimy mass of what he at once knew to be blood. His first effort to rise was accompanied by a feeling of faintness, that caused him to stretch himself again upon the floor, where he lay for some time endeavoring to collect his scattered senses. After he had fully comprehended the meaning of his alarming situation, he made another and more successful effort to arise. Sitting up in the middle of the room, and straining his eyes into the darkness, he began to see more and more distinctly each moment. He was soon satisfied that he was alone. It did not take long after this to arouse the whole house. An examination resulted in determining the fact that his secretary had been robbed of five hundred dollars in gold.

By daylight, the whole neighborhood was aroused, and some twenty or thirty men were in hot pursuit of the robber, who was arrested about twenty miles away from the village, and brought back. The money taken from the secretary of Mr. Acres, was found upon his person, and fully identified. The man proved to be quite young, seeming to have passed but recently beyond the limit of maturity. But, even young as he was, there was a look of cruel and hardened villainy about him, and an expression of settled defiance of all consequences. He gave his name as Frederick Hildich. A brief examination resulted in his committal to await the result of a trial for burglary at the next court.

The day of trial at length came. The action of the court was brief, as no defence was set up, and the proof of the crime clear and to the point. During the progress of the trial, the prisoner seemed to take little interest in what was going on around him, but sat in the bar, with his head down, seemingly lost in deep abstraction of mind. At the conclusion of the proceedings, when the court asked what he had to say why the sentence of the law should not be pronounced upon him, the prisoner slowly arose to his feet, lifted his head, and glanced calmly around for a few moments, until his eyes rested upon Mr. Acres, whom he regarded for a few moments with a fixed, penetrating and meaning look. Then turning to the Bench, he said, in a firm, distinct voice:—

"Your Honor—Although I have nothing to urge against the execution of the laws by which I am condemned, I would yet crave the privilege of making a few remarks, which may, perhaps, be useful. The principal witness against me is Mr. Acres,—and upon his testimony mainly, so far as positive proof goes, I am convicted of a crime, the commission of which I have no particular reason for wishing to deny. But, if I have wronged him, how far more deeply has he wronged me. If I have robbed him of a few paltry dollars, he has robbed me of that which he can never restore, either here or hereafter. In a word, your Honor, I stand up here in the presence of this Court, and the people of this town, and charge upon that man (pointing to Acres) the cause of my present condition. My real name is Richard Lawson!"

As he said this, the prisoner's voice failed him, and he paused for a few moments overcome with emotion. A universal exclamation of surprise passed through the Court room, and there was scarcely an individual present, who did not wonder why he had not discovered this fact for himself long before. For, sure enough, it was Dick Lawson, and no one else, that stood there humbled under the iron hand of the law. As for Mr. Acres, he became instantly pale and agitated—and when the prisoner again looked up and fixed his eyes upon him, his own fell to the floor, as if he were conscience stricken.

"To that man," resumed the individual at the bar, pointing steadily towards the farmer, "as I have just said, am I indebted for my ruin. A wild, but innocent boy, he first seduced me into conscious wrong, by tempting me with money to rob a bird's nest.—The young mocking bird was procured for him, but at the expense of a violated conscience, for a voice within me spoke loudly against the act of cruelty, about to be practised upon the mother bird and her young. But I stifled that inward monitor, and stilled the voice that urged me to depart not from the path of innocence. I saw that the act was a cruel one, and felt that it was a cruel one—but to be asked to do even a wrong act by a man to whom I looked up as I then did to Mr. Acres, was to rob the wrong act of more than half of its apparent evil—and so I performed the cruel deed, small as it was, deliberately. From the moment I took the young bird in my hand, all my scruples were gone, and after that it was one of my greatest pleasures to rob birds' nests, and to kill the older birds with stones. My dog Rover, who is no doubt as well remembered as myself, was given me by Mr. Acres, and I was, moreover, encouraged by that individual to make Rover fight, and to fight myself whenever it came in the way. Had he discouraged this in me; had he told me that fighting was wrong, his precept for good would have been as powerful as his precept for evil. He was kind to me, and had gained my entire confidence, and could have made almost anything of me. My cruel, tyrannizing temper, thus encouraged, grew rapidly, until at last I took no delight in any good. Finally expelled from the Sabbath school, and persecuted for my ill-behaviour and annoyance of almost every one, I became reckless, and finally left this neighborhood. Five or six years of evil brought me at last into a strait. I could not gain even a common livelihood. I must starve or steal. In this state I thought of my corruptor—of the man who had been the cause of my wretchedness, and I resolved that he should, as least, pay some small penalty for what he had done. In a word, I resolved to rob him—and did so. And now I stand here to await the sentence of the law for this crime."

The prisoner then suffered his head to fall upon his bosom, and sank slowly into the seat from which he had arisen. A profound and oppressive silence reigned through the Court room, broken at last by the Judge, who said—

"Richard Lawson, alias Frederick Hildich, stand up, and receive the sentence of the law."

The prisoner arose, and looked the Judge steadily in the face, while a sentence of imprisonment in the Penitentiary for three years was pronounced upon him, in a voice of assumed sternness.

When the unfortunate man was removed by an officer the crowd slowly withdrew, conversing in low subdued voices, and Mr. Acres turned his step homeward, the unhappiest man of all who had stood that day in the presence of offended justice.

And here we must leave the parties most concerned in the events of our brief story. Richard Lawson to fill up the term of his imprisonment in the Penitentiary; and Mr. Acres to muse, in painful abstraction of mind, over the ruin his thoughtlessness had wrought—the ruin of an immortal mind—the corruption of a fellow creature, born to become an angel of heaven, but changed by his agency into a fit subject for the abodes of evil spirits.

SPIRIT OF THE NIGHT WIND.

BY LIEUT. G. W. PATTEN, U. S. A.

A sound went forth through the midnight sky,
Like the voice of a whisper rushing by;
Anon through the forest it rose and fell,
Like the distant chime of a convent bell.
And who art thou of varied tone,
Floating around us with murmurs lone;
That cometh unseen, by the stars' dim light,
Startling the ear 'mid the hush of night?

Like the voice of a spirit that wrestles in prayer,
A tone replied on the viewless air—
"And who art thou?"—I'm a prince of power,
The fitful lord of the midnight hour.
The wary watcher knows my breath,
Lifting the veil from the brow of death,
He knows as I show him the pale, pale sight,
The voice of the lonely wind of night.

Though much be mine, I never may tell
Where I sit by day in my secret cell;
'Mid clouds above—on the tranquil lea,
Or in caves beneath—by the sounding sea.
But I leave my home when the day grows dim,
Commencing at eve my mystic hymn;
And I wander the earth around, around,
Breathing abroad its thrilling sound.

I have heard the infant's plaintive wail,
Where the mother sat by the taper pale;
With unwearied love to her patient breast,
Pressing the charge that had broke her rest;
I have seen the tear unconscious glow,
As she sealed with a kiss its brow of snow,
And have come, as she watched its wakeful eyes,
And fill'd her breast with my own low sighs.

I have plumed my wing where the calm moon shone,
On brows which told of a battle done:
And I've lifted the banner which all day long
Was borne aloft by the day-breeze strong;
I have raised it again from the blood-stained ground;
But where were the hearts that had hemm'd it round?
I have tossed it once more to its native sky,—
But where were the hands that had borne it high?

"And who art thou?"—I'm a prince of power,
The fitful lord of the midnight hour!
I people the woods with mysterious things,
Sweeping their harps of thousand strings,
'Till the red deer looks from his covert lone,
Startled with sounds that are all my own;
And the blood-hound bays with a smothered cry,
Dreaming again that the chase goes by.

I pass o'er ocean on wings of night,
Sprinkling my path with stars of light,*
Changing the cheek from red to pale,
As I burst asunder the bellowing sail;
Ye may trace my track on the murky main,
By the eyes that watch for land in vain,
By the hands outstretched where the black cloud lies,
And the voices that plead for morning's skies.

Yet I'm oft where pleasure avoids the day,
Passing with mirth on her rosy way;
O'er fair young brows my pinions glance,
Quick'ning the step of the festive dance;
And when the drooping eye-lids fall,
And the lights grow dim in the sounding hall,
I come to the maiden's couch of rest,
To whisper the name that she loves the best.

But bid me not tarry till rise of sun,
Ere morn shall break must my course be run;
I have yet to portion out hopes and fears,
From my mighty burden of smiles and tears;
There are thrilling hearts that must know me well,
Ere I return to my mystic cell:
The winds of day may be kings of power,
But I am the Lord of the midnight hour.

* Every person who has been on the Ocean, is familiar with the luminous appearance of the waves when stirred by the wind at night.

THE TWO FATHERS.

A TRUE STORY.

BY J. T. S. SULLIVAN.

Many years ago, there arrived on our shores a Mr. L.*, an English gentleman, who had invested some amount of money in this country, which, owing to heavy losses in England, he now regarded as his only means of support. He brought with him his wife and daughter Emily, an only child, just then on the verge of womanhood. Her education had been carefully bestowed, more so than that of most young ladies. She possessed, too, genuine feminine beauty to a high degree. Her figure was slight, but well developed for her age; her dark brown hair fell in natural ringlets over her snow-white neck; in her deep hazle eye one could read the mild disposition which had endeared her to all those who knew her, while its depth of thought and of feeling gave an enhanced charm to the expression of her exquisitely chisselled features.

Strangers in this land, they had neither home nor friends. Although to part from his loved ones was a severe trial to the father and husband, yet he deemed it cruel to subject his wife and child to the hardships of a life in the West, where he was forced to seek for the result of his investments. He determined, therefore, during his absence, to leave them in New York, in which city he procured for them comfortable lodgings in one of the most respectable boarding-houses. During the summer months Mr. L.* was absent on his tour, endeavouring to rescue something from the wreck of his fortune. In winter he passed his days with his family, to whom he looked alone for comfort and solace. Four years had thus flown by, and Emily had reached to womanhood.—The bright promise of beauty which her childhood extended, had been fulfilled. To see her was to admire; to know was to love this charming creature.

At the boarding-house where they had been residing since their arrival, they met with a young gentleman of pleasing manners, who was employed by sundry wealthy merchants in the city as a supercargo in the Chinese trade. He was intelligent, good-looking, and prepossessing in his manners. He fell in love with Emily. Every opportunity was afforded while on shore, to enjoy the society of this lovely being. His efforts had proved successful. And after his last voyage, which had been unusually fortunate, he determined to relinquish his sea life, and take up his permanent abode on terra firma. It was after this determination had been taken, that young George W declared his passion to Emily. Her parents were undecided, whether this gentleman would, in all respects, be able to secure their child's happiness. On learning, however, how deeply interested were Emily's feelings, they hesitated no more, but gave their consent, and George saw himself accepted as the acknowledged lover of the beautiful Miss L.*. Many were the congratulations bestowed upon him, and many an aspirant to the fair Emily's hand envied George in his success. The time was fixed for the wedding, and at the altar of the Church the two were joined in that bond, which death alone should sever. A small house was rented, and the happy pair soon took possession of their new domicile.

During the summer the mother became the guest of her daughter; in winter the father again occupied apartments with his wife in the house they had lived in since their first arrival. During the second summer a letter was received, informing Mrs. L.* that her husband lay dangerously ill in one of the Western villages. No sooner had she learned the sad intelligence, than she resolved to hasten to his side, to comfort him and to nurse him. George was unable to accompany her, so that the dutiful wife, unwilling to await the finding of an escort, started off alone on her perilous journey. Buoyed up by hopes, she hurried on as fast as the uncertain communication of places in those days would permit, and finally reached the village of Kaskaskia in time to receive the last instructions and blessings of the devoted partner of her life. With a broken heart she followed the corpse to the grave. The tedious journey, the fatigue, the long suspense, and the fatal termination of her husband's illness, had so completely worn upon the constitution and mind of the widowed mother, that she was overtaken by a fever, which threatened to place her speedily by the side of one, whose death had left the future without promise, and the present dreary and lone. Aided by the skill of physicians, she slowly recovered. With the advice of her friends, she remained in the West long enough to settle her husband's affairs, from which she succeeded in realizing near ten thousand dollars. This sum she had sent to New York, and then turned her own steps towards that city, which now contained the only object she loved on earth, her child.

The jaunt, the fever, and the anxiety of her long absence, had in a great measure undermined her constitution, at no time robust. Such had been the ravages made by disease, care and sorrow, that Emily burst into tears on beholding her dear mother again. Four years had passed since the union of her daughter with George W. These years had beheld a happy and contented home. The mother had resided with her son-in-law since her husband's death, but had never recovered from the shock she then received. It was now evident that she was rapidly failing in strength and health. Yet, although the event had been long anticipated, her death was a sudden blow to Emily. She felt herself alone in the world, and wept long and bitterly over the irreparable loss. But time with its healing influence soothed her grief, and softened the sting of affliction. The little girl, now three years of age, that had blessed their union, had become the idol of her parents,—and promised to rival her mother in charms and beauty. The fifth year broke upon their tranquil course of life. Emily presented her husband another daughter. She perceived, however, that there was no apparent evidence of corresponding joy on the part of George at this accession to their family. A weight seemed to hang over him. He lost the joyous expression of countenance he had worn, and seemed much depressed in spirits. One morning when the infant had attained her fifth week, George approached the bedside of his wife, and disclosed his intention of once again resuming his former life, giving as a reason for this unexpected determination, the serious losses he had then lately met with, to repair which he had already agreed to make a voyage.

Ever ready to sacrifice her own feelings for the welfare of those in whom she felt the deepest interest, she at once bowed to the necessity of this step. Urging her husband to explain the cause of these losses, she received very unsatisfactory answers.—Believing the subject a painful one, she made no further enquiries, but gave all necessary orders for the preparation of his voyage.

The morning came, and amid the tears and prayers of his doting wife, George W tore himself from the home, where, to all appearances, he had passed and enjoyed years of tranquil happiness.—Emily drove down in a carriage to the wharf, and with her eldest daughter, now four years old, she watched through her tears the lessening sail, which bore away the object of her affection and love. Never more did she behold him!

A few days after this farewell, a gentleman of the Bar, highly esteemed and respected both in his private and professional character, called to inform her of the means provided for her support. This statement, he said, was made in compliance with her husband's request.

"Owing to sundry severe losses in business, Madam, Mr. W has been obliged to sell his property, for the purpose of raising money, all of which he has invested in this voyage. The property which your father left is at interest in the Life Insurance Company, and yields six hundred dollars a-year. The furniture is yours, and the rent of your house has been paid two years in advance, so that this income of six hundred dollars will be all you will have to cover your expenses; and I sincerely hope you may find it sufficient."

Poor Emily was grieved to hear of these losses, but the fact of the rent having been paid two years in advance startled her, and she was now struggling against the fears this singular provision awakened.—She enquired of the counsellor the object of such foresight, but he seemed as ignorant as herself.

"He told me he would return in ten months, or a year at most—and to provide two years ahead?"

"Perhaps, Madam, he has done this to protect you against the possibility of want, should his voyage prove unsuccessful."

"True! very true! That must have been his object. George was ever thoughtful of the future!"

With these reflections to console her solitude, the counsellor took his leave. She felt, however, that there was something mysterious in the sudden resolve to resume sea-life, and his arrangement for her support, yet, unwilling to dwell on such a painful contemplation, she believed these fears to arise from her weak condition, and lulled herself to rest with the memories of the past.

Daily did she examine the papers for some mention of the "Mary Elizabeth," the name of the ship in which her husband had sailed. For several months she looked in vain, but, after the fifth had passed, she read a notice that the "Mary Elizabeth" had put into some port in distress, having been dismasted in one of the raging tempests of the China Seas; but the note —"all well on board"—quieted all her fears. Ten months elapsed, and no news arrived from her husband. A year passed, still no communication, no letter, not even a massage arrived; nor could she even hear of any one who had seen him. This length of time naturally created intense anxiety as to his fate. Sweet sleep deserted her couch, and one absorbing thought, one sole subject, occupied her mind. At length it was reported that the "Mary Elizabeth" was "below." Almost insane with suspense, she waited on the wharf for the news-boat to arrive. It touched the landing stairs, the mate was pointed out to Emily, who rushed upon the astonished sailor, and, with an eager eye, enquired—

"Where is Mr. W***?"

"I don't know, Madam! We left him at Batavia, and since that time we ain't heard of him!"

Sinking under the weight of disappointment, she tottered back to the carriage which had brought her to the wharf, and there gave vent to her anguish in tears. This last blow had been too much for her.—During the last three months she had been supported by the belief, that the captain of the ship would bring her certain information of her George. This support now failed her, and she knew not on what to hang a hope. She was confined to her room for several days nor did she regain the former elasticity of spirit, which had once been her most attractive charm.

But the poor mother's sorrows did not end here. The bank, or company, in which all her fortune had been invested, suddenly became insolvent. It was a terrible blow! The news was broken to her in the gentlest manner, but she had no sooner become fully aware of the extent of her misery, than she seized her two daughters in her arms, and, with sobs and tears, as she bent her head over them, exclaimed—

"Oh, God! have mercy on my innocent babes, for I am weak and friendless!"

It was some time before she realized the extent of misery which now stared her in the face. It was true, the rent of the house had been paid two years in advance, and there was nearly twelve months before the lease expired. But how live in the meanwhile? She determined to sell the lease, and dispose of such furniture as she did not need, to raise a fund; then to take one room, and while the means thus obtained would supply all necessaries for herself and children, she could find employment for her needle, to which she could alone look for a livelihood.

As soon as she had found a suitable apartment, she carried her plan into execution. The bitterness of this change was softened by the hope, aye, more, the firm belief that George would soon return to dispell her doubts, and restore her home. She regarded her lonely apartment as a temporary place of abode, and contented herself with the self-satisfaction of having done her duty, rather than to claim assistance from those who might refuse her their aid.

She sought for the counsellor who had visited her after her husband's departure, and imparted to him all that had been done. He approved of her course, and promised to procure employment for her, if it should be in his power. Touched by the sad beauty of the now altered Emily, and by the wonderful change her grief had made, he deeply sympathized with her sufferings, and took the most sincere interest in her welfare. No immediate necessity pressed upon her. The means realized from the sale of the lease and of her furniture, were ample to keep want from her door, at least for months ahead. Still she was aware that these means were very limited, and would soon be exhausted, especially as she possessed no further property from which to derive support.

Months passed away and no intelligence of her husband came! Not even a letter, that insufficient, yet welcome substitute, arrived to cheer her solitude.—

Months had lengthened into years, yet no tidings from the absent one; and after hoping against hope, the unhappy wife was compelled to believe that he had found a grave in the capacious bosom of the remorseless ocean. Long did she cling to the expectation, that he would in some way relieve her agonized mind; yet when day after day, month after month, and year after year rolled by, she could not solve the question of his absence, or his silence, in any other way, than by the belief that he was no longer among the living.

Her sorrow was deep and heartfelt, but in addition to these afflictions, poverty had laid its hand upon her, and the widow was forced by her needle to earn a maintenance for herself and little ones. Ten long, desolate, hopeless years did she labour, early and late, for the miserable pittance which is ever grudgingly bestowed upon an humble seamstress. Nor had she a single bright spot in the future, not the gleam of a prospect, to allay the increasing anxiety for her children, when she should be gathered to those who had left her happy and contented.

By some accident, she was seen by a merchant, visiting the house of one of the ladies for whom she worked. Struck by her gentleness of manner, her dignity, and her extreme beauty, now much faded, he was led to inquire into her character. All he could learn but served to increase the interest his first interview had awakened. He sought means to become acquainted, and this acquaintance progressed from sympathy to friendship, from friendship to love. He finally offered his hand, and was accepted. This second marriage metamorphosed the home of the widow to a paradise. She was at once surrounded by every comfort, every luxury; but, above all, her dear children were now provided for, and their education attended to. The husband proved also a good and affectionate father to her children. They soon learned to love him, and every day beheld them more happy and contented, and he saw, too, the mother's heart relieved from that burden of care and anxiety, which had threatened to undermine her health, and bring her to an early grave.

Fifteen years passed away; the daughters were married, and furnished by their step-father with every comfort requisite in their new vocation of housekeepers. But a few months elapsed after their quitting his roof, when the mother was taken ill and died.—The unhappy and desolate husband immediately took up his abode with the youngest daughter, who was rejoiced to offer a home to the widowed benefactor of her youth.

After an absence of thirty years, during which no tidings had been received, no intelligence of him brought to the knowledge of his family, the first husband appeared as suddenly as he had departed.

There were strange rumors afloat of slave trading, piracy, smuggling and the like, but they were mere gossip, idle whispers of conjecture rather than of truth. Whatever the motive that could have induced him to pursue such a course of conduct towards a lovely and affectionate wife, and his pretty, helpless children, must be imagined. He maintained on these points the most obstinate silence. Be they pardonable or not, true it was, that on his return he manifested the deepest interest in their concerns.

When informed of his wife's second marriage, he raved like a madman; he swore vengeance against the man who had dared to estrange her love from him. He had revisited the city as a very wealthy man. He devised means for his revenge, but they were all futile. At last, he chanced to meet with one of those reptiles of the law, who may be found working about the halls of justice every where, and who are willing for money to lend themselves to any thing; he made friends with this artful attorney, as ignorant as he was hungry for fees, who advised him to bring suit against the second husband, promising him the recovery of very heavy damages. The absurdity of instituting such a suit was at once seen by every professional man; to prosecute a claim for a wife, whom death had already released from all earthly laws and their jurisdiction, never could have been thought of by any one at all versed in his vocation.

To avoid publicity, which was desired, not only by the defendant in this singular suit, but also by the two daughters of their deceased mother, it was finally agreed that the case should be left to Referees, whose award should be conclusive, and without appeal.

It was a bright and beautiful afternoon in Spring, when the five Referees assembled; the sunlight streamed brightly through the dusty windows of the room where they met, and fell upon the long grey locks and broad forehead of the defendant; while the harsh, weather-beaten features of the plaintiff were thrown into still broader relief, by the same beam which softened the placid countenance of his adversary.

Counsel of high character had now been employed on both sides. The plaintiff's case was presented with the most eloquent appeal, and the hearts of the Referees, had they been ignorant of the matter, might have melted at the touching description of the return of the desolate husband, and the agony with which he now beheld his household gods removed to consecrate the hearth of the stranger; his childrens' affections estranged by the man who had induced the wife of the afflicted husband to turn from her vows to him, and forget even the memory of her obligations, voluntarily assumed at the holy altar.

On the other side, appeared as counsel for the defendant, a gentleman long known, and still remembered for his eloquence and intellect. From him a corresponding strain was expected. Contrary, however, to all the anticipations of those present, he made no attempt to confute his opponent's oratory. He slowly, and with dignity, opened the statute book, pointed his finger to the page containing the enactment applicable to the case, and desired the Referees to peruse it, while he retired to produce his principal witness.

Scarcely had the time been allowed necessary to run over the passage referred to, when the counsel returned with a tall and elegant female form leaning on his arm. She was simply attired, with a lace veil completely concealing her countenance. After a few moments' pause, and a little encouragement from her step-father's friend and lawyer, she advanced to the table, and then gracefully raising her veil, disclosed a face of proud and surpassing beauty. She was the image of her mother, the youngest daughter of the deserted Emily, and bore her mother's name. A murmur of admiration burst from the lips of all present.

With a cold, quiet tone, the counsel turned to the plaintiff:

"Do you know this lady?"

"I do."

"Will you swear to that?"

"I will. To the best of my knowledge and belief, she is my daughter."

"Could you swear to her identity?"

"I could."

"What is her age?"

"She was thirty years of age on the 20th day of last April."

"When did you last see her?"

"At her own house, about a fortnight since."

"When did you last see her previous to that meeting?"

The plaintiff hesitated—a long pause ensued—the question was repeated—and at last was heard the unwilling reply:

"On the 13th day of June, 17—."

"When she was but five weeks old," added the counsel, rising and turning to the Referees.

"This lady, gentlemen, I have brought here as an important witness, and such, I doubt not, she will prove. What the father has here confessed, she will establish, should his confessions, made thus informally, be objected to. The plaintiff's counsel, learned and ingenious, has pleaded ably in behalf of his client; he has glowingly depicted the sorrows of the bereaved husband, whom God in his mercy has saved from a watery grave, through years of danger and of peril, to seek his home again, and find it desolate and desecrated. But who will undertake the task to paint, even in faint hues, the picture of his lonely wife bending over her daily toil, devoting her best years, her health, her beauty, to the drudgery of sordid poverty, to the earning of a pitiful reward for her labours, which should keep her children from starvation, supported only by the hope of her loved husband's return? Who will paint the slow progress of heart-sickening—the wasting anguish of hope deferred—and the agony which at last came upon her, which he could have averted by a line, or word, sent by some friend or foe, which extinguished that last hope, and compelled her indeed to believe herself a widow? Who shall depict, with even the outline of resemblance, all these overwhelming causes of sorrow, without arousing in your hearts the deepest sympathy for the deserted wife and mother, and the most sincere scorn for the despicable wretch who could thus trample on the heart of that devoted one, whom he had sworn to love and cherish, and who now ventures to appear here before you, without even the show of that shame which becomes our nature, and to seek redress from laws, which were not framed to reach so extreme a case of pitiful debasement. But let me not be carried away by feeling—here stands a witness, with the frank, fearless brow of true-hearted woman—let us hear from her lips which of these two men has been to her a father."

Turning to the lady with a tone, whose sweetness was in wonderful contrast with the scornful accent, and withering eloquence that had just characterized his words, he besought her to relate briefly the recollections of her early life. A slight flush colored her cheek, as she turned her beautiful face to the referees and replied:

"My earliest recollections are of a small, ill furnished apartment, which my sister and myself shared with our deceased mother. She carried out every Saturday evening the work which she had accomplished during the week, and brought back employment for the following one. Saving these wearisome visits to her employers, and her regular attendance at church, she never left the house. She often spoke of my father, and of his return, but at last she made no mention of his name, although I saw she used to weep more frequently than before. I imagined then her tears were shed for our poverty, for it sometimes happened that our meals consisted of a crust of dry bread. She was accustomed to sew by the light of chips, which she had kindled to warm her famishing children, because she could not purchase a candle without depriving us of our scanty morning repast. Such was her condition, when she contracted her second marriage, and the change was like a sudden entrance into Paradise. We found a home and a father——"

"Would you excite my own child against me?" cried the plaintiff, as he impatiently waved his hand to her to be silent.

The eyes of the witness flashed fire at these words, and she exclaimed vehemently:

"You are not my father! The law may proclaim you such, but my heart, my tongue disclaim you.—What? you my father, who basely deserted my mother, leaving your wife to toil in beggary, and her children to pine under the stings of starvation? Never! never! Here is my father," pointing to the defendant, whose wrinkled cheek was flushed with anxiety as to the termination of this scene, and with pride at his Emily's indignation. "Here is my father, who watched over my infancy, shielded and protected me; guarding my mind as well as my outward comforts, and who softened the sorrows of that devoted being, whose heart you trampled upon, and whose invaluable and priceless love you knew not how to appreciate. This father claims my affections, and I give them to him. You, who have led a life of selfish, lawless freedom, from all social ties, go seek among the companions of your decrepitude for comfort, nor dare insult the ashes of my injured mother, by claiming the duties of kindred from her deserted children!"

She drew her veil hastily around her, and supported by her step-father left the room.

"Gentlemen," said the counsel, "I have no more to say. The words of the Law are in the book before you; and in your hearts, as in my own, are the truths upon which the case rests, breathed by the pure lips of woman. You will decide according to justice, based upon the requisitions of nature."

It is hardly necessary to add, that the decision was in favor of the defendant, and that the plaintiff went away, followed by the contempt and scorn of every witness to this touching scene.

"OH! FATHER, LET ME IN."

BY MRS. CAROLINE LEE HENTZ.

The dark clouds gathered in the sky,
Loud rose the thunder's din,
When, hark! a sweet imploring cry,
"Oh! father, let me in!"

And still, as louder swelled the gale,
And heavy fell the rain,
That soft, intense, and plaintive wail,
Thrilled to the heart again.

I know that sweet, imploring tone.
Fair child! I saw thee stray,
When bright the morning sunbeams shone,
On the green slope to play.

And there amid the light and dew,
'Mid fragrance, song and mirth,
A living sunbeam, on ye flew,
Young gladdener of the earth?

Ye recked not of a father's care,
Nor of thy sheltering home;
This world seemed made so green and fair,
For thy young feet to roam.

But now, in danger's hour, the world
Shews but one place of rest.
Poor dove! thy flattering wings are furl'd,
Within thine own dear nest.

So, children of a larger growth,
When pleasure's pulse beats high,
We spring with bounding footsteps forth,
'Neath hope's cerulean sky.

But, when the clouds of darkness low'r,
When life's sad woes begin—
We cry at heavenly mercy's door,
"Oh! Father, let me in!"

THE OCEAN BURIAL.

BY F. BUCKINGHAM GRAHAM.

Here let the lovely rest in peace,
Beneath the ocean's whitened surge,
And here may wandering zephyrs breathe,
At eventide, a solemn dirge.
In sorrow have we placed her head,
Where ne'er will mourner's tears be shed,
But where, around her marble brow,
The sea-weeds cluster even now.

Sleep on! No willow o'er thee bends,
Nor birds a mournful requiem sing,
But summer breezes floating by,
Will here the flowrets' largess bring.
And may that radiant evening star,
Which glimmers in the heavens afar,
Each twilight gild the mountain wave,
That tow'rs above thy ocean grave.

Alone we leave thee, gentle one,
In the Atlantic e'er to rest,
And with the tidings of thy fate
We hasten t'wards the distant west.
Farewell!—farewell!—where'er we roam,
O'er prairie lea or ocean foam,
We'll think of thee at morn and even,
As of an angel now, in heaven.

THE MECHANIC.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

"You cannot think how surprised I was," said Emeline Bransdon, addressing Mary Fields, "to see you walking with Sydney Ashton, the other day."

"Why?" enquired Mary.

"I shouldn't think a girl who, like you, moves in the first circles, would ask."

"Now, seriously, Emeline: I should like to hear your objections to Sydney Ashton. Is he not a young man of unblemished morals?"

"I cannot say that I ever heard anything to the contrary."

"And he has, I believe, a good education."

"He never went to college."

"No—but I heard a person say who has had good opportunity to know, and who is a good judge, that by diligence and perseverance, he has acquired a much better knowledge of most branches than many who have been."

"Well, what good does it do him, as long as he keeps plodding away at his trade? We may know that he is naturally of a grovelling spirit, or he would try to get a situation in a counting-room, or even a store, rather than make bureaus and tables."

"There are so many eager for situations of that kind, that he might find it difficult to find one, where he to make the attempt. Besides, I am not sure if he could, that he would be situated so much to his mind, as he is at present, for he can now do a good day's work, and have an hour or two for reading or any other intellectual pursuit that he chooses."

"An intellectual mechanic! What an anomoly!"

"By no means. I could, besides Franklin, name a longer list than you would have patience to listen to."

"Well, I don't care—I think it is condescending quite too far for the daughter of one of our wealthiest citizens to be so sociable with a mechanic."

"And I," said Mary, smiling, "think it is condescending quite too far for Emeline Bransdon, the heiress, to be so sociable with Frank Blandley."

"Now, Mary, I know you are in jest, for is he not the richest, the handsomest, and the most fashionable young man in the place?"

"Not the handsomest, Emeline. The most partial observer would admit that Sydney Ashton is not only handsomer, but has a far more intellectual countenance. Blandley's personal appearance, however, is not only good, but rather prepossessing."

"When the handsome, intellectual mechanic is not by to eclipse him," said Emeline.

"I had no reference to his looks," said Mary, "when I told you that I thought you condescended too far in being sociable with him. His idle and expensive habits are what I object to."

"I am sure that a gentleman with an income like his, cannot be blamed for gratifying his tastes."

"If he has a taste for idleness and dissipation, he should be blamed."

"I suppose you think it would be commendable for him to learn a trade of Mr. Sydney Ashton?"

"O, no, I do not. A young man left with so large a property as Frank Blandley, has no need of having recourse to manual labor. There are many elegant pursuits open to a gentleman of his standing from which he might derive much enjoyment, and there are likewise many duties which he might perform, that would be a comfort to himself and a benefit to others."

"It is not to be expected that a gentleman of twenty-five, possessing a princely fortune, should set up for a moralist, or a philanthropist. Money supplies the place of all things, and those who, like Frank Blandley, have it in abundance, and can, whenever they please, bestow it where it is needed, may, I think, without incurring reproach, leave the performance of laborious duties to others. I don't expect to be so fortunate as to be his choice, should he think of selecting a wife, but I am willing to confess that if I should be, I should consider myself the most enviable girl in the place."

"There is, much to my regret, I confess, little doubt but that you will be his choice, should he think of marrying, for he has, of late, been very attentive to you."

"If I should be," said Emeline, "I think you had better reserve your regret for yourself, as there will be little need of your bestowing it on me."

"Is what I hear true, Blandley?" said Edwin Barrett. "Have you really any serious thoughts of matrimony?"

"Yes, I have thought of it, and they are serious ones too, I should think, for I have not yet made up my mind whether to choose between it and a pistol."

"For shame, Blandley, to speak thus when such a handsome girl as Emeline Bransdon is ready to accept you."

"Now, Barrett, you don't think me such a milksop as to be taken with a pair of bright eyes and ruby lips. If merely a wife was my object, Emeline Bransdon is the last person I should choose. Money is what I want—money is what I must have, a commodity of which the woman I love is destitute."

"May I ask her name?"

"I imagined that you were well enough acquainted with me to know that such a woman as Helen Faulkner could not cross my path and leave me with a heart!"

"She was, in good sooth, a bright and glorious creature, with a face full of intelligence and feeling—a woman not only to be loved, but to be adored.—Are you really in such want of money as to be obliged to marry for it? I thought you were in receipt of four or five thousand a year?"

"Not one hundred."

"Why, what has become of that fine block of buildings, that used to rent for four thousand dollars a year?"

"All gone—marched off at the rattling of the dice box."

"Blandley, I was not aware that you were a gambler."

"It was not my intention to be one, but you know that I have neither taste nor talent for business, nor for any of the fine arts. Now there must be something to amuse and excite, if one would not sink into a mental lethargy."

"Better do that, than seek the excitement of the gaming table."

"I am of your mind. All I wish now is to win back what I have lost."

"It is a dangerous experiment, and, as a friend, I warn you not to try it."

"I must, at any rate, have twenty thousand dollars, or my honor is compromised. Emeline Bransdon, as I have understood from good authority, has twenty-five thousand in ready cash, besides a farm in the country valued at three or four thousand. The safer way will be to marry her, pay my debts of honor, and go and live on the farm. Don't you think that when people see the once dashing Frank Blandley, that kept his span of greys and his five hundred dollar saddle-horse, digging in a potato field, they will hold up their hands and exclaim—'O! what a fall was there?' "

"It might possibly be a nice day's wonder. But, seriously, Frank: if your affairs are as desperate as you say, the course you suggest would be the most prudent you can take, though with respect to Miss Bransdon, not the most generous one."

"Barrett," said Blandley, suddenly changing his playful manner, "you will not think of frustrating my plan, now I have given you my confidence, by advising Miss Bransdon of my situation."

"I shall not, and for the very good reason, that I know either warning or advice would be utterly thrown away upon her, or even stimulate her to accept you the sooner. I am enough acquainted with her disposition to know that she has great confidence in her own knowledge of character, and of yours she has so high an opinion, it would be impossible to make her believe anything to your disadvantage.—Were it otherwise, I will give you my word, that before twenty-four hours had passed, I would warn her against marrying a gambler."

They now parted, and as Blandley knew that Barrett would not break his word, he felt no apprehension with regard to the secret he had disclosed in an unguarded moment. But he had a rival in one he did not suspect—one who had seen him at the hazard table, and knew the amount of his losses. His name was Ward, and had been a resident of the city scarcely a year, yet he had several times met with Emeline Bransdon at parties, where his reputed wealth, handsome person, and showy manners had gained him ready admission. Having recently sustained some heavy losses at the gaming-table, he began to think Miss Brandon's twenty-five thousand dollars worth looking after.

About a week subsequent to the conversation between Blandley and Barrett, there was to be a splendid ball, to which they, Emeline, Bransdon and Ward, were invited. Ward, who feared to trust to his personal advantages alone, against such a rival as Blandley, sent her an anonymous note, in which he gave an exaggerated account of Blandley's recent dereliction from the path of moral rectitude, and referred her to Barrett, for the truth of his communication, having, in the character of an ever-dropper, ascertained that he possessed all the necessary information.

Emeline immediately called on Mary, showed her the note, and asked her what she thought.

"I should not wonder if it were true," replied Mary, "for I have little confidence in the strength of Blandley's moral principles, and should advise you, by all means, to apply to Mr. Barrett, who may be able either to confirm or contradict the assertions of the anonymous writer."

"Who do you suppose the person can be who wrote it?" said Emeline. "I half suspect it is Sydney Ashton, for no gentleman would meddle with what does not concern him."

"It is not Sydney Ashton's hand-writing," said Mary.

"That is nothing. It is very easy for a person to write in a feigned hand."

"I think he would have mentioned it to me, if he had reason to suspect that Blandley frequented the gaming-table," said Mary.

"I am not of your mind. The underhand method of warning me by an anonymous note, would, I imagine, be exactly suited to the exalted views of one, who is all the time plodding with a chisel or plane in his hand. On second thoughts, I think it would be ungenerous even to suspect a gentleman like Blandley, because some base-minded person, from interested motives, no doubt, wishes to degrade him in my opinions."

"Then you will not mention the subject to Barrett?" said Mary, without making any allusion to the ungenerous remarks relative to Ashton.

"No, I certainly shall not. Should I show myself to be so suspicious of Blandley, I should not blame him if he should never speak to me again."

On the evening of the ball, Ward was by Emeline's side, before Blandley, supposing himself secure in her preference, and acting upon the policy of not showing himself too eager in his attentions, thought of honoring her with his notice. She was a vain girl, and when she found the fashionable and elegant, and, as he affected to be, the exclusive Ward, bending on her his dark lustrous eyes, as if she were the only object present he deemed worthy of his regard, and when she heard the soft insinuating tones of his voice, which thrilled on her ear as if they had a softer meaning than the time and place permitted him to express in words, she almost forgot the equally handsome and fascinating Blandley and his splendid equipage, with which he almost daily dashed through the streets.—Blandley was thoroughly aroused from his apathy. The twenty-five thousand dollars and the farm were at hazard, and he determined, if possible, to secure them that evening. As soon, therefore, as etiquette demanded that those who had joined the dance, should exchange partners, he was at Emeline's side. At the conclusion of the dance, he imperceptibly drew her aside from the gay throng. Fear of failure, as he observed her eyes wandering in the direction where Ward sat conversing with a distinguished belle, gave him eloquence, and he plead his cause so well and so earnestly, that when she again joined the company, it was as his affianced bride. When Ward renewed his homage, and Barrett directed Blandley's attention towards them, he smiled and said, "I have nothing to fear from him."

The pressing need in which Blandley stood for money, would not permit the marriage to be delayed, and it was with some difficulty that Emeline induced him to defer it long enough for her to have a dress prepared, which she deemed of suitable elegance for the occasion. Twenty thousand dollars was freely surrendered to her husband, who assured her that he would invest it in certain stock which he named, which would yield twice the income heretofore realized. The remaining five thousand, reluctantly on his part, was reserved for the purchase of furniture.

Emeline had little depth of feeling, or of that true tenderness which causes the heart to yearn for something more than cold politeness. It had been her ambition to form a brilliant marriage, to be placed at the head of a splendid establishment, and during the few first months of her wedded life, that ambition appeared to be realized. No house was furnished with so much elegance and taste as Mrs. Blandley's. The floors were covered with the most beautiful Brussels, and the windows were draped with curtains of the heaviest and richest satin, some worked in flowers of the natural colors, others with gold and silver tissue. Vases, statues, pictures, and whatever money could command, were displayed in profusion. All this was by the direction, and under the express superintendence of Emeline; Blandley having given her his promise, when she objected to their hurried marriage on the ground that she wished to purchase her furniture previous to its taking place, that he would leave all to her own judgment and taste.

Mrs. Blandley soon came to be the star of fashion, and nothing could equal the elegance and brilliancy of her parties, fetes, and soirees. To these Mary Fields was always invited, but Sydney Ashton could not, of course, be admitted into company so select and exclusive. In the mean time, Blandley's infatuation for play had returned upon him stronger than ever. Separate from the need of winning, he felt the want of excitement, a kind of morbid craving which the company he met with at home did not supply. He had paid his debts of honor, and again stood on fair ground. "It is a long lane," said he to himself, that has no turn, and fortune must take a turn in my favour." Under a feigned pretext, he succeeded in obtaining possession of his wife's title deed to her farm, and on the evening of the same day he was again at the hazard table. Fortune did take a turn, and to his surprise, he returned home a thousand dollars richer than when he left. This he had been allowed to do, that he might not take alarm and retreat before all his available property, which was thought much greater than it was, could be secured. While affairs were in this train, Mrs. Blandley, who was out shopping, happened to meet Mary Fields in the street.

"I am glad that I have met you, Mary," said she, "otherwise I should have been under the necessity of calling on you, and really I am so pressed for time on account of the preparations necessary for to-morrow evening, that it would have been extremely inconvenient. I wished to see you—and I know that you will excuse me for being sincere and open with you—to tell you that I cannot invite you to our soiree to-morrow evening, unless you will promise to drop all intercourse with Sydney Ashton. Blandley says my inviting you, while you encourage the attentions of such a person, has already been the subject of conversation among his fashionable acquaintance, and he says, too, that it is a shame for a girl like you to throw yourself away on a mechanic. He moreover hinted that the elegant and fashionable Ward would not hesitate to offer himself to you, only he cannot think of putting himself so much on an equality with a mechanic, as to become his rival."

"I should have declined accepting an invitation to your soiree," said Mary, "had I received one; for as I last evening engaged to marry Sydney Ashton, I shall for the future associate only with those who will not scorn to admit him into their society."

"Is it possible, Mary, that you have made a promise which you cannot in honor retract?"

"By no means. Sydney Ashton is too generous to bind me by a promise, should it cease to be sanctioned by inclination. I think, however, that I shall have no cause to change my mind. A barrier, therefore, which you will not wish to pass, is placed between us for the present; but, as all earthly things bear the stamp of mutability, should the time ever come when sorrow or misfortune should make it desirable for you to renew our acquaintance, I trust that you will find me more ready to obey the dictates of duty and humanity, than those of resentment and pride."

"It is hardly probable," replied Mrs. Blandley, "that I shall ever wish a renewal on such grounds; but should you ever come to a proper sense of what is due to yourself, I can assure you, nothing would afford me more pleasure."

The same day that this conversation took place between Mrs. Blandley and Mary, a gentleman, who called at Sydney Ashton's shop to purchase some furniture, remarked that he had once been a cabinet maker, and that his first step towards amassing the large property then in his possession, was the purchase of a small share in a vessel. He then enquired if he had never felt any inclination to try his success in a similar way? Ashton replied, that he had never thought upon the subject.

"The shipping business," said the gentleman, "is at present uncommonly prosperous, especially the East India trade; and if you have a thousand or two dollars to invest in the way I mentioned, I think there is little doubt but that you may double your money."

The reasons he gave for what he said, were so clear and satisfactory, that Ashton was induced to follow his advice, and purchased a share in a vessel soon to sail for the East Indies, for which he gave the earnings of the five years since the expiration of his apprenticeship. The result more than realized the merchant's predictions, which encouraged him to turn his attention to commerce. The India trade continued to be more and more prosperous, and by prudence, perseverance and enterprize, he had, at the end of five years, accumulated a handsome fortune. Mary Fields had, at that time, been four years his wife, and was mistress of one of the most tasteful and elegant, if not one of the most costly mansions in the city, which was frequented by many of the most deserving and intelligent of the community.

From the day that Mary met Mrs. Blandley in the street, she had never exchanged with her a single word. She had seen her, several times, within the first year afterwards, pass in her elegant carriage, and had a few times met her on the side-walk, but nothing more than a cold and distant bow was exchanged between them. Once or twice, during the same year, she had seen Blandley, whose dress was as fashionable and dashing as ever, though his haggard, care-worn countenance bespoke irregular habits and a mind ill at ease. Subsequently, she lost sight of them, and her husband, who, at her request, made enquiry concerning them, was informed that they had left the city. One evening, in the depth of winter, as Mr. and Mrs. Ashton sat before a bright fire, surrounded by those comforts and luxuries commanded by wealth, a note was put into the hand of the latter, which, on examining the signature, she found to be from Emeline Blandley. It appeared to have been written by a weak and tremulous hand, and ran thus:

"Do you remember the last words you ever said to me? They sunk deep into my heart, though, when I returned home, I made them the subject of mirth to my husband. In less than a year from that time, I found that he was a professed gambler, and that we were reduced to beggary. I did not spare my reproaches, though they procured me the most brutal treatment. We left the city privately, for one where we were not known, and Blandley, without either the energy or will to seek employment, again found his way to the gaming-table. To the vice of gambling, he soon added that of intemperance. Frequently he remained from home all night—sometimes several days and nights in succession. At length, a week passed and he did not return. A laborer who took pity on me, made enquiry respecting him, and ascertained that he had sailed for New Orleans. I had an infant three months old, which gave me energy, and prevented me from sinking into a state of apathy. By unremitting exertion, I succeeded in obtaining a subsistence, till my health began to fail. My last efforts were directed towards accumulating a sum sufficient to convey me back again to my native city. I was very ill when I arrived at the stage-tavern. The ensuing morning I was in a high fever, and perfectly unconscious of my situation. When reason returned, I found that myself and child had been conveyed to the alms-house, it being but too obvious, by our mean appearance, that I was destitute of the means by which to remunerate those who might take the charge of us.—No one that has seen me, suspects me to be the once gay and wealthy Emeline Bransdon. Though my fever has left me, I feel that my days on earth are few, and have not, therefore, addressed you in my own behalf, but for the sake of my little girl, who, I cannot bear to think, unless you take compassion on her, must be an inmate of the alms-house when I am gone. She is a beautiful child, though nurtured in the lap of poverty, and, unlike her parents, of a sweet and gentle disposition. Will you, Mary, take her to your home, even though you make her as one of your hired servants? Say but yes, and willingly, most willingly, will I exchange my couch of suffering for the lonely and silent rest of the grave! If you think me worthy of notice, enquire for Mrs. Mansel, the name Blandley assumed four years ago, when he left this place."

"It is only seven o'clock," said Mrs. Ashton to her husband, after he had finished reading the letter which she had handed him, after perusing it herself—and as it is a still, bright evening, what is there to hinder us from calling on her immediately?"

"I think it will be better than to defer it till morning," replied Mr. Ashton, "as she must necessarily feel a good deal of anxiety as to the manner her communication is received. The sleighing is admirable, and it will be a fine drive."

"But have you already come to a conclusion what to do?"

"We cannot refuse her request," he said.

"I am glad you think so," she replied. "I shall be ready to go in five minutes."

The alms-house was only a mile distant, and the sleigh moved rapidly over the smooth, well-beaten path, which glittered in the bright moonlight as if it had been strewn with gems. Mr. Ashton remained in the parlor, while his wife was conducted to the apartment of the invalid. She was sitting up in bed, supported by pillows. The hand trembled which Mrs. Ashton held out to her, and she pronounced her name with an unsteady voice. A bright, hectic glow rushed over Emeline's features, and, for a moment, brought back some traces of her former beauty. It faded, and Mrs. Ashton could not recognize, in her pallid and sunken features, any thing to remind her of the haughty woman who, five years previous, had declined her acquaintance because she had engaged to marry a mechanic. By her side, was a little girl four years old, wrapt in rosy slumber. Her lips, fresh and bright as an unplucked cherry, were slightly parted, and a few of the soft curls that clustered in golden profusion over her innocent head, had strayed so far as to half cover the dimpled elbow of the small, plump arm, lying on the coarse but clean sheet folded over the coverlet.

"It is for her I implore your charity," said the mother, laying her thin hand on the head of her sleeping child; "for you see how plainly it is written upon these faded features that I shall not need it."

"But may we not hope that time may restore your health?" said Mrs. Ashton.

"Consumption works with a sure hand," she replied; "and to me, there is comfort in the thought, for I shall be cared for by Him in whom I have a firm and unwavering trust. Only tell me that when my voice is hushed and can speak no more in behalf of my sweet Agnes, there will be a voice in your bosom that will plead for her instead?"

"I will be a mother to her then," replied Mrs. Ashton.

"You have said enough. That promise includes every thing, and I feel assured that it will be faithfully fulfilled."

Mr. and Mrs. Ashton called again the ensuing day, and offered her an asylum in their own home, but she declined.

"I am comfortable here," she said, "and it would make unnecessary trouble. An occasional call from you, and the presence of my child, is all I desire during the short time I have to live."

Mrs. Ashton thought she might live many months, and even get better. She, herself, judged more correctly. Just four weeks from the day Mrs. Ashton first visited her, she was conveyed to her last resting place, and the little Agnes, too young to realize her loss, was playing in the nursery with the two children of her benefactors, who, as may be inferred from the correct tone of their moral sentiments, never failed in faithfully discharging their trust.

THE CODE OF HONOR.

Two young men, one with a black leather cap on his head, and military buttons on his coat, sat in close conversation about six months ago, in the bar-room of the ——— hotel. The subject that occupied their attention seemed to be an exciting one, at least to him of the military buttons and black cap, for he emphasized strongly, knit his brows awfully, and at last went so far as to swear a terrible oath.

"Don't permit yourself to get excited, Tom," interposed the friend. "It won't help the matter at all."

"But I've got no patience."

"Then it's time you had some," coolly returned the friend. "If you intend pushing your way into the good graces of my lady Mary Clinton, you must do something more than fume and swear about the little matter of rivalry that has sprung up."

"Yes; but to think of a poor milk-sop of an author—author!—pah! scribbler!—to think, I say, of a spiritless creature like Blake thrusting himself in between me and such a girl as Mary Clinton; and worse, gaining her notice, is too bad! He has sonneteered her eyebrows, no doubt—flattered her in verse, until she does'nt know who or where she is—and in this way become a formidable rival. But I won't bear it. I'll—I'll—"

"What will you do?"

"Do? Dammee! I'll—I'll wing him! That's what I'll do. I'll challenge the puppy, and shoot him!"

And the young Lieutenant, for such he was, flourished his right arm al a duello, and looked pistol balls and death.

"But he won't fight, Tom."

"Won't he?" And the Lieutenant's face brightened. "Then I'll post him for a coward! That'll finish him. All women hate cowards. I'll post him—yes, and cowskin him into the bargain, if necessary."

"Posting will do," half sarcastically replied the friend. "But on what pretence will you challenge him?"

"I'll manage one. I'll insult him the first time I meet him, and then, if he says any thing, challenge and shoot him."

"That would be quite gentlemanly—quite according to the code of honor," returned the friend quietly.

The young military gentleman we have introduced was named Redmond. The reader has already penetrated his character. In person he was quite good-looking, though not the Adonis he deemed himself. He had fallen deeply in love with the "acres of charms" possessed by a certain Miss Mary Clinton, and was making rapid inroads upon her heart—at least he thought so—when a young man, well known in the literary circles, made his appearance, and was received with a degree of favor that confounded the officer, who had already begun to think himself sure of his prize. Blake had a much readier tongue, and a good deal more in his head, than the other, and could, therefore, in the matter of mind at least, appear to much better advantage than his rival. He had also written and published one or two popular books. This gave him a standing as an author—Take him all in all, he was a rival to be feared, and Redmond was not long in making the discovery. What was to be done? A military man must not be beaten off by a mere civilian. The rival must be gotten off in some way. The professional means was, as has been seen, thought of first. Blake must be challenged and killed off, and then the course would be clear.

A few days after this brave and honorable determination the officer met the author in a public place, and purposely jostled him rudely. Blake said nothing, thinking it possible that it might have been only an accident. But he remained near Redmond, to give him a chance to repeat the insult, if such had been his intention. It was not long before the author was again jostled in a still ruder manner than before, at the same time that some offensive word was muttered by the officer. This was in the presence of a number of persons, who could not help hearing, seeing, and understanding all. Satisfied that an insult was intended, Blake looked him in the face for a moment, and then asked, loud enough to be heard all around—

"Did you jostle me intentionally?"

"I did!" was the angry retort.

"Gentlemen never do such things."

As Blake said this, with marked emphasis, he looked steadily in the officer's face.

"You'll hear from me, sir."

And as the officer said this, menacingly, he turned and walked away with quite a military air.

"There's trouble for you now, Blake. He'll challenge you!" said two or three friends who instantly gathered round him.

"Do you think so?"

"Certainly. He's an officer. Fighting's his trade."

"Well, let him."

"What'll you do?"

"Accept his challenge, of course."

"And fight him?"

"Certainly."

"He'll shoot you."

"I'm not afraid."

Blake returned with a friend to his lodgings, where he found a billet already from Redmond, who was all eagerness to "wing" his rival.

On the next morning, two friends of the belligerents were closeted for the purpose of arranging the preliminaries of the fight.

"The weapons?" asked the friend of the military man. "Your principal, by the laws of honor, has the choice; as, also, the right to name time, place, etc."

"Yes, I understand. All that is settled."

"He will fight, then?"

"Fight? O, certainly. Blake's no coward."

"Well, then, name the weapons."

"A pair of good goose quills."

"Sir!" in profound astonishment.

"The weapons are to be a pair of good Russia quills, opaque, manufactured into pens of approved quality. The place of meeting, the ——— Gazette; the time, to-morrow morning, bright and early."

"Do you mean to insult me?" This was said with sternness.

"By no means."

"You cannot be serious?"

"Never was more so in my life. By the code of honor, the challenged party has the right to choose weapons, place of meeting, and time. Is not that so?"

"Certainly."

"Very well. Your principal has challenged mine. All these rights are of course his; and he is justified in chosing those weapons with which he is most familiar. The weapon he can use best is the pen; and he chooses that. If Lieutenant Redmond had been the challenged party, he would, of course, have named pistols, with which he is familiar, and Mr. Blake would have been called a coward, a poltroon, or something as bad, if, after sending a challenge, he had objected to the weapons. Will your principal find himself in any different position if he declines this meeting upon like grounds? I think not. Pens are as good as pistols, at any time, and will do as good execution."

"Fighting with pens! Preposterous!"

"Not quite as preposterous as you might think.—Mr. Blake has more than insinuated that Redmond's no gentleman. For this he is challenged to a single combat that is to prove him to be either a gentleman or not one. Surely the most sensible weapon with which to do this is the pen. Pistols won't demonstrate this matter. Only the pen can do it. So the pen is chosen. In the ——— Gazette of to-morrow morning my friend stands ready to prove your friend to be no gentleman. Let him stand on the defensive, and prove that he is a gentleman, and that a gentleman has the right to insult publicly and without provocation whomsoever he pleases. Depend upon it, you will find this quite as serious an affair as if pistols were used."

"I did not come here, sir, to be trifled with."

"No trifling in the matter at all. I am in sober earnest. Pens are the weapons. The ——— Gazette the battle-ground. Time early as you please to-morrow morning. Are you prepared for the meeting?"

"No."

"Do you understand the consequences?"

"What consequences?"

"Your principal will be posted as a coward before night."

"Are you mad?"

"No. Cool and in earnest. We fully understand what we are about."

The officer's second was non-plussed. He did not know what to say or think. He was unprepared for such a position of affairs.

"I'll see you in the course of an hour," he at length said, rising.

"Very well. You will find me here."

"Is all settled?" asked the valiant Lieutenant, as his second came into his room at the hotel, where he was pacing the floor.

"Settled? Not. Nor likely to be. I objected to the weapons, and, indeed, the whole proposed arrangement."

"Objected to the weapons! And pray what did he name? A blunderbuss?"

No, nor a duck gun with trumpet muzzle. But an infernal pen!"

"A what!"

"Why, curse the fellow, a pen! You are to use pens—the place of meeting, the ——— Gazette—time, to-morrow morning. He is to prove that you are no gentleman, and you are to prove that you are one, and that a gentleman is at all times privileged to insult whomsoever he pleases without provocation."

"He's a cowardly fool!"

"If the terms are not accepted, he threatens to post you for a coward before night."

"What!"

"You must accept or be posted. Think of that!"

The precise terms in which the principal swore, and the manner in which he fumed for the next five minutes, need not be told. He was called back to more sober feelings by the question—

"Do you accept the terms of the meeting?"

"No—of course not. The fellow's a fool."

"Then you consent to be posted. How will that sound?"

"I'll cut off the rascal's ears if he dare do such a thing."

"That won't secure Mary Clinton, the cause of this contest."

"Curse it, no!"

"With pens for weapons, he'll 'wing' you a little too quick."

"No doubt. But the public won't bear him out in such an outrage—such a violation of all the rules of honor."

"By the code of honor, the challenged party has the right to choose weapons, etc."

"I know."

"And you are afraid to meet the man you have challenged upon the terms he proposes. That is all plain and simple enough. The world will understand it all."

"But what's to be done?"

"You must fight, apologize, or be posted. There is no alternative. To be posted won't do. The laugh would be too strongly against you."

"It will be as bad, or even worse, to fight as he proposes."

"True. What then?"

"It must be made up somehow or other."

"So I think. Will you write an apology?"

"I don't know. That's too humiliating."

"It's the least of three evils."

So at last thought the valiant Lieutenant Redmond. When the seconds again met, it was to arrange a settlement of the difference. This could only be done by a very humbly written apology, which was made. On the next day the young officer left the city, a little wiser than when he came.—Blake and his second said but little of the matter. A few choice friends were let into the secret, which afforded many a hearty laugh. Among these friends was Mary Clinton, who not long after gave her hand and heart to the redoubtable author.

As for the Lieutenant, he swears that he would as lief come in contact with a Paixhan gun as an author with his "infernal pen." He understands pistols, small swords, rifles, and even cannons, but he can't stand up when "pen work" is the order of the day. The odds would be too much against him.

THE MODERN OTHELLO.

A TALE FOUNDED ON FACTS.

Towards the close of the year 1826, a large house in the Calle San Geronimo, in Madrid, which, for a considerable time, had remained uninhabited, suddenly became the scene of much bustle and preparation. Doors, shutters, and jalousies, were thrown open, creaking upon their hinges, which had grown rusty from want of use, and a host of painters and decorators were seen busily at work, cleansing the apartments, and fitting them up in the most sumptuous and expensive manner. The walls of the rooms were soon covered with splendid mirrors and admirably-painted frescoes; superb chandeliers hung glittering from the ceiling; and furniture, made of the richest silks and most costly foreign woods, filled the suites of rooms. In the inner court, or patio, the broken and moss-covered flags were replaced by a mosaic pavement of the rarest materials and most ingenious device; the broken pipes and dilapidated stonework of the dried up fountain were removed, and in their place a dolphin, exquisitely carved out of the purest white marble, spouted a gush of sparkling water into the sun-beams. Some boxes of earth, the plants in which had perished or run wild from neglect, disappeared, and rows of huge porcelain jars, containing citron and orange trees, camelias with their wax-like flowers, and exotics of the greatest fragrance and beauty, were ranged in the galleries and around the court.

The cobwebbed and bat-haunted mansion which, under the spell of that great magician, gold, was thus so rapidly transformed into a palace of almost oriental magnificence, had been the property of a nobleman who had made himself conspicuous in the political struggles of 1821 and 1822, and who found himself compelled to fly the country when Ferdinand, by the aid of French bayonets, was restored to absolute power. Before reaching the frontier, however, he fell into the hands of some royalist guerillas and was shot without form of trial. His property was confiscated to the use of the crown, his estate and the furniture of his house at Madrid sold, but for the house itself no purchaser had been found, and for more than three years it remained shut up and neglected. It seemed as if the unhappy fate of its last owner had deterred every body from occupying a mansion which for size and outward appearance was one of the best in Madrid, and the neighbors had become so accustomed to its deserted and gloomy aspect, that they almost began to think that it had acquired a sort of proscriptive right to remain uninhabited, and were proportionably surprised at the preparations now making for the reception of some new proprietor. It soon became known that an Andalusian gentleman, of ancient descent and immense wealth, had purchased the house, and that he intended inhabiting it as soon as it was ready to receive himself and his young and beautiful wife.

Don Mariano Flores was the owner of one of the finest estates in Andalusia, which had been in his family nearly from the day that the Moors were finally driven out of the richest province in the peninsula. Following the example of his ancestors, he was leading the peaceful and happy life of a Spanish country gentleman, when the invasion of Spain by Napoleon's generals rendered person and property insecure. Don Mariano was then about thirty-five years of age, and still unmarried, and feeling no disposition to take a part in the struggle which was commencing, he embarked for the Havannah, where he had some extensive plantations, intending to remain there until things should again become settled in Spain.—He remained, however, much longer, busied with the superintendence and improvement of his property; and it was only about eighteen months before the period of this narrative that he landed at Cadiz, after an absense of fifteen years from his native county. During a stay which he made in the last named city, he became acquainted with a widow lady of good family but limited means, who was residing there with her son and daughter. The amiable qualities and agreeable conversation of Dona Olivia Guevara had at first induced Flores to cultivate her acquaintance, but before he had paid many visits to her house, it became evident that the point of attraction was changed, and that her beautiful daughter was the magnet which drew him each day to the Casa Guevara.

Dona Lucia was indeed a most enchanting creature, the very perfection of Spanish beauty, but with a share of good sense and accomplishments far larger than is usually found in her countrywomen. She was at this time in her twentieth year, possessing a regular, beautiful and expressive countenance, a figure that was the perfection of grace and symmetry, and feet and hands remarkable even in Andalusia, where that class of beauty abounds. The care and instructions that had been lavished on her by her mother had borne good fruit; she was well informed, played admirably on the guitar and piano, painted as few amateurs paint, sang like a nightingale, and danced like a sylph. In short she was the toast of Cadiz, and her admirers were innumerable, but her want of fortune deterred some, while others, who had offered themselves, had been met by a courteous but firm rejection. Her mother, whose health was bad, and who had little to depend on beside her pension as widow of a general officer, was desirous of seeing her daughter married, and frequently expostulated with her on her rejection of suitors apparently unexceptionable. When Flores began to pay her marked attention, Dona Olivia strongly urged her to give a favorable answer to the proposals which he was evidently desirous of making. Lucia's heart was entirely free, and she liked the agreeable conservation and gentlemanly manners of her new suitor. This, added to her strong wish to please her mother, to whom she was devotedly attached, and to an equally strong desire to promote the interests of her twin brother Enrique, which might be greatly advanced by an alliance with a wealthy and influential man, induced her to accept the proposals which Don Mariano at last found courage to make. He had for a long time been deterred from offering himself, by a doubt, whether happiness could result from a union between a girl at nineteen and a man nearly thirty-five years her senior, and it was at some sacrifice of reason to passion, that he finally decided upon asking Lucia to become his wife. He had too little vanity, and had seen too much of the world to be blind to the possibility of a husband being accepted for his riches' sake, who, in all other respects, might have been deemed undesirable. The frankness of Lucia's character, however, offered a strong guarantee against this risk, and Flores had every reason to be gratified with the manner in which she accepted him, and with her subsequent deportment. Without affecting feelings which she did not really experience, she allowed him to see that she appreciated his many excellent qualities, and entertained towards him a strong feeling of friendship, which it was by no means impossible might ripen into a warmer sentiment.

On his part, Don Mariano lost no opportunity of proving his affection for his affianced bride. He had heard both her and her mother express anxiety on the subject of young Guevara, who had recently left the university of Salamania, without, as it appeared, having attained much proficiency in the studies which he had been sent thither to pursue. The young man entertained an invincible repugnance to all professions except that of arms. Commissions in the army were, at that time, given entirely by favor, usually to relatives and a few influential grandees, and the senora Guevara, in spite of her strong claims as an officer's widow, saw little probability of procuring one for her son. Without apprising any of the family of his intention, Flores wrote to a friend at Madrid, directing him to use all his interest and spare no expense to obtain the desired commission for his future brother-in-law. A fortnight later he surprised and delighted the Guevara family by placing before them a copy of the Gazette, in which was Enrique Guevara's appointment to one of the best cavalry regiments in the Spanish service.

Shortly after this incident, Lucia became the wife of Don Mariano. But few weeks had elapsed after their marriage, when a defect became apparent in the character of the latter, which neither Lucia nor her mother had previously suspected. This defect was one which, however prominent in the Spanish character a century or two ago, when duennas and daggers, midnight serenades and grated windows were the order of the day, has of late years been considerably modified. Jealousy, most causeless and absurd, was the demon which now crossed the path, and threatened to mar the happiness of the newly-married couple. Don Mariano's fears and doubts as to the possibility of his being loved by a young and beautiful woman, had been at first dissipated or forgotten in the joy of finding himself the husband of Lucia. They now, however, revived with redoubled force. He could not persuade himself that Lucia loved him, or did more than tolerate him as a friend and benefactor; and on his part, he could not make up his mind to accept friendship where he had hoped for love. In vain did his wife, when she discovered the cause of his uneasiness and frequent depression, do all in her power to dissipate the cloud which she saw forming over their happiness. His extreme susceptibility rendered the task an impossible one. The feeling of unfounded, and at first objectless jealousy, increased rather than abated, and to add to Lucia's sorrow, soon became too apparent to be concealed from the most casual observer. Don Mariano felt that he was wrong to entertain such a feeling, but still was totally unable to vanquish it. He was too generous-minded a man to resort to the usual expedients of jealous husbands, and far from attempting to seclude his wife in any degree, he on the contrary encouraged her to go into society, and to accept the numerous invitations to balls and entertainments which were poured upon them by their friends and acquaintances at Cadiz. Yet the time spent at those entertainments were to him so many hours of torture. Amidst the gay cavaliers who thronged around his wife, eager to lead her to the dance, profuse of compliments and lavish of attentions, there was always one or other to whom he fancied she listened with a marked and pleased attention. The slightest smile extorted from her by some compliment or over-strained gallantry, was by his jealous interpretation converted into a symptom of preference, and the extreme degree of reserve and propriety maintained by his wife was insufficient to dispel the phantoms created by his diseased imagination.

Lucia's mother and brother had naturally been amongst the first to observe this unfortunate failing in the character of Don Mariano. The former had even expostulated with him on the subject, setting forth in strong but not exaggerated colors her daughter's propriety of conduct, firm principles, and, above all, her strong attachment to himself. Flores listened patiently, promised to be more reasonable,—and remained as suspicious and unhappy as before. Enrique Guevara could not, of course, presume to reason with his brother-in-law, but the hair-brained and mischief-loving youth did not scruple to banter his sister pretty freely on the subject of Don Mariano's jealousy. A period was at last put to his ill-timed pleasantries by his departure to join his regiment, which was quartered in the provinces of Valencia.

About a year after her marriage, Lucia surprised her husband by expressing a wish that they should leave Cadiz and take up their residence in the capital. The reason she assigned for this request was the not unnatural one of a desire to partake of the gaieties of Madrid, but her real motive was of a far different nature. She thought it would conduce to Don Mariano's happiness if they left a city where she was in the daily habit of meeting young men who had known her from childhood, and with whom she was on terms of sister-like intimacy which she could not break off without appearing grossly capricious, and doing violence to their feelings and her own. Yet the familiar terms on which she unavoidably was with these persons seemed frequently to pain and annoy Flores; and she thought that in a place where she had as yet no acquaintances, she should be able to avoid all such intimacies. Don Mariano did not penetrate her intention, but eager to gratify her smallest wishes, he immediately sent instructions to Madrid for the purchase and fitting up of a suitable mansion.

It was early in the year 1827 that Flores and his wife arrived in the capital, and took possession of their splendid house in the Calle San Geronimo. Don Mariano had many friends and connections at Madrid, and moreover the fame of the Beauty of Cadiz, la Bella Gaditana, as she was called, had preceded her thither, so that within a week after their arrival they had received the visits of a large proportion of the best society in Madrid. It was the gay season of the year; the carnival was about to commence, and balls, operas, ridottos, and amusements of every kind were the order of the day. Lucia found herself unavoidably drawn into the vortex of dissipation, from which she would willingly have kept aloof had not Flores pressed her to accept the invitations of all kinds which they received, and which she had, therefore, no pretext for declining. Her whole thoughts, bent on eradicating the feeling of jealous uneasiness which had taken possession of her husband, she did all in her power to avoid attracting notice, but in vain. Even in the brilliant circles of the capital, her beauty drew universal attention, and she had soon the mortification to find that she could not enter a ball-room without being besieged by a host of admiring cavaliers, petitioning for her hand in the dance, and paying her an exaggerated homage sufficient to turn the head of any woman less free from vanity than Dona Lucia. At the same time her object in leaving Cadiz was for the moment attained. Flores seemed at first to look on with indifference while the swarm of glittering admirers fluttered round his wife. It was only when some of them became almost daily visitors at his house, rode beside Lucia's carriage in the Prado, met her at every ball, and were to be found, in short, wherever she went, showing a punctuality and acquaintance with her movements so great that it almost seemed the result of a system of secret police, that Don Mariano's brow again began to darken, and his face to resume its anxious, suspicious expression. This could not escape the affectionate observation of Lucia, and she implored her husband to let her live secluded and quiet, since the gay and bustling life they were then leading was evidently disagreeable to him. Don Mariano denied that it was so, asked her if she wished to make him pass for one of those jealous old husbands who are afraid to allow their young wives to be seen; and refused compliance with her request in a half jesting, half-serious tone, which deterred Lucia from insisting any farther.

It was towards the close of the carnival, and the Madrilenos seemed determined to make the most of the few days that remained before the arrival of Lent with its fasts and privations. Amongst other fetes and entertainments that were upon the tapis, a masked ball, to be given by the Marquis of Torrejon, on the Sunday before Lent, was perhaps the most prominent, and excited the most eager anticipation on the part of the persons invited. The spacious suites of rooms of the marquis's palace afforded admirable facilities for magnificent entertainments of this description, and it was expected that upwards of a thousand persons would be present on the occasion. Don Mariano Flores and his wife were of course among the invited. An elegant Moorish costume had been ordered for Lucia, who had wished Flores also to assume a disguise, but he had declined doing so, and was to accompany her in plain clothes.

When the evening of the ball arrived, however, Lucia felt unwell, and expressed a wish to remain at home, as the headache of which she complained could not fail to be aggravated by the heat and noise of crowded rooms. Her husband proposed remaining with her, but she urged him strongly to go, saying that it would look like an intentional slight to the marquis, who was a new acquaintance, if both were to stay away. At last Flores reluctantly departed, with the intention of merely showing himself at the ball, and immediately returning home.

The rooms of the Torrejon palace were already thronged with masks when Don Mariano entered them. The usual collection of knights and shepherdesses, flower-girls and harlequins, Turks and troubadours, gipsies, contrabandistas, majos and manolas were there, but besides these there were also many less common-place characters, costumed with elaborate fidelity to the fashions of the times in which the originals had lived, and admirably supported by those who had assumed them. The rooms were draped and tapestried for the occasion, and illumined by thousands of wax-lights, and the whole scene was so gay and brilliant that Don Mariano, who had gone thither as a matter of form, and without expecting amusement, was surprised to find himself taking an interest in the pageant, and listening with a smile to the pleasantries and repartees bandied about amongst the maskers.

After a few turns round the rooms, Flores was standing watching a party of masks dressed as Arragonese peasants, who were executing one of their national dances in a strikingly graceful and characteristic manner, when he felt himself touched slightly upon the shoulder. On looking round, he saw standing behind him a figure attired in a black silk mask and domino, the hood of the latter thrown over its head, so as to obviate any possibility of recognizing the wearer.

"Buenas noches, Otello," said the mask, in a feigned tone. "Where have you left your pretty wife?"

The freedom of this question, and the impertinent insinuation conveyed in the sobriquet applied to himself, were anything but agreeable to Flores, who, as has already been seen, was of a morbidly susceptible disposition, and at all times ready to exaggerate and misconstrue the slightest word spoken of Donna Lucia. His first impulse was to turn his back upon the unceremonious interrogator and leave the room, but calling to mind the license of the season, he checked himself, and answered the question by another.

"Have you not wit enough to find the ladies you seek without inquiring of a third person?" he replied.

"Perhaps," said the mask, nodding confidently, "perhaps yes, and perhaps no, Marianito. Or it may be that I could tell even better than yourself, where and how occupied la Bella Gaditana now is. What if I had seen her since you have?"

"That were scarce possible," replied Flores, hastily; "for it is little more than an hour since I left her, and then she was indisposed and about to retire to rest."

"Oh, most incautious of all Othellos!" exclaimed the domino, in a tone of grave banter; "most negligent of dragoons, revealing the exact position of the treasure you are set to guard; watching over it when no danger is near, absent when the knight is at hand who has swern to tear it from thy clutches. Vaya, Marianito; thou art but a blind buzzard after all. A marido, a husband, in the full force of the term."

"And you are a sorry jester, Senor Domino," retorted Flores, nettled in spite of himself at the solemn impertinence of the mask. "Carry your buffoonery where it may be more relished."

"Gently, gently, worthy senor Flores," replied the mask; "remember a certain proverb, chi va piano, va sano. Why should you be angry with me because I am one of your best friends, and disposed to throw a light upon your domestic history, of which I am grieved to find you are lamentably unconscious."

"Pshaw!" exclaimed Flores, impatiently.

"Pshaw! if you will, but what if I were to prove to you that within a few minutes after you left your fair lady about to retire to rest, a cavalier, young, and not altogether ill-looking, was admitted to her presence. That he was allowed to kiss—her hand, you think perhaps—not so—her lips. Nay, that she returned his embrace with the utmost ardour and affection, that"——

"Liar and slanderer!" exclaimed the enraged Flores, suddenly starting out of the state of stupefaction into which the bold assertions of the mask had at first plunged him. "Liar! you shall eat your words or prove them."

And he clutched at the domino with one hand, while with the other he attempted to tear off his mask.

"Gently, good Mariano," said the domino, springing back. "I have more to tell, but not till you can hear it more coolly." And gliding behind a group of persons standing near them, he was the next instant lost in the crowd of masks.

Although Flores felt the absurdity of attaching any importance to the random pleasantries of a carnival ball, he was not the less annoyed and angry at what had just passed. He hurried from one room to another in hopes of finding the black domino, with the full intention of making him unmask and calling him to account for his insolence. Black dominos he found by dozens, but not the one he sought. Some were taller, others shorter, and one or two whom he accosted, fully believing he had found the object of his pursuit, burst into a fit of laughter at the angry apostrophe he addressed to them, and replied in a tone or accent which at once convinced him of his mistake. Sensible that his search must be in vain, and was only serving to render him ridiculous, he was about to leave the ball, when at the moment that he found himself in a particularly crowded part of the rooms, something was slipped into his half-closed hand, without his being able to see the person who had given it. It was a twisted paper, which as soon as he could extricate himself from the throng, he opened and read. It contained the following words, written in pencil:—

"What you have heard is true, but more remains to tell. Would you know all, place yourself at midnight beside the fourth pillar of the great orchestra."

Flores at first felt inclined to disregard this mysterious epistle. His naturally generous disposition made him unwilling to attach importance to anonymous accusations, or attacks that could only be made behind the incognito of a mask. At the same time, the words of the black domino had not been without their effect upon his jealous mind. Without confessing to himself, that he was in the slightest degree swayed by any suspicion of his wife, he finally resolved to go to the place of rendezvous, with the sole intention, as he persuaded himself, of unmasking and punishing the insolent slanderer of Dona Lucia. It wanted but a quarter of an hour to midnight, and making his way slowly through the crowd, he reached the great orchestra, one of three which were that night filled with musicians. The other two orchestras were temporary erections, but this one was in a saloon in which the Marquis of Torrejon gave frequent concerts, and it was permanent. It was raised about five feet above the floor, supported by pillars, and surrounded by a gilt balustrade. The entrance to it was from the corridor without.

Midnight struck; five, ten minutes, a quarter of an hour elapsed, and no one accosted Don Mariano, who remained leaning against the pillar, chafing inwardly, and furious with himself for having kept the appointment, and thereby, doubtless, rendered himself a laughing stock to one or many of the masks around him, who had probably been informed of the hoax, and were even then enjoying his vexation. The dancing had been interrupted by the performance of some jugglers and fantoccini which was going on in the adjoining apartment, and the orchestra below which Flores was standing was unoccupied, the musicians having gone out to take some refreshment. Suddenly, and at the moment that Don Mariano was about to leave his post, he heard a rustling above his head, and looking up, saw the black domino leaning over the balustrade of the orchestra.

"You are punctual, Othello," said the mask, in the same cool, sarcastic tone that had before annoyed Flores.

"Punctual," replied Flores, "not because I attach any importance to what you have told or may tell me, but because such insolence exceeds the license even of a carnival night. If you are a Caballero, as I may presume from finding you here, you will immediately unmask, or at least tell me your name and appoint a time to-morrow to give me satisfaction for the insult you have offered me."

"Neither the one nor the other," was the answer.

"We must part without your knowing me otherwise than as the black domino. But I promised you a little information concerning the conduct of la Bella Gaditana, and I will keep my word. Do you know this ring, Mariano?" continued the mask, holding out an emerald ring which Flores immediately recognized as belonging to his wife.

"Villain! where got you that?" exclaimed Flores, turning deadly pale, all his jealous suspicions reviving with tenfold violence.

The mask gave a low, sarcastic laugh.

"From her, Mariano."

Without uttering another word, Flores thrust his hand through the balustrades, and endeavored to seize his tormentor, who, by his position in the orchestra, had his feet about on a level with Don Mariano's head. The domino stepped back, eluding his grasp with ease.

"One more attempt of that kind and I leave you," said the mask.

Flores saw, in fact, that to escape him, the unknown had only to pass through an open door leading from the orchestra to the corridor without. The sight of his wife's ring had roused his jealousy to the highest pitch, and obliterated all the good resolutions he had made to disregard anonymous accusations. He now thought only of the best means of inducing his informant to tell all he knew. The latter did not leave him long in a state of suspense.

"Bien, Mariano," said he, as he saw Flores step a pace or two back from the orchestra, as if to intimate his intention of abstaining from further violence.—"Remain quiet, and I will tell you all. The Lothario who causes you so much uneasiness is young, and good-looking, and agreeable. He entered your house five minutes after you left it. Enquire of your servants; they will confirm what I tell you."

"But the ring," exclaimed the unfortunate Flores, his lips white with suppressed fury, his hands clenched till the nails dug into the palms. "How came you by that ring?"

"I took it from the finger on which you have more than once seen it. Cuidado! senor," continued the mask, as Flores made an impetuous movement towards his tormentor. "No nearer, or I am gone.—What do you suppose could be my motive for telling you all this, had I not some pet vengeance of my own to accomplish? What if I had been once preferred, but were now capriciously thrown aside to make way for a favored rival?"

"Proofs! What proofs have you?" gasped Flores, in a voice so hollow and unnatural that the mask seemed to start slightly and hesitate before he replied.

"You would have proofs—what think you of this ring, drawn from her finger?"

"You may have stolen it," replied Flores, in the same hoarse and hollow tone as before.

"Do you recognize this hair?" said the mask, drawing a small gold locket from under his disguise, and holding it out to Don Mariano. "Nay, touch it not. You can look at it in my hands."

"'Tis her's! 'tis her's!" muttered Flores; "I could tell it amongst a thousand, that rich and silky black. But no, no, there may be other hair like her's.—'Tis no proof—no more than the ring. She may have lost it; or it is stolen—or—"

And the unhappy man trembled and stammered in the agony of his jealousy, striving to persuade himself of the inefficiency of the testimony which to him appeared only too ample and conclusive.

"You are hard to convince, Mariano," said the domino; "but I have yet other evidence, at least as far as I myself am concerned. Hark! a word in your ear."

Flores stepped close up to the orchestra, and the unknown, kneeling down, brought his masked visage within a few inches of Don Mariano's ear, and spoke a few words in a low, hissing whisper. What those words were was never known but to him who spoke and him who heard them. What seeming proof or voucher of his wife's guilt, the black domino, like another Iago, conveyed to Flores in that whisper, none can tell. Its purport can only be conjectured from the effect it produced upon the unhappy hearer, who started back as though a knife had been driven into him, and uttered a cry so wild and shrill that it was heard through the whole suite of apartments.—Then, with a spring like that of a tiger, he caught hold of the top of the balustrade, which was nearly eight feet from the ground, and in an instant swung himself into the orchestra. The domino, as soon as he had said the words which wrought so fearful an effect on Don Mariano, had darted through the small door leading into the corridor, and shut and bolted it behind him. The fastening, however, was too frail to withstand the violence with which Flores hurled himself against it, and in an instant he stood in the passage without. But the domino had disappeared, nor did his pursuer take much trouble to seek him. The direction of Don Mariano's fury seemed suddenly to change, and a new and more worthy object of revenge to occur to him. Rushing along the corridors and galleries, he sprang down the stairs, burst through the group of startled and staring domestics collected in the hall, and darted out of the palace.—Forgetting his carriage, which was waiting for him, he flew through the streets, bareheaded and panting, relaxing nothing of his desperate speed till he reached his house in the Calle San Geronimo. The porter, who hurried to answer his furious summons, stood aghast on beholding his master rush past him, hatless, his ball dress splashed and soiled by the mud of the streets, his features pale as death and distorted by the violent conflict that was raging within him. Before he had crossed the hall, he hurried back, and, grasping the man by the collar—

"Has any one been here to-night?" he demanded.

"Yes—No—Senor," stammered the terrified domestic.

"Scoundrel!" vociferated Don Mariano, shaking the man violently. "Have you been taught your lesson? Answer me, who has been here?"

"An officer," replied the servant, half choked by his master's violence.

Without staying to hear more, Don Mariano darted up the marble staircase, along the carpeted gallery, and through a suite of rooms that led to his wife's apartments. He paused but for an instant in a chamber, on the wall of which a number of weapons of various descriptions were fantastically arranged in the manner of a trophy. From amongst jewel-hilted scimetars, Toledo swords, and richly inlaid pistols, Don Mariano snatched a dagger of the well-tempered steel of Albacete, a short, keen, double-edged blade, that flashed as he drew it from its sheath. The next instant he entered his wife's apartment.

Behind the half-drawn curtains of dark crimson velvet that surrounded her couch, Dona Lucia lay sleeping, her beautiful head supported by one of her exquisitely formed arms, her abundant black tresses, which had escaped from the silken kerchief that bound them, streaming over the snow white pillow. The mellow light of a painted lamp suspended from the ceiling fell upon her delicately chiselled features, placid and calm in sleep as those of an infant. It seemed impossible to gaze on that face and entertain a doubt of its owner's spotless purity. But Don Mariano gave himself no time for such reflections.—With a face like marble, and teeth fiercely clenched, the deadly weapon with which he had armed himself clutched firmly in his right hand, he stepped into the alcove in which Lucia was sleeping, and drew the curtain partially behind him. There was a moment's dead silence; then a stifled cry and a deep drawn sob, and Flores re-appeared, the furies of jealousy, revenge, and—already—remorse, written upon his face. There was a stain of blood on his right hand, and flecks of the same sanguine hue on his distorted, ashy-pale countenance. At that instant hasty steps were heard in the adjoining apartment, the door of the room was thrown violently open, and the black domino stood before him.

"Where is Lucia?" exclaimed the mask, in a hurried and anxious voice.

Instead of replying, Flores sprang upon the new comer with a shout, or rather shriek, that resembled no earthly sound. But before he reached him, the mysterious domino tore off his mask, and with a moan of agony and despair, Don Mariano fell senseless to the ground. The features revealed were those of Lucia's brother.

But a short explanatory epilogue is necessary to this sad tragedy. Scarcely had Flores left his house to go to the ball at the Marquis of Torrejon's, when Enrique Guevara arrived, having obtained a leave of absence, of which he profited, to visit Madrid. No sooner did he hear that his brother-in-law was gone alone to a masquerade, than it occurred to him to follow him thither and torment him on the subject of his jealousy. Of the latter part of his project he said nothing to his sister, who, on his expressing a wish to go to the ball, gave him a card with the Marquis's crest and initials on it, which was to have served for her own admission. Enrique had combined his mischievous plan in a moment, and seeing several of his sister's rings lying on the table, he took one of them, which he thought would be useful to assist in mystifying Flores. The locket containing Lucia's hair was a chilling token of affection that he had had several years in his possession, and was in the habit of wearing suspended round his neck.

Scarcely, however, had he played off the joke that was to produce such fatal results, when he became alarmed at what he had done, remembering the wild look and violent agitation with which Flores had received what he considered the proofs of his wife's faithlessness. Don Mariano's strange demeanor and the disordered state in which he had left the ball, had attracted attention, and were the theme of many conjectures. Terrified for the consequence of his folly, Enrique Guevara jumped into a carriage and drove rapidly to the Calle San Geronimo, but, with all the haste he made, he was too late to prevent the sad catastrophe, of which his habitual indulgence in practical jokes was the immediate cause.

As recently as the year 1835, a small country house within a few miles of Madrid, was inhabited by three persons, a lunatic and his two attendants. The former might frequently be seen, during the more tranquil periods of his malady, walking feebly up and down the gardens belonging to the house, accompanied by his keepers. Those of the inhabitants of Madrid, who occasionally took their afternoon's ride or drive in that direction, gazed at him with compassion and curiosity, and the stranger who, perchance, enquired his name, was informed that it was Don Mariano Flores, surnamed the Modern Othello.

THE PARTED.

PART I.

Sir Hubert.—Grant Heaven the fair one prove but half so true!
Percy.—O, she is truth itself!
Sir Hubert.—She may be changed,
Spite of her tears, her fainting, and alarms.
I know the sex, know them as nature made 'em;
Not such as lovers wish, and poet's feign.
[H. More's "Percy."

There's many a tale of man's inconstancy,
And woman's changeless love, her fearless trust,
And never wavering devotedness:
Both have been seen, and are, and will be,—so
Have been and are, and will be the reverse.
'Tis not that Nature forms the heart of man,
Different from that of woman, but for him
There's more temptation to forgetfulness,
In the world's busy scenes; yet even there,
Through all temptation, through all trials, he
Has oft proved constant, and has sometimes found
His heart's wealth pour'd upon a hollow shrine.
I have been thinking of a tale I heard.
If 'twas all told I know not; it would seem
There was slight cause to separate two hearts,—
But to my tale,—I tell it as I heard:

Her native home was 'neath a sky
Serenely clear,—her native bowers
With the world's loveliest might vie,
So fragrant and so bright their flowers:
And there she pass'd her childhood,—there
She found a mystic charm, which threw
Even around that home so fair,
A richer, a more glowing hue;
'Twas Love,—but turn we from the view,
To where, with unimpassion'd brow,
Repressing every earthly feeling,
Are cloister'd nuns devoutly kneeling,
With them is "Sister Agnes" now;
Calm and unmoved, as though she ne'er
Had known a home more bright and dear.

Wealth, rank, and regal blood, and power,
Her haughty father boasted,—she
Dream'd not, in girlhood's careless hour,
How they would shape her destiny.
Ere from her bright and thornless path,
One flower or sunbeam had departed,
Eugene St. Clairville cross'd her way,—
Young, highly gifted, noble hearted.
They loved, and she had given her hand,
But for her father's harsh command,
He coldly said, she was too young
To wed,—and while their hearts were wrung
With hopeless anguish, they were parted.

The father, to a cloister's gloom
Consign'd his child,—a living tomb!
And, e'en within a convent's gate,
May wealth and power like his prevail,)
When but a brief noviciate
Was past, they placed the sable veil
Upon her young and beauteous brow,
A sad, a never-changing token,
Of the irrevocable vow,
Too oft in bitter anguish spoken.
But still her father fear'd it would prove Too powerless to conquer love;
He fear'd rebellious feelings, where
She breath'd St. Clairville's native air,
And soon his jealous, heartless care,
Found in our "Western World" a dome,
He deem'd would be a safer home,
And placed his helpless victim there.

She was a victim,—yet no trace
Of grief appear'd upon her face,
Not e'en "sweet music," which she taught
(Her daily task,) to those around her;
Seem'd to awake one painful thought,
By memory of past scenes to wound her.
Beloved in that secluded home,
She never breath'd a wish to roam;
It seem'd that happiness was found,
Within her convent's narrow bound.

PART II.

How Love, though unto earth so prone,
Delights to take Religion's wing,
When time or grief hath stain'd his own.—[T. Moore.

Where was Eugene St. Clairville?—years
Had pass'd, since from his dream of love
He waked, the bitter agony
Of hopes forever crush'd, to prove.
Had that past by? Had he gone forth,
At Pleasure's or Ambition's call,
Or sought for Fame, or found at last,

The utter worthlessness of all
Had he forgotten heartlessly,
Or sunk in sorrow hopelessly?

He was o'erwhelm'd;—and, for his loss
Feeling nought earthly could attone;
He humbly knelt before the cross,
And sought for aid from heaven alone.
Turn'd from a world, in which, to him
The brightest beams of joy were dim,
Since the once cloudless, hope-fraught ray
Of mutual love had pass'd away.
The balm his stricken spirit found
He sought to pour on those around,
Became a Priest, and earnestly
Labor'd the unerring soul to win
To paths of penitence and hope,
From the bewildering maze of sin.

Yet there were seasons when he felt
Too strongly, memory's torturing power,
When feelings he had fancied hush'd,
Were waked by moonbeam, stream or flower;
To rise above their with'ring sway,
Awhile he strove, with vain endeavor,
(In the familiar scenes that lay Around his path,) then turn'd away,
And left his native land for ever.
The land where he believ'd that she
Whom still he loved so hopelessly,
Remain'd,—for of her destiny
He knew not, but he felt 'twas vain
To dream of meeting her again.

With his adopted home, a balm
It might appear, was found,—for calm,
And sometimes even cold he seem'd,
As though his spirit ne'er had dream'd
Of aught unsanction'd by his vow;
Of the heart's warmer, wilder feeling,
There was no sign,—on lip or brow
No change, a hidden grief revealing.

But yet his bosom's calm was like
An ice-bound stream,—e'en in the glow
Of the bright sun, as motionless,
And marble-like it seems, as though
Its waters ne'er again would flow:
But when the swelling flood below
Is loosed, with devastating force,
It rushes madly on its course,
Bursts banks which bound its waves before,
And scatters ruin on the shore.

At length a neighboring convent's hall
For the first time he enter'd, (led
To visit it at duty's call,)
When, like a vision from the dead,
But e'en more beautiful than when Within her native bowers,—again
His loved and lost one stood before him!
Oh, who can tell the hopes and fears,
The visions of departed years,
That one brief moment's spell threw o'er him?
That moment's feeling none may tell,
For senseless at her feet he fell,
As pallid and as motionless,
As though his sorrows all were o'er,—
As though, his cup of suff'ring full,
His wounded heart would throb no more.

Yet did he live—he breath'd again,
But life to him had nought to give;
That shock had pierced his tortured brain,
And made it misery to live.
The holy calm, that had of late
Encompass'd him, was swept away,—
His heart and spirit desolate,
He was a maniac from that day.

And she?—her calmness was unbroken,
She spake no word, and gave no token,
The memory of past days revealing,
Or aught of deeply painful feeling;
But turn'd her to her tasks again,
Perform'd her duties day by day,
Even as though the memory
Of that sad scene had pass'd away.
There yet—far loveliest in the band
Of the meek sisterhood,—is she,
And there, beneath a mild command,
Her days are pass'd unmurmuringly.

Such was the story,—and 'tis one of truth,
Told by a witness of the closing scenes,
One knowing, loving "Sister Agnes" well,—
Such was the mournful story that I heard.

THE VILLAGE FUNERAL.

MRS. L. F. MORGAN,
FORMERLY "LUCY SEYMOUR."

Behold, he taketh away—who can hinder him? Who will say to him what doest thou?

The solemn and impressive utterance of those words of the sorrowful prophet of Idumea, attracted the attention of a lady who had stopped at a tavern in a village of New England, to her hostess. The speaker stood near a window of the apartment, into which she had but recently ushered the traveller, gazing intently on a lengthening throng, whose slow and measured pace told that they were bearing another tenant to the house appointed for all living. She was evidently so absorbed by the feelings the spectacle awakened, as to be wholly unconscious of the stranger's presence until the movement of the latter to the window, consequent on her remark, recalled her recollection. As if to excuse her forgetfulness, she observed—

"Many a heart is made sad, Madam, by the scene that you now behold."

The stranger, an elderly woman of benevolent countenance, inquired the name of the deceased.

"Mrs. Rainsworth, the benefactress of our town," replied the hostess. "Not soon, indeed, shall we look upon her like again. If we had been called upon to choose a victim for death to wreak his malice on, I am sure she is the last of our whole population we should have named. She cannot be spared, indeed she cannot," continued she, with emphasis. "But God knows best."

Further questions from the traveller elicited from the hostess the following particulars of the deceased, related with so much simplicity and genuine feeling, that Mrs. Harper, who had a heart attuned to sympathy with every grade of human suffering, was deeply interested by the recital.

Mrs. Rainsworth had been a resident of ——— about fifteen years, during which time she had devoted herself to the education of her two children, Edward and Lucy, and to the amelioration of the condition of the afflicted around her. Nothing was known of her history previous to her removal to the village. She never alluded to it herself, and there was always a reserve about her manner that checked the inquiries of the inquisitive. But curiosity itself soon lost its disposition to discover more than she chose to reveal, in admiration of her virtues; and penury and grief learned to associate her name with all that is lovely and loveable in human character.—That she was possessed of an ample fortune, was rather inferred from her habitual liberality, than known to be the fact. She never said to the suppliant for relief, "depart, be thou warmed and filled;" but generously provided what was needed out of her own stores. Nor did the frequent deceptions practised upon her bounteousness, or the ingratitude subsequent on many of her charities, arrest the stream of her benevolence, which seemed incapable of check or exhaustion. But perhaps the most remarkable feature in her character, contrasted as it was with her profuse munificence to others, was her niggardliness towards herself. Her dress was of the simplest and cheapest materials, and her house small, and as plainly furnished as was compatible with the comfort of her children. Their gratification as well as happiness she indeed consulted and promoted to the extent of her ability, always careful, however, that the indulgence of the present should not militate against their future welfare. They were both educated under her own eye at home, and both gave promise of no ordinary attainment and usefulness.—The talents of her son, especially, were considered brilliant, and his enthusiastic attachment to his mother gave her an influence almost unlimited over a temper naturally haughty and impetuous, and called into exercise a thousand amiable qualities. His character was as highly esteemed as his intellect by all who knew him. He had studied law and passed an honorable examination but a few months previous to the mournful occurrences which introduced Mrs. Harper to his sad history.

Having given this slight sketch to the reader, we will now permit the landlady to continue it in her own words.

"But, ah, madam, I have only told you what is pleasant. The worse part of the story is to come yet. A young man came to our village about a fortnight ago. Many have cause to rue that event! He and Edward Rainsworth had a quarrel at a public dinner at my house. It was a political celebration, but there was no drinking. There are a great many reports about the cause of the dispute, but nothing is known with certainty. However, it terminated in a duel, and Edward was mortally wounded. He survived five days, and the very hour he was buried his mother died. If sorrow can break one's heart, I am sure her's was broken."

As Mrs. Brown concluded her narrative, the procession reached the tavern on its road to the village cemetery. Perceiving the sympathy of her auditor, she remarked—

"Perhaps you will attend the funeral, madam. The stage will not go for two hours or more."

Mrs. Harper replied affirmatively, and in a few minutes took the arm of the landlady, and mingled with the crowd.

Those who have joined merely as spectators in a funeral procession, cannot have failed to notice the indifference and even apathy manifested by the majority of the train not immediately connected with the deceased. The voice may indeed be more subdued, and the tread less hurried than usual; but if a few words meet the listener's ear, they will not unfrequently be found to tell of the failure of the crops, the unfavorableness of the weather, the stagnation of business, or some subject equally irrelevant to the solemn occasion which has congregated the assembly: and the inquiring eye might wander from face to face, vainly endeavoring to trace some consciousness of the incontrovertible fact: I, too, am mortal, and must, ere long, lie as low as that quiet sleeper. An unconquerable repugnance to the contemplation of their latter end seems to characterize mankind in general, and but a small number of those whom feeling or custom summons to perform the last sad obsequies for a departed neighbor, regard the warning token as a harbinger of their own dissolution. Nor are the sympathies of the crowd who gather around a new made grave, much excited for the decease of the individual who but lately moved in life and health among them. Small, indeed, is the number whose exit from terrestrial existence is universally deplored, even in one neighborhood; and a passing sigh, a brief sentence of commendation on their virtues, or a transient expression of regret for the home hearts made desolate, is the usual tribute offered on the newly tenanted tomb, the costliest expenditure which can be spared from the store of sensibility. Although we would not adopt the selfish sentiment of Rochefaucault, and assert that there is always something not wholly disagreeable to us in the misfortunes of our best friends, we are forced by observation to acknowledge that the sympathies of most bosoms revolve in a very narrow sphere; and, if we may be allowed to judge from appearances, curiosity is often the chief attendant at a funeral.

The one, however, in which our traveller had been accidentally called to participate, was calculated, from the mournful and novel circumstances connected with it, to awaken some degree of sorrow in the most inconsiderate mind; and I have not unfrequently suspected that there are few persons more unfeeling than the habitually inconsiderate. Almost every face indicated interest in the scene, and Mrs. Harper felt an increasing concern for the melancholy death of one who evidently held a sway so unusual over general sympathy. Several sentences met her ear, as she proceeded to the grave-yard, expressive of regret and commiseration, but the following observations particularly attracted her attention. They were interchanged between a tall, gaunt woman, with large grey eyes and high cheek bones, and a short, black-eyed female, with a sharp nose, and slightly pock-marked face.

"Lucy will be very rich, now, I suppose," said the former; "but there is nobody here to take care of her money. She will be fleeced, as sure as my name's Kitty Wright. She has so little thought about the value of wealth, except to give away, that any person can impose on her."

"Yes, it is useless for her to have such a fortune," replied her companion, "for she would be just as well contented without it. If you and I had a little of it, she would not miss it, and it would help us mightily with our large families. Things are very unequally distributed in this world."

"I doubt if either of you would be willing to exchange lots with poor Lucy, with all her money," said Mrs. Brown, in a half-reproving tone. Then turning to Mrs. Harper, she added in a tone loud enough to be heard by the last speaker, "our Minister, Mr. Berkley, always said Mrs. Rainsworth was the best expounder of the commandment, 'Thou shalt not covet,' that he ever saw. Indeed, ma'am, possessed as she appeared to be, of means enough to purchase every luxury, she always seemed watching against buying any article that might lead her neighbors to envy her. She often talked to us about the sin of covetousness, and had a very persuasive way of reconciling every one of us to our condition. She knew the poor were more prone to break the tenth commandment than any others. I hope I shall never forget her many lessons on this subject."

"I do not think any of us will, for they were often repeated," said the woman Mrs. Brown had reproved—"She meant them for our good, no doubt, but I used to think she must suppose we envied her wealth a great deal more than we did, when she took so much trouble to reconcile us to poverty."

"I never thought her an object of envy," remarked Mrs. Wright, "for she had not a happy look.—Poor thing! she loved her children very much, and never was in her senses entirely after Edward's wound was pronounced mortal. I reckon she feared she had made an idol of him. Awhile before she died, she looked up sadly at me and said, 'Retribution—retribution—it has come at last.'"

As Mrs. Wright concluded this remark, the procession entered the grave-yard. The removal of the coffin from the hearse to place it in its last receptacle, and the alighting of those who had proceeded in carriages or on horseback, caused some little delay. When the bereaved and desolate orphan of the deceased was assisted from a carriage by some of her mother's friends, there was a general stir in the assembly, as if all were excited by a common impulse. She was evidently weeping bitterly, though struggling to control the expression of her deep grief; and her tottering steps towards the melancholy repository of her young heart's most cherished hopes, told that her fragile form could but illy sustain its weight of wo. As she caught a last view of the coffin in its descent into the sepulchre, she uttered a wild and piercing cry, and starting from the arm that supported her, sank senseless on the new-made grave of her murdered brother.

Mrs. Harper, our compassionate traveller, had rushed forward involuntarily, and was kneeling beside the object of her commiseration, ere she remembered there were other persons present who had more right to administer aid.

"Take her hence—take her quickly, while she is insensible," she cried to the sympathizing but perplexed friends of the unhappy girl.

The request was immediately obeyed, and many an anxious tearful eye, watched the carriage which bore Lucy Rainsworth from the mother's open tomb. The clergyman, a middle aged man, of prepossessing appearance, paused until the carriage disappeared in an angle of the road, and then, as he repeated the beautiful and solemn service which announces the return of "Ashes to ashes—dust to dust," his voice was agitated, and his hands trembled with emotion. As the sexton's spade was lifted to complete the mournful work of interment, the Minister respectfully requested a brief delay, and wiping the perspiration from his forehead, thus addressed his attentive audience:

"As the afflicted orphan of our deceased sister is not now present to be pained by a protracted ceremony, I unwilling to dismiss you, my friends, without an effort to improve the mournful occasion which has called us together! Abstract truth may be admitted by the judgment and understanding, but it is only when sensibly exemplified or strikingly exhibited before our view, that it lays hold on the feelings, and convictions of the majority of mankind. We believe in the existence of goodness, and admire it as a principle, but it is only when developed in action, and illustrated by example, that we become familiar with its nature, and learn to love and practise it. Hence it becomes the duty of every expounder of the Gospel, to take advantage of every opportunity to direct the eye of his congregation to the visible representation of the virtues he inculcates, and entreat them to 'go and do likewise.' There is a beautiful harmony in the Christian religion, and each of its votaries should seek to interweave the whole of its precepts into his life, and let no part of his conduct be faulty or defective. Yet from the diversities of natural dispositions certain differences of action will arise, and one person will be seen to present a much more striking and specific embodiment of particular virtues, than another.—That person then should be held up as a beacon light to those of his neighborhood, that they may learn to tread in his footsteps. Such a one is now before us, about to be shrouded from mortal vision forever! Oh! let her memory remain with us to teach and to bless! Methinks I read in your earnest attention the enquiry, in what particular quality did Mrs. Rainsworth excel? Was she not a Christian in every respect? Did she not delight in the sanctuary of the Lord? Where was the Sabbath more hallowed than beneath her roof? Who could accuse her of a want of charity? Dwelt not the law of kindness on her lips? and was not her hand ever open to supply the claims of the needy? Yes, our deceased sister was all you would describe her. But, although it was her 'greatest excellency that she possessed, no known fault, it was not her fault to possess no excellency.'* Perhaps, she felt that the term of existence is to short to bring before the observer's eye all the graces of the Christian religion, and therefore determined to exhibit one, fully, brightly, to those around her. She seemed to have selected for the motto of her life, the tenth commandment, and both by precept and practice, did she exemplify it. Her history during the fifteen years of her residence among us, has been an embodiment of that prohibition. Not only did she endeavor to banish the insidious leaven of covetousness from the dwellings of the poor, and skilfully follow it through its various windings of repining, envy, and discontent, but to the rich she said by her daily conduct, throw no stumbling block in the way of your less favored neighbors, nor by the indulgence of personal vanity and ostentation, lead them to covet your possessions. She was rigidly economical and self-denying in her own expenditure, not from natural taste, but from the fear of tempting others to envy. 'I must lead none into temptation,' was her rule—and faithfully she adhered to it. But she is gone! The Saviour whom she loved and trusted, has taken her to her home in Heaven. Let us, my friends, imitate her virtues, and lay up treasures in the Eternal World. She has left her example as a legacy to our little community. Let her not have lived in vain!"

The Minister ceased speaking. After a moment's pause, he motioned to the sexton to proceed with his work, and in a brief interval, another hillock rose in that populous grave-yard, as a memorial of the rapacity of death.

The crowd dispersed, and as one by one those who witnessed that burial, bowed beneath the same dark sceptre, or removed to some distant home, the turf under which Mrs. Rainsworth slept might have become undistinguished from the common mass, but for the following circumstance, which made that quiet resting place, through many succeeding years, a spot of interest and attraction to the curious traveller who stopped awhile in ——, to learn the legends of its locality.

The young man who had shot Edward Rainsworth, and been committed to prison immediately after the duel, made his escape before the day of his trial arrived. There were various rumors in circulation relative to the manner by which he thus evaded the law, but the goaler, the only person who could give any particular account of the affair, was always remarkable for surliness, and in this instance would not gratify public curiosity, by any detail of the means by which his prisoner managed to elude his well-known vigilance. A few months after the occurrence, two beautiful monuments were erected over the graves of Mrs. Rainsworth and her son, and the sculptor acknowledged that the work was directed, and the expenses defrayed, by the duellist himself. As, however, he never afterwards was recognized in the village, the curiosity which his singular conduct and unknown history excited, gradually subsided, except when the subject was accidentally reverted to.

Lucy Rainsworth was ill for some days after the interment of her mother, and Mrs. Harper's sympathy was so much excited in her behalf, that she deferred her departure from the village, visited and nursed the orphan in her sickness, and so won upon her regard, that Lucy begged to accompany her to her home in Louisville, a request which was cordially granted.

The executor of Mrs. Rainsworth's will was a gentleman of New York, who had visited her twice during her residence in ——, and was the only person, as reported by the Post Master, with whom she held any correspondence. Mr. Berkley, the Minister, wrote to him immediately, on the opening of the will, but when he arrived, his ward and Mrs. Harper were gone. A letter from each to him, left with Mr. Berkley, seemed, however, to satisfy him. He sold the property of Mrs. Rainsworth, in ——, ere he quitted there, and took the proceeds of the sale with him.

Years swept by, ere any intelligence of Lucy Rainsworth reached the scene of her happy youth—but many were the speculations relative to her fate, and not a few deemed her departure with Mrs. Harper singular.

Those who are desirous of following the fortunes of the young orphan, may learn more of her history in a subsequent number of the Courier, under the title of "The Growth of Covetousness."

THE MOTHER'S LEGACY;

OR,

The Growth of Covetousness.

BY MRS. L. F. MORGAN.

[THE SECOND PART OF THE STORY ENTITLED "THE VILLAGE FUNERAL."]

"Beware of covetousness: for a man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesseth."—THE BIBLE.

Our story commences at the moment when Lucy Rainsworth was left alone in her own desolate home, after her return from the funeral of her mother. One by one her sympathizing friends had departed in compliance with her earnest solicitations, imagining she at length reposed under the influence of a strong narcotic, and an elderly woman, her nurse in infancy, was strictly enjoined to watch her during the night. But Lucy was not even temporarily oblivious to the grief that preyed upon her spirit. For the first time, in her brief term of existence, she had practised deception, in order to obtain sooner the solitude she sought, and contrived to avoid the anodyne prepared for her, while, at the same time, she affected to have yielded to its soporific effects. When the street door closed on her last kind guest, she rose from her couch and dismissing the attendant for a few moments, on some trifling pretext, cautiously entered the adjoining chamber from which the corpse of her beloved parent had been so recently removed. Kneeling by the bed on which she had been wont to rest beside her, she supplicated strength and direction for the task before her. Many tears, from the fountain of an aching heart, fell on her clasped hands, and the sorrows of a long life seemed crowded into the short interval. But those tears and that earnest prayer brought relief, and she rose with a lightened and more resigned spirit. An unperformed duty was yet resting upon her conscience, and though in the confusion of her intense anguish, its character was but indistinctly comprehended, her intention to fulfil it had never wavered, and she now felt better prepared for its accomplishment.

"I must now collect my thoughts," she said, slowly and reflectively, as if seeking to recall some memory that bewildered while it nerved her: "my beloved mother's parting injunction was this: 'Save your brother's enemy. Save him at every hazard, Lucy. Save him, if you desire my soul to have peace in eternity. Regard neither prudence, form, nor the world's opinion on the subject. Save him as you hope for my blessing on your future hours. Save him, and convey to him this sealed paper. You will then be almost portionless, my daughter, but trust to God, and pursue the course your own heart will dictate, when you read my history. It is in my cabinet. Now swear to me, Lucy, swear.' And then she blest me as I knelt and swore. To-night, then, must he be liberated—to-morrow he will be tried."

Lucy pressed her feverish brow more closely, and stood for some minutes in an attitude of concentrated and anxious thought. Presently her eyes brightened even in their settled mournfulness, and her lips compressed, as if her decision was made. She hastily unlocked a small cabinet in the apartment, took hence a sealed package and some other papers, also a purse. Another moment she knelt in prayer, then hurried to the chamber where her attendant had left her. The woman returned almost simultaneously. A few low and earnest words were interchanged between them. There was doubt, surprise, and hesitation in the countenance of the attendant—resolve and enquiry in that of Lucy. The latter prevailed at last in the request she was urging, and while she hastily adjusted her attire, the nurse again disappeared. When she returned, she brought with her a pair of high heeled boots, and a man's cloak and hat.—With a trembling hand she assisted her young mistress to put them on over her own dress, and so arranged the collar and hat as effectually to conceal her features. A shawl and bonnet were then procured for herself, and with noiseless steps they descended the stair-case together and stealthily opening the street door, glanced anxiously around them. Lucy lingered on the threshold until she saw her companion reach the stable, and presently bring out the horse of her deceased brother accoutred for a journey. She then joined her, and they took the road to the town prison.

In a gloomy cell, but dimly lighted by a solitary lamp, stood a young man who had apparently numbered about twenty-three years. His countenance, at the moment that we present him to the reader, was a tablet of conflicting emotions of a most painful character, and deep sighs and broken exclamations of complaint alternately burst from his lips.—Well might a feeling of misery and hopelessness rest upon his heart! The ensuing morning he was to be tried for what seemed to the friends of Edward Rainsworth, and they comprised nearly all the citizens of the town, his deliberate murder, and being an entire stranger in their community, without influence or money, he had no reason to suppose that a single individual would "for charity's sweet sake" interpose in his behalf, and attempt to rescue him from the fate which appeared inevitable. Suddenly a noise, unusual at that quiet hour, arrested his attention, and he hastily turned towards the door of the prison—it was unbarred, and the jailor announced "a young man who proffered himself as the prisoner's counsel."

"Admit him," was the reply, while an expression half hopeful, half suspicious passed over the features of the speaker. The stranger entered and the keeper closed the door upon him. There was a momentary silence which was first broken by the duellist, who observed, as he placed for his visitor the only chair the room contained—

"I should, perhaps, thank you for this courtesy, sir, the first tendered me since I have had the honor to be patronized by your civil authorities. But I apprehend you will find my case worse than you imagine. Poverty and friendlessness can have little chance for justice, opposed to wealth and power."

The mingled irony and bitterness of his tone and words, fell harshly and coldly on the ear of his companion, and increased an embarrassment which was already excessive. Rejecting with a slight but decisive gesture the offered seat, the youth replied in a low, earnest tone—

"Nevertheless, I come to save you." At the same instant the hat and mantle enveloping that fragile form were hastily thrown off, a profusion of clustering ringlets escaped from the comb that had confined them, and fell over the neck and shoulders of the speaker, and a young girl whose extreme paleness contrasted strikingly with the mourning dress she wore, stood before the astonished prisoner. Her dark eyes, kindled with high resolve, were yet expressive of deep grief, and her whole contenance evinced strong excitement tempered by a stern determination to be calm. As the young man's glance met hers, he shuddered, for he almost fancied the ghost of Rainsworth had come to mock his misery. "I come to save you," she repeated, with a long drawn breath, "but no time must be lost. Disguise yourself in this cloak and hat, and accompany the jailor hence, stooping as much as possible to avoid betraying the difference of height. He will not address you and you need not speak to him. Just beyond the court of the prison, a horse, spirited and strong, awaits you. Before sunrise you may be far away. Take this," she added, putting a sealed paper with a well-filled purse into his hand, "it will give you important information. Why delay?" added she, more hurriedly, although she had spoken with rapidity throughout, for the young man stood immoveable, with his earnest gaze fixed upon her face.

As she thus impatiently questioned him, he passed his hand across his brow as if to clear his sight and intellect together, and as his bewildered faculties awoke to the comprehension of her meaning, he said, resolutely—

"I will not leave you here in this horrid place, I cannot. If you can depart in safety, go, and leave me to my fate. Why should you encounter peril to save one—an unknown stranger?"

"I have a motive sufficient to render greater peril powerless to deter me," she replied, with emphasis; "you may frustrate my purpose, but by doing so you will only add to the sorrows of an already burthened heart. I promised one to save you whose approbation has hitherto been the light of my existence. Can you still hesitate?" continued she, and her appealing glances grew wilder from anxiety.

"Who are you?" exclaimed the prisoner, impetuously, "who thus compassionate a wretched stranger, and have evinced such intrepidity to save him?—'Will you not tell me, that I may worship you as a far off 'bright particular star' in the gloomy destiny which gathers around me?"

"The knowledge you desired could awaken no pleasurable emotion," she said, hurriedly, proffering the mantle again; "attribute your deliverance to God, and oh! by a life of penitence seek to expiate, as far as mortal can, the fearful past. The jailor comes," she added, seeing him about to speak, "waste not the fleeting moments in idle questions."

The prisoner still lingered.

"Tell me at least," he said, with emotion, "if you are not the spirit of the murdered Rainsworth in an angelic form?"

That name thus uttered brought a deep flush to her pale face, but it 'faded as it came,' and though the hand which offered his disguise trembled, it was still extended.

"You will be too late. The jailor comes," she cried, vehemently. "For his sake whom you have just named, then, if not your own nor mine, consent to save yourself." The wild energy of her tone and manner commanded obedience. The hat and cloak were thrown on according to her desire, and as the outer door grated on its hinges, the young girl had concealed her form in the prisoner's great coat and the shadow of the apartments, while he passed out to meet the keeper. The latter did not enter, but merely glancing at the recumbent figure which tenanted the cell, accompanied his companion to the street door.

Their retiring steps had long died away in the last faint response of echo, ere Lucy Rainsworth could admit the hope that the prisoner was indeed free, and her duty fulfilled. She then knelt in grateful acknowledgment of success, and prayer for future protection. For the enemy of her brother too she prayed that contrition for his crime might be awakened in his bosom, and the coming years of his existence be unstained by guilt. True, his hand had thrown a dark eclipse over the sunshine of her destiny, and rifled her home of all its treasures, leaving her a lonely and orphaned pilgrim to pursue the race of life. But she tried to forgive him, and soon found peace for her own bosom by the effort. She had no apprehensions of discovery for herself, if she could avoid detection until the morning. The duellist would then be beyond the reach of danger, and it was for him only Lucy feared. She knew the jailor well. Often had she entered those gloomy walls before, accompanying her mother on embassies of mercy. She was convinced when he was satisfied that his confession could avail nothing to bring back the prisoner, he could easily be persuaded to conceal his knowledge of her interference in his escape. Placing the lamp in a convenient position beside her, she drew a manuscript from her bosom, and thoughtfully examined it ere she unsealed it. It was directed by her mother, and addressed thus: "My daughter after my death." Lucy pressed to her lips the dear memorial, and with her cheek resting on her hand, and her arm supported by the chair which contained the lamp, perused the following history:—

"Although this narrative is not designed to meet the eyes of my daughter until the hand which writes and the heart that dictates it are alike cold and insensible, I blush at its exposure and shrink from the task I have enjoined myself. The bare suggestion, that the child who has ever regarded me with love and reverence shall have cause to reprobate her mother, is so exquisitely painful that I revolt at its realization even as a tenant of the dreamless tomb, and almost determined to lay aside my pen. But imperative duty comes to my assistance and nerves me for the painful effort. A knowledge of my faults may confirm the influence of my precepts, and save my daughter from her mother's sins and consequent misery. And let the affectionate heart of my Lucy be comforted by the assurance that I am even now not what I once was, but by the grace of God in peace and hope look forward without fear to the hour of death; and when she will be reading these pages I expect to have entered my eternal rest and to be rejoicing before the throne.

"When you were not more than six years of age, you innocently touched a chord in my bosom connected with the source of all my sorrows, and I then resolved during its acute vibrations that I would one day pen this history for you. You asked me the meaning of the word heiress. Some indiscreet persons had told you that if your little brother died you would be an heiress. He was at that time an exceedingly delicate child, and in the simplicity of your artless affection you imagined it signified a terrible deprivation. From that hour have I sought with unwearying care to form your character free from covetousness, and root from your breast that bane to virtuous actions—selfishness. I have taught you to value earthly possessions only as a means of enabling you to benefit others, and to consider wealth as a talent for whose improvement you must render a strict account. That you may estimate the worth of such instruction more justly, and render suitable acknowledgements to Heaven for shielding your early years from the debasing influence of worldliness, I must inform you that the moral culture of my childhood was particularly defective,—yet I would not wantonly breathe a reproachful word against the guardians of my morning hours, or attempt to extenuate my own culpability. My natural disposition was aspiring, and the love of distinction was a prominent trait of my character;—therefore, subjected to the most judicious discipline, I doubt not I should still have exhibited symptoms of the malady, which, without such discipline, pervaded my being, and shed a blight over my future prospects. Possessing talents rather above mediocrity and a promise of uncommon beauty, indiscreet associates too soon made me sensible of my advantages, and I appreciated them far beyond their real worth. I frequently heard my abilities descanted on by my friends, and lamentations expressed that pecuniary difficulties deprived me of the means of mental improvement to which my native powers entitled me. I was mentioned in connection with others who with inferior intellects were favored with the opportunities from which I was debarred, and thus I learned both to arraign the justice of Providence and to covet the gifts of the more fortunate.

"Taught to reflect on the position which I might occupy in society, if wealth and its consequent concomitants were added to the bestowments of nature on my person and mind, I was constantly imagining myself in the situation to which I aspired, and revolving in my brain the possibility of attaining it. Nor was I long in discovering that such a possibility existed, though vague indeed and shadowy would seem the prospect of its realization. I had but one maternal uncle, a widower, with an only child, the beautiful, accomplished, but most hapless, Augusta Derrington. My uncle was very fond of me, and often took me to his house to amuse him with my sprightliness and gayety, while his daughter was at boarding school. He was reputed to be very rich, and the costliness and elegance of his domestic arrangements rendered his residence particularly attractive to my disposition, and I always returned home from those occasional visits more discontented with my lot, and restlessly desirous of fortune. A report reached us, when I was about ten years of age, that my cousin was attacked with severe illness, and the physicians had little hope of her recovery. The idea which had rather floated through my mind than found a lodgment there, took then a more tangible form, for I overheard the whisper, 'If she dies, Ellen will unquestionably be adopted by her uncle.' My cousin was restored to health, but I delighted from that period to dwell on the events which might have transpired had my uncle been left childless.—Whenever I heard Augusta's name, it excited a long reverie on the contingencies of her death, and I never afterwards visited Derrington Hall, without coveting the situation of its youthful mistress. When Augusta attained her eighteenth year, her father celebrated her birth-day by a handsome party. I was only twelve years of age, but was present, and several girls as young as myself were invited for my entertainment, for my uncle loved to see us happy. His dwelling was situated on the western banks of the Chesapeake, in Maryland. The beach was of easy access, and pleasure boats, prepared for the occasion, were moored beneath its spreading trees. The day was devoted to enjoyment. Now, after the vicissitudes of years, I can recall the figure of my lovely cousin as she moved amid that light-hearted circle, the fairest, and yet the humblest there. Her dress was rich and beautiful, of a pale blue color, suiting well the delicacy of her pure complexion, and the hue of her soft expressive eyes. She wore no ornaments but a necklace of her mother's hair, from which was suspended a handsome watch, the gift of her father on that morning. Modest and unobtrusive, yet graceful and dignified, she pleased without any effort to attract attention, and was chiefly solicitous that her companions should be interested. Her countenance was indicative of sweetness, gentleness and unclouded happiness, for at that period she knew no sorrow, and a more guileless being never walked the earth. I envied her as much for her freedom from evil passions as her wordly advantages, for I felt their poisoning influence upon my own enjoyment, and admired the virtues I yet made no attempt to obtain. It was almost impossible not to love Augusta, and I did love her as much as I could consistently with my eager yearning after her possessions. Yet, let me be just enough to myself to declare that I had no consciousness of desiring the death of my cousin. I should have started with horror had the idea been suggested. I was an habitual dreamer, but not of bright, and high, and beautiful things. My visions were of sordid wealth, and its vain and paltry distinctions. I wished to be a leader of fashion—a reigning belle—a wit who was caressed and flattered, even while feared—I craved distinction—I loved display. The magnificent delighted me—but for the pure, and holy, and good, I had but little taste. Yet I was not insensible of the selfishness of my feelings—I was not naturally cruel—I would not intentionally have trampled on a worm in my progress towards the summit I sought—still less would I have admitted the most indistinct suspicion of injury to my cousin. Let no human being presume to say in the career of guilt, 'thus far will I go but no farther.' Every step renders the succeeding one more easy—yea, almost impels us forward.

"As my cousin's education was now considered as completed, and her constitution was rather delicate, my uncle thought travelling might prove beneficial to her, and took her to visit the principal of our cities, and the different watering places of most note. They were absent nearly two years, and in my obscure home I heard much of the charms of my young relative, and the conquests she had made. These reports increased my envy of her, and my dissatisfaction with my own condition. Immediately after their return to Derrington Hall, I was invited thither. Rumor informed us that among the suitors of Augusta, an Englishman had been most favored by herself, but that he was disagreeable to her father. The most trifling circumstance connected with one so admired and courted as Augusta Derrington, was interesting to the gay circle in which she moved, and busy tongues, and curious ears were active in the circulation of a story of blighted love, parental authority, and a rejected but still hopeful suitor. At the time the fashionable world were canvassing the family secrets of Derrington Hall, I went thither on a visit. My cousin received me with her usually affectionate kindness, and exerted herself to make my time pass pleasantly. She was even more lovely than when I had last seen her, and adulations had failed to impart either affectation or conceit to her manner. But I had not been long in her society, before I felt that she was changed. She was evidently less happy than formerly; the sweet tranquility of her girlhood had been ruffled, and thoughtfulness and abstraction frequently brought their shadows to her brows. She would often start suddenly from an unconscious reverie, during which I had marked the half checked sigh and moistened eye, and commence a conversation with me on some subject connected with myself. I sometimes rallied her on those fits of musing, and told her what the world said. She listened in silence; but, though she neither acknowledged, denied or evaded the report, I was disposed to attach some credence to it. One evening we were walking on the shore, when I alluded to the celebration of her birth-day.

"'Yes,' she said, in reply to my remark, 'I was very happy then.'

"'And are you not happy now?' I asked.

"'I ought to be, certainly,' she returned.

"'Ought to be!' I repeated; 'none can command their happiness. It is a feeling, not a duty.'

"'You are right,' she said, emphatically; 'but what taught you that truth, Ellen?'

"'Experience,' I replied. 'Situated as I am, I learn many such. But you, I should think, would necessarily be happy, cousin.'

"At this instant we heard approaching footsteps, and we both turned to observe the intruder. A gentleman eagerly advanced and addressed Augusta. He hurriedly apologized for his appearance, and attributed it to accident; but, as the place was retired, and on my uncle's grounds, I was sure the meeting had been sought by him. Augusta seemed much agitated, and would have returned home immediately, but he earnestly entreated her to remain, and allow him a few minutes' conversation. She named him to me as 'Mr. Montresor,' as soon as she had recovered from the discomposure his unexpected presence produced, and he asked me if I did not think she might comply with his request. I smiled, and glanced at Augusta ere I replied. As she looked irresolute, I said—

"'You promised to take me to the old beach-tree this evening. It is quite early yet.'

"Mr. Montresor insisted we should extend our ramble thither, and my cousin reluctantly consented. He of course accompanied us. He spoke frequently to Augusta in a low tone, and as I knew his words were not designed for my ears, I avoided hearing them, and amused myself with throwing pebbles occasionally into the waters, as we slowly walked along the shore, and watching the circles they made. They were both too much engrossed to notice my employment, except by waiting for me as I thus delayed their progress. The few sentences of which I was an unwilling hearer, were sufficient to inform one as quick to comprehend as myself, that Mr. Derrington's disapprobation was the only obstacle to their mutual happiness. When we reached the beach-tree, I managed to occupy myself deciphering the names upon its bark, and my two companions appeared to forget my presence in the interest of their discourse. Mr. Montresor had at first spoken low; but gradually, in the earnestness and energy of his tones, his voice became more distinct, and I learnt that he was endeavoring to persuade my cousin to elope with him, declaring his confidence in her father's readiness to forgive her, when once the irrevocable step was taken. Augusta firmly opposed him, but she was weeping bitterly, and I felt that he had said much which I had not heard to call forth her tenderness. After many expostulations and entreaties, he changed his manner, and accused her of coldness and insensibility, evidenced by her willingness to submit to the whims of a prejudiced father, and sacrifice his happiness to a mistaken sense of filial duty. She glanced reproachfully at his flushed and excited countenance, and said gravely—

"'Ellen, shall we return home?'

"'Yes,' I replied, carelessly, 'but I must come back here to-morrow, and cut my name on this tree. I forgot to bring my pen-knife.'

"Montresor eagerly exclaimed—'Then you will walk again to-morrow?'

"My cousin shook her head, but I replied entreatingly—

"'Yes, dear cousin, you promised to take me to see the cave. I have never been there, you know.'

"As we proceeded homewards, Mr. Montresor accompanied us. He offered his arm to Augusta, but she declined it. He became silent and gloomy. As we approached the house, my cousin stopt, and inquired if he intended to go home with us. He started at the sound of her voice, and replied—

"'Not if disagreeable to you. But may I not see you to-morrow?'

"'Why should you desire it?' she said, sadly and earnestly; 'it can avail us nothing.'

"He answered by protestations of attachment, and passionate appeals to her sensibility. He seemed to be entirely unconscious of or indifferent to my presence. He alternately reproached and entreated her, and finally she consented to walk on the shore with me the ensuing evening. As soon as he had left us, however, the indiscretion of her compliance seemed to strike her mind with new force, and she imploringly exclaimed—

"'Oh, Ellen, call him back, and tell him I cannot, I ought not to see him.'

"'And wherefore?' I asked. 'I can perceive no particular sin in rambling on the shore.'

"'Disobedience to my father makes the sin, Ellen. He does not approve of Mr. Montresor's addresses. He has forbidden me to receive them, and commanded me to tell him his visits must be discontinued.—He will never consent to our union, never. He is as inflexible and firm as man can be.'

"'What is his objection, cousin?' I inquired.

"'He thinks Mr. Montresor is deficient in stability; but his chief objection is, I am sure, to his country. My father hates the English—he always said I should never marry any but an American; but an Englishman is the most detestable to him of all foreigners.'

"'That last is a most frivolous objection,' I said; 'a mere prejudice, without reasonable foundation. But does Mr. Montresor evince instability?' I inquired.

"'I never discovered that he did,' said Augusta, hesitatingly. 'He has been very constant in his devotion to me for the last twelve months.'

"I was half inclined to dispute the strength of her argument as a proof of general decision of character, for it seemed even to my young and unpractised mind, that other motives than love might influence his perseverance. But I pitied Augusta too sincerely to attempt to shake her faith in her lover, though I had some suspicions of his disinterestedness. I thought his professions too vehement to be strictly genuine. He appeared rather to watch their effect on her than to feel them himself. Perhaps I wronged him. Most truly do I hope he proved all her heart desired. But the doubt I entertained should have incited me to a more cordial and generous endeavor to promote my cousin's happiness in the events which followed.

"The next evening, I accompanied Augusta to the shore. Mr. Montresor joined us on the way, and I left them to uninterrupted conversation while I explored the cave and its environs. The interview, however, only increased the uneasiness of my poor cousin. She afterwards informed me that he passionately urged an elopement, and I perceived that his arguments had at last half convinced her of the injustice of her father's objections, if they had failed to shake her resolve to abide by them. Montresor tried to engage me as his advocate. My cousin wept all that night, and the struggle between her love and her sense of duty strongly excited my sympathy. I even offered to plead her cause with my uncle, but she refused to permit my interference, assuring me it would only aggravate him.

"'He will never consent,' she said, with bitter tears. 'He told me, in the most solemn manner, I should not marry Mr. Montresor; that if I did, he would disinherit me forever. I never knew my father to break his word. He is inflexibility personified. I see nothing but misery before me.'

"I sought to comfort her, and hinted that the future might reconcile her to her father's decision by introducing her to a more admired suitor.

"'No, Ellen,' she replied, with earnestness, 'my hopes of happiness as a wife, terminate with the dissolution of my engagement with Mr. Montresor. I shall marry no other.'

"Mr. Montresor wrote to her a few days after our walk to the cave, and sent the letter by a special messenger when my uncle was absent.

"'I cannot permit a clandestine correspondence,' she said; 'I must tell him so, but know not how to communicate my resolve. My father would never forgive my writing.'

"I proposed a stroll on the shore, convinced that he would meet us there. After some hesitation she agreed. Montresor came. He was more importunate than before. He seemed, indeed, very unhappy. I now espoused his cause, for I thought Augusta's peace forever gone, if she continued firm. I tried to persuade myself that I was deeply interested for her welfare, and acting from the purest motives. But I had begun to calculate the probable advantage of their union to my own prospects, and mingled with my solicitude for them many a dream of self-aggrandizement. Mr. Montresor professed to be wholly regardless of fortune. The approbation of my uncle was all he desired—his wealth was a mere bauble. Augusta was equally thoughtless on that subject.—Indeed, the idea of the splendid possessions to which she was heiress, never seemed to have a place in her imagination. Her father's affection and consent was all she thought of. The idea of succeeding to immunities so little valued by them, so earnestly coveted by me, dazzled my fancy, and obscured the kindlier feelings of my nature. I became the medium of intercourse between Augusta and her lover, and met him constantly on the shore to give and receive messages. I was cautious in expressing my opinion, and rather appeared to yield to my desire to promote their happiness, than to advise or commend their course. My ostensible sentiments were, however, made sufficiently apparent to my cousin. She respected my judgment, having imbibed the general notion of my relatives, that my mind was a superior one, and thinking, in her situation, I would act as I hinted, was influenced to a similar conduct. To be brief, her objections were at last surmounted by Montresor, and they eloped. I accompanied her to the roadside, where he waited with a coach and four, with a widow lady, at whose house they had first met. My cousin embraced me with many tears, and was assisted by her lover to the carriage. It drove away, and I never saw Augusta again! I hastened back to the house and shut myself up in the library. When the servant entered to inform me that dinner was ready, I affected to be busily occupied with a book. I had arranged with Augusta and Montresor the course I was to pursue. They were to write to my uncle immediately after the marriage ceremony was performed, and in the interim I was merely to say that Augusta had gone to ride with Mrs. Lewis. This account satisfied my uncle, and after dinner he questioned me about the volume I had been perusing, and asked me to read to him. I obeyed, and the evening passed away. He expressed some uneasiness, when the day terminated without bringing his daughter, and despatched a servant to learn the reason of her continued absence. The message received in reply was, that Miss Derrington had accompanied Mrs. Lewis to a neighboring town, and would not return until a late hour to the house of the latter; therefore, would remain with her during the night. My uncle seemed disappointed, but not alarmed. The ensuing morning, I contrived to amuse him until the arrival of the promised letter. When he received it I was with him, and observed his color change as he glanced at the superscription. While perusing it, his hand trembled violently, and his countenance varied in its expression. But one feeling was ascendant: however affection might have pleaded for his only child, its voice was stifled by the stern resolve of outraged authority. He turned to me with a cold, angry glance, as he concluded the fatal epistle, and said—

"'You are leagued against me alas?!

"He examined my face steadily for a moment, and walked to a window, against which he leant, and covered his eyes with his hand. I had been unable to conceal my embarrassment while subjected to his searching gaze. I now approached him and touched his arms. He started, and as I caught a fugitive view of his features, I saw tears in his eyes. I would have spoken, but he commanded my silence, and abruptly left me. I purposed saying something in extenuation of Augusta's conduct, but was intimidated by his displeasure, and the opportunity passed by. He remained alone during the afternoon, and ate nothing. The following morning he sent for a lawyer, and they were together for several hours. I quickly divined that they were writing my uncle's will. Two of the neighbors came in the evening by his request, and witnessed it. They staid until after tea, and my uncle came to the table with them. All traces of emotion had vanished from his countenance, but a settled gloom was there. He addressed me as usual, having, as I afterwards learnt, pardoned my share in the elopement of Augusta, in consequence of my youth and inexperience.

"A few days subsequent to the first letter of my cousin another arrived, but my uncle returned it unopened, and himself directed the envelope. At that time he ordered every article removed from the hall which had belonged to Augusta. Her wardrobe was sent to her, and I managed to add a few books and valuables which I knew she prized. But her bureau, piano, harp, &c., were sold, and he strictly and peremptorily forbade the mention of her name in his presence. The first transgressor was to be punished with banishment from his house. Augusta's chamber was refurnished for my use, and I was publicly and formally declared his adopted child and the future proprietress of his wealth. I was immediately placed at a fashionable boarding-school, where the teachers were commanded to instruct me in whatever was deemed essential to a first-rate education. I entered with eagerness upon my studies and devoted not only the whole day, but many hours of the night to the acquisition of the knowledge I so coveted. Yet as I aimed at shining and dazzling rather than pleasing and benefiting others, I sought accomplishments more than solid information, and was especially attentive to music and the modern languages. I received two letters from Augusta during my continuance at school, entreating me to intercede with her father in her behalf. To the first I did not reply, but to the second I returned a few cold lines, expressive of wishes for her happiness, and regret that I could not comply with her request. I told her my uncle had forbidden me to mention her to him on pain of his displeasure, and I owed him too much to forfeit his regard. Again she wrote, begging me to ask him to forgive her—she wished no pecuniary aid—she needed none—she sought no portion of his fortune hereafter—she did not even supplicate to see him—she only pleaded for his pardon and his love. I answered, and promised to comply with her request, as far as possible; but I had no real intention of hazarding my own interests. I remained at school four years, and then went to reside at Derrington Hall with my uncle. I had now attained the zenith of my wishes. I was an acknowledged heiress, the centre of a circle of admiring friends, either true or pretended, beautiful, accomplished, witty, and reputed amiable. Flattered and caressed, I talked, laughed, sang, and danced, apparently the gayest amidst those gay crowds who fluttered round me. My word and taste gave law to fashion, my disapprobation made the most costly costume unpopular. My uncle appeared gratified at the homage I obtained, and liberally defrayed all my expenses. He treated me with constant tenderness, and towards him, at least, I conducted myself with the propriety of a dutiful child. And well might I seek to make his lonely life pleasant and cheerful, well might I occasionally sacrifice my own desires to promote his, and forego the admiration of a brilliant company to spend an evening quietly with him! Had I not usurped the place of his only daughter, the sole relic of the wife of his early years? Had I not risen as a cloud between his heart and her's, and shut her forever from the shrine of his affections? It was even so, and slight indeed was the compensation my utmost efforts for his comfort could render. But alas! these feelings did not actuate me. I feared to lose my advantages,—to be hurled from my high position, for I knew I held it by a frail tenure. The man who could cast away his only child for one offence could not be supposed to look with greater lenity upon his niece. Self-interest, not gratitude, taught me the art of pleasing—impelled me to humor all his prejudices, and obey his commands. Yet amidst the splendor that surrounded me, I was not happy. Added to the apprehensions of forfeiting my uncle's favor was the condemning whisper of conscience that I was unjust and ungenerous. Frequently have I wished in the solitude of my own chamber that my cousin had died in her infancy, or at the period when she was deemed so ill by her physicians. There was another thought that occasionally intruded itself with power to excite anxiety. It might be my fate to love as haplessly as my cousin had done, and then could I yield as readily as she had yielded the worldly advantages I enjoyed? I considered myself capable of true and deep affection, but I even at that period doubted my ability to relinquish them, to share a lowlier lot with any human being. Sad indeed is the reflection that the heart may become so ensnared by ambition, so hardened by selfish vanity, that the passion for distinction may absorb all its pure and natural emotions. There was a time in the history of your mother (alas! my daughter, that I should be compelled to record such a fact,) when she could sympathize with a feeling which prompted Napoleon to divorce the devoted Josephine and seek an alliance with royalty. Oh, how carefully should covetousness in all its Protean forms be weeded and rooted from the heart of woman! Whatever we unlawfully desire becomes a lure to guilt. There is a lust of power of admiration, of display, as well as a lust of wealth. Eve coveted knowledge, which would appear to be the least culpable of all ambitious cravings—yet behold the consequences of her unhallowed aspirings. Every leaf of the annals of mankind is stamped with the direful record. But the fancy which sometimes haunted me was not realized. Perhaps it might have been better had the trial come upon me. Yet even while I trace that surmise, my reason acknowledges its falsity. Had I loved against the approbation of my uncle, and been forced to choose between penury or even modern competence with the object of my regard, and the wealth to which I was heiress, I believe the latter would have claimed my preference, so wedded was I to the distinctions it brought. The effect of such grovelling sentiments would probably have been destructive to all after virtues, and I might have descended to an unwept grave, the selfish, cold and impenitent being my youthful days beheld me. My God had merciful designs respecting me. He knew my weakness, and did not try me then. He waited the hour when the test even in its revealings of corruption and helplessness would prove salutary. Had the prophet Nathan been sent to David during the mastery of passion, his words might have been unheeded, or if heeded, the royal transgressor might have attributed their influence to his own moral strength. But the message came when the storm had subsided—the still small voice was felt to be distinct—apart from himself, and the awakened sinner bowed in humble, contrite submission to the chastisement of his acknowledged guilt. Oh! even in the moment when the light of truth flashes upon the conscience, and we mourn over the retrospect of the past, we should bless God that the illuminating energy came at a period when the soul was not barred against its reception, and the gross darkness of depravity was not impervious to its beams. There are such hours in man's history. Satan hath a fearful power; but he is not omnipotent, and those who are seeking to exert a moral influence, should diligently watch the moment when temptation is weakened, and evil least triumphant, to insinuate counsel, and warning, and reproof, and attach the strong holds of wickedness. God's spirit will be there to aid, to encourage, and give victory. The Christian teacher knows that there are intervals when he is peculiarly incited to and assisted in this work. When the promised intercessation seems to draw more solemnly and intimately near, and give unction and efficacy to his efforts. I doubt not the unwonted fervor he feels is an intimation from the spirit land that the emissaries of evil have relaxed their vigilance, and incursions upon their dark dominions may be successfully made. The parent may profit by the consideration of this truth in the education of his children. I have realized its force with mine. I have observed the waywardness and indisposition for instruction that you and your brother have occasionally evinced, and been discouraged in my office of preceptress. Again I have seen you eager and inquiring, quick to understand, sympathetic and impressible. Experience has taught me to sieze the propitious moment. Would that your mother had been thus watched and taught in her early years! She might not then have been the heartless girl I have presented her to your view, at the period to which I have brought my story. Yet none breathed a word against either the qualities of my mind or heart, and when about a year subsequent to my leaving school, I met Lieutenant Rainsworth for the first time: the admiration my appearance excited in his bosom gathered strength from the reports he heard of my character. I was introduced to him at a ball. He not only attracted my fancy by his brilliancy and wit, but the feeling which mingled even with his lighter sallies touched and interested me. I perceived the impression I had made was favorable, and sought to confirm it. He visited me, and was presented to my uncle. I watched the manifestations of his opinion—it was agreeable to my wishes. With what blended emotions of happiness, sadness and regret, do I look back upon the days and weeks that followed! Rainsworth was chivalrous and romantic even to excess. I would sometimes playfully combat his sentiments of love, friendship and self-devotion, and appeal to experience to convict him of his illusions. He always maintained that I looked at life in its artificial, not its natural aspect, and with the enthusiasm and originality that characterized all his words and actions, would paint a picture of domestic bliss, so bright and beautiful, that, worldly as I was, I wished it real.—I do not recollect that I purposely deceived him. I rather think that the desire to please rendered me more natural and amiable than I had hitherto been—perhaps, association with him had for the time thrown over me a superficial lustre which concealed from his penetration the true character of my heart. Rainsworth, however, was deceived. Yes, mortifying as the consciousness must be to one who so loved him, I am compelled to own that I should never have been his choice, had he seen me as I was. His imagination gifted me with attributes I did not possess, and he dreamed of a paradise on earth. How bitter was his awaking!

"After a suitable time spent in courtship, we were married, and the gaol of my ambition was attained. I will not waste your time, or dazzle your fancy with a detail of the magnificent preparations for my wedding. My very soul sickens when I remember that such frivolous and unsubstantial circumstances should have had power to excite such deep interest in my breast, at the most momentous era of my existence. But so it was. I personally superintended every arrangement, and nothing transpired to mar the taste, elegance and splendor of the scene. Yet, I recollect feeling slightly disappointed at my husband's unconcern relative to adjustments so important in my estimation. He would smile, indeed, at the beauty and tastefulness displayed, and glance admiringly at my bridal adornments, when I was attired for the parties given in compliment to my marriage; but there was an indifference and absence of interest in his manner. On one occasion, he marked my change of countenance when he had answered carelessly, though not impolitely, to an appeal to his judgment on some such trivial subject. He instantly altered his tone. His fine eyes lit up with an expression of anxiety, for every mutation of feeling lent its glow to his eloquent countenance, and he assured me that whatever I wore pleased him; that he considered my taste perfect, 'only a little too ornate, perhaps,' he added, smiling. 'You know I like simplicity. But your views are perfectly consistent with the magnificence that has always surrounded you. I do not blame you. I only wish my dearest Ellen to understand that I love her for her priceless self alone, independent of the glittering appendages which attract the homage of the vulgar only.'

"I felt my cheeks flush. I fancied he began to divine my thoughts more clearly, and thus reproved me for my fondness for display. But I was wrong. Rainsworth was wearied with the adoration which he saw paid to wealth and rank by those around me, but he regarded me as one 'among, but not of them.'—He thought me a petted child of fortune, endowed with intellectual and moral powers of the highest order, which I was wasting on objects that rather amused than interested me, with my fancy dazzled, but my heart unaffected by the flattery lavished on me, and the lustre of prosperity. He longed to snatch me from such a poisonous influence, and win me to a nobler destiny. He knew not that the pleasure costly dress and equipage imparted, was not the mere effect of habit and association, but had its source in deep-seated vanity, and systematic selfishness. He knew not, that instead of being nurtured from my cradle in the lap of luxury, my childhood had been haunted by images of coveted splendor, and embittered by cravings for unattained distinction—that my present affluence was built on the ruined fortunes of one who had awakened the gnawings of envy in my earliest years—and the gay and frivolous life I was leading, was the prompting of natural desire. Rainsworth had been religiously educated, and his principles and tastes were attuned to the true and good. But he was not an experimental Christian. He had not learned to pity the frailties himself had never felt. Lofty and elevated in his sentiments, he had no sympathy with the littleness of meaner minds, and unread in the corruption of the human heart, scorned without commiserating the guilty. During the many conversations we had held together before marriage, the name of my cousin had never escaped my lips. In the early period of our acquaintance, I was too much engrossed by other thoughts, to reflect upon the expediency of mentioning her; and after our engagement, I instinctively shrank from the communication. Sometimes, indeed, the truthfulness and integrity of my lover's character, startled me into the belief, that he might hereafter deem me reprehensible in not informing him of her existence, and our relative position, and the facts would tremble on my tongue. But some indefinite apprehension always prevented their utterance; and after I became his wife, that apprehension assumed a more palpable and determined character. I was well assured that the world and the world's law would not consider me culpable. I had been adopted voluntarily by my uncle, while yet a child. He had suspended his future protection on my obedience to his orders, and an attempt to reinstate Augusta in his favor would have been a direct infringement of them, and brought banishment to myself without benefiting her. I was conscious how much might be pleaded in justification of my silence, yet was there something terrible to my imagination in the idea of my husband's becoming accidentally aware of Augusta's history. To my uncle's inflexibility of temper, and resoluteness of purpose, he added a magnanimity of sentiment and abhorrence of duplicity, which made me tremble at the thought of his detecting in his wife any action partaking of dissimulation. Often have I started at the sound of his footstep, in the imagination that it was quicker than usual, and that he came to reproach me;—often have I feared to raise my eyes to his, lest I should meet an angry frown. The most remote reference to any topic that could introduce Augusta in general conversation, has sent the blood to my heart with a more rapid pulsation, and produced an agitation of feeling I could scarcely suppress. Yet, by some strange good fortune, several years went by without the discovery I so dreaded. My husband, at the solicitation of my uncle, left the army immediately after our marriage, and resided wholly at the Hall. He had evinced considerable reluctance to resign his profession, but my uncle manifested such unwillingness to part with me, and really respected and loved Mr. Rainsworth so much, that he finally yielded. He studied law, however, and was appointed to the State legislature two years after our union. I accompanied him to the seat of government, as also did my uncle. I managed to gratify my fondness for display, at the same time that I continued to retain the good opinion of my husband. He attributed the unusual excitement and dissipation in which we lived, to our position in society, and comforted himself with the anticipation of more quiet happiness when we returned to Derrington Hall. Yet I sometimes think that he had begun to awake to the illusion he indulged relative to my partiality to the vanities of the world before the third year of my marriage, for he often looked grave and sorrowful as his eyes followed me through some brilliant but heartless circle. He spent much time in the nursery with our little boy, and delighted to watch the development of his perceptions. Alas! that so brief a time was allotted for that pleasant task!

"My dear uncle died very suddenly when my son was about three years of age. I cannot bear to dwell on that awful event. The idea of his being called so abruptly, it may be, so unprepared, to the bar of God, harrows up my feelings, and has for many years been a burthen to my spirit. I grieved sincerely at the mournful bereavement, and oh! how I shuddered at the contemplation of the revelation the opening of the will would make! It came at last, that fearful moment, never to be blotted from the tablet of memory!

"My husband entered my chamber a few days after the funeral. He told me tenderly it was deemed necessary to read my uncle's will, and inquired if I wished to be present. I consented, for I dreaded to permit its perusal out of my sight. It was the identical instrument that had been written the memorable day that acquainted him with his daughter's elopement. He had often talked of writing another after my marriage, but my husband was too careless of wealth, too high-minded, to urge him to the performance of his purpose, and I never dared to allude to the subject. Thus it had been delayed. The present will left me sole heiress to his whole estate, with the exception of a few legacies. It was so framed, that the person whom I married could expend no part without my permission. His daughter was named only to be renounced and disinherited.—My husband slightly started when that paragraph met his ear, and glanced hurriedly at me. I was confused and alarmed, but measurably prepared for the explanation, so long had it been anticipated. Indeed, I rather wished it over. As he observed my countenance, he colored excessively, but made no remark. He walked across the room in silence, until the lawyer, who had written and perused the will, departed. Rainsworth then drew a chair beside me, and taking my trembling hand in his, fixed his eyes upon me.

"'Ellen, my love,' he said, 'why have I never before heard that Mr. Derrington had a daughter? Did you know her?'

"'Yes,' I replied, answering his last question first, 'I knew her when I was quite a child. She was several years older than myself.' I tried to speak steadily and without discomposure.

"'How long have you known yourself the heiress of his wealth? This will seems to have been written while his daughter still lived,' said my husband.

"A sense of relief came to my heart. I imagined that Rainsworth had been informed of Augusta's death, but the next moment I was sensible of my illusion, and conscious that he merely inferred her decease as a positive certainty, from the circumstances just unfolded.

"'I have known the fact a long time,' I said; 'my uncle was very stern and cold at the period he adopted me. He strictly prohibited the mention of his daughter before him. I never dared disobey him.'

"'But to me, Ellen—why did you not mention her to me?'

"'Oh! it was useless. My uncle might have been displeased.'

"There was a pause.

"'Has your cousin left any children?' he inquired. 'How long has she been dead?'

"'I really cannot tell, for I do not know. We held no intercourse after I left school. Previous to that, I wrote to her, but have received no communication for many years.'

"'She probably deemed you unjust, ungenerous, my dear Ellen. The afflicted are prone to suspicion. I suppose you wrote frequently, but in the relative situations you occupied it was difficult for her to feel your interest for her was genuine. I would that I had earlier known of her existence. I could have aided you in the discovery of her retreat, so as to have benefitted her children, if she had left any. When did you learn her death, Ellen?'

"I was silent a few moments, and then remarked: 'I never heard positively that she was dead—I only inferred it from her long silence. She always seemed fond of me.'

"'Oh! that you had acquainted me before with those particulars! For five years have I been quietly enjoying the possessions of another. But, thank God, it is not yet too late to make restitution. I shall immediately advertise the death of your respected uncle, and make every effort in my power to discover his rightful heirs. None shall ever have farther cause to say the son of Edward Rainsworth was enriched by dishonesty and injustice.'

"The energy and vehemence with which my husband uttered these words convinced me that he would carry out his purpose to its utmost limit. My son, my idolized son, reduced to obscure and ignoble poverty, and myself degraded from the pinnacle on which I had so long proudly stood, constituted a picture I was not disposed to contemplate. All the vanity, egotism, and ambition of my nature, claimed ascendancy. The test was now applied, and my husband might well revolt at the blackness which gathered over the imagined gold, at the hideousness of the character he had deemed so fair! I resented the imputation of dishonesty and injustice, as attached to our continued possession of the inheritance my uncle had bequeathed me. I combatted Mr. Rainsworth's intention of resigning it to others. I asserted my legal right to it, and finally declared that I did not recognize the interference of any person to deprive me of it, and was determined to maintain the power to which Mr. Derrington's will entitled me. I said I had no idea of beggaring my child and myself from a merely romantic notion of generosity, at which the wiser portion of the world would smile. I felt that the moment for decision had arrived, and I spoke calmly and resolutely. The changes in my husband's countenance told the varying and overpowering emotions that were at work in his bosom, crushing out light, hope, and happiness forever, and tearing away every fragment of the bright but shadowy illusion which faith and love had woven. As I paused, he attempted to speak, but his voice faltered. His child met his eyes at the moment, and alarmed by their expression, sprung towards him exclaiming—'Dear papa, what ails you?'

"Mr. Rainsworth raised him in his arms and clasped him to his breast.

"'Ellen,' he then said, in a mild, but deep tone, 'do you value most my love or your own wealth?'

"'I prefer riches to poverty,' I replied, 'and shall evince that I do.'

"He gazed into my face long and fixedly. Oh, what a world of disappointment, sadness, hopelessness, and gloom was pictured in the eyes which had never looked on mine before but in tenderness!

"'You do not speak as you feel—you only mock me,' he half inquired, half asserted.

"'I speak as I feel and think: why should you doubt me?'

"'Why should I doubt you?' he cried, passionately; 'do you ask me why I cling to the last frail remnant of vanished happiness? Do you ask me why I hesitated to tear away and throw from me the beautiful image I have enshrined in my heart of hearts? Do you ask me why I shrink back from an admission that would make me loath—detest you, and blot out forever from my mind the last flickering spark of faith in human virtue? No, Ellen, you do but jest. I cannot think you sincere.'

"Had I wished to retract, I felt it was now too late. I believe I was infatuated, but I thought the very violence and impetuosity of my husband's feelings would work their cure. I imagined when the tumult subsided, he would himself perceive that he had colored extravagantly, and the consciousness of exaggeration would incline him in a calmer moment to admit the probability of his own injustice to his wife. I therefore maintained my consistency.

"'Then, Ellen,' he said, in a resolute but low tone, 'there is no alternative. I cannot countenance dishonor. We must part.'

"My very soul grew sick within me as these words met my ear, but urged on by a selfish and imperious temper, I coldly replied—'Be it so.' That brief sentence sealed my doom. The chain of affection which had been drawn to its utmost capacity of extension, snapped asunder, and its broken fragments rebounded in upon my heart. There they have corroded through the lapse of dreary years, and will continue to corrode, until that sore and bleeding heart shall have its throbbings quieted by death. But weep not, my daughter, over this mournful recital. While you read it, the sod is resting on a tranquil and unaching bosom, and the spirit of your mother is beside the fount of life. 'Earth hath no sorrow that Heaven cannot heal.'

"I cannot dwell upon the scene which followed the brief words I have recorded above. It is enough to know my husband left me—left his child—left the hall—the neighborhood—the country,—nor have I ever been able in all my untiring, anxious, earnest efforts to ascertain his fate. Yet I cannot believe he destroyed himself. His principles and his feelings alike forbid such a suspicion. I rather suppose he fled the haunts of civilization, and in some far off solitude sought a refuge from future disappointment.

"A lingering and alarming illness succeeded his departure, and my life for a few weeks hung on a slender thread. The fever left me in a state of extreme nervous debility, during which I saw no company, and was reported to be insane. In that interval my daughter entered upon existence. No father welcomed the new candidate for immortality, and smiled upon her infant loveliness. Your mother's tears, through many a lonely night, as you slept upon her bosom, attested her sympathy for a loss you could not feel. As my health returned, my heart hardened, and I indulged emotions of anger and bitterness toward my husband, for his desertion. The world had no conception of the cause, and I was careful that the mystery should not be penetrated. I persuaded myself that justice as well as law approved my conduct, and tried to regard my husband's views as chimerical and absurd. But my efforts to be contented were vain. I mingled in society with a calm brow, but a perturbed and weary spirit. I was still courted by the world for my grace, wit, and wealth, but its adulation had lost its power, its gay scenes their charm. In a word, I was wretched. The distinctions I had won, palled upon my taste. I still valued riches, but rather from habit than desire. The rose-tints of life had faded. I turned coldly from its once coveted delights. The past was fraught with bitterness—the present was insipid—the future void of hope. If my husband should return, I felt we could no longer be happy. The spell was broken. He saw me as I was, and saw only to detest or pity. Either feeling I could not brook. If he forgave, he could not forget. The romance of love would be gone—and then, I had no wish to submit to his ideas of justice. I was as stubborn in my resolve to retain my uncle's wealth as when I first received it. Time sped on. Restlessness seeks relief in change. I sold Derrington Hall, and removed to New Hampshire. It was my husband's native State, and that knowledge drew me to it. His only surviving relative was an aged aunt. She was a Christian in deed and in truth. I know not how nor why, but I learned to love her. She had herself passed through deep afflictions, and was well read in the history of the human heart. I wondered at her quick understanding of mine, but was content that she should read it; and soon she so won upon my confidence, that its most secret windings were unfolded to her scrutiny. She neither started nor repulsed me, but taught me to examine it myself, and I did examine, until I shuddered at the sight, and detested the being I had so worshipped—self. But the more I loathed, the more she loved me, and gently, and judiciously, and sweetly did she instruct and guide me to the fountain which alone could wash away the foul pollution I so hated. And He who opened that fountain for the moral cleansing of a degenerate world, received me. His spirit and His grace have re-modelled and transformed his rebellious creature, and made me what I am, still faulty in deed, and weak, but ransomed from the power of the evil passion which held such fatal sway over my early life. My kind and generous preceptress has long since passed to her eternal reward, but ere she departed, she witnessed the execution of a legal instrument, reinstating Augusta Montresor and her heirs in the possession of their alienated patrimony, whenever they shall come to claim it. My most persevering inquiries hitherto, however, have failed to win any information of my poor cousin, except the bare report that she accompanied her husband to England, about the time that she must have received my last letter. After the death of my friend, I removed to ——, and here have I since resided. My beloved instructress bequeathed me at her death the sum of ten thousand dollars. With part of this money I purchased the house in which I now reside, and by economy and resolution have managed to preserve the property of my uncle entire, since I first felt that I was not justly entitled to it. Since my residence in this place, I have also allowed the interest to accumulate, which, with the previous principal, is secured to my cousin and her descendants, should they ever appear to claim it. In the mean time, I hold it in trust. The lawyer who wrote my uncle's will, is still my solicitor and friend, although he disagrees with me relative to the claims of Augusta, and thinks my children may hereafter dispute my right to set their's aside. But of this I entertained no apprehension. Early education has, I hope, instilled their father's noble sentiments too firmly in their breasts to allow mere legal pretensions to influence them. And now, my daughter, my history is unfolded to you. Soften its details to your brother, and do not let him, with his father's stern and unbending rectitude, forget to exercise mercy in his judgment of his penitent, though erring mother."

The manuscript terminated here, but there was below a mournful sequel, almost illegibly traced, dated the fatal day of the duel between Derrington Rainsworth and the prisoner Lucy had released. With absorbing interest our heroine perused it. It ran thus:

"The cup of gall my lips so long have quaffed, has received the 'drop too much.' The bitter potion is exhausted, and the poison works. I feel that I should die, yet I bow in humble submission to the just chastisement of a righteous God, acknowledging that my own hand mingled the draught—my own trangressions wrought out the punishment. Listen, my daughter, and let your mother's fate be a heeded warning, through your future life. Your brother has fallen by the hand of Augusta Montresor's son. His middle name of Derrington, added to my reputation of affluence, induced the supposition of young Montresor, that we were the persons with whom he has no doubt been taught to link the idea of fraud, meanness and injustice. On being introduced to my son, he contemptuously refused to acknowledge him as worthy of his acquaintance. An explanation was demanded, and given with such insinuations against his unhappy mother, that your brother struck the speaker. The duel followed. From my beloved son, the innocent victim of his miserable mother's sins, have I learned these facts. Truly is the Scripture verified, 'the wicked is snared in the work of his own hands.'"

The story was concluded, and Lucy Rainsworth buried her face in her handkerchief, and wept long and passionately. No marvel that the jailor found her in the morning in a high state of delirium. With the aid of Lucy's attendant, who was early at the prison door, he conveyed her home unsuspected. The report of her illness was soon circulated, and after her recovery she gladly quitted the scenes of her sorrows with the lady whom we introduced to the reader at "The Village Funeral." If his patience is not exhausted by the sad details of "The Mother's Legacy," we hope he will pursue the fortunes of the more innocent daughter, which will be given in a subsequent paper, under the title of the "Black Cloud."

RICH ANNUALS.

[From "The Gift" (Carey & Hart) for 1843.]

A GLEAM OF SUNSHINE.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

This is the place. Stand still, my steed,
Let me review the scene,
And summon from the shadowy past
The forms that once have been.

The past and present re-unite,
Beneath Time's flowing tide,
Like footprints hidden by a brook,
But seen on either side.

Here runs the highway to the town,
There the green lane descends,
Through which I walked to church with thee,
Oh! gentlest of my friends!

The shadow of the linden trees,
Lay moving on the grass;
Between them and the moving boughs,
A shadow, thou didst pass.

Thy dress was like the lilies,
And thy heart as pure as they;
One of God's holy angels
Did walk with me that day.

I saw the branches of the trees
Bend down thy touch to meet,
The clover blossoms in the grass
Rise up to kiss thy feet.

"Sleep, sleep to-day, tormenting cares,
Of earth and folly born!"
Solemnly sang the village choir
On that sweet Sabbath morn.

Through the closed blinds, the golden sun
Poured in a dusty beam,
Like the celestial ladder
Of the ancient patriarch's dream.

And ever and anon, the wind
Sweet scented with the hay,
Turned o'er the hymn-book's fluttering leaves,
That on the window lay.

Long was the good man's sermon,
But it seemed not so to me,
For he spake of Ruth, the beautiful,
And still I thought of thee.

Long was the prayer he uttered,
But it seemed not so to me,
For in my heart I prayed with him,
But still I thought of thee.

But now, alas, the place seems changed;
Thou art no longer here;
Part of the sunshine of the scene
With thee did disappear.

Though thoughts, deep-rooted in my heart,
Like pine trees dark and high,
Subdue the light of noon, and breathe
A low and ceaseless sigh;

This memory brightens o'er the past,
As when the sun, concealed
Behind some cloud that near us hangs,
Shines on a distant field.

[From "The Child's Delight" (G. S. Appleton) for 1845.]

THE MOTHER'S PET.

How happily the little child
Enjoys the summer air;
How cheerily, with accents mild,
She greets her cousin fair!

How sweet to see the mother fair
Bend o'er that cherub form,
And mingle, with a parent's care,
Words of affection warm!

Right merrily the little ones
Will sport this sunny morn;
But mother's eye, where Clara runs,
Still anxiously is borne.

Should Clara fall, mother will fly,
To raise her from the floor.
When Clara cries, mother's dark eye
Beams with delight no more.

So, o'er my path through this vain world,
May guardian hosts keep ward;
And, when life's fleeting flag is furled,
My flight to Heaven guard.

MY WASHERWOMAN.

[FROM THE ELWOOD PAPERS.

Nancy, my old colored washerwoman, whom I had paid regularly every week for her day's work at the washing tub, during the past six years, presented herself at the door of my room one day last week, as has always been her custom, to notify me that her part of the contract had been filled, and that it was now time for me to fulfil my portion of it. It so happened that, for the first time, I had not the accustomed half dollar ready for her. I had three or four silver dollars in change, but I only owed her half a dollar, and so could not make it out.

"I havn't a single half dollar in change, Nancy," I said, looking up into the old woman's face. But no matter, it will do as well next Monday, when you come again."

For a moment Nancy hesitated, and I could see that she was disappointed. Then she turned and walked slowly away, without saying a word. I did not like this. Punctually, for six years, had I paid her at the close of every washing day; and now, it happening that I could not make the change, she was not pleased. Thus I thought, and permitted such thoughts to linger in my mind, until I grew quite angry in my feelings towards old Nancy. I called her greedy—and permitted myself to imagine that she was afraid I would not pay her. The more I thought about it, the more my mind became disturbed, and the more unkind things did I permit myself to harbor against her.

In the evening, when my husband came in, he noticed, in a moment, that my mind was not in a placid state.

"Has any thing happened to disturb you, Mary?" he asked, in his usually kind way.

"Yes, there has," I returned, in a petulent tone, "and I feel vexed, in spite of myself."

"Pray, what has occurred, Mary, thus to disturb your usually quiet mind?"

"Oh, nothing to trouble you," I replied, seeing that my husband looked uneasy. "I am a little foolish, no doubt; but, then, I can't help it. I happened not to have half a dollar in change, to-day, when Nancy finished her washing. It is the first time it has happened for six years—and so I told her that I would hand it to her on next Monday, when she came. But the old thing" (I never called her that before) "hesitated, and didn't seem willing to go without her money. It vexed me downright—just as if I would cheat her out of it!"

I must confess, that when I came to relate the matter to my husband, I felt a little ashamed about it. It sounded rather foolish even to my ears.

"Did you get the half dollar for her?" he asked, as soon as I had closed my brief relation.

"No, I did not. I wasn't going to humor her in that way."

"I'm afraid my good wife is in the wrong this time," my husband said, with his usual honest frankness. "Nancy had earned her money, and was entitled to it."

"I know that well enough," I returned. "But, then, the mere trifle of half a dollar was not a matter of so much consequence as to make her afraid to let it lie in my hands for one week. She never had to wait an hour in her life, before, for what I owed her."

"Why should you think it involved a doubt of your honesty, Mary?" responded my husband. "Can you not imagine some other reason?"

"What other reason could there be?" I asked.

"Want of the money, was, no doubt, the true reason. A washerwoman earns so little, that she can never have much ahead at any time. A half dollar a day, for three or four days in the week, does not make up a very large income, and will rarely permit the person who earns it to lay by much. No doubt, poor old Nancy is at this moment suffering privation of some kind, in consequence of not having received her hard day's earnings."

"O no, husband, I have no idea of that," I replied, in a changed tone. Nancy lives very comfortably, I believe. She doesn't want for any thing."

"Do not be so certain of that. Her wants may be small, but her means of support are small likewise. Depend upon it, her exhibition of disappointment to-day, arose from a deeper source than a mere desire to get her money that she might possess it, and lay it by."

I did not reply to this, because it set me to thinking—and my thoughts troubled me. While I permitted myself to be displeased with Nancy, I could indulge in an accusing spirit against her: but now, a feeling of kindness had been awakened by my husband's remarks, and this gained strength every moment, until my heart was pained at the thought that the poor creature might actually be suffering because I had neglected to have the small pittance she had earned by a hard day's labor, ready for her when her work was done.

"I am sorry I did not give her a dollar, and thus pay her in advance for next week, instead of making her wait a week for what she had earned," I said, half aloud.

"That would have been better, Mary," my husband replied. "But it is not too late, yet, to repair your error. Do you know where she lives?"

"The cook does, I believe."

"Then call her up, and send her with the half dollar to Nancy."

"I will, after tea," I answered.

"O no. Send her before tea. Let us wait. Perhaps the poor old creature has a use for that single half dollar, of which we dream not."

The cook was called up, but she said that Nancy lived in Lombard street, near Fifth, which was a long distance from our house.

"Never mind," said my husband; "I will walk down that way after tea."

"O no. I wouldn't do that," I said.

"I would rather," was his quiet, firm reply.—Whenever he spoke in the peculiar tone in which he uttered his last remark, I never objected further; and so I remained silent.

After tea, he put on his hat and walked out. He did not return for an hour. When he came in he looked serious.

"Did you find her, dear?" I asked.

"Yes," he replied.

"And did she really stand in need of the money?"

"Listen, and you shall learn," he replied. "You remember old Nancy had a daughter who was married a few years ago. Well, I found that the old woman lived in a room up stairs in Lombard street, and that this daughter was with her, quite sick. Her husband had treated her badly, and had gone off to New Orleans, some weeks ago. When I entered old Nancy's poorly furnished room, she arose quickly to her feet, and looked very much surprised to see me.

"'Mrs. Elwood,' I said to her, in as kind a voice as I could assume, 'is sorry that she hadn't the change to give you to-day for your washing. She has thought, since you went away, that perhaps you might want it, and as I thought so too, I have stepped in to give it to you.'

"The poor old creature seemed touched at this.—Her voice choked as she attempted to utter her thanks, and then she held down her head, and seemed a good deal moved.

"'Is this your daughter?' I asked, wishing to relieve her from the embarrassment she seemed to feel.

"She said that it was. That she had been sick for some weeks. That her husband had gone off and left her, and all the burden of her care and support in sickness had fallen upon her. I continued to question her, and get her free and artless answers, until I learned that since Saturday they had had but little food, and that she had not been able to buy the medicine ordered by the doctor for her daughter.

"'Mrs. Elwood has always paid me as soon as my washing is done,' she went on, 'and so I told Jane that she must bear every thing as well as she could, until I came home this evening, when I would get her some medicine, and cook something nice for her to eat. I worked harder than usual, thinking all the time of my poor sick child. At last I finished, and went up, as I always do, to get my money. But Mrs. Elwood hadn't any change! I can't tell you how bad I felt as I went home. I hated to come into my room and see Jane. When I did get home, my poor child looked at me with a look that made my heart ache. She had waited, I could see, patiently all day, alone in her sick bed, and now her wants were to be satisfied. But I had to disappoint her. She tried not to show how bad she felt when I told her that Mrs. Elwood had not paid me, but the tears ran down her face.'

"I could hear no more. 'Here is your money, Nancy, and as much more into the bargain to make up for your disappointment,' I said, handing her a dollar. I would have given her more, had I yielded to my feelings. But I knew that sum would meet all their immediate wants. I then broke away from the grateful creature, as well as I could, assuring her that while her daughter lay sick she should have three quarters a day for washing at our house—the pay never to fail."

The narrative of my husband rebuked and humbled me. I both saw and felt that I had acted wrong in not thinking beforehand, and providing the change for my washerwoman—and still more wrongly in suffering my mind to blame her for appearing to feel disappointed, when she had so much cause to be really distressed at not receiving her hard-earned wages.

"I will be more considerate in future," I said to my husband, after I had sat silent for some time, drying my eyes as I spoke.

"I am sure you will, Mary," he replied. "Of the poor people who work for us, we never can be too thoughtful. It is but little that they can earn at best, and that little should always be promptly paid; for it is never earned before it is needed."

MARY ELWOOD.

LOVE STRONG IN DEATH.

BY EBENEZER ELLIOTT.

The brother of two sisters
Drew painfully his breath;
A strange fear had come o'er him,
For love was strong in death.
The fire of fatal fever
Burn'd darkly on his cheek;
And often to his mother
He spoke, or tried to speak.

He said—"The quiet moonlight,
Beneath the shadow'd hill,
Seem'd dreaming of good angels,
While all the woods were still;
I felt as if from slumber
I never could awake—
Oh! mother, give me something
To cherish for your sake!

A cold, dead weight is on me,
A heavy weight like lead,
My hands and feet seem sinking,
Quite through my little bed;
I am so tired, so weary—
With weariness I ache;
Oh! mother, give me something
To cherish for your sake!

Some little token give me,
Which I may kiss in sleep,
To make me feel I'm near you,
And bless you though I weep.
My sisters say I'm better—
But, then, their heads they shake,
Oh! mother, give me something
To cherish for your sake!

Why can't I see the poplars?
Why can't I see the hill,
Where dreaming of good angels
The moon-beams lay so still?
Why can't I see you, mother?
I surely am awake;
Oh! haste to give me something
To cherish for your sake!"

The little bosom heaves not;
The fire had left its cheek;
The fine chord—is it broken!
The strong chord—could it break!
Ah, yes! the loving spirit
Hath winged its flight away;
A mother and two sisters
Look down on lifeless clay.

The Pretty Haymaker;

Or, Charlie White's Second Love.

Here too dwells simple truth; plain innocence;
Unsullied beauty; sound unbroken youth,
Patient of labour, with a little pleas'd;
Health ever blooming; unambitious toil;
Calm contemplation; and poetic ease.

[THOMSON'S SEASONS.

Charlie White was a prince among men. A chef d'œuvre of nature—who, doubtlessly, intended him to heir some magnificent and titled estate in merrie England, but, in a fit of vexation, (perchance that the old Earl, his "ci-devant" father, obstinately refused to shuffle off his mortal coil to make way for the new comer:) dropped him in our homespun republic, y'cleped alas! for romance, Charles White. The wee Charlie, by virtue of good nursing, paregoric, and anniseed, soon changed to a sturdy urchin, who stumped about all unwitting of the honors he so narrowly escaped.

As there is nothing worth recording during the minority of our hero—unless indeed we may mention his taking three rather sudden and involuntary cold baths in the cistern during as many successive years—also a singular and brilliant experiment in Pyrotechnics, in memory of which he bore ever after sundry warning cicatrices; yet as these are nothing more than accidents, to which flesh, and particularly children's flesh, is heir, we will pass lightly over them, and the succeeding years to his twenty-sixth birthday. At this time he was as the girls say "such a love of a man," his eyes so "deeply, darkly blue"—his brow so broad and white, and the bright locks turned above it so precisely the right shade of brown. His finely cut, though somewhat haughtily curved lips, disclosed the handsomest teeth in the world, his whiskers were faultless, and his "six feet and upward" the envy of half the beaux. On his inner man we will not enlarge, merely premising that he was called a "pretty good fellow," also that he had a most intense and aristocratic horror of all plebeian employment. How far the fact of his possessing at the same time a sufficient quantum of the "filthy lucre," and a pair of very white hands, (which "en verite" it would have been a thousand pities to have spoiled)—how far, we say, the fact of these possessions might have gone in confirming his intuitive repugnance to "man's curse" we know not, but certain it is he slid along through the world right easily. It was passing strange, and so said all the pretty girls of our hero's acquaintance, that his twenty-sixth birth-day found him still hugging his single blessedness. There were, however, whispers that Cupid had, in times of yore, sadly wounded his heart, through the violet eyes of a merry damsel, who, after leading him a pretty dance through all the perils of love, in lieu of finally surrendering at discretion and falling quietly into his wake to follow on cozily over life's sea—suddenly shot off with flying colors, under another pilot, leaving him to rig his shattered bark, and sink or swim, as best he might.

Since that perilous day, Charlie had gone on breaking hearts with the utmost industry, gaining in process of time quite a reputation as lady-killer, without being once unpleasantly reminded that he possessed some fragments of a heart. The girls, who at first had spread their silken nets most assiduously, and in consideration of the value of the prize thrown rather more honey than usual into their smiles, now saw with dismay all their "loves labor lost," and after numerous repulses raised the siege "en masse," and stacking their arms unanimously, declared the fortress impregnable.

Our hero, in the mean time, little recking the result of this "council de guerre," quietly wended his way to foreign parts, still engaged in treasonable practices against the fairer half of creation. But his cup was nearly filled—the hour of retribution was at hand.

Receiving one day an invitation to a "petit dinner," he found himself at the conclusion of his toilette rather late, and determined to shorten the distance by a cross route to the house of his friend.

Sallying forth, therefore, he bounded over a low fence with an energy that somewhat discomposed the nice arjustment of his hyacinthine locks, and, with half-uttered malediction upon the heat of the day and his own tardiness, proceeded with hasty steps over a meadow, richly dotted with mounds of freshly mown hay. Diverging a little from his path, he entered a grove to obtain a momentary shelter from the sun—Crushing beneath his feet a dewy cluster of the richly motted wood-lily and pressing aside the fragrant foliage, he wound his way along till gaining a more open spot, with the next step he half stumbled over.

"Ye powers, a woman, and moreover fast asleep"—as he half uttered. And a more fitting nook could not have been selected for a noontide siesta, closely sheltered as it was, save an opening on the shady side, where the breezes crept in to die sighing away 'mid the odorous foliage. A dry and mossy bank supplied a fitting couch, and there reclined the sleeper who had so nearly destroyed our hero's equilibrium. Her slight though rounded figure was clad in a dress of some course, dark material, certainly not the last Paris mode, and from beneath the scanty and somewhat brief skirt peeped forth a foot and ankle of the most perfect symmetry, but alas! for the elegant Charlie, guiltless alike of shoe and stocking. One little hand had sunk by her side with the soft, pink palm unturned and the taper and relaxed fingers grasping a tiny harebell. Its fellow was hid amid the mass of curls half crushed beneath her face. On the other side of the finely turned head the silky clusters were flung boldly back from the broad, smooth brow, and swept out over the green moss, crushing down a cluster of wild daizies, whose tiny blossoms peeped out here and there, amid the raven shadows trembling in the breeze, that wafted their soft perfumes over the still face of the sleeper. It might have been that a sweet thought was stirring at her heart, for just now the hue of her cheek grew bright as the pink of an ocean shell, and her rose-bud lips half parted with the smile that swept like a sunbeam over her face.

But we have left our hero standing with mouth and eyes equally extended, wondering very much if such flowers were indigenous to all the groves in that region of country—wondering what the creature was thinking of, precisely at that moment; and wondering (the villain) if it would be possible to snatch a kiss from those sweetest of lips, and escape with impunity. I know not how long he might have wondered, had not a saucy Zephyr lifted his hat at this moment, and "sans ceremonie," bore it away.

Making a step forward to recover it, he tripped against a projecting root, and came in no very gentle manner on his knees beside the sleeper. The shock was effectual; the jetty lashes that had rested so lightly on either cheek were lifted suddenly. With a cry of alarm the girl sprang up, but as her feet pressed the cool grass, she turned to see the eyes of the stranger fixed upon them, and sinking again to the ground she concealed them under her, while a pink flush stole over her face, and her eyes filled with tears of vexation.

Our friend all this while was fully engaged in framing and uttering a thousand apologies, to all of which she listened in half-pouting silence, till her eyes glanced from his vexed face to a large dark stain on either knee, acquired by their ungentle salutations of Mother Earth. Forgetting all else, she burst into a peal of merry laughter, waking the echoes with notes so silvery that her pleading companion at last caught the infection, and joined her right heartily. Half an hour afterward the two sat side by side in the little nook, apparently the best friends in the world. He was made to understand that she had come out to make hay in her father's field, and that she had selected their shady retreat for a 'salle a manger,' wherein to partake of her simple refreshments; and he in his turn explained his intrusion, and accepted with right good will a part of her dinner in place of that he had lost through her means. We will not relate how he praised the cream pie of her own making, or how they drank spring water from the same tin cup, or any of the other interesting minutiæ of their tete-a-tete.—Suffice it to say, from this time our friend Charlie eschewed most religiously all dinner parties, and other merry-makings, and was seized with quite a mania for rural researches.

* * * * *

It was on a July afternoon, a full fortnight from the event just recorded, that Charlie and the country girl sat once more side by side in the little grove.—The merry girl was twining a garland, and laughing as gaily as ever, but the fiery eyes of her companion had a troubled light, and his voice an earnest tone, that betokened change.

"Come, let us go—my garland is finished—and see, the sun is sinking;" and, rising, the girl scattered with a sudden toss the dewy flowers, that half filled her apron, all over the head of her silent companion; then lifting her bonnet from the ground, she stepped out into the golden light; and, with a mocking courtesy, turned to go.

"Come back, Hetty—stay one moment—I have something to say;" and as she seated herself again half impatiently beside him, he relapsed again into silence.

"Well, speak if you have any thing to say. I must hasten home, for I expect Henry."

"And who is Henry? But no matter!—I will speak. Many years ago, Hetty, I loved a fair young girl—loved her deeply, devotedly. I wooed and won her. A few short days, and she would have become my own; but, ere they passed away, she left me for another. At that time I vowed I would never love again. I thought I never could. I thought that the bright hopes so utterly crushed could never wake again. But you have undeceived me, Hetty; and now can you return my love? for I do love you, Hetty—better, far better——"

"Hark! hark! did you not hear that?" And the girl tossed back the dark hair from her brow, and bent eagerly forward.

"Hetty! Hetty"—and again her name echoed through the grove at the loudest pitch of a manly voice—"Hetty, where are you?" And the next instant a young man burst into the circle with his fine face all in a glow, and his arms eagerly extended.—With a half scream, Hetty threw herself on his bosom, covering him with kisses, and sobbing as if her heart would break from very joy.

"And who is this?" said our discomfited hero, whose anger, on account of the interruption, was in no wise lessened by the conduct of his inamorata.

"This—why don't you know—this is Henry!"

"And who, in the name of King Solomon, is Henry?" And Charlie waxed more wroth as he detected something like a smile on the face of the young man.

"Why, Henry is—he is—why, did'nt you know it?"—and the little coquette crimsoned down to her very shoulders—"Is it possible you never heard it?—Henry—IS MY HUSBAND!"

The Child's Way to Heaven.

"O! I am weary of earth," said the child,
As it gazed with tearful eye
On the snow-white dove that it held in its hand,
"For whatever I love will die."

So the child came out of its little bower,
It came and looked abroad,
And it said, "I am going this very hour—
I am going to heaven and God."

There was shining light where the sun had set,
And red and purple too;
And it seemed as if earth and heaven met
All around the distant blue.

And the child looked out on the far, far west,
And it saw a golden door,
Where the evening sun had gone to its rest
But a little while before.

There was one bright streak on the cloud's dark face,
As if it had been riven;
Said the child, "I will go to that very place,
For it must be the gate of heaven."

So away it went to follow the sun,
But the heavens would not stay,
For always the faster it tried to run
They seemed to go further away.

Then the evening shades fell heavily,
With night-dews cold and damp,
And each little star on the dark blue sky
Lit up its silvery lamp.

A light wind wafted the fleecy clouds,
And it seemed to the child that they
Were hurrying on to the west, while the stars
Were going the other way.

And the child called out when it saw them stray,
By the evening breezes driven,
"Little stars, you are wandering out of the way,
That is not the way to Heaven."

Then on it went through the rough waste lands
Where the tangled briers meet,
Till the prickles scratched its dimpled hands,
And wounded its little feet.

It could not see before it well,
And its limbs grew stiff and cold,
And at last it cried, for it could not tell
Its way on the open wold.

So the child knelt down on the damp green sod,
While it said its evening prayer,
And it fell asleep as it thought of God,
Who was listening to it there.

A long, long sleep—for they found it there,
When the sun went down next day;
And it looked like an angel, pale and fair,
But its cheek was cold as clay.

The sunbeams glanced on the drops of dew,
That lay on its ringlets bright,
Sparkling in every brilliant hue,
Like a coronet of light.

HUSBANDS AND WIVES--A SONG

BY BULWER.

Ah, let us love while yet we may;
Our summer is decaying—
And wo to hearts which in their gray
December, go a-Maying.

Ah, let us love, while of the fire
Time hath not yet bereft us;
With tears our warmer thoughts expire
Till only ice is left us!

We'll fly the bleak world's bitter air—
A brighter home shall win us;
And if our hearts grow weary there,
We'll find a world within us.

They preach that passion fades each hour,
That naught will pall the pleasure:
My bee, if love's so frail a flower,
O, haste to hive its treasure!

Wait not the hour, when all the mind
Shall to the crowd be given;
For links which to the million bind,
Shall from the one be riven.

But let us love while yet we may,
Our summer is decaying;
And wo to hearts which in their gray
December, go a-Maying.

MARRYING AN HEIRESS.

BY J. B. FOSTER.

"Good morning, Henry," said Richard Brown, as he entered the office of the former; "you are just the man I wanted to see."

"Well, sir, what is your business—anything in my line?"

"No, no; put up your old musty law books, I want none of them now."

"Well, then, what is your business?"

"Why, you see—but by the way, you will keep secret what I disclose?"

"Of course—if you wish it."

"Well, I do wish it—for the present, at least, and I will confide in you, for I need a little of your assistance."

"Well, go on; and let us hear your story," said Henry, impatiently.

Richard (or, as he was generally called, Dick,) then hemmed two or three times, and commenced with—

"You have seen Clara Harvey?"

"Yes: but why do you ask that question?"

"Because it's of her I have to speak."

"Why, what have you to do with her?" asked Henry, quickly.

"What have I to do with her? considerable you will find; but are you interested in any way concerning her?"

"No, no," said Henry, "go on with your story."

"Well, you see I have been for some time paying her particular attention, and now I have come to you to gain your assistance."

"Well, how do you get along with her?" asked Henry, while he restrained his feelings, which prompted him to kick Dick out of his office. He, however, was determined to hear what he had to say about Clara, without interrupting him. He therefore calmly listened to Dick's answer to his question.

"Why," said Dick, "I get along with her much better than I shall with her father, I fear."

"Why—don't the old man like you?"

"Bless your soul, no; not in the least."

"What is the reason?"

"Oh! I can't tell—I have never seen him: that is, to have any acquaintance; and Clara says he calls me a dandy, and a fop, and all these hard names. But I don't care for that."

"Why, if you have never seen Mr. Harvey, how did you become acquainted with Clara? You said you were paying your address to her."

"So I am—but no thanks to the old man."

"Well, how did you first form an acquaintance with her—that's the question."

"That is what I am about to tell you. You see, when I first came here to teach this school, I heard considerable about Mr. Harvey and his beautiful daughter. Well, you see I thought that, if possible, I would gain her affections; and she being an only daughter, and the old man rich, I surmised that if I could succeed with her, it would make me a good home, and at some future day, I shall stand a fair chance of coming in for a good portion of the old man's property. But how to get an introduction was the next question. However, I"——

"But," interrupted Henry, "why not get some of the neighbors to introduce you?"

"Oh! I had rather not—and they were pretty shy about introducing a stranger. So you see I had to depend upon myself. But, as good luck would have it, one evening as I was passing by her father's house, I chanced to meet her. I of course bowed very politely, and she returned the compliment. I

...an him—"I presume I have the honor of addressing Miss Harvey?" To this she nodded assent; and we were soon engaged in conversation."

"Well, what kind of a girl is she—pretty?"

"Why, Henry, I can't say that she is as pretty as I had expected to find her. But you known these country girls look rather coarse at first sight. But if I can make my plans work, the old man's money will make up for any little deficiency that may appear in personal beauty, you know."

"Yes, I suppose so; but go on and tell me what your plans are, as regards Clara."

"Well, I found that the old man and his wife were away from home. So I passed a very agreeable evening with Clara. The next evening I was there, and for two or three succeeding ones; until the old folks came home. Then, you see, we had to meet in private?"

"Why meet privately?" asked Henry.

"Because Clara said that her father would not allow her to keep company with any one, and much less with me. So we have met privately since that time, and my plans are fast progressing."

"But," said Henry, "what benefit is it going to be to you to marry her, if her father is opposed? You will only have a wife to support beside yourself, and will not be bettering your condition."

"Oh! there's no danger but what the old man will come round right when we are married."

"Don't be too sure of that, Dick—you had better look before you leap."

"Pooh! I am not afraid of that. He may be angry at first, but he will soon get over it—when he finds out there is no help for him."

"Well, you know best. But when are you to be married? You say your plans are now nearly consummated."

"Yes, they are. She has already consented to an elopement, and as soon as I can make the necessary arrangements, we shall be off."

"Where will you go?"

"To New York, I think, at first. And there we will have the ceremony performed; and then I shall write a dutiful letter to the old man, telling him of the course we have taken, and asking for his forgiveness."

"But what if he will not grant it?"

"Oh! there's no danger. As I said before, he may be angry for a short time—but if he is, I shall visit around among my friends until he gets over his pet and invites us home."

"Well, Dick, I must say you have your plans well laid. But what is it you want with me?"

"Why I want you to assist us in getting off—you know there's a hundred things to be attended to at such a time. And I thought that I could depend upon you for assistance."

"Well, I'll render you all the aid I can," said Henry. And they then separated—Dick to attend to his school, and Henry took his way direct to the residence of Mr. Harvey.

Dick, or Richard Brown, was a young man of prepossessing appearance; being (what is generally termed) well built, of a clear complexion, and having a profusion of light auburn hair, which fell in ringlets over a forehead of ivory smoothness. He was also a person of good education—having gone through with a collegiate course of studies. But this was all that could possibly be said in his favor; for he was unprincipled in the extreme. His father had left him a comfortable fortune at his decease, which Dick thought was sufficient for any mode of living he should think fit to adopt. He associated with companions as unprincipled as himself, and in a few years his property was squandered, and he forced to take up the occupation of school teaching to gain a subsistence for himself.

He had, a short time before our tale commences, been employed to teach the school in the village where Mr. Harvey resided. And (as I have said,) being unprincipled, and void of all feelings of manhood, he had formed the plan of seducing from home, and eloping with Clara Harvey.

He had contracted a slight acquaintance with Henry Stanton, who resided in the village, and believing that he could easily be prevailed on to assist him in his plans for self-aggrandisement, he had, as the reader has already seen, applied to him for aid in his undertaking.

But he was mistaken in his opinion of Henry, for he was a young man of sterling qualities, and, what was of far more importance, he was the accepted lover of Clara Harvey. Judge then of his surprise when Dick detailed to him his views in regard to the very woman to whom he was paying his addresses, and whom he intended to make his wife. He could not believe that Clara would have any thing to do or say with such a fellow as Dick Brown. But there was something in the story which he could not comprehend. Therefore he had immediately, upon the departure of Dick, gone to see Clara, and learn from her, if possible, the truth of his story respecting her.

When he entered the house he was met by Clara, who was as beautiful even as report had stated, with a smile of welcome. As soon as he was seated, he said:—

"Well, Clara, I have just heard that you are about to be married."

"To be married! Why, Henry, I am surprised. To whom did you hear?"

"To our Schoolmaster."

"What! To Richard Brown?"

"Yes."

"Who informed you?"

"Dick himself."

"Why, Henry, what does it mean? Do tell me all about it, for I am anxious to hear."

"I will," said Henry, "tell you all that I know concerning it."

He then related to her his conversation with Dick. Clara listened with no less surprise than Henry had done while conversing with Dick; and after he had finished, she said:

"What can that fellow mean by this story?"

"I know not," answered Henry, "and hoped that you would be able to throw some light upon the subject."

"Well, do not look so serious. You cannot think that I have really consented to elope with him, for I have never spoken with him, and in fact know him but by repute."

"No, Clara, I do not think any such thing; but what has caused Dick to tell me such a tale?"

"I am sure I cannot say; perhaps," said she, blushing, "he has heard of your visits here, and wished to learn something of your intentions, or make you uneasy, or"——

"No, no, Clara; that could have not been his intention, for he appeared to be in earnest in what he said."

"Well, I know not. Oh, yes! I guess I know now," she exclaimed; "how he is deceived!"

"How? Tell me how you think it is."

"Well, he said that father was gone from home when he first met me?"

"Yes he did."

"Well, I recollect the time. We had all gone to the city on a visit, and our servant girl, Betty, was left at home. She is a very good looking girl, and I have of late noticed that she was making alterations in her dresses, and buying new ones. He must have mistaken her for me; and she, seeing his mistake, has kept him in ignorance of her real name and situation. This must be the way that he is deceived, and he will marry, instead of me, our Betty."

"That must be how it is situated," exclaimed Henry; "and as I promised him, I will render all the assistance I can to help him in consummating his choice."

"Oh, no, Henry, do not let him marry her."

"Yes I shall—for she is good enough for the unprincipled scoundrel."

"But how will he feel when he discovers his error?"

"I care not. All that he cares about her or you, is the money which he expected to get by the marriage. And it will be serving him just right; therefore, Clara, say nothing about the circumstance to any one, and I will, when he is ready, assist him, if he calls upon me."

"Well, Henry, do as you think best; but I feel as if it was going too far, thus to trifle with his feelings."

"His feelings! Clara, he has none; and besides, it will be a measure of his own planning, and no one to blame but himself."

"Well, as I said before, do as you think best; for I cannot have much sympathy for him, after this display of his egotism."

Thus they came to the conclusion to leave him in his error, and let him pursue his own plans to their final consummation, without any of their aid or assistance.

Time flew rapidly away for a few weeks, and Dick was one morning missing, and with him Mr. Harvey's servant girl, Betty. They went immediately to the city of New York, where the marriage ceremony was performed, and then Dick thought his happiness was almost complete, for it only remained to write to Mr. Harvey and receive his pardon, which he doubted not would be readily granted. His wife tried, with all the persuasiveness she was master of, to induce him not to write to her reputed father, but without avail. For he believed that she was only fearful of her father's anger, and of this he thought there was little or no danger. He therefore wrote and despatched the following letter to Mr. Harvey:

NEW YORK, Sept. 18, 18—.

Respected Father.

Well knowing that you must be anxious for the welfare of your daughter, I have taken the liberty of addressing these few lines to you, informing you of her marriage with myself. And although the ceremony was performed in a private manner, without your knowledge or consent, still we fondly hope that you will overlook this one rash act, and extend to us your full pardon for the course we have taken. I feel it a duty to my lovely wife to state, that she cannot consistently be censured for the course she has taken, for it was through my earnest persuasion she was prevailed upon to leave her parents and home, and trust herself to my care and protection. Therefore, dear sir, if you must censure any one, let it be me, for I alone am to blame. But I cannot believe that you will forever disown an only daughter for marrying the man she loves. True you may say your consent was not obtained, or even asked for. But, sir, we knew it would not only be useless, but that it would perhaps blast our fondest hopes—for Clara repeatedly informed me of your aversion to my character and appearance. And, sir, I fondly, ardently love your beauteous daughter, and I believe she is as ardently attached to me. Under these considerations, and knowing that your consent to our union would not be granted, we have taken the course we have. And now we fondly hope that you will extend to us your full pardon for the step we have taken, and invite your daughter to again return to her parents and home, with the full assurance that all that is past shall be forgotten, and we received with welcome and kindness. With these feelings, I subscribe myself your dutiful son, and shall wait with impatience your answer, which you will please direct to my address, and oblige

RICHARD BROWN.

To H. Harvey, Esq.

Henry Stanton was visiting at Mr. Harvey's when the above letter was received; and, learning from whence it came, he requested the old man to make the contents known. He accordingly broke the seal, and commenced—

"Respected Father—"

"Well, well, the young scamp begins very well," said he. "But let us see what he has to say for running away with my servant girl."

So saying, he read the letter of Dick to his attentive listeners.

"Well," said he, when he had finished reading, "I must say that he writes a very good letter."

"Yes, he does," said Henry; "and now I suppose you will answer it?"

"Oh, yes—of course I must."

"What, father, and tell him of his mistake?"

"No, no, Clara; tell him how sorry I am that he has pursued such a course—and, after giving him a good lecture for his conduct, ask him, with his wife, back; and, as he says, extend my pardon to them for the step which they have taken."

"What, father, and not undeceive him?"

"No, it will be time enough for that after they come back."

"But," said Clara, "I would not distress him in that way; write to him, and let him know that I am here, and who his wife is, and that will be enough, I should think."

"No, Clara, that will never do; for as soon as he knows that Betty, instead of you, is his wife, he will probably leave her, and what would she do there, in the city, alone, with no friends to assist her? No, no, if he leaves her it must be here, where he took her from, for she is too good a girl to be entirely ruined."

"I think," said Henry, "that would be the best course to pursue."

"Yes, Henry, and I must see if I can write as good a letter as he has written."

Thus saying, he left the room to indite an answer to Dick's epistle.

In the mean time, the young married couple were anxiously waiting the arrival of news from home. I say anxious, for they both were; but for far different reasons. Dick was sure that his fortune for life was made, if the old man would only invite them home. And this he thought there was no doubt of; for he conceived that no parent could be so hard-hearted as to forever disown an only child.

But with Clara—or with Betty, which the reader has seen was her real name—the cause for impatience was far different. She wished, ardently wished, for the letter to arrive—and yet she dreaded to have the time come. For she doubted not but that would explain to her husband her real name and situation. And then what course he would pursue, she knew not. She had thought that she could prevail upon him not to write to her pretended father, believing that he was as ardently attached to her as he professed to be. But in this she was deceived. And now she waited with impatience for what she believed would seal her fate.

At last, the long wished-for letter arrived. Dick quickly broke the seal and read the following:

"Sir—Yours of the 18th inst. is received. I cannot hardly address you as my son; for I feel as though you had outraged all the feelings which a son ought to possess towards a father. My daughter, you say, is safe; for this I am thankful, for her welfare is as dear to me as my own.

"If she has married you without my consent or knowledge, she has committed a hasty and wrong act; and bitterly do I mourn to think that she would be deceived by your smooth and artful protestations of love, and be induced by them to forget the duty she owed to her parents. And it would be doing my duty towards you if I could nerve myself to the task to disown her forever, and heap curses upon your head, for enticing an innocent girl from the path of rectitude, and from her home.

"But this I cannot do—for I love my daughter, Clara, with such love as a parent possesses for an only and darling child. Therefore, I must of needs extend to you an invitation to come home. Think not, by this, that I shall grant you my unconditional pardon for your elopement, for I do not. But, on your return, if you are disposed to make my house your home, I shall use my best endeavours to ascertain your character and standing in society, and if I find them to be respectable, without spot or blemish, I may possibly forgive you for this one ill-timed act. But now, I say, come home immediately, and your wife shall occupy the same situation in my family and affections that she always has filled. And you, for the time being at least, shall be treated as her husband. This is all that is necessary for me, at the present, to say. And with wishes for your safe return, I remain, H. Harvey."

"There, Clara," said Dick, as he finished reading the above letter, "I told you that he would forgive us and invite us to come home; but you would not believe me. However, you see I was right."

"Yes, but—"

"But what?—what are you afraid of now?"

"Why, he says that he does not forgive you."

"Yes, but what of that?—of course, he would not at first say we had his full pardon."

"But," said Betty, who knew not what to think of the letter written by her former employer, "it may be that he only writes this to get you back, so that he can abuse you and me. Depend upon it, he will never forgive us."

"Yes he will, Clara. I know something of human nature at least; and we shall be received with kindness by your father. Therefore, do not distress yourself with unnecessary fears."

"They are not unnecessary fears, Richard. I know him better than you can, and I fear his anger."

"You need not, Clara, there is no danger attending our return; so make your arrangements, and we will leave the city as soon as possible."

But this course did not suit Betty in the least. She concluded that Mr. Harvey was disposed to assist her, now that he must be aware of the situation in which she was placed; and she thought he had written that letter to keep her husband blinded as regarded her real name; believing he would not, for such an invitation, return to her former home. And earnestly she plead with him to relinquish his plans of returning.

"I do not wish to go back," said she; "I fear my mas— my father is not, will not be reconciled. And, dear Richard, you say you have friends, and we certainly can live and be happy without his aid. So do not go—say you will not!" And the misguided girl wept while she plead, for what she knew was the only course to ensure her happiness.

But Dick, thinking that all her fears were on account of her father, would not listen to her entreaties; and she was forced to accompany him back to her former residence. With what feelings she looked forward to the coming evil, may be better imagined than described. Bitterly did she repent the course she had taken in first deceiving her husband, but it was now too late to retract. But she had believed he loved her as fondly as he professed to, and for herself alone. With these views, she had, after noticing his error, kept him in the dark as regarded her condition, thinking that they might be happy—never dreaming that she should be taken back, to bear the scoffs and sneers of her former companions.

But so it was. She was fast nearing the place which, above all others, she wished never again to behold. And with sad and downcast feelings, she silently submitted to her fate.

Not so with Dick. His plans, he thought, were about to be consummated to his heart's desire. He was, as he thought, the husband of the daughter of a rich and powerful man. And as such, he expected to live in ease, surrounded with all the comforts that wealth could procure.

He tried repeatedly to cheer his wife's feelings by telling her of the many happy hours they should pass beneath her father's roof; of the welcome which they should soon receive from her fond and forgiving parents. But in vain. There was more cause for her sorrow than he dreamed of.

Time and again did Betty resolve that she would explain to Richard her present situation. But she could not nerve herself to the task. The words died upon her lips; and, with dread forebodings of ill, she waited impatiently for the result of her schemes, which were to end far different from what she had hoped or expected.

The time had arrived when Dick was, as he thought, to have his hopes and anticipations realized. He feared not but what his reception would be friendly, and looked forward to the time when his wife would again smile with joy, to be received by her parents with a cordial welcome.

They reached the house, and Dick, quickly jumping from the carriage, prepared to assist his wife.—She could scarcely stand, she was so excited; and, almost fainting, she leaned upon her husband's arm, and entered the house.

Mr. Harvey, with his wife and daughter, were seated around a cheerful fire when they entered. He arose, and, cordially shaking hands with Dick, invited him to divest himself of his travelling coat, and be seated. Dick did as requested, while Clara was helping to disrobe his companion of her cloak and hood. When this was accomplished, they were invited to partake of a supper, which was provided with much care and attention.

Dick, all this time, was wondering why the reception of his wife had been so cold and restrained. And more than once his eye wandered to the beautiful Clara, who was, with many smiles, assisting her mother about the household matters.

Soon Henry Stanton entered the room, and, with a hearty welcome to Dick, seated himself by the fire, and commenced a conversation with Mr. Harvey.

When the lately arrived couple had finished their meal, Mr. Harvey arose, and, with a nonchalant air, introduced—"Mr. Brown, Mrs. Harvey, my wife." Dick bowed very low to his mother-in-law. And then—"Mr. Brown, Miss Harvey, my daughter," said the old man.

"Your daughter?" said Dick, with surprise; "I thought you had but one?"

"You thought right, sir. I have but one child."

"And this is your daughter?" asked Dick, in amazement.

"Yes, I believe so."

"And who be you?" said he, turning to his wife, who sat like a statue in her chair, without speaking, or moving a muscle.

"Who be you?" again thundered forth Dick to his now inanimate wife.

"She has fainted!" said Clara. "Bring me some water, Henry, quick!"

Dick stood amazed. What to make of this scene he knew not. At last, advancing to Mr. Harvey, he said—

"Sir, will you tell me who that woman is?"

"Who?" said the old man. "Why, your wife, I suppose."

"I know that; but who was she?"

"Her name, sir," said Mr. Harvey, calmly, "was Betty Smith; but now it is Betty Brown."

"And how came she here?"

"You brought her, sir."

"But before now, when I first saw her?" exclaimed Dick, while rage almost choked his utterance.

"Why, sir, she was my servant girl; but you saw fit to——"

"Your servant? My Heavens! your servant!! And I have—— Fire and furies! But this is too much!—And you," said he, approaching Henry, "you were knowing to the fact?"

"I was, but thought——"

"Enough! I am ruined for ever! A servant girl my wife!! Good Heavens!" And thus saying, he rushed from the house, leaving, in his haste, his wife, without even one parting word. And "the place which once knew him now knows him no more!"

Betty was in a few days consoled for the loss of her husband, who was never again seen in those parts, and returned to her old occupation in the family of Mr. Harvey. And thus ends our tale of Marrying an Heiress.

THE DAILY TEACHER.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

There is more scope for observing and analysing character at a suburban distance from the loud beatings of the "mighty heart" of London, than among its crowded streets. Well, indeed, is it called "mighty" London—the mighty! the magnificent! the commercial! and, despite the efforts that are made to conceal or disguise the fact, London is so essentially "commercial," that all its might, and nearly all its real magnificence, originate in commerce.—There is now-a-days (and most unfortunately), a spirit abroad which makes the good city of London ashamed of itself. If it had its own way, it would be considered aristocratic from Apsley-house to Mile-end: it seems to like no longer to be called "a city:" it would, if it could, be "west-end" from Buckingham Palace to Blackwell; it would rather affect a lean and skinny gentility, than stand forth a furred and golden-chained citizen, elevated by the dignity of honest industry, and proud of the citizen-power which, like Warwick's stout Earl, has made and unmade kings. All this has little to do with the "Daily Teacher," though the particular train of thought originated in calling to mind that the parents of Kate Ellis were ruined by anxiety to be considered aristocratic. I have heard that they occupied a house in one of the fashionable squares, and lived in strict accordance with what is vaguely termed "style;" but that was before I knew anything of their history.—Some years ago we resided in Fulham, quite in the Vale of the Thames; and a charming residence it was—to look at—never was grass so green, nor American plants so luxuriant; and well they might be, for between marsh and vapour, the cottage enjoyed a perpetual steam-bath; still it was very pretty, and people frequently paused to admire the size of the pond, the rapid growth of the willows, and the verdure of the lawn. It is a curious neighbourhood, abutting into by-lanes, where you frequently come upon a tiled, gabled cottage, sunk several steps below the level of the road, trellised, and chonked up with ancient jessamine and dark ivy; or an old, mysterious-looking house, with upper windows, peering, like giant's eyes, over the high buttressed wall. In some such dwelling, I conjecture, two ladies lodged, who passed our cottage frequently, seeking pure air; (city people always fancy that air in the "west-end" direction must be pure); but I believe the air was, from being soft and mild, the best for the elder lady, whose deep cough and flushed cheek told of the canker at the core—the incurable disease of our sharp, uncertain climate. The ladies had an old fat spaniel, who would waddle through the hedge, and our lithe greyhound formed an acquaintance with the wheezing dog. This led to a sort of interchange of courtesies; it was impossible not to offer the strangers some of the abundant flowers, which the younger always accepted gratefully, the elder as if she were conferring a favour. In every respect, you could not imagine a greater contrast than the mother and daughter. The mother, bending under the disease, would bend to nothing else: her dress was invariably a gay, half-faded silk; her shawl, of former state, well put on; some out-of-place ornament glittering either on her bosom or her wrist. She was evidently sinking into the grave, a creature deprived, either by waste or loss of fortune, of the only abundance she appreciated,—the abundance of wealth,—and yet affecting state, and assuming, poor thing! that ill-fitting sort of manner, which is so frequently mistaken for dignity. Her daughter was indeed different; different in every respect. Her dress of simple muslin was always clean and plain; her black silk shawl pinned quietly across her bosom; her straw bonnet tied down closely; and, if she did not return a salute with the self-possession of her mother, her well-opened dark grey eyes spoke an appreciation of every little act of kindness which her mother scorned.

Mrs. Ellis continually apologised about her dog's "intrusion," as she called it; adding that, "indeed, he never saw a garden but he thought of the square he used to walk in, poor fellow! and he grew fat from riding in the carriage."

Such observations always made Kate look pained; and she would say something to turn the conversation; but her mother invariably returned to "the square," "the carriage," and an occasional jingling of the names of lords and ladies—"friends," she called them. Once having strung a few titles on the thread of her discourse, as boys string eggs, her daughter, evidently anxious that her mother should not be considered an inventor of falsehoods, turned her blushing, truthful face towards me, and said,—"We did know them once, when papa was alive, and before his misfortunes." It was painful to see the thunder of ill-temper clouding the white damp brow of the vain-minded woman, who was as deficient in tact as she was in common sense. She reproved Kate for speaking, and, while shame at the falsehood averted the daughter's face, repeated the assurance that "she had chosen her present retreat to be out of the way of fashionable visitors, as she required quiet;" then, with an air of deep offence, she pursued her walk, and I could hear her voice in sharp reproval of poor Kate, interrupted almost every moment by the hollow-tolling cough that rings the death-knell with such fearful punctuality. For several days she avoided passing our gate; the flowers placed upon the hedge for the invalid were left to wither; and it was only from an old Irish woman, who used to weed in the market gardens, and who once came with a little note from Kate, requesting the loan of a book, that I heard how Mrs. Ellis was: "Much worse, indeed," she replied, "choking alive with the pride and the weight about her heart."

A few days after they passed as usual, with slower and more languid steps; even the greyhound had learnt to know their approach, by the sound of the poor lady's cough, and would rush out to meet the fat spaniel. It might be my fancy at first, but I did fancy, that even the animal grew thinner and thinner. I am certain the dresses did—the mother's shawl might have been more closely pinned, but I ceased to perceive the ornaments; Kate's bonnet was browned by the sun, and the straw-coloured riband faded into soiled white; her gloves, too, had been mended so often, that, had not her small hand grown much smaller, they could not have been drawn on. Surely her face had not always that lean look: but why should I continue thus?—poverty was leading the dance of death. Now poverty, simple poverty, can be easily dealt with; and pride—bold, vulgar, barefaced pride—if you cannot conquer, you can spurn. But poverty and pride!—a combination which the cold-hearted world reproves, as if the quality, so excellent in the rich and prosperous, became tainted when associated with the helpless craft of poverty;—poverty and pride are delicate to manage; and those who thoughtlessly bark in with the cry of the rich and proud, against the poor and proud, know little of the social duties of humanity, to say nothing of those of a higher and holier nature. Of all tortures, the poverty endured by pride is the greatest: let no one sneer at it; let no one call it "merited;" let no one, with untaught hands, attempt to tear down the barrier which the instinct of a sensitive mind erects around itself: let no one dare to break it. If it is fault, its punishment is sufficiently sharp—the stings of its own scorpion are agonizing enough; those nurtured in pride, when assailed by poverty, however tendered, find no balm but in death—no sanctuary but in the grave. I had been watching the feeble steps of the mother, supported by the almost as feeble daughter, when the poor woman who "did their marketing," made me a curtsey and paused.

"It's a'most over with the poor lady, and the dog," she said, "I'm thinking; and, indeed, when the world goes contrary with the likes of them, the sooner it sees them out the better. They try to stand against starvation, but it's strongest—it's always strongest in the end. What's to become of the poor thing when the mother's gone, I don't know; for, by all accounts, whatever there is—and its neither broad nor deep—dies with her."

"But they have friends—relations!"

"Bathershin! friends and relations!" She shrugged her shoulders in a peculiar manner, and then added: "I know they had once; but it's a long time ago; and sorra a thing in the world harder to remember than a poor relation. They wasted more thousands on grandeur, than grandeur will ever give half-pence to them. But—I'll tell ye the truth—their marketing is asy done; I don't think an ounce of food passes the poor young lady's lips once in the twenty-four hours, striving to get her mother's fancies for her, and they're not little ones either. They are both proud—in a different way, and," added the Irish woman, "I respect them the better for it—it's the only warm clothing they have, the coming on of winter.—Well, if it doesn't warm the back, it's a fence to the heart, and that's something, particularly when nothing else is left. It goes to my heart to take a half-penny from them; and, in troth, I often add a penny of my own, to get a little thing better, though I daren't let on, because of hurting their feelings."

The creature—whose entire dress, including a nondescript bonnet, whose crown was beat in perfectly flat from carrying the market baskets, could not have been valued at five shillings—made another curtsey, and trotted off, singing "Peggy Bawn" with as careless a voice as if no deep or delicate feeling had ever entered her heart.

A few days after this, the same woman told me the poor lady was dead. I never saw grief at another's sorrow more deep than hers; and the tenderness she evinced in, as she called it, "managing the little things for the young lady," must have appeared wonderful, to any who are unacquainted with the delicate minds of the peasant Irish.

Kate's pride was not to be overcome; nothing could induce her to apply to any of her former acquaintances for assistance; she had written, she said, twice, to an uncle abroad, but he had not replied to her letters. She could struggle by herself; she had seen too much of the love of display and gorgeous vanity, amongst those who ought to assist her, to suppose they would treat, otherwise than insolently, one upon whom poverty had stamped her badge of shame. She would do anything—go to service, rather. She endeavoured to obtain a situation as a companion, or nursery governess, but she had no knowledge whatever of music, and that seemed a perpetual obstacle. Her gentleness and timidity, crushed down by sorrow and circumstances, rendered her so shy and reserved, that the qualities and acquirements she really possessed she seemed to have no power to set forth; but when whiled into forgetfulness of her sorrows, it was impossible to converse with her without the warmest appreciation of her clear, distinct mind, and deep respect for her steady resolve to work her way. She had been much embittered by past circumstances; and, like all sensitive persons, was prone to exaggerate neglect into unkindly feeling. People are sometimes kind from impulse—sometimes from principle; but objects of sympathy and aid press so closely upon those who have means, that the want which seeks concealment will most likely perish. Kate Ellis relinquished the humble cottage rooms she had occupied with her mother, and plied her needle in curious embroidery, and every womanly craft she could devise, to earn a scanty subsistence, in a little attic that overlooked the Fulham fields. Sometimes she would reply to an advertisement which "exactly suited her wishes;" and watch the postman as he trotted down the lane, lessening his bundle of letters at each door; but none came to her; she has, after he passed and re-passed, wondered how she should feel if she really did receive a letter. She engaged to teach French and Italian for a shilling an hour; and took two pupils at Kensington who offered her half the sum, and after benefiting by her instructions for three months, turned her off, because she remained away one morning when the rain poured in torrents.

Lonely, indeed, she must have been in that small, low room, plying her needle unceasingly until midnight, for one the of bazaar stalls; and waking at the earliest dawn, to work again;—hopeless, uncheering labour!—she worked only for herself—to sustain an existence which seemed to repay her exertions for its preservation by adding bodily weakness to the sorrows of her mind. There is something grateful and exciting in labouring for those we love—something that teaches us to wait and forbear—and hope is stimulated to persevere by love; but Kate Ellis was alone: and she who would have been so gentle and tender in prosperity, was daily shrinking into herself. Happily, she was daily learning to look beyond the world, as the only means of overcoming it; and this blessed influence—stealing gradually into her soul—subdued, while it elevated, her spirit.

It chanced that a lady who took much interest in a school which she had been the chief instrument in establishing, wished to procure the assistance, for a few weeks, of a young person, whose care and talent would enable her to permit the resident teacher to visit her parents in the north of England. The remuneration was small, the duty severe; but when Kate Ellis mentioned it, she shook her head mournfully, saying—"It was too good for her to dream of obtaining;" yet after some delay and much inquiry, she was appointed; and every morning, before eight o'clock, she passed to the school, as daily teacher, and returned after six in the evening.

Poor Kate! not only had she to please the great lady who placed her in this school, which was a sort of picturesque half-charity, half-paying seminary, for cottage children, but to satisfy the committee; and occasionally to be called to account, on her way home, by the parents of the tweaty-seven little girls who were under her care. Alas! at first, it seemed harder to endure than the unseen privations in her small damp room; where, but for the silent companionship of the spaniel, which was nearly blind with age, she would have felt, if possible, more desolate than she was. The committee were delighted with the various specimens of needle-work she produced; they immediately set all the little girls embroidering all manner of pretty useless things in German wool; and a great criss-cross basket was filled with a most perplexing assemblage of patterns, which every body brought, that Miss Ellis might put them in hand forthwith. It was discovered that she wrote so clear a hand (they would hardly designate a teacher's hand-writing 'beautiful'), that the committee flattered her, by requesting that, during the children's play hours, or in the evening, she would copy the yearly reports, and arrange the books, which Mrs. Lance had not time to do before she went away. Then the children discovered she was so "good-natured," that they brought her skipping-ropes to twist, and shuttlecocks to cut; and little "Jane," or little "Mary," came laden with messages to "Miss Ellis," concerning "white work," or slates, or something, which, if she had attempted to agree to, she must have offended the ladies, who certainly perplexed still more the perplexing "system of education," which, in nine cases out of ten, ought to be more truly called the "no system." But this was not all: amongst the visitors to this pretty pet school, were some who, in former days, sat at the teacher's father's table; she was little more than a child, then, admired, flattered, caressed. They did not remember her, but she remembered them; and when obliged to stand forth and exhibit the proficiency of her pupils before the brilliant ladies who "came to see," her voice often faltered, and her cheek flushed beneath the gaze—no matter whether kind or curious—which she invariably thought was rudely prying into her poverty.

Still, her new occupation, after the first roughness had worn off, had an interest for her which nothing else possessed; the constant communion with children, some of them young, lovely and guileless, had opened her heart, and the heart once opened, will surely heal;—wearisome and tiresome as they were, she was proud of the improvement which follows even a moderate organization. Alone, quite—quite alone, as she felt herself, whenever a merry shout of laughter arose from the play-ground, still, though labouring night and day, she was not so solitary as she had been; one rosy urchin would thrust an apple into her basket—another observe when she was occupied, and climbing up to where her bonnet hung, put an orange into the crown, and watch, with panting anxiety, to see Miss Ellis's astonishment when she went to put it on. The young ones held up their little faces for a kiss, at least twice a day; and, feverish as all school matters must have been to the proud, sensitive girl, it was with a heart beating to palpitation that she heard that the resident teacher would return in a week.

The poor Irish woman continued her humble attachment—she had the care of the old spaniel from eight in the morning; she called him "her daily boorder;" and I have met her in the scorching heat of June, with a basket of "fine fresh lettuce! green, gay, gosh lettuce!" as she used to call it, surmounting her flat bonnet, and the spaniel tucked under her arm. "If I left it at Miss Kate's lodging," she say, "it would brake its heart for want of company; if I left it at home with my own children, they'd worry the life out of it; so all I can do, when it's tired walking, is to give it a lift. It sees as much life with me out of its one eye, as ever it did before with two."

Poor Kate became fearfully nervous as her last day drew nigh; she went to the school at seven, instead of eight, and sat down to wait for the pupils, whose hour was nine. Having hung up her bonnet and shawl in their usual place, she drew over the large criss-cross basket, to arrange the patterns and work, and piled up the books she had laboured to finish, that they might be ready for inspection. Soon after eight the little girl who took care of the rooms, brought her her usual cup oi coffee and slice of bread and butter, but she could not taste it; the next day the regular teacher would assume her duty, and she would again be without occupation. She wondered, then, how she could have been so ungrateful to the Almighty, as to have thought she had too much to do, or to have felt shy and proud, or annoyed, with any thing sweetened by the unselfish love of youth and innocence. Some of the village children were playing outside, and she could hear them laugh: the laugh of children had, in nine weeks, become music to her ears. It was not the small stipend, so much as the companionship, and interest, she should miss; this rankled in her heart, and never, since her mother's death, had she felt so cast down—she covered her face with her hands, and wept. Each shout of childish laughter from without, was as a knell to her crushed spirit: to-morrow she would be alone, companioned only by her poor old dog. We do not know how much sorrow is lessened by the sight of a human face, and the sound of a human voice; nor how much self-respect we gain by being actively, however humbly, useful, until we are left alone—without a lip to smile, a voice to cheer, and no one to look to us even for the smallest service.—Kate Ellis wept bitterly.

"Indeed!" exclaimed a voice whose rough brogue made her start, "I saw the postman leave this letter for y'e; and I thought I so often saw you looking for it, that it would be as good to bring it here as keep it waiting till evening, so I made bould to take it;—and och, Miss Kate, don't be using yer eyes to the tears dear, while they're so young; take heart, Miss, every one has their weight of happy days set against their weight of sad ones, and yours are to come. I know the teachers have heavy times of it, for I meet them at all hours, and in all weathers, I know them by their being always alone; and their things expected to look twice as good as they are, through the means of a bit of trimming or the like; and by their stuffed bags, and thin books, with the pens sticking out; or a rowl of music in their hands,—what they havn't in their hearts! barring it's a lamentation—a cairn, as we call it over the past and gone. Well, that's enough, there's bright days for you yet; and though that letter has an ugly rim to it, yet an ugly nut has a sweet bit inside it!"

And the humble Irish woman disappeared, giving some early pupils, whom she met at the door, two or three apples, as she said, "to keep them employed while the poor young lady read her dark letter."

When she did read it, her head sank—the hand that held it fell on her lap—she trembled violently. Is she smitten with a new sorrow?—she is an orphan! friendless! unprotected! proud! poor! No!—poor she thought she was, but she is not; when she recovers, she will tell you that she is RICH!—what a magic word it is—she is RICH! The uncle to whom she wrote, and who never answered, is dead—died childless; and all—the all from which he would not spare her a single pound, is hers!

The Rewards of Perseverance

BY EDWARD WEBSTER.

"Honor and shame from no condition rise."

"Was the Saturday Courier in the mail, to-day?" inquired a lad dressed in the humble garb of a mechanic's apprentice, at the Post Office of a flourishing village in one of the Northern States, soon after the commencement of that excellent miscellany.

"I'll take the contents of our box, if you please," said a young gentleman, stepping from an elegant carriage at the door, containing several ladies, and pushing rather rudely before his humble neighbor, who quietly drew back to give him room.

"I will wait on you as soon as I have looked out Thomas Hunter's paper," replied the officer.

"Thomas Hunter can wait," replied the other, casting a look of contempt upon the apprentice boy; "Col. Thornton's daughters are at the door.—It is high if they are to be detained for the sake of accommodating such a fellow."

A sudden blush passed over the face of the apprentice, and taking the paper tossed him by the Post Master, he withdrew in silence.

Mr. George Washington Masterton, for such was the young gentleman's name, was now served, and if anything could excite the just envy of a less favored individual, it was the extent and variety of literature to which he had access, as periodical after periodical, both domestic and foreign, were produced upon the counter, which he ordered the servant to deposit in the carriage, and then entering it himself, was whirled away by as noble a pair of horses as ever started at the crack of whip.

In the meantime, our apprentice hurried home on foot: it being noon, and having an hour allowed him for his meals, he usually managed to devote half of it to reading and study. Seating himself at a rude desk in one corner of the shop, he hastily unfolded the sheet, and glanced with anxious eyes, over the very last page; then at the middle ones; and finally turned, with disappointed looks, to the first, murmuring as he did so—"I was a fool for sending it, or dreaming a mechanic's apprentice could write an article worthy the public eye," when he gave a sudden start, turned pale as death, and in spite of all his efforts to restrain it, dropped a tear upon its yet damp folds. The first item upon the page was his own production—some chaste and beautiful verses—the first he had ever offered for publication: his want of confidence in his own powers preventing him from looking at first where their superior merit entitled them to stand. In the editor's gossip with the readers and correspondents, was a compliment, unexpected as it was gratifying; and he could scarcely believe his eyes as he read the high encomium. Light was the heart with which he applied himself to his afternoon's task; and week succeeding week, found him still at his post, an industrious, faithful, and trusty lad; never neglecting an opportunity to improve his mind, or to acquire the mastership of his trade, until, four years from the Post Office incident, found him commanding a salary of five hundred dollars a year, with the respect and confidence of all who knew him. Nor was he unknown in the literary world; some of his productions, both prose and verse, having been published in several of the best periodicals of our country, proving clearly, that following a laborious occupation does not exclude an individual from that elevated position, in the intellectual world, too often considered as belonging to affluence and a freedom from the sterner duties of existence. His father had been a private soldier in the Revolution—brave and patriotic—and though he had fought the battles of his country with unflinching courage, he returned at the close of the war, exhausted by privation and suffering—undecked with military distinctions, and with the written promises only of a Government too poor to meet demands upon her treasury, instead of arrearages of pay. These he was obliged to sell at an enormous discount, in order to sustain himself during the interval of prostration that fell upon every branch of business immediately succeeding the treaty of peace—so that, although Government subsequently redeemed its pledges, in his case, as in too many others, it enriched speculators instead of those to whom it was justly due. Still, he was able to obtain an honorable livelihood, and married at a rather late period of life. He gave his children a good common education; imbuing their minds with principles of honesty and self respect; and was finally gathered to his fathers, with the satisfaction of thinking they would not disgrace the heritage of freedom for which he had fought and bled.

Young Masterton's grandfather had likewise been a soldier in the Revolution. Descended from a noble family, if I may be allowed the expression in a Government like ours, he was enabled to enter the service under more advantageous circumstances than the other, being advanced before the close of the war, to the post of a senior officer in the army. Possessing a valuable property, which descended to his only son, together with military lands granted him by the State, George's father, at the commencement of life, found himself in a high and honorable station of society. Marrying, likewise, into a family of wealth and influence, he gradually forgot those principles of equality taught by the founders of the Republic, and succeeded in teaching his two children, young Washington and Adeline, to shun the society of those who were guilty of so heinous a crime as that of laboring for a livelihood.

After leaving the office of which we spoke, Masterton and his sister accompanied the Misses Thornton home.

"Let us look at the plate of fashions in your magazine," said Miss Angelina Thornton, after they were seated in the parlor, addressing herself to Miss Masterton; "I am all anxiety to know the latest changes. Is it not beautiful?" she exclaimed, surveying its gaudy tints; "how gracefully that young gentleman pays his addresses."

"It is indeed beautiful," replied the other, "that boquet he has just presented looks as if it was real"——

"Why, what is this!" exclaimed Washington, interrupting them, having in the mean time opened the Saturday Courier and scanned its contents; "The Beauties of Nature, by T. H., of ———."

"That is our place," said Angelina Thornton.—"Who can it be?" Various conjectures were indulged in without any satisfactory results, as the initials were applicable to none of their associates, until Caroline Thornton, a younger sister, with a noble brow and a frank, open countenance that spoke the purity of her heart, suggested that it might belong to Thomas Hunter, the shoemaker's apprentice; as he had been known to write several pieces for the literary society under an assumed name.

"A youth," she added, "although in humble circumstances and diffident almost to a fault, is an honor to the town in which he lives."

It was finally settled as belonging to him; and many were the ill-natured and envious remarks indulged in at the expense of an humble friend. The whole company, with the exception of Caroline, voting him a presumptuous person, having no right to so much honor.

"I wish you would not be forever defending such low persons," said Angelina, as Caroline entered her protest against their decision. "I should not be surprised if you married a shoemaker yet, you have so much sympathy for them."

A deep blush passed over Caroline's face at this remark, but she made no reply, and there the subject dropped. Although, owing to the disparity of their conditions, Caroline Thornton and Thomas Hunter had rarely met, still several incidental circumstances had occurred to attract her attention, and impress her mind with his real worth. His unobtrusive, retiring manners in company, where she had seen him once or twice; the superior excellence of his literary productions, read before the village lyceum, had made her acquainted with the extent of his mental acquirements; and on one occasion when he risked his life to save that of a little boy, who would have perished but for his timely assistance, she learned the strength and decision of his character.

A stream of sufficient magnitude for driving mills, ran through the town, a clear and beautiful brook in ordinary times, but subject to rapid rise after heavy storms, when it became a maddened torrent, rushing on its impetuous course like a fiery steed, and bearing upon its bosom whole trees swept from the forest above the village. On one side a steep bank lined the stream, above which a poor Irish family had reared their humble tenement. It was in the month of April, and a heavy rain had swollen the stream exceedingly, and been succeeded by a mild and sunny day.

The children, having escaped the watchful eye of the mother, were amusing themselves by throwing sticks into the stream, and watching their disappearance down the current, just as Thomas Hunter passed along the other side with a basket of shoes to supply his master's customers. Caroline, ever a lover of nature, had been attracted to the spot by the wildness of the scene, and was answering the young man's salutation when their attention was arrested by a terrific shriek from the direction of the hut, and looking up, they saw the mother rushing wildly towards the bank, down which a child was seen an instant falling, and the next disappear beneath the foaming tide. Instantly disengaging himself from the basket, young Hunter plunged headlong into the flood, and succeeded in rescuing the little victim from the very jaws of death; yet so exhausted was he by the efforts as to be unable to stand when he reached the shore a quarter of a mile below. Caroline sped with the fleetness of a fawn along the bank—hastened across the bridge near which he landed to meet the mother and restore her child, and then hied to his side—chafed his temples with her own fair hand, and praised his conduct with such generous words that he could have risked a thousand times as much to gain such sweet reward. From that hour a flame was kindled in his heart, although he strove to quench it from the beginning, and dared not own its existence, even to himself. Although in his wildest dreams he could never think of aspiring to her hand, yet it nerved his soul to high resolves, and was the means of preserving him from many a snare of vice and folly. Neither did it fail in its effects upon Caroline, for the manly form and noble conduct of our humble hero mingled with many a happy dream and many a waking vision. A reciprocal passion, as secret and as pure, took possession of her mind, and infused a melancholy through all her conduct more attractive than even her previous buoyant and happy spirits. But to return to our story.

The Mastertons at length separated from their friends. The young man was moody and silent for some distance on their way home, until asked by his sister for the cause of his ill-humor.

"There is something in that Courier you do not dream of," he replied, "and it is enough to provoke a saint. Read this," he continued, pointing to the compliment bestowed by the editors upon the "Beauties of Nature." Adeline read as follows:

"The lines by 'T. H.,' on our first page, are beautiful. They evince genius and cultivated taste.—We hope to present his favors often to the public through the medium of the Saturday Courier."

"That," said Masterton, "is for Tom Hunter, the shoemaker's apprentice, who has never been to any but a common school is his life. Now look at the next one, you can see, by the initials, it is meant for me, as I sent a production not long ago." Adeline read:

"'G. W. M.' is an imposter. His 'Distinctions of Society' are as destitute of rhyme and measure as they are of sense. We wish to be troubled with no more such doggerel. We append a couple of his best lines as a sample of his calibre

'The poor should know their place,
Not try to ellevate themselves their betters to disgrace.'

It reminds us of the famous old couplet—

'Wasn't Pharaoh a rascal,
Because he wouldn't let the children of Israel go three days into the wilderness to keep the Paschal?'"

"I have written six pieces besides that, and have sent them to as many different papers, but every one has been rejected, and yet I am acknowledged to be the greatest gentleman in town, and the influence of our family is known throughout the state."

Young Masterton sought not for the causes of success in the apprentice's case, or of failure in his own; but contented himself with anathematizing the whole race of editors, resolving henceforth to have no more to do with literary composition; and giving up all thoughts of intellectual culture, he devoted his whole time to the amusements of the day, attending the theatre, the billiard table, and the race course; associating with vicious and unprincipled persons, and imperceptibly forming habits, which, if indulged in, inevitably bring their votaries to misery and degradation.

Four years wrought changes in his circumstances, as well as in those of Thomas Hunter. He had followed to the grave his father, brought down from a state of florid health by an apoplectic fit; and subsequently his only sister, Adeline, hurried off the stage of action with a pulmonary disease, engendered by carrying to excess all the pernicious practices of fashionable life. All restraint was then removed;—he found himself master of an ample fortune—and never having been compelled to acquire it, he could not appreciate its value. He lavished his money upon unworthy objects; and whilst young Hunter was gradually rising, he was rapidly sinking in the world's esteem.

At length, finding himself embarrassed for want of funds, by his extravagance, he resolved to sell the paternal estate, and remove to the city of New York, where a greater scope was offered for pleasure and indulgence. He immediately carried this resolution into effect, transferring all right and title in its broad domain and noble mansion to a retiring city merchant; and taking a heavy sum of cash as an equivalent, he turned his back upon his native village.

Thomas Hunter was preparing to leave the home of his childhood about the same time, but in an opposite direction, intending to seek his fortune in the growing West. As he was rambling over the scenes endeared by many a memory of early youth, preparatory to his departure,—perhaps for ever,—he encountered Caroline Thornton, upon the very spot where he had saved the child several years before. His intercourse with society had removed much of the diffidence of his earlier years, and he met her without embarrassment.

"Miss Thornton," said he, after some preliminary conversation, "I am about leaving my native place, perhaps to return no more; but it is with deep regret—for there are ties that bind me to it which will cause many a pang."

"Why do you leave us?" Caroline enquired, with an earnestness that surprised him, for he had never breathed the secret of his heart to a living soul, nor dreamed that she had aught of interest in his welfare more than any other; but the ingenuousness of her manner caused a ray of hope to cross his mental vision, that it had never known before.

"The field of enterprise is more extensive there," he said, "and I must be the architect of my own fortune. Yet, Miss Thornton," continued he, with faltering accents, "I must say a few words at parting, hoping it may not forfeit me your good opinion. Since the time you displayed the kindness of your nature upon this spot, five years ago, your image has been ever present in my heart; and although, knowing the disparity of our conditions, I have tried to shut its avenues against a hopeless passion—it is all in vain. You are sole mistress of my affections; to you alone, of all your sex, can I yield my undivided love."

The unexpected avowal caused the blood to recede so suddenly from Caroline's cheeks, that he became alarmed; but she instantly recovered herself; and there, in the great temple of nature, with the green trees and the blue sky for a canopy, declared a reciprocal attachment, and pledged herself to await the realization of the competence he hoped to obtain in the Far West. He did not meet her again after that evening, but departed with full faith in her plighted word, buoyant with hope and anticipation.

* * * * *

Five years more passed. He met with brilliant success, and purchased a valuable farm from the profits of his business, intending to leave it to a junior partner, return, and claim the fulfilment of Caroline's promise. He had maintained a regular correspondence, by which he learned her family had met with reverses of fortune, owing to a depreciation in stocks, of which her father was holder to a large amount, and which he had pledged in some business transaction, guaranteeing their par value. That they had in consequence removed to a smaller estate near New York—that her sister was dead, and her father alone was left; yet the extent of their misfortune he had never dreamed, or he would have flown to their assistance long before. The fear that it might embarrass him and prevent his success, had induced the noble girl to keep him in ignorance of the facts; and the pension of her father, as a soldier of the Revolution, added to her own earnings as instructress in a school, supported them in comfort, though not in affluence.

On the following Spring, Hunter repaired to New York, for the purpose of making some early purchases, in order to have them shipped at the opening of navigation, and intending to bring Caroline back, as a wife, with him on his return.

It was at that early stage of the season when winter, still unwilling to yield the dominion over which he had held such undisputed sway, would summon all his remaining energies—drive the genial influences of his successor far away, and ride forth in all the fury of a February storm. Having completed the purchase of a large quantity of morocco and foreign leather, he was turning from Ferry street, where the principal business in that commodity is transacted,—into Pearl, on his way to a hotel of the same name, when his attention was arrested by the appearance of three young men, nearly his own age, who issued into the street immediately in advance, with flushed countenances and boisterous conversation, that showed plainly they had been indulging in drunken revelry. The street lamps were just being lighted, and the cold, threatening clouds that hung heavily over the city all day, had settled into a chilling snow-storm. There was something in the voice and manner of one of them, that attracted his attention; the tones seemed familiar to his ear; but the conversation was so mixed up with profane and vulgar language, it was impossible to recognise it. He lingered in their rear, striving to recall it to his memory, but in vain, and was about to quicken his pace, in order to pass them by, just as they approached the steps of a closed shop, where an old man had sunk from exhaustion or from cold.

"Hallo!" said one of the trio, "old fellow, you have got more than you can carry, and Charley must bring a wheelbarrow, or you'll perish in the street."

"I am not intoxicated," the old man replied, in a feeble voice; "I have walked far to-day, and am unable to proceed. Be kind enough to help me to a place of shelter, or I perish from the cold."

"Not drunk, and yet can't walk," retorted the other. "Look here, old boy, we are all three drunk, and can walk too if we keep together; so good night, we have got all we can do to take care of ourselves, and I would advise you next time to get a boon companion or two, like these, to help you walk."

So saying, he spurned the old man with his foot, and then all three reeled away together.

And the degraded, unfeeling wretch, who thus mocked the miseries of that aged man, was George Masterton, once a youth of promise and respectability, now an outcast and a drunkard. Yet the avenger was on his track, and a miserable death in the street, not many months afterwards, with no one to soothe his dying agonies, or to follow his unhonored ashes to their last resting-place, was the reward of his folly and his guilt. Hunter hastened to the assistance of the old man, conveyed him to a place of shelter, and procured medical assistance, which soon restored him. The two gazed a moment upon each other, a mutual recognition took place; and the old gentleman (for it was Col. Thornton,) grasped the hand of his future son-in-law. The Colonel told the story of his misfortunes, and the manner in which they had supported themselves after the loss of his property—how on the day before he had left home on foot to obtain his annuity, but was told, on his arrival at the Pension Office, the fund had been some time exhausted, and was not yet replaced, although many a war-worn soldier was thus left in penury and want. That he had left the office penniless, and with a heavy heart, and had proceeded thus far when he was obliged to stop from fatigue. "And," continued he, "but for your timely assistance, I must have perished in the street."

Hunter sympathised with his misfortunes, although, so far as himself was concerned, he rejoiced at it, as the means of unfolding to his view the nobleness of Caroline's character; and affording the best proof that he loved her only for herself. Their stay in the city was of short duration. He hastened to the residence of his intended, and bore her and her father to his own happy home. The remainder of our story is best told by quoting an article from a newspaper, printed in the Queen City of the West:

"Thomas Hunter, one of the members elected to the Legislature from this county, served an apprenticeship to a shoemaker, and has risen by his own efforts to his present wealth and influence; yet he is not ashamed to have it known abroad, and is untiring in his efforts to diffuse knowledge amongst the laboring classes. His wife is a fit companion for such a man, dispensing blessings with unsparing hand, visiting the habitations, and ameliorating the condition of the sick and the poor."

THE LADY ARABELLA.

The Lady Arabella stood with averted eyes and quivering lip, while a handsome youth poured forth the tale of his passionate admiration and devotion to his fair companion. Never had a declaration of truer love been breathed within the walls of that stately apartment in Whitehall, than that which fell from the lips of William Seymour.

For a few moments after he had concluded, the Lady Arabella spoke not; at last, raising her beautiful eyes to the gaze so eagerly bent on her, as though life or death depended on what the small and exquisitely formed lips were about to utter, she spoke in a low and melancholy voice:

"I know not," said she, "if it be not my duty to reject thy love, and bid thee see me no more. Oh! Seymour, hast thou well considered the dangers this rash affection may bring upon thy head? Knowest thou not that the King has shown himself averse to all the proposals of marriage that have been made me? Alas! his enmity would be the sure consequence didst thou solicit him for my hand, and need I tell thee of what that enmity is capable?"

"For thy love," answered Seymour, "willingly would I expose myself to all the dangers the anger of a monarch could menace me with. Oh! Arabella, say but that I may hope, and I care not for aught else."

"Urge me not, Seymour," replied she, "it were deeply criminal in me if, seeing the precipice on which thou standest, I should permit thee to linger on its brink. Seek to forget me: there are many maidens, young, lovely, and high-born, who would gladly smile on the suit of William Seymour; may'st thou find one among them worthy of thy love, and enjoy with her all the happiness ever granted to mortals by indulgent Heaven."

"Cruel Arabella!" exclaimed Seymour. "But my doom is passed. No affection for me has ever warmed thy breast, else would'st thou know that a heart that loves like mine heeds not the frowns of kings; that rank and wealth and the favor of the world are as nothing compared to the smiles of her, the object of its deep devotion. Oh! Arabella, didst thou love me, if thou wert willing to be an exile for my sake, cheerfully would I renounce home, friends, my native country, and seek in another land the happiness denied us here."

The Lady Arabella hesitated. Her resolution waivered before his entreaties, even as the snow-flake melts beneath the sun-beam.

"You have conquered," said she, at length. "But if evil should come upon thee because of thy fatal passion, blame not the weak fond heart that could not resist the prayers of him it loved."

The Lady Arabella was the only child of Charles Stuart, fifth Earl of Lennox, and consequently cousin to King James the First of England. Brought up in privacy, under the care of her grandmother, the Countess of Lennox, she was nevertheless rendered an object of dread to her royal kinsman through the urgent desire felt by many to see her seated on the throne of England. Anxious for the re-establishment of the Roman Catholic religion, the Pope proposed to her to marry an Italian Cardinal, descended from Edward the Fourth, whom he intended to free from his vows for that purpose, promising her if she would consent, to use all his influence towards establishing her as Queen, and imagining it could be accomplished with but little difficulty, as she could trace her descent from Henry the Seventh. But Arabella declined the proposition, being unwilling to undertake a perilous struggle for a station her unambitious mind did not aspire to.

There was still another project for raising her to sovereign power, in which the name of the illustrious Raleigh was implicated. Not dazzled by the brilliant prospects held out to her, she again refused, and her conduct on both occasions, was of such a nature as would have convinced any Prince less timid and suspicious than James, that he had nothing to fear from her as a rival.

Beautiful, talented, and accomplished, graceful and fascinating in her manners, and gifted with every quality of heart and mind calculated to secure the affection and respect of those who knew her, many were the suitors for her hand; and among others, the King of Poland knelt at the shrine of her charms.—But the narrow policy of the King prevented her acceptance of all the offers made her. Naturally timid, he shrank from the least appearance of danger, and while he thought that, unmarried, and living in the same royal dwelling with himself, she was comparatively little to be feared, he trembled lest, once a wife and removed from his surveillance, the same overtures that had formerly been made her, might be repeated, and instigated perhaps by the ambition of her husband, might be accepted by her, to the loss, possibly, of his crown and life.

Among the many noble youths who sought the hand of the Lady Arabella, was William Seymour, second son of Lord Beauchamp, and grandson to the Earl of Hertford, himself of royal descent. Distinguished above all the courtly throng for the graces of person and manner, as well as for the more important qualities of mind and heart, it is not surprising that he should have succeeded in inspiring the fair object of his affection with an interest for him. Hitherto the Lady Arabella had viewed with indifference, or at most with no deeper sentiment than flattered vanity the homage rendered her, but the love of young Seymour produced feelings of a widely different nature; conscious, however, that the King would oppose her union with him, and fearful of exciting his anger against her lover, she struggled to repress her attachment for him, and she sought, by conducting herself towards him with marked coldness and reserve, to induce him to abandon a suit so dangerous to both. But Seymour, suspecting the cause of her chilling demeanor, was not so easily discouraged; he let no occasion escape on which to testify to her his devotion, and at last sought and succeeded in obtaining an interview, and Arabella, overcome by his prayers and entreaties, seconded as they were by the pleadings of her own heart, consented to become his bride.

A few days then elapsed subsequent to the interview which had decided the destiny of Seymour and the Lady Arabella, when she was summoned to appear before the privy council. Her heart thrilled with a prophetic fear as she entered the presence of the King and his Ministers: but the blood mounted to her high brow, and then retreated from cheek and lip with indignation and mortified pride, as James addressed her with severity, informed her that he had become acquainted with her engagement with Seymour, and forbade the alliance on pain of his eternal displeasure, requiring her to promise implicit obedience to his commands.

The high spirit of her race revolted from submitting to a mandate so fatal to all her hopes of happiness, and that was imposed upon her so harshly and tyrannically. She was about to make a forcible appeal both to the justice and the feelings of the despotic monarch, when James, fearing she would remonstrate and shrinking from the reproachful eloquence of an injured woman, spoke again, and told her in the most unfeeling manner that Seymour had already relinquished all claims to her hand, and had consented to become the husband of a lovely and wealthy ward of the crown.

Arabella started as though an arrow had pierced her heart, but conquering instantly all outward signs of emotion, she assured the King, in a firm voice, of her entire submission to his will. Satisfied with her obedience, James dismissed her, and with a low obeisance she left the presence, and sought the solitude of her own apartment. There, with no human eye to mark her agony, she yielded to the violence of her feelings; her heart throbbed as though the suffering soul struggled to burst from its prison house, she gasped for breath, and the color varied in her cheek as rapidly as the bitter thoughts that contended in her breast.

To be separated for ever from one whom she so fondly loved, was misery unutterable, but to be slighted, abandoned, relinquished without a struggle by him, was worse, far worse to the proud heart of Arabella. Had he remained faithful to her, there would still have been a hope of future happiness, or at least, the consciousness of his fervent attachment to her would have been a source of proud yet tender consolation in her deep sorrow, but to have bestowed the whole wealth of her affection on one who loved her not, to have preferred above all her suitors, one who at the first mark of royal disapprobation could forsake her, and transfer his vows to another, was more than the high spirit could bear; love and pride were alike wounded, and almost stung to madness by her intense suffering, she felt in her bitter agony, a scorn as deep towards Seymour as a few short hours before she had felt a love for him.

"I see it all!" she exclaimed. "It was not Arabella Stuart, but the cousin of the King he loved.—And he told me he would expose himself to all the dangers an angry monarch could menace him with for my sake!—for my sake he would hold as nought the frowns of the world! And I—weak, trusting as I was, I believed him!—I confessed I loved him!—And now he will marry the wealthy and beautiful Lady Sybil—well: be it so—I wish him nought of evil—may he obtain and enjoy what alone he is capable of loving—gold and lands: I will drive him from my heart, my thoughts. I should scorn myself could I feel aught of affection for one so unworthy."

* * * * *

The banqueting saloon in Whitehall was filled with the gallant and the lovely of the Court of James the First. The brightest star of the brilliant galaxy was the Lady Arabella. Her eye sparkled with gayety, her cheek wore its richest bloom; smiles, so bright that they seemed to come from another world where care and sorrow were never known, played round her lips. Never had she appeared in higher spirits, never had her wit been more keen or more playful, never had she looked more lovely. Surrounded by a crowd of flatterers, young, beautiful, and fascinating, who would have deemed that beneath that gay demeanor was hidden an aching heart? Suddenly the rose left her cheek, and the smile faded from the sweet mouth, for her eye fell on Seymour, who was by the side of the fair Sybil, and apparently absorbed by his lovely companion. But it was for a moment only, the next she was gayer than before.

But wearied with the bitter task of assuming a character so little in unison with her true feelings, she availed herself of the first opportunity of withdrawing from the festal hall, and seating herself by the open window of an ante-chamber. She leaned her head on her small white hand, while the cool breeze breathed upon her burning brow and stilled its throbbings, as though it were some pitying spirit that fanned her with its wings, and sought with its sweet influence to calm the painful emotions that agitated her. She sat for a short time, lost in thought, when she was startled by hearing her name pronounced softly by her side, and, turning her head, she beheld Seymour.

She arose hastily and was about leaving him, when he caught her hand.

"Arabella," exclaimed he, "surely thou would'st not leave me, when surrounded as we are by watchful eyes, it is so difficult, may almost impossible to speak with thee? Can it be that thou art so willing to submit to the commands of the king? Hast thou indeed ceased to love me?!"

"It is scarcely befitting thee to reproach me," answered she bitterly, "when thou thyself hast shown me so good an example of obedience to a monarch's will."

"And hast thou indeed, so wronged me," replied he reproachfully, "could'st thou believe for a moment that William Seymour would break his plighted troth to thee, and wed another? Thou can'st not love me, or thou would'st not deem me so base."

"But the king told me thou had'st consented to espouse the Lady Sybil, and I did I not see thee by her side this very night, gazing upon her as though she was the star that ruled thy destiny?" demanded Arabella.

"Listen to me, Arabella," said Seymour. "When summoned before the king and council, an I questioned concerning my love for thee and our engagement, of which the king had been previously informed, how I know not, I confessed both, and besought his majesty to consent to our union. But he reprimanded me severely for seeking to ally myself with a member of the royal family, and bade me think no more of thee. In vain did I plead to have the sentence withdrawn; he was inexorable, and fearing to exasperate him, I deemed it best to promise obedience. The king then told me that as a reward for my submission, he would bestow on me the hand of the Lady Sybil; to have refused would have caused him to suspect my true intentions, and I therefore accepted his majesty's offer, but believe me, dearest Arabella, never for a moment did I dream of being false to thee."

Arabella's eyes filled with tears, but they were tears of joy.

"I do believe thee," murmured she.

"And now, my only love, as a proof that thou dost indeed no longer doubt me," said Seymour, "thou must grant my bequest. Will thou become my wife, and fly with me to France?" She hesitated. "It is our only hope of happiness," urged he. "The king, I fear, notwithstanding my apparent submission, still suspects me; it is in his power to separate us forever, and nothing can ever induce him to grant me thy hand. Be my bride then, and let us seek in another land an asylum against his cruelty and tyranny."

* * * * * * *

Before the altar of a small church stood Seymour and the Lady Arabella. The ceremony of marriage had just been performed, and Seymour, turning from the altar, drew the arm of his lovely bride within his own. "Now for France, my own Arabella," whispered he. As he spoke the door of the church opened, and an officer, followed by soldiers, entered. Arabella trembled violently and clung to her husband as the officer approached them, while a presentiment of evil almost paralyzed her. And her fears were but too soon verified.

The officer saluted the unfortunate lovers with courtesy, and informed them with evident regret, that it was his painful duty to arrest them.

"Of what crime are we accused?" demanded Seymour, while his bride, overcome by the terrors of their situation, was scarcely conscious of what was passing around her.

"Of disobedience to the commands of his majesty, and of contempt towards him in seeking to marry a lady of the royal family without his permission," replied the officer. "I have orders to place her ladyship under the care of Sir Thomas Parry, at Lambeth, and to conduct you to the Tower."

"Must we be separated then?" exclaimed Arabella, wildly. "The king cannot be so cruel! Oh! have pity on me, fair sir,—I am his wife, let me share his prison—let me seek to soften the horrors of an imprisonment to which he has been doomed through his love for me! Or arrest me alone, and let him escape—let the anger of the king fall on my head alone! Oh! be merciful, as thou dost hope for mercy! I will submit cheerfully to my fate, if he suffer not with me."

She clasped her hands in supplication, and fixed her streaming eyes on the officer, who, deeply affected, averted his head. Seymour endeavored to soothe her. "All will yet be well, dearest," said he; "believe me, the king will relent. Urge not this gentleman to disobey his orders. Surely thou can'st not think I would escape, even were it possible, without thee. Nay, weep not so bitterly, for my sake; we shall soon meet again."

"Never—never!" exclaimed the unhappy bride, "I feel it—I shall never see thee again." And exhausted by the violence of her emotions, she sank insensible into the arms of her husband.

* * * * * * *

The Lady Arabella was possessed of too much energy to submit to her fate without a struggle. When the feeling of utter hopelessness, caused at first by her arrest, had passed away, she wrote a most eloquent letter to the king, in which she pleaded her cause respectfully, but with dignity, appealing to his majesty's love of justice, and assuring him of her dutiful attachment for him. The king, as well as the prince and council, highly approved of her letter, but it produced no other effect upon him. She also wrote to Lady Jane Drummond, one of the ladies of the bedchamber, imploring her to induce the queen to interest herself in her favor. In this she was successful. Queen Anne, with a womanly sympathy, touched by her unhappy condition, used all her influence with James, but in vain; and the Lady Jane, in communicating the failure of the Queen's intercession, frankly told her that "the wisdom of this State, with the example how some of your quality in the like case has been used, makes me fear that ye shall not find so easy end to your troubles as ye expect or I wish."

But one hope now remained to the Lady Arabella, that of escape. The daughter of Sir Thomas Parry, a young and lovely girl, who felt the deepest commiseration for the beautiful prisoner, was betrothed to a young knight who had long been the friend of Seymour, and who was permitted occasionally to see him. Through the fair Mary and her lover, Arabella was enabled to correspond with her husband, and a plan of escape was arranged.

The day previous to the one on which it was to be put in execution, Arabella and her lovely friend were seated alone together. During the period of her imprisonment she had been alternately sanguine and desponding, cheerful and depressed. Now, as the decisive moment approached, she became highly excited, and was seized with a dread of failure, which the affectionate Mary endeavored in vain to overcome.

"Dost thou not believe in presentiments of coming joy or woe, Mary?" said Arabella; "can'st thou doubt the whisperings of the heart? There are times when it seemeth to me as though the spirit held mystic communion with the denizens of its far distant home, and as though in extremity of misery they sought to lighten its load of sorrow by inspiring it with prophetic hopes of a happier future, and when all is bright to prepare it for the approaching hour of desolation by those dim and shadowy forbodings that oppress us we know not wherefore. Ah! I see by that smile thou art sceptical, sweet one, and dost rather hold my fears to be phantoms conjured up by misfortune, and an imagination too easily excited."

Mary smiled, and was about replying, when Sir Thomas Parry entered the apartment. His brow was clouded, and his manner betokened that something painful had occurred.

"It is with the deepest regret that I am obliged to inform your ladyship," said he, "that his majesty having had cause to suspect that you had found means to communicate with Mr. Seymour, has decided upon confiding your ladyship to the care of the Bishop of Durham, whither he wishes you to depart as soon as it may be possible."

The Lady Arabella spoke not, moved not. She had arisen on the entrance of Sir Thomas, and stood, her eyes widely opened and fixed upon him, her lips slightly apart, and her face deadly pale. It seemed as though she were suddenly deprived of sense and motion. Mary flew to her side, and, leading her to a chair, endeavored to soothe her, but she did not seem to hear nor understand her; the sudden destruction of all her hopes had been more than her frame, exhausted by suffering, could endure.

Sir Thomas hastened to make known to James the alarming state of the unfortunate prisoner: the king, however, was determined that she should proceed to Durham immediately. The next morning she left Lambeth, travelling in a litter, and accompanied by a physician and the devoted Mary, in addition to her usual attendants. But she became worse so rapidly that they were obliged to stop at Highgate, and the physician returned to London to represent her royal cousin that she was unable to bear the fatigues of a journey, and to implore him to allow her to remain where she was until she was sufficiently recovered to travel with safety. It was with great difficulty that he succeeded in his mission; the selfish monarch finally granting her permission to stay at Highgate for a month.

The health of the unhappy Lady Arabella slowly improved, and she appeared to become by degrees resigned to her fate. But she was far otherwise in reality. Hope, which rarely deserts the young, pictured to her bright visions of future happiness, and her active imagination suggested the means of escape — Again she was assisted by the affectionate devotion and ready wit of Mary Parry and Sir Henry Clifford, her betrothed husband.

A few days previous to her intended departure for Durham, Arabella stood before the mirror in her apartment, attended by Mary. She was dressed in a costume of a courtier of the day, the long locks of a peruke concealed her own silken tresses, surmounted by a black hat, a cloak of the same color was flung over her shoulders, and a rapier hung by her side.

"Thou wouldst make a handsome gallant of the court, lady," said Mary, "but thou art so pale and faint, I fear me thou wilt never be able to reach thy place of destination."

"The firm heart will lend strength to the weak frame, Mary," answered Arabella. "The pure air, the blessed thought that I am free, that I am about to meet the husband I adore, will nerve me to sustain all the hardships I may be called upon to endure. But now, dearest girl, away, and see if it be possible for me to leave this prison house unperceived."

* * * * * * *

A short time afterwards two travellers approached a small inn, about a mile and a half distant from Highgate. The one was a handsome and intelligent-looking man of about twenty-five, who paid the utmost deference and attention to his companion, a pale but beautiful youth, who appeared almost overcome with fatigue, though he walked with the utmost rapidity of which his delicate frame was capable.

"Pray Heaven your ladyship may be able to endure the fatigue of riding to Blackwall," said Sir Henry Clifford, looking at the Lady Arabella anxiously. "Once there, and on board the boat that waits to bear you to Lee, you are safe."

"I could endure any fatigue inspired by the hope of seeing once more my husband," answered she; "but alas! I fear lest he be discovered in the attempt to escape, and if so, what is liberty to me? If it be decreed that both may not escape, I would rather, oh! a thousand times rather, than he should enjoy the freedom of which his love for me has deprived him, and that I should linger out my life a hapless prisoner, victim to the injustice and cruelty of a heartless king."

They had now reached the inn, where horses awaited them, provided by the care of Sir Henry; she mounted with the utmost difficulty, but the exercise of riding, and the pure air, refreshed and invigorated her, and she was enabled to reach Blackwall before sunset.

At dawn of day, on the morning succeeding the flight of Arabella, a boat containing the fair fugitive and Sir Henry reached the side of a goodly vessel, anchored near Lee. The captain received his fair passenger, as with the strength inspired by excitement, she sprang on board. She looked around eagerly, then turning to the captain, she asked, in a voice tremulous with agitation, if Seymour had arrived.

"Not yet, madam," was the reply.

A sudden paleness overspread the face of Arabella, on which the sea breeze had called up a faint bloom. She looked despairingly at Clifford.

"All is lost," she exclaimed; "it is as I feared!—But, perhaps," she added, hope again rising in her breast, "perhaps he may have been merely detained—he may be here anon. Oh! Clifford, say in pity that it may be so, thou who did'st so often assure me that it were almost impossible that a plan so well arranged as that for his escape should fail."

"I doubt not that he has escaped, lady," answered Sir Henry, "but permit me to entreat you to allow the captain to set sail immediately for France; your flight must be known to the king, ere now; his messengers are, perhaps, already seeking you, and should you linger here, to-morrow may see you again a prisoner."

"But he will surely be here, ere long," said the unhappy wife, "and should he come and find no ship to receive him, whither would he fly for safety?—Shall I abandon him to fall again into the hands of his enemies? Shall I, seeking only to retain my own liberty, doom him to an endless imprisonment?"

"But, lady," urged Clifford, "he may, perhaps, have been unable to reach Lee without danger of detection, and therefore have fled to some other port. If so, to remain here would but expose you to certain capture. Let me implore you, madam, to consent. Think of his agony, his hopeless misery, at finding that your love for him had been the means of reconducting you to a prison, and be assured that once more in the power of James, never again will you enjoy one hour of freedom. Nay, should your ladyship still refuse, I shall be obliged, painful as it will be to oppose your wishes, to take upon myself the responsibility of ordering the captain to set sail."

In vain did Arabella plead even for one short hour's delay. Clifford, aware that the danger increased every moment, was inexorable, and the captain, obedient to his commands, hoisted sail.

And where was Seymour? He had indeed escaped from the Tower, though unable to do so at the time appointed. Disguised in the coarest habiliments, a flaxen peruke covering his dark hair, and his face dyed and disfigured in the most artful manner he succeeded in passing the warders unsuspected. At the wharf he found a confidential servant waiting with a boat, and they immediately started for Lee. On arriving there he descried a vessel in the distance, which he fondly imagined to be the one that bore his Arabella. Overjoyed at the prospect of rejoining his beloved bride, he hired a fisherman to take him on board, but his bitter disappointment and despair when he found it was not the vessel he sought, almost deprived him of reason. But feeling that all attempts to discover the ship that contained the Lady Arabella would be useless, and inspired by the hope of meeting her on the continent, he induced the captain, by the offer of a large sum of money, to take him to Flanders.

The escape of Arabella and her husband filled the king and his cabinet with consternation. A vigorous pursuit was instantly commenced; couriers were despatched in all directions, and every measure taken to recapture the unfortunate pair. Meanwhile the Lady Arabella, tortured by the agonizing uncertainty in which the fate of Seymour was enshrouded, and haunted by a fearful foreboding that she would never see him again, sank into a state of deep despondency, only varied at times by paroxysms of grief and despair so violent that her attendants trembled for her reason. It was in vain they endeavored to soothe her, to speak to her of hope.

"There is no hope for me," she would reply, "save that which points to Heaven."

She was seated in her cabin, her hands clasped, her eyes tearless, but beaming wildly, fixed upon the floor, while her thoughts were far away, bent on Seymour, when the captain entered and informed her that a vessel had appeared which was evidently in pursuit of them.

"Ah!" exclaimed she, starting, "perhaps it contains Seymour."

"Alas! madam," answered he, "I have reason to suspect it is one of the king's ships, and, if so, I fear your ladyship's sufferings are not yet over, for it gains upon us rapidly."

"Be it so," said Arabella, "liberty and durance are alike to me, since I am separated from my husband."

The captain was but too correct in his surmises. It was indeed one of the king's ships in pursuit of the fugitives, and in a few hours the unhappy Arabella was again a prisoner.

* * * * * *

For four long years did the Lady Arabella languish in hopeless confinement, when death released the unhappy victim of the heartless cruelty and timid policy of James the First, but not until the glorious mind, the sound judgment, the ready wit, were wrecked by the storms of suffering, through which she had passed. Such was the fate of one of the best and loveliest of her race, one whose gentle virtues, warm heart, and brilliant intellect would have adorned a cottage or a throne, and would have spread happiness around the domestic circle, or diffused it over a nation.

Seymour arrived at Flanders in safety. He was recalled, and created Marquis of Hartford by Charles the First, and Duke of Somerset by Charles the Second. But—rank and honors could never lighten his heart of its load of sorrow, or make him forget or cease to love the beautiful and unfortunate Arabella Stuart.

ALICE.

THE SISTER'S HOPE.

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

Chapter I.

"Stranger, will you be kind enough to give me assistance?"

The speaker was a young man, with an athletic looking frame, but with a sallow face, sunken eyes, and bloodless lips. Disease seemed to be even then fearfully working upon him, for he tottered forward as he spoke, scarce able to retain an upright position. The person addressed was also a young man, and indeed appeared hardly a proper object to claim charity of—for his habiliments, though of fashionable cut, and adjusted about his person with nicety, had that forlornly thread-bare cast, which speaks the wearer a gentleman whom "better times" have forsaken. But the kindly melancholy of his full eye, and the proud firmness of his step, probably induced the sickly youth to suppose that so much dignity of mien was supported by something more substantial than the mere consciousness of moral worth, and that there was, under the faded vest, a full purse, as well as, what the eye intimated, a full heart.

"I am not a beggar," continued the young invalid as the other paused and eyed him hesitatingly—"That is—yes, I'm a begger now—but I mean I'm not used to begging. I am a stranger here—I came to the city to look for work, but I havn't found any I'm sick and famishing."

"How long have you been here?"

"Nearly a week. I gave my last shilling for lodgings night before last, and last night they turned me away because I had no money."

"And where did you go?"

"I went to the outskirts, where I climbed over a fence and slept in a grave-yard."

Poor youth!—he little thought how very soon he would take permanent lodgings in the same place.

"Well," said the interrogator, "it is bad enough to want, I know by experience; but, thank God! I have not disease to contend with, too. Here," he continued, having, after some search in the pocket of his faded vest, succeeded in "cornering" its solitary tenant—a piece of silver—"take this: I have a little left, but I suppose I have a prospect for more, which you have not."

The sick youth received it in silence, with tearful eyes. As he was not accustomed to asking alms, he had no set phrases in which to speak his thanks—he looked them. Just then a dark-visaged, malicious-looking man, who had, unobserved, been a spectator of the scene, laid his hand upon the alms-giver's shoulder, and said—

"A prospect for more—eh? Then I shall get my fifteen hundred?—I must have my own, you know; every man gets his own when he can—eh? Ha! ha!"

Had the new comer been one of those terrors of unfortunate debtors, a bailiff himself, armed with stick and writ, the young man could not have recoiled more suddenly from his familiar tap.

"Fiend!—villain!" he exclaimed, "is there no corner of the earth where I may escape your persecutions—is there no spot sacred from your infernal footsteps? Leave me, or you shall rue it!"

"Do you hear that," said the dark-visaged man, turning to the beggar youth. "He threatens me with violence, because I ask him to pay a debt."

"You lie!" cried the young man; "it is not money you want of me. You know if I had any you should have it. If you want my very life-blood, you shall have it, if," here his tones sunk into something like supplication; "if you will only spare my—my"——

"Come," said the man, "you are a fool to rave so in the street. I do not ask of you more than you can perform—we can settle it amicably if you will. Let us go to your lodgings and arrange it there."

"No! By heavens! you have driven me to desperation. If you follow me another step, your blood be upon your own head—you die!"

Uttering these words with the calmness of resolute despair, the young man drew a pistol. While he was in the act of cocking it, the man grappled him by the throat. The beggar, weak and enfeebled as he was, ran to the assistance of his benefactor, and during the scuffle which ensued, the pistol was discharged, and the contents entering his breast, he fell to the ground. This caused an immediate cessation of the fray. A crowd collecting, the fallen youth was raised—but his earthly troubles were at an end, he was a corpse. A few minutes after, some of the police entered the scene of action, and seized the young man.

"Release me," said he; "there is the murderer—it was Hurston who fired."

"The young man is the murderer," said a bystander, "I was upon the opposite side of the street, and saw him draw the pistol."

"It was the young man," responded several others, and he was led off, in custody, from where the scene transpired, (a narrow street in the Southwark district of Philadelphia,) to a Magistrate's Office. Here he underwent an examination, in which the evidence so entirely established upon him the charge of murder, as to justify his immediate commitment to prison. He attempted to say something in his own defence, but the corpulent Justice had learned too much of human nature in the course of his profession, to pay any regard to the protestations of the accused party. He looked upon the avowal of innocence by a criminal, as a natural principle, as inherent and intuitive, as the love of life.

"Did you say your name was Joseph A?" asked the Magistrate.

"His name is Joseph E. Leighton," replied the dark-visaged man, whom the youth had called Hurston, and who was one of the most eager to criminate him.

While the warrant for committal was being made out, a gentleman of the Bar entered the office, with whom the Justice exchanged salutations.

"Ah! Elsley," said the latter, "you are just in time: here is a young man who will need counsel. His case will not be a profitable one," he added in a lower tone; "but it will be a difficult and interesting one, which is just what you, as a beginner, want." He then detailed the particulars of the case as he had gathered them from the witnesses present.

When he had finished, the lawyer approached the young criminal, who was standing apart, his head proudly erect, his arms folded, his lip scornfully compressed, and his eyes wandering over the placards upon the opposite wall, without seeing them, however, for his mind was absent. As they stood a moment confronting each other in silence, the two figures presented a contrast not unworthy of notice. The lawyer seemed to wear the unfurrowed brow of five or six and twenty. His form was tall, graceful, and of manly proportion. Without asperity, his features were sufficiently marked to denote an energetic mind, and his florid complexion, light brown hair, and blue eyes, evidenced a decided predominence of the sanguine in his temperament; while his countenance exhibited that generous, friendly-with-all openness, which speaks no hypocritical concealment of the real sentiments of the heart. Neither was dignity wanting in the blending of the features, but it was of that softened kind, rather calculated to persuade or carelessly exact, than command, respect. Altogether, he was what we may call a fair model of manly beauty.

The criminal was several years younger—perhaps scarce twenty-one; yet his face bore the traces of deep and harrowing thought, and there was more of intellectual expressiveness in it, than in that of the former. His inferiority in point of stature, was manifest enough, but then there was a hauteur in the attitude, that checked a too familiar approach to him. His features were more angular in their developments, and their color slightly bronzed. The forehead was massive, and shadowed with dark locks. But the expression of the eye was peculiarly earnest. It was large and beamed with what has so often been called a subdued light—the fire of genius partially dimmed by care.

The throes of a weak mind, when harassed and struggling with difficulties, impart to the countenance a sickened expression of discontent and cowardly anguish, that we look upon with pain—sometimes with contempt. The powerful mind veils this outward expression of the suffering within; or if it is racked and tortured into any manifestation, it is merely a prouder compression of the lip, or a barely perceptible contraction of the brow. But there is one indication of the long continued agony of a strong mind, that it cannot conceal, because it is not like the other expressions of the face, at control of the will. It is the fading of the fire of the eye, from its flashing brightness, to saddened earnestness, giving to the features a melancholy that is eloquent of grief. Such was the expression of Leighton's eye—and it at once excited the sympathy of the young lawyer.

A moment's scrutiny of each other seemed to have resulted to their mutual satisfaction, for they simultaneously extended their hands, as if they had read enough, in that single moment's glance, of each other's feelings, to make them perfectly acquainted.

"From what I can learn," said Elsley, "you are a stranger here, an orphan, without friends and without means. From your face, which favorably impresses me, I am inclined to think that the provocation must have been great which could have impelled you into this rash and unfortunate difficulty. You will need counsel—my services are freely at your command."

"I accept your generous offer," replied Leighton, drawing the other aside, so as to be beyond the hearing of the dark-visaged Hurston, whose sinister gaze was fixed upon him; "not that I am concerned for my own fate—but I have a sister, whom yon fiend has marked for his prey. And now that I, her only protector, am effectually in his net, he may drive her to her—her—grave; I fear no more. But there is that in your face which has won my confidence. You will—will—"

The powerful emotion which choked the utterance of the speaker, wrought upon the susceptible feelings of the young lawyer with strange effect.

"I will protect her for you," said he, speaking through his clenched teeth, "and baffle your persecutor, if it cost me my life!"

Leighton's emotion still prevented his words, but he seized Elsley's hand with a convulsive grasp, and tears, the first that had for years been wrung from his proud heart, fell from his eyes. He soon mastered his feelings, however, and assuming a degree of calmness, the conference between himself and the generous Elsley continued for some minutes longer, after which he was conveyed away to prison.

It was now sometime after candle-light—the unfortunate affray having occurred between three and four o'clock in the afternoon of an October day of the year 18—.

Chapter II.

In a small, poorly furnished room, in a narrow house, in a narrow street, in Southwark, with a small Bible in her hand, which she had been perusing by the ghastly light of a tin lamp, that, throwing its unsteady glare over the table on which it stood, revealed the nicely arranged but scanty materials for an evening meal, sat the sister. There was a restlessness in her glance, and a nervousness in the listening start, which every sound from the street occasioned, that betrayed her deep solicitude at her brother's unusually prolonged absence. The worthy, poor old Methodist couple, with whom they boarded, had gone to meeting, and left her alone to wait her brother's return, and serve him with his tea. As minute on minute after the usual hour passed, and footstep after footstep in the narrow street, fell upon her ear, cheating her into the hope that it was he, and then died away again, leaving her to silence and disappointment, she became more and more anxiously alarmed. But that the character of her solicitude may be more fully understood, we must go back to some time before the date at which this narrative has been commenced.

Joseph and Isabella Leighton had been the children of a respectable but poor couple in the town of ——, in the western part of Pennsylvania. Both had received a more excellent education than would be thought consistent with the humble means of the parents; nay, the latter even had denied themselves many of the actual necessaries of life, to secure to the son that scholastic knowledge, and to the daughter those elegant accomplishments, which they imagined would constitute the success and happiness of their after life. In consequence of this self-denial, the father became a prey to disease, and was at length incapacitated to provide for his family. In this exigency young Leighton put his shoulder to the wheel, and was thenceforth their sole dependence. Industrious and talented, he was received as a clerk into the employment of Hurston, a wealthy merchant, a bachelor of thirty-five, a heartless libertine, a wary schemer, and a deliberate villain; but so good a dissembler, that, among the upright of the citizens of his town, he bore a fair reputation.

Hurston saw the sister of his clerk—her form, bursting into womanhood, in the glory of seventeen, displaying the grace and symmetry of a Venus de Medici, her face the embodiment of all that beauty can express, her voice soft, sweet and rich, and her low musical laugh floating to the ear like the thrilling melody in a joyous dream—these fired his sensual soul, and with the remorselessness of a demon he resolved upon her ruin. He knew enough of the brother's spirit to fear that he would prove rather a formidable barrier to his base design, and, therefore, his first step was to ensnare him. Circumstances were but too favorable to his project. The parents of the clerk died within a short period of each other, the father leaving some little debts unsettled, which the son felt himself bound in honor to discharge. His employer generously offered to advance him the money, and he, with a breast full of hopes, and unsuspicious of wrong, gratefully accepted it. Not satisfied with the control over the mind of the youth which the obligation of a debt of fifteen hundred dollars gave him, Hurston sought to involve him in secret crime, and for that purpose employed accomplices to decoy him to the club-house, and the gaming-table; but his principles proved too pure and firm for their connivances. Though not to be seduced into crime, he was, however, implicated in it by stratagem.—Hurston was aware of the fact that Leighton, being an excellent penman, could counterfeit almost any chirography, and accordingly set on foot the following plan:—His head clerk, who was his reckless tool, bantered the young man to a trial of skill in penmanship, which was readily accepted, and among other "flourishes," they tried their hands at imitating the signatures of various letters which lay upon the desk. At length Leighton incautiously executed Hurston's signature alone, upon a second sheet of paper, which the wily head clerk had laid before him after the first one was filled. The latter then took the pen and coolly drew above the signature a draft upon one of the banks of the place, for a large sum, and folding it up, said he would "make a raise." Leighton did not suspect for a moment but that the remark was jocosely made. What was his surprise, when a few days after, Hurston, in a private audience, charged him with forgery, and produced the draft with the signature before mentioned, which bore evidence of having passed through the bank. Leighton declared his innocence, and stated the facts of the case, which Hurston affected to disbelieve. He gave the youth to understand how completely it was now in his power to send him at any moment to the penitentiary, but his youth, and other considerations, would induce him to hush the affair into oblivion, in return for which leniency, he hinted it would become the young man to show his gratitude when a proper occasion should arrive. Inexperienced, and ignorant of the deep villainies of the world, Leighton saw in all this only that his indiscretion had involved him in a peril, from which, as there was no possibility of proving his innocence, the only chance to escape was to submit quietly to his employer's dictate, and trust to Providence. But when, after a time, the design of Hurston became revealed to him, in all its hideousness, he beheld the snare in which he had been taken; and although his situation was helpless, almost hopeless, his soul did not shrink. He nobly dared to defy the libertine, and guard his sister's honor at the risk of every thing. The latter, though, was not to be driven from the pursuit. He, in turn, threatened the young clerk with prosecution for debt and the crime of forgery, and tried to allure him by bribes of wealth; but Leighton met his arts with such bitterness of scorn, and hurled such anathemas of honest indignation upon his dastard soul, that once, maddened to ecstacy, he drew a pistol and aimed it at the brave youth's heart. It missed fire, and he did not make a second attempt. To be provided against another such attempt upon his life, Leighton henceforth carried weapons about his person.

Things approached a crisis. Leighton saw the cloud ready to burst upon him. The horrors of a criminal's cell in the state prison, and his sister—the only tie that a hard fate had left to brighten his miserable life—defenceless and helpless at the mercy of the fiend—this was the vision that appalled him. He saw but one faint hope—flight! He soon resolved, and though he had but little money, he left his native place, and, with his sister, was soon quietly domiciled in the house of a poor Methodist couple, in one of the most obscure portions of the good city of brotherly love. Here, at least, he thought he had found an asylum for his sister, secret from the intrusion of the libertine, even should he trace them to the city; and with a relieved heart he set himself about the search for employment. He was indulging his imagination with a fore-taste of the bright prospect which the future presented when the fatal encounter, described in the preceding chapter, took place.—Armed with a double incentive—unholy passion for the sister, and deep-rooted hatred for the brother—the archfoe had tracked them—and now, with the brother safely immured, and his doom inevitable, all that remained was to find the sister, and consummate the triumph.

To return—we left Isabella Leighton listening, with the quick ear of alarmed affection, for her brother's returning step. Two hours passed, and still she was alone. Her apprehensions had increased almost to distraction, a vague feeling of despair crept chillingly to her heart, and a tear fell from the silken eye-lash upon the pale cheek. The old couple returned from their meeting and retired to their rest, and still she watched. The sonorous voice of the watchman, broke the stillness that reigned in the street—"past ten o'clock" swelled upon the air, and died away in melancholy echoes along the narrow avenue, and silence reigned again. In a few moments more the stillness of the street was again broken by the rattling of the wheels of a solitary vehicle—it stopped before the house; footsteps were heard upon the pavement, then in ascending the steps, and then came a slight rap at the door. While she hesitated, between doubt and hope, the rap was repeated. Summoning her resolution, she approached the door and opened it. She started back, as the form and face of a stranger met her gaze.

"Do I see Miss Leighton?" said the stranger, in a respectful tone, that disarmed the alarm that the first sight of himself had occasioned.

"You do, sir," she answered timidly.

"I bear a message from your brother," said Elsley, entering the room. He was followed by an old gentleman, with a round face, and eyes that twinkled with merry benevolence beneath the wide brim of his hat, which, with the broad skirts and straight collar of his drab cloth coat, denoted him to be of the persuasion of Friends. Hanging to this old gentleman's arm, was a young lady, apparently of Miss Leighton's own age, who, although not strikingly beautiful, was pretty. Elsley handed Isabella a billet from her brother, which she opened with trembling hands, and read with a throbbing heart and blanched cheek. When she had finished, she raised her hand to her eyes, and her breast heaved with the momentary struggle. Then uncovering her eyes, they shone with the mildness of calm resignation, as she said—

"Heaven's will be done!"

Turning to the young lawyer, she continued, "My brother speaks of you, Mr. Elsley, as a generous stranger friend, upon whose sincerity, he thinks, I may rely. I will gratefully regard any suggestions you may make, and God will bless you for your kindness."

There were respect and admiration mingled in Elsley's manner as he replied, "Then allow me to introduce to you my excellent friend, Mr. Kirby, and Miss Kirby, his daughter."

Isabella returned the old gentleman's inclination of the head, and, with a graceful movement, seized the cordially extended hand of the daughter. Their fair hands lingered in gentle pressure, while Elsley continued—

"My friend, on hearing your brother's unfortunate situation, became interested in your troubles, and has come to offer you the protection of his roof, until your brother is liberated, which I trust, as I believe him innocent, will not be long."

The gush of grateful emotion that agitated the poor girl's breast found vent in tears. Extending her other hand to the old man, and pressing Miss Kirby's to her heart, she sobbed—

"Oh, you are kind, very kind! I do not know how to express my gratitude; but I feel as if God had sent angels to comfort me."

This simple language of her feelings, so affected the benevolent Quaker, that the great cuff of his coat sleeve was called in requisition to clear away the mist that gathered in his eye.

"As thee is not safe here from thine enemy, deprived of thy brother's protection, perhaps thee had better go with us at once," said he.

The girl weighed the proposition thoughtfully for a moment, and then replied—

"I will go consult the kind old persons with whom we lodge." But as she turned to leave the room for that purpose her eyes, through the street door, which had been left ajar, fell upon the dark visage of Hurston, who stood upon the steps watching the scene.—The vision was so startling that, with a shriek, she fell senseless upon the floor. Of the others, Miss Kirby, only, beheld the piercing eyes which flashed, with terrible brightness, beneath his lowered brow, ere the libertine disappeared.

The old people of the house, alarmed by the shriek, now rushed into the room. They had no cordial, no stimulants, or other nostrum, to restore the insensible girl, and Elsley, bidding them call at No. —— Arch street on the morrow for an explanation of this, to them inexplicable mystery, raised the insensible Isabella in his arms, and the Quaker and his daughter following him to the coach, the party drove off.

Chapter III.

"What are you thinking of, dear Bell?" said Miss Kirby to Isabella Leighton, as she entered the boudoir one evening, about a week after the domiciliation of the latter into the abode of the benevolent old Quaker, and found her sitting pensively upon the sofa "And there is a tear drop in your eye—you have been weeping. You should not be so unhappy," she continued, throwing her arms affectionately around her neck, and kissing her lovely cheek.

"Oh, no; I am very happy. You may think me a strange girl; but there is more of pleasure than of pain in these tears. I was thinking of you and your kind father and Mr. Elsley. They are so unlike the selfish world, and it seems strange that they should take so much interest in the welfare of my poor brother."

"I do not think it strange, if he is like you," replied the artless girl. "I'm sure I loved you the first time I saw you, and you become dearer to me every day—you are so gentle, and so beautiful, and so good."

"Ah, you talk like a little man, my sweet Alice. If you were one, you would be a sad flatterer," replied Isabella, kissing the lips which had betrayed the simplicity of a guileless heart. "But where are your books, we must have a lesson in French, as it will not do for your instructress to forget her duty, and allow you to waste your time."

"True," replied Alice; "we were to have had the French at five o'clock, and it is near six already." And she left the boudoir in search of her books.

Jonathan Kirby was a Quaker gentleman of the olden time. And Quaker gentlemen of the olden time essentially differ from those of the present generation. Time, that has wrought such sad changes in all other institutions, does not appear to be more partial to the worthy Society of Friends; for of late the gaieties of fashion and the pleasures of the world have made great innovations upon the plain costume and sedate habits of the sober peace-lovers. They are gradually mingling in the world, and a few generations hence there will scarcely be a vestige of their primitive customs left to distinguish them from any other denomination. Jonathan Kirby was of the old school, and held tenaciously to the forms of dress and conduct characteristic of the earlier members of the persuasion. He did not, however, on this account impose any restrictions upon the inclinations of his only daughter, who, as he was wealthy, moved in the most fashionable circle of city society. In consequence, Miss Alice became imbued with all the fashionable notions of the age, and must needs acquire all the accomplishments requisite in the character of a modern belle. She was already perfect in music, drawing, dancing, and various other elegancies; and the only thing wanting to constitute her a young lady of finished education was a knowledge of the French language which, by some awkward neglect, had been omitted in the catalogue of her boarding-school studies.

She was just upon the look-out for a private tutor, to supply this deficiency in her education, when Miss Leighton, as we have seen, through the disinterested and generous interest of Elsley, (who was a distant relation,) was introduced into the family. It was accidentally discovered, upon the first day of her sojourn in her new abode, that she understood French. The old gentleman, not lacking in knowledge of human nature, quickly discerned that her situation of entire dependence upon his charity, would prove painful to her sensitive mind—and, to remove the humiliating sense of obligation on her part, proposed that in return for his protection, she should undertake the post of instructress to the young lady—a proposition she gladly accepted and cheerfully carried into execution. She had only been a week with her new friends, and yet the sweetness of her disposition, her intelligence, and beauty, had so won upon the hearts of the worthy Friend and his wife, that they were already almost as much attached to the orphan stranger as if she were their own child, and no sister could have lavished upon her a more sincere affection, than did Miss Kirby. Thus there was every thing to render the orphan sister as happy as possible under the circumstances—but her mind was not tranquil, nor could it be, while there was before it the thought of her loved brother, followed, persecuted, dragged down into the wretchedness of a dungeon, and perhaps awaiting a felon's doom—and all for her sake.

The French task finished, the young ladies were summoned to the tea-table, from whence they afterwards adjourned to the parlour. Here they had not been long before Elsley was announced. The young lawyer was, by his personal attractions, and lively conversational powers, peculiarly fitted to grace a drawing room. It is a sad fact, that few who shine there ever shine elsewhere, but he was an exception. It has been shown that he possessed sterling qualities of the heart, and if he was not naturally endowed with one of those uncommon intellects we style Herculean, his memory deserves to be so much the more honoured, that by dint of indefatigable attention to his profession, he in after years arose to be one of the most distinguished ornaments of the Philadelphia bar.

In the course of the evening Elsley requested Miss Leighton to sing. Although she felt reluctant, it was sufficient that he expressed a wish to hear her, and without any apologetic affectation, she seated herself at the piano. As he left the choice of the piece to herself, she selected that melancholy song, "Hours they were." She performed it exquisitely, throwing into it the soul and life of music, real feeling; and once or twice, when she timidly raised her eyes, Elsley observed them filled with tears. He listened to it delighted, breathless—every tone of her rich voice thrilled to his heart. When she had finished, he feared to insult her feelings by a compliment, which, however delicately he might have delivered it, must have sounded idle—he therefore expressed his sentiments in a glance.

If Isabella had not been wholly unsophisticated she would have discovered from his looks, and words, and actions, before he withdrew that evening, that she had made a deep impression upon his heart. But nothing was further from her thoughts than the idea of love. That he was in love, though, was palpable enough to his cousin Alice, and to his own mind.

Physiologists affirm that it is impossible, or highly improbable, (which is next thing to it,) that men, in whom there is a great preponderance of the sanguine temperament, should be otherwise than inconstant, fickle, and ever changing in their affections—often escaping from beauty's chains when she thinks them most secure. Elsley's temperament was decidedly sanguine, and therefore there can be but little confidence placed in his sudden passion for the orphan sister. But, we will see.

The rays of the setting sun beamed through the grated window, lighting up every corner of the narrow cell, and revealing all its wretched cheerlessness. The brother had sought the remotest corner, as if he desired to avoid the light which mocked the place with its cheerful gleams, and was sitting with folded arms and downcast eyes. But his spirit was away beyond those prison bars, in the bright walks of the imagination—not even the vapours of a dungeon can suppress the dreams of hope that awake in a youthful breast. The lonely cell, with its rusty bars, its gloomy walls, and its loathsome atmosphere, had vanished, and luxury and splendor were usurpers of their place. "Perfumed lights," that were reflected back from costly magnificence, and the music of his sister's glad voice floated through the scene. The vision was broken—the prison door creaked upon its rusty hinges—he raised his eyes, and the malignant features of the tormentor of his peace, were before him.

"Stole through the mist of alabaster lamps,"

"Ha! are you here?" he exclaimed; "is not even the loneliness of my prison sacred from the intrusion of the fiend?"

"The foot that leaves a golden mark may intrude where it lists," replied Hurston, calmly; "but I come to do you a service. You know the value of gold—will you try its power?"

"Tempter, I despise you!" responded Leighton, elevating his form, and eyeing the debauchee with unmingled contempt.

"Ho, you are rash. Gold and liberty! Think again! I can give you both. Shall I name the conditions?"

"Keep your gold for those who are willing to sell their souls for it—you know me well enough. Do you speak to me of conditions? I demand of you my liberty, for it is in your power. Beware how you refuse—justice will overtake the guilty!"

"Ha, ha! Vain fool! Do you think to frighten me as you would a woman, with silly words. But I have offered you fair—you perish by your own choice." So saying he left the cell.

For a while Leighton paced the narrow apartment, and endeavoured to calm the agitation of his mind. Hurston's presence had irritated him. His misery was sufficiently bitter before, but to be taunted and insulted there in his lonely cell, by the author of it, was too much for his stoicism to endure. While he brooded upon his resentment, the prison door creaked again upon its hinges, and Elsley entered.

"You are excited!"

"Hurston has been here to tantalize me," replied Leighton.

"I guessed as much," returned the young lawyer; "I met him at the door, and exchanged a scowling salutation with him. He bears me, doubtless, but little good will for my officiousness in the case. But no matter. I have nothing to fear from him—his time is measured."

"Ha?" exclaimed Leighton, his eyes brightening in anticipation of the good tidings of which the last sentence seemed to be the forerunner.

"Did you not observe the dullness of his sunken eye, and the ghastliness of his features. Debauchery, disease, and the excess of his passions, have struck their fangs deep into his vitals—the mark of death is upon him."

Leighton was silent, for although he had good reason to exult in this annunciation of the fate impending his pursuer, his heart was not of the mould to take pleasure in the destruction even of his foe. After some moments of thought, he enquired—

"What encouragement does my case afford?"

"As yet, none," replied Elsley; "but we must not despond—we have that sentiment of Halleck to cheer us,—

"'Truth crush'd to earth will rise again.'

I shall be upon the alert, and not relax my vigilance. We have time enough;—the day for your trial is somewhat distant."

"Ah, my friend, what do I not owe you, for all your generous exertions! I shall never be able to express my gratitude."

"Tut! talk no more of gratitude," returned Elsley; "I shall doubtless be repaid. Men of our profession, you know, seldom waste their abilities without some prospect of a fee. But I have a pressing engagement; keep your spirits. Adieu."

The meaning manner in which Elsley had alluded to a fee, left the prisoner somewhat puzzled; but the half-formed suspicion that he was playing him false, and that his professions were as hollow and insincere as those of the world generally, he soon dismissed, with anger at himself for having an instant entertained the thought. And truly he might, for the love of his own sister was hardly purer than the disinterested friendship of the young lawyer.

Chapter IV.

The trial at length came on. It did not occupy many days, for the testimony in the case was brief. Several witnesses stated that they had seen the prisoner in altercation with Hurston—that he drew a pistol, pointed it at Hurston, and that while in the act of cocking it, the latter had closed with him—that the deceased beggar youth had approached the combatants, apparently with the intention of taking part in the affray, when the pistol was fired, and he fell. The pistol was afterwards picked up at the spot of the occurrence, but none of the witnesses, except Hurston himself, were able to testify positively as to whether it was in the hands of the prisoner at the moment of its being fired. The prisoner's counsel (consisting of Elsley and two other gentlemen of legal merit) were able to produce no testimony for the defence, and consequently were compelled to trust to their own ingenuity. The only course that the nature of the case allowed them, was to invalidate or set aside Hurston's testimony, and create a doubt as to which of the combatants fired the pistol. Although, from the fact that Leighton drew it, the presumption would have been strong against him, yet had previous circumstances been brought forward, something might have been effected by the eloquence of the defence. But Leighton's pride revolted at the idea of having his sister's name dragged before a gaping public, and he had exacted from Elsley a promise that it should not be done. And, indeed, the young lawyer's own feelings now made it a point of so much delicacy with him, that he was easily persuaded to yield to the brother's wishes. Thus they were left without a single hope of being able to establish a successful plea.

Upon the third day from the commencement of the trial, the jury, after only an hour's absence from the court-room, returned a verdict against the prisoner of "guilty of manslaughter," and he was remanded back to prison, to await the sentence of the law.

That evening, the sister sought the solitude of her chamber, to indulge her grief. Tears afforded no relief to her bursting heart, and she turned to her Bible, that never-failing source of consolation to the sorrowing Christian. She had scarce opened it, when she was startled by a footstep at her side, and, looking up, beheld the haggard and death-like features of Hurston. She sprang up, and would have screamed for help, but he seized her arm, and, half-drawing a dagger from beneath his vest, warned her that her first cry would be her last.

"Oh!" cried the terrified girl, sinking upon her knees at his feet, "wretch, as you are, have mercy!"

"Rise!" he replied, "and calm yourself. I am not here, this time, for violence. But hear me! Your charms have fired me to desperation—I cannot exist without you. If you are willing to forget the past, I can make amends for it. I can free your brother, and place him in the road to fortune. I can give you a home, with all the splendour wealth commands, to gratify your woman's vanity—and I now make you a tender of honorable marriage."

"I scorn your wealth, and so would my injured brother," replied Isabella, her eye brightening at the insult.

"Listen more calmly," continued Hurston. "Your brother may scorn wealth, but do you think he will scorn liberty and an honest reputation? You forget that he is now a convicted murderer—that to-morrow he will be sentenced to the vile toil of a State Prison, from which, if he survive his term, he will issue a branded felon—a miserable outcast from society. I have the power to save him—say if I shall?"

He had touched the strongest chord in the sister's heart with a subtle hand. She was silent a moment, and then replied—

"It is impossible! A demon as well might ask me for my heart."

"I do not ask you for your heart, but a more trifling sacrifice. Do not reject my offer lightly. You know your brother's proud spirit; go to his cell, and see it broken. Look upon his glazed eye and his worn features; and when the term of his imprisonment expires, see him come forth, a withered wretch, with a bowed form and a head prematurely silvered with sorrow! See him encounter the scorn of the world, that will avoid him as a loathsome contamination! See him, in the agony of his broken heart, crawl aside, like a wounded reptile, to die!"

"Enough! Enough! I—I—"

"Speak!" urged the tempter. "His fate and your own depend upon the word—you have no other hope."

"I have a hope," exclaimed the tried sister, with sudden energy. "I have a hope—beyond the grave—which you, who are on its brink, have not."

He started, for at that moment the hand of disease was wrenching his vitals, and her words fell upon his ear like a prophetic warning.

"There you nor the world can assail us. Father of Mercies!" she continued, raising her eyes to Heaven, and clasping her hands, "I thank Thee that I have a hope!"

At this moment, footsteps were heard in the hall below, and the conscience-stricken debauchee precipitately left the room. How he could have entered the house, and escaped unseen by the servants who were moving about, was afterwards a matter of wonder. But desperate passion will dare every thing.

With a feverish brain, and sick at heart with brooding over the fate of his young client, and the grief of the gentle sister, Elsley pressed a sleepless couch. It was sometime past and he was vainly endeavoring to compose himself to slumber, when a servant knocked at his chamber door, and informed him that a dying man at the —— Hotel wished to see him immediately. Springing from bed, and dressing hastily, he issued forth. At the door of the hotel, he met the State's Attorney, Mr. ——, who had arrived upon a similar summons. They entered the room of the dying man together, and found a minister and a physician at the bedside—the former dispensing the comforts of his holy office, and the latter holding in his hand a pen and paper, as if he had been taking down the last words of his expiring patient.

"That hour, o' night's black arch the keystone,"

"Have they come? Have they come, at last?" said the dying libertine—for it was Hurston—and as they approached the bed he stretched out an emaciated hand to each. "I am going to my last account," he continued, "and I wish to make some reparation for the evil I have done, though I fear it is too late for my soul's salvation. I sent for you to hear my confession, that the innocent may not suffer for the guilty. Read it, Doctor, read it."

The Doctor read the confession he had taken down verbatim from Hurston's lips, and, when he had concluded, the latter resumed, addressing himself to the two lawyers.

"I want you to hear me declare, here in the presence of Almighty God, before whose awful bar I shall shortly stand, that this confession of my guilt is true, and that my own infernal passions urged me to it. It was I that murdered the beggar youth, as I hope God may forgive me for it. I wrested the pistol from Leighton's hand and deliberately did it to ensnare him, that I might the better accomplish my designs upon his helpless sister. I was defeated in that last object. The vengeance of Heaven has over taken me—I am trying to repent."

He ceased from exhaustion. A few moments afterwards he raised his head, as with an effort of returning life, and laying his hand upon his breast, said to the minister—

"I feel something like peace here, now. I feel—I think—I think I have that sister's hope."

"I pray God you have," replied the minister.

Hurston sank back upon his pillow—the unnatural brightness faded from his eye, and a blank expression of unconsciousness gathered over his features.—It was the lethargy of death. Ere the morning dawned the repentant libertine had drawn his last breath.

But little more remains to be told. Two years after a group was gathered around the hearth of Jonathan Kirby. The old Quaker's cheerful face showed that his age was "like to a lusty winter, frosty but kindly." His daughter, the artless and affectionate Alice, sat there beside her young husband, a prospering and respected merchant of the city of brotherly love. That husband was Leighton. And his sweet sister was there—she was a wife, too. Elsley had not wasted his professional abilities in the brother's behalf without the prospect of a fee—the sister's hand had paid it. It was a happy group.

MARRIED BY MISTAKE.

The steam was furiously whizzing from the safety valves of two fine boats that lay beside the wharf at Providence, crowded with passengers, and every moment taking more on board. The Spitfire and Rasp, (Captains Chace and Charcoal,) seemed like two huge monsters, impatient to display their fiery speed upon the race course of the Sound. The tongue of the bell had rung its last alarm, when a hot and hasty traveller, encumbered by a cloak and carpet bag, sprang from the wharf to the deck of the Spitfire, and in so doing, blundered against a gentleman who was standing near the gangway. The new comer, recoiling from the immoveable form of the other, trod on the gouty toe of an unhappy bull dog, who uttered a low growl, and rasped his muzzle against an adjacent trunk, signifying thereby that he had the will, if not the power to avenge an insult. The unlucky assailant sneaked blushingly away to deposit his burthen and secure a berth, while the proprietor of the bull dog drew himself up to his proudest height, toyed with a pink shirt collar, and muttered something like an imprecation, which was lost, however, in the folds of his cravat. The gentlemen who had thus come in contact both belonged to the genus cockney, as was evident from their dress and personal appearance. They both wore square cut green coats, garnished with brass buttons, and white felt hats, with very yellow gloves, and waistcoats, and there was a certain spruce grubness in their noses and a carroty tinge in their crooped locks that plainly told their origin. The principal differences between them consisted in the thin sandy mustache which twinkled on the upper lip of the owner of the bull dog, and in his superior stature. This gentleman had been travelling in the Canadas, and making the grand tour of the lakes, whence he diverged to the City of Notions. He was on his way to a town on the Hudson, there to sign and seal; in short, to wed a lovely damsel, the child of a distant relative, whom he had never seen, but whom the miniature in his possession assured him was a "lovely crittchure." The second cockney was travelling "for hinformation."

When the boat began to move, the passengers on board the Spitfire crowded to the starboard side of the vessel to watch the progress of the Rasp. Frequently did Captain Chace descend to the "inferno" in the centre of his craft, and as often, on his re-appearance, did the volume of smoke that issued from the funnels grow denser and blacker, spreading like the wings of some vast bird above the water. At length a loud hurrah proclaimed that the Rasp had given up the contest, and away flew the victorious Spitfire, justifying her name by the trail of sparks she left behind, and cleaving the waves of the Sound with a devilish velocity. The excitement of the race soon died away. Some of the passengers descended to the cabin, others lay at length upon settees; while not a few, with an air of determined activity, strode back and forward on the upper deck. Among the latter were our cockney friends. As often as they crossed each other in their countermarches, he of the moustache gave vent to some fragmentary ejaculations, such as—"Ven a gentleman hinsults another gentleman," and, "heven if the hinsult was hunhintentional," and the like; all of which mutterings ended with a smart swing of his switch cane, which was very awful to behold. Whereupon the lesser cockney would look fluttered, but would essay the air of "Money musk," which invariably died away in a demi-semi-quaver.

The conduct of these travellers afforded much amusement to a couple of American gentlemen, who had noted their proceedings from the first. These last were Frank Harris, a midshipman, and his companion, Dr. Scalpel, both of the U. States' navy. If the young middy was in the highest spirits, the man of science was by no means indisposed to join in his mirth. He was a bluff and portly gentleman of the sect of laughing philosophers. To a whispered scheme of the mischief loving middy, Dr. Scalpel gave assent and countenance. In pursuance of the plan, the friends separated, and soon after entered into conversation with the cockneys; the midshipman making up to the lesser Briton and the surgeon accosting the owner of the bull dog.

"My dear sir," said Harris, "you must excuse my interference in your affairs, but really I take such an interest in you, though a stranger, that I cannot help assisting you. You ran against the gentleman with the switch cane and mustachios."

"It vas hentirely hunhintentionally," replied the little cockney, "I ham so wolatile and 'eedless."

"But the man's irascible, and his insolence is apparent to all our fellow passengers."

"Vel, vat shall I do? Hapologize?"

"Apologize! Pooh! that would only encourage him. No—stand your ground, and I'm the man that will uphold you. Assume a firm demeanour."

"Pray 'ow can hi? I'm so wolatile."

"Its easy enough. You must, I say, take a determined attitude."

"As 'ow?" asked the cockney.

"Knit your brows and look big." The little cockney stood on tiptoe. "And if he should challenge you"—

"I'd lodge a hinformation," said the cockney quickly.

"If you did so pusillanimous a thing," replied his Mentor, "I would be the first to forsake you. I would abandon you to the rage of your ferocious adversary."

At that terrible voice and those terrible words the heart of the little cockney died away within him. Meanwhile a different conversation had taken place between the larger cockney and the doctor. The former did not wait for the latter's advances, but commenced with—"'Ow dy'e do, sir? 'Ow dy'e do, sir? Fine day, fine boat, sir. Nice gentlemanly captain, I vish I could say as much for hall the passengers." And he cast a very blood-thirsty and significant glance at his timid countryman.

"I take your meaning," said the doctor. "You have been grossly insulted."

"Me and my dog."

"'Twas too provoking."

"An apology, or his 'art's blood!"

"My dear sir, I like your spirit. With your consent I'll wait on the gentleman, receive his apology, or insist on a meeting."

"You're too good, sir."

"And may I ask your name?"

"'Tis of no consequence. At present I'm travelling incog. like my werry good friend, the Juke of St. James. It will be a condescension to meet this man, but, as the Juke says, we can't always walk on stilts like the French shepherds that we saw in 'Ungary."

The pugnacity of one of the parties favored the designs of the schemers. A duel was agreed upon, and since the doctor had promised to act as the second of the man with mustachios, the midshipman could do no less than render a similar service to his timid antagonist. It was determined, on their arrival at New York, that they should all ascend the Hudson in a steamer, and be set ashore at a landing place well known to the middy, who promised to take them to a most secluded spot.

"I'm fond of seclusion," said he to the little cockney with an air of sentiment, "it's so convenient for fighting. I'm accustomed to these things. I was once at a tavern, with some of my friends, when we got in a confounded squabble. There was Jack Travers, my most particular friend, Ned Halyard, his crony Thompson, and myself. We were so hazy at the time, that the next morning none of us could tell how the quarrel began, or who enacted the parts of it; but it was agreed that the lie had been given, that one gentleman kicked another, and that somebody threw a decanter at some body else's head. It was necessary to have a duel, and we drew lots for sides. Principals and seconds fought at the same time. I shot at my friend, and Ned Halyard lodged a bullet in his crony. But there was no great harm done, and we shook hands and breakfasted together. We bore no malice to each other—it was done for the honor of the service. There was a necessity for fighting, as there is in your case."

The little cockney would fain have disputed the proposition, but his courage failed when he heard Frank Harris talk so dashingly about a duel.

Arrived at the fatal battle field, the combatants were placed in their respective stations, and furnished with pistols by their friendly seconds. The little cockney was as pale as a sheet, and even the upper lip of the mustachioed hero twitched convulsively. "Fire!" cried Frank Harris in a voice of thunder. Bang! bang! went the pistols. "Are you hurt!" cried each second to his principal. The replies were in the negative. "Try it again," said Frank Harris fiercely, and fresh pistols were presented. This time the hero of the mustachios took a deliberate aim—and missed. The little cockney pulled the trigger, and down went his great antagonist. The seconds and the successful duellist rushed to the spot where the dying man lay kicking convulsively with a deep red stain upon his marble forehead.

Like Byron's hero, he exclaimed—"I've got my gruel," and, like Byron's hero, too, his thought was of his layde love. "I enjoin it on you," said he to the victor, "to go to the 'ouse of William Viggins, which can't be far from 'ere. Take this 'ere letter, which was my credentials, and show it to 'im. Tell Miss Sarah Viggins I hexpired with a vound in my 'ed and von in my 'art—she'll understand the compliment. Tell 'em I died game—and 'arkye, I forgives you 'artily. It vas all my hown fault." Having wrung the hand of the repentant homicide, he closed his eyes and lay back upon the sward.

"'Eaven knows," exclaimed the poor little cockney, "that I didn't seek his life. I shut my heyes ven I fired, and I thought the bullet would go over 'is 'ead."

"You have killed your brother traveller," said the surgeon, in a deep sepulchral voice.

"My brother traveller!" shrieked the poor little cockney. "Yes, and that makes me a fratricide!"

"This is no time for lamentation," said Frank Harris. "Rouse yourself. If you resolve to comply with the dying man's injunction, you must procure a conveyance at the inn, where they can direct you to the house of Wiggins. As for me, I will soon meet you again. Tell the story of your victim's death, but conceal your agency in the affair. Adieu."

The disconsolate duellist shook the profered hand of the midshipman, and after one sorrowful glance at the body of his victim, took his departure from the fatal spot. At the inn he was informed that Mr. William Wiggins lived in the immediate neighborhood, and thither he proceeded on foot, musing, "under the shades of melancholy boughs," upon the late disaster.

"He from the world had cut off a great man;"

And what was to be his reception at the house of the bereaved bride. How would her lovely bosom heave, and her beauteous eyes be filled with tears, at the melancholy intelligence which widowed her ere she had been wedded. And the heart-broken father, too! It would bring down his gray hairs in sorrow to the grave. In the event of their discovering that he had been the destroyer of their bliss, what would his penitence and tears avail! Into such a state of agitation was the poor little cockney thrown, that, upon arriving at the Wiggins' house, he had hardly strength enough to pull the door bell. The house stood on the outskirts of a thriving village, and was a trim little box of a place, overgrown with vines, and embosomed in foliage and flowers, looking out upon a pleasant lawn. But the little cockney had no eyes for the beauties of nature, and no time to observe them; for, at the sound of the bell, an aged domestic appeared at the door, and ushered the tremulous visitor into the best room of the house. Mr. Wiggins immediately entered, a portly little gentleman in a snuff-coloured suit, with the brightest pair of eyes that ever looked a person through. He bowed, and waited for the visitor to speak.

"Mr. William Viggins, I presume."

"The same, sir."

"I come, sir, to inform you of an unappy, a werry unappy event—your son-in-law—that vas to be—hoh lord! hoh dear! I never can get through vith it. This letter"—— ——"Is directed to me! Hey! Speak fast. Let's have it." And as the trembling youth yielded up the letter, the piercing little eyes of Mr. Wiggins ran over the lines in a minute. No sooner had he finished the perusal of the letter, than his face lighted up, and springing forward, he grasped the hand of the little cockney with warmth.

"So, you are Mr. John Smith—hey!"

"That certainly is my name. I vondet vere he found it out," was the exclamation of the cockney.

"My dear Mr. Smith, I'm so delighted to see you—we've been long expecting you—made all the preparation, my dear fellow—and Sarah feels as brides expectant ought to feel, and Mrs. Wiggins is in the fidgets—but I'll present you at once."

"Mr. Viggins, you mistake hentirely."

"No mistake at all in the matter."

"I didn't come to marry your daughter, but to say that her marriage can never take place."

"What d'ye mean, John Smith?" cried the irascible old gentleman, his little eyes twinkling with sudden passion, "D'ye know to whom you speak? Absblud! I'll make you marry her. Why, you're mad as a March hare."

Several times did the unhappy bearer of a too common name attempt an explanation, but as often as he essayed to speak, the singular little eyes of the old gentleman would sparkle and light up, and he would overwhelm the wretched Londoner with a torrent of high words. So the latter submitted at last, with forced resignation to his fate, which in this instance seemed to hurry him into the arms of a very pretty girl. Both mother and daughter welcomed their guest with delight, and he soon found himself at ease in their company; but as often as he began to speak on the subject that lay heavy on his heart, the eye of the old man kindled up, and he made a menacing gesture, which brought back all the fears of the unhappy Smith. Thus beset, he began to think it would not be so very wrong to accept of the wife thus singularly forced upon him. He was in good circumstances, no obstacle stood in his path, and it was very unlikely the affair would ever be cleared up. On the contrary, should his full confession be heard, should the knowledge of the unhappy rencontre transpire, what had he not to fear from the severity of unknown laws in an unknown land! He could not run away, for the bright-eyed old gentleman kept a vigilant watch over him, and he found he could not pass the limits of the lawn in a morning walk, without being pursued by the aged domestic, with some message that invariably brought him back. Therefore we should not wonder that when the wedding day was fixed, Mr. John Smith was a passive bridegroom—that he pronounced all the vows required by love, law, and religion: Squire 'Cobus Everlink kissed the bride maids and the bride, and was as gay as a man in such unhappy circumstances could be.

On the morning after his marriage, to his horror and surprise, he was confronted, in the little parlour which had witnessed the sacred ceremony, with his ancient antagonist, who, accompanied by Harris and the surgeon, appeared to beard the bridegroom in his den. The resuscitation of the largest Mr. Smith is easily accounted for. The mischievous midshipman had superadded a little red paint to the charge of powder in the pistols, and the appearance of this on the forehead of the cockney, so alarmed him that he gave himself up for dead. He had now arrived too late in the day. What an eclaircissement! And the bride trembled and fainted, doubtless! She did no such thing. But when she found that one Mr. John Smith was quite as respectable and wealthy as the other, she clung to the arm of her husband, declared that he was the man of her choice, that she never could have looked twice upon the other; and was as happy as possible, though married by mistake.

Danger of Incautiousness.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

"O, that the good gods
Would set me free from this unhallowed place,
Though they did change me to the meanest bird
That flies in the purer air."—[ANON.

"There is Mr. Haynes just passing by in his chaise," said Mrs. Osborne to her daughter; "run to the door, Lucy, and ask him to step in a minute."

Mr. Haynes, with a good-natured smile, stepped out of his chaise, and hitching his horse in the shade of a tree that grew near, entered Mrs. Osborne's parlor. The little apartment was furnished in the style common in retired country towns thirty years since. The floor, white as scouring could make it, was strewed with silvery sand collected from some distant beach, and the fire-place was filled with pine boughs, intermingled with asparagus—then somewhat a rare plant in the country—full of crimson berries. Opposite the fire-place was a small black walnut desk, highly polished with beeswax, and in one corner a round table of the same material, bearing the same high gloss, which, with the lid turned perpendicularly for the purpose of saving room, nearly superceded the necessity of the small-looking glass, in a mahogany frame, ornamented with a gilt spread eagle. An old-fashioned clock occupied another corner, and a few coarse engravings, glassed and framed, above which stuck several peacock feathers, hung against the white-washed walls. Mrs. Osborne, attired in a ley-colored and white linen gown of her own manufacture, was employed with some plain sewing, and Lucy, with a slight approach to what was considered more fashionable costume, was dressed in a blue and white calico.

"Mr. Haynes," said Mrs. Osborne, after a few common place remarks had been made, "you know that when my husband died, our farm was burthened with a mortgage of three hundred dollars, and the best that I have been able to do, is to pay the interest annually. Lucy and I have been talking the matter over, and we can think of only one way to obtain any thing towards paying the principal. A gentleman by the name of Williams, who resides in the city, and who is very rich, is married to a woman I used to be well acquainted with in my young days, and I have thought of writing to her, to see if she will employ Lucy to do plain sewing, or to work about house, just as she may need."

"My wife and daughter," replied Mr. Haynes, "will be loth to part with a girl they set so much by as Lucy; but if she have resolution and enterprise enough to be willing to go away from home for the sake of earning something, I think we ought to do what we can to encourage her."

"It will be a great trial for me to part with her," said Mrs. Osborne, "as you may well think; but as Lucy is the eldest, and there is a large family of children to provide for, I don't see any alternative."

"Her education," said Mr. Haynes, "is good enough to keep our school next summer; but she will have to be idle nearly a year waiting for it; and after all, as Mr. Kimball is one of the school-committee, he will be likely to secure the place for one of his daughters. As we know Lucy to be a discreet, considerate girl, I think her own inclination and opinion should have some weight in the matter."

"I first suggested the plan of going to the city," said Lucy, "and though it may be considered more genteel to be a school-mistress, I could obtain employment in that way only three or four months, which would procure but little towards paying three hundred dollars. I shall regret leaving home, but as I consider it a duty, I think I can content myself to be absent."

"If my application to Mrs. Williams should prove successful," said Mrs. Osborne, "I shall wish to make an arrangement with you to convey her about forty miles, when she can, you know, take the stage."

"I can carry her the whole distance, as well as not," he replied; "for I have business just this side of the city, and have been thinking of going for some time."

Mr. Haynes now took leave, and Mrs. Osborne, with more reluctance than she thought it prudent to manifest, commenced the task of writing to Mrs. Williams, the early friend whom fortune had exalted to a high station in society, while it had left her, though gifted with superior advantages, both mental and personal, to maintain a continual struggle with poverty.

As the mail, which was carried on horseback, arrived only once a week, an answer could not be expected short of two weeks. During the interim, Lucy employed a part of her leisure in putting her wardrobe in order, the more prominent articles of which it may not be amiss to describe, as it was nearly a fac simile of all the wardrobes belonging to country girls of her age, thirty years since. Her dresses—always in those old-fashioned days called gowns—were, besides two calico ones for every day wear, that had evidently seen much service, a pink and white plaid gingham, a calico with a white ground, ornamented with minute purple sprigs; and a plain white cambric, embroidered round the bottom to the depth of eight or ten inches, with work designed to represent sheaves of wheat and bunches of grapes. One plain cambric cape, another scalloped at the edge, near which ran a vine of leaves, interspersed with eyelets; and a cotton shawl supplied the place of more costly articles, for a similar use at the present day. These, together with two cambric pocket handkerchiefs, a pair of new morocco shoes, and a pair of gloves made of white jean, and a straw bonnet trimmed with pink lustring ribbon, constituted the choicest and most costly part of Lucy's clothing.

Mrs. Osborne's letter received a prompt reply from Mrs. Williams, who said she had plenty of sewing to give Lucy constant employment. The letter arrived Saturday evening, and as every thing was in readiness, Mr. Haynes thought it best to start early Monday morning. Mrs. Osborne parted with Lucy with a smiling countenance, though her heart was sad. Lucy, with the cheerfulness and elasticity of spirits usually attendant on youth and health, sprang into the chaise, and brushing away the tears that hung like dew-drops on her long dark eye-lashes, she bade her mother a smiling good-bye.

It was nearly sunset, the second day after leaving home, that they arrived at the busy and crowded metropolis of her native state. Every thing was nearly as new to Mr. Haynes as Lucy, he having never been there but once, which was ten or a dozen years previous. His first enquiry was for Pearl street, in which Mrs. Williams resided, and though the directions he received were so complicated that they served to perplex rather than enlighten him, he told Lucy there was no use staying there, and that they had better jog on.

"Let me see," said he, "I think the man told me, that after going up this street a piece, I must turn to the left."

To the left, therefore, he turned, but the difficulty of making his way amongst vehicles of different kinds, which were jostling against each other, entirely drove the remainder of the directions out of his head. He, therefore, enquired of an elderly woman, rather showily dressed, and who came almost to a stand to look at them, if she could tell him the way to Pearl street.

"La, yes, indeed," she replied. "What part of Pearl street do you wish to go to, sir?"

"That I cannot tell you; but I want to find a family of the name of Williams, where this girl I have with me is going to live. Do you know such a person as Mr. John Williams?"

"I guess I do. He is a near neighbor to me, and his wife is an old crony of mine. Just walk your horse along slowly, and I will point out the house to you in fifteen minutes."

Mr. Haynes and Lucy had no words to express half the gratitude with which their hearts were overflowing, but she assured them that it did her heart good to do people a kindness, even if they were strangers to her. Mr. Haynes, who was fond of chatting, made no attempt to move on, but continued to answer her questions, till she had learnt all the circumstances which had induced Lucy to leave home.

"But there," said she at last, "I won't detain you here any longer, for it is growing late. Proceed slowly, and keep your eye on me, and I will soon bring you to the right house."

Twilight was now rapidly merging into night, and had it not been for the street lamps, and the lights which began to illuminate the shop windows, it would have been difficult for them to have discerned their guide. After threading what appeared to them a perfect labyrinth of narrow streets, the woman stopped before a large brick building, which she informed them was where Mr. Williams lived.

"I expected such a rich man as Mr. Williams would have a handsomer house than this," said Lucy.

"La, dear," replied their conductress, "the gentry care more about the inside than they do the outside of their houses."

As they were alighting from the chaise, she gave two smart raps with the large brass knocker, and the door was immediately opened by a man to whom she spoke a few words in a whisper. The man directed a glance of intelligence towards Lucy, and telling Mr. Haynes that he might set her trunk down in the hall, invited him to walk into the parlor.

"I cannot make any stop," he replied, "but should like before I go to speak a word or two to Mrs. Williams about this girl, and charge her to treat her kindly, now she is away from all her friends."

"I am sorry it has so happened," said the man, "but Mr. and Mrs. Williams have both gone out to spend the evening, and probably will not return till a late hour."

"You needn't feel a mite worried about her," said the woman, "for Mrs. Williams is none of your mean, narrow-spirited women, and I'll warrant, that instead of putting the daughter of an old friend into a gloomy back chamber to do her sewing, she will treat her like a queen, and keep her in the parlor with her."

"If she does," said Mr. Haynes, "it will be no more than Lucy deserves, for there never was a better girl. Her mother, I am afraid, will have a lonely time without her, but I will tell her what you say of Mrs. Williams, which will be a great comfort to her. Lucy," said he, taking her hand, "I hate to leave you among strangers, though I couldn't ask people to be kinder or more obliging. I know well enough, though every thing here looks as grand as Aladdin's palace I read of when I was a boy, your heart will be with your mother and the children, this evening, in the little parlor. Good bye, and remember there is One who protects the innocent."

He now turned abruptly away, for he felt a moisture gathering in his own eyes, when he saw that Lucy's were filled with tears. When he reached the threshold he stopped.

"Have you a boy about the house," said he, "who would show me the way to a tavern, where I can get my horse well stabled?"

"Certainly," replied the man, and a lad of fourteen was instantly summoned, to whom he gave some directions, and then added in a low voice—"be sure that you make turns enough so that he will not easily find the way back again."

"Come, dear," said the woman to Lucy, "take off your bonnet and take a seat on the sofa."

"I think I had better go into the kitchen," replied Lucy, "for I have heard that people who live in the city don't like to have those that work for them sit in the parlor, even when their work is all done."

"La, you don't consider yourself on a level with the servants, I hope, as you are to be employed in sewing. Besides, it would be a shame for a girl with such eyes and such rosy cheeks as you have, to be hid away in the kitchen. What beautiful hair you have too. I have known such a head of hair to make a girl's fortune; so sit down and make yourself comfortable. I will stay with you this evening and keep you company, and as I am a friend of the family, I shall make myself at home and order supper, as it would be a shame for you to go without eating after such a journey."

"O! don't order supper on my account," said Lucy. "A slice of cake or a biscuit is all that I need."

As Lucy finished speaking, a loud rap was heard at the outer door.

"Bless me," said the woman, "I will warrant somebody has come to spend the evening with Mr. and Mrs. Williams, but Mr. Falers, the man you saw when you first came, can tell where they are gone."

In a few minutes the parlor door was opened by Mr. Falers, and a man, who, though past the prime of life, was dressed in the extreme of dandyism, was ushered in.

"Good evening, Mrs. Jukeley," said he, addressing the woman. "I called for the purpose of passing a social evening with Mr. and Mrs. Williams, and though I regret that they are absent, I shall not mind it much with you to supply their place."

"You might with more propriety say with this beautiful young lady to supply their place," replied Mrs. Jukeley, who introduced him to Lucy by the name of Dawton.

Shortly afterwards Mrs. Jukeley ordered refreshments, and a table was soon spread with a variety of delicacies, most of which were entirely new to Lucy. Mrs. Jukeley and Dawton chatted very fluently in a strain which, though Lucy could not fully comprehend, she by no means liked, and which was intermingled with many direct compliments to herself that flattered far less than they disgusted her. The clock struck twelve before Mr. Dawton thought proper to take leave.

"What a pleasant gentleman," said Mrs. Jukeley, after he had gone. "Were you not very much pleased with him?"

"I cannot say that I was," Lucy replied.

"I dare say you would have liked him better, if he had appeared like one of your country clowns, who would have stumbled over the threshold in attempting to make a bow, and dropped his hat and cane in trying to recover himself. But it is not to be expected that you should understand and appreciate fashionable manners at present, but you will soon learn."

Lucy, without replying to these remarks, enquired if it were not time for Mr. and Mrs. Williams to return.

"La! I forgot to tell you that Mrs. Williams sent word just after you arrived that she should accompany Mr. Williams to a distant town, where he was unexpectedly called on business, and where they will, without doubt, stay several days."

"How unfortunate!" said Lucy.

"Now I think it is fortunate, as it will give you time to procure elegant and fashionable clothing, which is all you need to make you outshine every belle in the city."

"I must make my old clothes do for the present," said Lucy, "as I came here to earn money, not to spend it."

"Certainly you did—but then if some friend should make you a present of some—Mr. Dawton, for instance, who is rich as a Jew, wouldn't mind giving you a twenty dollar lace veil, more than he would a cent."

"But I should mind accepting one from such a disagreeable person," replied Lucy.

"You are tired and sleepy now, child. You will look differently after a good night's rest, and when you come to see the ladies pass by dressed in their silks and hundred dollar shawls. Come, let me show you to your chamber."

When Lucy was left by herself, and had time to reflect on what had occurred since she parted with Mr. Haynes, she began to be haunted with a vague fear that Mrs. Jukeley, whom, at first, the had thought the kindest and most motherly women, belonged to a class she had read of in some novel. This fear assumed a shape more palpable, when looking round the chamber, she found it was furnished with a splendour equal to what she had seen described in oriental fiction. The more she reflected, the more alarmed she became, and at last, she formed the resolution, late as it was, to attempt to make her escape from the house. For this purpose she cautiously raised the latch, but on attempting to push open the door, she found that it was locked on the outside. More confirmed in her fears than before, she looked round for the purpose of finding something by which she could secure the door on the inside so as to prevent any person from entering. Her eye fell on her trunk which caused her to recollect her scissors, which she placed over the latch. Her mind now became calmer, and placing herself in a large damask-covered chair, contrary to her expectations, she soon fell into a sound sleep. It was sunrise when she awoke, and as she raised her eyes and saw the reflection of her person in a costly mirror, a sense of her situation fell with a crushing weight upon her heart. She listened to ascertain if any of the household were yet astir, but an unbroken silence, reigned throughout the mansion. As the air of her room seemed somewhat close, she drew aside the rich, heavy curtain, and opening the window sat down near it. Not more than five minutes had elapsed, before the blind of a window exactly opposite the one where she sat, and only a few feet distant, was thrown back by a young man of a handsome and pleasing countenance, who was neatly, but plainly dressed. Lucy started and was going to leave the window, but making a sign for her to remain, he hastily wrote a few words on a piece of paper which he reached so far towards her that she could take it without difficulty. It contained the following words:

"I saw you when you entered the house, where you now are, and your appearance so much interested me, that I immediately took measures to ascertain whether it were a place suitable for an innocent girl, such as I doubt not that you are. My investigations have proved to my own satisfaction, what I had for some time suspected, that it is a nest of infamy. If this communication is received, as I trust it will be, you will, of course, lose no time in attempting to escape. Should you succeed, enquire for the jeweller's shop of Thomas Whitman, where you will find the writer of this, and his sister, Edith Whitman."

As the note exactly accorded with her own suspicions, she determined, without a moment's hesitation to follow, if possible, its directions. It was not long before she heard persons moving below, and removing the scissors she had placed over the latch, she waited with all the composure she could assume, for the door of her prison-chamber to be unlocked. It was nearly an hour when she heard the key turn and the door open. She looked round, dreading to encounter the hypocritical face of Mrs. Jukeley, but instead of her, she beheld a coarse looking servant woman, who enquired if she needed any assistance about dressing. Lucy replied in the negative, and she then told her that when the breakfast bell rang, which would be in half an hour, she would come and show her the way down. Lucy listened till her receding footsteps died away, then taking what little money she had, and putting on her bonnet, she stole softly from the chamber. When she came to the first landing of the stair-case, she found it branched off in two opposite directions, and she knew not which to take. It would not do to hesitate, and she turned to the right, but the voice of Mrs. Jukeley in loud and chiding tones met her ear, which caused her quickly to retrace her steps and take the left hand stairs. When she had descended, she found herself in the hall she had entered the evening preceding, but her consternation cannot be described when she found the outer door was locked and the key removed. She entered an apartment, the door of which was ajar, with the intention of escaping from a window. All of them were faced with a close, high fence, not one looking towards the street. She ran back into the hall. At that moment the door was opened by Mr. Falers, and as it swung back it screened her from observation. As he was taking off his hat and gloves, she darted from her hiding place, and almost flew through the open door. Falers immediately recognized her, and nearly succeeded in intercepting her flight; he dared not pursue her, however, as the streets were beginning to be filled with people. For the first few minutes she thought only of making good her escape. As she became calmer, she thought of the jeweller's shop and was about to enquire of a person she met, when she discovered it was Dawton. She held down her head that he might not see her face, but he had already perceived who she was, and bowing low, bade her good morning.

"You walk early this morning, as well as myself," said he—"shall I have the pleasure of accompanying you?"

"I thank you," she replied; "I had rather not trouble you."

"O, it will be a pleasure rather than a trouble," he said, and turning about, he walked by her side.

Lucy was greatly perplexed, for she disliked to enquire the way to the jeweller's shop in the presence of Dawton. She walked on a while, hoping he would leave her. She soon found that this was by no means his intention; she therefore accosted a boy standing at a shop door, and made the necessary enquiry.

"You ought to have turned into the last street but one, which you passed on the right hand," said the boy, where anybody would have showed you the shop."

"I should have been happy to have given you the necessary information, Miss Osborne," said Dawton, "had you condescended to enquire of me. Mr. Whitman has a great variety of choice and splendid jewelry on hand, and if it be your intention to purchase some this morning, as I am allowed to be a judge in such matters, I can probably assist you in making a judicious selection."

"As it is not my intention to purchase any," replied Lucy, "I will not trouble you to go with me."

"I have thought of purchasing some myself," he replied, "and consider it a fortunate circumstance in having your company."

At this moment a gentleman turned the corner of the street to which the boy had directed her, and looking round for a few moments, advanced towards them. When she first beheld him, Lucy imagined he resembled the writer of the note. She quickened her pace, and as the distance lessened between them, she felt sure it was the same person. As they met, she involuntarily held out her hand to him saying—"Oh, sir, will you not protect me?"

"Certainly," he replied, looking at Dawton; "if you don't consider yourself as already sufficiently protected."

"I am, at least, very willing to protect her," said Dawton; and, seizing Lucy's hand, he drew it under his arm.

"I am not under his protection," said she, struggling to free herself from his grasp. "He met me and insisted on walking with me, though I repeatedly assured him that I did not wish for his company."

"You may judge how far her assertion may be credited," said Dawton, "when I inform you that she is a boarder at a certain establishment in —— street. She has a good eye, and can see the difference between your young face and my old one."

Lucy, afraid that Whitman would abandon her, burst into tears.

"If she at first desired your protection, sir," said he to Dawton, "it is evident that she wishes for it no longer, and it is certainly unnecessary for me to inform you, that no gentleman, in such a case, would use compulsion."

"It is certainly unnecessary for me to take lessons in politeness from Mr. Thomas Whitman, the jeweller," replied Dawton, endeavoring to conceal, by a nonchalant air, the fear with which Whitman's resolute air, more than his words, had inspired him. "I only wished to ascertain whether such a pretty little rustic really had a mind of her own or not."

He now released her hand, and told her he hoped to have the pleasure of seeing her again in the evening at Mrs. Jukeley's."

While Mr. Whitman and Lucy are proceeding to his shop, where his sister Edith is awaiting them, we will look in upon Mr. Haynes, who had just risen from a good breakfast at the tavern where he lodged, and who, when he parted with Lucy the evening previous, intended to call on her in the morning, though, lest something should occur to prevent him, he did not mention his intention.

"Have you a lad about house," said he, addressing the landlord, "who would be willing for a shilling to show me the way to Mr. Williams' house in Pearl street?"

The landlord replied that he had, and calling a boy who stood near, he gave him the necessary directions. Mr. Haynes, as they passed through several streets, thought every thing looked very different from what it did the evening before, and asked the boy if he was sure he was going right.

"Yes, sir," was the boy's laconic reply, who indeed went forward with the air of one who knew what he was about.

In a few minutes afterwards, he stopped before a splendid looking building.

"This is the house, sir," said he; and touching his hat, he held out his hand for the promised shilling.

"It is Mr. Williams' house that I want you to show me," said Mr. Haynes.

"This is Mr. Williams' house, sir."

"Is it Mr. John Williams' house?"

"Yes, sir."

"Well, here is your shilling; but I must say I never saw a house look so different by daylight from what it did by lamp-light."

He knocked at the door, which, being opened, he found, as the boy had told him, that the house belonged to Mr. John Williams. He was ushered into the parlor, where Mr. Williams, who had just risen from the breakfast-table, sat reading a newspaper. Mrs. Williams, too, was present, engaged in sewing, to whom he remarked, after a little conversation with her husband, that he thought he would just call and see how Lucy was after her journey, and whether she thought she should be contented.

"Lucy!" repeated Mrs. Williams; "whom do you allude to?"

"Lucy Osborne, to be sure, that I brought here last night, to live with you according to the agreement you made with her mother."

"Did you say that you brought her here last evening?" said Mr. Williams.

"Certainly I did, and left her here.

"That is impossible, for Mrs. Williams and I were at home all the evening, and we neither heard nor saw any thing of either of you."

"Is it possible that I have been imposed upon?" said Mr. Haynes, turning very pale. He then, at their request, gave a particular account of all that occurred, from the time he and Lucy first entered the city, till the moment he parted with her.

"Would it not be possible for you to find the house where you left her?" said Mr. Williams.

Mr. Haynes shook his head, and replied that the boy who showed him the way to the tavern went through so many streets, and turned so many corners, that by the time he got there, he could not tell one point of the compass from another. They all concluded, however, that something must be done, and Mr. Williams proposed accompanying Mr. Haynes on an excursion of discovery. They had but just stepped from the door, when Mr. Haynes exclaimed—

"If I can believe my own eyes, I should say that was Lucy Osborne, coming this way with a young man and woman."

"We will wait a minute and see," said Mr. Williams.

"Yes, it is she," said Mr. Haynes, as they approached nearer; "and were it not that people might mistake me for a dancing bear, I should have a good will to try a hornpipe; for, to confess the truth, I never felt so blank in my life as I did when I found that I had been overreached by that woman that I took to be a kind of saint upon earth, to say nothing of what I felt on Lucy's account, who, through my want of caution, was in a situation of so much danger."

By this time, Mr. Whitman and his sister and Lucy had arrived at the spot where they stood, and Mr. Haynes, so overjoyed that he hardly knew what he did, gave Lucy a kiss that rang so loudly in the clear morning air, as to bring a smile to the lips of the spectators, and a deep blush to the cheeks of Lucy.

"You must excuse me, Lucy," said he, "and you too, gentlefolks, for, except our own daughters, there is not a girl on earth that my wife and I set so much by as we do by her. Besides, to have gone home, and not been able to tell where she was, would near about have killed her mother."

Mr. Williams was well acquainted with Mr. Whitman, and he now invited him and the others into the house, where an hour was spent in conversing upon the circumstances which had been the means of bringing them together.

"That young man," said Mr. Williams, after Mr. Whitman had taken leave, "affords a striking example of what may be gained by unquestionable probity and strict attention to business. When a boy of fourteen, he went to learn a jeweller's trade of a Mr. Anderson; and when twenty-one, his late master hired him as a journeyman. In this capacity he worked three years, when Mr. Anderson, whose health was infirm, and who did not care to increase his already large property, determined to retire from business. Having great confidence in young Whitman, he wished him to become his successor; but the wages of three years—all he possessed in the world—was, of course, wholly inadequate to the purchase of the most valuable and select assortment of jewelry in the city, and he could not be prevailed on to accept Mr. Anderson's offer, and take a sufficient quantity on credit to enable him to go on with the business. Finally, an arrangement was made between them, by which Whitman was to assume the whole care of the business, and, in return, receive a certain share of the profits. Four years' trial has showed Mr. Anderson that he he had not overrated Whitman's talent for business, and that his confidence in his honesty had not been misplaced.—He told me, not a week since, that he would soon be able to purchase the whole establishment."

"There is no knowing, after all," said Mr. Haynes, "but that good may come of evil. If Lucy had come directly here, she might never have been introduced to his young gentleman; but now, if I am any judge, he will not fail to improve the acquaintance which has already commenced."

"I am of your opinion," said Mr. Williams; "that is, if Miss Osborne will permit him to."

Lucy, of course, did not hear these remarks, being engaged in examining some very pretty card-cases

...ions unfolded her were painted by her eldest daughter.

Though Lucy had been taught by her mother to take an active share in the labors of the household, she had not been without her dreams of romance.—She had occasionally found time to steal away to a sweet forest-nook, where the thrilling whispers of the wind-stirred leaves, at intervals lost in the clear, joyous carol of some bird, seemed to speak the same thoughts which were treasured in her bosom, though she had no words to utter them. These lonely hours of musing, together with the companionship of an intelligent and well-educated mother, had refined and elevated her intellectual nature, so that there was no one of the coarse, though frank and open-hearted young men of her acquaintance, who had sympathies corresponding with her own. Their eyes would glisten at the sight of a thrifty hill of potatoes, but a bed of violets was either passed unheeded, or regarded as worthless; and if they admired a live oak, it was on account of the quantity of timber it would afford, and not for its rich foliage.

Thomas Whitman, as has already been mentioned, had, like her, been early inured to toil, yet his intellectual nature had not slept. Possessed of a firm and vigorous constitution, he had been able, without injury to his health, to almost nightly steal an hour or two from sleep, which was devoted to mental culture. He did not, as Mr. Haynes had suspected, neglect to cultivate his acquaintance with Lucy, who, when listening to his remarks, found language for her own beautiful thoughts. In him, she had found one who possessed the key to unlock the treasures of her heart and mind, and enable her to give them form, and color them with the beautiful and vivid hues of imagination. It is not, therefore, very natural to suppose, that when, after an acquaintance of a few months, he made her an offer of his hand, she felt much disposition to refuse it, as she had for some time been pretty sure, that she possessed his heart.

Mr. and Mrs. Williams would have been gratified to have had their bridal celebrated at their house; but Lucy preferred to return home, and be married in the parlor described in the commencement of the story, surrounded by her mother, and brothers and sisters, and a few particular friends, among whom were Mr. Haynes, with his wife and daughters, one of whom was her bridesmaid.

THE PIC NIC—A RETROSPECT.

Oh! long shall we remember well, like dreams of earliest love,
When o'er the bosom of the lake we sought the island-grove;
The shaded walks, the rich repast, the music, mirth and song,
The sail at twilight, and its scenes, we shall remember long!

And when the evening feast was o'er, and hearts were beating high,
Oh! then came on the sunny dance beneath the moon-liteky;
And gallant hearts, and soft white hands, and fairy steps were there,
And sounds of flute and light guitar rose on the perfumed air.

The beautiful and gay were there—the ELLENS and the KATES—
And married men without their wives, and wives without their mates!—
And there was JANE—"my pretty Jane,"—the fairest of the fair,
With heart as light and eyes as bright as ever maiden's were!

There, too, was MIRA, with the bloom of girlhood on her cheek,—
A smile was over on her lips, as if she fain would speak;—
The LIZZYS, with their glorious eyes, and features form'd to please,—
And she, with air and look sedate—the modest, fair LOUISE.

Out on the canting moralist, who, in an hour like this,
With bodings dark, and solemn phiz, would shade our present bliss;
A ban be on the envious wight, whose sidelong glances say,
Old Time will change those maidens fair to matrons old and gray!

We meet no more as then we met, in yonder sylvan dell,
Yet, ere the minstrel's song is o'er, he speaks a last farewell!
Oh! ever be the smile as bright, as stainless each fair brow,
Each heart as full of happiness and free from guile, as now.

HARP OF THE VALE.

The Visions of the Past.

The flitting visions of the past—
How oft they rise and pass before me:
Until their shadowed splendors cast
A deep and thrilling feeling o'er me.

Then oft my spirit wafted back,
Beholds thro' memory's open portal
The hopes that lit life's early track,
The joys she fondly deem'd immortal.

She breathes perfume from flowers again,
That round the early home were springing;
And hears once more the birds' sweet strain,
That round that cherished spot were singing.

Kind voices meet her eager ear,
And gentle sounds of love and gladness,
And many a tone she loved to hear,
Ere life for her had breathed of sadness.

She reveals 'mid her early dreams,
Again with all her bounding lightness,
Until she fain no longer deems
How fleeting was the fairy brightness.

How slight withal may be the things
That thus our early feelings waken—
That stir the memory's charmed springs,
Till all its crystal depths be shaken.

A strain of music breathed again,
Heard not perchance since childhood's hours—
A wild bird's sweet but sudden strain,
Perfume from once familiar flowers.

Oft thro' the startled soul will dart
A sense of vague yet thrilling pleasure,
A wild desire as if to start
And grasp some lost and cherished treasure.

Bright are these visions—but alas!
Too truly are they visions only—
And o'er the weary heart they pass,
To make its weariness more lonely.

CHARLOTTE WINFRED.

BY THOMAS G. SPEAR.

Often have I recalled the story of Charlotte Winfred, as a touching instance of woman's wasted affection, and I will endeavor briefly to unfold to the reader the sweet character she sustained from the time I first knew her as a girl, until I heard of the close of her life. However little of interest may attend the relation, it has, to me, all the force of a sad reality.

Richly endowed with personal beauty, and possessed of a quick understanding and amiable and sprightly disposition, Charlotte needed but education to complete the work which nature had so well begun. This her parents did not fail to bestow, and, at the age of seventeen, she returned from the seminary complete in every requisite accomplishment. Her attractions soon became the theme of general admiration, especially among the young men of the vicinity, whose attentions were soon lavishly bestowed upon her. Among those whose addresses she received, the appearance and bearing of Joseph Manferd were ever the most acceptable to Charlotte. He was always mild, complaisant, and agreeable while in her presence, though reputedly of a haughty, ambitious, and impatient tendency; but this Charlotte not knowing, her heart was finally taken captive, and she committed her hopes, confident of happiness, to the man she loved. When once entranced in the dream of bewildered passion, her affections would naturally seek to palliate every fault of her intended husband. Never doubting the parental sanction, when, in her mother's presence, she approached her father upon the subject, who had for some time regretted, while he could not well avoid the strengthening partiality of his daughter for Manferd, she was surprised and confused at his hesitating acquiescence.

"Charlotte," said he, "I fear you are mistaken in your choice. I have doubts of your congeniality with Mr. Manferd, and wish you to consider well before you decide; but, if you cannot change the tide of your inclination, I beg you to fortify yourself in case of disappointment or reverse. Men, sometimes, however, turn out different from what we expected.—This may, and I hope will be, the case with your idol; and may you be as happy as a wife as you have been dutiful as a child."

She thought often and seriously upon these words, but she believed her father had judged through error, from what she had uniformly seen of the object of her growing affections. Mr. Winfred had never, but in this case, seemed to disapprove her expressed inclinations, nor did he now interfere to thwart her wishes. His children had none of them given him occasion to say, in the bitterness of feeling, and in Charlotte he possessed a daughter ever attentive, through her minority, to the dictates of prudence and filial affection, and though he now thought her promised happiness of doubtful continuance, he forebore any thing but the expression of his fears, while hoping for the best. Charlotte accordingly soon resigned herself as the bride of Manferd. Her marriage was an event of peculiar interest and unusual joy in the place of her nativity; and the bridal period was to her one fraught with present enjoyment, and the prospect of future felicity. With Manferd, however, there seemed, on several occasions shortly after the wedding, a reserved moroseness of manner, which a close observer would interpret as an evidence that all did not set well within.

"How like a serpent's tooth it is

I have said that Manferd was ambitious. He was also prone to vices hitherto well concealed, but which were gradually taking a fast hold upon him. The love of fame was the natural ennobling instinct of his ardent temperament, but a frequent indulgence in the fashionable and pernicious amusements of the gentry of his neighborhood, had tinctured it with a grosser quality, until the habit of gambling began to seat itself deeply in his character, and the love of the card-table, the dice-box, the race-ground and the cock-pit, slowly displaced the more honorable incitements of an opening political life. The vestal fires of his earlier aspirations had thus gradually lost their purity. His hold upon the popular will grew weaker in proportion to the indulgencies which blunted his moral sensibilities, and the defeats which followed his demands for public favor, where he had always promised himself certain success, engendered a chagrin which rankled in a spirit they should have fortified to better exertions. Thus, by a strange perversion of reason, he grew morbidly regardless of consequences, until evil became his good, and as "The aspiring youth that fir'd the Ephesian dome, Lives more in fame than him who built it," he preferred the eccentric folly of fleeing where the fiends of mischief might drive him, to not being advanced as he listed. Thus, one tendency being destroyed, its opposite flourished; and in the fulness of a false philosophy, giving way to one mad impulse after another, whatever it might be, that

"Ruling passion in the human breast,
Like Aaron's serpent swallowed all the rest."

The irregularities which this distempered state of mind superinduced, ere long betrayed their influence in the disturbance of Charlotte's domestic peace.—The sunshine of her little heaven of wedded life began slowly to be dissipated, and clouds continually arose and settled upon her prospects. But the changes that were now arising, were met by her with a spirit of tranquil endurance and meekness, in such immediate contrast with her husband, that her character, like a flower when bitten by the frost, and drooping to the ground, seemed more lovely and interesting as the weight upon her spirit increased.—While he raved, she endured; and his recklessness and dissipation found her always considerate, forbearing and affectionate. She at first expostulated, advised and entreated; but her fond persuasions were so sullenly, and sometimes so rudely received, and no amendment following, she at length ceased her tender beseechings, and awaited silently what she could not avert. As time wore away, she grew melancholy, but would occasionally rally in the presence of her friends, and counterfeit the hilarity of past days. But the mask could not conceal the malady. This assumed complacency and cheerfulness was like sunshine resting upon a broken sepulchre—joy lay buried within, and the heart, while it guarded the relics, was falling to pieces itself.

In two years after Charlotte's marriage, Mr. Winfred died, and as her fortune was early submitted to her husband's charge, his profligate career had dissipated or concealed nearly all that came into her possession, and things were now rapidly drawing to their inevitable issue. Her principal source of enjoyment latterly had been with her child, but even that consolation was not long to remain to her.—Several winters had passed over their heads, and another was now throwing his hoary mantle over the faded prospects of nature, and with it, in fearful terror, came the grim visage of poverty. How little anticipated—how undeservedly inflicted! Let those who have enjoyed the conveniences of opulence, and banqueted on the luxuries of plenty—who have laid down and risen up surrounded by every comfort, and been suddenly deprived of them, and had their prospects diametrically reversed, realize, if they can, Charlotte's present destitute situation.

With its usual accompaniments of snow and piercing wind, another winter's morning had arrived. Their house was situated some distance from the suburbs, surrounded by leafless trees, and though the sun had arizen far above the horizon, the air was too cold to allow any effectual action of his warmth upon the frigid earth. Charlotte looked forth upon the chilling scene, and found her feelings in sad consonance with this outward garniture of nature. The hues had passed from her cheeks like the green freshness from the blighted fields. The mirth had gone from her heart, and like the songs of the birds, was hushed and intermitted,—yet not like them, only for a season, but perhaps for ever. She had spent one anxious and watchful night after another in waiting for her husband, but he had not yet come. Where could he be? Alas! she might easily conjecture, for the sun of virtue had set in his bosom, and vice and error had the sway of his actions. What would she not do to retrive him? But it was too late. One act of cruelty had followed another, until her home was deserted by him, and she was left alone to suffer in want and misery.

Charlotte's destitution now made the interference of her friends necessary, and she at length found, with an early and cherished companion, a solace for her aching heart and impaired health. But she was there denied that sweetest of consolation to her as an afflicted wife and mother, the presence of her only child. He had been mysteriously snatched from her keeping, and placed she knew not where. Society and attention, however, gradually recruited her strength, and enlivened her drooping spirits, until an occasional glimmering of cheerfulness again added its lustre to her faded countenance.

It was now spring, and the air grew balmy and salubrious. Around the dwelling where Charlotte resided, extended a well-cultivated garden, fenced in upon a wide-spread lawn. It was tastefully encompassed with shrubbery and flowers, dappled with every hue, and emitting every variety of fragrance. Along this beautiful enclosure would her invalid steps often stray, to inhale the pleasant breeze, and feast her eyes upon the cheerful prospect before her. One day as she sauntered there, thus engaged, the sun being nearly at the end of his course, and here and there a bird sending his farewell melody up into the clear sky, as she walked near the fence that stretched along by the roadside, her attention was suddenly arrested by the sight of a man staggering in the foot-path. He was bloated, unclean and tattered in his garb; but even in this disguise, her familiar eye soon recognized the person of Manferd. The spectacle appalled her. Alas! how altered! She gazed as he passed with a sinking heart and a trembling frame. The man she loved was an outcast! He who had destroyed her peace, was a wreck himself!

moment in the contemplation of earthly things. An heavy, relentless melancholy settled upon her heart, and no art—no music—no scenery of earth nor sky, nor ministration of friendship, could dissipate its gloom. The last blast of the storm had fallen, and she bent beneath it like a reed. How strong was her love, and how mysteriously frail did its power make the texture of her existence! She wasted rapidly. But one thing she asked for, and that was her child. "Go," said she, "find my child and bring him hither. If Joseph has him, say I will forgive all, if he will return the boy. I shall be happy then. It is all I ask. Do find him. I would bless him and die with him at my side."

But the realization of this last request was denied her. As the breath of feebleness grew still less and less, but while her voice was yet sweetly audible, she said, "How long they stay! Has he no mercy?" and then died, as if she had been an angel, who had come on earth to enjoy, to suffer, to teach, and then flee back to her dwelling place in Heaven.

Manferd was not long among the living. He had confided his son to strange hands, and that son, having early learned his mother's story, has lived to honor her memory, and proved himself worthy of her blessing. He has caused a monument to be raised over her grave to perpetuate his affection and her Heavenly character, and often dutifully seeks the solitary precints consecrated by his tears and her ashes.

THE COLONEL ABROAD.

A Sketch from Real Life.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

A few springs ago, it was impossible to display one's gay attire in Broadway, without becoming acquainted with the person of my hero—Augustus Blazon, Esq. The reader (who may never have rightly caught his name) will recognize him when I call to mind an individual who usually dazzled the public eye with a bright blue or green coat, crimson vest, and a greater quantity of jewelry gracing that portion of his breast, in which Momus recommended a window, than would have shown to advantage through one of Tenney's double sized panes. So exceedingly slender was this gentleman, that the cane, with its monkey head, which he invariably carried, bore no slight resemblance to himself; but the material, of which nature had stinted him in breadth, she conscientiously returned in height—he stood some six feet two in his boots. His pliant form was surmounted by a head, which in shape, and I might almost say in size, forcibly reminded me of that most insipid of fruit, a shaddock. Doubtless some malicious persons would add that the simile might be carried out, and a comparison made between the quality of the head and the shaddock's contents; but far be it from me, conversant as I am with Mr. Blazon's own peculiar talents, to be guilty of such detraction.

Augustus Blazon, when I first beheld him, was a man seeking his proper sphere in society. This he did not seem likely to find. His father was a ship builder, and had left him considerable property—sufficient, it might be supposed, to purchase the entree to that society in which he was calculated to "cut a figure." Yet, strange to say, both he and his wealth were then totally unappreciated. He was a very ill-treated person; the butt of waggish young gentlemen, and the bore of fashionable young ladies. It was astonishing with what lack of discernment people of haut ton declared that his manners were vulgar in the extreme—that he was uneducated—a booby—a bear—and those without daughters even went so far as to declare that his presence, "in spite of his money," would be a disgrace to their balls. Augustus endured the horror incident upon this verdict but one winter after he became of age. He then suddenly disappeared from Broadway, and for a year I entirely lost sight of him.

The ensuing autumn, I was standing in the gallery of the Louvre, before one of David's most felicitous productions, when my attention was arrested by a person of aspiring stature beside me. His face recalled some face once familiar to my eye; but the long curling hair, in color and shagginess somewhat resembling a setter's, the bushy whiskers and sandy mustache, so disguised those diminutive features, that I could not recognize to whom they belonged.

Upon the gentleman's arm leaned a lady, whose comfortable embonpoint recompensed the eye for the lanky sparseness of her escort. To pronounce on a lady's beauty is a delicate point. I leave the reader to judge of her attractions. A horseback ride on the Champs Elysees could alone have given her cheek that exceedingly brilliant bloom; the most celebrated powder in Paris certainly must have assisted in lending those strangely regular teeth, displayed by a perpetual smile, their dazzling whiteness. Nature seldom before clustered such a profusion of glossy black ringlets round a white forehead; or tinted brows with so jetty a hue; or vermillioned lips so exquisitely.—In the eye alone she had made an error—it was decidedly too small for the loving languishness of its expression. As for the lady's age, it might have been considered a compliment to call her actually young. At all events she > ——"Was blooming still, had made the best

> Of Time, and Time returned the compliment,
> And treated her genteelly."

"What a thrillingly beautiful tableau!" softly murmured the lady, pausing before a picture which represented a group of Cupids sportively loosening their arrows.

"Tolerably executed—quite passable—not at all remarkable, however," said her critical companion; "here is a much finer:" and he pointed out a dark painting, in which the figures were obscured by so deep a shade, they were hardly visible.

"Ah! Colonel, you are such a connoisseur! It is dangerous to express an opinion before you!" sighed the lady.

"Well, really, I do pride myself on some taste in these matters. When a man has travelled all over Europe, it is to be expected that he should be a judge of the fine arts. I have no doubt, after a trip to Germany and Italy, you may be as competent as myself to pronounce upon them; bear one thing always in mind, whenever you see a dark, dingy picture, you may be sure it is worthy of praise, and certainly by a master. Obscurity is the greatest mark of beauty. But persons must travel to discover these things."

The couple passed on, and I lost sight of them, until we met in the halls of statuary beneath the extensive gallery. Here I observed that the gentleman induced his companion to pause before every remarkably worn and discolored statue, or decayed relic, pointing out to her their hidden beauties, but hurrying by all the most attractive works of art that were unmarked by this defacing seal of time.

Shortly afterward, we were waiting at the entrance of the palace for our voiture de remise, which had driven away, when the Colonel and his blooming lady passed us on the steps. They entered an elegant carriage, which drove up to receive them; but, before the door was closed, the sprucely liveried footman begged to make Monsieur le Colonel acquainted with a person who had some valuable relics, veritables curiosites, that were really worth Monsieur le Colonel's examination.

"Relics! let me see them by all means," enthusiastically exclaimed the Colonel. "I am making a collection to take to America. I know well enough when they are genuine. Come here fellow—qu'avez—ques—ce—que—avez vous?"

"Toutes sortes de choses, Monsieur a votre service—tout ce que vous pouvez desirer," replied the antiquarian Frenchman, opening his large box.

"Voyez—faites voyez—a—je—me—moi," said the Colonel, with the air of a man who knew very well what he was saying, if he could only keep from stammering.

"Montrez a Monsieur," interpreted the officious footman, putting his own hand into the box, "Monsieur has so much bon gout! Here, Monsieur le Colonel, is a nail actually taken from the cross—it has been in the possession of some monks hundreds of years; of course such a relic is a little expensive; here is one of St. Anthony's teeth; and here is a bottle of holy water, consecrated by the Pope himself, and here is a vial containing some of the Apostle Peter's tears; and here"—

I could not catch the names of the other invaluable contents of the box, but I observed that a number were stowed into the carriage.

When the Frenchman was paid, the footman, while he closed the coach door with his right hand, stretched out the left significantly open, behind him. The dealer in antiques slily laid a piece of money within it, and the footman turning round, his mouth twitching with suppressed laughter, gave a glance at the other sufficiently expressive and comical.

As the carriage drove off, we were joined by a countryman, who bowed to the Colonel and lady as they passed.

"My dear S——," said I, with inquisitive haste, "in the name of all that is original, tell me, who is the individual to whom you bowed?"

"Why, surely you have not forgotten him, in spite of the metamorphosis effected by the salt Atlantic?"

"Indeed I have—pray who is he?"

"Has he lost all resemblance to Augustus Blazon, of Broadway memory?"

"Is it possible? but the lady calls him Colonel?"

"To be sure—and a Colonel he is, without doubt; he had himself made Colonel, before he left America, on purpose to gain a travelling title."

"But the lady—who is she?"

"She is a—'charming widow'—Madame De Courtenay; an English woman, it is reported, of immense fortune, and of high rank—niece to a lord, I have heard her say. She is passing the winter in Paris; and her business is probably to procure an eligible life-partner. Her appartemens garnis in the Rue Rivoli, are as splendid as any in Paris, and you saw her coach just now. Nobody seems to understand how she got into society; but, as I said before, the French are not scrupulous. Colonel Blazon has been paying her attention some time, and she introduces him everywhere. I hear they are now engaged.—She believes him worth £10,000 a year—a Colonel in the regular army, and his very remarkable escutcheon unblemished and genuine. Indeed, she often expresses a strong desire to make America a permanent residence."

"Are your suspicions of the Colonel never avowed?"

"Of course not—communicativeness is not the fashion here—everybody minds his own business—you will soon learn that. It is very possible that both Madame de Courtenay and Colonel Blazon, when they are fairly married, may discover each other to be somewhat different from what they now seem to be—all in due time—but that is entirely their own affair."

"Well, no place like Paris for acquiring the real sang froid; I must have less curiosity before I am possessed of it, I fear."

Not many days after this conversation, my friend joined us one evening at Tortoni's, and over an ice related with real enjoyment, (whether of the ice or of his own story I do not pretend to judge,) the concluding scene of the Colonel's adventures in Paris.

Monsieur le Colonel was sitting in the tasteful boudoir of Madame de Courtenay, a few mornings previous to the one fixed for their anticipated union.—Madame, in a rich velvet robe, was reclining on the graceful car-sofa, complacently surveying the luxuries aronnd her, and making a calculation of those which were wanting, and which the Colonel would doubtless supply. The walls of the room were hung, and the table covered, with drawings, to which her own name was attached. A number of musical instruments were elegantly scattered about; and on one of these the Colonel was entreating her to play. But the piano, she said, she had relinquished for the harp, after which it sounded harshly on her ear; unfortunately, several strings of the harp had been broken ever since her acquaintance with the Colonel; she would touch the guitar to please him, but her voice was affected by a cold, and the instrument was nothing without a vocal accompaniment. In short, she preferred to hear him read one of the numerous poems, addressed to herself, which she had had bound in stamped velvet covers to grace her centre table.

The Colonel was employed in giving voice to Madame's versified praises, when a lady and gentleman entered, with whom Madame de Courtenay had but recently become acquainted. They happened to be Americans. The lady saluted Madame, who rose from her reclining position to receive her, looked at the Colonel as though he were not wholly unknown, and seated herself, without any sign of recognition passing between them.

The American gentlemen, however, whose manners and exterior were decidedly un-Parisian, immediately addressed Colonel Blazon with—

"How do you do, Mr. Blazon? So you're in Paris, are you? I heard you'd cut New York: stupid place, is it not? The people are so deuced particular! It makes society here much preferable. We arrived ourselves about a fortnight ago. How are you sisters, Mr. Blazon?"

"Quite well, I thank you, Mr. Andrews," said the Colonel, trying to seem cool, while the hue of his very finger ends evinced a superabundance of caloric.

Madame appeared to be discomposed; an ominous pause ensued. It was broken by the unceremonious Mr. Andrews.

"Are you going to remain in Paris all winter, Mr. Blazon? I guess it is just the place for you—pick up acquaintances—go about—feel more at home than when actually at home."

"I shall, probably—that is, I may stay," said the Colonel, glancing at the alarmed countenance of Madame. Then, suddenly gaining courage, he began to talk with great fluency—threw open Madame's portfolio for the inspection of the visitors, and effectually monopolized all conversation.

"For Heaven's sake, Colonel," whispered Madame de Courtenay, "why does that gentleman call you Mr. Blazon?"

"I'll tell you, my dear Madame," said the Colonel, confidentially, "it is really a misfortune—he is the most absent man in the world—never knows what he is saying, and has the very worst memory—yet he cannot bear to be corrected, therefore it is better to take no notice of him."

"Mr. Blazon," said Andrews, "I suppose you find all the balls here to be quite as splendid as the assemblies in New York, for which we had such difficulty in getting our ten dollar tickets, don't you?"

"Really, Mr. Andrews, you must be thinking of some other person—to what assemblies do you allude?

Dear me!" he continued, drawing forth his watch with an air of empressement, "how time flies! I am very sorry, Madame, that I have an engagement at this hour which calls me from you. I will fulfil it, and with your permission, return in time to accompany you to the Bois de Boulogne—good morning."

After the Colonel left, Madame's regret at his absence must have affected her conversational powers, for she spoke with an obvious effort. With her visitors she was but slightly acquainted, and felt a natural delicacy in introducing the subject uppermost in her thoughts. At last, when the lady rose to take her leave, Madame de Courtenay, fearing that the opportunity for inquiring might not again be offered, demanded, rather abruptly—

"Were you acquainted with Colonel Blazon in America?"

"The gentleman who just left the apartment, I presume, you mean, Madame! No—" and there was a slight expression of haughtiness in the lady's tone; "he is not among the number of my acquaintances."

"The Colonel is a friend of yours, sir?" persisted Madame de Courtenay.

"The Colonel! What Colonel? Colonel who, ma'am?"

"Colonel Blazon, who just left the room."

"I knew Mr. Augustus Blazon in New York, but I never heard of his being a Colonel before."

"Oh, sir—but he said your memory was so treacherous. You, Madame, may not be acquainted with him, but you have heard of him?"

"I have, Madame, frequently."

"And he is a Colonel, then? I knew it was a mistake."

"Yes, I certainly believe him to be a Colonel. I presume you are aware of the existence of the militia, and that in America a man from almost any class of the community may become a militia Colonel or even a General. Mr. Blazon is a Colonel, doubtless, but it is a militia Colonel."

"Is it possible! What will become of me? I am bewildered, my dear Madame—will you open that door, sir? Camilla—my sal volatile—this room is so close—pray who is this gentleman, then?"

"A very good fellow, in his way," replied Andrews, "only considered rather soft for a Yankee; but I guess he does well enough here. His father has built many a good ship, and he is his son—that's who he is."

"But—you will excuse me," said Madame de Courtenay, with the manner of a drowning person catching at a straw: "he is very wealthy—worth ten thousand pounds a year, is he not?"

"Ten thousand pounds? We do not calculate by pounds in our country," replied the lady. "I suppose Mr. Blazon, for he is rich"—

"Rich! He is really rich, then?" and the sal volatile became suddenly efficacious, for the lady obviously revived.

"Yes, quite well off—his property yields him from two to three thousand dollars a year."

"Three thousand dollars! Merciful powers! that would not support such an establishment as this three months! Camilla! excuse me—I am ill—a sudden pain—" and Madame de Courtenay sank on the sofa and hid her face with her handkerchief.

Her visitors, observing themselves decidedly de trop, wished her speedy relief, and left her to the consoling care of her pretty femme de chambre, Camilla.

"I am ruined, Camilla!" sobbed the afflicted widow. "The Colonel—Colonel Blazon—is a militia Colonel! Tinkers and tailors can be militia Colonels! His father's a ship builder—and the wretch, he is only worth three thousand dollars a year—not £10 000. We never shall see America, after all! What a horrid place it must be! Every thing will be discovered here—we shall have to leave Paris and hide ourselves again in Cheltenham—the little all my poor husband left me in just"—

"Hush, dear Madame," said the maid, "here comes the Colonel."

The Colonel entered hastily.

"What ails you, dearest lady?" said he, with unaffected anxiety. "Speak to me—look at me;" and the gentleman trembling knelt beside the sofa, on which the fair sufferer was lying, supported by her confidential grisette.

"Speak to you—look at you, sir!" said the lady, uncovering her distorted countenance, "how have you deceived me—betrayed me!"

"Prenez garde, Madame—do not toss your head so," prudently whispered Camilla, "those clasps of Pugno's are so bad they have let your hair slip all on one side!"

"I deceive you—I? Fairest of created beings," said the Colonel, devotedly: "I would rather lose my life! Can you believe anything that vulgar fellow, Andrews, could say? A plague on his absent-mindedness! I will send him a challange to-morrow!"

"Will that make you a Colonel, or a man of honor either, Mr. Blazon? Oh, I am too wretched!"

"Madame, dear Madame," again whispered the maid, "you forget yourself in this excitement—pray do not weep, Madame: your cheeks will be all marked—your toilet already is frightfully obîme."

"Listen to me, dear Madame; I assure you whatever that Andrews may have said was out of spite. Should anything shake your tender confidence in me after the promise you have given? You said this little, white hand"—

"Do not touch me, perfidious man! Oh! I am ruined—what will become of me?" Perfectly regardless and unconscious of the Colonel's presence, the lady raved on. "I shall be turned out of these elegant apartments—and my coach—my saddle horses—my box at the opera—Camilla! do you suppose they put women in prison for debt in this barbarous country? What shall I do?"

The Colonel sprang from his knees as though a thunderbolt had burst near him. He looked at the weeping fair one with unutterable horror depicted on his countenance.

"Quelle scene! Madame is a little out of her head, Monsieur le Colonel—she does not know what she is saying—ah! ce diable de vermillion! how it has got off her lips!"

The Colonel, for a moment or two, was incapable of motion. When animation was restored, he turned round, seized his hat, caught hold of the door-handle—clenching it as though he was afraid of being forcibly detained—flung the door open with an ejaculation of "What an escape!" and vanished.

The footman, who met him racing down the stairs, told Camilla that Monsieur le Colonel rubbed his hands exultingly as he ran, and that he heard him repeating to himself, "What an escape! what an escape! That Andrews is the best friend I ever had in my life!"

After half a year's sojourn in Paris, we returned to America. The Colonel had sailed for New York immediately after his denouement with the "charming widow;" and as I felt that interest in him which every student of human nature takes in the fate of a decided "character," I questioned a friend as to his further history.

"Do you mean Colonel Blazon, as he is now generally called—though he seems to have got his title abroad—the traveller?" was her reply. "He is in New York, and a great personage here, I assure you. You may see him any day in Broadway, with his elegant span of horses, driving his liveried footman about. He has created a great sensation since his return—he is quite the rage—is received in the first society, and is the avowed pet of all mammas. His reception abroad must have been exceedingly flattering—his adventures are in everybody's mouth. The people are running crazy about his paintings and statues, and relics, and curiosities. I don't know much about it, but they say his collection is invaluable."

THE BURNING SHIP.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "CRUIZING IN THE LAST WAR."

My friend Harry is the happiest of men. He has the sweetest and most romantic cottage in the vicinity of Philadelphia. It is but nine miles from the city, and near a fine old turnpike, so that a span of blood horses will take you there in forty minutes. His wife is a perfect angel—beautiful, sweet-tempered, and loves Harry devotedly. And then a group of such lovely children!

"Did you ever hear how Isabel and I became acquainted?" said he to me, one evening, looking on his wife. I shook my head in the negative. "Well, then, draw your chair closer to the fire, and I will tell you."

With those words he began:

"It was a night in the tropics. We had been in pursuit of a heavy merchantman, but a fog coming up, she was shut in from our sight, and for more than an hour remained invisible. Suddenly, however, the moon broke forth, and we saw the chase close-hauled, on the very point of escaping us. We instantly made all sail, but the wind was so uncertain that the stranger kept his advantage, the air being comparatively still with us, while he had a respectable breeze. At length it fell a dead calm, the chase being by this time several miles off.

"She could now be seen, lying in a liquid flood of moonlight, rising and falling lazily upon the swell, her white sails scarcely moving from the mast, and flashing in the distance, like a sea-gull's snowy wing. All at once Captain Drew, who had been scrutinizing her through his glass, exclaimed—

"'There is something the matter on board there, the men have almost all left her decks—and even those aloft repairing are coming down—what can it be, Mr. Jones?'"

"'I can't make out, sir—the crew, perhaps, has mutinied, they are running wildly hither and thither—no, my God, the ship's on fire!'" he ejaculated, as a cloud of thick, black smoke suddenly puffed up her fore-hatchway, followed by a long, vivid stream of fire, that shot up brightly into the midnight sky.

"We saw at once that the flames must have been raging some time in the hold, and that they had attained an intensity which would defy every effort to subdue them. It was a fearful sight. The eager element shot along the rigging, ran swiftly up the foremast, and wrapping the hamper in a sheet of fire, streamed almost perpendicularly upward a fathom or two above the truck. There was no breeze; but the undulations of the atmosphere swept the dense smoke to one side, forming, as it were, a gloomy curtain against which the lurid flames shone in terrible relief. Every object on board could now be distinctly seen, and we noticed that all at once, the whole crew rushed aft. A signal of distress the next instant was shown on the quarter. All this had passed in a moment.

"'Lower away the boats—pipe their crews there, boatswain! quick, sir, or the poor wretches will be lost,' thundered the captain.

"The men hurried to their stations, fired with a sympathy equal to his own.

"'Mr. Danforth,' he said, 'I shall give you the command of the leading boat, spare no effort to reach them in time—but,' he continued, in a whisper, 'mind the magazine!'

"'Ay, ay, sir,' I answered, touching my hat, and leaping into the stern sheets, I continued, 'push off there forward—and now give way with a will, boys—pull!'

"At these words, the men bent to their oars with the thews of giants, curling the waters in foam beneath our bows, and sending the boats along as if they had been pleasure skiffs.

"But swift as was our progress, that of the destroying element was still more so. The fire had spread with such frightful rapidity as to wrap the whole fore-part of the ship in flames, and threaten to consume her before we could arrive. Since it had found vent, it raged with redoubled fury, until now the shrouds, the foremast, the bow-sprit, the yards, every thing was sheeted with fire, which, whirling round and round, ascended spirally to the mast-head, shooting its forky tongues out on every hand, and streaming like a meteor away up into the calm, blue sky. Meanwhile the flames had broken out from the after hatch, and catching at once to the ratlins, leaped from rope to rope, ran wildly up the rigging, spread almost instantly to the huge lower sails, hissing, flashing and roaring as they went, until at length the whole ship seemed a mass of lurid fire, and nothing was left untouched but the narrow quarter deck, on which the now despairing crew had gathered in crowds, some eagerly endeavoring to lower the only boat that had escaped the flames, some frantically crying out for mercy, some cursing and blaspheming awfully in their agony, and some stretching out their hands imploringly for help.

"'Give way, my men, give way—will you see them miserably burned to death before your eyes?' I shouted, rising in the boat and waiving my hat to the sufferers, forgetting in the excitement of the moment the imminency of our own danger in case of an explosion. The poor wretches on the quarter of the burning ship answered back with a hysteric shout. Our gallant tars started, like mettled hounds at the cry, and with a few vigorous strokes we dashed up to the quarter.

"'Keep her off there,' I shouted, seeing that we should be swamped by the eagerness of the sufferers to escape; 'keep her off—jump overboard, and we'll pick you up,' I continued, as we fell off from her quarter again; and in less than three minutes the deck was bare, and our boats full of the rescued crew.

"'Mr. Danforth,' at this moment shouted Jack, from the other boat ahead: 'there's a lady and her father, they say, here—still on board—for Heaven's sake let us try to save them.'

"For one moment, as I remembered my orders, and the extremity of our danger, I paused; but when I reflected that, by departing, we should abandon two human beings to a horrid death, I hesitated no longer. Hastily learning from the mate of the vessel that they were their only passengers, and having taken refuge in the hold during the late chase, had since been forgotten—and not feeling warranted in ordering any one on so dangerous a service, I gave the boat in charge to Irvine, who had luckily smuggled himself on board, sternly bid one or two of my crew, who attempted to follow, to keep their stations, mounted her side by a rope that hung over the quarter, rapidly traversed the deck in the midst of a tremendous heat, and darted down the companion way, leaving the flames roaring not five feet from its entrance.

"The cabin was a large one, and fitted up with taste. The decorations were even luxurious, and such as I had at that time rarely seen in merchantmen. The state rooms were of mahogany, inlaid with ebony, and finished off with the greatest elegance. Curtains, apparently of damask, hung around, and the show of silver and cut glass by the companion way was even brilliant. The cabin was, however, still as death. A lady's glove lay on an Ottoman, and beside it was an open book; but no other traces of a human being were discernible around. Where could the owner of that small, delicate French glove be? Was she already a victim to the frightful element?—had the mate deceived himself in supposing she had been removed from the hold?—was there no hope, if she still lived, of reaching her in time to save her from a horrid death? All these questions flashed rapidly across my mind, and my heart sickened as I owned I could not answer them. The danger, meanwhile, grew more and more imminent. I was standing, as it were, above a mine that had been sprung, for should the flames reach the magazine inevitable destruction must ensue. Nor could that catastrophe be much longer postponed. The devouring element had already gained possession of all around, and even now might be eating its way ravenously toward it. Besides, if I paused a moment longer the fire would reach the companion way, and all hope of escape from the cabin be cut off.

"Had it been only my own life that was endangered, I would not have hesitated in perilling it the utmost; but when I remembered that a dozen gallant fellows from my crew, as well as a score of others from the rescued sufferers, would be involved in my own fate, I could not doubt as to my duty.—These reflections, however, had not occupied more than the instant in which I had been throwing open successively the doors of the different state-rooms. Alas! all were empty. With a heavy heart I was about to mount the companion way, when I noticed that a massy curtain at the further end seemed to divide off a smaller cabin aft of the one I was in.—Without a moment's delay I rushed toward it, hastily lifted it aside, and there beheld a sight I never shall forget.

"This after cabin was much smaller, but far more luxurious than the other. It was adorned with everything that taste could suggest, or wealth afford. Ottomans ran completely around it, forming a kind of divan. At one side was a harp, and beside it some music was scattered on the floor. But after the first hasty survey, I saw nothing but a group of two beings before me. One of them was a gray-haired man, apparently about sixty-five, dressed in the gentlemanly costume of a former day. He was bending wildly over the almost inanimate form of a fair girl, reclining on the cushions. Never had I seen a being who looked more beautiful than that pale, half-fainting creature seemed at that moment. One arm supported her on the divan, and the other was thrown around her father's neck, the blue veins just discernible as they stole along beneath the ivory skin. Her head rested on the bosom of her parent, and the hair, loose and unbound, streamed in dark, glossy ringlets over her snowy shoulders. At the noise made by my entrance she started, raised her head, and I could see through the tears that glistened on her lashes, one of the sweetest hazel eyes I had ever looked upon. A quick flush shot over her face, crimsoning it like a rose-leaf as she beheld a stranger; and half starting to her feet, she essayed a moment to speak, and then stood with half-opened lips, gazing almost wildly upon me.

"'For God's sake fly!' I cried, 'the ship is on fire in every part—we can barely escape by the companion way—in another instant she will blow up—why hesitate? For heaven's sake, come!'

"'Oh! sir, God bless you for this kindness—there is then hope,' exclaimed the old man—'but Isabel has fainted,' he continued; 'go, fly, I will die with her,' he added, in a voice of agony, vainly essaying to raise in his enfeebled arms the seemingly lifeless form of his daughter.

"I looked into her face. The transition from calm despair to hope had been too great, and she had indeed fainted. It was no time to hesitate. Hastily raising the beautiful stranger in my arms, I called upon the old man to follow, dashed into the front cabin, up the companion way, and to my utter horror, found the flames had just crossed the entrance. For but a second I paused. Death was behind, destruction, perhaps, before. Laying my hand upon the old man's shoulder, I urged him ahead, hurriedly threw the shawl of the fair girl around her face and form, made a bold, desperate push for life, and in another instant, amid the cheers of my men, had gained the quarter-deck. The boat shot to the side, a dozen arms were extended to receive my burden. I carefully gave it in charge to the nearest, almost slung the old man after, and springing with a bound into the stern sheets, waived my arm, and shouted—

"'Shove off—board—give way—and if ever you pulled before, pull now, for your lives, my men!'

"I was obeyed. With one soul they bent their brawny arms to the task, and while the ash almost snapped beneath them, made the boat whirl from the quarter, and then sent her with the velocity of a sea-gull over the deep. Not a word was spoken. The old man sat beside me in the bewilderment of gratitude, astonishment, and only half-dissipated fright—while the form of his still inanimate child was extended unaided, for the moment, by his side. It was, indeed, no time for delay. Every man knew we were pulling for life or death. The other boat was nearly a mile ahead, skimming swiftly along from the devoted ship. Far off on the moonlit horizon lay our schooner, with all her exquisite tracery reflected in the wave beneath, and seeming, with her thin, taper, raking masts, like some aerial vessel floating half way between sea and sky. Down to the right was the burning ship, presenting a vast body of lurid fire, that roared along her sides, streamed out her ports, eddied spirally up the masts, and leaped in huge masses straight out into the sky. Now and then, as her guns became heated, they went off with a roar like thunder. Meantime, the dense smoke, gathering in a thick cloud above, hung like a pall over the consuming ship. For some instants the flames appeared to die in part away; but all at once a stream of intense fire, that almost blinded the eyes, leaped perpendicularly upward from the decks; the horizon, for miles around, was illuminated with a light more vivid than that of the brightest noonday; a part of the foremast, lifted bodily out, shot like an arrow almost a cable length on high; a concussion ensued that made the boat shiver like a reed, and rock a moment frightfully about; and then a stunning roar followed, shaking the firmament to its centre, and sounding as if a thousand broadsides had been discharged at once. For a moment, as the burning fragments sailed aloft, falling on every hand about, while the boat rolled wildly to and fro upon the agitated swell, we held our breaths in momentary expectation of death, and I involuntarily ejaculated—

"'The Lord have mercy on us all!'

"'Amen!' said the rescued father at my side.

"But we were again almost miraculously preserved. The offing we had gained, though not sufficient to ensure safety, proved great enough to relieve us from inevitable destruction. Had any of the falling timbers, however, struck us, we should have all gone down together. As it was, it was one of the narrowest escapes I ever made, and when I gave the command to the crew to give way again—for at that terrible explosion they had as one man paused—a gush of thankfulness and devotion went up from my heart to the great Author of my being, who had thus preserved a second time my life.

"The deafening uproar, however, recalled the senses of the fair girl at my side. But I will not describe her gratitude, and that of her parent, to myself, whom they persisted in considering the preserver of their lives. Suffice it to say we were soon on board; the captain delicately resigned his own cabin to the strangers, and I then had leisure to learn some particulars concerning their history. They were easily told. Mr. Thornton, the father of Isabel, was a wealthy West Indiaman, and was just returning from Great Britain, with his daughter, who had been there for several years obtaining her education. Before the Letter of Marque sailed, she had been fitted up by Mr. Thornton in a style bordering on eastern luxury, with furniture intended principally for his mansion-house at Jamaica. But at this moment a message arrived, soliciting my presence with Mr. Thornton. As I entered the cabin, he frankly extended his hand, and presented me to his now blushing daughter—for what woman, be she who she may, can stand unembarrassed in the presence of one to whom she fancies she owes her life? I have had many moments of pleasure, but I never felt as I then felt, when Isabel Thornton, extending her delicate hand to me, with her sweetest smile, uttered her thanks.

"'But how,' said I, to change the subject, 'did it happen, my dear Miss Thornton, that you were in the cabin when the rest had escaped?'

"'In the general alarm we were forgotten, for we had been hurried to the hold during the conflict, and when the fire broke out were overlooked. We found our own way back, but only when the whole ship was in flames. We had but just reached the cabin, through a forward door below, and believing the ship destroyed, had despaired of all escape, when you—you—appeared.'

"I had forgot till this moment we were foes,' said I, gaily, determined to avoid the coming thanks.

"'But foes or not,'' continued Harry, turning to his wife with a smile, "Isabel is now my bride; and often, when I speak of the sacrifice she has made in leaving her native land for me, she reminds me, with grateful heart, that I saved her life on that eventful night."

The wife looked up as he spoke, and—sworn bachelor as I am!—I envied Harry the tender gaze of those confiding eyes.

CHEER YE UP.

BY ADELIA MORTON.

Cheer ye up, oh! stricken-hearted!
Though ye shed the silent tear;
Hope and trust should not be parted,
By the hand of doubt or fear.

Sighing mourner! does thy spirit
Bow to sorrow, sink with care?
Know that trusting souls inherit
Joy and bliss surpassing fair.

Is thy heart in trouble beating
Strong emotion? trust on still—
Hope and Faith will soon come meeting
At thy spirit's crystal rill.

There the pearls of Promise dropping,
Soon shall dazzle Hope's bright eye,
And thy Faith in sweetness stopping,
Bring thee jewels from the sky.

Is thy spirit now unstringing
Every chord of heavenly birth?
Let new Trust, her gladness bringing,
Lift thee far away from earth.

Catch thee now, thou hast a token,
Strains seraphic from on high,
Let not now thy harp be broken,
While sweet Mercy hovers nigh.

Time hath weeping, hath its burden,
Time hath sighing, Time hath care,
But beyond there is a guerdon,
Ye may gain it—it is there!

Then cheer up, oh stricken-hearted!
Spirit-calm will come to thee!
The mellow tints ye mourn departed,
Robe the sky beyond our sea!

Then be Hoping, Trusting, Praying!
Be ye steady, firm, and true!
And no more shall thou go straying,
With the better land in view.

THE CASTILIAN AND HIS WIFE.

BY ADDISON.

An inhabitant of the kingdom of Castile, being a man of more than ordinary prudence, and of a grave, composed behaviour, determined about the fiftieth year of his age to enter upon wedlock. In order to make himself easy in it, he cast his eye upon a young woman who had nothing to recommend her but her beauty and her education, her parents having been reduced to great poverty by the wars which for some years have laid that whole country waste. The Castilian having made his addresses to her and married her, they lived together in perfect happiness for some time; when at length the husband's affairs made it necessary for him to take a voyage to the kingdom of Naples, where a great part of his estate lay. The wife loved him too tenderly to be left behind him. They had not been a shipboard above a day, when they unluckily fell into the hands of an Algerine pirate, who carried the whole company on shore, and made them slaves. The Castilian and his wife had the comfort to be under the same master; who seeing how dearly they loved one another and grasped after their liberty, demanded a most exhorbitant price for their ransom. The Castilian, though he would rather have died in slavery himself, than have paid such a sum as he found would go near to ruin him, was so moved with compassion towards his wife, that he sent repeated orders to his friend in Spain, (who happened to be his next relation) to sell his estate, and transmit the money to him. His friend hoping that the terms of his ransom might be made more reasonable, and unwilling to sell an estate which he himself had some prospect of inheriting, formed so many delays, that three whole years passed away without anything being done for the setting them at liberty.

There happened to live a French renegado, in the same place where the Castilian and his wife were kept prisoners. As this fellow had in him all the vivacity of his nation, he often entertained the captives with accounts of his own adventures; to which he sometimes added a song or a dance, or some other piece of mirth, to divert them during their confinement. His acquaintance with the manners of the Algerines enabled him likewise to do them several good offices. The Castilian, as he was one day in conversation with this renegado, discovered to him the negligence and treachery of his correspondent in Castile, and at the same time asked his advice how he should behave himself in that exigency: he further told the renegado, that he found it would be impossible for him to raise the money, unless he himself might go over to dispose of his estate. The renegado, after having represented to him that his Algerine master would never consent to his release upon such a pretence, at length contrived a method for the Castilian to make his escape in the habit of a seaman. The Castilian succeeded in his attempt; and having sold his estate, being afraid lest the money should miscarry by the way, and determining to perish with it rather than lose one who was much dearer to him than his life, he returned himself in a little vessel that was going to Algiers. It is impossible to describe the joy he felt upon this occasion, when he considered that he should soon see the wife whom he so much loved, and endear himself more to her, by this uncommon piece of generosity.

The renegado, during the husband's absence, so insinuated himself into the good graces of his young wife, and so turned her head with stories of gallantry, that she quickly thought him the finest gentleman she had ever conversed with. To be brief, her mind was quite alienated from the honest Castilian, whom she was taught to look upon as a formal old fellow unworthy the possession of so charming a creature. She had been instructed by the renegado how to manage herself upon his arrival; so that she received him with an appearance of the utmost love and gratitude, and at length persuaded him to trust their common friend, the renegado, with the money he had brought over for their ransom; as not questioning but he would beat down the terms of it, and negociate the affair more to their advantage than they themselves could do. The good man admired her prudence, and followed her advice. I wish I could conceal the sequel of this story, but since I cannot, I shall despatch it in as few words as possible. The Castilian having slept longer than ordinary the next morning, upon his awaking found his wife had left him. He immediately arose and inquired after her, but was told that she was seen with the renegado about break of day. In a word, her lover having got all things ready for their departure, they soon made their escape out of the territories of Algiers, carried away the money, and left the Castilian in captivity: who partly through the cruel treatment of the incensed Algerine his master, and partly through the unkind usage of his unfaithful wife, died some few months after.

THE UNHAPPY WIFE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"You don't seam happy, Margaret," said Mr. Jones to his wife, in a kind voice, seating himself, as he spoke, beside his dejected-looking partner, whom he found upon the sofa in the parlor. He had just returned from his store, in the evening, after a day of more than usual business anxiety.

Tears came into the eyes of Mrs. Jones. But she made no reply.

"Has any thing happened to give you pain?" asked the husband, in the same kind voice.

But there was no answer. The fact was, Mrs. Jones could not answer the question, for although she felt very unhappy, she did not know from whence her unhappiness proceeded. Her silence, while it convinced Mr. Jones that nothing more than usual had occurred to distress his wife, had the effect to oppress his own feelings with a heavy weight. He understood that she had fallen into one of her melancholy states, the cause of which he had yet been unable to determine, and for which he had not, of course, found any remedy.

A shadow fell gloomily over the feelings of Mr. Jones. He, in turn, became silent and depressed—During the whole day his mind had been more than usually anxious in regard to his business. Heavy payments were maturing fast, while the funds for meeting his obligations came in with unusual tardiness. This had disturbed his thoughts a good deal. But when he left his store in the evening, like a wise man, he left his cares behind him, and looked toward home with the pleasing expectation of there finding that sweet repose of mind which he so much needed. As has been seen, in this he was doomed to be disappointed. Mrs. Jones had fallen into one of her periodical fits of melancholy, for which no cause was apparent to his mind, and which, for this very reason, distressed him the more. Ten years' experience had satisfied him that, when in this unhappy state, it was useless to make any effort to lift her out of it. Heretofore, every such effort had been perfectly futile. Like an attack of measles, it had its incipient stage, its climax, and its decline.—Medicines seemed rather to exacerbate than palliate the symptoms, and, therefore, like a wise physician, he chose rather to keep away, as far as possible, all exciting causes, and let the disease run its course.

The evening meal was passed in perfect silence. After it was over, Mr. Jones thought of asking his wife to go with him to hear a celebrated singer, who gave a concert that night. But, satisfied, from former experience, that "no" would be answered to his proposition he wisely forbore doing so.

On the next morning, as Mr. Jones had expected, his wife did not rise. He asked, as in duty bound, how she felt?—if she were sick?—what he should get for her? etc., but received, as usual in such cases, no reply. He sat down to breakfast with his children; poured out the coffee for them, and attended to their wants at the table. He ate but a few mouthfuls himself. After giving directions to the cook about dinner, he went to his store with a heavy heart. Mr. Jones loved his wife. To see her unhappy, always oppressed his feelings. But, to see her unhappy without any knowledge of the cause, made him wretched.

Throughout that day it seemed as if every event was of a nature calculated to disturb the mind of Mr. Jones. At dinner time his wife, in accordance with his expectations, was in bed. He spoke to her kindly, but received no answer. This did not surprise him. He had looked for nothing else. The evening brought no change. Mrs. Jones was still in bed. The small portion of her face that could be seen above the pillow in which it was buried, did not make the husband very desirous of seeing more. That sample was enough to give him a very fair idea of the character of her whole countenance. After tea, every thing being so still and gloomy at home, Mr. Jones went to a public house, where he drank a glass of ale, smoked a cigar, and talked politics for a couple of hours. He then came home and retired for the night.

Not until the afternoon of the next day, did Mrs Jones leave her bed. When her husband came home to tea, he found her, much to his satisfaction, in the dining-room. But he said nothing. The disease had reached its highest point and was now on the decline. He was content to let it go off in due course, because he knew very well, that any attempt on his part to hasten its departure, would only retard that anxiously looked for event.

A day or two more, and all was again sunshine in Mr. Jones' dwelling. His wife went singing about as gaily as a bird.

"If it were only always so," sighed Mr. Jones to himself, "I would be the happiest man in existence. But where can lie the cause of these unhappy periods? Something is wrong. What can it be?"

To determine this question was, however, beyond the power of Mr. Jones. He could imagine no adequate cause.

"I think, dear," said his wife to him, one day, "that we should be a great deal happier in the country. I know it would be better for the children — Poor little things! They are so confined here. There we should have pure air and freedom. Instead of hot brick walls and filthy streets, we should have open fields, with trees, and flowers, and the sweet breath of Heaven. Oh, it would be delightful! I am sure I should be the happiest creature in the world."

The idea of making his wife happy was sufficient to give almost any proposition a favorable aspect in the eyes of Mr. Jones. He was not himself fond of the country. Raised in a city from boyhood, his habits were formed for city life. His business, too, required him to be every day in town. Still, if it would make Margaret happy, that was sufficient to gain his approval. A pleasant house, with a garden and several acres of good land surrounding it, was rented, and his family removed to the country.

"Oh, this is delightful!" exclaimed Mrs. Jones, on alighting from the carriage that had conveyed her husband, herself and children to their new home, to which all the furniture had been removed and arranged by a competent person, while Mrs. Jones and her little ones remained for a couple of days at the house of a friend in the city. "I shall be as happy here as the day is long. How sweet the odor of that new hay! How rich these beds of flowers! How spirit-stirring the song of birds! How soothing the low hum of bees! This is indeed life! Who would be content to live in a pent up city? '

"It's pleasant, certainly," returned Mr. Jones, in a more quiet way. And it was pleasant to him.—He perceived and enjoyed all the things to which his wife had alluded. They soothed his care-worn spirit, and refreshed his senses.

For a few days, Mr. Jones was really happy. But she was the same woman as before. The causes of disquiet were internal and not external. In leaving the city, she could not get away from herself. Change of scene did not change the causes of unrest that lay hidden in her own bosom. After awhile she ceased to perceive the sweet odors that were borne upon the air. The warblings of merry songsters were unheard. The flowers, Spring's lovely children, were unseen. She grew lonely, and sighed for companionship.

With a sad heart, the husband soon saw that a country life was not the specific for his wife's malady. All doubts on this head were removed at the end of a month, when she had an attack of melancholy, and kept her bed for a week Her wish to return to the city in the fall was not opposed by Mr. Jones. He preferred a town to a country life, although he had not said so.

As before, every few weeks Mrs. Jones would sink into a gloomy state, and remain so for several days; and, as before, the cause was altogether hidden from her husband. He was careful that she should be burdened as little as possible. He employed a waiter about the house; and permitted her to keep a nurse, a chambermaid, a seamstress and a cook.—Every want she expressed was gratified, and much anticipated. But, instead of improving, Mrs. Jones grew worse and worse. It seemed as if the more of external good she possessed the least she enjoyed.

In the hope of diverting her mind, Mr. Jones took her during the winter to many places of fashionable resort and amusement: such as assemblies, concerts, the theatre, etc. He also encouraged her to give a large party, which laid her under a kind of obligation to attend such as were given by any who had been her own guests. In this way the season passed amid a gay round of festivity and amusement, into which Mrs. Jones entered with a keen zest. Her husband had never seen her so full of life before. Two months had passed, and not once during that time had she felt depressed in spirits. Mr. Jones was much encouraged. It was evident, to his mind, that it was plenty of society that his wife wanted: and this he meant to see was provided for her.

Towards spring, as fashionable assemblies became less and less frequent, Mr. Jones could see that old visitations were returning upon his wife. He would often find her, on returning home, sitting by herself, with a dreamy, absent look in her eyes. How to meet such states in their incipiency and throw them off, he did not certainly know. Sometimes he would propose going out to see a friend, or a visit to the theatre. But these propositions were rarely accepted. Occasionally he could get her interested in the future prospects of their children: especially of Helen, their oldest girl, now between eight and nine years of age. But his resources were small, and even they not skilfully brought into action.

The fact was, Mr. Jones was a merchant in feeling as well as by profession. In other words, Mr. Jones took but little interest in any thing that did not pertain to business. A poor boy, with few opportunities for the improvement of his mind, he was placed at an early age in a store. Intelligent and industrious, and, withal, ambitious to rise, he soon made himself of value to his employers. Little beyond the sphere of trade approached his mind near enough to effect it with any permanent interest. Books were resorted to but rarely. His reading was confined mainly to the newspapers, and the topics that took hold upon his mind were those connected with politics, and the passing events of the day. For a year or two after having attained his majority, he remained in the store where he had served his time. Then he commenced business in connexion with a young man who had a good cash capital, and credit to a large amount whenever it was needed. This young man was the son of a wealthy merchant, who had become such by his own vigorous exertions. But, like too many similarly situated, he was content to have his children educated entirely at schools, seminaries, and colleges.—He did not bring them occasionally in contact with real life, early, and let them feel its peculiar strong tendencies, standing beside them as he did so, and guarding and guiding their young minds into the truth made indelible by feeling experience. The consequence was, that, when they did enter upon life, at the ages of moral responsibility, the whole world was new to them. When they did take the rudder into their own hands, they knew nothing of the stream down which they were gliding. All was yet to be learned.

The partner of Mr. Jones had a sister named Margaret, a girl of fine taste, and good education. She had remained at school until her eighteenth year.—During the last year of her school-girl days, she contracted an intimate friendship with a young lady o her own age, with whom nearly all her time not occupied in study was spent. Both were fond of reading, and, as might be expected, works of imagination. They not only read these together, but talked together of their contents, and of their own bright future, made brighter by their fond fancies. To them the world into which they were entering was full of all their hearts could wish. In the most perfect sympathy with each other, did that last year of girlhood pass. Purely and fervently did they love each other, and their love made them happy.

Margaret left school and returned home about the period at which her brother entered into business with Mr. Jones. The first time she met that individual, she thought him the dullest creature she had ever seen, and did not hesitate to laugh outright as soon as he had departed. Her brother mildly chid her, but this only provoked greater merriment, and caused her to launch against him sundry keen shafts of ridicule. Her estimation of Mr. Jones did not change much during the first year. In that time she met him occasionally, and as she knew him better, could perceive his good qualities. Still, her beau ideal of a young man was so different from Thomas Jones, that the mental contrast always produced a merry peal of laughter.

For Mr. Jones to meet Margaret frequently was to love her. Before a year rolled round, he felt that his happiness depended upon his being able to secure both heart and hand of the lovely girl. He had observed enough to satisfy him that Margaret did not look upon him with a very favorable eye, and that, sometimes, it was hard work for her to treat him with civility. But, 'faint heart never won fair lady,' was his motto. He determined to lay a siege, trusting to patient perseverance for the accomplishment of his end.

He was successful—but the siege was a long one, and vigorously prosecuted. When the fair one at length yielded, it was not with a joyous impulse, but was, rather, a compromise with her objections. She would not have chosen Mr. Jones, but she did not see how she could longer refuse him. And so they were married. He made her a kind, devoted husband, for he loved her fervently. But there was little in his mind that she could love, and hers became not, therefore, a mirror in which his thoughts were reflected. There did not take place that interior conjunction of mind and heart, from which, and from which alone, comes happiness in marriage. As far as he was concerned, the lack of this was made up by the abstraction of his thoughts in business — He had a defined pursuit in life, and this absorbed the larger portion of his time. Not so his wife. She had nothing upon which to fix steadily her mind. In her household she had little care; every thing was delegated to others. There was a domestic to fill every department. She had, therefore, plenty of leisure, in which thought, instead of going out in pursuit of the means for the attainment of ends, could turn back, and corrode like a canker her own bosom. The daily return of her husband was not looked for with the interest that return would have excited, had he been a man of cultivated taste, and with habits of mind at all congenial with her own. The genuine warmth of his manner always made, however, his return pleasant—always awakened a glow of pleasure in her heart.

From this brief history, the reader will be able, for himself, to determine, to some extent, the cause of Mrs. Jones' periodical fits of despondency. They showed themselves, at first, only in states of pensive abstraction of mind, that remained for a few days, and then passed off. Gradually, they became more and more defined, until they arrived at the stage already described.

And now we will resume the broken thread of our narrative. As spring advanced, Mrs. Jones relapsed into her old states of melancholy. Her husband became really discouraged. It seemed to him that his wife could have no real love for either himself or her children. If so, why indulge such wretched feelings while she had them to minister to and make happy? Five years before, he had dissolved his connexion with her brother, and was now acting alone. Her father had been dead three years. He left her a fortune of forty thousand dollars. Most of this was in her husband's business. This business, in spite of Mr. Jones' most devoted efforts, had been falling into embarrassment for some time, in consequence of over-trading and heavy losses. He had, therefore, anxious care through the day, and often the most wretched feelings when he came home at night, and found his wife in one of her gloomy conditions.

Spring passed away, and summer came.

"Mr. and Mrs. Lorman are going to make the tour of the Lakes this summer," Mrs. Jones said to her husband one evening. "I should dearly love to be of the party, if you could leave your business."

Mr. Jones could not well be absent. But nothing of this was intimated. He was so much concerned on his wife's account, that he was willing to submit to any sacrifice to meet an expressed desire. Making hasty, and consequently, imperfect arrangements, to leave his business, Mr. Jones declared himself ready to accompany his wife in the proposed tour. They started, in company with Mr. and Mrs. Lorman, taking with them their oldest child. After spending a week at Saratoga, the party went to the Falls of Niagara. From Buffalo, after another week, they embarked for Chicago. Thence they passed over to St. Louis, and down the river to the mouth of the Ohio. Louisville, Cincinnati, Wheeling and Pittsburg, came next in their route, as they turned their faces homeward. Three days' journey in stage, rail-road and steamboat, brought them to the place from which they had started, all glad to get back, but none more so than Mrs. Jones. She had felt miserable for a week. For three days she had not spoken to any one, not even so much as replying to her husband's oft-repeated question, if there was nothing that he could get or do for her. At Saratoga, Mrs. Jones had enjoyed herself wonderfully. The visit to Niagara was also delightful. But the first day's sail on the lake made her sick, and she was not able to hold up her head until their arrival at Chicago. The journey from thence to St. Louis had no attractions. For the first day, on leaving St. Louis, the river scenery interested her, but she tired of its sameness after that. From the mouth of the Ohio to Pittsburg, but little had a charm for her eye, that, for a greater portion of the time, although it looked abroad, took intelligent observation of nothing. The retina was impressed, but the mind perceived it not. From the time of leaving Pittsburg till their arrival at home, her spirits were down to the lowest ebb.

Poor Mr. Jones was in despair. If this state of things continued, he did not know how soon his wife's lady would take a permanent form in a confirmed mental derangement. But an inspection of his business on arriving at home, gave him other and more absorbing causes of concern. His paper had been dishonored, and his credit, in consequence, so severely shocked, that he found himself in imminent danger of ruin. Business had been suspended until his return, which would have taken place weeks before, had not his letters failed to reach him. A few days of anxious investigation, revealed to the trembling merchant the dreaded truth, that he was a ruined man. A meeting of creditors was called, and an assignment made of all his effects.

During the progress of these distressing events, Mr. Jones had not been able to summon sufficient courage to disclose the truth to his wife. For days after their return, she had been too much depressed in feeling—too really wretched—to notice the dark shadow that rested upon her husband's face. Her attention was first directed to him by noticing one night that he walked the floor of their chamber in evident agitation of mind, for more than an hour after his usual time for retiring. Her thoughts once fixed upon an object out of herself, and that object her husband in apparent distress, her own undefined and undefinable state of dreamy wretchedness began to subside.

In the morning, her first thoughts were of her husband. He had already arisen, when she awoke, and left the chamber. For three days she had not met the family at table. The thought of this, connected with the remembrance of her husband's agitation, too plainly exhibited on the night before, quickened her conscience as by a painful sting. She had never before seen him so moved; for he had always carefully striven to conceal from her whatever trouble and anxiety he might feel.

Arising quickly and dressing herself, Mrs. Jones went to the nursery to look at the children, her first visit to them for three days. The little things crowded around her, climbing up into her lap, twining their arms around her neck, and kissing, with childish fondness, her cheeks, lips, and forehead. Her bosom throbbed with a warm impulse of delight. She remained with them until the breakfast bell was wrung, and then joined her husband at the table. He lifted his eyes to her face as she entered, and smiled faintly. Her heart bounded with a quick throb the moment she saw the expression of his countenance. To her a dreadful change had passed over it. His brow, ever so smooth and calm, was heavy and corrugated, as by intense, anxious thought;—his lips were compressed to half their ordinary volume—and his eyes had a strange, fixed, troubled expression. He ate only a few mouthfuls, and then left the table and retired from the house, seeming to be altogether unconscious of the presence of any one.

"Mercy! what can have happened?" ejaculated Mrs. Jones, rising involuntarily and leaving the breakfast room with two of the children seated at the table. Until dinner time, she had no thought but for her husband. He was evidently in deep trouble, and that awakened all her sympathies. He was nothing changed in appearance when he came home at dinner time. She spoke to him in a kind voice, and he looked up in evident surprise.

"What is the matter, husband?" she asked, laying her hand tenderly upon his arm, and looking him with anxious interest in the face.

There was something so affectionate and earnest in his wife's manner, that Mr. Jones was taken by surprise. He replied, without time for reflection:

"I am a ruined man, Margaret! But, were it not for you and the children, I would not care."

"Ruined! Ruined!" murmured Mrs. Jones, in a bewildered manner. "How? What?"

"During our Northern and Western tour, my business became embarrassed, and some of my paper was dishonored. It was too late, when I returned, to repair the injury. There was nothing left me but to call a meeting of my creditors, and assign all my effects into the hands of trustees. This latter is now about being done. I shall come out a ruined man. But still, with a fine character, unbroken spirits, and a knowledge of business that will, I trust, put me on my feet again in a few years."

"Then why despond?" asked Mrs. Jones, in a tone of confidence.

Her husband started, and looked her in the face for a moment, doubting if he had heard aright.

"I only despond for your sake," he replied, after a short pause.

"And why for my sake?"

"You will not be able to bear the change. All this elegance, and luxury, and ease, will pass away, Margaret." His voice trembled. "Ah! my poor wife! I fear that you will not be able to bear it."

"All we have possessed has, at least, not made me happy," the wife returned. Her voice trembled likewise, and was low and somewhat plaintive. Her feelings shrunk instinctively at the change her husband had predicted. But she felt a new love for, and a new confidence in him, blended with something of that heroic spirit which sustains a wife amid the severest trials.

"Margaret!" said the husband at length, in a firm voice, "can you stand up bravely by my side in this trial? Will your love for me keep you up? Can you forsake all for the sake of your husband and children?"

"Try me!" was the firm reply.

"I will!"

"And you shall not be disappointed," she returned, leaning her head against his bosom.

From that moment Mr. Jones had a cheerful, confident spirit. He passed through the trying ordeal of giving up every thing into the hands of his creditors, without once flinching. He had feared for his wife, when she should be called upon to abandon the luxury and elegance to which she had always been used. But he did not know what was in her. Ease had suffered the rust to accumulate upon her real internal character. But the stroke of misfortune's hammer had shivered off the dimming scales, and now she stood forth in the brightness of a woman's true nature.

They had three children, the youngest but two years old at the time the event occurred.

"We shall have to give up our waiter," Mr. Jones said, when they were prepared to move into a small house, far away from the fashionable neighborhood in which they had for years lived.

"Of course," was promptly replied. "And the nurse also. I must now take the entire charge of my children."

"But, I am afraid it will be too much for you."

"Do you think we can afford to keep these servants?"

"I do not," Mr. Jones said. "I shall enter again into my business. But it will be in a small way, and without capital. Our income will be limited."

"That settles the matter at once. I must be my own nurse. I have been thinking seriously over this matter for some time, and it seems to me clearly wrong for any woman to delegate her duties so fully as I have done. Perhaps," and her voice faltered, "all this trouble has been sent upon us that I might be made to see and do my duty as a woman and mother. You are called upon to suffer for my supineness."

In a few weeks they were settled down quietly in their new home. Mrs. Jones found enough to do for her husband and children, to keep head and hands both in constant occupation. She had no time for lowness of spirits—and, in fact, no cause. Her malady had arisen from a want of active interest in others. This she now had. Her body was often wearied, but duties well done left behind them a cheerful spirit. Mr. Jones found that it was as much as he could do to meet the expense of his family. His children were growing up, and it cost no small sum to educate them. His wife was, in consequence, not suffered to relax in her efforts. And this was well for her. Constant occupation, and her portion of this world's cares and anxieties were the medicaments her case required. When freely administered, they proved fully efficacious.

THE MARTYR WIFE.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

Chapter I.

A fair-haired girl, with a pure, bright complexion, and eyes of the softest blue, sat partly shading her face with her hand as she bent over a volume, deeply absorbed in its contents. It was evening, and as she sat near the light, it fell strongly upon her. With her dress of virgin white, and sunny countenance, all reflecting vividly the rays that streamed forth from a gas lamp, she looked like an image of innocence—but too delicate and fragile for a world of such severe realities as this.

More in the shadow of the room, yet still in clear light, sat the father and mother of the young lady. Their eyes were upon her, and moistened from feelings of exceeding tenderness, mingled with the consciousness that this, their beloved one, could not always thus be perfectly sheltered from the wind and the tempest—that she was a child of earth, although, seemingly, untainted by an earthly stain, or disturbed by a thought of evil.

"Florence, dear," the father said, after the passage of nearly an hour, during which he had been at times silent and thoughtful, and at times interested in some remarks either of his own or the mother of his child. "Florence, dear, you have enjoyed your book a good while now—won't you play and sing for me a little?"

"Certainly I will."

And the fair girl closed her book, and looked up with a sweet smile, that was full of tenderness and affection. She was, indeed, exquisitely lovely—and with this loveliness was blended something that did not seem of the earth, earthy. Her brow was high and white, her eyes soft, yet brilliant and full of expression. Her cheek, upon which rested a delicate bloom, that seemed as if it would fade every moment, was gently rounded into a healthy fullness, and yet it seemed as if it could not be flesh and blood that lay concealed beneath its pure transparent skin. A mouth formed to convey, in its rapid, yet delicate variations of expression all the good and affectionate impulses of her mind, gave a living and intelligent grace to her whole countenance. And the beauty of all these was heightened by the luxuriant tresses that fell in sunny ringlets about her neck and face, gracefully swaying and catching a thousand changing reflections of light, as her head partook of the gentle motions of her body.

No wonder that Mr. and Mrs. Allison were fond of their child. No wonder that they loved her with unspeakable tenderness. For her body but fitly corresponded with the loveliness of her mind.

Rising from her place at the centre-table, where she had been reading, Florence took up the guitar, and after passing her fingers for a few moments over the chords with practised touches, commenced warbling, in a low, thrilling voice, a sweet ballad of the olden time. Beautifully did her voice blend with the tones of the instrument, giving to them a richness and exquisiteness of expression not legitimately their own. Thus did she sing song after song, until, wearied, she laid aside her guitar, with the silently uttered blessings of her parents upon her head.

Florence Allison was just eighteen—that tender age at which we so often see the slender girl suddenly assuming the rounded contour and quiet demeanor of the woman. That age so beset with unknown dangers. That age, when the heart swelling with "tenderness suppressed," is ready to pour out its treasures at the feet of him whose touch shall first unseal the hidden waters—pure as crystal, and sweet as virgin innocence itself.

"I tremble when I think of our dear child," Mr. Allison said, after Florence had left them for the evening, and retired to her chamber. "This is too sad a world, and the way through it is too rough for one like her."

"Indeed it is," returned the mother. "She is far too beautiful not to attract admirers. But who is worthy to take her hand? I know of none."

"Nor I. But we are known to be rich, and our daughter's hand will be assuredly sought, not from a pure desire to possess that hand, but the wealth that will go with it. Pray Heaven, that no base wretch, with such motives, may succeed in winning her heart. If so, our gray hairs will assuredly go down in sorrow to the grave—sorrow for the anguish, and perchance early death, of a broken-hearted child. We must watch over her with tenfold greater vigilance than we have hitherto exercised."

Mr. Allison spoke with earnestness and emotion.

"Still, let us hope for the best. Surely, one so innocent as she, will not be suffered to become the victim of a heartless money-seeker."

"Others, as innocent and lovely, have not escaped that sorrowful condition," replied Mrs. Allison, gloomily. "I have sometimes wished that she were a plainer girl."

Thus conferred the parents, while the child was sleeping sweetly upon her pillow, her mind filled with pleasant dreams—dreams of one who had claimed many hours of her waking thoughts through the previous day.

As she lay thus, gently wrapt in slumber, a young man, in a distant part of the city, sat writing a letter, a portion of which ran thus.

"You say, Harry, that old Gripe threatens to send on his account and sue me here. For Heaven's sake choke him off a little while longer! Trump up any tale, I don't care what. Say I'm not here, if that will do. That I left for New Orleans on the first of the month. Any thing at all to stave the old rascal off, until—Ah! 'until what?' you will ask.

"Harry, I have met an angel here! And if I'm not mistaken, she is going to lift me out of all my difficulties—for, besides being an angel, her old father is as rich as a Jew. Can I get her? you will ask. Verily, that is the question! But, I'm at least determined to have the merit of trying, even if I don't succeed. She is just eighteen, innocent as a lamb, and with a heart just ready to lavish its treasures of love upon the first one who comes along. I must be that fortunate one, if possible. With such an Eve by my side, the whole world would be a Paradise—especially, as by the power of an enchanter, she could subdue all the wild beasts of duns, who now beset my path, and send them off to their own waste, howling wilderness. I could love her, Harry. Yes—I do love her now, with the fervor of an Orpheus. And I can and will make her happy, if I can get her. If I can only win her, I will wear her proudly.

"Last night I met her for the third time, and unaccompanied by her parents, who watch over her as vigilantly as did the dragon of old over the golden apples in the garden of the Hesperides. And well they may, for she is a prize for which many will contend—and some far less worthy than your friend. I was not long in getting by her side, and when once there, you may be certain that I put on my very best clothes. I was really eloquent, at times, in my conversation—entirely surpassing myself—and you know that, at any time, I have a pretty smooth tongue in my head. I am in a state of wonder now, when I think how I talked to her. How ideas flowed into my mind, just as I wanted them, and formed themselves on my tongue into most eloquent sentences.—The fates were doubtless in my favor. She was taken with me, I could see plainly enough.

"If I can once get her, and thus form an alliance with the Allison's, I shan't care the snap of my finger for my old man. However, in that event he will at once have a better opinion of me. Strange, how a little alteration in external circumstance, alters the opinion of one's real quality in some people's minds!

"Write to me immediately, and tell me what you have made out of that Shylock, Gripe. More anon."

The young man who penned this characteristic epistle, was named George Campbell, the son of a high-minded, honorable citizen of a Southern State, well known for his virtues and the able manner in which he had filled several public stations of responsibility and usefulness. Thrown among companions of loose habits and looser principles while at College, the son had become so sadly corrupted, and so confirmed in idle and vicious courses, that his father lost nearly all control over him. For some time he had continued to supply him with money; but as this only gave him the power of free indulgence in evil courses, Mr. Campbell was finally compelled to cut him off with but a small annual stipend. His wants being far greater than his income, debts rapidly accumulated on his hands, and subjected him to the worst of all annoyances, duns for money, when the pockets are empty. This drove him to the necessity of doing something by which to raise money. For a time, he connected himself with a company of men trading from the Middle to the Southern States in slaves. In this way he obtained a few hundred dollars that were speedily dissipated, part in gay living, and part at the gaming table, to which he resorted in the hope of bettering his fortunes. There he became linked in with a party of gamblers, and acted for some time in the execrable capacity of a stool-pigeon, by which he realized handsome profits. In this, however, there was something so detestably false-hearted and base, that the small portion of unextinguished principle remaining in him, rebelled, and he broke himself loose from the vile association.

After this, with a few hundred dollars in his pocket, he came to P———, the residence of Mr. Allison. Here he had lived under more restraint than was habitual to him, and, on the strength of his father's good name, mixed pretty freely in good society. In doing so, he came in contact, as has been seen, with Florence, and determined, if possible, to secure her hand.

In the incipiency of this determination, although its prompting motive was the base desire of forming a rich connection, there came into activity some of the better feelings of his nature. About Florence, there was something that awoke purer sentiments and better resolutions than he had experienced for a long time. And yet, the highest emotion he was capable of feeling, was far too selfish and gross, to form any thing like a true conjoining principle between him and such a being as Florence Allison. She might, indeed, love that with which her fond imagination invested him—but he could never make her truly happy.

Chapter II.

Three weeks from the time the letter was written, an extract of which is contained in the proceeding chapter, another epistle was penned, of which the following is a portion:

"I declare, Harry, I am half inclined even now to give up the effort. I can win her,—of that I am satisfied. Indeed, I have her heart now, in spite of her father, whose dragon-like watchfulness has not prevented my feasting my eyes on his golden fruit. Then why give up? You will ask. For the very strange reason, so you will say, that she is too good for me. But that is the fact. I never, in my life, met with so pure a being—and she is as wise as she is pure. She utters sentiments, at times, that really make me feel as if I were suffocating, for they seem to surround me with an atmosphere so subtle that I cannot respire in it. If ever I am in love with virtue, it is when I listen to her low, sweet voice giving utterance to heavenly precepts, for none other ever fall from her lips.

"I can never make her happy. That is clear. And knowing this, will it not be acting a cruel part, Harry, for me to entail upon her a life-time of misery? I think so. And yet, is it not possible, that a union with her may elevate me, and make of me a wiser and a better man? Sometimes I think so.—And then again I am satisfied that what is bred in the bone, as they say, is not going to come out of the flesh. I am too old now, and know a little too much to be put in leading strings by a woman.

"Old Gripe, you say, is savage against me. Confound him! I wish he were dead. The fact is, I must push my fortunes with Florence as my only chance. There are several other girls here, of whom a handsome fellow like me, with a smooth tongue in his head might easily get the blind side, but I don't fancy them. It's one thing to get a wife with money, and another thing to get one with whom you can bear to pass a whole life-time. I wish Florence had a little more spice in her composition—a little of the devil in her eye: then we might jog along, and jar a little occasionally, and so get on comfortably. When I marry, it ought to be a woman of some considerable spirit and independence. One who could bear a little neglect, and wildness on my part occasionally, and even pull my ears, when in the humor. But Florence Allison is not of that stamp. If I were to neglect her, she would rebuke me only by a sad quiet look of distress, and a pale cheek. Perhaps I might even surprise her in tears. But she would never remonstrate, never chide—and if I continued my neglect, would, like a flower shut out from the light, wither, and droop, and die. I shouldn't like that. I don't want such a sin upon my conscience. And yet, what am I to do? Here is a flower in my path, waiting for my hand. Why not pluck it and wear it upon my bosom? Advise me, Harry."

While George Campbell was writing this letter, Florence was holding converse with a very dear young friend, between whom and herself existed a congeniality of feeling and sentiment. They had on the evening before attended the wedding of one of their young companions.

"Mary looked sweeter than I ever saw her," remarked the friend.

"But did you not think there was often an expression of sadness on her face? A withdrawal of external sight from surrounding objects, and a looking inward. It seemed so to me. And no wonder. Marriage is a solemn thing, and the marriage relation mysterious and holy. Who can enter into it without serious thoughts? Surely I could not."

"But I see no reason," returned the friend, "for sadness. They who marry, love each other above every thing in the world, and for such to be joined together, never to be separated during life, it seems to me must be of all things most delightful."

"And so it doubtless is," Florence said, while her voice slightly trembled, and her eye felt the gathering moisture. "But in that union, as in death to the good man who knows that he is going to his reward of eternal blessedness, there is something that causes the heart to flutter and shrink back. It is the passage of a bourne from which no traveller returns to give intelligence that can be comprehended by the virgin pilgrim to the same goal. Who, then, can stand just on the verge of that passage—that narrow space of time—and not feel her heart sink in her bosom? Certainly I could not."

"And yet, the wife's position is a higher and happier one than the maiden's."

"It is so, truly—far higher and holier—for only as a wife can a woman fill her true place in the world. Still, I have sometimes thought that as a maiden I should like to live and die. Would not you?"

"I cannot say that I would, Florence. Nor do I suppose you would, really. A lover of the right kind, I doubt not, would put all such notions to flight."

"Perhaps so," was the half-evasive reply, while her heart gave a quicker throb at the thought of George Campbell.

A month more elapsed, when Campbell called, formally, upon Mr. Allison, and asked an interview with him.

"You know my father?" began the young man, with an embarrassed air.

"By reputation, I do. I never had the pleasure of meeting him."

Then followed a silence.

"Hem! You know his standing in society, I presume?"

"O, yes. Very well. No man stands higher than he."

Then succeeded another silence, quite embarrassing to the young Campbell.

"Hem! Presuming upon my connections, I make bold to approach you upon a subject that deeply interests us both."

"Indeed, sir! And what is that?" asked Mr. Allison, quickly.

"I find myself becoming attached to your daughter, sir."

"My daughter! Impossible! When did you meet with my daughter. I have never seen you at my house."

"That is true, sir. But I have met your daughter in company, several times of late, and have only seen her to admire: and then to love her. As an honorable man, I felt it my duty to seek your permission to address her, before intruding myself into your family."

"I cannot give you that permission, sir. I know nothing of your disposition or habits. Nothing of your ability to make my daughter happy."

"Of these you cannot, of course, judge at once. But, as there exist the means of ascertaining what it is so requisite that you should know, I hope that your present ignorance of my character will not be the means of entirely excluding me from the society of Miss Allison. Let me at least visit her, while you make every necessary inquiry concerning me?"

"No, sir. I cannot do that. It would not be the course of a prudent parent. I know that it is in the power of the bad, as well as the good, to win the affections of innocence—to bind the pure and the lovely to them by chords that no human power can rend asunder. You may be, in every way, worthy the hand of my child—which hand, however, I shall not give to any one for at least two years to come—but I do not know it."

"Will you not make inquiries? Will you not take the requisite steps to satisfy yourself?"

"Most assuredly I will. But of one thing let me caution you, Mr. Campbell, and that is, not to seek, in any way, to win the regard of Florence, should you be thrown accidentally in her company. If you do so, I shall at once consider you to be void of honor, and shall turn, ever after, a deaf ear to all your overtures."

"You may depend upon me," the young man said. "But how long a time do you wish?"

"I cannot now tell. But a month or two at the least. I must be fully satisfied before I will give my consent for you to approach my child."

A letter from Campbell to his friend, written on the same day that this interview took place, will show his views and feelings in relation to the matter.

"Well, Harry, I have crossed the Rubicon," so began the letter; "to-day I have seen old Allison, and formally asked permission to address his daughter. But the way he threw cold water on it was curious. He would not consent that I should put my foot inside of his door, until he had made enquiries about my character, etc., which I should think he designs shall be thorough and extensive, for he requires at least from one to two months. I am not, in the mean time, to attempt to make any impression upon Florence, if I should accidentally be thrown into her company, under the penalty of an utter rejection of my suit. So now you see how the land lies. And then, he talks about not letting her marry for two years to come. Preposterous! As to not trying to make an impression on her if I fall in with her, that is my business. Most certainly I shall make myself as interesting to her as possible. Wouldn't I be a fool not to do so, especially as there are ten chances against, to one in my favour, in the event of his making any very minute investigations into my character. If he should decide unfavourably, as I fear he will, I have no idea of giving up the game. The fact is, I have never seen a woman who made so deep an impression on me, as Miss Allison has done. She is loveliness and innocence embodied. The music of her voice, the expression of her countenance, linger with me for days after I have met her. Her image is in every dream. Surely, the presence of such a one, ever by my side, would change my whole character. I have been a wild boy in my time, it is true. But this is, I feel, the turning point in my life.

"I have written to my father, and stated the whole matter to him freely. I have affected with him a good deal of penitence, and promised to come right home with my wife, and be all that he can ask me to be. This will, of course, excite new hopes in his mind, and cause him to put as good a face on the matter as possible when he replies to Mr. Allison, who will, no doubt, write to him in regard to me.

"And so, old Gripe really took the bait, and believes that I am in New Orleans. Ha! ha! Keep him on that scent, if you please, as steady as possible, while I lie low in this quarter, and push my fortunes with Florence Allison. All is well that ends well—Addio."

Disregarding his pledge to Mr. Allison, young Campbell sought every opportunity that presented, to insinuate himself into the good opinions of Florence. It so happened that he was a regular visitor in a family where Florence was intimate. Hence the maiden, who had already begun to feel the power of the charmer, went often, drawn by an inclination, the reason of which was unacknowledged to herself—and here she met Campbell—unknown to her parents, though not clandestinely, for she had no idea of the young man's proposal to her father, or that he even thought of her,—at least half a dozen times during the two months her father required for prosecuting his enquiries. These meetings were not without a decided effect upon her. Her young heart was won.

Skilled in the unspoken language of the heart, Campbell saw at every step the progress he was making, and knew the precise moment when he might feel certain of his prize.

When the time which was thought necessary by Mr. Allison, for the prosecution of his enquiries, had expired, Campbell waited upon him again, formally.

"Good morning," said the old gentleman coldly, as the suitor came into his presence.

"Good morning, Mr. Allison," returned Campbell, bowing politely, and permitting his features to assume a bland smile.

"Take a chair, sir."

Mr. Campbell seated himself, and then said, with affected unconcern:

"Well, sir, I suppose you have satisfied yourself in regard to me."

"I have. And what is more, have heard nothing that prepossesses me in your favour—that is, as a man suitable for my daughter to marry. I find your habits of life have been irregular, and your associates of the worst kind."

"But that is past, Mr. Allison. I am willing to acknowledge that while young I have been imprudent. But I trust I am a different man now."

"No man can pass through the flames without the smell of the fire remaining on him, Mr. Campbell. A moral character once tainted, like a polluted stream, takes a long time to run clear again. I could not trust my child with one who had ever thought lightly of virtue."

"Have you written to my father, Mr. Allison?"

"I have."

"And has he replied to you?"

"Yes, sir. Here is his letter."

And Mr. Allison handed the young man his father's communication. It ran thus:

"You place me, sir, in a most painfully trying position; one in which duty and affection come strongly into conflict. You say that my boy has asked the hand of your only daughter, who is to you as the apple of your eye—whose happiness you would sacrifice any thing in your power to maintain. You describe her as being fragile as a blossom; and one whose affections, when once called out, would be so intense and devoted, that should they not be met by one who could truly appreciate and truly love her, would, 'like a worm in the bud,' eat away at her heart, and destroy her. Were she my daughter, sir, and your son were to ask her of my hands, and I knew him to be such a one as my erring boy, I should be compelled to reject his suit. George has written to me freely of your daughter; and has described her in such terms as has made us all love her, and earnestly desire that she might make one of our family. He has, in doing so, promised much that is good in regard to the future, and I trust that his resolutions are sincere. I doubt not but that such a lovely being to stimulate him to noble ends, would modify his future life, and perhaps save him. But, sir, the experiment would be dangerous to your child. Truth requires me to say this, while my heart yearns over my son, and leaps at the thought of the alliance proposed, as the means of reclaiming him."

George Campbell read this letter over twice, and then dashed a tear from his eye, as he handed it back to Mr. Allison.

"Can you blame me, after that, for declining your proposal?" the father of Florence said, looking the young man steadily in the face.

"Perhaps not. But may I not hope to find favour in your eyes, if I return to my father, submit myself to him, and change thoroughly my course of life? I find myself deeply, and, I know, tenderly attached to your daughter."

Campbell spoke seriously; for he was in earnest.

"No, sir," was the prompt reply. "If the desire to possess the hand of my child be a motive strong enough now to cause you to give up a dissipated and vicious course of life—for such I find you have led—when you grow tired of her, as a man of your character must grow tired of every thing after a time, a desire to return to the habits which have been confirmed by your delight in them, will be strong enough to induce you to neglect, and even ill-treat her. No, sir! I cannot give you my child. I would rather see her in her grave, for then I know she would be happy."

This was spoken in an excited, tremulous voice.

Seeing that there was nothing to be gained by a further conference with Mr. Allison, Campbell arose, and bowing formally, withdrew.

"I have seen Mr. Allison to-day," he wrote to his friend, that evening, "and he has said 'no,' emphatically. He wrote to the old man, who very affectionately advised him not to have any thing to do with his dutiful son. A pretty way this to win back the penitent prodigal! Never mind! He'll be sorry for this, I'm thinking. And now, shall I back out and call myself beaten? No, I'm blamed if I do! I'll show both of them, and my old man in particular, that I can get Florence Allison in spite of his endorsement of my character. 'But, will this be prudent?' you ask. 'Won't you be encumbered with a wife, and yet not have a dollar more with which to help yourself?'—No. I think not. Allison will soon come round, for his daughter's sake. If he don't, why its easy enough to throw her upon his hands again. But I shouldn't like to do this, exactly, for in very truth I love her. Who can help loving her, that spends an hour in her company! So beautiful, so innocent, and yet so full of intelligence, beyond her years, she interests all, and binds all to her by a spell that cannot be broken.

"Yes, I will win her. In fact, I have won her. She is mine already. And I will make her happy. I will prove to them all that I am worthy of her. I will be to her all that he fond heart can desire. But will she leave her home to go with me? That is the next question. If, after her father and mother find that she loves me, and will not think of another, and they refuse to let us be married, will she leave all for me? We shall see. More anon."

Chapter III.

After Campbell had parted with Mr. Allison, it occurred to the latter that, perhaps, the young man would seek opportunities for meeting his daughter, and interest her affections while she was entirely unconscious of the character of the individual into whose company she had fallen. As soon, therefore, as he went home he sought an opportunity of conferring with Florence. He found her reading, and, seemingly, much interested in the book she held in her hand. It was a volume of poems—"The Improvisitrice and other poems, by L. E. L."—the tone and spirit of which accorded with her own feelings, just awaking under the magical touch of life's enchanting wand.

"My dear," began her father, after sitting for a few moments, "have you ever met a young man by the name of Campbell?"

Though not intended to be so, the question was asked in a tone that was full of meaning.

Florence looked up at the question, the color deepening on her cheek, and replied—

"Yes; I have met him several times of late."

"Is it possible! Where have you met him, Florence?"

"At Mrs. Carpenter's; and once or twice in company," returned Florence, the blood now mounting rapidly to her face, and an alarmed expression coming over her countenance. "But why do you ask, father?"

"I ask, my child, because I have recently learned that about him which causes me to regard him in a very unfavorable light. If he should make any effort to cultivate your acquaintance, repel him at once."

"You certainly cannot mean the Mr. Campbell of whom I speak," Florence said doubtingly.

"I mean George Campbell, a young man from the South, who has been mingling in society here for the last few months. He was at Liston's three or four weeks ago."

"The Mr. Campbell whom I have met at Mrs. Carpenter's was there on the occasion to which you allude; if he is the person you mean, he must have been most basely traduced."

"Florence, I mean the very George Campbell that you do!" Mr. Allison now said, with startling emphasis, for he became suddenly aware that the tempter had already been at work upon her—had already half won her heart. "And he is, let me assure you, a specious scoundrel. A man without principle.—The cast-off son of a high-minded father. Florence, beware of him as you would of a serpent in your path!"

As Mr. Allison uttered these words in an excited voice, Florence grew deadly pale. Her father did not fail to observe this, and guessed too well the cause.

"My dear child," he resumed, after a few moments' silence, and in a calmer voice, "I see too plainly that this person of whom I speak has, as I feared that he would, if thrown into your society, made upon your mind a favorable impression. But let that impression be instantly effaced. He is utterly unworthy of a pure heart's smallest regard. From all that I can learn of him, his life has been of the most abandoned character, and his associates the vilest of the vile. He is even now skulking in this city from the pursuit of the ministers of the law—at least, so I have been told. His father, one of the most honorable men at the South, has partially disowned him; and he is now a mere selfish fortune-hunter; a man seeking to form an alliance with some wealthy family, in order to get new supplies of money. My dear child, beware of him."

As Mr. Allison uttered the last sentence, Florence burst into tears, and rising quickly went up to her chamber.

Gradually, and almost insensibly, had her mind become first prepossessed in Campbell's favor, and then interested in him, until he had come to fill, almost constantly, her waking thoughts, and dreams by night. To have the tender emotions of her heart, that had been going sweetly forth, almost unacknowledged by herself, thus suddenly breathed upon by a wintry breath—thus checked and chilled, was more than she could bear. It was, to her, life's first dark shadow—the first cloud in a hitherto serene sky.

But did she credit her father's description of Campbell's character. Alas! no. In his deep anxiety to warn her of impending danger, he had drawn too strong a picture—he had said too much. Florence could not believe that the intelligent, winning, and apparently pure-minded young man, who had interested her so much, was the wretch her father represented him to be. It was, in her mind, impossible. She could not love anything that was not good. And he must be good, for she—no, she did not own that she loved him—at least, she did not say to herself that she did.

As for Mr. Allison, he was alarmed and distressed beyond measure. He had never dreamed, for a moment, that any serious impression had been made upon his daughter's mind. Now it was too evident that the young man, disregarding entirely his pledge, had been actively engaged in endeavoring to ingratiate himself with Florence, while he was making inquiries in regard to his character. This only tended the more stongly to confirm his mind against him.—It showed Campbell to be thoroughly unprincipled. To have acted falsely towards him, under the appearance of a great show of fairness. After a long conference with the mother of Florence, it was thought best to say nothing to her for the present, but to prevent, if possible, her meeting with the young man any more.

In the evening, when Florence again met her father, she did so with an effort to be cheerful, but the delicate bloom of her cheek had faded, and her eyes had a dreaming look. She read to her parents, and played and sang for them as before. But her voice had in it a peculiar expression that touched their feelings. In singing, it was full of an unusual pathos, and often seemed to tremble, involuntarily, as it lingered on words expressive of tender sentiments.

At an early hour she retired, after receiving from her parents the usual parting kiss. She went up to her chamber, to be alone—not to sleep. Her thoughts were too troubled for sleep. At first she sat musing near the window, looking out upon the sparkling sky—then she took up a favorite volume and read for half an hour, when tears blinded her, and she closed the book with a deep sigh. Hers was a painful struggle, and one too severe for her delicately wrought frame. It was not a struggle between duty to her parents and a wish to receive the attentions of Campbell. From the moment that she understood that her father had objections to him of so grave a nature that they could not be set aside, she considered herself as forever separated from the young man, although she did not feel the less confidence in, and attachment for him. In fact, these, strange as it may seem, were stronger than before. Her father had spoken so harshly against him, and had declared him corrupted in, to her mind, so impossible a degree, that it had upon her just the contrary effect to what had been designed. The effort with her was one of endurance. She was struggling to be resigned to the will of those to whom she had ever been in obedience, and whom she loved with the purest affection.

It was past midnight before she felt inclined to return to bed, and then she lay long awake, her mind crowded with thoughts and images that would not suffer her to sink into unconsciousness. But at last her eyelids became heavy with sleep, and gentle slumber locked up her senses in forgetfulness.

In the morning her parents saw, with feelings of pain, that their child's countenance, instead of regaining its bloom, was paler, and that her eyes had a more dreary look than on the day before. Her voice, too, was lower, and touched with a tone of sadness. They endeavored to interest her, but she only smiled at pleasant words with her face. There as no beaming forth of the soul from her countenance. Thus it went on from day to day, and from week to week, the cheek of Florence growing thinner and paler every day. She rarely went out, and evinced no desire for company, usually spending the greater portion of her time alone. She did not again visit the house where she had met Campbell so frequently, from the hour her father expressed his objection to him. And this was from design. She had no wish to meet him. The love that had been awakened in her heart, she dreamed not to be a mutual flame. It was her maiden secret, guessed at only by her parents.

Seeing that their daughter's health must suffer, vitally, unless her mind could be interested, a journey was proposed by Mr. and Mrs. Allison. She was passive in the matter, evincing no desire to go, and no particular preference for remaining at home. But, from the lethargy that was creeping over her, she was startled, on the evening before the day on which she was about to commence a journey to the Falls of Niagara, by receiving a letter from Campbell. It ran thus:

"Pardon, my dear Miss Allison, my presumption in addressing you. The strong interest you awakened in my mind on the few occasions in which I had the pleasure of meeting you, must be my excuse for doing so. It is now weeks since I have met you.—Almost every evening has found me at my friend Mrs. Carpenter's, in the expectation of seeing you as usual. But, from some cause, you have avoided visiting Mrs. C. or, indeed, as far as I can learn, any one else. Why is this? Surely it is not to avoid me? I say this, because certain persons have made representations against me, to your father, greatly to my injury; which have so prejudiced his mind as to cause him to positively refuse me the privilege of visiting you at your own house; a privilege which I had presumed to ask. From the day I was refused all opportunity in an open and manly way of endeavoring to make myself pleasing to you, I have not seen your face. And now I hear that you are about going away on a journey, to be gone some weeks.—This fact has induced me to make bold to write to you, and let you know that there is one who cares for you, and who would gladly win you. I cannot ask you to reply to this, although a line from you would be most gladly received."

Florence read the first line of this letter, and then glanced at the signature. As she did so, her heart gave a sudden bound, and the blood flew to her face in rapid currents. Then she returned to the first line and read the epistle through with surprise, and a feeling of exquisite pleasure. But this feeling of pleasure quickly subsided as she remembered her father's strong expressions of dislike towards Campbell, and the impossibility of the mutual sentiment being any thing but a source of pain to both of them.

Again she read over the letter, lingering upon each sentence, and then placed it securely under lock and key, in her drawer. But she had no thought of answering it. The passion on both sides was, in her view, a hopeless one. On the next morning, she started with her parents, on the proposed journey, from which she returned in about two weeks, paler and thinner, and more given to absent mindedness and musing, than before. All this was too apparent to Mr. and Mrs. Allison, and affected them most painfully. A realization of their worst fears had come. There was no doubt in their minds as to the cause of all this change, although their daughter had never been questioned on the subject. There was, it seemed to them, but one of two desperate causes to pursue—to let Campbell visit her, or suffer her to droop for a year or so, and then sink into her grave. From the first, their hearts turned with unconquerable repugnance—but from the last with a feeling of dread and fear, united with something of self-condemnation. And then there came pleading thoughts for the young man. He had promised amendment. Perhaps he was sincere. Perhaps it might reclaim him, and restore health to the veins and happiness to the bosom of their child. Thus were their minds held in a state of vascillation between a choice of evils, unable to decide the difficult question.

In the mean time Campbell was coolly awaiting the decision of this question, as the following will show.

"You ask in your last, how my love affair comes on. I think it is in a pretty fair way, Harry. Am I not in an interesting position? Surely, to have one of the sweetest girls in the country actually pining away for you, is extremely flattering to the vanity. Such is my case. I had a glimpse of Florence yesterday, as she passed me in her father's carriage. She looks exceedingly pale and interesting. I am told that she has never been herself since the day her father refused to let me address her. I suppose he attempted to prejudice her mind against me, and this made her conscious of how deep an impression I had made upon her heart. I wrote to her once just to let her know how I felt on the subject. She has not replied to it—I did not expect that she would. But it told, I have no doubt. The old folks took her off to Niagara, but it didn't do her any good. She came home worse than she went. The upshot will be, I suppose, an order, before long, for the attendance of Doctor Campbell. I am waiting for the summons daily. I doubt not that I shall be able to prescribe with the happiest result. My compliments to old Gripe, and tell him to keep cool a little longer,—confound him!"

Chapter IV.

"Didn't I tell you so, Harry!" so wrote Campbell, about four weeks later. "Didn't I tell you that Doctor Campbell would be called in before long? It has happened just as I predicted. Three or four days ago, I received a note from Mr. Allison, asking an interview. Of course I was in prompt attendance. I found the old gentleman in quite a state of perturbation. Florence, it seems, had become so ill as not to be able to leave her room, and her case baffled the physician's skill.

"'Mr. Campbell,' said the father, gravely, when I met him; 'I feel that I have just cause of complaint against you for the violation on your part, of a pledge solemnly made to me.'

"Of course, I was entirely ignorant of what he was driving at, and affected to be wonderfully surprised at the unexpected charge.

"'You are speaking to me in riddles, sir,' I said.

"'Did you not,' he then asked, 'promise me that, while I was endeavoring to satisfy myself of your ability to make my daughter happy, you would not seek, in any way, to win her affections?'

"'Well, sir—and did I violate that promise?' I asked confidently.

"'It would seem that you have.'

"'Appearances, Mr. Allison, are often very deceptive. While you were taking time to satisfy yourself in regard to me, I was thrown, on three or four occasions, into your daughter's company. I did not think that I ought to treat her rudely, or even with marked indifference. I only conducted myself towards her as I had on former occasions. Had I dreamed that you would have come to the extraordinary conclusion about me that you did, I might have studiedly avoided your daughter. But how could I know that the result would prove so disastrous to my hopes—to my peace of mind? I was conscious of the sincerity of my affection for Miss Allison, and conscious that in asking the privilege of addressing her, I did so with honorable ends. I knew that in former years I had been betrayed into indiscretions from unfortunate associations during my college life—but I did not anticipate that my father's stern principles, his sensitiveness in regard to the external conduct, would have had the effect to make him write such bitter things against me. There is the possibility of being mistaken, sir. Even the best and the wisest may err. My father is a good man, and I have always honored him for his high-minded integrity of character. But even my father may commit an error, and such was the case when he wrote to you as he did. But all that is past now, and to recall it can avail nothing. It has only been alluded to, incidentally, in connection with my vindication of myself from the charge you have brought against me.'

"This seemed to soften the old gentleman amazingly. After thinking for some time, he said—

"'Mr. Campbell, all you say may be true—it seems to be true. But it is past, now, and cannot be recalled, nor can the effect of your brief intercourse with my child be obliterated from her mind.'

"Then, after another long pause, he asked, in evidently a reluctant voice, and with much feeling—

"'Mr. Campbell—can I—dare I trust the happiness of my child with you?'

"'You can—you dare,' I instantly replied. 'I am, sir, not the cold-hearted, corrupt, abandoned individual you have seemed to suppose me. Your daughter I love truly, if ever man loved a woman. We do not usually seek to render those we love, unhappy.'

"Another long pause ensued, and then he said, offering his hand—

"'I give you, young man, this hand in confidence. I withdraw my refusal to let you visit my daughter. Win her, if you can. But do not—oh! do not betray the confidence this day reposed in you.'

"The old man's voice trembled as he said this. He was, evidently, deeply moved. I took the offered hand, grasped it warmly, and replied earnestly and sincerely—

"'I will never betray your confidence, sir! I will prove to you that I am not what I have been represented to be.'

"I spoke with feeling. It was a moment of triumph and pleasure. But a few weeks before, I came a suppliant for the hand of Florence, and my request was refused; now the father came to me, and offered me his child. But I bore my honors meekly. I did not insult him by flinging her back in his face. After a little while, I was asked by Mr. Allison to accompany him home. I did so. I was a little embarrassed when I met the mother of Florence. She did not receive me cordially. In fact, how could I have expected her to do so? She had never seen me, and had no doubt imbibed a prejudice against me of the strongest kind. But I soon made my way into her good graces. I was as smooth as oil, and as open, and fair, and full of pretty speeches as it was possible for me to be. After again talking over matters and things, I was asked to go up with them and see Florence. My heart beat violently, as I ascended the stairs, and I almost lost my self-possession as we paused at the door of one of the chambers. In a moment after, I was in the presence of the dear girl.

"How shall I describe her as she appeared at the moment my eyes first rested upon her? Imagine a fair-haired girl, with bright blue eyes, and a face—thin and white—white and transparent as the purest marble, polished by the most exquisite art—half-supported in bed by snowy pillows, upon which her attenuated form made scarcely a perceptible indentation—and you have a faint picture of her appearance. In one hand she held a small bunch of choice flowers, the delicate odour of which touched the sense instantly, yet almost imperceptibly. A single pale rose lay upon her pillow, close by her paler face, and seemed like a representation of the bloom that had once mantled the rounded but now sunken beauty of her cheek. Oh! what a thrill of tenderness and love passed through me, as my eyes first met this touching picture. I never saw so lovely a sight; and yet, one that so moved me to tears as it did. I could scarcely retain a manly control of myself.

"My entrance seemed to take her utterly by surprise. She had, evidently, received no intimation from her parents of the step they were about to take. Quick as a flash did the blood spring to her face, and her cheek deepened in bloom until it paled the delicately tinted rose that had blushed on the pillow by her side.

"'Florence,' I said, going instantly to the bedside, 'your father and mother have consented to let me see you, and not only to see you once, but to visit you as often as you are willing that I shall come.'

"For a moment or two she looked inquiringly and incredulously into the faces of her parents, where she read an assent to all I had said. Oh, how sweet, how exquisitely sweet was the smile that played about her lips, as she closed her eyes, and lay with her long lashes resting upon her cheeks, while the hand I had taken was gently compressed upon mine! In a little while a tear, bright as a diamond, stole out from beneath each fringing eye-lash, and lay sparkling upon her cheeks. Moved by an impulse that I could not control, I stooped down and kissed them away. As I raised up, half frightened at the liberty I had taken, her eyes opened and repaid me by a look that thrilled my whole being with delight.

"Our interview on this occasion was short, but it was sweeter to my feelings than I can describe. As for Florence, I never saw so lovely a creature. The color that had sprung so suddenly to her cheek, did not leave it, but only diffused itself more widely, thus softening its tint into one of exquisite delicacy, and giving to her whole face a tone of health beautifully contrasting with the transparent pallor that marked her countenance when I came in. On leaving her, we parted with a cheerful smile on the face of Florence, and a promise on my part to call on the next day and see her again.

"It would have done your heart good had you seen the change in the old folks towards me after we went down stairs. I sat and talked with them for an hour, and they evidently looked up to me as the saviour of their child. The good advice they gave, too, was quite edifying. But what pleased me most, was their ardent praise of Florence. It seemed as if they would never tire of expatiating on the loveliness of her character. And I do not think they estimate her too highly. She is doubtless a treasure of a daughter, and will make a treasure of a wife.

"On the next day I called, and found Florence already able to sit up. Her cheek was blushing in beauty, as it was when I parted with her on the day before. This time, we were left alone for an hour. I cannot, of course, tell you all the tender things that were uttered by me, nor give her equally tender responses. It was an hour of delicious pleasure. To-morrow, I am to see her again. For the present, I must say good-bye. Am I not in luck?"

From the moment Florence met Campbell, she was a changed being. Health and spirits came back, her countenance brightened up, her step became elastic, and even the laughter of a happy heart fell occasionally from her lips. Campbell became a daily visitor, and soon won fully the confidence of Mr. and Mrs. Allison. He was well educated, had an active mind, and had not only travelled much and seen much in his own country, but had, some years previous, made the tour of Europe with his father, and gathered, in that tour, much information of a very interesting character. He had, also, read extensively, and knew how to make good use of all he knew. His conversation was, therefore, always attractive, and his society agreeable. A few weeks' intercourse with the young man, who tried himself, convinced Mr. Allison that he had been harshly judged both by his father and others.

Towards Florence, he was untiring in his attentions, and appeared to her to possess new intellectual attractions at every recurring interview. Her innate love of the good, the true and the beautiful, was met by him with sentiments calculated to stimulate that love, and of course to exalt his character in her eyes. Gradually, her ardent mind invested him with all human perfections. He was, in her eyes, a man of the purest and noblest ends—one who would be to her like the manly oak to the tender, clinging vine, lifting her up into the pure regions of elevated thought, and high-toned principles, whither her nature tended with intense yearnings.

"How beautiful is truth," she said to him one day as they sat conversing alone. "If a character formed upon truth as a basis is so beautiful to behold—so lovely as an object of contemplation, how light, how pure, how like God himself must be truth, as a principle of life, flowing from him."

"Truth, I have read somewhere," replied Campbell, "is an entity—a real, substantial existence. A living and vital thing, that, like the germinating principle in plants, or that higher something that quickens and continues to flow into that germinating principle as a point of influx, and finding a place in the mind as a vessel or form receptive of it, causes a new formation of the character to take place—produces a new growth of ruling principles, or forms and modifications of itself, but all with truth in the centre, as a king ruling in the centre or highest place of a kingdom."

"Beautiful! beautiful!" ejaculated Florence.

"And I have further read," continued Campbell, rising into a higher and purer region of the mind, a region above, far above, the region of his ruling affections, but into which, by the power of thought, all can ascend, even evil spirits themselves, in their disembodied forms. ("The devils believe and tremble.") "I have further read, that it is not truth really that is the vital thing, but good which is in truth—good of which truth is but the form, the appearance—that which we can see, touch, handle, with our spiritual senses."

"Beautiful! Far more beautiful because it is true! It is not, then, what a man thinks and knows to be truth, that is really truth to him, but what he lives—what he makes good by bringing into actual life. It is what a man does, not what he thinks, that constitutes a true standard of estimation. It is his quality that makes him truly a man."

"Justly discriminated," Campbell said. "And the same moral qualities give to woman her true loveliness of character. We love her because she is good, as well as beautiful. Beauty fades—the intellect grows dim; but good is a positive quality, and never loses its attractive power."

This conversation will give some idea of the character of Florence Allison's mind; it will show, too, how forms of intellectual truth and moral good may be advanced, and right principles declared and approved by one who is corrupt in heart, and ruled by his evil passions instead of his understanding of the truth. And it will show how this counterfeit presentation may deceive even the purest mind, when under the control of that fond affection which is too prone to invest its object with every virtue. Another extract from one of Campbell's letters, will help to develope the interest of our story:

"Every thing is going on as merrily as a marriage bell. I am with Florence for hours every day. We have obtained the consent of her father and mother to be married in a month. I have written a long letter to my father, giving him a full history of the present aspect of affairs. Mr. Allison has also written to him. I made large promises in my letter, of future good conduct, which I mean to keep. My wild oats, I think, are all sown—at least they ought to be, for I have already reaped a pretty abundant harvest of fruitless stalks, that have not paid the trouble of gathering in.

"I have my misgivings, at times, about Florence. I am afraid that I have put on almost too many appearances of good. I am afraid, when she begins to know me more as to what I really am—when she finds out that I am not exactly a saint, as she now seems to think me, that she will make herself unhappy about it. I tell her, sometimes, that I'm afraid she estimates me too highly—that I am but a man, with a man's imperfections and weaknesses. But she always silences me when I talk so, and ingeniously insinuates that in all probability I will get the worst of the bargain. Dear, innocent creature! I wish, for her sake, I was a better man than I am. And for her sake, I will try to be. I would not draw a tear of pain from her mild blue eye, for a kingdom.

"You see, Harry, that I am a gone case. And what is more, confound me if I can help it! I only wish the dear girl had a little more spice in her disposition, as I have said before. Then I should be in freedom to act out a little of the devil that is in me; for in that case she would brighten up, and comb my head with a right good will. Then we could be even again, for in making up there would be something mutual. We would both have to repent a little—both have to confess a little,—and then we could kiss and become good friends again until next time. But this ain't going to do with Florence. She will never chide. My first indiscretion—my first coldness or seeming indifference, the first act of folly which will tear the veil from her eyes, and convince her that I am not the perfect being she has imagined me, will take the blossom from her cheek, the light from her eye, and the healthful elasticity from her step. But I will not think of this. I will not conjure up vain fears. I will be to her all she can desire. And now adieu. Write soon."

Chapter V.

"George! Who was that I saw with you in the street yesterday?"

This was asked by a female, in a quick, stern voice, at the same time that she fixed her black eyes keenly upon the young man she had interrogated.—That young man was George Campbell.

"I was with several persons yesterday. To whom do you allude, Ellen?" was the somewhat evasive answer.

"You know well enough whom I mean!" the female replied, in sharp angry tones. "I mean that flaxen-headed, milk-faced girl you have become so taken with of late."

"You speak in riddles," was the young man's apparently unconcerned rejoinder.

"Why don't you answer?" ejaculated the female, angrily stamping her foot, and looking Campbell fiercely in the face. "Who was she? Say!"

"I don't know as that is any of your business, Ellen," coolly returned Campbell, fixing his eyes with provoking indifference upon his excited companion.

"No business of mine, ha! You don't know me, George, if you think to trifle with me on this subject." Her voice was calm, and more resolute, and her eyes were upon him with an unflinching intensity. "You have linked my destiny to yours, and no earthly hand shall break the chain. I loved you, confided in you, and you sacrificed me. I love you still, but I can hate as intensely as I can love. I will not be thrown aside. I am your wife as fully and as truly as if a marriage bond united us, and I will claim you before the world as my husband, if you dare to resign me for another. I have been all along prepared for the emergency which now seems to threaten me. The cost I have coolly calculated; and have fully settled my course of action. I can be a firm, confiding, all-sacrificing friend and lover, but a bitter and persecuting enemy."

There was an energy and pathos about the woman, connected with the strong and startling language that she uttered, which broke up Campbell's assumed coldness of demeanor.

"Ellen!" he said quickly, "you are going mad certainly. The girl you saw with me was only one of the dozen young misses I have necessarily to treat with politeness, for the sake of keeping on good terms with their families."

"Wasn't it Miss Allison?" asked Ellen, compressing her lips tightly, and eyeing Campbell with a steady, penetrating gaze.

"Miss Allison! Nonsense! What put Miss Allison in your head, as if she were anything to me more than another?"

"Wasn't it Miss Allison?" Answer me that, George!"

"No—it was not. There! will that satisfy you? But you are in a strange humour, Ellen. Suppose I were to get married, for the sake of bettering my fortune—that needn't make me less attached to you."

"Married!" half shrieked the excited girl; "never! Except to me. That promise I hold, and when marriage is spoken of by you, that promise I claim.—Don't flatter yourself with the idea of leading any woman to the altar but me. It shall never be done while I live!"

"Oh, well, never mind, Ellen," Campbell said in a soothing voice. I have no thought of getting married. So you can cool yourself off and put your heart at rest."

With this assurance, his companion's excited feelings were calmed down. To this excitement succeeded a state of great depression of spirits, accompanied by a free gush of tears, in the midst of which Campbell left the apartment in which the scene just described had occurred. Half an hour after he was beside the pure-minded, innocent-hearted Florence.

That night he wrote to his friend after the following fashion:

"It's a true saying, Harry, that the course of true love never did run smoothe. Here I have the deuce and all to pay. Don't you think that Ellen has seen me in the street with Florence, and more than that, has got, how the mischief only knows, the notion into her head that I am going to marry the girl. The consequence is, she has flared up and told me to the teeth, that I shall never marry any one but her, that I am her husband, and as such she will claim me if I dare to wed another.

"Verily I am in a narrow place. I'm afraid the girl's determined spirits will bring me into trouble. I am pledged, you know, to Florence, and our wedding day is now but a few weeks off. Ellen's suspicions are all awake, and she may do something before that day arrives to mar everything. I am not much afraid of her threat in regard to her claiming me for her husband after I am married. She only wants to frighten me and prevent the occurrence of an event that will forever cut her off from the hope of getting back again into a less questionable position than the one she now occupies. I denied positively that it was Florence, of whom she has heard some how or other. Until the marriage takes place, I must lull her suspicions by increased attentions; and trust to make fair weather with her when it is all over.

"Florence grows more and more charming every day. She is a lovely creature, and as pure as a dew-drop. How strongly does she contrast with Ellen, who, you know, used to be known as the beauty of R———. And yet, I sometimes wish she had a portion of Ellen's fiery nature. I should then know better how get along with her."

Chapter VI.

Time passed on until the wedding day arrived.—The morning arose without a cloud, and the bright sun smiled upon few hearts that bounded in happier pulsations than that of Florence Allison. And yet, a feeling of pensiveness would at times steal over her spirits, and fix her eye in dreaming unconsciousness of external things. A very dear young friend was with her; one who could feel with her upon almost every subject. They were most of the day alone together, in the sanctuary of Florence's chamber.

"Your spirits are not even, Florence," this friend remarked, as she observed her sinking into one of her abstracted moods. "Sometimes you are gay as a lark, and then you seem unusually thoughtful. Why is this?"

"It could hardly be otherwise with any one in my situation, Mary," replied Florence, in a quiet tone. "Marriage is a solemn thing, and the relations of marriage holy. I feel something like awe as the hour approaches, and a shrinking consciousness that I am unworthy to take upon myself the solemn vows of wedlock. I fear that, weak and imperfect as I am, I shall not be able to fill, truly, a wife's position.—That I shall not be to him who has chosen me above all other maidens, the treasure that he so richly deserves to find in a wife, Mary! His is a noble nature. Every day's, every hour's intercourse only reveals to me more and more of the truth and beauty of his character—his pure-mindedness, his exquisite perceptions, and above all, his goodness of heart—the key-stone of the arch—the crowning gem of every perfection."

"You will be happy, Florence, very happy. Like a pleasant stream, moving sweetly along through fruitful valleys, may your life glide on, undisturbed by even too dark a ripple upon its bright surface."

"That I must not expect, Mary. That I do not expect. Life must have its clouds and storms as well as its sunshine. Its tears as well as its smiles. And these will be apportioned to me in an appropriate measure, as well as to all others. It will, doubtless, be good for me. But with the love of my husband to sustain me—with one by my side upon whom I can lean in every trial, and up to whom I can look for counsel in every hour of temptation, I shall find enough to gild even the darkest cloud of my life with a ray of sunshine. You must pardon, my dear Mary, the frequency with which I allude to, and the warmth of my expressions in regard to my intended husband. 'From the fulness of the heart the mouth speaketh.'"

In such tender communion between the deeply attached friends, passed the day. At last the hour approached which was to witness the solemn ceremony of uniting the lover and his bride. Campbell came early, but with some misgivings at his heart that all would not pass off happily. He had parted with Ellen only an hour before, and she had been unusually excited and suspicious that all was not right.—Solemnly did she affirm that if he dared to attempt to marry any one but herself, she would claim him as her husband at the altar. There was something about her that half-convinced him that she would put her threat into execution. There appeared something new, and strange, and desperate in her manner. As well as he could, had he soothed her by solemn assurances that her suspicions were all without foundation. Still he was not easy in mind.

Happily, however, nothing occurred to mar the enjoyment of a single heart. The ceremony commenced and proceeded without interruption. The responses were all made, and then the young couple were pronounced man and wife. If ever there was a joyous heart in this world of sin, such an one beat in the bosom of the lovely bride, still in the blossom of young womanhood. But Campbell could not breathe freely. Ever and anon his eye would glance towards the door uneasily, expecting every moment to see a blasting apparition. The slightest sound that was unusual would cause his heart to throb quickly; and the color to mount to his brow.

"Fool! Madman!" he would sometimes say to himself, "thus to jeopardize not only my own peace, but also the life of another. If that wretched creature should boldly thrust herself in here, all is lost."

Far different was the scene that was passing in the solitary room in which the object of his uneasy and alarmed thoughts was passing the hour which he had consecrated to a holy rite, but with unholy purposes.

For nearly an hour from the moment when she had good reason for suspecting that Campbell's marriage had taken place, she had sat with her face buried deeply in a pillow, her feelings so paralized and her thoughts so confused, that her state was little above that of unconciousness. At last her mind began to act freely and with this came back her too seriously entertained intention of exposing the nature of her relations with Campbell. She had loved him with a blind intensity, with a madness that had led her to sacrifice everything—virtue itself—at his feet. To be set aside at last, a fate long dreaded, to suffer another to occupy a place in his mind, and that a higher one than she could ever hope to occupy, was madness. The thought of it alone almost drove her to the verge of insanity.

"I will do it!" she at length exclaimed, starting up. "I will confront him even by the side of his milk-faced beauty."

Quickly pulling on a bonnet, and throwing a shawl loosely over her shoulder, the excited creature passed into the street, and took her way directly towards the dwelling of Mr. Allison. A walk of twenty minutes brought her before the door. From within came gushes of rich music, mingled with the hum of happy voices, and an occasional burst of merry laughter.

The contrast between her own feelings and the scene within was too strong. Quickly descending the steps, she drooped her head upon her bosom, and wandered away in tears, she knew not whither.—But from this state she again aroused herself, her resolution to expose Campbell returning with full power.

Again she stood at the door of Mr. Allison's dwelling, her hand upon the bell. Just as she was about to ring it vigorously, a soft, sweet voice rose clear and melodiously from within, accompanied by a few light touches of the piano, pouring itself forth in a pensive ballad of the olden time. It was the very song that in other days had been warbled by a dearly beloved sister, between whom and herself evil courses on her part had wrought a separation deeply painful to both. How many, many thrilling memories did the air and the words of the song bring back upon her. But one scene it called up more distinctly than all the rest—a scene like the present, when that dear sister stood a happy bride at the altar. The guilty creature, whose lascerated heart still clung to that only sister, shuddered as the picture of that sister came distinctly before her mind, standing horror-stricken before such a blasting appearance as she would make, were she to rush madly into that joyous assembly. It was only an imagined scene—but it had its effect.

"No—no! I cannot do it!" she murmured, turning away. "Happy bride! The memory of my sister has saved thee. I will not smite thee down, unconscious injurer of one whose heart has been trampled under foot, because thy pale face was more attractive than her darker beauty! For my sister's sake I will spare thee!—my sweet, innocent sister!—the very thought of whom drives the dark fiend from my spirit!"

Slowly and thoughtfully did the unhappy girl wander away, she knew not, and cared not whither.—Half an hour after, she looked up, as external consciousness returned once more, and threw her eyes enquiringly around her. She was beyond the crowded confines of the city, and alone. The moon shone from an unclouded sky, throwing a dim veil over wood and field; but resting in broader light upon the rushing water-fall and gently gliding river.

The quiet beauty of the scene calmed down her excited feelings. It did more—it caused them to sink into despair. So many touching memories did that hour recall—so many happy scenes, and loved friends, no more to gladden her heart with their smiles and welcome, did it bring up to her remembrance, that a calm desperation took possession of her, and ejaculating—

"There's nothing to live for now! Nothing!—nothing!" stepped quickly forward, and in a few minutes stood beside the river. As she looked down into the dark water beneath her, a cold shudder passed through her frame, and starting back, she sunk to the ground, as weak as an infant.

Poor wretch! Who can tell thy sufferings? Who can count the pulsations of thy heart of hearts, beating with agonizing throbs, deep, deep and unseen by mortal eye, from down in the inner chambers of affection? Virtue has its own exceeding great reward—its dower of joy, that no thought can fully estimate. And virtue's opposite has its reward—its exceeding great reward of wretchedness and unutterable anguish of spirit. Would that this immutable law were written as with a pen of iron upon every heart—but especially upon the hearts of the young and still innocent ones!

Slowly, at length, did Ellen arise from the earth, and turn her steps wearily towards the city. She paused not, and, indeed, seemed not conscious of any thing around her, but took her steps direct to her cheerless abode. When there, she threw herself upon her bed, and lay, for a long time, in a kind of stupor. This, after awhile, subsided, and the vibrating pendulum of her feelings drew to the opposite extreme.

Under this state of mind, she could not rest in her inactive position; but, raising up quickly, with the exclamation—"Oh, that my heart would break!" commenced walking the floor with hurried steps.—This was continued for a few minutes, when she paused, with her hand upon her head, her lips apart, and her nostrils widely distended, as if part in the agony of some desperate resolution, to which her mind came up against almost unconquerable internal opposition. Then she walked deliberately to a trunk, opened it, and taking therefrom a vial containing a black liquid, swallowed it eagerly. This done, she threw herself upon the bed, burying her face in a pillow, and lay as still and motionless as death.

A week had passed away on the fleet wings of joy, since Florence Allison had become a happy bride, and the excitement of parties, and calls, and congratulations, was beginning to give place to the calmer delights of the quiet home circle. Early in the evening, the father and mother, who had come to have full and affectionate confidence in Campbell, left the young couple alone, and retired to their own room. Their thoughts were of their dear child, and their conversation turned, as a matter of course, to things that concerned her.

"We have parted with our treasure at last," remarked the father; "and yet, she seems more our own than ever. May she be as happy as she deserves!"

"I think she will be happy," replied the mother. "She loves her husband tenderly, and he seems devoted to her. How shamefully he has been misrepresented! Even his own father had turned against him."

"Through false accusation, perhaps. No doubt the young man, as he indeed owns, has been led away into early indiscretion. His father is a stern man, with a high sense of honor and correct principles, and doubtless judged his son too harshly. But I got a letter from him to-day, in which he speaks strongly of his son's natural good qualities, and seems delighted at the alliance. He begs me to permit the young couple to visit him immediately, and presses that we should accompany them."

"I cannot think of going so long a journey," Mrs Allison replied; "nor can I bear the thought of being separated even for a day from Florence. She has become dearer to me than ever."

"And yet, Mr. Campbell's desire is a very natural one, and I cannot well see how we can oppose it—particularly as George has already expressed a strong desire to visit home with his bride."

"We will not, at least, spare them for some weeks to come."

"No—not if we can help it. But we must not be too selfish."

"With what constant anxiety," resumed Mrs. Allison, after a brief silence, "have we looked forward to this time. To the period when we should have to yield up the hand of our child. Oh! how much I have suffered in anticipation. So many—so very many—make shipwreck of happiness here. So many love-laden barks scatter their rich treasures here upon the bosom of turbid waters. And our dear child has escaped safely over this terrible danger.—She has found a bosom upon which she may rest in safety, and an arm that will bear her up in her journey through life. We are blessed in——"

At this moment, the door of the room in which they sat was thrown suddenly open, and Florence rushed in, her eyes wildly starting from her head, her face blanched to a marble hue, her lips apart, her nostrils distended, and her breath almost whistling as it rushed, panting, from her heaving breast. With a long, wailing cry of anguish, she flung herself upon her mother's bosom, and sunk into instant insensibility.

Mr. Allison, horror-stricken at this unexpected apparition, could not collect, for some moments, his bewildered senses. When he did recover himself, he sprang from the room, and glided down stairs with the swiftness of an arrow. But there was no one below. The parlors were empty. There was no sign of violence, nor any thing to give him a clue to explain the terrific appearance of Florence.

All night, notwithstanding the constant attendance of a physician, she remained unconscious, with scarcely a perceptible respiration. At day-light, she appeared to recover a little, but took no notice of any one. The expression of her face had remained, from the first, troubled, and her pure white brow marked with unusual lines. Her husband did not make his appearance through the night, and this only rendered the mystery of her condition the more inexplicable. But he was there by day-dawn, almost as pale as his insensible wife.

To all the agonized importunities of the distressed parents, to tell them what had happened—what was the secret of their daughter's dreadful condition—he maintained a rigid silence, or replied, gloomily,

"Do not ask me."

Taking his position by her bed-side, he never seemed for a moment to withdraw his eyes from her pallid face; but gazed constantly upon her—sometimes with an expression of deep tenderness, and sometimes with looks of the bitterest anguish.

Towards the evening of that day, Florence began to show more indications of returning consciousness. She became restless, and muttered frequently—but no words could be distinguished. It was near the hour of sun-set, and the father and mother, with her husband, the physician, and three or four intimate friends, were standing or sitting about the bed, anxiously watching the expression of her face, or endeavoring to catch the words that were ever and anon murmured, incoherently, when she opened her eyes with an intelligent expression, and looked enquiringly into the many faces that were around her.

"Dear, dear Florence!" exclaimed Campbell, in an agitated voice, bending eagerly over towards her.

But, as her ear caught the sound of his voice, and her eye his face, she instantly shrunk back with a look of fear, repugnance, and even horror, and covered her face with her hands.

The physician instantly drew him back with a strong hand, whispering in his ear in a deep, hoarse whisper, as he did so—

"For Heaven's sake, sir, keep out of her sight, or her case is hopeless!"

With strange passiveness, Campbell permitted himself to be withdrawn from the room by the physician, who obtained from him a promise not to attempt to see her again, except with his permission, and in his company. He then left the house, without holding further conference with any one.

The tender words and caresses of her parents, united with the assurance that her husband was not in the room, caused Florence again to look up, but with a face painfully marked by inward anguish of spirit. This, however, subsided after a time, and she lay in a calmer frame of mind, and continued to do so for some hours, when she sank into sleep, and remained in this peaceful state during the night.

In the morning she was calm, but very pale, and altogether indisposed to converse. She would listen, while the tears gathered in her eyes, to tender words from her parents; but became instantly agitated the moment any one alluded, even the most remotely, to the unexplained cause of the terrible change that had come over her so suddenly—and which was still, to all, an unexplained mystery. The physician saw Campbell every day, but he steadily refused to give even the slightest clue to the inexplicable circumstances.

Chapter VIII.

"Dear Harry"—so wrote Campbell, about a week after the event just detailed—"Your letter has found me, not the happy man you have described, but the most miserable wretch in existence. My cup of bliss has been dashed from my lips ere the first few drops of its delicious contents were more than tasted. Dashed to the earth, and broken into a thousand pieces.

"On the night of my marriage, I was in a most painful state of uncertainty and fear. I saw Ellen just before evening, and found that she either knew, or strongly suspected that I was going to be married that night. She tried her best to keep me with her, but I went away under a feigned pretence. As I left her, she looked me steadily in the face, and said, with unusual earnestness—

"'Remember what I have told you. If you dare to marry another, I will claim you at the altar!'

"I affected to laugh at her, and then went away. But I was uneasy. Every moment during the evening, I expected to see her enter and execute her threat. But, fortunately, she did not come. On the next day, as early as I could get out, I went to see her. As I opened the door of her room, I was almost driven back by a strong, suffocating and offensive odor of laudanum. Springing to the bed, upon which I saw that she was lying, I lifted her up, and found that she had, indeed, swallowed the poison indicated by the fumes of the room. But, she had, I suppose, taken too much, for her stomach had rejected the fatal draught, retaining only sufficient to throw her into a profound and somewhat prolonged sleep.—Calling in assistance, and a physician, I left her, half regretting that she had not done the work more efficiently. On the next day, I visited her again, and found her in bed, suffering, still, from the effects of her attempt upon her own life. I did not say much to her, except to chide her for her folly, which she bore with a kind of stern defiance. I did not remain long with her, but returned toward evening. She was better, but had not risen.

"During the next four or five days, I could not possibly get freed from the many engagements and the press of company that occupied me almost every hour, long enough to go and see her. I felt anxious all the time, however, and had a kind of foreboding that trouble was ahead—that I should yet be made to suffer, and all connected with me, for the wrong I had done her—a wrong that it was out of my power to recompense.

"It was just a week from the night of our marriage, when, for the first time, Florence and I had an evening to ourselves. We were seated on a sofa, her hand in mine, and her sweet face turned towards me. We were talking of the future. Her heart was full of pleasant anticipations. The whole world, in her eyes, teemed with blessings for the good. And she was good. She did not say this. But it was conscious innocence that spoke.

"All at once the door was flung open, and in stalked Ellen! Her face was pale—her lips tightly drawn across her teeth—and her eyes flashing with malignant passion. Oh! how I did for a single moment long for the power of invisibility. But there was no escape. Florence uttered an exclamation of alarm, and half clung to me in fear. I expected that the unhappy creature would at once break forth into angry, vindictive and half-insane language. But I was mistaken. I only wish she had done so, for then I might have had it in my power to break the force of her allegations by declaring her to be a crazy woman. But she did not leave me even that slender foundation to stand upon.

"For a few moments she stood near the centre of the room, looking fixedly at us—as we still remained seated, and Florence clinging to me—the stern, angry expression of her face gradually changing to a milder cast. At length she came close up to us, and said to Florence, in a somewhat sad tone of voice—

"'I pity you, poor girl! But I cannot help what I am now doing. A bruised heart cannot bear even a little blow without extreme pain, far less the grasp of an iron hand crushing it to atoms!'

"'Ellen! I cannot suffer this!' I interrupted her, unconscious, in the confusion of the moment, that in calling her by name, I was confessing an acquaintance which, of all things, my policy should have been to avoid.

"'Silence!' she exclaimed, with sudden energy, stamping her foot. 'Your power to command me has gone. I was once slave enough to you to crouch at your feet for smiles and favor. That time is past. But, pardon, gentle lady!' she said, regaining her calmness of manner, and addressing Florence, towards whom the feeling of spite and anger before entertained, seemed to have entirely subsided.—'There was a power in innocence to subdue even the fiend that had possessed her. 'I have come here to claim my husband. George Campbell and I were united years ago, by a bond which cannot be broken—a bond as sacred and as binding as that which has united you—though no holy priest consecrated the union. He won my heart in my happy home, far in the South—a home as pleasant as this which shelters you, gentle lady, and in which were those who loved me as dearly as any here love you. He betrayed me from innocence—but I clung to him, and gave up all for him—father and mother, and fond sisters, who had cherished me with a holy affection. And now he abandons me for a fairer face—or, perhaps for the wealth that goes with your hand; and throws me aside like a withered flower. But this shall not be. I have warned him, but he has not heeded my warning. I told him that I would assert my claim to him even at the altar to which he led his bride, if he dared to wed another. I have his promise, sealed on the altar of my innocence, to restore me to my friends, acknowledged before the world as his wedded wife. That he must still do. Your claim to him is void—your marriage right was but a solemn mockery. He is not your husband—he never can be while I live.'

"As the mad creature thus went on, Florence gradually disengaged herself from the arm that I had thrown around her, and had half risen to her feet, her face as white as marble, when Ellen paused at the last sentence I have given. A moment after, Florence was gliding from the room with a step as fleet as an antelope's.

"The moment she left the apartment, I seized Ellen by the arm, and dragged her with the energy of a madman from the house, cursing her in a low, bitter tone, from the very centre of my heart. As soon as we had both gained the street, I flung her from me with desperate force, which caused her to fall headlong upon the pavement. This brought me a little to my senses. If she were to be found dead or dying at Mr. Allison's door, it could only make matters worse, I thought, and so went to her and lifted her up. She was a little stunned, but soon recovered, and walked along by my side for a square or two. Then I attempted to leave her, but she laid hold of my arm and said, resolutely—

"'No, George! You shall not leave me to-night.'

"I cursed her! I threatened to kill her on the spot! But it availed nothing. She was immovable. At length, I was compelled to go home with her.—As she entered her apartment, I thrust her in, closed the door quickly, and fastened it on the outside. I never saw her afterwards. In the morning she was found dead, having taken another and more happily gaged draught of laudanum. Curse the fate that prevented the first from doing its work! I saw the fact mentioned in the papers, and also an account of the inquest—but I did not go near her. She sleeps now, I suppose, without a stone to mark the spot—a tenant of the Potter's field! Poor Ellen! I cursed her life, and she has now cursed mine! So we are even.—But the curse stops not with me, else would I not complain. Florence was pure as a snow-flake, and innocent as an angel. Strange fatality, that should include her in the blighting, withering curse!

"All night I walked the streets, a prey to the most agonizing thought. I felt that what Ellen had said was too true—that I was not, really, the husband of Florence. That I had no right to go near her, and soar her eyes with my polluted presence. That she and I had not been, and never could be, truly united as one. A little after day-dawn I ventured in, and found her in a state of insensibility, and learned that she had been in that condition all night. Her parents overwhelmed me with eager questions as to the cause of the sudden and alarming change that had taken place in their daughter. But I refused to give them any clue to the mystery. I dared not.

"All day long I sat by her side. Towards evening she began to recover, and before the sun went down, consciousness had returned. But the moment her eyes rested upon me, she shrank away with a look of terror, and grasped for breath, as if my presence would suffocate her. At the earnest request of the physician, I retired at once, and have not seen her since. I visit the doctor every day, but he gives me little encouragement in regard to her. He will not give his consent for me to see her. Her life, he says, depends upon keeping her mind free from any excitement.

"I am living in a state of horrible suspense. Sometimes I resolve to leave this accursed place, and hide myself somewhere in a wilderness. But I cannot tear myself away. I must remain here until the fate of Florence is decided. Most likely she will soon sleep as soundly as my first victim."

Chapter IX.

Up to a certain point Florence recovered from the terrible shock she had sustained, and then commenced slowly to decline, with a disease for which the physician had no remedy. She was able, in the course of a week, to leave her room, and go about the house, but she neither went out nor saw company, except one or two particular friends. The name of her husband, it was soon perceived, could not be mentioned in her presence. If spoken, even accidentally, she would become instantly pale and agitated. Every thing belonging to him was removed from her chamber, and every thing that could remind her of him, kept out of her sight. Once her mother, painfully anxious to penetrate the mystery that hung round her child, urged her earnestly upon the subject. She grew instantly agitated as usual, and then gave way to tears. These enabled her to allude to it, as her feelings calmed down. But she only did so to declare that what had occurred on that dreadful evening, could never pass her lips. It was a secret forever locked in her own heart, where it was consuming her like a hidden fire.

Sadly did the parents watch the gradual progress of the disease that was silently but surely carrying their beloved child down to the grave. As time passed away, she seemed to rise, in a degree, superior to the depressing influence which her pain of mind had exercised over her spirits, and to be calm and peaceful, if not happy. But the fatal malady that was consuming her, paused not for a moment in its deadly progress.

After a few weeks, the color came back to her cheeks, and her eyes grew brighter, awaking up in the bosoms of her parents a thrill of hope. But the bloom and brightness deceived not the physician for a moment, although he could not find it in his heart to break, in the minds of the aged parents, the feeble hopes that these indications instantly excited. Day after day now passed on, and week after week, and at length Florence became so feeble that she could not leave her chamber,—but her cheek was still touched with the most delicate bloom, and her eye undiminished in its brightness.

To her parents and the few friends who gathered around her, she now became an object of deeper and tenderer interest. The purity and sweetness of her character shone out lovelier and more winning, as she drew nearer and nearer to that world of blessedness and peace, to which she was fast journeying—that world where no cheating counterfeit of true affection can ever deceive the heart, and breathe over its opening blossoms a withering mildew.

"Dear child! can you not—will you not live for us?" urged her mother one day, in a voice of touching entreaty, as her heart shrank tremblingly away from the sad indications too plainly presented, that few were the days left for her child to number on earth. Florence looked up into her mother's face, with the tears standing in her eyes, and said in a quivering voice:

"I am not guilty of self-destruction, dear mother! I try to live for your sakes, although I earnestly long for the hour that shall release me. But there is here," laying her hand upon her bosom, "a feeling as if something had been taken away. As if there were a void there, which cannot be filled in this world. I have tried to lift up my head, and be as I have been. But I cannot. Every such struggle has only left me weaker than before."

"But will you not tell, dear Florence, the cause? Why leave us in such doubt?"

"Mother! Do not urge me farther on that point," she said, in a calmer tone than she had yet been able to allow herself to allude to the subject. "Let it suffice for you to know that I have been cruelly deceived by one who may have had some affection for me, but who was utterly unworthy of my love. Had not this knowledge come upon me suddenly, like a flash of lightning, I might have borne up against its crushing weight. I might, perhaps, but I know not, have been able, in time, to have risen superior to its effects. But coming as it did, without a moment's warning—without the foreshadowing of a single dark suspicion—just at a time when I felt most secure—just when all my heart had been yielded up in happy unconsciousness of aught save the joy of being beloved by a pure, noble, manly heart—made the trial more than I had strength to bear. Mother! All this may seem to you a weakness. Perhaps it is—but I cannot help it. I have struggled hard to keep up. I have reasoned with myself time and again, but it will not do. My life's love is gone. Oh, with what exquisite delight have I dreamed over the thought of a union with one whose manly character and high virtues would sustain me as the tall tree sustains the clinging vine. Upon such a one I fondly imagined I had poured out the treasured affections of my heart; and that these affections would be garnered up in a bosom unpolluted by vice. But it was not so. All these affections have been wasted. They can never return to me again,—and they were my life."

On another occasion, to a very dear young friend she said,—

"It is a sad thing to pour out your best affections—to give up every thought and wish in life to the keeping of one who proves himself to be unworthy of the sacrifice—whose love is but a cheating counterfeit—whose bosom holds a betrayer's heart. To be loved by such a one with his false passion-fire, is but to be cursed. I am thus cursed, and am sinking under its baleful effects."

"But cannot you, dear Florence," urged the friend, "dismiss all thoughts like these from your mind, and let other things come and take possession; thus reviving your spirits with a new interest. Who can love you more tenderly than your father and mother? Cannot love such as theirs sustain you?"

"It ought," replied Florence, her eyes running over with tears. "I know it ought, but it does not; I am a wedded wife, but where is my husband? A place has suddenly been made vacant in my heart, which can never be filled; and with that aching void within, I cannot live. I feel that this is so. Oh, how cruelly I have been deceived! But mine is not the only breaking heart that he has trampled upon. There is another more wretched than I—more wretched, because bound to him by crime."

This was the nearest allusion she ever made to the actual event that had taken place. It was enough, however, to cause Mr. Allison, as soon as it was told to him, to resolve never again to suffer the unhappy young man to cross the threshhold of his door.

Chapter X.

THE CONCLUSION.

We close this painful but instructive history with another letter from Campbell, written four months from the day of his marriage:

"The curtain has at last fallen," he wrote to his friend—"the curtain of death, and Florence sleeps in the grave. I was not permitted to see her in her last moments, earnestly as I plead for the boon. Perhaps it is well. My presence would only have disturbed the blessed tranquility with which I am told her evening of life closed in. What a power there is in goodness! Blasted as had been all her hopes—crushed as had been her heart, she could yet go down to the grave in peace.

"From the time I parted with her, on the evening succeeding the accursed intrusion of Ellen, I did not look upon her face until after her pure spirit had left its frail but beautiful body. Then, for an hour, I was permitted to gaze alone upon the wreck I had made. I cannot describe my feelings during that hour which I spent in the still chamber of death. It would hardly express my true state, were I simply to say that I solemnly resolved to live in the future a purer life. Such resolutions I have too often made before; but they were not made as was this one. This I feel that I shall keep. In every hour of future temptation—for temptation I know that I shall have to endure—one thought of the pale sweet face of Florence, as it looked when I last gazed upon it, will give me a more than human power. But, is it not a painful thought, that one like me is to be saved by the agonies beyond description, of one like her?"

"I have seen no other mother since her death. They could not meet me—and who can blame them? But the physician, in whose mind I have been able to awaken some feelings of interest, has given me an account of her last moments. Eagerly did I listen for some allusions to myself—but none were made. She seemed to have banished me from her thoughts, as she would a form of evil. She died as peacefully as an infant sinking into slumber. The grave has no terrors for the innocent—and she was pure as a seraph.

"In a few days I shall leave the place, and return home to my father's house, as a prodigal who has fed too long upon the husks. I will begin life anew. Oh, that I could do it as a little child, with only hereditary forms without the deadly bias of confirmed evil! I have sown the wind, and reaped the whirlwind. I have hewn unto myself cisterns, broken cisterns that could hold no water. I have sought for food upon barren mountains, and now, weary, and sick, and faint, I long to return. Oh, that I could ever retain my present state of mind. But I know that evil propensities will return like a flood upon me, and unless I get strength beyond my own to struggle against them, will assuredly overcome me. It is a dreadful thing to follow after evil pleasures!

"My feelings are so strong, and so suffocate me, that I must lay aside my pen. What the tenor of my future life will be, I know not. The present I believe to be the great crisis of my fate This is my last struggle. If good conquers, I am saved—if evil, I am lost. Involuntary, almost, I sometimes lift up a prayer for aid. But I instantly shudder at such presumption. How dare I, polluted and corrupt as I am, look to a pure and holy Being like God. But He must aid me, or I am lost forever! Adieu!"

I CANNOT LOVE THEE NOW.

I cannot love thee now; my heart,
Once blighted by thy love, grown cold,
Can ne'er again to thine impart
The love so fondly to thee told
There was an hour when thought of mine
Was ever on the wing for thee;—
No dream but where that form of thine,
In brightest hues was shown to me.

Why come again to one betrayed?
Think'st thou that I could love thee yet?
Ah, no! my heart is now arrayed
For brighter spheres;—can I forget
The past with all its hopes and fears,
The present with its mockery;
The promised future—bitter tears—
The last reward for loving thee?

My soul is seared with blight and grief,
Corroded still by withering care;
And soon must fall like autumn leaf,
A nurseling of the summer air;
Bright spring's return with fresh'ning bloom,
May place another in my stead,
Whose happy way shall lead too soon
O'er memories of the injured dead.

THE PEDLAR'S GRAND-DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. MUZZEY.

It was on a cold dark evening in November, about the year 1815. The rain was falling heavily, and the wind moaned piteously through the crevices of an old dilapidated house situated in the outskirts of a populous town in Rhode Island. In a poorly furnished apartment on the ground floor of that old dwelling, sat two persons. One, a man whose silver hair and wrinkled forehead proclaimed advanced age, the other a female just emerging from early girlhood. The light shed by a scanty fire and feeble candle, showed a countenance of extreme sweetness; yet its expression was subdued, almost sad. The fair hair of the young girl was gathered into a simple knot, and her dress, though very plain, and of cheap materials, was arranged with neatness and taste; she was busily engaged in braiding straw, such as is used for making bonnets, and the old man was equally busy in arranging a variety of small articles in a basket: a pack, such as is carried by pedlars, was already made up and rested on the floor near him; he shivered as he pursued his employment—The girl rose and brought a few sticks of wood from a closet, where a small stock of fuel was piled. As she proceeded to place them on the fire, the old man raised his eyes from his work, and exclaimed—

"Rhoda, what are you about? The fire does well enough, child! We shall come to want, if you are so extravagant!"

"I thought you seemed to be cold, grandfather," said the girl, meekly.

"No, child! no! it is not cold—the fire does very well." Then looking earnestly at her, he added—"But, poor thing, maybe you are chilly; put on the wood, Rhoda—never mind old grandfather: he does not mean to be cross: poor, dear lamb!"

Rhoda threw her arms around the old man's neck and kissed him: and her young fair cheek resting on that of her grandfather, might have reminded one of a rose bud on a piece of parchment. Assuming a cheerful tone, she said, smilingly—

"My work comes on finely, grandfather: I have orders for as much as I can do! and I will work so fast, if you will not go out in the rain—promise me now that you will not go out to-morrow if it rains—promise," she repeated, patting the old man's cheek.

"Oh! child," answered her grandfather, "you don't know—you don't know!—how shall I get a living if I stay idling here at home?—how shall we live, girl? No, no, Rhoda, I must work—work as long as I am able."

"Grandfather," answered the girl, earnestly, "I am able to work and willing. I can do a great deal towards our support. It is hard that you, in your old age, should travel about in such bad weather, and be absent so long: besides"—— and she paused.

"Besides what, Rhoda? what were you going to say, child?" enquired the old man.

"Why, grandfather," she replied, after some hesitation, "the neighbours say you were not used to work in the way you do now, in your younger days; and—and that you are saving up money, or else you would not do so now."

"Yes, yes, child," replied the old man, "I know they call me an old miser—they say 'there goes Amos Grattan, the old peddling miser.' I have often heard them! I know that wild fellow, Richard Atwell, thinks I have money laid up, (he tells people so,) and that is the reason he comes about here so much. But," he added, after a pause, "he's mistaken if he thinks so, Rhoda—he'll get no money with you, child, if you are ever so foolish as to marry him. Grandfather has no money to leave you, poor girl!—you must work, Rhoda, for your living—work, my child, and be honest."

"Do not fear for me, grandfather," said the girl, while a blush of pride and maiden shame suffused her cheek, "I have never imagined you could give me any money and I am very certain I shall never marry Richard Atwell."

A hasty knocking at the door interrupted the words which were rising to the old man's lips, and as Rhoda hastened to open it, he concealed his basket beneath the old-fashioned arm-chair in which he was sitting. Rhoda bade the stranger enter, and she perceived a young man from whose garments the rain was dripping, but whose countenance, expressive of frankness and good humor, instantly dispelled any alarm she might have felt at the unusual circumstance of being disturbed at so late an hour.

"Excuse me," said the young man as he entered the apartment; "excuse me for disturbing you—but the rain falls so heavily that I felt compelled to ask shelter, and yours is the only window near from which a light can be seen."

"You are welcome," said Rhoda, while she blushed at the stranger's earnest gaze.

"And what brings you out in such a storm, and so late in the evening?" enquired old Amos, as he regarded the young man with a scrutinizing look.

"An accidental circumstance," answered the stranger, evidently surprised at the abruptness of the question.

"I am a stranger in these parts—the vessel in which I sail has just arrived in this port. I strolled out to see the country a little and lost my way, and the rain coming on, I took shelter in an out-house, but finding it did not abate, I endeavered to regain the road, and so far succeeded as to be in the direct way to the town, I believe."

"Which you might have reached in half an hour," interrupted the old man, frowning, as he saw the eyes of the stranger directed towards his grand child. "You couldn't have been much wetter if you had kept strait on! Besides," he added, as if speaking to himself "if you are a sea-faring lad, as you seemed to say, you can't mind a little wetting."

The countenance of the young man did not lose its good humoured expression, as the old man gave vent to his querulous humour, but on a sign from Rhoda he divested himself of his dripping overcoat, and took a seat near the fire.

After a few conciliatory remarks, the young sailor alluded to his profession: to the dangers attending it; at the same time acknowledging that seamen but seldom bestowed much thought on those dangers and hardships while actually exposed to them. He spoke of the different countries he had visited—of their various productions—of the habits and manners of other nations, and of the joy and pride which he always felt when returning to his own. The heart of old Amos seemed to relent; he listened eagerly: drew nearer and nearer to the youthful mariner, and sometimes rubbed his hands in evident delight. At length he so far forgot his usual caution, as to desire Rhoda to "mend the fire, and get some supper for the poor lad, who must need it after his long, cold walk." This the young man earnestly opposed. "He had need of nothing," he said; and as it was drawing near midnight, and the storm began to abate, he soon after took leave, with many thanks for the shelter afforded him, and many a lingering look at the downcast eyes of the young girl as she bade him "good night!" and innocently expressed a "hope that he might not again lose his way."

"I will step in to-morrow," said the young man, as he crossed over the threshold, "and let you know if I get safe to my quarters."

"Rhoda," said the old man, when the stranger was gone, "I am glad you opened the door, though I was going to bid you not. I havn't seen such a fine lad this many a day; he's like some people I used to know. I quite forgot how late it was hearing him talk. Well, well, he's a stranger in these parts; he won't be likely to come here again." Then with a sigh, he added—"You may take the fire apart now, child; there's no use in burning wood away at this rate for nothing."

Rhoda did as she was bidden, and then retired to her little sleeping-room. When there, she thought of the singular chance that had brought the young stranger to their dwelling—of the wonderful things he had spoken about—of her grandfather's unwonted hospitality—and she fell asleep while wondering if he really would be angry if the stranger should remember his promise, and call again.

Calm and profound is the sleep of youth and innocence. Rhoda, the destitute orphan, whose only relative was a poor and aged grandfather, whose sole dependence was on her own exertions, whose only prospect for the future was a life of toil and penury, surrounded by all the outward signs of poverty—Rhoda slept as sweetly on her humble pallet as if it had been a bed of down, and she the child of opulence, possessed of all the luxuries that wealth can purchase.

The next day, the young sailor called again to see the old man and his grand-daughter. He was going, he said, to his native place, at some distance, to visit his mother, who was his only relative, and whom he had not seen for many months.

"You will see me again," he said, "if my life is spared." And he bade them farewell more with the manner of an old friend, than of a casual acquaintance of a day.

The winter wore away—spring, with its blossoms and sweet breath, departed—the bloom and fruit of summer disappeared—autumn arrived—and still old Amos Grattan toiled on at his usual occupation of peddling small articles about the country. His gentle grand-child still pursued her humble employment of braiding straw, which she sold in a neighbouring town. Yet, though the old man kept toiling on, it was evident that his strength declined; and though Rhoda still kept the "even tenor of her way," a change had come over her mind and heart, which took its rise in reflection and awakened observation. She began to perceive that what she had regarded as her grandfather's eccentric humors, or at most the querulousness of advanced age, was in reality the effect of some secret trouble which weighed heavily on his mind.

As Rhoda grew older, she became convinced that humble as was the traffic in which the old man was engaged, his gains undoubtedly far exceeded the expenses of their very frugal, even scanty house-keeping, and she knew that her own small earnings, although thrown into the common stock, never again appeared in any shape. "It is possible," she thought, "my grandfather may be trying to make some provision against the time when he will not be able to continue his employment." She knew that he denied himself comforts, even necessaries, and that, though uniformly kind and affectionate to her, he invariably expected from her the same self-denial which he practised himself. Old Amos discouraged any intimacy with their few neighbors; and the slightest intercourse with them, or with strangers, seemed to give him uneasiness. Rhoda felt that her way of life was gloomy and unsocial, compared with that of other young females. She saw many in humble circumstances who enjoyed social intercourse and recreation. Yet Rhoda never thought of disobeying the old man, who stood in the place of the parents she had lost. Of her mother she retained a vivid and tender recollection; she remembered her pious and gentle instructions, her kind words and fond caresses. She remembered, too, the rapturous but brief endearments of one who called himself her father—that he came only after long intervals—that his stay was brief—and that he departed as suddenly as he came; and the silent sorrow of her mother, on these occasions, was engraven on her heart. She remembered when her mother told her that her father was dead, and that she never smiled afterwards. There was also the memory of a funeral procession—her grandfather had led her by the hand as they followed the remains of her mother to the grave; her suffering spirit had passed away—she had sunk into the arms of death, calmly as an infant sinks to its slumbers. Then her grandfather brought her to their present solitary home after what appeared to Rhoda a long journey—and there she had remained ever since. The old man had not entirely neglected the education of his orphan grand-child. "The seed fell not upon stony places, but upon good ground, where it sprung up and brought forth fruit;" for Rhoda was docile and attentive, and her mind was capable of much higher cultivation than their limited opportunities allowed.

When autumn was far advanced, the young sailor sought again the home of Amos Grattan. He repeated his visits frequently for one month, and again bade its inmates farewell. His lips had been silent, but his eyes were eloquent, and Rhoda learned from them, aided perhaps by a corresponding feeling in her own heart, that he loved her; and when she laid her head at night upon her pillow, when she arose with the first dawn of morning to her toil, she now knew what name to mingle with the prayer which she put up to Heaven—and Mark Westbrook was the subject of many a fond and secret aspiration.

One evening, as Rhoda was returning from the town, where she had been to dispose of her work, she was accosted by Richard Atwell, the young man mentioned by old Amos in the beginning of our story. He was their nearest neighbour, and the only one who had persevered in trying to cultivate the acquaintance of the pedlar; for, though treated by him with uniform coldness, and by Rhoda with as much indifference as her gentle nature would admit of, he had, till within a short time, tried every means to establish himself on a friendly footing with them.—This was the more singular, as although his manners in some degree rude, he was, in point worldly circumstances, raised far above those who endeavoured thus to shun him. His admiration for Rhoda had been open and undisguised; but she had always endeavoured to check his expression of it with gentle firmness, and with that simple earnestness which left no doubt of her sincerity: and now she felt averse to the meeting, and endeavoured to pass, as if she had not perceived him, but he soon overtook her, exclaiming—

"Oh you need not hurry so, Rhoda—you can't escape; I shall speak to you in spite of your not seeming to see me. I dare say you wouldn't fly so from Blue Jacket, that comes courting you! Your grandfather will open the door to him, though he shuts it upon a neighbour, one that has known you from a child. But say, Rhoda, have you told the jack-tar where the old man hides his money? Don't you know, Rhoda Grattan, that sailors have sweethearts in every place they go to? You know what the song says—

'In every port a mistress find,'

He'll forget you for the next pretty girl he sees."

"Richard," replied Rhoda, who felt with unusual keenness the coarse remarks of the young man, "if you know that a young man has called at our house, you may also know that he sought shelter there one night from the storm; and it was but natural he should call again. As for the other part of your jest, you know I have always told you that if my poor grandfather has any money concealed, (which I do not believe,) it is his own, and neither yours nor mine."

Richard burst into a laugh; then instantly checking himself, he said, with some seriousness—

"But it might be both yours and mine, Rhoda; the old man has no relatives but you, that I ever heard of, and you'll have all he leaves when he dies."

"I thank you for speaking so plainly, Richard," said the young girl, while her look spoke all the contempt she felt at the moment. "I thank you—for I now know why you intrude yourself so often upon me. But I have my grandfather's own word that he will not be able to leave me any riches. As poor as I now am, I expect to remain; but why our poverty should be made a jest of, I am unable to tell, or even to imagine."

"Come, come, Rhoda," replied the young man "I didn't intend to make you angry. I am a rough lad, you know! as for money I don't care for it more than other people— but you're mistaken if you think the old man is as poor as he seems to be, working both you and himself to death—and—but no matter! I know he has money, for I've seen him count it—when I was fool enough once to come around the house in hopes to see you; but good bye, I see you don't like my company, good bye," and Richard forced a laugh which he intended should sound careless; but, which expressed any thing rather than mirth, and sounded hoarse and unnatural to the timid girl, whose reflections were far from pleasant as she pursued her way home.

That night the old man did not return home; it was his custom to be absent one or two nights; and Rhoda had never been troubled with any fears for herself when left alone in the solitary dwelling.— But now new fears kept her waking; she dreaded, she knew not what! she started at every sound, and trembled when the wind rattled the old casements; she remembered her grandfather's strict injunctions that she "should never leave the house after night fall; and to keep the door and windows fast barred;" did these precautions concern only her safety, or was there indeed treasure concealed, which he dreaded might be discovered? This was a question Rhoda could not answer to her own satisfaction; she could not reconcile the idea of sordid avarice, heaping only for the love of secret hoarding, with her grandfather's strictly moral counsels, his inoffensive habits, and simple, unobtrusive piety. "It cannot be!" she said to herself, "this idle tale of Richard Atwell is not true; he invents this just to vex me."

Then she called to mind many circumstances which tended in some degree to corroborate the doubt, which in spite of herself would intrude, and she could not entirely divest herself of uneasy fears, for to an open and pure heart like Rhoda's the idea of mystery seems fraught with evil. She pondered over the assertions of Richard, so often repeated; then from him her thoughts reverted to Mark Westbrook, and she fell asleep thinking of the latter.— Her dreams partook of the uneasiness of her waking thoughts, and strange and incongruous they were.— Bags of gold, floating on rolling billows, tall ships with snowy sails, and deep pits dug in the earth, mingled in wild confusion; and when Rhoda awoke she rejoiced to see the sun peeping through the crevices of the window shutter.

This day, for the first time, Rhoda was assailed by temptation—she blushed when she found herself wishing to pry into something which might be concealed from her; for the first time too she shed bitter tears, when she thought of their mode of life.— She recalled the image of the young sailor, whose frank and graceful manners evidently placed him above the vulgar, and she wept for the penurious habits and sordid occupations of her grandfather.

"Oh! she sighed, "why should Mark Westbrook come again to our miserable home? he can find no companionship with the pedlar and his grand-daughter;" she looked round the mean apartment, and wept yet more bitterly. Rhoda was not perfect, consequently such thoughts would arise in her mind, but she wished to be submissive to the will of Providence, so she strove successfully to conquer them.— She was high-minded too, and she felt, though she could not perhaps have expressed her thoughts in words, that worth and affection depend not on adventitious circumstances, and that she should, however elevated the station she might have occupied, have held in the same estimation she now did, the manly yet gentle character of Mark Westbrook, and that he would in the same degree have attracted her admiration, had his outward condition been yet more lowly than her own.

Thus reasoned, or rather thus felt, the lonely girl, as she counted the hours until her grandfather's return, and longed for the presence of the only being with whom she could hold free intercourse.

At length the old man came, weary and exhausted by travel, and his grand child flitted about him to relieve his wants and administer to his comfort; she told him how weary she had been of looking for him, how fearful during the hours of night. The old man regarded her with surprised attention.

"Why, how is this, child?" he said, "you used to be courageous—what can have put such idle fears into your head?"

"Yourself, grandfather," answered the girl with frankness. "The charges you always give me to keep the door and windows fast barred, and never to stir out after night-fall, have made me think there must be something to fear."

"Poor child!" said the old man after a pause, during which his thoughts seemed to be painfully occupied—"poor child! it is indeed my own fault—I should not have left you so much alone, you are too young, and too timid. But you are prudent for your age, Rhoda—you are a good child—you have been my only comfort. But you have led a hard life—I couldn't help it; I have often felt grieved for you, my poor girl, but I couldn't help it!"

"Do not be grieved for me, grandfather," replied the young girl, caressing the old man fondly. "Do not be grieved for me, but tell me why you are so sad, so very sad sometimes, and tell me if there is not something I can do to comfort you?"

"I know I can trust you, Rhoda," said old Amos, after a silence of some minutes. "I must tell you all; I may be called suddenly from the world, I cannot live much longer, if I am left to live out all man's miserable days"—"come and sit down by me, poor girl," he said to Rhoda, who was now weeping bitterly. I will tell you why we have lived in this miserable way, and why I have kept from all intercourse with other people, and why you, poor child, have been doomed to such a life of toil, and want, and loneliness."

Rhoda drew her low seat near to the old man, whose aged features looked almost ghastly in their paleness and agitation. She leaned her beautiful head upon his knee, and prepared to hear, what she longed, yet dreaded to know.

"I was born here, Rhoda, in this very house," he said; my grandfather built it when there was not much beside waste ground around it. Where the town now stands was then swampy, and huckleberry (whortleberry) bushes grew where some of the finest houses now are; he bought some land, which he cultivated in time, and my father lived here with my mother till they died, which was when I was about twelve years old. You were named after your great grandmother, Rhoda, and she was called after this beautiful little island, which was named from its supposed resemblance in climate to another beautiful island in the old world."

"But I do not believe that island is half so lovely as this," interrupted the listener.

"May be not," answered the old man, "but as I was saying, child, when I was about twelve years old, my parents died, and I went to another place far away from this, where I had a distant relation, and learned a business by which to live. The little land which belonged to me was sold, but the old house stood. One after another lived in it, and after it was empty for a long while, when I was twenty-one, I gave an old woman leave to stay in it, which she did till she died. I did not come back here, I was busy in other parts. Just before the war, I was then about thirty years old, I married a beautiful Scotch girl whom I saw weeping on board the vessel which had brought her over—her father, her only friend, having died on the passage. She had no friend in the wide world,' she said, 'and no home to go to.' I took her to a place where she was kindly taken care of; and in a few months we were married. She was too good for this world; Rhoda, your grandmother was as perfect as a mortal can be. My business had prospered exceedingly; I was able to make her happy notwithstanding I lost much during the war. I need not tell you now about the troubles of that trying time. I have often talked to you about it—well, well, your poor grandmother died, leaving me a son about five years old—he had the beautiful blue eyes, and golden curls of his mother; I doated on that child—I loved him foolishly—I could deny him nothing; I was blind to his faults, and I indulged him to his ruin."

"And was he my father?" enquired the weeping girl.

"Yes, child, he was your father, my poor son," resumed the aged narrator. "As he grew older I saw that he was fond of frolicking, and running about from place to place; he could never be brought to attend to any regular business. But he was affectionate; he loved me, and when he thought he had offended me, he would be so grieved, that I hoped he would grow steady as he grew to be a man. I hoped, but I did not take the right means to make him better, for I was a weak and foolish father. I glossed over his faults, and could not bear to grieve him by reproof. I became reconciled to him, and as indulgent as ever when he appeared sorry; I should have waited for some signs of reformation, before I forgave—but I had not the right sense to direct me. I wanted firmness. Poor Charley went on in his wild ways. He began to run in debt; I had to pay his debts, which put me to inconvenience. By and by, I had reason to mistrust that he gambled. I had always a horror of gambling. I taxed him with it;—he denied the charge; and we had high words, which almost broke my heart to think on. He went away and staid several months. I suffered terribly then, for I did not know what had become of him. At last he came back; he begged to be forgiven, and owned that he had indulged in gaming, but solemnly promised that he would never bet or throw the dice, or touch the cards again. I believed him. He told me that he was married. His wife was very young—little more than a child—his handsome face and winning ways had won her heart. She was an orphan, and poor—but a sweet creature to look on. Poor Annie!—she had a hard life, though your father was always fond of her, in his way, Rhoda; but his love for her was like mine for him, it was not shown in the right way. I had to support them; and when you were born, he seemed so delighted, and so fond of you, that I hoped he would mend his ways, for your sake; but he did not. My poor son! Things went on worse than ever. They got so bad, and he owed so many debts that he was afraid to stay in the place where we lived. He came home only by stealth, for a short time, and dare not be seen by any one."

"I remember it well," sobbed the listener; "I remember the grief of my mother when he went away; and how glad, yet frightened, she seemed when he came home again."

"Yes, child, yes," resumed the old man, "an unsteady husband brings sorrow to the home where he ought to bring gladness. One night your father came home at a late hour; he had been absent many weeks, he seemed dreadfully frightened and flustered; and he took me apart from your mother, and made me swear to keep the secret he was going to tell me, for his very life, he said, depended on it. I promised. Then he put a pocket book into my hand, and said that he had won the money at the gaming house; but that the man from whom he won it, was found the next morning dead—none knew by what means. My son solemnly swore that he had no hand in his death—though, no doubt, he would be suspected, he said, if he was known to have been with him that night, or to have the money. The man was flustered by liquor, and had insisted on staking the pocket book, and all it contained. The two were alone when your father won the money. He was never a successful gambler, for he usually lost much more than ever he won.— After they parted, your father rode some miles further, (they had met on the Hartford road,) and then at another place, as he felt elevated by his unusual success, he played again, and lost seven hundred dollars of the two thousand that he had won! He had since learned that Kelsey, the man from whom he won the money, was found drowned in a pond. Your father thought he had missed his way, as the night was dark, and he the worse for liquor, and fallen into the water, and had not been able to help himself. Your father knew that Kelsey had lately married a young widow, and it was her money he had squandered at the gaming table. She had, it seems, entrusted it to him to conclude the purchase of a valuable farm, and the stock, in which she wished to invest it. Enquiries were being made for the money! Your father dared not stay in the State, or in any other near, for fear of being taken up as the murderer of Kelsey. He dared not produce the money—which he now would gladly have done—as he had no proof of his innocence, I knew he had no hand in his death! I knew him too well to suspect him of that, (the rest was bad enough;) but I could not prove what I believed—so I hid the money, and your poor father went away. All my previous troubles were nothing to this! A year after, I received a letter from your father. He begged me to come to him at a place which he named, a long way off; he was very ill, he wrote, and not able to leave the place. I set out to see him, and when I arrived I found him very ill indeed, and terribly uneasy in his mind. He charged me to keep the money concealed, or to destroy it, for he was afraid it would bring trouble on us. Yet

...told me where the widow of Kelsey lived; that she did not think she knew any thing of their meeting, for that they were acquainted; he had heard much talk about the manner of Kelsey's death; and it was generally believed that he had been robbed, and then thrown into the pond. He wished from his very heart that he had never met him, and that the money was with the right owner. My poor son was in great trouble of mind, and repented sorely of the life he had led; he often said 'if he should recover, he would become an altered man, and endeavor to make up to his poor wife, and to me, for all we had suffered on his account.' I was truly thankful to find him of this way of thinking; and I believe if his life had been spared, he would have kept his promise. But it was not the will of God that he should recover! He lingered a long time, but kept growing weaker. My own trouble was very great—but the greatest of all was the secret I dare not tell to any one! I verily believe that if Kelsey had been living, your father would have restored the money, which was such a trouble to us both, before it could have been missed; but his death, in such circumstances, had forced us to keep it; and besides, a part of it was wanting, and it was not in our power to replace it. We might have restored what was left to the widow, but the fear of being suspected of having caused Kelsey's death, and of having repented too late, kept us from doing right. Oh, Rhoda! that money has been a weight upon me! It dragged me down, and kept me down. I have never dared to look any body in the face since I had it. I am now very old, but I might still have lived like a man, if it had not been for that. Your father died, and your poor heart-broken mother did not live long after him. She was a mild, good, pious creature, and had been taught many things in her childhood, which raised her above the ignorant. She had loved your father fondly, in spite of his faults. After I had followed her to the grave, I determined on the course I would pursue. I had none but you, a feeble child, now to live for. I sold the little that was left, and came to the only shelter that remained to me. I came to the old house where I was born. I had been living hundreds of miles from this place, and scarcely any one knew me here, except by name. I began trading a little in the town, as I was unable to engage in any more profitable business, and when you were old enough to be left alone, I went about the country. I resolved to make up what was wanting of the sum my poor son had entrusted to me, and by some means or other return it to the right owner, for I never could believe that money got by gaming was lawful gain. I always thought it was no better than swindling, and my poor son thought so too, before he died. Well, Rhoda, you know nearly all the rest. You know how I have toiled and starved, and avoided all intercourse with my fellow beings, except as it was necessary in the way of trade. You know the hardships we have undergone—and all the while the weight of that money lay upon me!—I had to hide and to watch it;—and I feared that every one who spoke to me, would discover the secret I kept at so great a risk. My only wish has been to get rid of it, if I could restore it to the rightful owner. The neighbours call me an old miser. Sometimes I have been afraid they knew something of the money, and I should be brought to trouble about it yet. But my mind has long been made up to any thing that may come."

After a pause, the old man resumed—"And now, Rhoda, you understand why I have brought you up so hardly,—why I have denied you the company and conversation of our neighbors. I knew that in some way I was suspected by them, though no one knew the truth, except those who have gone to their last account; and here they, in all likelihood, never heard of Kelsey or his money, but they might have—and I have lived in constant dread—and you, my poor girl, have often had reason to think hard of your poor grandfather. I brought you up to work, and to depend upon yourself, and that is better than being indulged in idleness, and made helpless by doing nothing."

Rhoda made no answer, except by caressing the withered hand that was laid upon her head. She had sat down at the knee of the old man, a warm-hearted, affectionate, and timid child—but as she arose from her lowly seat, she felt that the cares of many years had been added to her short life. She arose a deeply-thinking and determined woman; notwithstanding the simple, even common-place language, in which the story of her father's misdeeds, her mother's sorrow, the anguish, the toils, and privations of the aged narrator, had been conveyed to her ears, it inflicted deep grief on her heart. Alternately she compassionated and blamed the parent who had brought such ruin on them all; her tears had flowed freely for the wasting grief of her blameless mother; but, most of all, her pity was elicited for the old man, who had endured so much, so long, and so silently, and whose mental sufferings were augmented by the feelings of self-reproach, which continually haunted him, respecting his culpable indulgence to a wayward child. But she knew that it was her duty to strengthen and console the old man, and to conceal from him the extent of her own affliction. Rhoda felt that her path of duty lay straight before her.—Her grandfather was infirm and old, a prey to disquietude and tormenting fears;—he dared not act, even to relieve his mind from the heavy load that oppressed it—but she, if she could win his acquiescence, would act for him. She felt that she dared do anything that could smooth his passage to the grave, which would not be far distant, worn and weary as he was with toil and sorrow. Rhoda learned from her grandfather that the sum for which he had toiled so long was completely made up by the small sums which his little traffic had enabled him from time to time to add to it, in course of so many years;—he told her, also, that the interest of the money, during the time he had held it, was now nearly added to the principal, and that a short time would enable him to complete his work.

The next time old Amos left home, Richard Atwell sought to see Rhoda, and renewed the subject of his attachment to her. After listening for a time to his professions of regard, mingled with jeering remarks on the imaginary wealth of her grandfather, Rhoda took a sudden resolution. She knew the young man was not in reality as rude in feelings as he was in manner, and she hoped that some show of confidence on her part might have the desired effect of freeing her from his importunities, without arousing those feelings of mortified pride, and anger, which had hitherto appeared to prompt his conduct towards her.

"Richard," she said, "you distress me by such discourse, for whether you are in earnest or only jesting, it is equally useless and improper; situated as I am, I have only my good name to depend on, and your conduct towards me is such as to subject me to censure and reproach. You may gain the regard of some one who can make you happy—I never can; but," she added, "you may be a friend, if you choose, and as such I am willing to regard you. I wish you to behave to me as a friend and neighbor, but, above all, I am grieved that you jeer thus at my grandfather, who injures no one, and whose only crime is that he is poor, and pursues a mean employment for his bread. We shall be all the happier if left alone to our poverty and sorrow."

"Sorrow!" interrupted the young man; "Rhoda I did not know that you had any sorrow. I don't wish to trouble you. It is true I have behaved foolishly. I never thought seriously of it before,—but the truth is, Rhoda, I am always thinking of you;—your image is before me night and day; but I suppose it is best for me to follow your advice. The old folks would make a great fuss if I should marry any poor girl,—they love money; and I thought if it was true that your grandfather had money, (which I think he has) they would be agreeable, and give consent, and overlook—you know!"

"I understand," replied Rhoda; "but now, Richard, listen to me—I will be as candid as you have been. My poor old grandfather toils, and starves, deprives himself of every comfort in order to save money, it is true—but not for the love of hoarding it. The money thus gained, and hoarded, is not for his own use, or mine—neither is it to lie useless—and it is honestly gained; but is destined to the payment of a debt—a debt, Richard, of long standing—contracted when I was an infant, and which has preyed upon his mind, and made him miserable. I aid him with all my power, and with all my heart, for I desire nothing so much as to see him free from this load of misery; I think of nothing else—I can think of nothing else, till this is done. Now, Richard," she added, "now you know our secret. You may expose us still farther to the jeers of our neighbors—or you may keep our secret in your own bosom, and forbear to harass me with flatteries which I cannot listen to, and jeers that make my heart still more heavy."

Richard gazed a moment in the face of the agitated girl,—then approaching her, and taking her hand gently, he said—

"Rhoda Grattan! I believe you—forgive my foolish teazing; I will act differently in future. Yes, Rhoda, I will be a friend to you—no one shall harm you when I am near—the old man shall not be molested. I have been in some measure the cause of reports about him; I will make all the amends in my power. You will see that I may be trusted."

Rhoda bade him farewell in a tone of kindness that brought the tears into his eyes, and Richard watched her retreating figure, as she pursued her way to her home, with mingled feelings of pride, regret, and admiration. And Richard kept his word with Rhoda Many were the acts of real kindness that old Amos experienced from the "wild youth" who used to teaze and vex him; and Rhoda's heart felt lighter for the confidence she had reposed in her former persecutor.

Another visit from Mark Westbrook enlivened the dull routine of toil and care, and left sweet recollections to be enshrined in Rhoda's heart, and fancy. A rare singing bird, from a foreign clime, remained to bring the giver each moment to her mind, and his chrystal vase and gilded cage contrasted singularly with the mean apartments which his song enlivened, and a curious plant in a porcelain jar caught the sunbeams from the little window; and these gifts, which Rhoda had not courage to refuse, were the charm of her life, for they assured her that the thoughts of the donor were with her, when he was far away.

Rhoda redoubled her exertions, and increased her occupations: she wished to make up a small sum to forward a purpose of her own, and she smilingly told her grandfather that "she intended to turn miser on her own account." The old man sighed heavily as he listened to her, and watched her unremitting toil. He had, of late, been troubled by new and painful self-reproaches. He began to fear that by attending only to the one absorbing wish of his soul, he had acted with cruel injustice towards the gentle and devoted being whom Providence had entrusted to his protection. He felt that he had, in all probability, doomed her to a life of cheerless penury, unremitting toil and unsocial gloom; he saw that she was unfit for the companionship of the rude beings by whom she was surrounded, and he knew that from even such companionship he had scrupulously withdrawn her. As his love for her increased, so did his anxieties on her account: he could not be blind to the feelings which brought the young sailor to their cheerless abode; he felt that he would gladly have confided the poor girl to his care and protection, and while he had full confidence in the firmness and integrity of Rhoda, and knew that by entrusting her with his painful secret, he had secured a zealous and faithful confidant, and a most efficient assistant, his heart smote him for the sacrifice she would in all probability be called on to make. There were moments of weakness, too, in which old Amos half regretted his confidence in Rhoda, as he said to himself, "If she could have been kept in ignorance—if I could have given her that money as a marriage portion!—My poor Rhoda!"

But these thoughts, though often recurring, were of brief duration. Once when he had inadvertently expressed similar regrets to Rhoda, the surprise she expressed, and her half resentful arguments, restored him to his wanted firmness of purpose.

"Let us act promptly, grandfather," she said, "let us perform our duty as soon as may be; life is uncertain. The widow may die—we, too, may be called away before our task is done. Oh! grandfather, let us hasten to restore this fatal gold to its owner—every moment is an age to me since I knew its history."

And Rhoda was steadily engaged in pursuing the labors, the proceeds of which were to aid her in accomplishing her plans; for the old man was now too infirm and ailing to journey from home. So Rhoda worked, and talked to the invalid, and attended to his wants; and by endeavoring to beguile his thoughts from painful subjects, found a useful occupation for her own.

While she was thus engaged, Mark Westbrook again sought their dwelling. The interval of his absence was shorter than formerly; and now he came resolved to tell her of his love, and bear her, if she would consent, from her cheerless home and wearying toil. Though young, Mark Westbrook was a keen observer; he had never doubted, for an instant, the innocence and perfect artlessness of Rhoda, but still he had struggled with his love, for he felt convinced that mystery of some sort was attached to the old man. In his visits to their neighborhood, he had met with persons whose remarks had strengthened the doubts which he could not help indulging; he had struggled then to vanquish his feelings, but love and generous trust had risen above worldly considerations, and Mark resolved to make the pedlar's grand-daughter his bride, if he could win her consent. He had confided to his mother his love, his doubts, and his struggles: she had listened, as a tender mother listens to an idolized son.

"Go then, Mark," she at length said, "go, and may God bless you! I will never upbraid you if it should be found that your feelings have misled your judgment. Win the poor girl, since you love her so deeply; I will be a mother to her! She has doubtless needed one; and as for the old man, why Mark," she added cheerfully, "we have enough for us all. I must see my son happy at all events."

So Mark departed with his mother's blessing, and when he reached the home of Amos Gratten, his hopes were high, for he had treasured up a thousand fond remembrances, and though far from being vain, he believed that Rhoda's heart would plead in his favor. "I cannot be mistaken," he repeated to himself, "I have read those lovely downcast eyes, and the modest blushes that flit over her cheeks: my sweet Rhoda will consent to be mine!"

Rhoda had ceased to be surprised that her grandfather never objected to the visits of his favorite.—To her it appeared a matter of course that he should be an exception to the rule which the old man had laid down. Mark's kind and cheerful manners, the modest frankness with which he made himself at home in their humble dwelling; the varied information he displayed; the fund of amusing anecdote on which he drew to enliven his conversation; and, above all, the deep feeling which appeared under this gay exterior, had opened a new era in the mind and heart of the hitherto isolated girl. Mark Westbrook was the sun which lighted the gloomy sky of her existence. Set apart from all others in her heart and memory, he was the one bright star that shone on her lonely pathway. Yet, steadfast in her integrity, and unwavering in her purpose, Rhoda listened to Mark's avowal of his love, of his hopes, and his prospects, as to a tale which charmed her, or a dream which could never be realized. He told her of the former struggles of his heart, that they were vanquished, and that he came, with the free consent of his mother, to woo her for his bride. Rhoda wept in silence.—Alarmed by her tears, and fearing, he knew not what, Mark exclaimed with much emotion—

"Have I then been mistaken, Rhoda? Can you not consent to pass your life with me? Does the thought make you weep? or is it concern for your grandfather? Be easy on his account, my sweet Rhoda, he shall be always with us; we will make his old age happy. Tell me then, Rhoda, if my proposal is disagreeable to you?"

"No, Mark, no!" replied the weeping girl, "to pass my whole life with you, would be happiness too great for me to expect, or hope for. Your generous trust in us must not be abused, Mark. There is much I ought to tell you—and I will, but not now—I have a task to perform, a duty to fulfil, before I know whether I ought to accede to your proposal; but to my last hour, I shall think of you—as I do now. Return here at the end of six months," she added, "and if you still feel and think the same, I will with joy and gratitude, be all you wish. Then, Mark, dear Mark! 'Whither thou goest I will go, thy people shall be my people'—will this content you, Mark?"

Overcome by emotion, Mark could scarcely bear up under this disappointment of his hopes. He lingered near them for more than a week, and each day repeated his visit and renewed his suit; but he could obtain no more—Rhoda's answer was still the same—and he left her with his hopes saddened, and his heart heavier than when he came, but with his love augmented, and his faith in Rhoda unshaken.

When her lover had been gone two months, Rhoda prepared for a journey which she had long contemplated. Her intreaties and arguments had at length induced old Amos to consent to her undertaking a journey to the place where the widow Kelsey lived, (for the old man had never omitted from year to year, his indirect inquiries, so that he was always informed that she still occupied the dwelling which had been designated by his unhappy son.) It was Rhoda's intention to relate to the widow the whole of her father's story, as she heard it from the old man, suppressing only the name. She firmly believed that the truth of her statement would be apparent to the lady, and that on recovering the money, so long lost to her, she would not wish to injure, in any way, those who restored it. Rhoda was resolved, come what might, to undertake this task, as fear, infirmity, and bitter recollections, made it so painful and humiliating to her aged grandfather.

"She will believe the truth," argued Rhoda, combatting the fears of the old man on her account,—"will know that I can have no agency in this affair, except to restore her property; as when she lost it, I was a little child. I am certain all will go right."

"But the journey," argued old Amos; "the journey, child: for you who have never been farther than into the town near by. Oh! Rhoda, you may meet with difficulties—you may fall sick—you may be robbed!"

"Fear not for me, grandfather," said the intrepid girl; "I shall be safe—I shall be protected! God will not forsake me! I am going to perform a duty acceptable to Him—when that is done, you can sleep in peace—your conscience will acquit you: and I have no fears for myself."

Before Rhoda left home, she sought to see Richard Atwell—she met him near the house, where he often came now just to see her, and wish her good day, in a friendly manner.

"Ah! Rhoda," said the young man, when she went towards him—"what good luck for me, to see you so early this morning! I expected some good luck: for I went yesterday to the fortune-teller's, old Daniel, who lives in the old hut, like a fly-cage, on the top of the hill yonder, he promised me good luck, and all manner of fine things, and only charged a shilling."

"Do you believe his promises?" asked Rhoda, laughing.

"To be sure I believe! Some of them have come true already. Here are you—the first piece of good luck I have had—and more is to come. You know," he added, "you know old Daniel reads the planets?"

"I have heard so," replied Rhoda: "but I scarcely know what it means."

"Nor I," said Richard; "but he muttered over his chalked board something about 'Mars being in the ascendant,' or something of that sort: and this morning, I found it was true."

"What was true?" enquired his companion.

"Why, this morning my star had the 'ascendancy,' for she scolded me awfully about being out late last night, and she beat the jack-towel about my ears when I laughed at her! That is what I call being in the [illegible]!"

"And were you out late?" enquired Rhoda, smiling.

"I went to see Fanny Brown, the rich brewer's daughter, you know, and stopping at old Daniel's coming home, I was rather late."

"I am glad you went to see her," said Rhoda, a little archly.

"Why, Rhoda, you see," replied Richard, "Fanny Brown is a pretty girl, and clever. You are the handsomest girl in Rhode Island, and the best—but you say 'go, Richard Atwell!' and she says—but I wont tell what she says."

"It is all right, Richard," said Rhoda; "I am rejoiced at what you tell me. But I have a favour to ask of you. I am going on a journey,—it is necessary that some one should go,—and my grandfather is too ill for him at present; now, the favour I want to ask of you is, to step in now and then, while I remain absent—he will be alone—your doing so will cheer him, and you can then assist him if he should require it. My mind will be easy if you promise to do this."

"I'll do anything you wish, Rhoda," replied the young man, while a glow of gratified feeling overspread his face. "You'll see! I'll take good care of the old man! He'll come on finely while you are away."

Rhoda took leave of her young neighbour with a friendly shake of the hand, and now she felt much easier on her grandfather's account.

Old Amos saw his grandchild depart with his prayers and blessings—he had furnished her with minute directions for her journey, which though distant but a few hundred miles, appeared much more formidable than such a journey would at the present time, when the facilities for travelling are so great. The poor old man felt deserted when he no longer saw the light figure of his grandchild flitting round their dwelling—he missed her gentle cares, and the soothing tones of her silvery voice. But it was for his sake she went, devoted and courageous—trusting to the faith of strangers, and firm in her simple integrity! If the old man's prayers could shield her, Rhoda was safe—for they arose each hour—each moment—for her safety; and he had no wish but to see her return—her mission fulfilled—and herself in safety.

The widow Kelsey sat alone in her little parlour, busily engaged with her knitting-work. It was so neat, that little parlour—the mahogany table was so highly polished, the brass andirons, shovel and tongs, shone with unrivalled lustre; a square carpet nearly covered the floor, and where it did not cover it, the boards were as white as boards could be; a clock ticked busily in one corner; a stuffed easy chair, covered with flowered chintz, occupied a recess beside the fire-place; the other chairs were of walnut wood, with stuffed seats, covered with blue worsted damask; China ornaments were on the mantle-shelf; a tortoise-shell cat purred on the brown stone hearth, while a bright looking-glass, in a carved mahogany frame, reflected all these objects, which bespoke comfort and competence; and the widow herself apparently about forty five years of age, looked as neat and as cheerful as her dwelling; she had a pleasing, benevolent countenance, which though it wore, at times, a thoughtful expression, was enlivened by the glow of health, and might still be termed handsome. There came a knock, a gentle, timid knock, at the street door: it was opened by a little servant girl, who presently came to tell her mistress that "a young woman wanted to see her."

"Show her in here, Ruth," said the widow; and Rhoda Grattan entered.

The widow Kelsey rose from her chair to greet the unlooked-for visiter. Struck by her beauty—by the paleness of her countenance—and surprised at the visible agitation of the stranger—she remained a moment silent—then approaching, she reached her a chair, and kindly requested her to be seated.

"You seem tired, my dear," she said; "take time to recover yourself, and then you can tell me your errand."

"I thank you, ma'am," replied the visiter; "I am a little tired."

A movement in the next room, separated from the parlour by a glass door, over which hung a muslin curtain, attracted Mrs. Kelsey's attention, and she requested Rhoda to excuse her absence a moment. She entered the inner room, and remained there a few minutes. When the widow returned to Rhoda, who had scarcely noticed her absence, in the confusion of her feelings, she appeared nearly as much agitated as her visiter, but addressing her in an encouraging manner and with a kind smile, she re-assured the trembling girl, whose courage had, for a brief space, given way.

"I come, ma'am," Rhoda began, "to speak to you on a subject which may be painful to you, and certainly it is so to me—but I bespeak your pity and indulgence, and above all, I beg you to remember that I am guiltless of all that is wrong in the transaction of which I must speak."

The widow hastened to assure Rhoda that "whatever might be the subject of her communication, she felt certain that no blame could be imputed to her." "Speak freely, then, my child," she said; "take time; do not hurry yourself—but speak freely, and without fear: as if you were speaking to a mother! But, first," she added, "take some refreshment—you are weary and faint!"

Rhoda replied that she was fatigued—having travelled many days, and had lost no time in hastening to the end of her journey.

After partaking of some slight refreshment, Rhoda began her story, in her own simple and touching language—she gave the details which she had heard from her grandfather. She recounted his domestic troubles—his fears—his privations, and his toils—his sorrow for the past; his firm conviction of the innocence of his son of any wish to take the life of Kelsey, or of any malevolence towards him. She declared her own positive belief that her grandfather had erred only by too great indulgence to his misguided son, and she spoke with tears of his terror of being suspected of having been privy to a crime at which both father and son would have shuddered.—She told the widow that the desire of restoring the sum entire, and with interest, had been the sole object of the old man's life for many years; and of the slow and painful means by which he had at length accomplished the desired end, and finally she produced the money which had been concealed in her dress.

At sight of the identical pocket-book which she had given to her worthless husband, a few days before his death, the widow felt overwhelmed with emotion. She had listened to Rhoda at first with amazement; then with deep and thrilling interest, which every moment increased until she with difficulty restrained the tears which were continually starting to her eyes.

"And now," said Rhoda, "my task is finished.—Can you, ma'am, believe in the assertion of my poor father—in the honesty and good intentions of my grandfather?"

"I can believe all that you tell me, my poor child," replied the widow; "it would be difficult to doubt you; but tell me, did the thought never arise in your mind that you were unnecessarily condemned to a life of toil and privation, from which this money might have freed you?"

"From the time I knew of it," replied Rhoda, "I also knew its destination; and no temptation could have induced me to keep it—no want could have forced me to use any part of the original sum—for that, I had the example of my grandfather."

"Few persons would have acted, under such circumstances, in the manner you both have," resumed the widow. "But tell me, child, did you not dread the journey, which must have seemed great to you, and full of peril?"

"I dreaded it, ma'am," answered Rhoda, "but I dreaded still more to delay it. I was always in fear that some accident might deprive us of the power of making restitution. Now it is done, and I shall be happier."

"And what did you mean to do here, in a strange place, after you had delivered to me this money, which has caused you so much trouble?" enquired the widow.

"I trusted, ma'am," answered Rhoda, looking with placid confidence in the face of the questioner, "I trusted that you would give me shelter for one night, and then speed me on my journey back to my grandfather.

The widow turned away to hide her tears; then extending her hand to Rhoda, she said—

"You are welcome, my dear, to remain here as long as you please. I should be happy to keep you always near me. Will you stay with me?"

"Ah, ma'am," replied Rhoda, "now, surely, you are jesting; you know that I ought to return to the poor old man as soon as possible, for"—

"Did you ever hear," interrupted the widow, "did you ever hear that I have a son?"

"No, ma'am," answered Rhoda; "my grandfather knew nothing of your family, and I never heard your name, except from him."

"But," said the widow, "my son does not bear the same name as myself; he is called by a different one, and I think, Rhoda, that you have heard his name."

Rhoda started. "You know my name, then?" she said, with agitation. "Ah! how did you learn my name?"

"From my son," replied the widow. "He speaks and thinks of no one but Rhoda!"

Rhoda half started from her chair, then sunk into it, and covered her face with her hands. A quick step approached her, the hands were gently withdrawn, and Rhoda saw Mark Westbrook, who held them in his own!

"Oh, Mark!" cried the bewildered girl, after a moment of speechless surprise, "Oh, Mark! how could you serve me so?"

"How could you serve me so, little miser?" retorted Mark, "hoarding your gold and your secrets for the widow Kelsey, leaving me to die with suspense, and dooming me to six months' penance, while you performed your mysterious pilgrimage. Ah, little plotter! you did not know you were flying straight to me, but I have caught you at last!"

Mark looked round for his mother, but she had quitted the room. He now told Rhoda how surprised and alarmed he was at hearing her voice, when she first addressed his mother; that, on her entrance, they had conferred a few moments—

"And you know the rest, Rhoda," he said; "you will pardon me for desiring to profit by my situation, and hear from your own lips the cause of your journey, and of your visit."

Rhoda did pardon him, and on the re-appearance of Mrs. Kelsey, a long conversation ensued, in the course of which Rhoda was informed that Mark was the widow's son by a former marriage, and also that Mrs. Kelsey had never believed her husband had been murdered. Such a report had been in circulation, but it soon died away, as there were other circumstances which contradicted the belief. A person, in whose veracity she had perfect confidence, had communicated to her what had passed between himself and the unhappy man a few hours before he was found lifeless. He had seen him much intoxicated, and in a state of great excitement; he had offered to accompany him home, but this offer Kelsey stubbornly refused. He acknowledged that he had lost a large sum of money at the gaming table, and swore that "he would never return home." Nevertheless, he was but a few miles from his own house when he was discovered in the state before-mentioned; that the enquiries which had at first been set on foot, were not prosecuted by her, after receiving this information.

"Oh!" exclaimed Rhoda, "my poor grandfather would have been spared much suffering and sorrow, had he known what you now tell me."

"True, my dear girl," answered the widow, "true, he would have been spared much suffering, but neither his worth nor yours would have been tried as it has been."

"And now, mother," said Mark, "she is ours, is she not?"

Mark's mother answered by kissing Rhoda, and calling her "daughter."

What happiness for Rhoda!—what a change in her prospects! But, in the midst of all this happiness, her thoughts continually reverted to the old man, alone, a prey to fear, and gloomy forebodings, and in all probability in need of her presence and her cares.

"Do not make me too happy!" she said to Mark and his mother, who vied with each other in showing her the most affectionate attentions. "I feel all your kindness, all your generosity, very deeply!—but I must not for one moment forget my poor old grandfather, who will count the moments till he sees me again!"

"We will make his old age happy!" replied Mark, with fervor.

"We should be basely ungrateful," said his mother, "if we did not do all in our power for one who has suffered so much in order to render us more than justice."

"I believe," remarked Rhoda, "that my grandfather may have peculiar notions on some subjects. He thinks that the toils and privations he has undergone for the last thirteen years, are in some sort, an expiation for the fault he committed in his over-indulgence of my poor father, and his blindness to his faults. This belief, joined to his native honesty, has kept him firm to his purpose, in situations where many would have wavered, perhaps given way. He is now happy in the belief that he has performed a sacred duty, and submitted to a penance acceptable to God."

"Be it so!" said Mark; "let him remain happy in that belief."

Mark's mother had been for the last few minutes busy in removing the money from the pocket book, which had been so long its repository. She locked the latter carefully in a drawer.

"I will keep that pocket-book," she said, "as long as I live; it will remind me of an inconsiderate and foolish action. Won by the handsome face and gay manners of a stranger, I threw myself and my whole property into his power, thus enabling him to indulge his fatal propensity, and to injure irreparably the prospects of my only son. Had not his career been so terribly arrested, my poor Mark, your mother's act would doubtless have reduced you to poverty!"

"Do not think of the past, mother," interrupted Mark, "you have been the best of mothers to me! Besides," he added, smiling, "how are we injured? this money has been placed at interest, and it was by no means our all."

"This money," resumed the widow, "which you have restored to me, Rhoda, I divide equally between you and my son. If I am not mistaken, it will soon be common property."

"No, mother," interposed Mark, "let it be all Rhoda's; it is her's and not mine."

"Now, Mark," said Rhoda, "you are talking nonsense; for if what you said to me a little time ago was sincere, you know that whatever is mine is yours also!"

It was agreed that in two days Rhoda should set out on her homeward journey. Mark wished to accompany her, but she argued against it, and prevailed. It was decided that Rhoda should apprise them by letter when her grandfather, of whose acquiescence she entertained no doubt, would be ready to meet them, about two days' journey from their home; for Mrs. Kelsey determined to accompany her son when he went to bring Rhoda and her grandfather home. Mark made every arrangement for her safety and comfort on her journey, which was accomplished in due time.

It would be impossible to describe the joy of old Amos on seeing Rhoda again. His delight was mingled with wonder and pious gratitude, when she detailed all she had heard, and the discovery that had been made.

"Then the good lad will belong to us, Rhoda," he exclaimed; "and it was for him and for you that I have toiled so long. God is very good! He has not punished the innocent for the guilty! I shall see my patient, dutiful child happy, and I shall die in peace!"

Richard Atwell had more than redeemed his promise. He had visited old Amos daily, and supplied him liberally with every comfort. He informed Rhoda that his suit to the pretty Fanny Brown had prospered, and he presented her with a piece of wedding cake the day before she set out with her grandfather to meet Mark Westbrook and his mother at the place appointed.

Rhoda entered the house of Mrs. Kelsey the second time, as the bride of her son. Old Amos spent the remnant of his days in comfort and security, and lived to rejoice in the happiness of his beloved grandchild.

The old house, where Rhoda resided so long with her grandfather, has now fallen to ruins; but Mark Westbrook always blest the hour when he first sought shelter under its roof, and saw for the first time his own Rhoda, "the Pedlar's Grand daughter!"

THY MOTHER.

BY LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

Who, when thine infant life was young,
Delighted, o'er thy cradle hung?
With pity soothed each childish moan,
And made thy little griefs her own?
Who sleepless watched in hours of pain,
Nor smiled till thou wert well again?
Who sorrowed from thy side to part,
And bore thee absent, on her heart?

Thy Mother, boy! How can'st thou pay
Her tender care, by night and day?
Who joined thy sports with cheerful air,
And joyed to see thee strong and fair?
Who, with fond pride, to guest and friend,
Would still the darling child commend?
Whose tears in secret flowed like rain,
If sin or woe thy life did stain?
And who, with prayer's unceasing sigh,
Besought for thee a home on high?

Thy Mother, boy! How can'st thou pay
Her tireless love by night and day?
Bear on thy brow the lofty smile
Of upright duty, free from guile;
With earnest diligence restrain
The word, the look, that gives her pain;
If weary toil her path invade,
Come, fond and fearless, to her aid;
Nerve thy young arm, her steps to guide;
If fades her cheek, be near her side;
And by a life of goodness pay
Her care and love, by night and day.

THE MISER'S WILL.

A TALE OF LIFE.

BY MRS. ANNA CORA MOWATT.

——"the waste of idleness,
Whose very languor is a punishment
Heavier than active souls can feel or guess!"
WORDSWORTH.

Chapter I.

"Ah! it's a dull world! a dull world! Hamlet was right—'flat, stale, and unprofitable'—flat as the jokes of a pertinacious punster; stale as the manœuvres of women; and unprofitable as a newspaper or a lecture!"

Frederick Faulkner, as he drawled out the last word, let fall the pamphlet which he had been endeavoring to read, and stretched himself at full length on one of the luxurious settees in the ladies' parlor at the Astor. With his arms beneath his head, and his eyes half shut, he lay for some time, gazing wearily at the different articles of furniture, wondering why people gave themselves the trouble to construct them; and, at intervals, expanding his finely-shaped mouth to its utmost dimensions by a long but silent yawn.

The drawing-room was vacant, for at that hour in the morning the ladies busied themselves in their own apartments; and idlers of the other sex found greater attractions in the smoking and reading rooms. It was, therefore, some time before the tediousness of Faulkner's meditations was disturbed. At length the door opened, but he did not trouble himself to alter his recumbent posture; nor had he sufficient energy to start at the possibility of a feminine intruder.

"Halloa, Fred!" exclaimed Frank Gaylord, with a laugh, "is that you? Are you asleep?"

"Asleep? I wish I was," half sighed, half yawned Faulkner. "Asleep? Sleep is too great a luxury for a fellow who is tired to death of all the world and himself into the bargain!"

"Thank you for the implied compliment," replied Gaylord; "the world is much obliged to you, so is your humble servant."

"It is the first time, then, I ever put the world under obligation," answered Faulkner, listlessly.

"Perhaps that is the very reason that you are so desperately disgusted with it! A man generally takes interest in his debtors, you know!"

Another long yawn, accompanied by an elongation of his well-dressed limbs, was Faulkner's only reply.

Gaylord was one of those happy beings who carry about a heart as light as their purse; exemplifying the proverb, that the absence of weight in the one counterbalances the ill effects of emptiness in the other. Full of projects—of activity—of hope; kindly in his feelings—almost undiscriminating in his affections, he never gave offence, and was never offended; consequently, the loud, light laugh which broke from his lips, as he contemplated the prostrate ennuye, awoke no unpleasant emotions.

"Glad you're amused," said Faulkner, turning on his side.

"That's generous of you, my dear fellow, to find happiness in affording others what you cannot enjoy yourself. But let us know, Fred, what unexpected misfortune has tumbled you into the Slough of Despond?" questioned Gaylord.

"Never had a misfortune in my life!"

"What ails you, then? You don't look like a dyspeptic—you are not encumbered with a scolding wife—report says you are worth ten thousand a year."

"And ten thousand blue devils to heighten its enjoyment! Dyspepsia would be something to think about, and a scolding wife would keep one awake—I'm dying of a stupor, occasioned by the absence of sensations."

"Why do you not travel?"

"Oh! I've travelled—been jolted in every stage-coach, shaken in every rail car, and cribbed up in every steamboat in Europe. Did me no good. Men and women—hills and mountains—lakes and trees—herbs and trees—the same all over!"

"Come, there is another panacea for ennui—matrimony. Why do you not get married?"

"To some woman who thinks ten thousand a year sufficient inducement to permit me to encircle her finger with a ring, and hang a chain upon my own inclinations? A rich man has not the privilege of marrying a wife; he can only expect to play the husband to a mercenary woman. That occupation is not to my taste."

"Nor, upon my word, does any other occupation seem to be! I beg pardon, my dear Fred, but why do you not employ yourself?"

"Oh! I've tried it. Tried to drink—gave me the headache; preferred not making a beast of myself. Tried to smoke—made me qualmish; preferred not smelling like an old pipe. Tried to gamble—no fun in losing. Tried everything—it's no go! Havn't a pulse for enjoyment! Don't know what to do with myself!—tiresome world!"

He concluded his sentence with a succession of yawns, and stretching out his arm for an additional cushion, which he placed beneath his head, laid himself upon his back, with his mouth half open and his eyes fixed upon the ceiling.

Gaylord turned away, for he found the yawns contagious, and was about to leave the room. Just as he reached the door, he looked back, and said—

"By the way, Fred, they tell me you have a lawsuit pending. Why don't you amuse yourself with looking after that? Who is likely to win?"

"Don't know—don't care! If old Scrapeall gets it, I shan't be worth a copper! Can't help it! Don't believe he will—don't care if he does!"

"There will be plenty of anxious mammas and marriageable daughters to care, I warrant," resumed Gaylord; "but I am afraid that your prospects of winning are too good for you to break the fair ones' hearts by anything but your indifference. So, adieu! I wish you a happy deliverance from your cerulean enemies."

And Frank Gaylord made a sudden exit, for he perceived his friend's mouth slowly enlarging itself with another protracted yawn, and his own began to give tokens of the sympathetic force of example.

Faulkner lay awhile longer, and after turning repeatedly from side to side, and finding all positions equally uncomfortable, he languidly arose to his feet. The mirror, directly in front of him, reflected his attractive person. He walked slowly towards it, passed his fingers through his dark and waving hair, contemplated for a moment his regular but inanimate features, and drawled out, "Wish I wasn't such a good-looking fellow; wish I'd been squint-eyed, or lame, or hunch-backed; then I'd have something to think about."

With this extraordinary regret he turned away, paced the room once or twice, looked out of the window, first at the gloomy sky above, and then at the peripatetic umbrellas which jostled one another beneath.

"I'll take a walk!" he suddenly exclaimed, with a kind of energy which resembled the desperate flickering of a candle just before it expires in the socket. "Mackintosh, India rubber shoes—can't get wet—don't care if I do!"

He was soon prepared for his promenade, and slowly descended the steps of the Astor, spreading his umbrella as he gave vent to his favorite ejaculation of "Tiresome world! oh! very!"

It was a day in March, and the air was as cutting as the breath of scandal. The rain which fell was fine, but penetrating, and the mud that darkly carpeted the paving-stones, rendered the walking slippery and difficult. Faulkner sauntered, or rather slid down Broadway, not from any particular choice, but because his face happened to be turned in that direction when he issued from the hotel. The friends he met were hurrying along, intent on seeking shelter; while his slow pace plainly bespoke that the object of his walk was to find refuge from ennui, and its goal any which chance might offer.

"Please give us a penny! a penny, please!" was the first sound that saluted his ears at one of the crossings, and two little hands were stretched out within the circumference of his umbrella. He looked down, and saw a couple of ragged children, each with a wet broom in one hand, while the other was extended supplicatingly toward him. As a sort of diversion for himself, rather than with any defined desire of being charitable, he thrust his fingers into his waistcoat pocket and drew forth a two-shilling piece. Just as he placed it in the hand of the elder petitioner, his eye fell upon a third little girl who stood near the others. She was busily sweeping the crossing, and though she did not stretch forth her hand, she looked up in his face with a half-timid, half-imploring look, and then pertinaciously plied her broom.

"Divide it amongst you—give that little girl some!" exclaimed Faulkner, as he passed on.

After walking a few paces farther, he turned back to take one more look at the little street sweeps.—The two that had addressed him were evidently quarrelling about the alms which he had bestowed. The third little girl stood leaning upon her broom, anxiously regarding them, but without taking part in the dispute. Faulkner had an eye for the beautiful, under all its guises and disguises; and he could not help remarking the almost inappropriate grace of the young girl's attitude. Her form, too, was remarkably slender; and mean as was her garment, there was an air of taste in its arrangement. The folded red shawl crossed over her expanded bosom and knotted behind, displayed the delicate roundness of her waist; the striped skirt, cut so short that it escaped all contact with the mud, exposed to view a pair of small and well-turned ankles; the shoes—but those were large, badly shaped, and much worn, and if the feet within them corresponded to the ankles, the shoemaker had done himself no credit. Then the little blue hood, tied so closely over the pale face! The pallor of that face reminded him of the sorrowful expression of the large dark eyes that were for a moment turned to his.

Faulkner walked slowly on, pondering upon the misery of street-sweepers in general, and of this little trio in particular. One of his habitual yawns, which at that moment surprised him, made him come to the conclusion that after all they were not to be pitied so much as himself; and one or twice more exclaiming, "tiresome world! tiresome world!" he turned to retrace his steps, with the intent, perhaps, of again wooing Morpheus upon the comfortable lounges of the Astor.

Once more he approached the crossing where the three little girls were stationed. Two of them were just starting in pursuit of a fat, good-natured looking gentleman, who seemed half disposed to listen to their prayers. The third—the one who had temporarily excited his interest, was still industriously sweeping away the mud, although her ungloved and purpled hands seemed almost too cold to grasp her broom. At the sound of steps she raised her head, apparently recognised Faulkner, for the ashy hue of her cheek gave way to a slight flush, then with even quicker movements resumed her occupation.

"Here, little girl!" said Faulkner, yielding to a sudden impulse of generosity; "take this!" and he placed in her half frozen hand a gold piece worth two dollars and a half.

The child, for she was scarcely more, gave one bewildered look at the gold, convulsively closed her fingers upon it, and with a cry of joy which was almost wild in its sound, darted down the nearest street. Her broom, which she still grasped, trailed after her without impeding her progress—the strings of her little blue hood loosened, and it fell to the ground, but she did not pause to recover it. Faulkner caught but one glimpse of the brown hair that curled in close round rings about her head, and she had disappeared!

For several moments he stood gazing abstractedly at the corner round which she vanished. The inquisitive glances of the passers by recalled him to a sense of the ridiculousness of his situation. With a quicker step he returned to the Astor and sought the ladies' parlor. But he no longer felt any inclination to throw himself upon the settee, for his eyes had lost their heaviness, and his limbs partook of the activity of his mind. He walked about with rapid steps, that pale thin face ever and anon rising before him, and the strange cry that had burst from the little girl's lips, ringing in his ears.

And then he pictured to himself the relief, or at least the pleasure, which his accidental donation had afforded the unfortunate child, and wondered if her pale cheeks were at that moment flushed and her eyes bright, and congratulated himself as the author of the unwonted hue and happy lustre.

"At least I have purchased a sensation, cheap at two dollars and a half, and I do believe I have not yawned these three hours." As he uttered these words, the dinner bell disturbed his reverie, and he hastened down with the unusual accompaniament of an appetite.

Before night, however, he had almost forgotten the little street sweep, and his ennui returned with redoubled violence.

Chapter II.

In the basement of a house situated in one of the most obscure parts of the city, sat an old and decrepid man bending over a small table. Every thing about him bespoke the most abject poverty. In his trembling hands he held a pen, and before him lay a paper which, strange to say, bore strong resemblance to a will. He was in the act of signing it, and two females stood beside him, evidently as witnesses.—He had scarcely made one stroke with the pen, before a violent fit of coughing interrupted his labors. Completely exhausted, he laid back in his chair, and the elder of the women advanced to support his head, but at the same time gave utterance to an exclamation of petulent disappointment.

"You shall have all—all—when I am gone! But that won't be yet—all. Lucy shall never see the color of my gold. Never fear—never fear! I say you shall have all!"

"You are better now; come sign, sign!" answered the woman, forcing her harsh voice to imitate the tone of kindness; "your signature is wanting!"

"Never fear—never fear—plenty of time. I'm not going yet!" And another violent fit of coughing seemed to contradict his words.

The repulsive countenance of the elder woman was distorted by mingled vexation and dread. She evidently exerted an all-powerful influence over the old man. And yet, though shattered by disease and the influence of evil passions, though sinking prematurely into his dotage, his ruling love—avarice—was stronger even than her fierce and despotic will.

"It's mine—the money's mine! Abby, you shall have it when I'm below ground, but it's all mine yet; and there's more coming to it! More—more! Never fear!"

Abby replied by placing the pen in his hand, and whispering, "Yes, more—more. But sign, or it will all be Lucy's one day. Come, your name, 'Hiram Scrapeall.' It's soon written!"

As she spoke, she placed her own hand upon the one that held the pen, and commenced grinding the fingers over the paper.

A knock at the outer door—a low and timid knock, made the old man start and drop the pen, for he was weak and nervous.

"What's that, Abby? What's that?" he demanded, trembling.

"Go and see!" said Abby Conklin to her daughter; "but do not admit any body."

The young girl (for though so old in appearance, so withered by care and worn by calculation, she had numbered but few years,) gave a warning look to her mother, and left the room.

A few moments afterwards a beseeching voice was heard in the entry—"Let me see him! I must—I will!"

With a sudden movement, darting by the person who was attempting to prevent her entrance, a girl some fourteen or fifteen years of age, rushed into the room. Mrs. Conklin seized her rudely by the arm, but she broke loose, and with one bound stood beside the old man, who was groaning and shaking in his chair.

"Who is it? who is it?" he gasped out, shrinking away from the intruder. Her thin and pallid face, and those large penetrating eyes fixed on his, alarmed him.

"It is Grace, your own grandchild!" answered the little girl in an excited yet not unmusical tone. "My mother is starving—dying. That woman (pointing to Mrs. Conklin) has driven me from your door day after day; but your own child is dying of want, and I would see you!"

"Let her die!" fiercely ejaculated Mrs. Conklin. "She married a beggar against her father's will. What should her child be but a beggar—and that in consequence of his will?" And as she shrieked forth these words, she pointed savagely to the document lying upon the table.

Grace turned slowly round, and even that evil woman quailed before her rebuking look, and the pitying reproach of her tone, as she said, "You are a wicked woman—God forgive you! It was you who made my mother's life so wretched. She married to escape from your persecutions—you incensed my grandfather against her—she is now almost"——the word that she was trying to utter seemed to choke her—"starving!" she exclaimed at length, with a strong effort—"And yet she is happier, in the midst of misery, than all her father's wealth can render you, in the very lap of luxury!"

Livid with rage, Mrs. Conklin once more seized the girl by the arm, and attempted to force her from the room.

"Grandfather! Grandfather! My poor mother"——

The old man seemed too terrified and bewildered exactly to comprehend what passed. He looked at Mrs. Conklin, whose iron grasp had completely mastered Grace, with a vacant stare; and then gazing at the young girl, muttered "Take her away! take her away!"

"Do you hear that?" shrilly screamed Mrs. Conklin. "But perhaps he will give a message that you can carry to your dear mother!" she added, maliciously. Then addressing the old man, she asked—"What about Lucy? What were you saying of Lucy?"

Her voice seemed to arouse him, and to recall the train of thought which Grace had interrupted; for he groaned out, "She shall never see the color of my money! Never fear—never fear! The money's mine—all mine! I'm not going yet! Never fear!"

Grace was too much shocked by these words, to make any further resistance to Mrs. Conklin's will. Almost before she knew how she came there, she stood in the street, and the door was closed against her. Mrs. Conklin had returned to the room, to witness the appending of Scrapeall's signature to the document which made her heir to a miser's carefully accumulated wealth.

Chapter III.

"I hate fine weather when the wind is so strong!" exclaimed Faulkner, peevishly putting his head out of his chamber window. How fast the side walks are drying. Street sweeps will soon be in Othello's predicament—'occupation gone,'—dull times for them; just as dull for other people!" And Faulkner drew his head in and closed the window, with more spleen and perhaps more energy than was his wont. In a few moments more he was walking in the same direction as on the previous day, but his pace was brisker, there was less languor depicted on his features, less heaviness in his whole mien; he looked as though he had, or was persuading himself that he had, some end to accomplish, some duty to fulfil. Before he had gone far, his steps unconsciously grew quicker, and his eyes were eagerly fixed upon some object in the distance. Was it the little street sweep? He felt certain that it was she, and yet her back was turned, and the pretty blue hood had been replaced by a faded Madras handkerchief, apparently tied beneath her chin. Her head drooped dejectedly upon her bosom, and she moved her broom more languidly than on the preceding day.

"I wonder if she is very poor! If she has parents! If they are suffering! What she does with herself when the pavement is not muddy. Whether she—whether she—whether she finds it—a—tiresome world!" And for once Faulkner murmured these last two words to himself, without the accompaniment of a yawn.

He had approached the little girl unperceived.—"Mud's drying, eh?" She started violently at the sound of his voice, and the fair face raised to his was suffused with crimson. After a glance of recognition, and a slight quivering of the lips, as though words of thanks for his yesterday's charity were hovering upon them, she attempted to continue sweeping. But her hands trembled, and the broom, though it shook beneath them, seemed fastened to the ground, and the black mud lay unmolested around it.

Every instant Faulkner became more interested. He did not care who saw him, for he was generally too indifferent to every thing, to be tenacious of the world's opinion. A conversation with a street sweep was something novel. He who had found the world so dull, could not lose the opportunity of enjoying any novelty, however it might subject him to ridicule.

"Have you parents?" inquired he of the little girl.

"Only a mother," she replied, in a low voice, the sound of which thrilled him strangely.

"And she is poor?"

"Very—very poor!" and a suppressed sob caught his ear as she articulated the last word.

"Do you live far from here?"

The girl shook her head, for she was too much abashed, or moved, to give utterance to the negative.

"Come!" said Faulkner, suddenly his countenance brightening until its expression became truly beautiful, "I will go and see your mother—will you show me the way?"

The girl looked at him a moment, her face full of wonder. He returned her glance with a shrug of the shoulders, which was followed by a smile. The first said, "If you choose you need not believe me!" The last, "Indeed I am in earnest!" There was too much encouragement in that smile for her to doubt its meaning.

"My mother will thank you," she murmured, with a swelling heart, and commenced walking in the same direction which she had taken with so much speed on the previous day. Faulkner followed at a short distance behind her, muttering to himself, "An odd way of putting the blue devils to flight—like it because it's new—walk will do me good!" The last casual exclamation awoke an unusual train of thoughts; and he added thoughtfully, "Good! I shouldn't wonder if it did—in more ways than one. I begin to feel as if it had done me good already!"

The young girl turned into a very narrow and filthy street. Faulkner's dainty senses, especially his olfactory organs, began to excite in him a repugnance to following her any farther. He was deliberating upon the practicability of giving her a few dollars and turning back, when for the first time she looked around. One more glance at that pallid face silenced the murmurings of the rebellious sense, and he walked briskly on. In a few moments more, the girl stopped at the head of a flight of steps, which led into a cellar, dignified by the name of a basement story. She descended, and entered a small room; dark, damp, cold and cheerless. A few ashes on the hearth, told that on the previous night some attempt had been made to kindle a fire of chips; but now, not even a dying spark gave out its feeble warmth. There was neither chair nor table in the room, but an old box served as both. The only articles of furniture was a narrow cot. A slumbering woman lay upon it—but so completely enveloped in a thick, woollen blanket, that only a small portion of her face was visible. This blanket was almost the only covering of the bed; but it was warm, clean, and apparently new.

After giving one hasty glance around the room, Faulkner's eyes rested upon the comfortable blanket. Those of the young girl followed his; and smiling—it was a faint sad smile, the first that he had seen illumine her countenance—she whispered,—"She sleeps! For many nights the cold would not let her sleep—but she is warm now. The money you gave me bought this!" and she laid her hand upon the blanket, and looked into his face with an expression of gratitude which made Faulkner draw his breath with unwonted rapidity, while a thrill of pleasure sent the blood to his cheek and an unusual moisture to his eye.

He felt as though that small piece of gold, so little prized by him, had purchased more than the one sensation upon which he had congratulated himself the day before; and that even that warm woollen blanket, was not the most valuable thing it had procured.

Several minutes he stood contemplating the slumbering woman, for the young girl made no attempt to disturb her rest. The face of the sleeper was, if possible, even more ghastly than that of her child—Disease had aided want in imparting to those regular and delicate features a death-like hue. Never was the stamp of suffering more legible; and yet there was a placidity upon the sleeping face, an air of resignation, that softened the impress of the wan countenance. At an involuntary movement of Faulkner's, the closed lids quivered and slowly opened. A look of terror convulsed the woman's features at the sight of a stranger standing beside her cot.

"Grace! Where is Grace?" she almost shrieked.

"By your side, mother," replied Grace, softly; and then, bending her head close to her mother's, she whispered a few words which explained the appearance of so unusual a visitor.

But the mother seemed scarcely satisfied. She looked at her child inquiringly and at Faulkner almost with dread. The tongue of the latter refused to perform its appointed office; he shrank, without knowing why, before that searching glance, and turned to the young girl, as though appealing to her to relieve his embarrassment.

"We have not thanked him, mother!" said Grace, half reproachfully.

"Oh! I want no thanks—don't mention it!" answered Faulkner, suddenly regaining the use of his tongue. "I hope that I shall be able to do something for you, my good woman. I shall try—upon my word I will; but I see you are busy now.—That is, I'm in haste myself; so I won't detain you. I mean I can't stay any longer. You must make yourself comfortable here. A little present from a friend—only a trifle!" and he dropped the well filled purse, which he had agitatedly drawn from his pocket, upon the bed.

He was turning away hastily, but Grace seized his hand, and, her face streaming with tears, pressed it between her own icy palms and said, "Oh, sir!—You—you have saved my mother. God will reward you!" And then, as though ashamed of this burst of emotion, she hung her head, and covering her face with her hands, wept in silence.

Faulkner was too much unused to such situations to know how to act: he twirled his hat with an air of indecision, for a moment, then bowed to the mother, who, leaning upon her elbow, was steadfastly regarding him, and hastily withdrew.

A thousand thronging thoughts gave activity to his brain as he walked homeward. "I must do something for them—a little of the money—nothing but a curse to me—what a blessing it might be to them! She shall sweep the streets no longer! I wonder what she can do—mantua-making—millinery—waistcoat stitching—profitable but tedious—too tedious—wish I could hit upon something pleasanter!" While these thoughts were chasing each other through his mind, his eyes accidentally rested upon a bunch of orange blossoms which was conspicuously displayed in the window of an establishment for making artificial flowers. "Flower-making—joining together the bright colored leaves—bending them in form—weaving them in wreaths—those delicate little hands of her's are just suited to such an occupation. It will be easy to obtain her admission as an apprentice here. Money can accomplish that, if it is not to be done any other way! Then when she has learnt the art—an establishment of her own—she shall be its mistress. I will advance her mother the capital—flower-making—flower-making—the little street-sweeper a maker of artificial flowers!" and he rubbed his hands together as he spoke, in actual delight. Then walking into the store, he purchased the identical bunch of orange blossoms which first attracted his attention, and, entering into conversation with the mistress of the establishment, soon obtained from her all the information concerning her occupation which he desired.

He had built a thousand castles in the air before he reached the Astor, and again and again pictured the little street-sweep and her mother in an elevated position—healthy—happy—prosperous—all through his exertions. Since the days of his boyhood his heart had not beat so lightly nor his spirits been so buoyant.

Frank Gaylord accidentally encountered him upon the stairs.

"Well, Fred, tiresome world, eh?" said Gaylord, accosting him laughingly.

"My dear Frank, I've just come to the conclusion that nothing makes the world so tiresome as to be of no use in it!" replied Faulkner, shaking hands with him warmly.

"Take care of my arm, will you?" replied Gaylord, withdrawing his hand from Faulkner's grasp. "Remember, my dear fellow, that I do not suffer from the same absence of sensations as you do!" and the friends parted.

That night, sweet sleep and sweeter dreams visited Faulkner's pillow. Immediately after breakfast he took a walk, in the hope of seeing Grace at her usual post. Her little companions were there, but she was absent. He returned home, and after a few hours, again walked that way. Still she did not appear. Again, towards dusk, he sought, but did not find her. Impatient to put into execution his schemes for her benefit, he hurried to the house whither she had conducted him on the previous day. He found it without difficulty—with a throbbing heart descended the flight of steps, and knocked. No answer. Again and again the knock was repeated, and at last, his impatience gaining a victory over his discretion, he opened the door and entered the room. It was empty—the cot was gone—no fire, nor even ashes upon the hearth—the old box was all that remained to assure him that he was not mistaken in the room.

Disappointed and almost confounded, he left the apartment through a door which opened into an entry, and walked up stairs to seek some one whom he could question concerning Grace and her mother.—He encountered an old woman upon the stairs. To his half-articulated and hasty inquiries, she replied, "Lord bless you, sir! they took themselves off by daylight this morning. Poor enough they are, but they paid the rent down. The little girl was taking on sadly, and the mother hardly able to stir a limb; but they would go! I believe it was something about a wild young man; and the mother thought it best Grace should not be in his way, for she's a handsome girl, sir; but that's the short and long of their going off so sudden-like!"

Faulkner had not the heart to ask another question. Frustrated in his first endeavor to be of service to his fellow-creatures—disappointed in the first scheme with which he for years had endeavored to occupy himself, he returned home dissatisfied, sad and weary. And yet those mingled feelings were less oppressive than that blank overspreading the mind, that distaste for enjoyment and sluggishness of thought, called ennui!

Chapter IV.

A year after the occurrence of the events related in the previous chapter, Frederick Faulkner was seated in a small office in the fourth story of a building in Wall street. Upon the table before him lay a number of legal-looking papers, carefully fastened with red tape. He was apparently occupied in preparing another which was to be added to their number. One glance at his features, his attitude, his movements, told that he was no longer the weary idler, the listless ennuye who had found the world and its occupants so exceedingly tiresome twelve months before.

Scarcely a couple of weeks after his rencontre with the little street-sweeper, and her sudden disappearance, Scrapeall unexpectedly gained the lawsuit upon which Faulkner's wealth depended. He found himself suddenly deprived of the means of subsistence. Strange to say, he evinced little chagrin on the occasion, and seemed almost glad to be relieved, even by a misfortune, from the lethargic incubus which weighed down his spirits. Before he reached his majority his father had insisted that he should qualify himself to become a lawyer, and he had accordingly passed an examination and received his diploma. But he had not then the energy to commence practice, and necessity did not compel him to abandon his habits of idleness. Once dependent upon his own resources, he seemed inspired with a new spirit. He found the panacea for his greatest ill in occupation, and gave promise of becoming eminent in the profession.

He never regretted his lost wealth except when he remembered how many heavy hearts he might have lightened—how many sufferers soothed by its means. The inexpressible pleasure he had received in befriending the little street-sweeper had never been equalled and never forgotten. The pale face of the little girl frequently rose before him. The burst of gratitude—the words of thanks, sobbed rather than spoken—these were often in his ears. For many months one glimpse of a broom in the hands of a young girl, made him quicken his pace, and his heart would beat tumultuously. But he was doomed to continual disappointment. Street-sweepers in abundance he encountered every day, but Grace was never among them. After some of these disappointments he would return home, open the box where the beautiful little sprig of orange blossoms had been carefully stored, and bitterly mourn over the unavoidable frustration of his first project for the benefit of a human being.

He no longer lodged at the Astor, for he was forced to study economy, his practice being as yet exceedingly limited. He had not visited his old residence, the scene of so many weary hours, for several months—when the arrival of a friend in town brought him once more to the Astor. Frank Gaylord chanced to be the first person who accosted him.

"Where have you been hiding yourself, Fred?—What have you been doing with yourself? But I declare you look younger and handsomer than ever!—By the way," he rattled on, "there's a chance of your regaining your fortune with a most delightful encumbrance! Scrapeall, you know, died some ten months ago. A will was found leaving his money to some woman, his housekeeper, I believe—but the signature to his will was only commenced. His property has, therefore, gone to his daughter and her child. The mother and young lady are now staying here. They are in the parlor at this very moment—let me introduce you."

"No! no!" replied Faulkner, "I am not so much in love with the money as to contemplate marrying it by means of a priest. Besides, I have a sort of superstition that it is in the keeping of the blue devils, who hover round it night and day. I have no inclination to renew my acquaintance with them!"

"But I tell you it is in the keeping of an angel, and her acquaintance you will soon have an inclination to make if you once see her face! The most artless, gentle little creature—not yet sixteen, and possessing all the grace and simplicity of a child. I hear that she spends half the day studying under the direction of the most accomplished masters; for her's is a strange story—but do let me introduce you! See! there she is sitting on the sofa beside her mother."

Gaylord, as he spoke, drew Faulkner towards the open door. They had taken but one step into the room, when a cry of astonishment burst from the lips of the latter, and he stood as though transfixed to the spot, spell-bound by an apparition. At the same moment Grace started from her seat and joyfully sprang towards him. Grace—Grace! Could it be Grace? That fair young girl with the rose of health upon her cheek—that beautiful woman who bore about her all the refinement and dignity suited to an elevated station? But Faulkner soon answered the question to himself, when the soft and thrilling voice which so long had haunted his dreams once more addressed him as a benefactor—a first and never-forgotten friend.

* * * * * *

Another six months, and once more the delicate bunch of orange blossoms was taken from its little box: this time to twine among the brown locks that clustered about the blushing cheeks of Grace. And over the orange flowers and the rich curls, floated a bridal veil. And by the side of Grace stood Faulkner, with more than a bridegroom's happiness pictured upon his radiant countenance. A few moments after the ceremony which united the young couple was ended, Frank Gaylord, who officiated as groomsman, whispered to Faulkner as he shook his hand—

"My dear fellow, I wish you joy of the good angel which you have taken to yourself, to exercise the blue devils!"

"Thank you," replied Faulkner; "but since the day that I discovered that it was a curse to be of no use in the world, they have seldom attacked me. To ensure my happiness the good angel will only have to remind me that 'it brings a blessing to bless!' She is pretty sure of doing that, by her own practical illustration of the maxim."

THE RICH MERCHANT.

A TOUCHING SKETCH.

It was night, and the streets were nearly deserted, the more especially as it was snowing fast. A single traveller, however, might have been seen, wrapped in a thick over-coat, urging his way against the tempest, by the light of the dim lamps. Suddenly, as he passed a ruinous tenement, the figure of a girl started up before him.

"Please, sir," she said, "if it's only a penny, mother is sick, and we have had nothing to eat to-day."

The first impulse of the moment was to go on, the second to stop. He looked at the girl. Her face was thin and pale, and her garments scanty. He was a man of good impulses, so he put his hand towards his pocket, intending to give her a shilling. But the traveller had forgot that his overcoat buttoned tight over his pocket.

"It is too much trouble," he said to himself, "and this wind is very cutting. Besides, these beggars are usually cheats. I'll warrant this girl wants the money to spend in some gin-shop." And speaking harshly, he said, "I have nothing for you! If you are really destitute, the guardians will take care of you!"

The girl shrank back without a word, and drew her tattered garments around her shivering form.—But a tear glistened on her cheek in the light of the dim lamp.

The man passed on, and, turning the next corner, soon knocked at the door of a splendid mansion, through whose richly-curtained windows a rosy light streamed out across the storm. A servant obsequiously gave him entrance. At the sound of his footsteps the parlour door was opened, and a beautiful girl, apparently about seventeen, sprang into his arms, kissed him on the cheek, and then began to assist in removing his overcoat.

"What kept you so long, dear papa?" she said; "if I had known where you were, I would have sent the carriage. You never stay so late at the office."

"No, my love, I was at my lawyer's, busy, very busy, and all for you," and he kindly patted her cheek. "But, now, Maggy, can't you give me some supper?"

The daughter rang the bell, and ordered the supper to be served. It was such an one as an epicure would delight in, just the supper for a traveller on a night like that.

"Pa," said the daughter, when it was finished, "I hope you are in good humor, for I have a favor to ask of you," and she threw her arms around his neck, and looked up in his face with that winning smile and those beautiful dark eyes of hers. "I wish to give a ball on my birth-day, my eighteenth birthday. It will cost, oh! a sight of money; but you are kind, good papa, and I know you have been successful, or you would not have been at your lawyer's."

"Yes, my darling," he said, fondly kissing her; "the cotton speculation has turned out well. I sold all I had of the article this afternoon, received the money, and took it to my lawyer's, telling him to invest it in real estate. I think I shall give up the business."

"O! do, do, papa. But you will give this ball, won't you?"

"You little tease," said her father, but he spoke smilingly; and putting his hand into his pocket-book, he took out a note of five hundred dollars, and placed it in his child's hand.

"Take this: if it is not enough you must have another, I suppose. But don't trouble me about it any more."

The next morning broke clear, but the snow was a foot deep, and lay here and there in large drifts, blocking up the door-ways. At ten o'clock, the rich merchant was on his way to his counting-room. He turned down the same street up which he had come the preceding evening. A crowd had gathered round the open cellar-door of a ruined tenement. The merchant paused to inquire what was the matter.

"A woman, sir, has been found dead below there," said one of the spectators; "she starved to death, it is said, and they have sent for the coroner. Her daughter has just come back, after being out all night; I believe she was begging. That's her, moaning."

"Ah!" said the merchant, and a pang went through his heart like an ice-bolt, for he remembered having denied petitioner the night before. He pushed through the crowd, and descended the cellar-steps. A girl cowered over an emaciated corpse that lay on a heap of straw in one corner of the damp apartment. It was the same girl he had feared it would prove. The merchant was horror-struck.

"My poor child," he cried, laying his hand on her shoulder, "you must be cared for: God forgive me for denying you last night. Here, take this," and he put a bill into her hand.

The girl looked up and gazed vacantly at him; then she put back the proffered money.

"It will do no good now," she said; "mother is dead;" and she burst into hysteric tears.

The merchant, at that moment, would have given half his fortune to have recalled her to life.

The lesson, thus learned, he never forgot. The merchant personally saw that a decent burial was provided for the mother, and afterwards took her into his house, educated her for a high station in life, and, on her marriage, presented her with a proper dowry. He lived to hear her children lisp their gratitude.

TO SARAH.

Oh! veil that flashing eye of thine!—
I would be free,—
Let it upon another shine:
But not on me!

There was an hour—there was an hour
I could have borne its light,—
Could have defied thy woman power,
But not—to night!

There is a spell upon my soul,—
And rise within my heart
Vague thoughts, the will cannot control
Or make depart!

For I should never think of thee:
'Twere worse than vain,—
Unless the hand and heart once free
Were so again!

Time in his onward course
May break the spell,—
May even hand from heart divorce:
Till then—farewell!

Memory will gild the past,
Though darkness lowers:
The present will not always last—
Hope may be ours!

Spring-time may come again
With fragrant flowers,—
Beneath Love's bright and glowing reign,
To deck her bowers.

* * * * *

But turn that lustrous eye of thine
Away from me:—
Let it upon another shine,
Till both are free!

I WILL FORGET--TO MISS M.

I will forget—though every flower,
That spring might claim, or summer own,
Fill with rememberances of thee,
And glad the heart that else were lone.

I will forget—though those sweet birds,
The chosen minstrels of the air,
Warble thy name in softest words,
'Mid songs of love so cherished there.

I will forget—though dreams of thee
Fill every hour, of blissful sleep,
With thine own image dear to me,
And still the struggling heart would keep.

I will forget—but not to bow,
In worship at another shrine,
No, Lady, no—as once, 'tis now,
My heart and muse be ever thine.

I will forget thee, cruel one,
Though days and nights of pain for me,
Fill this sad heart, already lone,
With blighted joys I found in thee.

I will forget—but, oh! not now,
Too fresh that smile, my all of bliss.
Thy gentle word and soothing tone,
So dear to life and happiness.

Then, fare thee well—we part, dear one,
To meet perchance in time no more,
While many a song I'll sing for thee,
Till hushed by death, my life is o'er.

ALICE FINLAY;

OR,

THE BREACH OF PROMISE.

BY JOSIAH D. BANGS.

"Hath the maid to whom thou wast kneeling,
Tyr'd with thy hottest feeling?
Cease to love her,—cease to mind her,—
Find one juster, truer, kinder."

It was a bright March morning in the year 18—; the weather, which, for several previous days had been tempestuous and stormy, piling the fine light snow into vast, fantastic drifts, had cleared during the preceding evening—the storm closing, as it often does in the latitude of the place we speak of, at this season of the year, with a slight rain. Hill and dale, plain and river, were clothed with a vest of the purest and most dazzling white; the glassy ice-crust reflecting the morning sunbeams with almost painful brightness, while from every twig, or tree, or bush, depended a tiny icicle, pure and clear as virgin crystal. Splendid work the sunlight made among these frozen rain-jewels. The rainbow is beautiful, but the rainbow is painted on the dull, dark cloud;—here were all the exquisite tints of the prismatic spectrum, with the superadded glory of a gem-like refulgence.

Nothing can compare with the splendor of a northern landscape, at such a season. The very air itself, calm, but keen and bracing, seems full of minute, atomic particles of sparkling frost—while the wide fields, the broad lake, and the old eternal hills, appear as though spread with gleaming silver.

There is melody in the leafy bough of summer, and the bending burden of the autumnal branch looks rich and glorious; but winter clothes the waving tree with a fruit and foliage yet more glorious, and then the tinkling treble of those diamond bells, when the breeze awakes, and pours its deep full bass along the forest aisles, makes a music that a southern ear in vain might list for 'mid the tropic blossoms.

Well, it was a bright March morning, pretty much such an one as the reader may fancy it to have been, from the description above,—if, indeed, the above description give him or her any idea of it at all. It was on a bright March morning in the year 18—, aforesaid, that two individuals, an elderly gentleman and his nephew, a student at law, were seated in a small room in a small frame building, situate and lying in the midst of a bustling village on the Vermont side of Lake Champlain. A bright wood fire was blazing on the hearth, and although it was yet comparatively early, for the sun was then just rising over a high bluff, probably a spur of the Green Mountains in the eastern horizon, still, from the comfortable temperature of that small room, it was obvious that the occupants, or, at least, some one, had been busily engaged in driving cold weather out of doors, for two or three hours at least.

The furniture of the room was simple in the extreme, consisting but of two office tables, plain birch, a few common and two arm chairs and a desk. Over the fire-place ticked a Yankee clock—by far the most gaudy article present—on each side of which several zig-zags of red tape served to confine, and at the same time parade for inspection, sundry papers, neatly folded and labelled, besides a number of remarkable billet-doux looking things, whose greatest characteristic seemed their diminutive littleness, betokening either a parsimonious in foolscap, or an extremely condensed style. On one side of the chimney a door seemed to open into another apartment, while in the opposite recess a faded chintz curtain, partially withdrawn, revealed what appeared to be the closely stowed shelves of a small library. The walls were hung with a half dozen smoke-stained maps, several plans of farms and mill-sites, with here and there a lithograph of an eastern township, or western city, that never existed, nor ever will. Among the rest, conspicuously posted, with an ostentatious display of brass nails, and green quality, was a sheet, which purported to be the rules and regulations of the —— Bar.

The place we have been describing was, in fact, a country lawyer's office, and its owner, and principal occupant, might be recognized in that bald, quiet-looking personage, who, with his gold-bowed spectacles shoved high up on his ample brow, arms folded, and the ankle of one leg deliberately placed on the knee of its fellow, was seated immediately in front of the fire, seemingly intent on studying the mystic emblems which, ever and anon, showed themselves in the flickerings of that ruddy blaze. Were an "outside passenger" to cast his eyes over the street door of this sanctum, just under the eaves, he might, with care, decipher, on an antiquated "shingle," HIRAM JONES, ATTORNEY AT LAW.

Mr. Jones, or, as he was more commonly designated, 'Squire Jones, though a Lawyer, was no petti-fogger. Unlike most adventurers, whose noses somehow inveterately turn westward, he had migrated from the interior of New York, with nothing but his profession to depend upon for his daily bread, and settled himself, some forty years before our story commences, a stranger and penniless, in the little village of B——, on the borders of Lake Champlain. That his shrewd, practical mind had not miscalculated the advantages of the location, may be inferred from the fact, that, at the time we are writing of, he was accounted the most wealthy man in western Vermont;—and that this property was fairly, honestly acquired, needs no better proof, than the universal voice of the community among whom he had grown grey, who, in speaking of him often gave him the sobriquet of the Honest Lawyer. Indeed, as the 'Squire advanced in years, whether this flattering unction, which, doubtless, occasionally came to his ears, or a deeper and nobler feeling actuated him, certain it was, that his seeming love of strict and impartial justice, had amounted to a hobby which he was prone to ride on all occasions, in season and out of season. He never would commence a suit unless perfectly satisfied that the cause was a just one, and never witness on the stand underwent a closer cross-examination, than did his clients in that old office when they came to state their grievances. But, when once convinced that the party who craved his services were in the right, he knew neither fear nor sued for supposing that, if required, he would as readily join issue in an action against his nearest friend, as fill a process against a stranger. But, for all these, the lawyer was a man of humor; and a practical joke—which, truth to say, he sometimes carried full as far as such strict notions of justice would warrant—was his delight. If his office furniture did not correspond with his means, it was not on account of any parsimonious spirit, for 'Squire Jones was a generous man, but his eye had long been accustomed to these simple articles, and now, in his declining years, he chose to be reminded by their silent language, of the busier scenes of a long past time.

Such was Hiram Jones, Esq. With all his foibles, this world sees few like him. May the shadow of such never be less.

"And so you want two hundred dollars?" said 'Squire Jones, addressing himself to his youthful companion.

The young gentleman, who had arisen from the fire, and was at that moment standing at the window, busily engaged in tracing certain characters on the frosty panes, turned suddenly at this abrupt resumption of a conversation which, for the last fifteen minutes, had totally ceased, and, approaching his relative, replied—

"Yes, uncle, I think I shall need that sum. I have good reasons for wishing an absence of a few months; it is now more than five years since I have seen my sister—my health is not firm, and I feel that some relaxation, and a ramble once more among the scenes of my childhood, would do much to re-establish it."

"That seems but reasonable, Robert—that seems but reasonable; but do you know how much I have already advanced you, over and above what I am authorized to, by the instrument that constituted me your guardian, and executor of the will of the late Col. Hardynge, your father?"

And 'Squire Jones, removing the spectacles from his forehead, wiped them carefully, and placing them well down on his nose—for their focal distance was somewhat ill-adapted to his failing eye-sight—he drew from his side pocket a memorandum book, and, turning a leaf or two, began to make a half audible calculation; during which young Hardynge, after taking a turn of the room, resumed his station at the window.

"I make it seven hundred and fifteen dollars," at length resumed the lawyer; "rather a large sum for a person of your age to have expended, beside a reasonable—a very liberal allowance from the estate."

"That of course includes the five hundred dollars for the library you purchased for me of the heirs of Judge Sharpe," replied Robert, slipping a card from his vest, on which it seems he himself had been making an estimate, and placing it in the hand of his uncle, as he drew a chair to his side—

"Look there, uncle Jones," said he, "you have not included the interest; advance me now the balance of a thousand, and—"

"How long do you purpose to be absent?"

"I cannot say precisely;—perhaps six months."

"But Alice—what of her?—have you made arrangements to postpone the fulfilment of your engagements with Alice Finlay? I thought you were to be married in May?" And Mr. Jones cast a quick, searching glance on the features of his ward. "I can allow no trifling there, Robert."

Robert Hardynge was silent for a few moments, during which his uncle once or twice essayed to put the question again, but the apparent uneasiness of his nephew deterred him. At length Robert replied to the interrogatory.

"I cannot marry Miss Finlay!—at least not at present. The fact is—nay, uncle, hear me—I have good cause for the course I am pursuing. The truth is, that since our engagement became public, Alice has grown so altered—so—so—if I may say, capricious and unfeeling, that, with my present impressions, though I were doomed, in consequence, to a single life through all time, I would never marry her!"

'Squire Jones made no response, but a slight interjectional whistle, scarcely louder than a whisper, answered all the purposes.

Robert continued—"I have loved Alice—I love her still—but I cannot brook the treatment to which she subjects me; and I have arrived at the conclusion, that the sooner I return South, the more agreeable it will be to both parties."

"Have you made Miss Finlay acquainted with your determination?" asked 'Squire Jones.

"I called twice last week for the very purpose," replied Robert, "but could not see Alice. Once she was indisposed—and the last time, she sent a message that she was engaged; but ere an hour, I saw her driving out in young Spencer's traineau. Her conduct seems to indicate a total lack of principle, or, at least, a heartlessness that ill accords with all my anticipations. One thing I do know—if she thinks, by her present course, to put her future husband in training, she may realize a disappointment."

"Strange language this, in relation to one's ladye-love!" thought 'Squire Jones; but he kept his opinion —and at that instant the entrance of a gentleman on business, put an end to the conversation for the morning.

Robert Hardynge did depart, however, just one week from that day, and as he darted past the dwelling of Mr. Finlay, en route for the South, he received a cold, parting nod from Alice, who was standing at the closed window, and returned it with a bow, full as stiff and formal. But his eye caught at that moment, another sight that gave him a heart-ache for many a weary mile. Directly in his path, and so near that he might have touched it from the sleigh as he glided by, lay a delicate myrtle, with its earthen vase shattered on the flinty ground, apparently cast there by some ruthless hand, and left to perish on the frozen snow! That myrtle had been his own! He had brought it, a tiny slip, some five years before, from the garden of his youthful home, and, in a moment of confiding love, twelve months by-gone, had presented it to Alice Finlay. And now!——He drew the vizor of his cap still closer over his brow.

It was a decided quarrel!

Robert Hardynge was the son of an opulent rice planter, near Charleston, S. C. Left an orphan at the age of fifteen, what time he was not at Cambridge, had been spent at the residence of his uncle and guardian, Hiram Jones, Esq, on the shores of one of the sweetest inland seas in the world. A casual glance at his pale, thin features and thoughtful brow, would have given the impression that young Hardynge had seen some twenty-five summers, when in fact, at the period of our narrative, he was not quite twenty-one. Born and nurtured to mature boyhood, in the warmer South, the climate, doubtless, had exerted some influence on his physical developments—while, through excellent mental training from infancy, a naturally active mind had been stimulated to a corresponding advancement, so that standing, as he yet did, on the sunny side of the line of legal manhood, the person and attainments of Robert Hardynge might well warrant one to credit old Father Time with another lustrum on his account.

His mother had been a Northern lady of beauty and accomplishments, whom Col. Hardyinge had wedded during one of his annual visits to Saratoga, but who died when Robert was three years, and his sister Irene but three hours old. Col. Hardynge at his demise, bequeathed his property to his brother, Dr. H., a respectable divine of Charleston, and to Hiram Jones, Esq., brother of his deceased wife, to be held in trust for the two children, until they should severally become of age, when they would enter on possession in their own right. Irene preferred to remain with her uncle in Charleston, while Robert, from some cause, chose to spend his minority among the hills and dells of New England. He had been enabled to enter himself immediately at Cambridge, a year in advance—and by application, more severe indeed than his health would seem to permit, might now confidently look for an admission to the Bar in six months, at farthest. With few glaring faults, he might be called a young gentleman of more than ordinary promise. There were but one or two traits in his character, that gave his friends permanent uneasiness. A seeming constitutional excitability, joined with an occasional wavering of purpose, or indecision threatened somewhat to impair his prospects of the future. His temperament was highly nervous, and a word, an action, or even a look, that most people would have disregarded, often gave him exquisite pain. Hence it was no ways singular that the conduct of Alice should have proved a source of extreme annoyance, and, under the circumstances, his visit to the scenes of his early youth, was in perfect keeping with the general aspect of his character.

Alice Finlay was a beauty, and she was well aware of it. The village belle ascertains the fact of her pre-eminence, full as soon as people generally suppose she should. Gay, lively, and—what woman is not?—fond of admiration, it ought not to appear surprising that a spice of coquetry, by the merest accident in the world, should mingle with her composition. And yet Alice was not a heartless girl. Her first, purest, and best affections had been given, in all sincerity, to young Hardynge, and if, since the hour of her whispered vow, circumstances had intervened, tending apparently to efface the freshness of her heart's fond hopes—if a passing cloud had dimmed the lustre of her love, there was that yet in her bosom which warned her, but too forcibly for her peace, that, in her estrangement from the object of her early affections, she could look with favor on no one else.

It is, perhaps, needless in this narration, to enter minutely, a la romance, into all the incidents of courtship and betrothal, with their usual attendants of sighs and glances—and vows and smiles—and, Cupid knows what,—which accompanied this inauspicious attachment. They belong to the thousand and one recitals of a like nature, and might be very properly stereotyped, and sold to order, to be filled, Valentine-fashion, with the names of the parties.—The reader is requested to suppose that these events happened along, nearly as they did in his or her own particular case—or, at least, as they wish such affair may chance to their sweet selves—sometimes, the stars proving lucky.

Alice Finlay and Robert Hardynge had been betrothed for a twelvemonth;—he only waiting for the period of his majority, to bestow his name upon his affianced love;—and, although he had, on several occasions, witnessed that in the conduct of Alice, which, to his sensitive feelings, seemed the result of almost unpardonable levity, if not indeed springing from a worse motive; yet never, until this last disagreement, had he indulged the thought of breaking his plight, and quitting her entirely.

It would, perhaps, be a curious, though, in many instances, not a very amusing study, to trace the progress of these "love quarrels," as they generally occur. To notice how a slight distaste will, in time, change to a confirmed dislike, and that, in turn, if not adjusted and removed, to disgust and hate!—yes, hate—for the moment—bitter hate!

> "Alas! how slight a cause may move > Dissention between hearts that love."

Somebody said that, and for once somebody said truly. Mark the remainder, or a part of it, as we quote from memory, and have forgot the rest:

> "A trifle light as air—a look—
> A word unkind or wrongly taken,—
> Oh, love that tempests never shook:
> A breath—a touch like this hath shaken!"

What the "trifle" was that caused the first ripple in this stream of true love, the progress of which we are now recording, is not preserved among the archives of either the Hardynge or Finlay families—neither is it embalmed in the memories of any of the numerous friends of the parties. The writer has made particular enquiries on this point, but was only answered, that every thing went "merry as a marriage bell," until about two months previous to the departure of Robert for the South. If antecedent to that time, there were any misgivings or heart-burnings, they were so well concealed, or adjusted so immediately, that they passed unnoticed.

However the case might stand, as it regards the first provocation, or who was foremost in the sin, matters but little now. The probability is that both were culpable;—Robert, for noticing little circumstances, innocent in themselves, but under the magnifying influence of a naturally excitable temperament, swelling to apparent causes of complaint and reprehension; Alice, for thoughtlessly persevering in practices, which, she knew, gave pain to her lover—sometimes, indeed, merely from the joyous exuberance of her spirits, but latterly more often from a desire to tease and torment. The consequences might be readily foreseen. Hardynge, finding no heed taken of admonition or remonstrance, proceeded to open invective; and Alice, who had, at first, cheerfully acceded to his requests, when made in the accents of affection, and only forfeited the trusting promise through inadvertence or girlish levity, finally broke in open rebellion to his wishes, as the exactions became more severe, and his language more imperious, until at length, one evening, after a rather stormy session, the parties separated—Hardynge bestowing upon his prospective bride the title of a capricious coquette, and Alice retorting, through her tears, the epithet of heartless tyrant!

Verily—"The course of true love never did run smooth." Yet how many there are who place the thorns in their own couch! That night Robert Hardynge pressed a sleepless pillow—Alice Finlay a tearful one. They had often before disagreed—had caused each other much of sadness—much of sorrow—yet never, until that evening, had they parted in anger. The feud had ever been amicably adjusted ere the hour of separation; and however much each might lament their own share in the troubles of the past, there was still the sweet satisfaction that their errors were, for the time, reciprocally forgiven if not forgotten. But now each, as the morning light dawned on their watchful vigils, in reviewing, for the hundredth time, the events of the preceding evening, felt naught but sorrow, remorse and shame.

The cause, a foolish accident, which frankness on the one part, and confidence on the other, would have adjusted without calling in play a single unpleasant emotion, had dwindled into insignificance, contrasted with the mass of crimination and recrimination which it had generated; and although either, had the opportunity offered, would have joyfully pressed, that morning, the extended hand of the other, still pride, coldly rebuking this healthful action of the heart, forbade to each the propriety of making the first advance.

Alice expected her recreant lover, all the morning, with the proffered apology, but the morning wore away; yet he came not, and then she looked for him during the long evening, but evening came and went, and the next day, and the next, until a full week had elapsed, and yet Robert Hardynge, from the time of that eventful parting, had neither come himself, or wrote or sent billet or message, to signify that he cared or felt aught for that being with whose destiny his own was to be so soon united, and from whom he had separated so harshly and unlover-like. Bitterly did Alice Finlay lament the error into which her feelings had betrayed her, and once was she on the point of inditing a penitential note to her betrothed, acknowledging her fault and craving forgiveness,—but "would it not be a breach of maidenly delicacy and decorum?—who ever heard of a lady making the first proposal in any affair where a gentleman was concerned!—and besides, might he not treat it: the outpouring of her anguished and repentant heart, with utter scorn and contempt!" "No—she would die first!" "Or, if Robert Hardynge intended, by his present conduct, to indicate to his future wife the path she must pursue in coming years, mayhap he might look elsewhere for a companion."

Thus reasoned Alice, or at least thus she essayed to administer something like balm to her wounded feelings, comforting at times her perturbed spirit, if comfort it could be called, with the reflection that Robert might possibly be as unhappy as herself. But her bright eye dimmed, and her cheek faded daily.

"What keeps Mr. Hardynge so close at home lately?" said Mrs. Finlay, one morning at breakfast; "I do not remember seeing him for a fortnight. Alice dear, there has nothing unpleasant happened, that he should have reason for this unusual absence?"

Alice did not answer—her heart was too full of that very subject.

"Oh, I do wish he would come oftener," said little Rose Finlay, "for sis goes moping about all day long—and then she cries so every night! Mamma, I don't love to sleep with folks when they cry, it makes me feel like crying too—and then the pillow gets all wet and frozen, and"——

"Hush, Rose, hush!" said the prudent mother; and then turning to Alice—"tell me, love, has any misunderstanding arisen between you and Robert, that he should cease his visits?—until quite recently, he has been in the habit of calling almost every evening."

"Robert is a hard student," observed Mr. Finlay, "and no doubt he is"——

"A hard-hearted, cruel man!" sobbed Alice, turning from the table in tears, "or he would never treat me thus."

"Hard-hearted, cruel!" ejaculated Mrs. Finlay, as she gazed in astonishment on the weeping girl—"Rose, dear, you may put on your hat and cloak—it is school time."

After Rose had left the apartment, Mrs. Finlay, with that tact which a mother alone knows how to exercise, drew from her sorrowing daughter the whole history of the causes of her unhappiness, which until that moment she had kept concealed in the recesses of her own bosom; most of the petty differences, up to the last sad parting, were unveiled.

It appeared that on the evening in question, at the close of a small social party, at a friend's house, Hardynge had, as usual, given his arm to Alice, and had accompanied her a short distance homeward, when he suddenly recollected a message which he was commissioned to deliver, that evening, to the lady of the mansion. Fearful that the family might retire ere he would have time to return, should he postpone the duty until he had seen Miss Finlay to her residence, and unwilling to subject Alice to the fatigue of retracing her steps with him, he frankly stated the dilemma, and as a favor requested her to dispense with his services for a few moments, promising to overtake her long ere she reached home. Alice freely acceded to the proposition—the moon was full and clear, and in that quiet country village, the lone maiden was as secure from molestation or insult, in the wide street, as in her father's dwelling. She had progressed, however, but a few yards, ere she was met by one of her former suitors, in the person of Harry Spencer, and Harry, after remarking on the beauty of the night, and laughingly, on the singularity of her appearance at that late hour, alone and unattended, offered his services to escort her home; and then, without waiting for an answer or explanation, quietly drew her arm within his own. The movement was so sudden and unexpected, that Alice had no room for expostulation; besides, she had often walked with Spencer before, and, under other circumstances, there would appear nothing in the action itself to reprehend;—he was a friend, and a valued one, though not a preferred lover. More than all these, she felt somewhat unwilling to inform him of the true state of the case; something whispered her that Hardynge had presumed full far enough on her good nature, in thus preferring the wishes of another, to the comfort and security of the lady of his heart.

True to his word, Hardynge did overtake them, while yet some distance from Mr. Finlay's dwelling, and the first impulse that Alice felt, was to quit the arm of Spencer for that of Robert.

"And why did you not do so, Alice?" asked Mrs. Finlay.

"Oh, mother, that look, as he passed!—I do verily believe that he would have struck me if I had attempted it!" said Alice—"merely remarking that he should probably see me at my father's, and wishing Spencer a pleasant walk, he hurried on and was soon out of sight."

"Well, Alice, what then?" asked Mrs. Finlay, calmly forbearing comment.

"We—he was in the parlor when I came home, and we said many foolish things—we quarrelled sadly—shamefully—he called me a capricious coquette! and I told him he was—oh, mamma!—a heartless tyrant!" and the sorrowing maiden sank into a chair, sobbing hysterically.

Alice Finlay was in reality quite ill, when, that very day, Robert called for the first time, to inform her of his intention of returning South; and at the time her parents did not deem it necessary to inform her of the fact of his visit. In truth, both Mr. and Mrs. Finlay, although they saw many things to condemn in the conduct of their daughter, considered his treatment of Alice as unwarranted and harsh, and the message that "Miss Finlay was engaged," when, in fact, she was only waiting the appearance of Harry Spencer, who, at the instigation of one of her particular friends, had proffered her an airing that day,—was given by the mother, to Robert, at the time of his second attempt, with an air of decision that amounted to almost rudeness.

Mr. Finlay had never approved the match, considering the parties as yet, too young and inexperienced. But yielding to the potent arguments of his better half, who considered the wealth and high literary attainments of her intended son-in-law, to be more than a counterpoise to the natural irritability of his disposition, he had yielded a reluctant consent to an agreement, which he would now have gladly seen cancelled, did he not have painful proof, that the feelings of Alice were too deeply interested for her peace—and when, a few days after, he received a note from Hardynge, simply informing him of the intended visit to Charleston, with the probability of an absence of perhaps a year, and lamenting that circumstances precluded the possibility, on the part of the writer, of fulfilling the engagement existing between him and Alice, the intelligence sank into his heart with a mingled sensation of satisfaction and sorrow.

But to Alice the news was sorrowful—all sorrowful. During the first paroxysm of her grief, the affront to her pride, seemed more bitter, than the ruined hope or blighted love. Her approaching marriage was a public affair—her preparations were nearly complete—her bridal dresses were ready—the bride maids selected—the guests decided upon, and all the paraphernalia of the coming nuptials hastening rapidly to perfection. And now!—now! what would she do?—what could she do?

It was under the influence of these feelings, and with a determination to do something, that, on the morning of Robert's departure, she tossed the unoffending myrtle into the street, and perhaps some other trifles, from the same donor, would have shared a like fate, had she not, at that instant, caught the sound of his approaching bells. Hastily taking her station at the parlor window, she watched him as he drove past, and, with an emotion allied to gratification, saw him quail as he noticed the ruin of that offering of early affection. But, with the dying chime of those retreating bells, died also in her breast that selfish triumph, and, for the first time on earth, Alice Finlay felt the real canker at her heart. Hitherto, hope had kept the vampire from its prey—but now, even hope seemed to have forsaken its trust—her brain reeled—a death-like pallor settled on her cheek, and she sank fainting on the floor.

Alas! poor Alice!

When she awoke to consciousness, she was in bed, surrounded by her friends, with little Rose chafing her hands, and weeping bitterly.

"Oh! Alice—dear Alice—don't die! Sweet sister, 'tis your own Rose."

"The myrtle!" murmured Alice—"where is my myrtle?"

"Your myrtle is safe, Alice, love," said Mrs. Finlay, tenderly.

"Bring it me," whispered the sufferer. "Will no one bring me my myrtle?"

It was brought to her bedside, just as it came from the street, where she had cast it, with its long roots dry and hard, and its delicate leaves stiffened with the exposure. Alice gazed at it an instant, and then, in a mournful voice—

"Rose," she said, "my beautiful myrtle is ruined!" and taking it in her hands, she passed her trembling fingers over its perished loveliness. Suddenly her countenance lighted up, and a gleam of seeming joy, spread over her sad but beautiful features. She had detected one little off-set that yet exhibited signs of vitality. Skilfully detaching the tender shoot from its parent stem, she rested not until she saw it placed in a sister vase to the broken one, and which she had intended to fill with a slip of that same myrtle, as a present to little Rose on her wedding-day.

When all was arranged, with her soft blue eyes fixed upon the resuscitated remnant of her "beautiful myrtle," Alice Finlay gradually sank into a deep and quiet sleep.

* * * * *

A year had transpired since the date of these events. Spring had come with its velvet verdure, sweet violets, and gentle winds. Summer, with its more mature growth of leaf and flower,—yellow Autumn, with her grateful fruits and golden grain,—and now again stern Winter's gleaming cloak was thrown o'er all the slumbering earth—but Alice Finlay had not yet passed from the threshold of her maidenhood. Her friends could but notice in her faded cheek, and the absence of the merry laugh, that a secret grief was wasting the sources of her life, and yet complaint or murmur never passed her lips. The name of Robert Hardynge, though seldom mentioned in the family, had ceased to awaken any visible emotion in her bosom, and at times her fond father indulged the hope, almost against hope, that her faithless lover was forgotten. Robert had not written to her since his abrupt departure, and all the intelligence Alice or her friends gathered of him, came, casually, through other channels. They asked no questions, but endeavored to manifest a total indifference to his prospects or pursuits.

In his letters to his uncle, so far as known, young Hardynge had carefully avoided all mention of his former attachment. A common-place enquiry after the health of "Miss Finlay," among others, was all that he vouchsafed. The contents of these letters, though not seen by Alice, were, nevertheless, familiar to her. Rose, her sweet sister Rose, was an especial favorite of 'Squire Jones, and often passed an afternoon with the kind-hearted lawyer, in the little back room of his now lonely office. For Hiram Jones, Esq., when he hesitated about advancing the money for Robert's journey, never thought of the dollars—it was the absence of his ward, who had become unto him even as a son. So when a letter came from his nephew, if Rose were present, sometimes 'Squire Jones, after glancing over it, found his spectacles so dim, that, as a matter of necessity, Rose must read it for him, while the lawyer paced to and fro in his ancient sanctum. At the close, slyly tapping her dimpled cheek with his long fore-finger, the sage admonition was given, that she "had better not tell Miss Alice aught of the contents of that epistle"—which Rose interpreted, as it was probably meant: full liberty to tell as much as she chose.

There was occasionally, however, a letter from Robert, which Rose, if she were present, was not permitted to see—the spectacles were remarkably clear that day, and the 'Squire, after reading, gravely putting it away in his desk. And these letters, all unknown as their contents were, served to keep alive an almost expiring ray of hope, in one trembling bosom. There might be in that, to her, secret correspondence, allusions and enquiries, not so cold and formal as the general tone of the letters seemed to indicate. Oh, the fond foolish confidence of a woman's love! Yes, trusty maiden, and there might have been in that hidden language words which would have racked thy gentle feelings to intensest agony.

It was in the early spring, immediately after the receipt of one of these mysterious epistles, that an unusual activity was imparted to a rather neglected portion of the village by the arrival of a number of mechanics—masons, carpenters, &c.; who, under the direction of Hiram Jones, Esq., proceeded with all despatch, to rejuvenate one of the time-honored dwellings of the place, which had been lately purchased by 'Squire Jones, acting as agent for his former ward, Robert Hardynge.

Curiosity was on the tip-toe, to ascertain what use the young Southerner was to make of the mansion, which soon assumed the appearance of a genteel country residence. "Was he coming back to marry Alice, after all? Or would he, the heartless trifler, bring some fair one from the sunny South, to share his heart and home?" But curiosity was baffled—the prudent lawyer kept his own counsel,—if, indeed, he knew, for what purpose his nephew ordered the expenditure. The house was completed and furnished in a style of gentility and affluence, that few dwellings could boast of, so far removed from any considerable mart of wealth and fashion. The grounds, meanwhile, had undergone the renovating process, and, in a space of time, incredible to those unacquainted with Yankee enterprize and perseverance, a beautiful estate had arisen, as if by magic, upon the shores of the placid lake.

But accident, at length, revealed what would have been soon otherwise known in the course of events.

Rose Finlay chancing, one summer day, in the office of 'Squire Jones, when the lawyer had for some cause stepped ont a moment, espied an open letter upon the table, with the post-mark of Charleston upon it, and presuming on the usual indulgence of the 'Squire, she was soon deeply engaged in its perusal. It was not in Robert's handwriting, yet it spoke of him, as being in delicate health, and inclined, at times, to be unsocial and melancholy. But the writer trusted 'that a Northern home and Northern friends, would do much to invigorate the one and remove the other." It concluded with the hope expressed, that the "Estate was in readiness for their reception, as the marriage spoken of in my last, took place last Thursday, and Robert starts with the bride for B——, in two weeks, at farthest. Yours, truly,

"W. W. Hardynge."

"The villain!" exclaimed Rose, "Oh, the villain!—if I was only a man!"—as, with a flushed cheek and flashing eye, she crushed the letter in her glowing hand.

"Who—who is this villain, Miss?" said 'Squire Jones, entering at that moment. "Tut! tut! you little vixen!—so you have been looking at forbidden sights, and got your eyes scorched? But, Rose, come back!—here, Rose!—you madcap!—I say—Rose!"

But Rose was bounding homeward, and the last that 'Squire Jones heard of her, as she turned the corner, was—

"Poor Alice! Married last Thursday!—the villain!"

Alas! poor Alice!

And there was reason to say, Alas! poor Alice!—Hope had grown strong in her bosom within a few past months; for, as she saw, day after day, from her own window, the improvements making at the "white cottage,"—for thus had the future residence of Robert Hardynge been named—it had fell upon her heart like a soothing balm, the sweet trust that all might yet be well. She had never dreamed that another was to fill her place in that mansion. Alas! poor Alice! Well might Rose say, "the villain!"

At an early hour the next morning, the office of Hiram Jones, Esq., was honored with the presence of one who had lately been almost a stranger to its ancient walls and pictures, in the person of the father of Alice Finlay. Mr. Finlay, although he had permitted Rose to run forth and back, as she was wont to do, before the trouble occurred between Robert Hardynge and his daughter, could not himself feel to treat even the relative of him who had so deeply injured his child with the friendly familiarity which had formerly marked their intercourse. The greeting, on his part, was coldly polite, and contrasted strongly with the warm-hearted salutation of the "honest lawyer."

"Happy to see you, Mr. Finlay," said 'Squire Jones, proffering an open hand. "Take a seat by the cool window; melting morning, sir."

And kindly inquiring after the welfare of the members of Mr. Finlay's family, the lawyer proceeded to descant on the usual topics of the day. He was soon, however, interrupted.

"I have called this morning," said Mr. Finlay, "for the purpose of making an enquiry. Is Robert Hardynge—married?"

"What could induce you, my dear sir, to ask that question?" blandly responded 'Squire Jones, evading a direct answer.

Mr. Finlay felt the delicacy of his position. He was in possession of information, which, as a gentleman, he had no right to make use of; but, as he had no motive for concealing its source, he frankly resumed:

"I learned last evening, for the first time, that Rose, in her childish visits to your office, has been permitted, occasionally, to peruse letters from Mr. Hardynge, and that, thoughtlessly presuming on the privilege, she, in your absence, yesterday, opened one from another source, containing the information on which my inquiry was based. It stated, as I understand, that Robert is married, and is probably, by this time, on his journey, with his bride, to take possession of his new residence."

'Squire Jones mused for a few moments. At length,

"I do not know that Robert is married, or, at least, I do not feel myself at liberty to give any one a direct answer on this point," he replied. "The information that Rose has communicated, I will, however, place at your disposal." And he laid the letter of Dr. Hardynge before Mr. Finlay. "I am going beyond what should have been my duty," said he; "still, since Rose has, unfortunately, betrayed a part, under the circumstances, perhaps it is best that you should know the whole."

Mr. Finlay carelessly glanced over the unfolded sheet, until he came to the concluding sentence—forcibly placing his finger upon it,

"That, that," said he, "is enough!—that is sufficient. 'Tis even as Rose said." After a pause, he resumed, with some feeling,

"I, myself, 'Squire Jones, should care little about the wrong, were it not for the lasting injury he has inflicted upon my poor girl. Alice will never be herself again!" and the father groaned bitterly.

"You should not, my dear Mr. Finlay, give yourself unnecessary grief concerning trouble in perspective," said the lawyer; "perhaps all will be for the best yet."

"We shall bring an action for breach of promise," said Mr. Finlay, firmly. "I despise, as much as any man can, the idea of paying for broken vows in dollars and cents. I do not want his money—Alice does not want it. And if, instead of heaping insult upon injury, by locating himself permanently under our very eyes, he had chosen some other home, Heaven knows he might have lived and died unmolested by me and mine."

"If Robert has forfeited his plighted word to Alice, and married another," said 'Squire Jones, "his conduct cannot be defended by any one—least of all, shall he find countenance in me."

Mr. Finlay fixed his eyes intently on the lawyer's face for a moment, as if to read what was passing beneath, and then earnestly enquired—

"'Squire Jones, will you undertake our case?"

"I would aid you as freely in obtaining justice of Robert Hardynge," replied the lawyer, "as freely and as willingly as though he were no relative of mine. Yet, let me say, that these actions for breach of promise are unpleasant affairs, even to those who have been deeply wronged. In all my practice, I have been engaged in but two, and, if I felt for the injured party at the commencement of the suit, my feelings were doubly outraged by the obloquy and insult that were heaped upon the shrinking plaintiff, during the progress of the trial."

"I see," interrupted Mr. Finlay, "you are fearful that"—

"Please to hear me through," said Mr. Jones. "I can hardly think that Robert Hardynge has been so base as present appearances lead you to conclude. Still, if it can be proved that he is about to place in that dwelling," and the lawyer cast a quick glance at the "white cottage," "any other lady, as his wife, save Alice Finlay, I will aid you, as counsel, in any action of damages you may choose to bring. I would do it, if he were my own son."

"Will it be necessary for Alice to appear in court?" asked Mr. Finlay.

"Alice is of legal age—she will, through her attorney, prosecute in person," answered 'Squire Jones. "It will be important," he continued, "in case we find it necessary to commence the suit, to obtain a copy of the marriage certificate, or a certified record of the ceremony, otherwise the defendant may, at the time of trial, enter the plea of willingness and ability still to fulfil the alleged breach of contract;" and a slight smile passed over the features of the lawyer, as though the allusion called up some pleasing reminiscence.

"You will enter the action at the October term?" said Mr. Finlay, in a tone half instruction, half enquiry.

"If the proofs can be forthcoming in season, of course," responded 'Squire Jones. "The damages"—

"Are ten thousand dollars," said Mr. Finlay, with emphasis. And after adjusting a few more preliminaries, and placing a small sum in the lawyer's hand as a retaining fee, the father of Alice Finlay took his leave.

* * * " *

It was at the close of a warm Saturday in August, some eighteen months from the commencement of the events in our story, that an open carriage, with two horses attached, was seen slowly descending the hill that shut out all prospect at the south-east from the village of B——. Its inmates, as they neared the town, were ascertained to be a gentleman and lady, with a travelling equipage, attended on horseback by two of Afric's sable daughters. As they passed along the principal street, the gentleman was recognized as Robert Hardynge, but pale, and apparently travel-worn and weary. His companion seemed a sweet young girl of sixteen or eighteen summers, of exquisite beauty, but whose cheek and brow betrayed an almost tropic nativity. Arriving opposite the "white cottage," the carriage turned to the left, up a green lane, and Robert was soon seen to usher that lovely bride to his future home.

It so happened, that on that very afternoon, by particular request, Hiram Jones, Esq., was conferring at the residence of Mr. Finlay, with one of the parties in the coming action. With the assistance of Mr. Finlay, he had drawn up a statement of the facts which would be necessary to guide him in the prosecution of the suit, and also another paper containing the heads of the testimony to which it would be indispensable for Alice to make oath, on the day of trial. After these arrangements had been completed, Alice was summoned, as the careful lawyer preferred to hear, from her own lips, the precise story she would be able to tell in the crowded court. But, as the worthy attorney took her attenuated hand in his, and gazed upon her thin white cheek, and sorrowing eye, the fount of his own feelings seemed almost to overflow; but hastily wiping his dimming glasses, he motioned her to a chair, and then proceeded to read to her, and explain, the facts and technicalities he had there recorded. Alice sat motionless as a statue pending the recital, her features presenting the same marble paleness, until mention was made of sundry presents "being given by the defendant, Robert Hardynge, aforesaid, unto her, the said Alice, more especially a myrtle, at or about the time the said contract was formed between the parties." At the mention of the "myrtle," a sudden flush overspread her features, while the moisture of her eye, and the slight tremor of her lip, bespoke keen and intense feeling. But it passed, and she was calm again.

"This is all correct, I presume, Miss Finlay?" asked 'Squire Jones, as he finished the reading.

"It is, sir," feebly articulated Alice.

"Well, then," resumed the lawyer, as he produced the other paper; "it is a disagreeable task, but a necessary one, and I have here noted the substance of what you will be called upon to testify to in court, and"—

"In court!—me to testify in court!" exclaimed Alice, with more animation than she had yet exhibited.

"Certainly, Miss Finlay; we can do nothing without your testimony."

"Then," said Alice, rising to her feet, while her countenance mantled with a gleam of satisfaction, "then Robert Hardynge goes as free as though Alice Finlay had never existed. He has wronged me—deeply, fearfully wronged me. But, oh! I have not been faultless—and here, in the humbleness of my sorrow, I do feel that were it not for my own levity and folly, I had this day been his"—

A quick convulsive gasp finished the sentence, and the hapless girl fell swooning in her father's arms.

The human heart is a sad prompter, and there are few who, in the contemplation of some expected and inevitable trouble, can truly say, as did one of old, "Surely, the bitterness of death is past." Twice had Alice Finlay nerved herself for an agonizing hour, and twice had weak nature failed her in the trial.

She had heard of Robert's homeward journey—she had heard and believed that some more favored one was filling her place in his affections—she had dwelt on the event of his arrival—the joyous looks—the greetings—the fond enquiries and warm wishes with which he and his doubtless lovely wife would be met, and, although the contemplation spread a darkness over all the little sunlight of her soul, yet had the termination been strong within her that he, at least, should never know the struggle in her bosom. She had even resolved to be among the first to welcome the stranger bride, and as she had ever strenuously opposed the suit with which her father threatened young Hardynge, it was with a feeling nearly allied to gratification that she learned how much it lay in her power to prevent it. But thrown off her guard by this information, she had almost betrayed the entire state of her feelings to 'Squire Jones, when, turning her eyes for an instant towards the street—in the very place where she had last seen him, a year and a half before, with his name almost upon her lips, she beheld Robert Hardynge, leisurely rolling past, and by his side that sweet being, who had, all innocently, doubtless, been the means of inflicting the most cruel wound in her tortured heart.

Alice was removed to her chamber, and the worthy lawyer, after tendering a few words of condolence to the distressed father, and renewing the assurance of every necessary legal assistance in his power, departed.

It was observed, however, that instead of proceeding directly to his office, Hiram Jones, Esq., turned up the green lane towards the "white cottage," and was soon seen to enter the dwelling of Robert Hardynge.

The next day the pew of 'Squire Jones was graced with an unusual company. Beside Robert and his lovely partner, sat a gentleman in a naval undress, whose appearance bore such a striking resemblance to the bride, that no one would be censured for supposing him to be her brother. It was ascertained that he had arrived by stage the previous evening, and had been set down at the "white cottage." What strengthened the impression of his being a near relation, was the fact that he handed the young wife to the carriage after service, while Robert was holding a short conference with 'Squire Jones. Alice Finlay was not at church, neither were any of the family—a very uncommon circumstance in the village of B—— of a pleasant Sabbath. At the evening lecture, however, both Alice and Rose were present.

A blessed old custom—those Sabbath evening lectures. During the day services, the holy shepherd, elevated in his tasselled and cushioned pulpit, above the heads of his worshipping flock, seems in many instances to feel the loftiness of his situation, and hence his admonitions and denunciations are addressed to "you, my hearers," and all his invocations are for the special benefit of the "dear congregation" under his eyes—the impression thus gains strength, that he himself would be thought of as one less liable to temptation and frailty than other poor, sinful mortals. But when descending from the throne of his greatness, he takes his station in front of the sacred desk of a Sabbath evening, mingling, as it were, himself with his erring people, and with the light of the pale and flickering lamps upon his brow, upraises his hands and heart in a humble supplication for pardon upon our trespasses, and pours forth a meek and trusting prayer for favor upon our necessities and wants, then indeed does his ministration appear evangelical and blessed.

In the former instance he may deliver a powerful and edifying discourse, to be admired and commented upon as the production of a gifted man. In the latter we hear his words, not as the whirlwind nor the fire, but as the "still small voice" rising in our midst, in whose tones, overlooking their source, we recognize the pleadings and promises of our God.—Robert Hardynge was there that evening, as also was 'Squire Jones—the rest of the occupants of the pew were absent.

As the congregation were dispersing, at the close of the exercises—by choice or otherwise—Robert found himself by the side of Alice, as, in company with Rose, she was pursuing her pathway home.—At the same instant appeared 'Squire Jones by the side of Rose, and lifting her arm to his, he said, gaily:

"Come, Rose, Alice is provided for—permit me to be your guardian for the evening," and the antiquated lawyer stepped briskly forward with Rose, leaving Alice alone with her former lover. For some distance they progressed side by side in silence. Each seemed wrapt in deep and absorbing thought. One by one the congregation had separated to their respective homes, until they alone seemed to occupy that long and shadowy street. The light silk calash of Alice drooping over her face, prevented all scrutiny of her features, and also debarred its wearer from observing the countenance, or even form, of her companion. She had not even looked up when he joined her—she dared not trust herself, yet she knew—full well she knew, who it was, that thus all so noiselessly, kept even pace with her own faltering footsteps. Her feelings at this moment were intense. The endearments of other years—the fond words he had breathed so warmly into her willing ears—the vows of love—unchanging love—the soft caress—the first sweet, fervent kiss—aye, and the last one, two—that one she cherished most, when last her lips met his in girlish trustfulness and affection—and then the harsh and cruel language that had passed between them—her sufferings—his cold neglect—his perfidy, and the deep wrong he had inflicted, joined with his present apparently heartless attempt at justification or palliation, for she could view his presence at that hour in no other light, all these and many other emotions, as varied and contradictory, created such a tumult in her bosom, that she felt no longer able to continue farther without support:—the whole blood of her system seemed to centre with a suffocating weight around her heart,—a darkness came over her vision, and through sheer necessity she was forced to seize the arm of her passive partner, to uphold her sinking frame. In a moment after, however, she was in the act of withdrawing her hand, abashed and confused, when she felt her fingers clasped in his, with a soft and gentle pressure, that sent a thrill through every vein, to the very recesses of her heart, while a voice murmured in her ear—

"Alice! dear Alice,—can you—will you forgive?"

It was a mournful voice, and musically sweet and low, but it came again with something more of earnestness, as the maiden still clung to him in trembling silence.

"Oh, Alice, if you could but know one half the agony I have endured since our separation—if you did but realize the depth of the affection—the undying love that I must ever feel for you, and only you"—

And he was in the act of raising her hand to his lips, when, suddenly disengaging it from his clasp, the affronted girl sprang from him with a bound that completely placed her beyond his reach. His words had broken the palsying spell that seemed hitherto laid upon both her physical and mental faculties, and she felt, at the moment, that in his present base attempt, she could look upon him as a very worm.—Turning until the moonlight, as it rested upon her features, seemed to light up a countenance as pale and passionless as its own far source—

"Go," said she with strange calmness, "Leave me! your language is not such as becomes you to utter!—certainly, not such as I should listen to from you. Forgive you!—yes, Robert—Mr. Hardynge, I do forgive you as I hope to be forgiven. I forgive you and I pity both you and that fair young being whom you have sworn to love, cherish and protect:—and as you this night press her to your bosom, may you forget that such words as you have just uttered ever passed your lips."

"Alice Finlay! you speak strangely," said Robert. "What fair young being do you pity?"

"Mr. Hardynge! is it not your bride, who is at this moment awaiting your return in that dwelling yonder?"

A light cloud at that moment floated across the moon, but, when an instant after, the queen of night emerged from her misty veil, the truant lover had resumed his place by the side of his early love;—his head was inclined towards her cheek—the arm she had so lately spurned slid gently and quietly around the slender waist of the unresisting maiden—her head sank back upon his shoulder—her sweet, fair face upturned to his, and—that last warm kiss of so long ago, was last no longer.

Robert Hardynge and Alice Finlay took a long walk that evening. Indeed, 'Squire Jones, who, for some purpose or other, tarried to spend a few moments with his client, Mr. Finlay, was observed to go very frequently to the parlor window, as if looking for some one whose leave of absence had been sadly broken. At length the loiterers arrived, Alice looking remarkably beautified and joyous, and Robert with one of those accustomed smiles upon his features, that reminded one of the olden time; and although Mr. Finlay felt somewhat mystified and dubious concerning the events of the evening, and, as well as Mrs. Finlay, greeted Robert rather coldly—yet it was apparent that the idea of a law-suit, for the purpose of binding up the broken hopes of their daughter, had nearly become obselete.

Rose, however, saw fit, with a slight twinkle of her merry eye, to enquire after the health of the wife of Mr. Hardynge.

"Well, Rose," said Robert, "you may ask Alice about it. She has been the first to call and welcome the bride, and she can tell you all about her."

And Alice did tell what a sweet creature was Robert's sister Irene, and what a noble-looking husband she had, in her cousin, Lieut. Hardynge, of the Navy—and how, being suddenly called to join his ship at Norfolk, he had entrusted his bride to the care of her brother, with whom she would remain during the cruise of the vessel—that he was now on a flying visit to his lovely wife, &c. &c.

"Oh, mamma, how foolish I have been!" said she, in a tone that only reached the ears of her mother. And she seated herself in the recess of a window, where a luxuriant myrtle, placed on a shelf outside, wove its foliage into a verdant lattice. The evening breath of summer came in, cool and delicious, through that living screen, playing upon her flushed cheek with a grateful freshness; but, mingled with it, came a sense of warmth upon her brow, and Robert Hardynge was bending over her. A whispered conversation of a few minutes ensued, at the close of which it was noticed, as they turned to the company, that a moisture was beaming in the eyes of both, probably the offspring of some allusion to the scenes of other days.

The remainder of the narration is soon finished.—Each had learned a lesson in the economy of life, which will be likely to prove advantageous to them through all their future journey, as side by side they bask in the sunshine, or buffet the storms of time. Alice has already earned the enviable distinction of an American matron of the third honor, happy and beloved, while Robert Hardynge—proud of his children, prouder still of his yet young and charming wife—is rapidly progressing in a career of usefulness and honor;—the consequences of their early errors serving as beacons to warn them, through all coming time, of quicksands on which the happiness of thousands has been made shipwreck.

These incidents—disguised, indeed, by fictitious names—form, nevertheless, a story of reality and truth, and are but records of actual occurrences.—Rose Finlay is to present the reigning belle at a celebrated naval station, and should any of the bachelor readers of our story wish to identify her, it may easily be done, by an odd sort of a ring which she wears—plain and massive—presented to her by an antiquated specimen of the lonely race, Hiram Jones by name, away up among the Green Mountains; it being formed of two half eagles, which the said Jones received, as a retaining fee, in a case which never went into the halls of justice—the action having been adjudicated upon, before term-time, in another and more expeditious court. Deeply chased in the back of the said ring—which almost covers a moiety of one of her taper fingers—as a speaking lesson, and changeless motto, are these cabalistic words—

"THE BREACH OF PROMISE."

THINK NOT THAT I LOVE THEE.

BY LIEUT. G. W. PATTEN, U. S. A.

Think not that I love thee!
Ah! how can it be?
In the hush of the twilight
I speak not of thee;
And the voice of my lute string,
As it floats o'er the frame,
'Mid all its soft murmurs,
Breathes never thy name.

Think not that I love thee!
'Twere an idle surmise—
Love lives in the accent,
Love dwells in the eyes;
And never by glances,
And never by tone,
Hath thy bosom discover'd
One thought of my own.

Think not that I love thee!
Ah! sure thou can'st tell!
Could woman dissemble
So wise and so well?
Go, go and forget me!
'Tis vain to repine,
For my heart, tho' 'twere breaking,
Must never be thine.

THE MESSENGER BIRD;

Or, The Spirit of True Benevolence.

Translated from the French.

BY B. S. BARCLAY.

The amiable wife of the celebrated author, Helvetius, whose graces and rare qualities inspired her husband in the production of his charming poem on "Happiness," possessed a remarkable passion for birds: and having devoted much time to the interesting study of Ornithology, she knew all the various species; and understood the various modes of rearing and feeding them.

At her beautiful country seat of Auteuil, Madame Helvetius had caused the erection of an elegant and commodious aviary, in which was assembled a feathered and tuneful throng; and which was an asylum for all the birds of the surrounding country during the inclement months of winter. This aviary was only closed at night, in order to secure its inmates from being attacked by destructive animals. In the morning, when Madame H. had distributed with her own hands the peculiar food suited to their different natures, she opened their prison doors, and permitted them to enjoy entire freedom. Hopping from spray to spray, they would then make the surrounding woods merry with their melodious notes.

Frequently happened, that during the fine weather of summer, but few of this joyous troop return[illegible] to roam at large, where the most tender care disputed with abundance. An insect, taken on the wing—the muddy water of a pond—and the slightest shelter afforded by a twig—were often preferred to the long ears of grain—the delicate seed—the clear limped fountain, and the nests of moss and down, which decorated the aviary: so true to nature, is it, that not even imprisonment in a palace, with every luxury, can compensate for the loss of liberty and independence! But, when came frost and snow, and the winds whistled chill through the leafless trees, then would these little fugitives gladly return to enjoy the sweets of hospitality; bringing with them not a few strangers, who sought also an asylum from cold and hunger.

It was never without regret that Madame Helvetius separated herself from her numerous and beloved guests; but the celebrity of her name—the charm of her society—and the graces of her person and manner, called her to become the ornament of a circle in the gay capital; to which she usually repaired about the beginning of January.

The memorably severe winter of 1788 produced, in France, unparalleled distress and misfortune.—Rivers, choaked by ice, piled mountains high, broke through their natural barriers, and destroyed indiscriminately, castle and cottage. Wild beasts, emboldened by the pangs of hunger, darted into the sheep-folds, and besieging the hamlet, attacked even the infant in its cradle! The bodies of men were found upon the highway petrified by cold; and in the fields and woods, game of every kind was seen extended dead upon the snow. One would have thought that the solar system was deranged, and that the earth had deviated from its course: so completely had the temperate climate of France—which is not one of the least advantages she derives from nature—changed into that of Greenland or Nova Zembla!

It was then that Madame Helvetius—after having assured herself that her numerous feathered family at Auteuil were well provided for, and not suffering in any manner during such a disastrous winter,—occupied herself at Paris, in affording relief to the unhappy poor. Her touching pity extended itself to all the suffering beings around her.

Often from the windows of her apartment—which opened upon a long terrace,—she observed that a great number of sparrows, who found refuge at night in the stables of the Hotel, during the day vainly sought for food. Her heart—so attuned to benevolence that she could not witness unmoved the distress of even the smallest of God's creatures—prompted her to extend them relief. Exposing herself to the rigorous cold, she opened a window, and stepping upon the terrace, swept from it the snow, with her own hands. When she had cleared a spot large enough, she hastened to distribute thereon, grain of different kinds; and to her joy, she soon saw alight, an infinite number of birds, who devoured eagerly the repast spread for them. Thus the good Madame H. occupied herself each morning, while many of her little visitors would crowd around her; some, even venturing so far as to peep in at the window of her apartment.

One day while abandoning herself to this pleasure, one sparrow of the numerous flock came and perched itself upon her head—descended to her shoulder, and nestled in her bosom. Madame H. attributed this boldness to the intense cold, with which the bird appeared to be somewhat benumbed; so she hastened to warm it with her hands—to caress it—and entering her apartment, approached the fire: but the bird increased its familiarity—perching on her finger, it pecked her hand; and alighting on her shoulder, it flapped its wings, as if wishing to express gratitude to its benefactress. Somewhat puzzled by this demeanour, Madame H. thought it could be no other than a pet sparrow belonging to some person in the neighbourhood, and had been attracted thither by the grain upon the terrace; so, after a little time, she reopened the window and said to the bird—

"If thou dost belong to any one in this neighbourhood they will be uneasy concerning thy fate: fly quickly! and comfort those who mourn thy absence. If thou canst not find thy home, return to me, poor little wanderer. Oh! return again to nestle in my bosom."

With these words, she gave it a kiss, and away it flew from her sight.

On the morrow, Madame Helvetius was pleased to find again, among her daily increasing flock, the little refugee who had inspired her with so much interest on the preceding day. So soon as it had taken its meal, the affectionate bird flew more familiarly, if possible than before, to receive a caress, when, to her great surprise, Madame H. discovered that around its neck was fastened a narrow blue ribbon, from which depended the end of a glove finger, forming a tiny bag. Excited by the most lively curiosity, she eagerly examined it, and found within a very thin leaf of paper, folded into the smallest possible compass, upon which was written in a delicate female hand, the following lines from Racine:

"Aux petits des oiseaux tu donnes leur pature, Et ta bonte s'etend sur toute la nature;"

which, literally translated, is—

"Thou givest to little birds their food;
And thy kindness extends over all nature."

Moved with intense interest, Madame Helvetius perused the postscript attached to this flattering quotation—

"Virtuous persons in your neighbourhood are languishing in need; would you do less for them, than for the numerous feathered family whom we see you nourish with food each morning?"

"Doubtless no!" she exclaimed, abandoning herself to every kind emotion—"resist a request so touching? impossible!"

Hastening to her escritoire, she took from it a draft for six hundred livres, which she deposited in the little bag, and fastened it again around the bird's neck. Bestowing repented kisses upon the interesting messenger, she went out upon the terrace, and bade it fly to relieve those who were perhaps that moment suffering the pangs of cold and hunger. Her eyes attentively followed the direction of the sparrow's flight, hoping that she might thus discover the spot where it alighted: but no, the trees in the neighbouring gardens intercepted her view: and Madame H., returning to her apartment, abandoned herself to the sweetest reflections.

"By what means," thought she, could this poor family have instructed a simple sparrow to direct its flight thitherward, and perform the task of selecting me for their benefactress? Ah! how anxious I am to know them; to visit them. They must be superior to the position in which they are thrown. With what touching delicacy the appeal was made. The more I reflect, the more am I lost in astonishment."

Many days passed, and brought not again the bird. Madame Helvetius thought constantly of this strange adventure, but was careful not to speak of it to any one; for thus she would have revealed a benevolent action, which, made known, would have lost half its merit. Sometimes the vivacity of her brilliant imagination, and her profound knowledge of the world, created in her mind the suspicion that she had been made the sport of some artful impostor: for often among the interesting and worthy objects who claim our commiseration, will steal those who impose upon our credulity, and abuse our confidence.

At last, one morning, while Madame H. was sweeping the snow from the terrace for the daily distribution of grain, among the birds which came flocking around—for it appeared as if all the birds in and about Paris attended the morning levee on the terrace of the good Madame H.,—she spied the little faithful messenger with its ribbon and bag.

"Welcome!" she cried, "welcome! and so thou hast for me another billet?"

The bird seemed pleased and proud, and wheeled around her head in graceful circles before alighting upon her hand.

The bag was once more opened with a deep emotion, while Madame H. advanced to her escritoire, that she might be ready to deposite a new pledge of her generosity, when her attention was arrested by the following:

"You have saved us! you have saved an estimable artist and his family. Accept our blessings, our thanks. The six hundred livres shall be repaid as soon as the return of spring, and the labor of our hands will permit."

These words were blotted over by tears of gratitude, and Madame H. could not restrain a few sympathizing drops, at having been the means of alleviating the distress of a virtuous family. She now applauded herself more than ever for having yielded to the first promptings of her generous heart, and wrote this reply:

"I thought I had bestowed a gift: and it is but a loan! The happiness I experience by having been useful to you, renders me your debtor."

"How very dear this sweet bird must be to those whose interpreter it is!"

With these words, and many caresses, Madame H. sent it forth to seek its home, and each succeeding morn she watched in vain; her feathered favorite appeared no more to partake of her bounty.

* * * * * *

The frosts ceased. The snow disappeared. All nature, smiling, again welcomed the coming of spring. The birds forsook the terrace of their kind benefactress, and began already to occupy themselves in building nests for their young. They became so shy that Madame H. could no longer allure them; and her tender heart was touched by their forgetfulness and ingratitude.

"But," said she, "how can I blame the unconscious bird for what we daily suffer from intelligent man?"

The first day of that sweetest of months, May, Madame H. took her departure for Auteuil. She wished to repair the ravages that the storms of the past severe winter might there have made: and above all did she desire to superintend the alterations and revisions, necessary to the comfort of her beloved guests in the aviary. Every time a sparrow winged its flight above her head—every time she visited her collection of gay-plumaged songsters—that lady would think with tenderness of the charming interpreter of the unknown family; and although this species of bird is not famed for any particular quality which attracts notice, or excites attachment;—yet she would gladly have exchanged many of her choicest birds for the one intelligent sparrow.

Towards the middle of summer, some pressing family business required the presence of Madame H. at Paris. Unwillingly she tore herself away from the charms of rural occupation, and the care of the now thinly inhabited aviary;—the fine weather having, as usual, won the occupants to seek in wood and grove their natural shelter.

The terrace was, of course, visited very soon after her arrival—and none but those who have experienced the same, can appriciate the sensations of one who visits the spot where one has performed a virtuous and benevolent action. She looked around, and said—

"Ay! my pretty messenger comes no more: will it not greet me ever again?"

Each morning, early, she sought to attract it by throwing grain, as in the winter,—and, as if to reward her perseverance, the bird came, but hovered around without approaching very near the terrace. Passing and re-passing, it seemed to express both a wish and a fear to alight. Madame H. called it, and made a thousand caressing signs, but all in vain: when the thought struck her that it was the change in her costume that caused this timidity—so, entering her apartment, she hastened to enrobe in her winter pelisse of blue satin, trimmed with ermine, and bonnet of velvet—and then made her appearance again upon the terrace. The sparrow now recognized its old acquaintance, and flew upon her shoulder all confidence and joy. The ribbon and bag were both around its neck; and Madame H. impatiently sought for the contents.

A check for six hundred livres most unexpectedly met her view accompanied by a few words, as follows:

"We hasten to repay the money which you so generously bestowed on strangers—the gratitude we feel will remain engraven on our hearts forever!"

Madame H was about to return the check, when she reflected that, perhaps, this act would deprive those estimable unknown ones of the sweetest enjoyment they could experience—that of discharging a debt sacred to honor.

Wishing to accustom the bird to her summer costume, she resumed her robe of white muslin, took off her bonnet, and appeared in hair simply arranged in bands. She had the pleasure to find that the sparrow no longer shunned her, though it examined her at first with a very prying, suspicious look, as much as to say—"what does all this mean? why can you not always dress the same, as I do?"

Every day would it come and pay quite a long visit—hopping about on the terrace; and if Madame H. delayed opening the window, it would tap with its little beak on the glass, and express impatience in a thousand ways.

* * * * * *

It was Sunday. Madame H., attended by several friends, persons of distinction, was resting, after a promenade in the beautiful Jardin des Plantes,* and enjoying the charm of an animated conversation, when a sparrow was seen to escape from its hiding-place under the neck-kerchief of a young girl of about ten or eleven years old, who sat opposite on a bank of turf, and perch upon the shoulder of Madame H., expressing its attachment by various endearments.

"Ah!" she exclaimed, covering it with kisses, "it is my darling little messenger; but how came it here, in this public garden, among so many people?"

"Excuse me, Madame," said the young girl, approaching—"it is my sister's pet."

"And where, my dear child, is your sister?" enquired Madame H.

"The young girl," she replied, "on the other side of the walk, sitting with my father and mother. She is dressed in white. Do you not see her, Madame? This sparrow is hers, and I do not think she would part with it for the world."

While concluding these words, she beckoned to a young person of singularly lovely face and figure, who, this moment discovering her bird in its new position, rose from her seat in agitation, and flushing with embarrassment and joy, exclaimed—

"It is her! Yes, it is herself, my parents!—it is our benefactress!"

Behold Madame Helvetius, now surrounded by a most interesting group. Father, mother, and six children, relieved by her generosity, invoking upon her head blessings, and overwhelming her with thanks—while the bird's sweet mistress, nearly overcome by emotion, in low, broken, but musical tones, falters a few words of gratitude, pressing the hands of Madame H. to her heart, and to her lips—bedewing them with tears—and the faithful sparrow flying from one to the other, looking proud and happy, as much as to say—"this is all my work; see, what I have done!"—formed a most charming picture.

After a little time, Elise—for this was the name of the eldest daughter, the owner of the bird—was desired by Madame H. to relate their story; "and, above all," she added, "inform us by what ingenious means you succeeded in directing [illegible] our mutual interpreter, to me."

Caressing her bird, Elise replied—

"Oh! Madame, if you knew how much it cost me! But first I will relate why it became necessary.—My father, whose name is Valmont, is by profession a carver of wood. Having been afflicted with a long and dangerous illness, he slowly recovered, and was unable to resume his employment until the middle of winter; and then none could be obtained. Myself and my young sisters were not idle. We laboured hard to procure for our parents the comforts to which they had been accustomed—but, alas! Madame, the little that we could earn was not enough. I daily saw my still invalid parent languishing, and distressed that he could no longer contribute to the wants of his beloved family. The intense cold prevented us from pursuing profitably our avocations.

"What was before us? starvation!—we were all in despair. From the window of my chamber I witnessed your amiable charity to the poor famishing birds. A gleam of hope dawned upon me. It was not necessary to inquire your name; for that of the 'good Madame Helvetius' was already known to me. A plan to procure that assistance from you, which pride and delicacy prevented me from soliciting boldly, presented itself to my mind. I hesitatingly, and without at first informing my parents, resolved to attempt its execution. Oh! the pain that it caused. This dear, innocent bird, was chosen for my interpreter. It was necessary to expose him to the rigorous pangs of hunger, by depriving him of food for several successive days. I thrust him daily forth, that he might learn to join the flock assembled each morn upon the terrace at your hotel; and the poor little creature would fly frightened over the whole neighbourhood, pursued sometimes by the wild sparrows, who pecked him with their beaks, and so he would return with torn wings and lacerated breast.

"I wept over him, and often said, 'thou shalt go forth no more!'—but when I turned, and saw these loved ones, my purpose changed. I sent him again, and with joy observed him mix with the throng, partake of your bounty, and at last, alight upon your shoulder. The next morning, I ventured the little bag, which contained my first billet."

Trembling with emotion, Elise now exclaimed—"Most honoured and beloved Madame Helvetius, you know all the rest. No! not all. You do not know, nor can I picture, the intense joy, the fervent gratitude, with which I presented, and my parents accepted, the generous sum your generosity bestowed. The proud happiness we felt when we were able to repay it, I cannot portray."

What a lovely picture did this affectionate daughter and sister present at that moment! her tearful countenance, at the same time radiant with all the virtuous and happy emotions, was upturned to Heaven, as if invoking its blessings—then bent, glowing with gratitude upon her benefactress—or lighting up with fervent love, as she met the proud, fond gaze of her beloved parents.

The friends of Madame H., who were with her at the time these new acquaintances claimed her attention, displayed throughout the scene a most lively interest. Madame H., herself, pressed the good Elise to her heart, and expressed joy at having been chosen to relieve the distress of this estimable family, and for having had the exquisite gratification to witness such a noble instance of filial affection.

"But the pet-sparrow—the messenger-bird—what became of him?" you, my daughter, will ask. Elise promised to bring it herself to visit Madame H.; and this good lady never omitted an opportunity to contribute to the comfort and happiness of so much virtue, and never ceased to inculcate the lesson which I now repeat:

"That it is better to absolve a guilty person than condemn an innocent one: so, the fear of nourishing vice, or encouraging fraud, should never cause us to neglect any opportunity of affording relief to honest and virtuous indigence."

MY DREAM OF BLISS WAS O'ER.

We stood beside the window—
It was the very same—
Where, years ago, together
We wrote each other's name;
I listen'd for the dear words
I us'd to hear from thee—
I listen'd, but there came not
One loving word for me!

I look'd into the blue depths
Of those beloved eyes—
I long'd to see them glisten
With thoughts of former ties;
I look'd, but oh! they spoke not
The tenderness of old!
I thought my very heart strings
Would break, they were so cold!

My hand, I laid it gently—
How gently! upon thine—
I thought its pulse beat quicker,
I thought it answer'd mine!
But no! there was no pressure!
My dream of bliss was o'er!
I knew the spell was broken—
That I was lov'd no more!

SORROW AND SONG.

BY JAMES HEDDERWICK, GLASGOW.

Weep not over poet's wrong,
Mourn not his mischances—
Sorrow is the source of song,
And of gentle fancies.

Rills o'er the rocky beds are borne
Ere they gush in whiteness;
Peebles are wave chafed and worn,
Ere they show their brightness.

Sweetest gleam the morning flowers
When in tears they waken;
Earth enjoys refreshing showers
When the boughs are shaken.

Ceylon's glistening pearls are sought
In its deepest waters;
From the darkest mines are brought
Gems for beauty's daughters.

Through the rent and shivered rock
Limpid water breaketh;
'Tis but when the cords are struck
That their music waketh.

Flowers by heedless footstep prest,
All their sweets surrender;
Gold must brook the fiery test,
Ere it show its splendor.

When the twilight cold and damp
Gloom and silence bringeth;
Then the glow-worm lights his lamp,
And the bulbul singeth.

Stars come forth when night her shroud
Draws as daylight fainteth;
Only on the tearful cloud
God his rainbow painteth.

Weep not, then, o'er poet's wrong,
Mourn not his mischances—
Sorrow is the source of song,
And of gentle fancies.

COMING OUT.

BY ELLEN ASHTON.

"What are you going to wear to-night, Lucy?" said Kate Balfour to her school-mate. "Oh! mother has bought for me the prettiest dress! It is of satin, with blonde over it. Mary Hanson's is not half so costly."

"I shall wear a white muslin: the same one I wore the other evening."

"What!—that plain thing? Oh! I wouldn't do that. Make your ma buy you one like mine."

"The old one will do well enough," quietly replied Lucy. And, smiling, she added, "you know I am not very fond of dress, Kate. We used to differ about that at school."

Kate Balfour and her friend Lucy were both on the point of "coming out." Though they had attended numerous little companies before, the party to be given that evening was the first large one to which either had been yet asked. This is always an important era in a girl's life. Her first party is talked of for weeks beforehand, her dress is usually arranged with great care, and she scarcely ever reposes her head on her pillow without dreaming of the eventful evening. But, perhaps, Lucy thought less of this party than did nine out of ten of her acquaintances.—Brought up by a widowed mother of most excellent principles, Lucy's natural good sense had been improved by education, and few of her age had less giddiness or vanity. The remarks she made to her companion, which we have quoted, show how superior she was, in a petty love for admiration, to Kate. Indeed, in this respect, her parent had fully succeeded in her laudable wish.

"My daughter," she would say, "never imbibe a passion for vain display. Every woman should dress well; for a neat and elegant costume is a very great charm. Perhaps the perfection of dress of a real lady is so to dress that, while there shall be nothing gaudy and unusual about the attire, it will yet stand the test of examination and leave on the observer's mind a conviction of the wearer's good taste. Therefore, my dear, choose rather to dress with simplicity than with vain show. I do not say this on account of the cost, for our fortune is ample; but I wish my daughter to be respected for her good sense. The sums uselessly lavished in the attire of some of our young ladies, every year, would support a poor family."

Imbued with these notions, Lucy grew up; and we have seen her adhering to them even on the tempting occasion of her first party.

Yet we must confess it was with a beaming heart that Lucy entered the apartment that evening. The glare of the lights, the crowds of dancers, the music, and the beautiful dresses, forcibly impressed her imagination; and as with difficulty she made her way through the room, she could not help contrasting her comparatively plain appearance with the richer attire of most of the company. Lucy was not beautiful: she had only what is called an interesting face; and she could not conceal from herself, therefore, that less attention was paid to her than her other school-mates received. Those, indeed, who were no more lovely than herself, but who were dressed more gaudily, had suitors when she had none.

Now Lucy was most pained to perceive that her childish playfellow, Frank Ritchie, who had just returned from the law-school after completing his studies, scarcely noticed her. For years they had felt for each other that sort of an affection which two children of different sexes, who are thrown much together, often experience: a mingled friendship and love, half childish, half serious. When Frank left for college, Lucy had been the last one on whom he called, and his parting gift had been treasured ever since. Girls are usually more lasting in their attachments than boys, and poor Lucy had always pictured to herself with joy the period when Frank should return. But now Frank had come, having arrived that very afternoon, and yet he scarcely spoke to her.—Once, indeed, when the evening was nearly a third gone, he came and shook hands with her; but he did not remain five minutes. His whole time seemed to be engrossed by Kate Balfour, whose costly dress and showy style of face made her the belle of the evening, at least among the younger portion of the male sex. Lucy thought that Frank might have danced with her, if only once, for old acquaintance sake. Poor girl! how she deceived herself in that thought; for Lucy was in love, if ever a true-hearted being was, and had been so for years.

By and bye, as she sat neglected in a corner, wishing herself home with her kind mother, she overheard two gentlemen speaking. One was the celebrated Judge Baldwin, and the other a member of Congress. They were canvassing the people present.

"Now to my taste," said the Judge, dropping his voice, though Lucy could not avoid hearing him still, "the best dressed young lady here is Lucy Morris—you knew her mother, did you not? She sits there on the ottoman. Good taste is the characteristic of her attire: there is no flash, no symptom of vanity about it: the girl who dresses so must be a most excellent creature; and judging from that fact alone, I would sooner fall in love with and marry her than any one here."

Lucy thought she would have sunk through the floor, for hers were ears unused to such extravagant compliments. Her cheek burned, but her heart bounded. Nor was she the only one who heard this speech. Frank was, at that moment, passing Judge Baldwin, with Kate Balfour hanging on his arm, and involuntarily turned to look at Lucy. The blush which suffused her cheek made her really beautiful at that moment, and Frank owned to himself that he had been as hasty in pronouncing her face plain as in overlooking the taste in which she was attired. For Frank was possessed of good sense; and though, like all young men of his years, he had been caught, for the time, by the brilliant beauty of Kate Balfour, he needed only reflection to make him sensible of the superior value of a girl like Lucy. He felt ashamed at himself for neglecting one whom such a man as Judge Baldwin praised.

Lucy was not aware that Frank overheard the compliment, and she was surprised, therefore, when Frank, a little later in the evening, approached her. She was then about to dance with a young man whom the Judge's wife introduced to her, "no doubt," as she mentally said, "at her husband's recommendation." Lucy was piqued at Frank's previous coldness, and not sorry for this opportunity to revenge herself, for, with all her virtues, Lucy was but human. She replied, therefore, with cold dignity to Frank's address; and immediately rose to take her place in the cotillion. And Frank bit his lip and flirted more earnestly than ever with Kate Balfour.

From that moment, however, Lucy was no longer left to seclude herself in a corner, where her gentle loveliness was hidden from sight. Once on the floor, a dozen eyes were attracted by her grace and elegant person; and as soon as the set was finished, she was besieged with suitors, asking the pleasure of her hand for the dance. In a few minutes she was engaged for every quadrille during the evening. She went home with a proud heart to recount the events of the evening to her parent; nor will we conceal that a portion of her secret satisfaction arose from having been so much admired in spite of Frank Ritchie's neglect. There was something flattering to her pride in it, and we doubt if many of our fair readers would have felt differently.

The next day several of the gentlemen to whom she had been introduced called, and Lucy soon had a regular set of admirers, who vied with each other in making the long winter evenings pass agreeably to her. Frank Ritchie had called on her too, and still made occasional visits; but he never presumed on more than a common acquaintanceship; and their conversation was, therefore, reserved and even cold. Lucy, with proper pride, was determined to make no advances; and Frank was daily becoming more and more convinced that she disliked him. He accordingly sought the society of Kate Balfour, who had first attracted him; and soon the gossips of the village pronounced that it would be a match between the gay belle and the rising young lawyer.

Yet Frank really loved Lucy, though he was becoming every day further entangled in the toils of the vain coquette. Judge Baldwin, who had been the bosom friend of Frank's father, suspected this, both from the character of the young man and from his demeanor when in Lucy's company.

"He was caught, at first, like very young men generally are," said the Judge to his wife, "by the glitter of our village belle, but his strong sense must teach him that Lucy is the pure gold, while Kate is but the counterfeit. It is a pity he should throw himself away. And I sometimes suspect that our sweet Lucy has not altogether forgotten their childish attachment."

"You are right," said Mrs. Baldwin. "I am no observer of young lady's hearts, if Lucy does not love Frank. But mutual distrust has grown up between them; he is reserved, and she is dignified; and really, I am afraid, it will end by his marrying Miss Balfour."

"That would be a pity, for I believe she only seeks Frank for his money. She is a vain, heartless flirt, who cares solely for admiration and display.—Lucy, on the contrary, is a sweet creature, with a heart that would be a treasure to any one. I don't approve of interfering in such cases, but really I am sorry to see two young people sacrificed, who are so fitted for each other, as Frank and Lucy."

"Stay! I have it," said his wife suddenly. "Trust a woman for managing a love affair! I will bring Lucy and Frank together, if they admire each other; and, if not, no harm will be done."

"But how?"

"I scarcely know yet myself. But you may rely on me that all will be managed with due regard to the feelings of both Frank and Lucy."

"I am sure of that," said the Judge, casting on his wife a fond look, which showed that twenty years of matrimony had not lessened his confidence in her discretion.

A few evenings afterwards there was to be a social party at the house of the Judge. Frank was there. So, too, was Lucy, and with her Henry Clarence, the young millionaire of the village, whose attentions to our heroine were the talk of the whole place. Frank was unsettled and nervous through the early part of the evening; his eyes constantly wandered to Lucy: and when he was not laughing gaily, he was plunged in abstraction. At last he stole out, as he thought, unobserved, on the balcony overlooking the garden. Directly, however, a light finger tapped his shoulder; he turned with a start and beheld Mrs. Baldwin.

"Ah!" she said, "did you think me Kate? Come, you have been absent-minded all the evening—confess now is it because Miss Balfour is not here. But you know she was too ill to come."

"I did not know it till I came here," said Frank, pointedly.

"Ah! that will not do," gaily retorted his hostess. "I do not wish to pry into your secrets, Frank," she said, more seriously, "but I consider myself half a mother to you, and if you are going to marry Miss Balfour you ought to tell me, so that I may cultivate her acquaintance for your sake. All the village say it is so. Really I must be growing old, for here are both you and Lucy about to be married, when it seems but yesterday that you were children."

"Lucy about to be married!—then, since you say it, it must be true," said Frank, surprised out of his composure.

"Frank," said his hostess, now fully convinced of the state of his heart, "you mistake. Lucy is not engaged, and if any one loves her, he is very foolish to let another carry off his prize, until he has seriously sought her hand. There is nothing like frankness in such matters; reserve and doubt on one side may be magnified into dislike on the other, and to produce equal coldness." She laid her hand on his arm as she spoke, looked earnestly into his face, and then disappeared into the crowded room.

"She has read my heart. The secret is out," said Frank, his first feeling being one of bitter mortification. But the next moment hope dawned on him.—"Surely," he said, "Mrs. Baldwin knows more than she has told. She is too sincere to raise hopes she knows cannot be fulfilled. Can she have discovered anything in Lucy? What a fool I have been, at any rate, to be so reserved," he said, as, in reviewing his conduct, he now saw what little his pride had suffered him to do to remove Lucy's coldness. "I can but fail."

Mrs. Baldwin soon met Lucy, who, though receiving the homage of a crowd of suitors, appeared spiritless and absent. The truth is, she had just heard that Frank and Kate were really engaged.

"My dear," said her hostess, "have you seen this new volume of poems? They are on my centre-table," and she adroitly led her forward, for she saw Frank, at that moment, standing there. "Ah! here is Mr. Ritchie, he knows the author well," and with still further tact she thus managed to draw the two lovers into a conversation on a subject in which she knew Frank would shine, if on any. Nor was she mistaken at the success of her plan. Frank had suddenly regained his old ease of manner, and Lucy, after a momentary embarrassment, likewise lost all restraint. Before the evening was spent, every one was talking of the new flirtation between Lucy and her old playmate.

But it was no flirtation. Lucy was too frank to coquet with her lover, and his evident affection for her was soon rewarded by the promise of her hand. Many and worthy were her other suitors, for, while the vain and foppish sought Kate Balfour's society, the most estimable young men of the village had long preferred Lucy's. So true is it that real worth, though at first it may be overlooked, must eventually win its reward. It would be well if all remembered this on coming out.

A FORTUNE

FOUNDED ON A HURRICANE.

BY E. C. WATMOUGH, ESQ.

The town of Trinidad, upon the south side of the island of Cuba, presents a very picturesque appearance from the sea. The dark blue mountains of St. Juan, rising to the height of three thousand feet, form the back ground of the picture, throwing the town into fine relief—with its white walls and turrets. At a distance, it appears like a white blur upon the mountain side. In any other region than the tropics it might, at first glance, be mistaken for a drift of snow, or a cloud resting upon the dark mountain's side, but the one is as impossible as the other, for, during the dry season, from October till April, not even a wreath of mist floats in the pure ether by day, or dims the brilliancy of the spangled blue of night. Gradually from this white obscure are shadowed forth, in faint outlines, turrets and cupolas, at every step becoming more distinct till at last the miniature houses with little dots for windows, stand forth brightly in the glare of a mid-day sun.

The ground between the sea shore and the town is barren and sandy, covered with brush-wood, with here and there a clump of palms and the umbrageous mango, broken into lagoons, or pools of salt water, near the shore, which at a distance have a pleasing effect, but upon inspection, the delusion quickly vanishes. These pretty lakes are in reality nothing but salt bogs, tenanted by the land crab; the shores furrowed by the sand grub, and haunted by myriads of mosquitoes.

The harbor, with its little port of Casilda, is formed by a thin strip of land, about two miles in length and densely covered with mangrove bushes. At the extremity of the point, or entrance to the harbor, is erected a small fort, which is apt to be submerged during a hurricane, and is never garrisoned by more than half a dozen soldiers. Between this fort and Pedro Blanco, a small island, is a narrow and intricate passage, through which can pass vessels only of a light draught.

With this bird's-eye view of the town and harbor, we will proceed with our narrative.

In the latter part of the month of September of the year 180–, some forty or fifty of the merchants and planters of Trinidad were collected together at the head of Calle de Gutierez, discussing the various topics of the day, in which the probable rise and fall of the prices of sugar and molasses was decidedly the most interesting. Amongst this group, were the keen looking Catalonian, the blunt Biscayan, and vivacious Andalusian—emigrants from the mother country, in the pursuit of wealth;—the joke was bandied about in that boisterous vein so peculiar to the Spaniard, interrupted occasionally by the presence of a passing signorita, with flowing mantilla, the only covering to her head, when compliments would fall freely from the lips of all.—Far from being offended, the lady appeared to consider it a just tribute to her personal charms—would reply with great gravity, muchisimos gracias, Caballeros—and pass on, with the grace and dignity of a queen. A Montero, upon a high-mettled pacer, darted up to the door, and saluted the group with that natural air of polite respect from which a true Spaniard never departs.

"Senores, Caballeros, dios guard ustedes." "Gentlemen, God be with you—what do you think of the weather?"

"It looks bad enough," replied one; "we shall have it tough and strong—the mountain passes are dark as night, with heavy clouds."

"Yes," said another, "and the sea moans, and heaves upon Pedro Blanco in a way that forebodes a hurricane."

The sea did present a strange and unnatural appearance, covered—almost obscured—by masses of vapor rolling over the surface. The atmosphere was so perfectly calm that the flame of a candle burnt as steady in the open air as if enclosed within a crystal vase. All were now busy speculating upon the indications of the heavens with the exception of one; to whom calms and storms apparently were alike indifferent.

Seated upon the counter, with abstracted air and folded arms, kicking his heels against the boards; there was an air of recklessness about the youth that plainly told his fortune to be desperate, and that he was at that very moment turning over in his mind the probable chances of success for a dinner, already having failed in procuring a breakfast. The light-blue eye, fair hair, and ruddy complexion disclosed at a glance his Anglo-Saxon blood; and as he gazed at the dark eyed, sun burnt features that surrounded him, there was an expression which seemed to say—"let it blow the whole island over to Africa for aught I care: I have neither kith nor kin here, and am as pennyless as a Spanish beggar." Something out of the common order of events appeared to animate the group; some were collected together apart, in earnest conversation; others were mounting horses and scampering off to the Casilda, whilst a party upon the house top were gazing through spy-glasses at the sea. The youth, before decribed, inquired of an individual who had just come down, and who closed his glass with a snap that shattered the instrument, exclaiming at the same time, "Caraho, she's gone."

"What is the matter, Senor? there seems to be a screw out of place somewhere, what is it?"

"Why, Senor Americano, mio. There is a barque outside there, in which we are all interested—a good half million of freight, that is likely to be swamped by this infernal hurricane, or nabbed by John Bull, that's all."

The youth spoken to, mounted the steps and was quickly upon the parapet. Almost all the houses of Trinidad are constructed with flat roofs, with a parapet about three feet high, for the purpose of catching rain water during the wet season.

Upon reaching the parapet, he was astonished at the sudden change from a breathless calm to a furious gale, with every premonition of one of those terrible hurricanes that sometimes, in a single hour, lay waste whole districts. The inhabitants were hurrying to shelter in the greatest trepidation, closing their shops and barricading their doors and windows—the streets were already strewed with fragments of roofs and broken tiles torn from their fastenings by the first fury of the blast. The vultures, those licensed scavengers of every West India town, at all hours of the day, skimming over the tops of houses, or soaring to a great height in gigantic circles, were now crouching beneath the parapets, and the atmosphere was filled with flocks of screaming sea gulls, torn from their habitations upon the coasts and numerous islands, by the irresistible fury of the wind.

A drift-like smoke rolled over the ocean and spread across the land to the mountain's base. At intervals, the surface of the sea, to the utmost limits of the wide extended horizon, was distinctly visible, lashed into a foam, and whirled aloft in wreaths of spray from the tops of the curling waves.

Two vessels were distinctly seen, scudding before the wind under close reefed topsails. Onward they both came with the speed of race horses, the one further seaward, from the cut of her canvass and squareness of yards, evidently a man-of-war, in full chase; as she rose upon a swell, her long dark hull and line of ports were visible; from the bow at the same moment issued a volume of smoke, which as suddenly was swept away by the wind, and mingled with the floating spray and haze, and ere the sound of the cannon had reached the shores, (in low, suppressed murmurs,) the Spanish barque had rounded Pedro Blanco, dropt her anchors, and swung round to the wind. The man-of-war came dashing in after under bare poles, her close reefed foresail but a few moments before having been blown clean out of the bolt ropes, and whirled off to leeward, twisting and twirling about until it was lost in the haze that now covered every thing with an impenetrable veil; but ere the two vessels were closed from view, it was evident that the man-of-war had passed close under the stern of the slaver, and was riding upon the swell with four anchors ahead.

The gale now had increased almost to a hurricane; it was with difficulty the youth could maintain his position upon the parapet; he therefore descended to the store below, and mingled with the anxious group collected there.

It was conceded by all that, the Esperanza, for such was the name of the slaver, was a gone case. If she rode out the gale, which was very improbable, the Stag, a well known British cruiser, would certainly capture her, and if the hurricane increased, as there was every likelihood, both vessels must be wrecked, with the chance of all hands perishing.

One said he would sell his interest for fifty ounces, another for five hundred, all appearing to think the chances so perfectly desperate, as scarcely worth an hour's purchase. The hero of our story listened to every thing with the deepest interest; at last he stept boldly up to one of the gentlemen and said,

"Come, sir, what did you say you would take for your interest in that ship?"

"I'll take five hundred ounces, and that's selling what, if all had gone right, would fetch at the barracoon this day fifty thousand dollars."

"Yes," replied the stranger, "but she will never come ashore except in pieces. Look at that—there goes the roof off of Don Vincente's house, as clean as a whistle. The hurricane is up—it will tear that ship to pieces in less than an hour. I'll give you one hundred ounces for your share, and take my chance."

"Papa! it's a bargain!" cried the Spaniard; "John Bull has got her, I believe, already. La Esperanza must have drifted down upon her ere this."

Seven or eight shares were purchased upon the spot, and a bargain made with the others, who appeared to view our friend in no other light than a madman, that if he saved the ship and cargo, he was to receive 25 per cent. upon the gross amount.

No sooner was the negociation concluded, and the writings, which were hastily drawn, safely deposited in his pocket, than he bounded forth into the storm, with a cry of "a dios senores," and was lost in the gloom which shrouded every thing without.

Onward he dashed, reckless of the thousand dangers that threatened to annihilate him at every step, from showers of tiles and broken parapets hurled at his feet by the wind, which, though not yet at its height, was howling above his head with great fury, occasionally licking up the dust and pebbles in whirling eddies, and then spattering it into his face with such force, as not only to blind, but for a time to cause him to reel and stagger.

A brave man might well have cowered beneath that blast—but our youth had felt, deeply felt, the pangs of a crushing poverty; with a spirit of the highest order, and a consciousness of his own merits, he had too often felt the deep degradation his abject poverty had made him subject to. Here was a chance—a terrible one, to be sure, if he failed, it would be death in the excitement of battle; if he succeeded, a double reward awaited him, a magnificent fortune, and the preservation of the lives of a thousand helpless beings. Upon emerging from the town, the road lay before him in almost a straight line, for three miles, to the little village of the Casilda. From this point, on a clear day, the eye can embrace a view of two hundred miles of sea, from North to South; but now, the road upon which he was ploughing his way, was scarcely discernible twenty yards ahead. Onward he laboured, occasionally, when the blast with uncommon fury swept across his path, seeking a temporary shelter beneath the hedges formed by the prickly pear and wild pine apple—beneath whose interwoven branches clattered thousands of land crabs, on their way to the sea from the mountains. An army of these creatures crossed his path; regardless of the countless uplifted hands from this strange multitude, he crashed through the array, kicking from his feet some half dozen, that had fastened upon his legs with their long pincering claws.

The sea was swollen far beyond its natural boundaries. The streets of the village were overflowed, and where, but a few hours before, the gay volante had whirled up the dust upon a sandy road, now were covered with boats adrift, floating logs, casks and merchandize of every description. Every minute marked a sensible increase of the power of the wind; occasionally, vast bodies of water were scooped up by the mighty hand of the tempest and crushed into vapour, or fell far from where they had been torn, in showers of brine. The foam of the sea floated over head like flakes of snow. The incessant roll of tropical thunder, Heaven's heaviest artillery, reverberated from the mountain's base, and was mingled with the roar of the wind and surf which pealed upon the shores of the neighboring islands, occasionally flashing up through the thick haze, pyramids of foam and spray.

After wading and floundering through ponds of water, under the lea of a large store, he encountered a fisherman by the name of Antonio, a hardy fellow, one of the best pilots of the port. To him he immediately made known his intentions, and offered a thousand dollars if he would accompany him with his boat on board the slaver.

"Why, Senor," said Antonio, "you must be mad. We should be swamped, for a dead certainty; and what good could we do, suppose we reached her?"

"I'll make your fortune!" was the prompt reply. "Does she still hold on?"

"Si, Senor."

"And how's the cruiser?"

"Oh, tight enough—with four anchors out—two chain cables. She'll founder at her anchors, if this gale increases."

"We can paddle under the lea of the mangrove bushes of the strip of land over the other side of the the harbour, till we come to the Fort, then before the wind, you pulling, I bailing, in three minutes we can fetch the slaver, once on board I'll show you we can save her."

Still Antonio doubted, wavered; all the eloquence of argument, and stout assurances, with scorn of danger, appeared not in the least to stagger his determination to decline the perilous adventure.

"Lend me your boat, then. By Heaven! I'll go alone; and when I meet you to-morrow, with five thousand Spanish doubloons in my chest, you'll curse yourself for not having had the courage to follow."

"Stop one moment. How much say you?"

At that instant a crash of thunder made the earth tremble beneath their feet, accompanied by a flash that pierced through the gloom, illuminating every object with a lurid glare, the foam flakes sailing through the air like myriads of floating brands of fire; at the same instant a transient glance was caught of the two vessels, reeling and plunging at their anchors.

"Two thousand doubloons!" cried the indomitable stranger, in a voice clear as a trumpet, every word distinctly heard by Antonio, above the roar of the elements.

"Agreed—come on!" and they jumped into the boat, Antonio exclaiming at the same time, "Another such a clap of thunder as that, and good-bye hurricane."*

After great difficulty, and the escape from many dreadful blasts, they succeeded in reaching the opposite shore; but the sea made a clear breach across the strip of land, and though broken by the mangrove bushes, yet the surge rolled over into the harbour with terrible force. The boat was light, and pulled by vigorous and skilful hands; in a short time they reached the deserted Fort, under the lee of which they rested for a few moments, and braced their nerves for the great struggle, when they should be exposed to the full fury of the wind and waves, the frail bark being as yet protected by the land under which they had for an hour laboured their perilous passage. Antonio ejaculated a short prayer, crossed himself very devoutly some half dozen times, then seizing the oars, cried out—

"Here goes. We can't miss her. She lies dead to leeward of that reef."

The boat shot forth from her cover, and was immediately whirled round by the wind, one of the oars escaping from his hand; it was caught in a minute by his companion, ere the rower had time to utter the cry of terror the accident occasioned. The sea was like a turbulent field of snow; the spray flew past them with terrible velocity—a single wave, ere it could lift its head on high, was cut off into foam, and mist and smoke; with the speed of an arrow shot from a bow, did they skim and gurr through the water.—When the American cried out, "Starboard oar—hard a starboard," it was promptly obeyed, and the bark wheeled round the stern of the slaver, and as she touched her dark hull, the adventurers seized the mizen chains, and in less time than we have taken to describe it, were safely upon the deck: the boat being swamped beneath the gunwales of the ship as she rolled to leeward. The storm was now at its height—the Captain was upon his knees crossing himself, and crying out to that God for mercy, whose divine precepts he had forgotten, when he entered into the dreadful traffic of his fellow men.

At every plunge of the vessel, the water poured over her bows and deluged the decks. From the bosom of the labouring craft issued a yell of mingled agony and terror, from eight hundred souls confined below, which mingled with the blast, and must have been heard far inland by the distant Vega,† who might fancy that a thousand fiends were shrieking in the elemental strife above.

"Where's your axe—give it me. Antonio take another. Where is the cruiser? I see her—we can clear her. Hard a port your helm. All hands run up the fore-top-mast stay-sail—cut!" rapidly uttered the dauntless youth.

The cables were severed at a blow, the sail burst from the bolt ropes, the ship rose upon a roller crested with foam, careened round before the blast and under the impulse of the hurricane, dashed madly towards the shore, passing the cruiser like a phantom, and disappearing amidst the haze and drift and surf;—in a moment after, she struck. A tremendous roller lifted her again from the ground, and after several successive shocks, she plunged into comparatively smooth water.

The next morning the Esperanza, lay high and dry a half mile from the shore, and landed her cargo in safety. And before night the bold and pennyless adventurer was in possession of one hundred thousand dollars—his well-earned share of a cargo, valued at that time, at nearly four hundred thousand dollars; whilst the British cruiser was content to weigh anchor and renew his honorable efforts against a trade now almost universally denounced the worst of piracy.

The hero of our sketch has since acquired great wealth, and possesses an income of some two hundred thousand dollars per annum, and is a Grandee of Spain, with several titles of distinction.

It is nearly forty years since this incident occured: he still enjoys excellent health, and in the conduct of his affairs is distinguished for that energy which marked his first career—as well as for every other quality that can adorn the character of a gentleman.

So much for making the best of a chance; the first instance, we suppose, of doubloons being coined out of a hurricane.

THE CASTLE BY THE SEA.

FROM THE GERMAN OF UKLAND.—TRANSLATED BY PROFESSOR LONGFELLOW.

Hast thou seen that lordly castle,
That castle by the sea?
Golden and red above it
The clouds float gorgeously.

And fain it would stoop downward
To the mirrored wave below;
And fain it would soar upward
In the evening's crimson glow.

Well have I seen that castle,
That castle by the sea,
And the moon above it standing,
And the mist rise solemnly.

The winds and the waves of ocean,
Had they a merry chime?
Didst thou hear, from those lofty chambers,
The harp and the minstrel's rhyme?

The winds and the waves of ocean,
They rested quietly,
But I heard on the gale a sound of wail,
And tears came to mine eye.

And sawest thou on the turrets
The king and his royal bride?
And the wave of their crimson mantles?
And the golden crown of pride?

Led they not forth, in rapture,
A beauteous maiden there?
Resplendent as the morning sun,
Beaming with golden hair?

Well saw I the ancient parents,
Without the crown of pride;
They were moving slow in weeds of woe,
No maiden was by their side!

THE PRISONER;
Or, GENIUS AND GROCERIES.

[From Chambers' Edinburg Journal.]

One cold evening, in January, a young man, who, though clad respectably, was not well protected from the inclement weather, took his station in a London stage-coach-yard, to await the arrival of some country friends. The bustle which was going on around him did not attract much of his attention. Except when interrupted by a push from a porter, or to escape being run over by a horse or cart, he seemed entirely immersed in his own musings. Suddenly his face was lighted up with a smile—a smile of inspiration—and thrusting his hand into his pocket, he drew forth a pencil and paper. He then retired into a door-way, and commenced writing.

In the meantime, the coach whose coming he awaited was driven into the yard, and while the busy operation of unloading was going on, while most of the passengers were heartily greeting the friends who had come to meet them, a widow and her daughter were looking about in vain for their friend. One by one their fellow passengers dropped off, and they were left alone, standing on the pavement beside their luggage. They exhibited signs of great disappointment. They had only one acquaintance in the vast wilderness, London. He had promised to meet them, and was not there. They were for the moment quite at a loss to know what to do. At last a bystander recommended them to take shelter in the travellers' room of the inn. Their boxes were accordingly being removed thither, when one was accidentally knocked against a person standing most inconveniently in the passage. He uttered an angry exclamation, and, looking up, perceived the very persons for whose arrival he ought to have more vigilantly watched. But now his anger, and the cold abstractedness of his manner, gave way to an opposite extreme. He greeted his friends with warm but unaffected delight; though by far the greater and more enthusiastic share fell to the younger female.

In less than half an hour the three friends were enjoying a refreshing meal in a humble but neatly furnished apartment in the outskirts of the city.

"Really, George," said the elder traveller, looking round the room, "I admire your taste exceedingly. You have taken for us a very neat and comfortable lodging."

"I have lived in the house ever since I came to London," returned George Selden, "and have been treated well enough by the landlady, though I do not trouble myself much about these things. But what news can you give me of Daleton?"

"Alas!" was the reply, "little but what concerns ourselves, and that is sad, very sad."

"Nay, mother, no desponding," said her daughter, with an effort at gaiety. "You cannot imagine, George, what trouble she gives me to keep up her spirits. She will not understand that brighter prospects are in store for us. In the first place, am I not a most lucky girl to get the situation of daily governess in Mrs. Webb's family? Has not she, also, promised to procure me other pupils?"

"Besides," interrupted George Selden, "there will be a time, my dear Mrs. Cooper, when a union of hopes, long nurtured, will give you a claim upon the exertions of us both."

Miss Bessie Cooper blushed, and suddenly dropped her eyes to look at the pattern of the carpet.

"Patience is all we require, and not much patience either," continued young Selden, "before we shall be placed beyond even apprehension of poverty. I shall soon leave my present employment, and soar above the intellectual degradation which it is now my fate to suffer, as a grocer's assistant. One of my poems has already appeared in the 'Monthly Literary Bouquet.'"

"But have you no settled prospect of bettering your condition, in the event of your leaving your present situation?" asked Mrs. Cooper.

"No prospect exactly settled—nothing positively definite," replied the poet. "But I know, I feel, that I shall one day be appreciated—that I shall hold a proper rank in the literary world. I have been writing a tragedy lately, it is finished all but the fifth act, and that will be done now in a very short time. I always think poetry when I am walking, and write it down the first opportunity. I was scribbling a brilliant idea for my fifth act when I first saw you."

No remark followed, but the two females exchanged glances expressive of sorrow and disappointment. It seemed as if this announcement, though intended to give them pleasure, damped the hopes which already existed in their minds. When they parted for the night, Bessie Cooper would have wept, but for the dread of increasing her mother's unhappiness.

The firm to which the poetical George Selden condescended to give his services, consisted of two partners, Mr. Williams and Mr. Webb. It being a wholesale as well as a retail house, the partners superintended separate departments. Mr. Williams, a plain-spoken man of business, ordered all the concerns of the retail shop, and, indeed, occasionally served in it himself. He was a man of strict regularity and precision, and shared the labors of the business with the same degree of perseverance and punctuality as he expected from the persons he employed. It was he, therefore, who most noticed and suffered most inconvenience from the extreme inattention to his duties which George Selden continually showed. About a week after the events we have narrated, he entered his partner's office, to consult him about discharging so troublesome an assistant.

"Why, really," said Mr. Webb, "I wish you would try him a little longer. I wonder what effect a severe lecture will have upon him?"

"I can tell you without trying it. I have talked to him till I am tired. It has not the least effect.—In fact, I believe he looks upon what I say with contempt. See, here is a bundle of his rubbish which I found hidden in a drawer. Every now and then he steals to the desk to scribble and add to the heap."

Mr. Williams produced several quires of paper, every page closely covered with writing.

"So," said Mr. Webb, taking the manuscript, and smiling as he opened it; "a tragedy, I declare. In blank verse, too. Well, though I dare say you will smile at my proposition, I will take it home with me, and look it over this evening."

"But what good will that do? It will not correct the mistakes he so continually makes in the invoices, nor make him more punctual in his attendance at the shop."

"That may be," replied Mr. Webb; "but the truth is, I take a more than common interest in this young man. You remember that, when I used to go the western journeys, I often spoke to you about a certain John Cooper of Daleton?"

"To be sure; he was one of our best customers, at least in the matter of punctual payment. His money used to come up as regularly, on quarter-days, as clock-work."

"True; but, with all his honesty, he was unfortunate, and died, leaving his widow and daughter almost destitute. George Selden, an orphan, was his apprentice, and appearing to be an intelligent lad, I placed him in our shop. He is young and inexperienced, and I am loath to turn him out on the wide world of London, without trying every means to make him suit us better. He is a great fool, I admit. Unfortunately for her, he is in love with his late master's daughter; and Mrs. Webb has engaged her as governess to our children. Now, if he would only remain steady and attentive to business, they might very soon get married, and it would be their own fault if they were not happy."

"All very pretty and romantic, I dare say; but I tell you what, Webb," replied Williams, shaking his head, "though a first-rate philanthropist, you are a deuced bad grocer. Well, I suppose I must put up with the lad till you reform him, or consent to my turning him away."

The usual summons of "Wanted, please, sir," attracted Mr. Williams into the shop.

George Selden had recently become acquainted with a set of men of similar literary propensities, who had formed themselves into a society for the purpose of producing to the public their own works. All of them had written tragedies which had precisely the same catastrophes;—they had been rejected by the managers. By mutual flattery, they had impressed each other with the idea that they were great but ill-treated geniuses; that it was their duty to the public not to allow it to be longer defrauded of their tragic sublimities. They therefore proposed to take a theatre of their own, and to cause their works to blaze upon the world, to the utter confusion and ruin of managers.

It was only the night before that Selden attended one of their meetings. From a fair copy of his own four acts, (the rough draft of which had got into his master's hands) he read portions of his drama. His audience professed to be in raptures; for it was a principle of theirs to receive the works of their fellows with great applause, that their own lucubrations might, out of gratitude, be equally well received in turn.

Consequently, the next morning, Selden, having arrived at the shop, fastened on his apron with more than ordinary distaste. That he, the author of four acts of a tragedy, the reading of which had been received with such enthusiasm, should be obliged to wear what he considered a badge of servitude, "cut him," to use one of his own tragic expressions, "to the inmost soul." He was out of humor with his shopmates, and treated them with more than usual superciliousness. Indeed this was a fault which made him many enemies. His companions had no sublime visitations of poetry; their minds did not soar above their business, and for that reason he looked down upon them as an inferior order of beings. To-day, therefore, he was mounted higher than ever upon stilts, and handled the tea, the sugar, and even the cash, with the utmost contempt for such grovelling articles. The consequence was, that he made more errors than usual. He cast accounts falsely, gave wrong change, and supplied those customers with pounds of soap who had asked for pounds of sugar. Perhaps it was lucky for his employers that they had granted him a half holiday, which he had solicited, to change his private residence.

Although scarcely more than a week had elapsed since he received Bessie Cooper and her mother with such rapture, yet he was already so tired of, and affronted with them, that he could not reside under the same roof. He would not subject himself to the advice which Mrs. Cooper had "presumed," as he said, to give him. Bessie, too, was, he was persuaded, a common-place sort of girl, after all; and he could not think of throwing away his affections any longer upon a young woman who had actually entreated him to abandon his high imaginings, and to devote himself more closely to business. No; the being who would win his heart, must have a soul to sympathize with the loftiest flights of poetic genius. Bessie was a clever, exemplary girl, to be sure; but not the girl for George Selden. To lessen, therefore, the poor creature's sufferings for the loss of so estimable a lover, he determined to leave the house. Besides, he wished to get nearer to his new friends, the unacted dramatists.

When he next appeared at business, he was ordered to go into the counting-house. The first thing which caught his eye was his manuscript lying on the table before Mr. Webb. As he had not missed it from its hiding-place, he wondered how it got there; but that was soon explained.

"I have sent for you, Selden," began Mr. Webb, "to say that complaints are so constantly made of your inattention to and carelessness in business, that, unless you can manage to alter your conduct, you must seek another situation."

"Very well, sir," said the genius, with an air that was meant to express a total indifference as to whether he went or stayed.

"Perhaps you wish to go?" remarked the master.

"I certainly do find my situation here extremely incompatible with my feelings."

"Then there is an end to the affair," returned Mr. Webb; "on Saturday next you will leave us."

"Very good, sir."

"You take the matter so coolly," continued Mr. Webb, "I presume you have provided yourself with a better place, or, at all events, with one where you are to have higher wages?"

"Quite the contrary," answered the genius, utterly disgusted with some of his master's expressions; "I do not intend to take another situation, and if I did, salary is always with me a secondary consideration."

Although Mr. Webb had read the tragedy, and was prepared for almost any degree of folly from its author, he hardly anticipated such decided infatuation. He felt a kind of terror at the fate which the young man was drawing down upon himself.

"A word or two before we part," he said. "Mr. Williams found this manuscript of yours. I have read it"——

Selden's eyes sparkled. He expected a flattering eulogy would follow. "I read it with this view; I saw that you were rendering yourself totally unfit for a business life, and hoped to discover in your poem germs of such talent as would justify me in encouraging you to cultivate it. In this I was totally disappointed. I can see that you have mistaken incoherent rhapsody for power, and the ravings of an unhealthy imagination for poetry. You are evidently ignorant of the first rudiments of literary art."

George, who was fast losing his temper, murmured something about "genius being superior to art."

"That remark," continued the master, "proves your slight acquaintance with either. Without art, genius is useless. However great a man's genius may be, it is only by studying the means of making it intelligible to others, that he can prove he possesses it. Devoid of this kind of application and industry, genius itself is a curse. It fills the mind with that dangerous vanity which breeds a contempt for all useful employment; it makes a real merit of personal sloth, and deems a reprehensible dislike of business the evidence of superior ability. It corrodes the best feelings with constant disappointment; for the untutored and unstudied genius is filled with a desire for fame, and he never obtains it because he will not take the proper means. In the words of a clever essayist, 'he pants for the prize, but will not struggle in the race.'"

The genius was getting impatient at being thus lectured by a mere tradesman, and wished to end the discussion by remarking, "At all events, I find business and literature quite incompatible."

"Doubtless, because you have not sufficient industry to cultivate both at the same time. But that has not been the case with many of our finest geniuses. Sir Walter Scott, a most voluminous author, is a punctual man of business. Being one of the clerks in the Court of Session in Edinburgh, he might be seen laboring in that certainly prosaic vocation day after day, with little intermission. Charles Lamb, as a clerk in the East India House, passed the greater part of his life at the desk. One of our most esteemed poets was a keen and clever banker.—Indeed, I could mention a hundred instances of men in business passing their leisure hours in literary pursuits, without interference, in the smallest degree, with their daily avocations. You, however, are unable to bring your fancied genius to the low level of trade or useful occupation. And I can only say, that I look upon your future career with extreme apprehension."

It must be remarked, that, with all their high-souled resolves, geniuses of Selden's stamp are generally great cowards. Though he longed to combat Mr. Webb's opinions—though he burned for a wordy revenge upon notions so directly opposed to those of the select society of unacted dramatists—he did not dare to open his mouth, but took his manuscript tragedy, and left the office with an air of extreme sheepishness.

He was not long in unburthening himself; for, in the evening, he deigned a visit to the Coopers. Had he been anything but a pseudo-genius, his heart would have smote him for the care-worn pale cheeks of Bessie. When he entered the room, he found her busily employed with several sheets of paper, which were covered with figures. Her mother was knitting by the fire. Bessie arose, and tried to greet him with cheerfulness, but the effort brought tears into her eyes, and she again bent over her calculations.

"Well," said George, with a flippant sort of gaiety peculiar to persons of his character, "I have got quit of Williams' and Webb's confounded drudgery at last."

"You surely have not left your situation, George?" inquired Mrs. Cooper anxiously.

"Indeed but I have though. On Saturday I shall be a free man—free to work out the glorious destiny which lies before me."

Bessie laid down her pencil, and turned towards Selden a look so full of grief that it almost amounted to despair. The genius, however, did not, or would not, notice it.

"By the by," he resumed, "let me tell you a good joke. I can hardly help laughing. Only think; Webb, the grocer, the dealer in figs, actually took upon himself to lecture me about literature! It really was rich to hear him. Such nonsense, too, as he talked. Of course nothing else could be expected; for what can he know about poetry? a fellow that sticks himself behind his desk from Monday morning till Saturday night all the year round; and, as to literature, never, I suppose, went beyond Watts' hymns or Scott's novels. I might have minded his lecture had he been any great literary man, who really knew what he was talking about, such as Byron or Moore, or the wonderful genius who has lately burst forth under the assumed name of 'Alpha;' but a common place tradesman—psha!"

George looked around for some marks of assent or approbation for this fine oration; but his manner and discourse had filled the hearts of his hearers too full of grief, to enable either of them to speak. "Phoo," he said to himself; "I am talking Greek to these people. I ought to have known they have no ideas above knitting stockings and adding up sums. I am afraid I am intruding," he ejaculated, finding the silence continued: "I only just dropped in to ask how Bessie got on with Webb's wife?"

"Most comfortably," replied Mrs. Cooper. "Besides teaching the children, Mr. Webb, hearing she was clever at figures, gives her accounts to do at home. You see we are both very busy."

"Ha, ha! I see," replied Selden, rising; "I can take a hint. Well, good-bye; if you read the public prints, you'll hear of me soon in a way that will astonish you. Good-bye!"

As George Selden descended the stairs, he could not help accusing himself of cruelty to that unhappy girl. "But really it cannot be helped. Pity she has no soul—poor thing," murmured the genius, as he slammed the street door.

During the following week, Mr. George Selden having become a gentleman at large, revelled in all the luxuries of laziness and literature. He lay in bed till twelve o'clock every day, and having performed the duties of the toilet (which were now rather onerous, for his long hair took a great deal of brushing,) he sallied forth to a neighboring coffee-shop, where he could read the papers and magazines over his breakfast. He then lounged to the lodging of some new literary friend, to talk sublimity and poetical metaphysics. At length he went to the theatre to criticise the play, and to condemn it, as infinitely inferior to his own tragedy; or else to attend a debating club he had joined. But he never missed a meeting of the select society of unacted dramatists.

Meantime he became a traitor to the cause of the unacted drama, for he secretly sent his play to one of the managers, feeling assured that its acceptance and production would follow as a matter of course. It was, however, decreed, that with all the intention of being a renegade, he was still to remain, in reality, true to the unacted cause; for his play was sent back in about a month, with a very decided negative.—While musing upon the extreme stupidity of a manager who did not know his own interest, Selden received a note from Messrs. Williams and Webb, desiring his immediate attendance upon them. The dignity of the genius was much damaged by the peremptory terms in which the missive was couched, and he determined to show the senders what was due to a literary character. He therefore sent back the following note, written upon polished post, and enclosed in an elegant envelope:—

"Mr. George Selden presents his compliments to Messrs. Williams and Webb, and begs to state that his literary avocations prevent him from attending upon them at present."

About this period the "Alpha" before-mentioned was making a great sensation in the reading world as a magazine-writer and poet. Indeed his talents procured for him the honourable patronage of George Selden's debating club, and one of their subjects of discussion was "The literary capabilities of Alpha, with reference to a comparison between modern and ancient genius." Selden dressed himself with peculiar care, for on that evening ladies were to be admitted to hear the debate. His collar was turned carefully down in imitation of the Byron portraits. A large pin was fastened into his stock, which, with his silk waistcoat and long hair, gave him, he thought, rather a distinguished appearance. Before, however, he could leave his lodging, it was intimated that a person wished to see him. That person immediately made his appearance, and having shut the door, sat down near it.

"Your name is George Selden, I believe?" said the stranger.

"It is. What is your pleasure?"

"I am sorry to say that I hold a warrant against you."

Selden trembled, and turned pale. "A warrant?" he faltered out.

"Yes," continued the police officer, rising and touching the wretched young man's arm; "you are my prisoner."

Unable to speak, or to inquire with what he was charged, Selden was half led, half dragged, into a cab, which awaited them in the street. Arrived at the Station-House, he heard the charge made to the inspector. He was accused of embezzling a sum of money, the property of his late employers, and suspected of further defalcations.

After passing the night in a cheerless cell, stung and tortured by the most bitter and humiliating reflections, George Selden was the next morning placed as a felon at the bar of one of the City Police Offices. His wan, haggard countenance, contrasted painfully with the gaudy finery in which he was attired. His appearance was not calculated to operate in his favour—for the style of his dress led to inferences by which the wretched expression of his countenance was accounted for, not so much from mental anguish, as from dissipation.

Mr. Williams appeared as prosecutor. It was proved that since Selden left his employment, one of the customers of the firm, on receiving his account, discovered that a sum of thirty odd pounds, with which he was charged, was previously paid. On calling at the shop to rectify the error, he produced the receipt, to which the name of George Selden was attached. He also proved that he paid the money to Selden, no other person being near at the time.—Messrs. Williams and Webb's cash-keeper, when put into the witness box, swore that the prisoner had never handed over to him the sum mentioned in the charge; as it was his duty when he received it. To this direct evidence, other circumstances of a criminatory nature were added. It was shown that Selden evinced a desire to quit his situation on the day after he received the money; that he had previously left a humble for a more elegant lodging; that he had, since resigning his employment, been living at a somewhat expensive rate; that, when sent for, he forwarded an impertinent refusal to see his late employers; and finally, it was inferred that he supported his extravagancies out of the proceeds of the frauds committed on his employers.

While this evidence was accumulating, the unfortunate young man seemed overwhelmed with shame. By the time it was concluded, his frame trembled violently with agitation; he became ashy pale; and when asked what defence he had to make to the accusation, he was unable to speak. His silence was construed into a reservation of his defence for another tribunal, and he was forthwith committed to Newgate, to take his trial at the ensuing session of the Central Criminal Court.

When George Selden told Mrs. Cooper and her daughter they would most likely hear of him in the newspapers, he little thought how soon and how fatally that likelihood would become realized. The morning after his commitment, the woman of the house in which the Coopers lived, entered their room pale and agitated, bringing with her a newspaper containing a report of her former lodger's examination. The shock which the news communicated to Bessie was terrible. She sunk upon her mother's neck, uttering cries of grief, that were for a time heart-rending. When the violence of her sorrow had somewhat abated, she sat down in a chair, rocking backward and forward, her hands clasped over her knees, in apparent stupor—a picture of mute despair.

It is a characteristic of some women, that, while they evince in the ordinary affairs of existence the most timid and retiring temperament, they are capable, in circumstances of difficulty and danger, of invincible energy. It was thus with Bessie Cooper.—Instead of stupor (of which she exhibited outward signs), she was employed in deep thought. A conviction, which, though totally unsupported, was still a conviction, assured her of George's innocence, and added a strength of resolve and determination of manner quite new to her character. She rose from her seat as if from a sleep, and taking up the newspaper, read the report with the utmost attention.

"With all his faults and flightiness," said Mrs. Cooper, "I cannot believe him guilty. Your father has often trusted him with all he possessed in the world without a suspicion."

The landlady, hitherto a silent actor in the distressing scene, here put in her testimony to the punctuality of her late lodger's payments; a test of morality deemed by London lodging-house keepers perfectly infallible.

That day Bessie Cooper did not attend at Mr. Webb's private house as usual to instruct his children; but, accompanied by her mother, went to his place of business. She entered his counting-house alone.—Mr. Webb received her with great surprise, but with a melancholy expression of kindness, which showed how deeply he sympathised with her sufferings. At the same time he was struck with the calm firmness of her manner. She stated her errand without circumlocution: she wished an order to be procured to see the culprit in Newgate.

As may be expected, Mr. Webb was astonished at this request. The young woman's manner, so earnest, almost dignified, forbade the supposition that the wish arose from a mere girlish desire to see and converse with a lover. He inquired her reason for so strange a request.

"Because, sir, I know he is innocent," was the reply.

"Indeed? I am sure I need not say how happy I should be if any fresh facts could be brought to light to stem the strong current of evidence which has set in against him."

"I have no such facts," replied Bessie, "but I have known him from childhood; we grew, were brought up together, and"——here her utterance was choked by rising tears; "and I am convinced he is incapable of what is charged to him. I wish to see him, to learn the exact circumstances of the transaction concerning which he is suspected."

There was something so rational and business-like in all this, that Mr. Webb immediately sent to the sitting alderman for the required order, and Bessie and her mother were soon on their way to the gloomy mansion of crime.

They entered the prison, and were ushered by the turnkey into a narrow passage, one side of which consisted of strong and closely-placed iron bars, the other of a dead wall. Behind the bars there was a small yard, with a door leading into a kind of cell at the extremity of it. Selden, who had hardly recovered from the shock of his commitment, saw with amazement who had come to console him in his affliction. he covered his face with his hands and wept like a child.

Bessie, knowing how much depended upon firmness and an unclouded brain, entreated him to be calm. She then questioned him minutely about the transactions of the day on which the money he was accused of embezzling was paid. She emplored him to tax his memory to the utmost, so as to tell her everything that happened on that morning. He could, however, recollect nothing which tended in the least degree to unravel the mystery; for Bessie, with a woman's confiding faith, never for one instant assumed his guilt.

"The most trifling incident," she said, "might afford some clue. Did you serve no customer that morning, or receive payment of any other account?"

"All I can remember is, that Sir Charles Fox's butler came to complain of a mistake I had made in his invoice; that he left it to be corrected; and that I afterwards made out a new one, having lost the original."

No gleam of hope entered Bessie's mind from these words. She dared not stay to converse on any other subject, for had she done so, her energies would have forsaken her. But it was terrible, when they would have shaken hands, to find the iron bars impeded even the poor consolation of that simple act; and in leaving the prison, Bessie was obliged to lean heavily on her mother for support.

It was not long before she again presented herself to Mr. Webb; she had a new favor to ask, a stranger one even than the first; it was to be allowed to see the cash-keeper and his entries for the day upon which George's accusation was founded. Mr. Webb assented at once.

"I know you already," he remarked, "for a ready and clever accountant, and will give you every possible assistance. Johnson," he continued, calling aloud, "come here, and bring your daily cash-book."

The cashier appeared. The book was handed to Bessie, who turned to the account in which the transactions of the day named in the indictment of George for embezzlement was recorded. Item by item she read over the various entries. At last she saw that a sum precisely the same in amount as that for which her lover was incarcerated for stealing, was placed to the account of Sir Charles Fox, whom George had before mentioned. She instantly asked the cashier whether Sir Charles Fox's account had been recently sent in.

The clerk replied in the negative.

"Then," said Bessie, "I entreat you to send one immediately."

Though Mr. Webb and the clerk were at a loss to conceive the object of applying to Sir Charles Fox, the request was complied with. While the clerk was gone on this errand, Bessie's agitation and suspense became almost insupportable. Firmly persuaded of Selden's innocence of everything but of contempt for, and carelessness in, his duties, she had a strong presentiment that the error he committed would be cleared up by the step now taken. Still she was not without her fears, and those fears were to be confirmed or banished by the result of the clerk's mission. She saw him enter the shop on his return. As he opened the glass door of the counting-house, she darted her eyes upon him, as if her whole fate were written in his countenance. But she learned nothing there. The cashier was a rigid man of business, and his face was a blank. "The fact is," he said to Mr. Webb, "there is some mistake. We have credited Sir Charles Fox with thirty pounds fifteen and fourpence, which he declares he has never paid."

A short chain of thought darted through Bessie's brain. Its results caused her to murmur, "he is saved," and to faint in her chair.

Had not her mother been by, poor Bessie would have been left to her fate, for Mr. Webb's whole attention was otherwise absorbed. Mr. Williams was called in; cash books, journals, and ledgers were turned over, entries traced; and before Bessie recovered her senses, the whole thing was cleared up. Selden was innocent. The truth is, he had received money from one customer and placed it to the account of another, during one of his poetical fits of abstraction. This fully showed how his name got placed to a receipt for money which he seemed not to have accounted for. Further inquiries were made, and it was found that he had saved out of his wages, the money so improvidently spent in fine lodgings and fine clothes. It happened that the grand jury were then sitting; all these new facts were sworn before them; they ignored the bill, and George Selden was restored to liberty.

About two months after these events, a newly married couple were seated in Mr. Webb's private office, attentively listening to what that gentleman was saying.

"Not long ago," he said, addressing himself to the bridegroom, "you heard my advice with impatience, almost contempt, because you then looked upon me as a mere mechanical man of business. That you may be more attentive to what I shall now say, and that you may know it is possible for a tradesman to be unremitting in his duties, and, at the same time, employ his leisure with success in literature, let me now inform you that the 'Alpha?' whom you were pleased, as I have heard, to patronise with your approbation, is no other than myself. You have already been taught by her who, happily for you, is now your companion for life, the superior value of common sense and practical acquirements, over what goes by the name, oftener than it deserves it, of 'genius.' To her you owe all your happiness."

George Selden, for he was one of the persons addressed, tried to speak, but tearful emotions prevented him. He firmly clasped the willing hand of his wife, and looked towards her to speak for him. But her heart, also, was full. They both wept tears of happiness. Mr. Webb, but for a strong effort, would have exhibited some emotion, but turned it off by asking what had become of the tragedy? George owned, without the smallest appearance of regret, that he had burnt it.

That evening there was a grand supper in the shop, prepared under the superintendence of Mrs. Cooper, who had been installed as housekeeper to the establishment. Her daughter, now Mrs. Selden, had had the privilege of inviting any person she pleased; and besides all the men and their female friends belonging to the house, Mr. Williams, Mr. Webb, and Bessie's pupils, graced the soiree with their presence.

The last I heard of George Selden was, that he is a partner in the firm of Williams and Company, and a livery-man of the city of London. Though he did not wholly abandon literature, he never, that I could ascertain, published a line of poetry. His most popular works are entitled, "An Essay on Foreign Exchanges," and a pamphlet on "Colonial Produce."

THE DYING DAUGHTER

TO HER MOTHER.

Mother! when these unsteady lines
  Thy long averted eyes shall see,
This hand that writes, this heart that pines,
  Will cold, quite cold, and tranquil be.
That guilty child, so long disowned,
  Can then, blest thought! no more offend!
And shouldst thou doem my, crimes atoned,
  O deign my orphan to befriend—

That orphan, who, with trembling hand,
  To thee will give my dying prayer;
Canst thou my dying prayer withstand,
  And from my child withhold thy care?
O raise the veil which hides her cheek,
  Nor stare her mother's face to see—
But let her look thy love bespeak,
  For once that face was dear to thee.

Gaze on—and thou'lt perchance forget
  The long, the mournful lapse of years,
Thy couch with tears of anguish wet,
  And e'en the guilt which caused those tears;
And in my pure and artless child,
  Thou'lt think her mother meets thy view,
Such as she was when life first smiled,
  And guilt by name alone she knew.

Ah! then I see thee o'er her charms
  A look of fond affection cast;
I see thee clasp her in thine arms,
  And in the present lose the past.
But soon the dear illusion flies;
  The sad reality returns;
My crimes again to memory rise,
  And ah! in vain my orphan mourns.

Till suddenly some keen remorse,
  Some deep regret her claims shall aid,
For wrath that held too long its course,
  For words of peace too long delayed,
For pardon (most, alas! denied,
  When pardon might have snatched from shame,)
And kindness, had thou kindness, tried,
  Had checked my guilt, and saved my fame.

And then thou'lt wish, as I do now,
  Thy hand my humble bed had smoothed,
Wiped the still moisture off my brow,
  And all the wants of sickness soothed.
For oh! the means to soothe my pain,
  My poverty has still denied;
And thou wilt wish, ah! wish in vain,
  Thy riches had those means supplied.

Thou'lt wish, with keen repentance wrung,
  I'd closed my eyes upon thy breast—
Expiring, while thy faltering tongue,
  Pardon in kindest tones expressed.
O, sounds which I must never hear!
  Through years of woe my fond desire!
O, mother! spite of all most dear,
  Must I, unblest by thee, expire?

Thy love alone I call to mind,
  And all thy past disdain forget;
Each keen reproach, each frown unkind,
  That crushed my hopes when last we met.
But when I saw that angry brow,
  Both health and youth were still my own;
Oh, mother! couldst thou see me now,
  Thou wouldst not have the heart to frown!

But see! my orphan's cheek displays
  Both youth and health's carnation dyes,
Such as, on mine, in happier days,
  So fondly charmed thy partial eyes;
Grief o'er her bloom a veil now draws;
  Grief her loved parent's pangs to see;
And when thou think'st upon the cause,
  That paleness will have charms for thee.

And thou wilt fondly press that cheek,
  Bid happiness its bloom restore;
And thus in tenderest accents speak,
  "Sweet orphan, thou shalt mourn no more."
But wilt thou thus indulgent be?
  Oh! am I not by hope beguiled?
The long, long anger shown to me,
  Say, will it not pursue my child?
And must she suffer for my crime?
  Ah! no; forbid it, gracious Heaven!
And grant, O grant! in thy good time,
  That she be loved, and I forgiven!

TRAVELLING ALONE.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TAILOR'S APPRENTICE."

"Isn't it too much!" ejaculated Mrs. Austin, tossing a note from her which she had just opened and read, while her face expressed strongly both disappointment and vexation. "Here I've waited for more than a week for company to New York, and now Mr. Barker, who was to have taken me under his care, has gone off without me. It is really too bad, and I am dying to get home."

"Has Mr. Barker really gone without you?" asked Mrs. Martier, a friend with whom Mrs. Austin had been spending a short time in Philadelphia. "How in the world has that happened?"

"Here's a note from him, in which he says that just as the line was about starting this morning, he received intelligence from home which made it necessary that he should leave instantly. He expresses regret, and all that—but he might have staid another day as easily as not, I am sure. What matter could a day have made in any case?"

"It might have been of great consequence to him, Mrs. Austin. But he is gone, now, and it can't be helped. It is said to be a bad wind that blows nobody good. I shall have your company for a few days longer. So, I need not complain."

"Yes, but Mrs. Martier, I am, as I said, dying to get home. You know how badly I want to see my husband and children."

"Another opportunity will no doubt offer in a few days."

"There isn't a bit of certainty in that. Even if there should be a chance, something will turn up, as it has this time, to disappoint me."

"You can go alone, then, if the worst comes to the worst."

"Go alone!" exclaimed Mrs. Austin, in profound surprise.

"Certainly. And why not?" returned the friend.

"Go alone! I'm astonished to hear you say so."

"Ladies often go alone between this city and New York."

"Not ladies, certainly. No lady would think of taking such a journey without an escort."

"Yes, ladies!" returned Mrs. Martier.

"Who, pray, would do so imprudent a thing?"

"I have done so more than once."

"You! I'm astonished!" The expression of Mrs. Austin's countenance showed that she spoke truly.

"Certainly."

"And were you not annoyed and insulted by vulgar and impudent people?"

"Never. Alone, upon the deck or in the cabin of a steamboat, I have been as politely treated by strangers as in a friend's drawing-room; and far more so than in many public assemblies, surrounded by the elite and the fashionable."

"Incredible!"

"Yet true, nevertheless. Why, even carping, snarling, ill-natured English travellers, have recorded the fact so honorable to the people of this country, that a lady may travel in the United States from Maine to Louisiana, unattended by a male friend, and never once be insulted in a stage, on a steamboat, or in a rail road car."

At this stage of the conversation, Mr. Martier, the husband of the last speaker, came in.

"What do you think, dear?" said his wife. "Mrs. Austin is afraid to travel between here and New York, alone."

"Afraid? And why so, Mrs. Austin?"

"I should be liable to insult."

"O no! I've travelled a good deal in my time, and have yet to see the first instance of a lady being insulted. A woman is as secure from insult in a rail road car, or steamboat, as in her own parlor. The attention paid to ladies who are travelling alone, is proverbial. On board of steamboats, they are particularly attended to by the captain. In rail road cars, the conductor looks to their comfort, and sees that no one annoys them; and a 'lone lady' in a stage coach, is under the especial care of each male passenger, and all vie in showing her courteous attentions. But let me relate a single incident which came under my own eye.

"A few years ago, I had business in Ohio. In returning, I came home by the way of Pittsburg. On leaving that city early one morning, I found that my fellow-passengers were two in number. From their conversation, I discovered that I had, as companions for my journey, two of the most vulgar, obscene, blasphemous men, it had ever been my lot to meet. Their conversation was licentious, their language coarse and filthy, and nearly every other word was an oath, an imprecation, or some startling appeal to the Great Ruler above, that really made my flesh creep. Occasionally a word was addressed to me. I never replied beyond a mere monosyllable, for I was too much disgusted with their language to be even civil to them. From the time we started till we got to Greensburg, which was several hours, they talked incessantly,—and I am sure, that during that time, there were not uttered five consecutive words that could have been spoke in a lady's presence, without grossly offending her. By this time, I had learned from their conversation that one was a merchant from Alabama, and the other a planter from Mississippi. This fact surprised me. Is it possible, I said to myself, that men moving in the society of merchants and planters, can really be so lost to all decency and virtue as these men appear to be?

"At Greensburg, much to my regret, a lady way-passenger took her seat in the stage. 'Here comes trouble now,' I said to myself. 'Of course, it will not be ten minutes before this lady is grossly insulted by their offensive language, and I cannot sit by in silence. If they insult her I must interfere, and in all probability get a bowie knife into me for my pains.'

"Thus thought I, as the most vulgar and obscene of my two fellow-passengers took his seat beside the lady in quite a familiar style, though with a degree of respect and gentlemanly deportment that I could not help noticing with surprise. The driver spoke to his horses, and away we rolled again, I expecting every moment to be called upon to interfere for the protection of the lady. But no such unpleasant necessity occurred. From the moment the lady entered the stage, my companions were changed men. They uttered no word, nor made any allusion that might not have been spoken in a drawing-room. To her, their attentions were kind and respectful, actually putting my frigid politeness to the blush. At every stopping place, one or the other would volunteer to hand a glass of water, or procure her some choice fruit; and this not to show off, as any one could have seen, but from, as it appeared, a habit of treating ladies, at all times, with attention and respectful consideration. For four hours our lady passenger remained with us, and during that time not once did the two men forget themselves. When the stage stopped at the village to which she was going, one of them took her bandbox in his hand, and waited upon her to her residence, which stood at some distance from the stage office. Upon all this I looked with silent surprise. I could hardly believe it possible that men could act perfectly in two characters so opposite. I was no less surprised, when we again took our seats in the coach, to hear the man who had just waited upon the lady home, compose himself for his ride with a foul expression falling from his tongue, in the most natural way possible. From that moment, both resumed their old character, which was continued for several hours, when a little girl, about eleven years old, was placed in the coach to go ten miles. Her presence changed them instantly. Not an indelicate word was uttered, nor an oath sworn while she remained with us. On the contrary, the subjects of conversation were changed, and much of it directed to the child, from whom one of them drew, ingeniously, a history of herself and an account of her school companions. When she left us, the old character was resumed. And these alternations continued throughout the journey."

"This, Mrs. Austin, is a strong but true instance of the respect and attention paid to females when travelling alone in this country. If even in a stage-coach their feelings and character are so much respected, how less liable are they to insult in the cabin of a steamboat, or in the commodious rail-road car?"

But Mrs. Austin could not be convinced. Day after day, however, passed away, and she could get no escort. And finally, she became so impatient to get home, that she actually ventured upon the perils of a journey, unattended, between the cities of Philadelphia and New York. Mr. Martier took the passage for her, attended her over to Camden, saw to her baggage, and procured her a pleasant seat in the cars. When he bade her good-by, her hand trembled and she looked pale and uneasy. He could hardly help smiling in her face at her weakness and timidity.

"All aboard," was soon uttered, and away she went, feeling as much like a cat in a strange garret as well could be, considering the difference of relation between a lady and a cat, and a rail-road car and an attic. Before and behind her sat gentlemen from whom she expected every moment to receive some insult. But after riding some twenty miles, she began to breathe more freely, as one of them once or twice during that time addressed a few polite words to her, and seemed quite disposed to regard her lone condition, and relieve its embarrassments as much as possible. After passing Bordentown, this individual resumed his attention, though with that reserved politeness which marked him as a gentleman. Mrs. Austin was a woman of education and intelligence; the remarks in answer to his, soon enabled him to appreciate her, and so to choose his subjects of conversation as to draw her out and enable her to take a fair part in the conversation. This she soon did, and so much interested did she became, that she forgot all attending disagreeable things, and looked up with surprise when the cars stopped at Amboy.

In descending from the cars, the gentleman who had been conversing with her, assisted her, and then gave her his arm and politely attended her to the boat. The remainder of the journey was passed in a most agreeable manner. The stranger had two or three very gentlemanly and intelligent friends who joined him on the boat and these were informally introduced to Mrs. Austin, around whom they gathered, charmed with her conversation, and in their turn delighting her with theirs.

When the boat touched the wharf, at New York, the lady's husband stepped on board, and received his wife, with a polite bow and smile upon her gentlemanly volunteer-attendant.

"And so you have really accomplished this most unheard-of task," Mr. Austin said, smiling.—"Most thankful am I to receive you safe and sound from the perils of your journey. Who ever heard before of a lady travelling alone between New York and Philadelphia? But you had an escort I recollect. Who in the world introduced you to Governor ——?"

"Governor ——!" exclaimed the lady in surprise. "Was that Governor ——?"

"Certainly it was! Who put you under his charge?"

"No one. He sat near me in the cars, and seeing that I was alone, volunteered the most polite attentions. But I never could have believed that Governor ——— would have paid attentions to a lady travelling alone."

"Governor ——— is a man of too much good sense to see anything disreputable in a lady's sometimes taking a journey unattended by a male friend, and too much observation and knowledge of people to mistake the character of any one he may happen to meet even in a rail-road car. But welcome home again. Another time I shall not consent to you going to any place on a visit from which you are afraid to return, even unattended by Governor ——."

The May-Day of Drumallis;

OR,

A TALE OF THE PRESS-GANG.

BY DR. McHENRY.

Chapter I.

Thank Heaven! that miserable niggardliness of time, preached by the wisdom-mongers of the modern utilitarian school of economists, which would render life a wearisome scene of "all work and no play" to that most deserving portion of society whose hands have to perform its principal labours, has not yet, at least in Ireland, succeeded in abolishing all those cheering anniversary pastimes in which our ancestors delighted. On Hallow-Eve the village boys still cause the streets and the highways to ring with unrestrained and boisterous mirth, while the gleesome noise of even the most rustic maidens, within doors, over their swimming apples, or burning nuts, proclaims, that for that evening, labour has ceased to oppress the children of toil, and the cares of life to annoy even the haunts of penury. Christmas has its athletic games for the robust peasant of the plain, and its relaxing festivities for the more delicate but not less toil-tired citizen of the town.

But it is the season of spring which chiefly inspires joyousness. Easter-Monday has been for ages a day of rampant idleness, and forgetfulness of care, in which young hearts rejoice in unison with the dawn of nature; and the first of May, in the rural districts, throughout all Ireland, awakens a universal manifestation of delight in the advanced loveliness and geniality of the season, and, according to immemorial custom, calls forth the merry groupes, to gambols on the green, or dances round the Maypole.

If, even in this age of economy, the calculators of the money-value of hours and minutes, have not been able very sensibly to diminish the ardour with which our younger classes rush from labour to enjoyment on those favourite holidays, it will be readily supposed that sixty years ago, when utilitarianism was in comparative infancy, they had done still less to check the joyous excitements felt at those periods of annual pastime.

It was on the first of May, 1778, that an assemblage of the younger and gayer classes of the population of Larne and its vicinity, met in the field of Drumallis, near the sea-coast, a short distance to the eastward of the town, in order, according to the ancient custom of the country, to celebrate the day which their ancestors in the age of Draidism, had dedicated to the great luminary whose invigorating rays did then, as they do still, call forth the peculiar beauty, and inspire the peculiar joyousness of the blooming season.

The field of Drumallis is situated in the centre of one of the loveliest landscapes in nature. But I shall defer further notice of it at present, that I may introduce to the reader an object still more lovely—the beautiful Rose Gilbert. She was the only child of a farmer in comfortable circumstances. Her mother had died in her infancy, and her father had remained a widower, "never," as he often said, "having seen the woman whom he thought worthy to fill the place of Ellen Tweed," that having been the maiden name of his deceased wife. The affections of John Gilbert, indeed, after the death of his wife, became so entirely concentrated on his little Rose, that he could command none to place on any other object. To nurse and watch over this beloved child, he employed a good-hearted, somewhat elderly maiden cousin, named Jenny Heddles, whom he placed over his household affairs, and whose managing and orderly house-wifery, and affectionate attention to Rose, were indeed such as to leave him no cause to wish for a connubial helpmate.

Jenny was, in truth, so doatingly fond of Rose, that she considered her safety and comfort as the most important matters to be cared for in this world. If little Rose cut her finger, or struck her head against a table, Jenny was in a bustle of consternation for days together, and would for years make the time of the accident a date from which to calculate other occurrences. This over-fondness of father and nurse, was attended with indulgences which threatened to spoil both the temper and the constitution of Rose. But she possessed from nature a soundness of frame and a happiness of temper, which defied the enervating effects of pampering kindness, and prevented ever-ready compliances with childish wishes from engendering impatience or imperiousness of mind. It is true that during her childhood and early girlhood, she was occasionally self-willed and stubborn, on which occasions, although her father would sometimes reprimand her, Jenny Heddles would always soothe her, and when practicable, would comply with her wishes. When Rose, however, became able to bring reflection to the aid of her naturally good disposition, she saw the evils of indulging irritable feelings, and the ungenerousness of giving pain to such a tender father and affectionate nurse. It is true, that as she dawned into womanhood, some traces of her girlish self-willedness were still traceable in the vivacity, wildness, and fearlessness of her manner, which, however, being regulated and restrained by the dictales of strong good sense, never ran to excess, and instead of being offensive, only imparted a slight tinge of eccentricity, which her natural gracefulness converted into a personal charm.

Such was Rose Gilbert, when, at the age of seventeen, she became the inspirer of many a young man's dream of connubial happiness. Jenny Heddles was at first proud of the conquests she saw her favourite making. But this feeling soon became mixed with considerable solicitude; for Jenny, knew, from experience, the dangerous softness which, at the first opening into womanhood, seizes the female heart; and, in proportion as the society of Rose became courted, the vigilance of Jenny increased, and was sometimes exerted, as Rose thought, with unnecessary anxiety and watchfulness.

Among the many competitors for the heart of Rose, there were two young men who surpassed the rest in the fervour and assiduity of their attentions. One was an industrious and thriving shop-keeper of Larne, who had contrived to ingratiate himself into the favour of Mr. Gilbert. The other was the son of a small farmer residing in Gilbert's immediate neighbourhood, who had the advantage of being a great favourite of Rose herself. The name of the first was Andrew Parker, and of the latter William Hunter.

By both of these young men the friendship of Jenny Heddles was anxiously courted, as she was naturally supposed to possess great influence over the mind of Rose. Jenny had a habit of which Parker eagerly availed himself—of using snuff—and she was very fond of having it perfumed with bergamot. Parker, aware of her predilection for this nasal luxury, scarcely permitted a week to pass without bestowing her a fresh supply. He went even further in the display of his friendship, having, on her forty-seventh birth-day, which he affected to consider her thirty-sixth, presented her with a handsome silver snuff-box replenished with her favourite stimulus.

William Hunter, on his part, did not court the good-will of Jenny by such splendid gifts; but he was, from a feeling of real, and, if it may be so called, instinctive attachment, exceedingly attentive to her. She was the relative of Rose, of whose infancy she had been the affectionate nurse and tender guardian, and was still the devoted friend and motherly protector of her blooming youth. This was enough to make Hunter love her with the devotion of a son, a feeling which spontaneously manifested itself in a thousand unstudied instances of respectful behaviour and zealous attention. This constant readiness to please and serve her, was not lost on Jenny, who, although she was well aware of Hunter's strong attachment to Rose, and had sagacity enough to ascribe to it the chief share of his respect for herself, could not resist the natural notion that some of it was owing to her own merit. On the whole, Hunter's unaffected attentions towards her, gained more of her favours than all the sweet-cented gifts of Parker, aided even by the handsome offering of the silver snuff-box.

Nor was Hunter entirely out of favor with Mr. Gilbert, who respected him as a well-conducted young man, the son of an honest although not wealthy neighbor. He objected to him indeed as a suitor for Rose, but it was solely on account of his unsettled prospects in life. Hunter, aware of this, endeavored to amend these prospects by commencing a trade in the products of the country, which he occasionally conveyed to Scotland for a market. These trips across the channel, together with his frequently engaging in fishing excursions, gave to his air and manner something of a sea-faring character, to which he had latterly added by adopting, in a great measure, the dress of a sailor. This he was induced to do, not only from the suggestions of his own fancy, but because Rose expressed her partiality for such a costume.

Of Rose's preference for Hunter, Parker was well aware, and was exceedingly jealous. But his superior wealth, the decided favour of Mr. Gilbert, and the powerful influence of Jenny Heddles, which he believed he had secured, inspired him with hopes which induced him to persevere in his suit.

Matters were in this state when sometime about the middle of April 1778, the parties met at a country ball, where from their first seeing each other, the rivals did not seem to be on the most courteous terms. Rose was also that evening in the humour of indulging her inclination to bestow her company on whom she pleased, rather than of practising her usual policy of sharing it with all alike. She seemed to avoid even proximity with Parker, and whenever he addressed her, she answered him with a coldness and brevity which he could not but feel offensive, especially as she permitted Hunter to engross her society, both in conversation and in dancing, during almost the whole evening.

Parker's mortification could not be concealed, and being audibly noticed by several of the company, it became inflamed to a degree almost unendurable; and his friend Jenny Heddles being present, to her he was at length constrained to complain.

"I know not how I have offended Miss Gilbert," said he, "but she has certainly taken some umbrage at me, for she has scarcely been civil to me since I entered the room."

"In what has she been uncivil?" asked Jenny.

"By her repulsive answers, whenever I spoke to her," said Parker.

"You must be mistaken?" returned Jenny. "Rose is never repulsive. What did she say?"

"She scarcely spoke at all," he replied; "but turned hastily from me to converse with that young fellow Hunter. Three times to-night, I have asked her to dance. Her answer was always the same—'she was engaged'—and engaged too with the same Hunter."

"Engaged to dance with William Hunter?" retorted Jenny. "There can be no harm in that. Why, Mr. Parker, she is engaged to be married to him, and instead of being only his partner in a dance, will in less than a month, be his bride."

Parker heard no more. He stood silent a few moments, as if stupified; then hurried from the apartment in a fever of malignant feelings, and spent the night planning schemes for the humiliation of Hunter and the disappointment of his bridal hopes.

Chapter II.

It has been stated in the preceding chapter, that "on the first of May, 1778, an assemblage of the younger and gayer portion of the population of Larne and its vicinity, met on the field of Drumallis, to celebrate, according to the custom of their ancestors, the day dedicated to the great luminary whose vivifying influence produces the genial season." We then deferred further notice of this field, which forms the centre of some of the most lovely scenery in nature, because we wished to give precedence to the description of even a more lovely object—the beautiful Rose Gilbert. A word or two may now be spared to Drumallis. It is a field of velvet softness and the deepest verdure, lying midway between the town of Larne and the sea-shore, a short distance from the entrance of Larne harbour. The view from it is at once magnificent, picturesque, and soothing.

To the eastward, far away over the channel, the blue hills of Scotland bound the horizon, relieved in front by the great "Craig of Ailsa," and the nearer objects of the two visible of the nine Maidens, with their twin light-houses rising trimly and gaudily, from their rocky foundations amidst the wild and wasteful ocean. Towards the north, Plada light-house, Cantire point and the Cliffs of Jura, guide the eye through the outlet of the channel into the Atlantic ocean; while, just at hand, stretching southerly and forming the eastern border of Larne's lovely lough, the fertile fields of Island Magee sweetly contrast with the ocean scenes, and the rich hills and lawns of Maughrymorne, forming the western boundary of the lough, delight the eye, and convey to the mind the agreeable ideas of peace, plenty and human comfort. In front of these Maughrymorne hills, the most extensive lime works in Europe, and the numerous vessels waiting to be freighted with the fertilizing mineral, or sailing to and fro upon the smooth surface of the land-locked waters, impart a liveliness to the scenery, and awaken pleasing conceptions of social industry and prosperity, which are strengthened when, turning to the westward, the spectator sees the busy town itself spreading before him, with its churches and seminaries, its vast flour mills, and extensive bleach greens, backed, at various distances, by gradually rising table-lands terminating in the abrupt and bold mountainous height of Agnew's hill—the whole furnishing a prospect, which, while it is sublimely picturesque, is, for rural and civic variety, probably unequalled in the British Islands.

The reader will indulge the introduction here, of the following stanzas written, a few years ago, by the narrator of this tale, when recalling to mind, in a distant land, the beloved scenes thus described, amidst which he first knew existence.

THE VALE OF MY BIRTH.

How dear to my soul is the memory of days
That I carelessly passed in the vale of my birth;
The loveliest vale which the glad sun surveys,
As he fondly looks down on this beautiful earth!
Some slave-coloured vale of the East may disclose
More brilliance of nature, more splendor of art,
But the charms which in Larne's lovely valley repose,
Have a spell more impressively dear to my heart.

Where, embraced by lawns, meadows and hills ever green,
The bark-studded lake in its brightness expands,
And Curran's old castle, in midst of the scene,
Of ages long vanished a monument stands;
How oft have I wandered, when visions of youth
Shone bright as my spirit, like glimpses of Heaven!
When in friendship was faith, and in love there was truth,
And my heart to the muse was devotedly given.

When advancing afar o'er the Scottish blue hills,
The smiles of the morning would gladden that vale,
How oft I've enjoyed, by the flower-margined rills,
The heart-cheering fragrance that freighted each gale!
And I've gazed while the sky-enthroned queen of the night
Diffused her soft radiance on all things around,
Till I fondly imagined the picturesque light
Was alone in that balm-breathing vale to be found!

Oh! those were the days when I felt as if life
Was a scene of enjoyment that never would end,
For as yet no chilled hope, nor embittering strife,
Had taught me how sorrow the bosom could rend;
Ambition had not led my footsteps astray,
Though her young aspirations oft swelled in my breast;
Unknown to contention I pass'd all the day,
And at night with light spirits betook me to rest.

Such at this day is the scenery around the field of Drumallis. The field itself is venerable for the remains of a very ancient monastery, which at the time of the events that form the subject of this narrative, existed more extensively than at present. There is still to be seen, however, what is supposed to have been the garden of the monks—an oblong quadrangular space of ground of about an acre in extent, marked out by a fine colonade of tall trees, many of which are yet flourishing in hoary vigour, upon a broad, verdant embankment, which on all sides bounds this favorite spot of ancient piety and modern mirth.

On the first of May before mentioned, a few yards from the eastern end of this quadrangular space, was erected a towering May-pole, fantastically decorated with flowers and ribbons of various colours. At the foot of this May-pole was constructed a frame of wicker-work, resembling an arm chair, the seat of which was covered with turf, brightly green with the freshly-springing grass. It was elevated about three feet from the ground, and was ascended by four steps, covered also with verdant turf. This was the rustic throne of the Queen of May, and the maid chosen on this occasion, to represent that character, was the beautiful Rose Gilbert.

The sports and entertainments of a May day celebration in Ireland, may vary according to the taste and fancy of those who take a lead in the arrangements, or in conducting the amusements, except in two particulars, which long continued custom has rendered essential to the character of the occasion—these are, the erection of a decorated May-pole, and the election of a "Queen of May." In former times there was a third particular, considered equally essential, namely, the recitation or chanting of an ode or song, prepared by some local bard for the occasion. But in our prosaic age, this most intellectual portion of the entertainments is generally omitted, no doubt from the difficulty of finding a rural rhymer capable of producing any thing acceptable to the managers of the day. At the coronation of Rose Gilbert, however, the following verses were produced, and chanted according to ancient form, in alternate portions, by two male and two female voices.

MALE VOICES.

Ye maids and swains who here repair,
In rural mirth to spend the day;
Of all our nymphs divinely fair,
Say, who shall reign the Queen of May?
Though numerous beauties grace our train,
One only can this honor gain.

FEMALE VOICES.

There is a maid amidst our band,
Whose mind with every grace is stored,
Who homage shall from all command,
Who pleasure shall to all afford:
Whose form, with every charm combined,
Is only equalled by her mind.

There is a maid whose feeling heart
With genial sympathy is warm,
Hose manners sweet shall joy impart,
And every mirthful bosom charm.
She with each grace of form and soul,
Deserves to reign without control.

MALE VOICES.

We know her by her winning smile,
And noble dignity of mien;
So fitted all our hearts to wile,
And form her for the Rural Queen.
Then haste the fragrant crown prepare,
And place it on the peerless fair.

Here a youth—we may suppose that it was William Hunter—led Rose to the throne, where, as soon as she was seated, a maiden, whose name we cannot now even conjecture, placed the crown on her head and sang:

Now let your sons our Queen proclaim,
And tell that Rosa is her name!

ALL THE SINGERS THEN JOIN IN CHORUS.

Hail, Rosa! hail! so justly crowned,
Fair sovereign of the vernal scene!
Long shall our songs thy praise resound,
O'er Antrim's hills and vallies green;
While youths and maids repeat the strains,
And joy proclaims that Rosa reigns!

It was about three o'clock in the afternoon, when, after a rustic repast taken on the field, the amusements which had been suspended were recommenced, but assumed a more miscellaneous character, the observances peculiar to the day being ended. Many small parties were now dispersed over the field engaged in such sports as chance or taste dictated. At what, however, might be called the head quarters of the scene—the vicinity of the May-pole and the throne of the May Queen, the most numerous party still remained under the eye of their rural sovereign.—Among these, it need scarcely be said, was William Hunter. He was engaged with a party of dancers, when a detachment of eight men from the press-gang of the tender Hynde, then lying in Larne harbor, appeared on the scene, accompanied by their commander Captain Greaves. These men took their station among the spectators of the dance, without any apparent design to interrupt the tranquility and enjoyments of the day; and, as Hunter had no suspicion of their visit having any reference to him, he paid no attention to their presence; and the dancing and other sports continued, for a time to proceed as usual.

Rose Gilbert, however, soon had her suspicion excited of some mischief being intended, by observing from her seat under the May-pole, Captain Greaves frequently directing his looks towards Hunter. When the latter, therefore, approached her in the course of the dance, she whispered to him her fears, and entreated him to withdraw unobservedly from the scene. He promised to comply, but he soon found that to do so was impossible, for Captain Greaves approached and requested him to walk aside. Hunter excused himself for not complying, by stating his unwillingness to break up the dancing party.

"Then I must compel you," said Captain Greaves; "for good seamen like you are at present much wanted in his Majesty's service."

"I am not a seaman, Captain Greaves, as you well know," replied Hunter.

"We will discuss that question on board of the tender, if you please," said the Captain. "So, Mr. Hunter, come along. Refusal is useless. You see I have means to enforce my command." So saying he made a signal for his men to approach and seize Hunter.

That instant Rose rushed from her seat and snatched a pistol from the belt of the Captain.

"I am armed, and I am determined he shall not go with you!" she exclaimed, with the fire of irrepressible energy flashing from her beautiful eyes, as the astonished Captain turned round and beheld her presenting the formidable weapon in a line with his heart. "I shall fire this instant into your breast," she continued, "if you do not order your men to withdraw."

A loud and simultaneous shout of applause burst from the numerous spectators. The press-gang party paused in evident alarm, while Hunter, excited by the exploit of his beloved Rose, seized the sword of the bewildered Captain, and with a loud cheer waved it triumphantly in the air. The effect was electrical. The press-gang were assailed by more than four times their number of resolute young men, who soon found weapons in the branches of the trees that grew around them. Two of the press-gang fired their pistols with the view probably of intimidating the assailants, for no person was injured by the discharge. The others, more wisely, withheld their fire, but retreated in a guarded and defensive attitude. The two that had fired soon surrendered their arms, and were permitted to depart.

"Your men do not advance," said Rose. "They do not obey you, Captain Greaves. But I insist that you obey me—for I am commander on this field—and leave us to our amusements, by deferring your kidnapping designs till a more convenient season."

"I will obey you, Miss Gilbert," replied the Captain. "Your authority here is indisputable, and is merited by your heroism, which has saved this young man from a trip to the navy. For your sake, seaman or no seaman, neither he nor any friends of yours shall ever again be molested by me."

"On that condition I return your sword," said Hunter.

"And I return your pistol," said Rose, "on condition that you will never again interrupt the sports of a May day."

"I agree to the condition, and shall hold it inviolable," returned the Captain. "And now, Mr. Hunter, I hope that both you and your fair defender, will forgive what is past and receive me on the list of your friends."

"With all my heart," said Hunter, while Rose nodded assent.

"Before I leave you," observed the Captain, "I must prove my good will by giving you a caution.—Beware of Andrew Parker. It was his management that brought me here!"

"I thank you," said Hunter, "and will attend to your caution. I am aware of the object of his treachery."

The Captain and his men then left the field, to the great satisfaction of all present, and equally to his own.

In about a week afterwards, Rose became the bride of William Hunter, and Parker's hopes of separating them were thus extinguished for ever. That unhappy young man, unable to bear the weight of public odium brought upon him by this day's transaction, soon broke up his establishment in Larne, and disappeared from its vicinity. To what quarter of the world he fled from the disgrace he had incurred in that pleasant town, none of its worthy inhabitants have been able to inform the writer of this narrative, although many of them, in this year of grace, 1844, are yet alive who remember the occurrence of its leading incidents.

The Heiress's Revenge.

BY MRS. ABDY.

A young, handsome, and richly dressed lady was sitting in one of those splendid apartments which are called "saloons" in poetry, and "drawing-rooms" in prose; her foot rested on an exquisitely embroidered ottoman, and her arm on a purple satin sofa cushion; opposite to her was a dame de compagnie, a smiling, lady-like, middle-aged person, unimpeachably and characteristically attired in a dove-colored silk dress, and a blond cap, trimmed with white ribbons. Two footmen at a little distance were employed in covering a table with that variety of substantial refreshments which, when partaken of at the hour of luncheon, enables young ladies so prettily to plead guilty at dinner to the charge of living on love, air, or learning, according to the phraseology of the accuser. It was a scene of plenty, but not of peace; a frown was on the young lady's brow, and a tear was in her eye; no one could have addressed her with the Chinese salutation, "Felicity is painted on your countenance;" she might rather be supposed to sit for the purpose of illustrating the proverb—"All is not gold that glitters;" flattery would have said that she looked very pensive; truth, that she looked very cross.—Now, the grand evil which darkened this young lady's horoscope, was one which admitted of no remedy—she did not belong to the magic circle of the aristocracy; and although her wealth permitted her occasionally to step within it, she knew and felt that she was considered as an intruder. Her father had been a grocer, her grand-father a pin-maker; and she would have freely surrendered all the wealth that she inherited, as the only daughter of an only son, could she by so doing have changed places with any of the "penniless dames with a long pedigree," whose swan-like throats and falling shoulders embellished the "portraits of the female aristocracy."

Now, although there was no positive cure for Miss Garston's affliction, a partial alleviation of it might be attained; she might wed a scion of nobility, and thereby be raised in name and precedence to the station of her husband; but Miss Garston was prudent, and did not like the prospect of being the neglected wife of a spendthrift or gamester; she had also warm affections, and had determined never to marry except for love. At length she became introduced to Lord Alfred Harleigh, the handsome and accomplished younger son of the Marquis of Delfield. She invited him to her house; he waltzed, rode, and flirted with her rather more than young men ought to waltz, ride, and flirt, who mean nothing by their attentions; but he was not a systematic lady-killer, and had not the slightest idea of the mischief he was doing to the heiress and preparing for himself by his thoughtless gallantry. The preceding evening Miss Garston had been present at a large assembly, where she knew Lord Alfred was expected to attend; she had wandered into the conservatory, and was concealed by a stand of geraniums and a profusion of gigantic myrtles; she heard Lord Alfred's voice speaking to a favorite friend, her own name was mentioned; she might have came forth from her retreat and welcomed her admirer, but instead of doing so, she bent down her head still lower, to avoid discovery, and the artificial flowers that garlanded her brow mingled with the natural ones around her. Lord Alfred's friend rallied him on his devotion to the rich heiress, and asked him, in a phrase which would once have been considered inelegant, but which now is of general acceptation, when the match was to "come off." Lord Alfred replied by an indignant burst of wonder, that he could be supposed capable of sullying the dignity of his ancient house by contemplating such a misalliance; and then dropped his dignity, became playful, said that the lady would, doubtless, in remembrance of her grand-father, make an exorbitant demand for pin-money, but that she must certainly inherit abundance of sugar from her father's stores, wherewith to sweeten the matrimonial cup; he added several other puns equally trite, poor, and pointless, but they were quite suited to the nature of his friend's comprehension, who encouraged him to proceed by vociferous bursts of laughter. Perhaps my readers may be disposed to be severe on Lord Alfred's flippancy and want of feeling, and I am not going to defend him; but let me just ask them whether they are prepared, themselves, to say that they never spoke of an acquaintance in terms of careless, laughing raillery, which, if overheard by that person, would ensure his or her lasting displeasure, although uttered without the slightest spark of ill-will or malice? Happy is it for all of us, that even those we like and esteem are not always secreted under myrtle trees to hear our comments! Miss Garston was mortified and enraged; she was wounded in the tenderest of her feelings—love and pride. Had Lord Alfred defamed her character, or censured her temper, she thought she could better have borne it than the light-cutting satire in which he alluded to her plebeian extraction, and the words of Junius recurred to her mind—"Injuries we may, and do forgive; but insults so debase the mind below its own level, that nothing but revenge can satisfy it."

Miss Garston retired early from the assembly; and arose the next morning in the state of nervous dissatisfaction that I have endeavored to describe. Mrs. Allison now addressed her in the usual cut and dried form of speaking to cross young ladies—"I am afraid, my dear Miss Garston, you are not quite well this morning;" and her young friend returned to her the cut and dried answer, "I am very well in health, but my spirits are sadly depressed."

"Dear Miss Garston," replied Mrs. Allision, "who has so many sources of happiness as yourself?" and as she spoke her eye glanced on the two tall footmen who re-entered the room, like the slaves of Aladdin's lamp, bearing a reinforcement of silver dishes to the table.

"I meet with ingratitude," replied Miss Garston, sentimentally, "where I had hoped to have inspired contrary feelings."

"You are a little nervous this morning," said the confidante, looking amiably arch; "Lord Alfred Harleigh's morning call will restore your spirits."

She had touched a tender chord; Miss Garston's colour mounted, and her eyes flashed fire.

"I have ordered myself to be denied to Lord Alfred in future," she said.

Mrs. Allison said nothing; she thought some love-quarrel had taken place, and determined, in her secret mind, that it would be adjusted on the receipt of the first pale-pink note or bouquet of green-house flowers from the offending admirer. Mrs. Allison was well-born, well-bred, and a slenderly jointured widow; she liked the large stipend she received from Miss Garston, and the luxuries of her house and table, and she was quite willing to endure the frequent contradictions and ill-humor of her "dear young friend" as a trifling drawback to these advantages.—Miss Garston, however, was not ill-humoured on the present occasion, for she wanted some one to whom she could confide her troubles, and she informed Mrs. Allison of the whole of Lord Alfred's crimes and misdemeanours. The proverb crossed Mrs. Allison's mind—"Listeners hear no good of themselves;" but she did not give it utterance.

"Lord Alfred is quite unworthy your thoughts," she replied; "he is one of a large family, and there are three lives between him and his elder brother; you may command half a dozen better matches before the end of the season; a connection with him could never have been a desirable one in a prudential point of view, and all love for him must of course be banished from your mind by his insufferable conduct."

"Love him!" repeated the heiress; "I detest and despise him; I shall never be easy till I am amply revenged on him."

"Unless I am much mistaken," said Mrs. Allison, "you will shortly enjoy the revenge you wish; Lord Alfred, I am certain, is a marrying man, and if he resolves only to seek an alliance among the aristocracy, he will plunge himself into poverty and distress, for it is not likely that he will have the good fortune to meet with the rare union of rank and riches in a wife."

"That would be no consolation to me at all," said Miss Garston, gloomily, to the great disappointment of Mrs. Allison, who had expected that her last speech would be a telling point; "I shall never be easy till I see Lord Alfred united to a woman whose connections are still more plebeian than my own, and who does not possess a hundred pounds to gild her degradation."

"That is not very likely to happen," said Mrs. Allison; "what motive could he have to marry a portionless girl of obscure family, when he objected to ally himself to a rich one merely on account of her want of birth?"

"Lawyers say," replied Miss Garston, "'prove to us the deed, and we will find out the motive.'"

Mrs. Allison was about to ask, "But how will you manage to bring about the deed that you talk of proving?" but she checked herself in time; she felt that it was not in accordance with her vocation to bandy repartees with her patroness.

"Perhaps after all," she said, "Lord Alfred is fettered by the plans and schemes of his mother and sister, to marry him to his cousin, Lady Adela Sefton."

"Not at all," replied Miss Garston; "I was speaking of the affair to a friend of the family only a week ago; Lady Adela, as a child, had always testified the warmest affection for her cousin, but her father died when she was only twelve years old, bequeathing to her an immense property, and nominating his only brother as her guardian; this brother had a son a few years older than Lady Adela, and felt earnestly desirous that an union might, at a future time, be effected between his son and niece; consequently, he deemed it desirable to remove his ward from the vicinity of her other relations, and the family have resided abroad for ten years. Lady Adela for some time kept up a correspondence with the Ladies Harriet and Esther Harleigh, but it gradually died away; and as, since her majority, which took place a year ago, she has not attempted to renew her intercourse with them, their pride has received an alarm, and they are as indisposed to seek her society as their brother has always been, who has been prejudiced against her by the reports he has heard, from those who have seen her abroad, of her affected and artificial manners."

"Lord Alfred's mother and sisters are terribly haughty," observed Mrs. Allison, secure that she was on the safe side when abusing the family of the renegade admirer.

"Yes," replied the heiress; "I have not forgotten the cold and distant manner in which they repelled my wish to be introduced to them."

"Well," resumed Mrs. Allison, "you will soon, I hope, receive your promised visit from your charming school friend, Lord Glenallan's daughter; you

I have no fear, dear Miss Garston, that the aristocracy will desert you while you are enabled to entertain them in so splendid a manner."

There was something in this speech that grated on the ear of Miss Garston, and she quitted the table, and betook herself again to the sofa, exclaiming that she was the most unhappy being in the world, and that nobody understood her or sympathized with her. Mrs. Allison could not enter into the mystery of her young friend's unhappiness; she was engaged in the discussion of an exquisite ragout, and considered it a balm to all the cares of life; nor must my readers censure Mrs. Allison too severely. I remember a question was once proposed in company, "Who is the happiest of men?" and the cleverest person in the room decided—"He who has the best cook!" Now, the dame de compagnie was not at all clever, and must therefore be excused for thinking that the wounds of the heart might easily be healed by the magic of vol au vents, souffless, and fricandeaux.—The luncheon was removed; the carriage came to the door, and Miss Garston enquired if her milliner had sent home a pink satin mantilla which she had promised her should be finished in time for her morning drive. The answer was in the negative; and, although trades-people's promises, as all ladies know, are as likely to be a subject of laughter to Jove as "lovers' perjuries," and although Miss Garston's wardrobes were teeming with every imaginable variety of wraps, from the furred cloak of January to the lace scarf of July, she yet thought proper to be violently aggrieved at her disappointment, and to declare that "she was destined to be ill-treated, and that the day was sure to prove full of calamities."—Miss Garston's idea was not quite so ridiculous as it appears at first reading; let any one of us receive, for instance, a letter by the general post, containing bad tidings, and a succession of little annoyances will be certain to haunt us through the day; harp-strings will break, the wrong books will come from the library, and the wrong people send cards of invitation or notes of refusal; bores will bestow their tediousness on us in an unmercifully elongated morning visit; the lap-dog will throw down a china vase, and the cat will commit petty larceny on the gold fish! Perhaps philosophers may say that these events might take place on any other occasion, but that when, like Miss Edgeworth's Rosamond, we are predetermined to endure a "day of misfortunes," we busy ourselves in looking out for them; be it so, I have nothing to do with the reason, I am only asserting the fact. A part of these annoyances was in store for Miss Garston; a morning visitor was announced; he was not a bore, however, but a handsome young man, whom she particularly wished to see. Captain Malcolm had just come from Scotland, where he had been staying with the family of Miss Glenallan. Now, Miss Garston had been at a finishing school with the Honourable Miss Glenallan; and as, even in her girlhood, she had a great passion for aristocratic connexions, she had plied the noble young lady with presents and flatteries, which were very graciously received. Miss Glenallan had an only brother, who completely engrossed the affections of her father. Lord Glenallan's estates were small, but his personal property was large; and, under the plea that the latter would be required to supply the defects of the former, he unhesitatingly announced his intention of leaving all his wealth to his son, deeming his daughter amply provided for by a showy education, and her maternal five thousand pounds. Consequently, Miss Glenallan was well disposed, when she returned to Scotland, to correspond with Miss Garston, and to continue to receive expensive presents from her; and it had been a long standing promise that, when Miss Garston took a house in a fashionable square, and mingled with the gaieties of the world, she should receive the honour of entertaining her aristocratic friend during the three months of a London Spring. Miss Garston had boasted of this expected visit to Lord Alfred, and delighted herself with the idea that her friend would now be a star of considerable magnitude in the world. Miss Glenallan had lost her brother about a year ago, but, alas! the alteration which that loss had worked on the prospects of the young lady augured ill tor the continuation of her school intimacy. The next heir to the estates was an unprincipled roue, with whom Lord Glenallan was not on terms; and his daughter was, therefore, the declared heiress of his large personal property, and suddenly became an object of vast importance in his eyes; he told her that "she must not commit herself by making her first entree into London society under the auspices of a parvenue like Miss Garston, but that she should visit the metropolis next year in becoming style, and with a proper chaperon," and the young lady dutifully acquiesced, and wrote a letter to the dear friend of her youth, declining her invitation now and forever. This letter Captain Malcolm delivered to Miss Garston; it was written in a cold, brief style! and it was quite evident that the head of the writer was somewhat turned by her sudden elevation in the scale of society, and that she felt disposed to signify to her school friend her desire that they might be "better strangers."

Miss Garston knit her brow, folded up the letter without a comment, and gave the Captain an unmistakeable hint to depart, by observing, that "the trampling of her horses without showed that they were unusually impatient that morning." Miss Garston sighed heavily during the drive, and Mrs. Allison did not venture to address her, but occupied herself in thinking how delightfully easy the springs of the carriage were hung. Alas! disappointment and mortification rendered the equipage as uneasy as an Irish jaunting car to its fair owner.

The carriage had been ordered to the house of Mrs. Philipson, a celebrated artificial florist, who, strange to say, was thought to be as ingenious and clever as if she had been French instead of English. Miss Garston had issued cards for a fete, and she was desirous that her rooms should be hung with wreaths of flowers, which were to be constructed in a novel manner under her own direction. Another minor disappointment awaited her. Mrs. Philipson was not at home, but she was expected in a few minutes, and Miss Garston condescendingly suffered herself to be shown into a neat front drawing-room, to await her return. A minute had scarcely elapsed before the keys of a piano, in the back drawing-room, were touched with that light, caressing brilliancy, which shows the ability of a performer at the first instant it greets the ear; a sweet symphony was then played, and a ballad sung in an exquisite voice, and in the purest taste. A difficult Italian air followed—the science of the singer was perfection. Miss Garston possessed no voice, to her great regret, for Lord Alfred Harleigh was a passionate admirer of singing; but her judgment was good, and it had been fostered by the instruction of the best masters, and the habit of hearing the best performers; she was quite aware that the singing in question was either professional, or well deserved to be so, and she could not resist the temptation of opening the folding-doors. An elegant girl rose from the piano; her bonnet was thrown on a chair by her side, and her beautiful chestnut ringlets waved over a countenance of surpassing loveliness.

Miss Garston hastily apologized for her intrusion, and withdrew; and the fair stranger, as if to show that she did not resent it, regaled the ears of her auditors with another exquisite song. Miss Garston was convinced that some forthcoming star in the musical world had engaged lodgings at Mrs. Philipson's, and felt very desirous to procure the aid of her talents for her proposed fete; for, since her double disappointment in love and friendship, she seemed to have become more than ever desirous of astonishing the world by the magnificence of her entertainment; accordingly she despatched Mrs. Allison down stairs, with the view of obtaining necessary information from one of the officiating priestesses employed in twining garlands and arranging bouquets; and in a little while she returned, bearing with her the tidings that the singing beauty was only a niece of Mrs. Philipson's, that her father was a tradesman in the city, that she had just left a situation where she lived as governess, and that, till she succeeded in procuring another, she was in the habit of paying frequent visits to her aunt for the advantage of practising on her piano. Miss Garston made no commentary on this intelligence, but merely observed that she had waited quite long enough for Mrs. Philipson; wrote a few lines in pencil, which she desired might be given to her on her return, and then re-ascended the carriage; she did not speak during her drive home, and passed the evening in reading "The Lady of Lyons, or Love and Pride."

The next morning was a repetition, in its first few hours, of the one preceding it. Miss Garston rose late, and was out of spirits and out of humour; the liveried slaves of the lamp did their bidding, bringing in divers covered silver dishes at two o'clock, and the dame de compagnie smiled, soothed, and flattered as usual.

"Pray, Mrs. Allison," asked Miss Garston, suddenly, "did you ever read the Lady of Lyons?"

Mrs. Allison replied in the affirmative, in that fearless, self-complacent tone which a person adopts who feels conscious that they are asserting a fact on which they can bear to be questioned and cross-questioned; the truth was, that she was fully aware that it was the duty of a confidante to be "mad in white linen" whenever her principal was "mad in white satin;" and as Miss Garston had been deeply absorbed in the study of "The Lady of Lyons" the preceding night, she had made it a point to be as deeply absorbed in it during the early part of that morning; and having so recently "read up" to the subject, she was fully qualified to discuss it in all its bearings.

"What do you think of the story?" said Miss Garston. "Did not the haughty Lady of Lyons deserve to suffer humiliation?"

"It is a very clever story for a play," returned Mrs. Allison; "but it is not very likely, I think, that such a scheme could be carried into execution in real life."

"And pray, why not?" asked Miss Garston, in an irritable tone of voice.

And Mrs. Allison took refuge from the displeasure of her patroness in the convenient, although rather hackneyed confession of ignorance—"I'm sure I don't know."

"How severely Lord Alfred Harleigh would be mortified," said Miss Garston, "were he to be entrapped into a marriage with a person of low birth!"

"Very severely, indeed," replied Mrs. Allison, who felt that she could not do wrong in assenting to this truism.

"I have written to Mrs. Philipson," pursued Miss Garston, "desiring her to be with me at three to take my directions about the wreaths, and to bring her niece with her."

"Indeed," said Mrs. Allison, "that is just like your kindness, dear Miss Garston; I dare say you mean to patronize this poor girl, and to procure some delightful situation for her."

"I hope it will be delightful," said Miss Garston, with a half smile; "for I purpose that for the present she shall reside in my own family."

The countenance of the dame de compagnie changed; destruction seemed to impend over all her highly prized enjoyments; the establishment of an heiress can no more bear two humble companions than the earth can bear two suns.

"My dear Miss Garston," she exclaimed, "are you in your senses—is that low-born girl fit to accompany you into society? I did not tell you all the particulars yesterday, because it was not fit to trouble you with such vulgar communications; but her name is Hannah Wilkins, and her father keeps a little haberdasher's shop somewhere in Whitechapel, and her mother works upon lace."

"All this has no effect upon me," said the heiress, laughing; "but rather increases my wish to have her with me. Why did you not tell me these circumstances yesterday, Mrs. Allison? You are really very entertaining."

All the entertainment, however, was on the side of Miss Garston. Mrs. Allison looked at her patroness equally in sorrow and in anger.

"However," pursued Miss Garston, "her residence will not, I dare say, be long in my house, and it shall interfere with none of your privileges, my good Mrs. Allison; you are too necessary to my comfort to be slighted by me, and you will not, I hope, refuse to accept this mark of my esteem."

Miss Garston, as she spoke, drew a valuable diamond ring from her finger, and slipped it on that of her companion. There certainly must be a secret power in diamonds to communicate some of their own brilliancy to the eyes of those who receive them: Mrs. Allison's dull grey eyes actually sparkled as she returned thanks to her "dear young friend" with unwonted energy.

"Do you not think," said Miss Garston, "that Lord Alfred Harleigh, who is such an admirer of beauty, and such a connoisseur in music, would be greatly struck with Miss Wilkins's person and talents? She is certainly very lovely."

"Decidedly so," answered Mrs. Allison, whose position in the front drawing-room had only enabled her to see the shoulder, and one of the long ringlets of that young lady on the preceding day. "Lord Alfred cannot fail to admire her."

"May not his admiration lead to the offer of his hand and heart?" asked Miss Garston.

"Dear me! no," exclaimed the dame de compagnie, surprised into sincerity by the outre supposition.—"Lord Alfred would, of course, immediately learn her connections and situation in life; and as pride is his decided characteristic, his love would soon take flight."

"Do you not imagine, however," said Miss Garston, "that even Lord Alfred Harleigh might behold a young lady with favor who was introduced to him as the heiress of Lord Glenallan?"

Mrs. Allison could not restrain an exclamation of horror, even though she felt the pressure of her ring upon her finger, and beheld the sparkle of the diamonds. She was not a woman of decided abilities or strong principles, but she was neither weak nor wicked: she saw the folly and liability to detection of such a plot, and she recoiled from the criminality of it.

"My dear Miss Garston," she said, clasping her hands, "do pray give up such an idea; you can never carry your plan into execution; it will certainly fail."

"Never," said Miss Garston; "I have a foreboding of success that I feel cannot deceive me."

"But success," persisted Mrs. Allison, "would be worse than failure. The whole truth of course must be discovered after the marriage, and then what opinion would the world form of you?"

"A woman who wishes for revenge," returned Miss Garston, "cares very little about the opinion of the world."

Mrs. Allison was quite perplexed for an answer: all the conventional pleas and arguments in her vocabulary seemed poor and inefficient to stem the mighty torrent of her patroness's fierce resentment. Luckily at that moment the door opened, and a servant announced that Mrs. Philipson had been shown into Miss Garston's boudoir, at the same time ushering into the drawing-room a nameless and veiled young lady, whom Mrs. Allison had no difficulty in con-

eluding to be the phenomenon of the preceding day. Mrs. Allison gladly embraced the opportunity of entering into conversation with Miss Wilkins, earnestly hoping to find that there might be somewhat of gaucherie, shyness, or flippancy in her manner which would disqualify her from acting up to the character of the Honourable Miss Glenallan. But she was doomed to be disappointed. In the same way that Miss Wilkins discovered her musical proficiency merely by a rapid prelude on the keys of the instrument, she evinced her lady-like propriety of demeanour, even in the observations that she made upon the common topics of the day. When she became rather more familiar, she delivered her opinion on some new publications lying on the table, in a manner which showed that she had read much and miscellaneously; and when, at length, she threw back her veil, and discovered a countenance beautiful enough to create a sensation at Almacks, Mrs. Allison could not but confess that any Scottish or English noble might be proud of such a daughter, and could only cling to the hope that the good feeling and good sense, conspicuous in every word uttered by the fair young governess, would induce her to shrink from the idea of being a party to the scheme of imposition devised by Miss Garston. In about an hour the stranger was summoned to the conference in the boudoir: half an hour more elapsed; Miss Wilkins and her aunt departed, and Miss Garston entered the room with a triumphant smile, which struck a chill to the heart of Mrs. Allison, and exclaimed—

"In a few days I expect to receive my long-anticipated visit from Miss Glenallan!"

It was the day of Miss Garston's fete; Lord Alfred Harleigh was accosted in Regent street, by a lounger of fashion:

"Shall I meet you at Miss Garston's to-night?" asked the latter.

"I hardly know what to say," replied Lord Alfred; "at one time I fancied myself very high in the good graces of Miss Garston, in fact higher than I wished to be, but latterly she has been quite cold and cruel to me, ordering herself to be denied to me more than once, when I was convinced she was at home. Yesterday, however, I received a most gracious smile from her in Kensington Gardens, and an intimation that she hoped I had not forgotten my engagement for to-night; therefore I suppose I must drop in for half an hour, especially as I hear that a young lady is staying on a visit with her, who is a most accomplished singer."

Lord Alfred Harleigh entered Miss Garston's splendid suite of rooms; they were brilliant with company and colored lamps, and Mrs. Philipson had outdone herself in the wreaths of flowers that adorned them, but the great centre of attraction was the music-room. Thither Lord Alfred bent his steps, directed by the rich, sweet tones of a melodious voice, which an enraptured amateur by his side remarked —"was almost enough to comfort one for the marriage of Sontag." He gained his way to the side of the piano; the beauty of the lady's face at least equalled that of her voice: she concluded her song; he was on the point of advancing towards her, forgetting all the forms of society in his eagerness to pour forth his tribute of admiration, but Miss Garston saved him from the solecism he was about to commit, by taking the hand of the fair songstress in her own, and saying—

"Permit me to introduce Lord Alfred Harleigh to my intimate friend, the Honourable Miss Glenallan."

Lord Alfred scarcely left the side of Miss Glenallan that evening, except for a happy tete de tete of a quarter of an hour with Miss Garston, who told him that he must come very often in the morning to practise duets with her friend, and further delighted him with an account of Lord Glenallan's high descent and splendid establishment, and enlarged upon the sweetness and excellence of disposition which Miss Glenallan had exhibited, even from her earliest girlhood.—Lord Alfred, instead of limiting his stay to half an hour, protracted it till colored lamps and champagne had been superceded by sunshine and strong coffee, and till he had feasted his eyes on the unfaded lilies and roses of Miss Glenallan's complexion, and qualified himself to say with Lord Byron—

"I never knew but one (the stars withdrawn)
Whose bloom could after dancing dare be dawn!"

Some weeks elapsed; Lord Alfred Harleigh was the devoted slave of Hannah Wilkins; his mother and sisters were anxious for an introduction to the beautiful and high-born young heiress, whom they considered a most desirable connection for him; and Miss Garston had the long-coveted and long-withheld honor of welcoming to her mansion the haughty Marchioness of Delfield, and the dignified ladies Harriet and Esther Harleigh; she exulted in thinking on the motives which had procured her this reluctant attention from them, and anticipated with delight their disappointment and vexation when fully awakened to the horrors of the connection she was providing for them. Miss Garston now thought it high time that the denouement of the tragic-comedy should take place; she spoke to Miss Glenallan on the subject,—the latter acknowledged her affection for Lord Alfred.

"I am, however," she said, "an impostor; I am not the individual Lord Alfred believes me to be; oh! how can I expect happiness from an union with him if that union can only be gained by preserving in a blameable deception?"

Miss Garston was not at all disconcerted by this speech; she considered the scruples of her protegee only words, of course, plausibly enough arguing that if the young lady had felt any conscientious horror of the scheme, she would not so easily have been persuaded to become an actress in it. Miss Garston next addressed herself to Lord Alfred—

"My dear young friend," she said, "has confessed to me her devoted attention to you, but I fear that difficulties encompass you. Lord Glenallan is mercenary as well as ambitious; the latter feeling would be fully gratified by an alliance with a family distinguished as your own, but he has repeatedly told his daughter that he would never sanction her union except with one possessing equal wealth with herself. You must have recourse to a private marriage; I will venture to predict that you will very quickly obtain Lord Glenallan's forgiveness."

Lord Alfred strongly objected to this plan; the pride which Mrs. Allison had justly enough mentioned as his decided characteristic was wounded, and he declared his resolution never to enter any family clandestinely. Miss Garston expostulated, soothed and argued. Lord Alfred hesitated; the man who deliberates is as surely lost as the woman who does the same, and in a short time he gave his consent to a private marriage, provided Miss Garston would ensure that of Miss Glenallan.

Miss Garston could not help smiling, when Lord Alfred left her, at the idea of the actual position of the family which he had so magnanimously declared "he could not endure to enter clandestinely." She had felt, some days ago, a strong inclination to recreate herself with the sight of the plebeian parents of Hannah Wilkins; and she knew that she might indulge her wish without danger of discovery, since they were not aware of the existence of such a being as herself, merely believing that their daughter was staying on a protracted visit at the house of her aunt, Mrs. Philipson. Accordingly, having obtained from Mrs. Philipson an exact description of the street in which Mr. Wilkins pursued his vocation as a haberdasher, Miss Garston set out on a journey of discovery to that place; her stately coachman looked horrified at the neighborhood to which she directed him, and her milk-white steeds seemed indignantly to paw the plebeian ground which they were compelled to traverse! Miss Garston desired that her carriage might stop at the end of the narrow street where stood the paternal mansion of the future Lady Alfred Harleigh, and alighting from it, pursued her way on foot, strictly forbidding either of her two tall footmen to follow her; she had not, however, calculated on the length of the street, neither had she calculated on the sensation which would be produced in the locality by her blonde veil, pink-satin mantilla, swansdown boa, and white silk parasol. A group of children in the middle of the street stood to look at her in such amaze that they would have inevitably have been run over by a gig, had not the young doctor who drove it voluntarily reined in his horse, that he might himself enjoy a good view of the splendid incognita; a porter who came behind her, carrying a deal box, actually stepped outside the pavement instead of uttering the usual "By your leave," which is followed by a heavy blow as quickly as the report of a gun follows the flash. Two men smoking on a bench before a public-house removed the pipes from their mouths that they might utter some audible, but not particularly refined commendations of her personal appearance; and a policemen quietly crossed the way, that he might give her, if necessary, that protection which the possessor of a showy person and a showy dress united, is very likely to require in a narrow street in Whitechapel. Miss Garston felt relieved when she entered the little dark shop, where old Wilkins was at that moment engaged in selling an ounce of brown packing thread to a woman who had a baby placed before her on the counter, and held the key of the house in her hand. The ignoble customer was soon despatched, and Miss Garston, while asking for gloves, muslin, and ribbon in succession, contrived to make her quick eye thoroughly acquainted with the whole bearing of the establishment; she ascertained, to her great satisfaction, that old Wilkins was vulgar, mean, and servile; that he performed the whole duties of the shop in person, and that every speech he uttered was guilty of that misdemeanour in pronunciation which Mrs. Ramsbottom denominates "exasperating the H!" Miss Garston also cast her eye into the parlour behind the shop, the door of which was open, and beheld a sight which which gave her intense gratification; an atrociously fat woman in a red linen gown was industriously working a lace collar, while a dingy, under-sized servant girl was laying the cloth for dinner on a small round table. Miss Garston was not near enough to detect the defects of the table-cloth, but she had the pleasure of ascertaining the presence of a tin pepper-castor, and a pewter pot! With what complacency did she recall the intelligent mind and manly address of her own father, the slender figure and "silk attire" of her mother, and the town and country house, handsome carriage, and establishment of clever and skilful servants which had always been hers since the first period of her recollection. "Lord Alfred," she indignantly soliloquised, "has spoken with contempt of my family and my early habits; perhaps he may find those of Hannah Wilkins rather inferior to them."

She dropped her purchases into her embroidered satin reticule, paid the price of them, two sovereigns, which was received with more delight by old Wilkins than a draft of two hundred pounds would have elicted in Regent Street, and then pursued her way down the street, followed by the eyes of a mixed crowd of admirers, to which were added those of old Wilkins, who stood at the door with his mouth wide open, and a half terror-struck, half triumphant expression of countenance, such as a young merchant in the Arabian Night's Entertainments might be supposed to wear, when a veiled beauty from the seraglio of the Sultan has come incog to the Bazaar, to make a selection from his choicest silver stuffs, leaving behind her a purse of gold pieces in part payment. Miss Garston desired her coachman to drive back to a civilized locality; she called on two ladies of title, visited the Diorama, a conservatory of rare plants, and an exhibition of fine pictures, but nothing did she behold that inspired her with such delight as the sight of the future father and mother-in-law of the fastidous and exclusive Lord Alfred Harleigh.

Lord Alfred had requested a private interview with Miss Glenallan: he was shown into the boudoir which Miss Garston had allotted to her during her visit; he spoke of love, he spoke of a private marriage. Miss Glenallan wept bitterly. Lord Alfred renewed his protestations; she was silent.

"Only tell me," he warmly exclaimed, "that you object to my attentions, and you shall no longer be oppressed by them."

"These tears are not tears of aversion," said Miss Glenallan, withdrawing her handkerchief.

"Then," replied Lord Alfred, "they flow from fear of your father's displeasure; oh! do not doubt that if he values your happiness, he will soon learn to esteem one who will make it the study of his life to promote it."

"Such is not the cause of my grief," said Miss Glenallan; "Lord Alfred you behold an impostor in me; I am not what I seem to be, I am not the daughter of Lord Glenallan."

Lord Alfred looked on her with wondering incredulity.

"Impossible," he said, "Miss Garston has known you long; she repeatedly mentioned you to me before I saw you; surely you could not impose on one who was familiar with Miss Glenallan from her childhood."

"No," replied Miss Glenallan, "the imposition has been originated by herself; I was the party to it, and you were intended to be the victim. Miss Garston was wounded and hurt by some satirical observations on her family, which you made without being aware that she was within hearing; she imagined that her vengeance might be best wreaked on you by betraying you into a secret marriage with a girl of low origin, who might be introduced to you as a person of rank and fortune. I fell in her way; she was pleased with my appearance; she suggested her scheme to me, and I had not the strength to resist the temptation."

A pause ensued.

"Do you command me to leave you?" said Lord Alfred.

"Can you need any command to do so?" asked Miss Glenallan, in astonishment; "do you not detest me for my deception, and despise me from my low birth?"

"Your deception was culpable," replied Lord Alfred, "but it is evident that you sincerely and deeply repent it, and your penitence has been evinced by your voluntary disclosures of circumstances which I should otherwise never have known until united to you. In respect to your birth, I might once have thought it an objection, but since I have known what it is to love I have ceased to be proud; your elegance of mind and person must enoble all connected with you; they may receive honor from you, but under no circumstances could they give it to you. I cannot be happy without you; I renew my entreaties to you, that you will become mine; say but one word in reply, I ask no tedious recapitulation of the past, no painful allusions to it—a simple monosyllable of consent will suffice for me."

"Then," said Miss Glenallan, a bright beam of sunshine sparkling through her tears, "I cannot be so unkind as to withhold it; but it will be necessary that I should make many allusions to the past, although I hope and believe they will not be of a painful nature. Have you patience to hear a long story?"

Lord Alfred promised attention, and his interview with Miss Glenallan was extended to a duration of two hours; at the end of that time he quitted her presence, looking as joyful and triumphant as if he were engaged to be married to a princess of the blood-royal, and Miss Glenallan proceeded to the boudoir of her patroness."

"I have accepted the hand of Lord Alfred Harleigh," said she, with a brilliant smile of happiness; "no particulars respecting the marriage have yet been arranged, but he has gone to acquaint his family with his engagement to me, and tells me that he is sure they will be delighted at the intelligence."

Miss Garston told her she was rejoiced that all was so satisfactorily settled, and inwardly ejaculated, "Artful hypocrite, her conscientious misgivings must have been all feigned; no doubt she is delighted at the success of her deception, but I think she will enjoy no enviable lot as the despised, insulted wife of a needy nobleman." The next morning Lord Alfred drove up to the door in his curricle, and preferred a petition that Miss Glenallan might accompany him home in it, as his mother and sisters were most anxious to welcome her. She agreed to his request, and in about an hour a note from her was delivered to Miss Garston, saying that she should feel obliged to her if, in the course of her morning ride, she would call on the Marchioness of Delfield, as there was a reason that made all the family desirous of her presence. Miss Garston gaily showed the note to Mrs. Allison.

"So," she exclaimed, "my triumph has begun; these haughty dames are anxious to obtain the assistance of one on whom they once looked down with disdain, to give their son and brother clandestine possession of the hand of an high-born heiress; well, they shall be gratified, a special license shall be procured, and at the earliest period they suggest, shall the ceremony be performed in my own drawing-room, and I will fill the station of bridesmaid to Hannah Wilkins. After this kindness on my part, the bridegroom's mother and sisters can scarcely refuse to accompany me on a short excursion, and I will have the pleasure of introducing them to their new relations in Whitechapel."

"My dear Miss Garston," exclaimed the panic-stricken Mrs. Allison, "how can you speak so terribly? the whole town will be talking of your vindictive disposition—the newspapers will get hold of the story."

"Of course they will," replied Miss Garston, "and I will take care that every caricaturist and lampoon-writer in London, shall partake of their enlightment."

"What a shocking thing it is," soliloquized the dame de compagnie, as she tied on her bonnet, "that people should be so violent; it is high time to get out of her house, and I am glad to think that I have arranged for a pleasant new situation. However, I may as well accompany her now to Lady Delfield's; of course the denoument of this sad business will not take place before the marriage."

Mrs. Allison, however, was destined to find herself mistaken in her calculation.

When the ladies entered the drawing-room at the Marquis of Delfield's, the company assembled there were all grouped as if for a tableau. Lady Delfield sat on a sofa, her arm encircling the waist of Miss Glenallan; Lord Alfred on an ottoman at their feet, was regarding them with heartfelt delight; the Ladies Harriet and Esther were placed at a little distance with netting in their hands, which they were not employed upon, and the Marquis sat at a table with an open book before him, which he was not reading.—Miss Garston was very coldly received, in fact Miss Glenallan was the only person who addressed her. "I have deemed it my duty, Miss Garston," said she, "to make a full and free confession to this honourable family of the deception I have practised on them."—Miss Garston started with amazement: had her young friend been of Scottish origin, she would have concluded that she had "cast the glamour" over the honourable family with whom she sat so familiarly domesticated. Was it to be accounted for by anything short of a spell of enchantment, that the haughty Marchioness of Delfield, after listening to "a free and full confession" of the scheme to ensnare her son, should encircle with her aristocratic arm the ignoble waist of the daughter of a Whitechapel haberdasher? Miss Glenallan continued—"All that now remains to me, Miss Garston, is to make a confession to you: I am not, as you are well aware, the Honourable Miss Glenallan, but I have something to impart which will astonish you—I am not Hannah Wilkins!"

"Who, then are you?" gasped the horror-struck heiress, feeling as if herself and all surrounding her were turning into marble statues.

"You are well acquainted," said the fair stranger, "with the name of Adela Sefton, and with her unfortunate estrangement from the society of her beloved relations. I was induced to cease my correspondence with my cousins, from listening to malicious representations concerning them, which I afterwards found were circulated by a foe, who employed equal pains to prejudice them against me. When I came of age, I removed from the house of my uncle, which had long been unpleasant to me, and left Italy in company with a family of friends to whom I had been for some years strongly attached. I resided with them for a twelvemonth in Derbyshire, and during that time never attempted to renew my acquaintance with my cousins, although deeply desirous of doing so. At length I visited London with my friends; I heard, a few days after my arrival that the faithful and worthy housekeeper who had lived in my father's family till the time of his death, had attained much celebrity as a fashionable florist, I was anxious to see and converse with Mrs Philipson, and not finding her at home when I called, I sat down to amuse myself at the piano till she returned. She received my visit with much delight; and after we had conversed for a time, she showed me a pencilled note which had been left for her by Miss Garston, and smilingly observed that a high honor had been conferred on her that morning, in having been supposed to possess a niece of my personal appearance. It appeared that her neice, Hannah Wilkins, was in the frequent habit of coming to her house and practising on the piano, and that she had been there two hours ago; but as her exit and my entrance were both made by the private door, it is not surprising that the young woman in the shop, hearing the sound of the piano, and probably not very critically scanning the style of the performance, should conclude that Miss Wilkins was still seated at the instrument. When I saw the note in which Miss Garston expressed a wish to see Mrs. Philipson's niece the next day with her aunt, I could not help feeling a great desire to accept the invitation; report had informed me that my cousin, Lord Alfred Harleigh, was paying attention to the lady in question, and I was anxious to be a personal judge of her attractions. Imagine my surprise when, instead of being requested, as I had surmised, to sing a ballad or bravura, I was entreated to assume the character of the Honourable Miss Glenallan, for the purpose of entrapping Lord Alfred into a marriage. I do not think I did right in acceding to this proposition; my conscience reproached me at the time, and is not quite easy even now; but, be it remembered that both the name and fortune to which I laid claim, were inferior to those to which I possessed a legal right, and that it was my firm resolution to reveal my deception as soon as Lord Alfred offered me his hand. All prospered according to my wishes; I was so completely altered in person since the days of my childhood, that I was not recognized by any of my relations, and I had the pleasure of winning their unsolicited affections. You have been the means, Miss Garston, however unwillingly, of bestowing on me much happiness; I will not, therefore, upbraid you for the part you have acted, but will merely caution you for your own sake to conquer your resentful disposition, and for the future, if you find your pride hurt or your feelings wounded in your passage through life, to refrain from laying those vindictive plans for the ruin of those who have offended you, which, sooner or later, are sure to recoil to 'plague the inventor.'"

Lady Adela Sefton ceased speaking, and the Marquis, who had been for some time revolving a sententious lecture to Miss Garston on the evils of revenge and the advantages of repentance, was on the point of opening his lips to deliver it, when he was prevented by Miss Garston's adoption of the usual refuge of passionate and mortified ladies, a violent fit of hysterics. The usual means were employed for her restoration; Mrs. Allison then suggested that home would be the best place for her, and she was assisted into the splendid carriage, the luxuriantly easy springs of which seemed on that occasion to resemble the machinery of the rack to her. Nor did she derive much consolation from the kind officers of her dame de compagnie; as soon as she arrived at home, Mrs. Allison told her that, foreseeing the very unpleasant position in which her late plot would place herself and all connected with her, she had accepted the situation of companion to a dowager of quality, and intended to remove to her new residence that very evening.

Thus "left and abandoned of her velvet friends," Miss Garston was consigned entirely to the companionship of her own thoughts—melancholy and unsatisfactory associates. She removed into the country, and secluded herself from all society, but she was anxious, like Cowper, to peep at the world "through the loop-holes of retreat" by means of the newspapers, and they teemed with the story of her malice and her mortification. In fact, it was perfectly impossible that the affair should be kept a secret, so many people had been introduced to Lady Adela Sefton as Miss Glenallan, that it was quite necessary they should receive an explanation of the mystery of her "alias."

Besides, the Dowager with whom Mrs. Allison resided, had a great taste for scandal, and the dame de compagnie enjoyed an unwonted popularity in relating to successive coteries of titled gossips every particular of the faults, follies, and artifices of her late patroness. I wish I could say that Miss Garston evinced any signs of salutary penitence for her conduct, but I fear that she lamented the failure of her scheme more than the formation of it; she is, however, as disappointed and miserable as the most rigid distributor of poetical or prosaic justice could wish her to be, and she affords a melancholy proof of the inutility of youth, beauty, and wealth to confer happiness, when the heart is haunted by that worst and most tormenting of feelings—the desire of revenge on our fellow-creatures for the fancied, or even real injuries that we have received at their hands.

THE MOSS ROSE.

The angel of flowers one day
Beneath a rose-tree sleeping lay;
That spirit, to whom charge is given
To bathe young buds in the dews of Heaven.

Awaking from his light repose,
The angel whispered to the rose—
"For the sweet shade thou giv'st to me, Ask what thou wilt, 'tis granted thee!"

"Then," said the rose, with deepen'd glow,
"On me another grace bestow."
The spirit paused in silent thought—
What was there the flower had not?

'Twas but a moment—o'er the rose
A veil of moss the angel throws;
And robed in Nature's simplest weed,
Could there a flower that rose exceed?

LOVE, HOME, AND NATIVE LAND.

When o'er the silent deep we rove,
More fondly then our thoughts will stray
To those we leave,—to those we love,
Whose prayers pursue our watery way.
When in the lonely midnight hour,
The sailor takes his watchful stand,
His heart then feels the holiest power
Of love, and home, and native land.

In vain may tropic climes display
Their glittering shores—their gorgeous shells;
Though bright birds wing their dazzling way
And glorious flowers adorn the dells,
Though nature there prolific pours
The treasures of her magic hand,
The eye—but not the heart adores;
The heart still beats for native land.

A GHOST STORY.

A TALE OF NEW ORLEANS.

FOUNDED UPON FACTS.

BY MELANCTHON

He who has not remained in New Orleans during the season at which it is visited by the frightful epidemic that yearly depopulates it, can form but a faint idea of the scene then presented. The busy clatter of omnibuses, carriages, and drays, is now heard no more, and nothing is to be seen in the deserted streets, save here and there a hearse or a wagon, as it solemnly wends its way to the grave, with new victims to the malady. Occasionally, however, a more philanthropic member of the human family may be seen, as he glides hurriedly along to the relief of the suffering—but without this the gloomy silence is uninterrupted.

For the benefit of those who have never been here at such a time, I will endeavour to depict the frightful scene as it is presented, and leave the imagination of the reader to fill up the blank space in my disconnected description with any thing that it can conceive possible in such a scene, for I believe nothing can be presented to the mind more horrible than the reality itself.

It is August—the scorching sun is now in his meridian splendour, and his unimpeded rays beat down between the narrow streets and the cramped alleys of the city, volatizing, by its heat, its putrid matter, and setting at liberty the stench of its choked gutters, its filthy warehouses—the floors of many of which are but a continuation of layers of molasses, salt and grease—join in the fumes, and render the atmosphere of the city insupportable to the old inhabitants themselves, who have lived in it, and become in a measure accustomed to it. The powdered dust of the streets is continually kept stirred up, and moves about as the wheel of a dray or an omnibus carries it. The heat of the pavements and the stones of the streets at noonday is insupportable, and the inhabitants are hurried along, as the scorching heat contained within them is imparted to the feet. There is not the slightest breeze stirring, and consequently the life-destroying stench stagnates in the streets and the alleys. That this tends to produce disease, does not appear strange, when we take into consideration the immense volume of fresh air necessary to sustain the life of a man, for a single hour; but there is another cause for epidemics, which is seldom considered—and, if at all, it is only spoken of in derision. I am in hopes, however, that the time will come, when the cause of contagious diseases will be more carefully sought for; and I am persuaded that when the time arrives, and old prejudices are cast aside, that the advocates of the doctrine I am an humble supporter of, will at least have an impartial hearing, if they do not succeed in establishing their opinion. From a great many facts of the same nature as the one I shall here relate—all of which have come under my own observation—I have been led to believe that the mind has a great influence over all the functions of the body; and in many cases where contagious diseases prove so fatal, I believe it to be in a great measure owing to sympathy or fear.

It is considered by most of the inhabitants of New Orleans, an inevitable decree—a standing dispensation of Divine Providence—that this city shall annually be visited by the yellow fever. In August it generally makes its appearance—all are upon the fearful look out for it;—it is the fatal signal for them to hasten from the city. A case of congestive or bilious fever happens in the hospital—it is rumored in the street—the second person who hears it reports it to have been two—and the number increases as the report circulates. Consternation now spreads with the rapidity of the electric shock—all rush together—and every means of conveyance is brought into requisition, to conduct the frightened inhabitants to some distant place, where they imagine themselves entirely out of its influence, and exult in their security. The busy hum of the city gradually subsides—one by one the houses are closed—the clatter of omnibuses, drays and carriages is hushed—the vessels one by one vanish from the shores, and the steamboats put off, as though death were inevitable should they stay a longer time than that necessary for them to raise steam.

At the time I speak of, the yellow fever was raging with all its violence—every person had left that could possibly get away—(this was confined to the majority, who became frightened upon the occurrence of the first case)—for there were many persons who remained from different motives;—some were influenced by circumstances over which they had no control, and were forced to stay; others because they were not so much frightened as the majority, and not a few upon this occasion remained for the philanthropic design of relieving the sufferings of the sick; when many of the disciples of Hippocrates had become panic-stricken and left, now that they should have been found battling against the monster of disease, with all the boldness of their master, of whose art they were very unworthy representatives. No one was to be met with in the city, whose mind did not appear to be fixed upon the horrors of the scene around him; the gloomy silence of the streets was scarce interrupted, and the closed houses, within contained either the dead or the dying. So great was the mortality upon this occasion, that numbers had to be put promiscuously in a common box, and removed from their houses in carts to the pits, into which they were all thrown together.

Under such trying circumstances, it is astonishing to observe what calmness pervades the gentler sex. It appears to have been appointed by Divine Omnipotence that they should be the ministering angels of comfort to man in his misfortune and distress. I have at such times observed the care-worn appearance of the wife as she has affectionately bent over the sick couch of her husband, and administered to his helplessness, when every person else had from fear forsaken him. I have observed the deep sympathetic feeling of the mother for her child, and the sister for her brother, and have found them administering comfort and relief in the sick chamber of an unfortunate fellow being, when men with all their boasted moral courage have shunned them in fear of endangering their own health.

The scene to which I would here "hold up the mirror" occurred in one of that uninterrupted line of brick buildings on Camp street. There was a very respectable family living in the second story of the house wherein our scene is laid—in one of the rooms of which I must "in imagination" take the reader. It was about ten o'clock at night. In the room was presented a heart-rending scene indeed.—There lay in the middle of the floor, upon a table overspread with sheets, the body of a youth in the bloom of manhood. The candles upon the table burned brightly, and shed their pale lustre about the apartment. A smile rested upon the fixed features of the young man, whose calm countenance spoke of the good honest heart that once beat within him; his face did not present the haggard appearance of one who had suffered much from long sickness—and had he have been otherwise habited, he would have appeared as one who slept. Upon a couch near by lay his mother, with all the symptoms of the fever upon her. Her husband, overcome with excessive grief and fatigue, rested his head upon the couch. A younger daughter sat near her mother, her face bathed in tears; she held her mother's hand, and anxiously gazed upon her, hopefully anticipating a change for the better; whilst the eldest daughter quickly moved about the room, waiting upon the physician, who was talking to her, when a knock was heard at the room door. She ran to open it, and a gentleman came in with two young ladies. The two latter welcomed the eldest daughter with a kiss, and she bade the three be seated—not, however, before they enquired how her mother was getting. I shall here name these three persons to prevent confusion. They were young Mr. Williamson and his two sisters. The young man went once more to look upon the rigid face of his friend. He stood by the table scarce a minute, when he confusedly left it, and going to one of his sisters, whispered to her.

I would now have the reader follow me to the lower story of the same building. It was a fancy store. Upon the counters lay the muslins, the shawls, the scarfs, the laces, and the ribbons, all in confusion, as the clerk had left them, the evening he was taken with the malady. Little thought he that it would be the last time he would handle them. He now lay a corpse in the counting-room at the back part of the store. There were three men here sitting up with the body. The only one of the three, who has anything to do in this narrative, was a young man of about twenty. He had listened attentively to the accounts given by the other two of ghosts and hobgoblins, and of the astonishing things that they have (according to tradition) been known to do at different periods of time. The whole catalogue of absurd, ridiculous tales were here related, and the young man sat by, utterly astonished. He said nothing, but would occasionally slyly glance behind him, to see if his dead companion had not left the table. The two elder men narrated tale after tale, until the young man's mind became worked up to such a pitch of absurdity and extravagance, that the least sudden fright at that time would perhaps have destroyed his reason for ever.

The theme changed, and the conversation became more lively. When the clock struck twelve, the young man yawned, got up, took up a candle, lit it, and ascended to the story above. He slept in one of a suite of rooms in the second story, which had previously been let out by the landlord to lawyers, doctors, and private gentlemen. Below stairs, the two men, with whom we first find him, had been giving a complete history of these rooms. No. 10—the one he now occupied—had, previous to his taking it, been rented by a very curious gentleman, (as they represented him) "of whom no one knew anything." He kept it for some time, and so seldom was he seen, that the occupants in the next room did not know him. He was so mysterious in all that he did, no one knew where he came from, where he boarded, or what his profession was, and would not have believed that any one lived in that room, had they not upon several occasions, as the clock would strike twelve, distinctly heard the bolt of the lock fly back, the door open, and slam again almost instantaneously. This alarmed several, and they left the rooms in consequence. One night the door was found open, and a light burning in the room. This attracted the attention of other lodgers in the rooms, and some of them ventured to the door to look in.—When they did so, to their utter horror and amazement, there lay the mysterious gentleman murdered in his bed;—a dagger was clenched in his hand, and the bed-clothes and the floor streamed with blood.—Since that, the room has always been "haunted," and no one will go in it.

Now, although this story was told in the fore part of the evening, it made a deep and lasting impression upon the young man, and the lively turn of the conversation afterwards only tended to allay the credulous feelings that were to ruin him. Going up the steps to his room, an old cat crossed before him, and it immediately occurred to him that this was one of the old women's "worst signs." The story told him below stairs of the room he occupied, recurred to his mind, and he concluded to go into No. 11 to rest for that night. Carefully looking about, he went in—his heart beat quick, and cold chills ran through his veins, as he carefully searched about the room, to convince himself there was nothing in it. This done, he locked the door, and after having carefully adjusted the key, that nothing might enter through the key-hole, (for this the old women tell us is not unfrequently done) he blew out the light and went to bed. But in spite of all his efforts to banish from his mind the "thoughts of supernatural things," the tales to which he listened below stairs with so much terror, now rushed before the vision of his mind; and he imagined that he could see the frightful characters just as they were represented.

What should he do? he covered his head and endeavored to fall asleep, but he imagined he could see the murdered man standing by his bed and the dagger clenched in his hand,—he feared to uncover his head to look at him, and he feared to stir else the ghost should stab him. Reflecting as he lay in this situation, it appeared to him that he was—notwithstanding his precaution—in room No. 10, and he could see the blood running about the floor. His breathing became short, and the sheet prevented him from catching the fresh air—he found that he must change his position or suffocate; and, with a powerful exertion, he thrust the bed clothes from him, sat up erect and glared wildly about the room; his reason had entirely left him, and he imagined he could see the ghost of the murdered man rush from his side, and endeavor to hide itself with some clothes in the opposite corner. He suddenly sprang from the bed and rending the frame of the musquito bar in pieces, he seized one piece of the frame and rushed at the Phantom of his imagination: it eluded him, and his attempts to destroy it were futile. The ghost appeared to spring behind him, and, with the dagger still drawn above his head, threatened his destruction. Going to the door he found that he could not unlock it; as quick as thought, he seized one of the heavy andirons in the fire-place, and, rushing back furiously to the door, he split it in two; still the Phantom pursued him, and when he attempted to strike it with the piece of frame which he still grasped in his hand, it only glided out of his reach and looked more horrible.—There was a passage angling off to the east of these rooms, which communicated with the sett occupied by the family, to whom we were first introduced. I must again conduct the reader to them, not, however, before introducing another person who has joined the family since we left them. Mr. Chauncey Smith was one of those young gentlemen who know not what it is to be serious, and who consider melancholic men as nonentities, which is no doubt as near as we can arrive at their true value in society—full of liveliness. Master Chauncey wore a natural smile upon his countenance, which always proved an effectual antidote to seriousness and melancholy wherever he went; he was one of those open-hearted, good-natured persons who are calculated to please every one. Mr. Chauncey's good sense would not permit him to be frightened from his friends in distress, and he remained in the city during the sickly season to administer to the relief of the suffering. He came in the room just after we had left it, to glance at the scene on the ground floor of the same house. He had not been in the sick chamber long before the doctor pronounced the lady much better, and Master Chauncey proposed to the girls and his friend, Mr. Williamson, that they should remove to the adjoining room and chat; this was accordingly done, and the doctor, with the gentleman of the house, remained by the couch of the sick person. It was impossible for the young folks, now alone, to hold a serious face long, for Master Chauncey glanced tenderly at Miss Leanora, who returned it with a meaning smile, and a signal, which was understood and interpreted by Master Chauncey, that they should commence their jokes on the balance of the company. The time flew rapidly with them, whilst on the contrary it crept slowly and tediously with those in the room adjoining. The young people were in as high glee as the nature of the case (in decorum) would admit of, when their merriment was interrupted by the sudden appearance of the maniac. They had heard the tremendous crash of the falling door, and scarce had time to wonder what it could be, when the maniac came rushing furiously along the passage, threatening the Phantom of his deluded imagination with deadly imprecations if it did not leave him. He knew not what he did, or whither he went; coming to the door, where the body of the young man lay, he rushed in backwards with a piercing shriek. The young people in the apartment adjoining ran in, much frightened, to see what was the matter—the sick lady sprang from her couch, and the young man, supposed to be dead, was observed to open his eyes for a moment, and move one of his arms from under the shroud; all present were seized with the utmost consternation,—the youngest sister fainted and fell to the floor—the doctor and Chauncey seized the maniac, to prevent him injuring any one in the room, for he imagined that they were all linked together to assist the ghost to destroy him, and he banged away in all directions with the piece of frame, to the serious injury of the doctor, who endeavored to hold his arms; for Chauncey, in assisting to capture the maniac, had his arm dislocated, but he was richly rewarded for this injury as the sequel will show. The mother of the young man, after having discovered life in her son, forgot her own infirmity, and was now busily administering (with the assistance of her husband) all the restoratives to him that the house afforded. His appearance was soon changed from the dead, to the living. Returning life becoming more apparent, he was placed upon the couch his mother had just left. The Misses Williamsons were attentively engaged about Miss Leanora, restoring her to consciousness, and the scene in a moment shifted; the excessive grief of the family was in a second turned into the greatest joy; but the poor maniac became more furious, and it was with the greatest difficulty that the piece of frame could be taken from him. Seeing the number around him who he imagined were linked together to destroy him, he foamed with rage, and his eyes gave sufficient indications in their wild, unmeaning expression that his reason had entirely left him. It was proposed to remove him back to his room, but he would not stir in that direction, and when they attempted to force him he screamed horribly. The doctor found that nothing would quiet him; his hands were bound together and he was placed upon the sofa in the parlor. Aroused by the noise below stairs, one of the men came up and was drawn to the maniac by his cries. It was not long before the man detected the cause of his young friend's derangement, and he wept bitterly. The maniac became still more furious, when he looked upon the man who had been instrumental in his disease, who he appeared to recognize. The doctor gave orders that all should remove to the outer room, with the exception of some one to watch the unfortunate sufferer, and the stranger then narrated the probable cause, (which we find true,) of the young man's derangement. Mr. Williamson was left to watch over the maniac. The doctor, with the balance of the company, returned back to the room of our first scene; the corpse had spoken during the time they were absent, and said he was much better; the lady was as well apparently as she ever was, and Miss Leanora was brought too, but there sat the good-hearted Chauncey without a murmur, supporting his dislocated arm; the doctor advanced to know what was the matter with him, and he very calmly told him that he had dislocated his arm in trying to capture the maniac. The doctor, with the assistance of one of the young ladies, removed his coat, and the arm was set, and now comes Master Chauncey's reward, which he considered ample for the pain he had suffered. The doctor called for some linen to bind the arm, and put it in a sling, when Leanora got up and gave him her handkerchief, and flew to a drawer in the bureau for bandages: they were soon obtained, and she helped to apply them. The pain was relieved when Leanora assisted, and Chauncey impationately kissed her for her kindness. What remains to be told is this, the person supposed to have been dead came to life, and is now living—the lady entirely recovered from her illness, but the poor, unfortunate young man lingered with his fit until that night a week succeeding, when, at 12 o'clock, he expired: the horrid symptoms of his insanity remaining with him to the last. This is one of the many facts going to show the powerful influence of "mind over matter." The case of the young man supposed to be dead, was one of the numerous order of cases of suspended animation, in which life is apparently extinct, but the outward signs of life only are suspended, whilst the vital spark or the principal of vitality still holds its earthly tenement. The noise of the maniac being so sudden and so loud, and in consequence so powerfully agitating that delicately constructed and highly susceptible organism of the ear, so easily affected by the least sound—this noise conveyed to the "drum," causing loud and quickly successive pulsations there, and being from thence as instantly transmitted to the sensorium, was sufficient stimulus to call forth all the energies of the mind, and to arouse the patient from his lethargic sleep. The sudden noise, no doubt, saved one more from being added to the long list of persons who, we have ample reason to believe, have been buried alive. The astonishment, and at the same time the pleasing emotions that were naturally excited in the mind of the mother, to behold again the face of her son upon whom she doted, beam with the intelligence of returning life, brought with it such a transport of hope and joy, that the symptoms of her disease (which were, perhaps, brought on from excessive grief from her son,) entirely left her, and she recovered. With this and a number of other facts equally strong and true, I cannot see why the attention of the medical faculty is not more stimulated towards the investigation of the laws by which the mind operates upon, and influences disease in the body. I believe, in contagious infections, a great many cases occur in which there is no internal derangement other than that produced by the mind.—Considering this curious matter in this light, I think that when an epidemic makes its fearful appearance amongst us, that "Quarantine" laws and other acts of the city authorities of this nature, should be carefully avoided, as acts only calculated to heighten fear, which is the great channel through which the disease circulates, and instead of fathers deserting their children—children their parents, and friends shunning one another, that we should be bound more closely together in the bonds of brotherhood, or by the great chain which unites us in one family, making the interest of one the interest of the whole, that all our energies should be directed towards the relief of the suffering with a good and willing heart—that a universal philanthrophy should beat in every bosom, and all paltry nominal distinction between us be cast aside, that we may unite "en masse" to relieve the suffering, and allay the malady, be the causes what they may.

A STORM.

The morning dawn was beautiful and bright,
The sun in splendor rolled up heaven's steep,
Pouring on earth his rich benignant light,
And nature's face was calm as beauty's sleep.

But what is there that dims the noon-day sun,
And clothes the heavens in black, as 'twere a pall!
See! vivid streaks of fire bright blazing run
Athward the sky, and darting earthward fall.

Peal after peal upon the startled ear,
Reverberating back from hill to hill,
The thunder rolls; then less'ning till we hear
No more; and fearful is the calm and still.

A breath of air relieves the dread suspense,
And by its spiral motion soon we learn
It is the dreaded whirlwind, and from whence
It breathes its force, surcharged at every turn.

The wheeling clouds in wild commotion pass,
Like marshalled warriors to the charge repair,
And dash their fury on the sullen mass,
And whirl the fragments through the blackened air.

The lofty oak that stood the tempest shock
For years, is twisted like a withe, and thrown Prostrate upon the earth; and scarce the rock
On its firm basis, claims the seat its own.

How feeble then, O man! your boasted strength!
Where is your dignity, your scornful brow,
Your stately strut with step of measured length!
I fancy all are unavailing now.

It dies away—and hearts beat free and glad;
And faces brighten up again—'tis o'er—
And eyes meet eyes again, that late were sad;
And heaven and earth are quiet as before. D. B.

Taking a Newspaper.

"A pleasant day this, neighbor Gaskill," said one farmer to another, coming into the barn of the latter, who was engaged in separating the chaff from his wheat crop, by means of a fan.

"Very fine day, friend Alton. Any news?" returned the individual addressed.

"No, nothing of importance, I believe. I have called over to see if you wont join Carpenter and myself in taking the paper this year. The price is two dollars; but, by taking three copies, we can get the whole for five—which is, you see, something of a saving. One dollar and sixty-six cents is dog cheap for the Courier."

"Nothing is cheap that you don't want," returned Gaskill, in a positive tone. "I don't believe in newspapers. I never heard of their doing any good. If an old stray one happens to get into our house, my gals are crazy after it, and nothing can be got out of them until it is read through. They wouldn't be good for a cent if a paper came every week. And, besides, dollars aint picked up in every corn hill."

"But think, neighbor Gaskill, how much information you girls would get, if they had a fresh newspaper every week, filled with all the latest intelligence. The time they would spend in reading it would be nothing to what they would gain."

"And what would they gain, I wonder? Get their heads filled with nonsense and love stories. Look at Sally Black. Isn't she a fine specimen of one of your newspaper reading gals? Not worth to her father three pumpkin seeds. I remember well enough when she was one of the most promising little bodies about here. But her father was fool enough to take a newspaper. Any one could soon see a change in Sally. She began to spruce up and look smart. First came a bow on her Sunday bonnet, and then gloves to go to meeting in. After that she must be sent off to school again, and that at the very time when she had begun to be worth something about home. And now she has got a forty piano; and a fellow comes every week to teach her music."

"Then you wont join us, neighbor?" Mr. Alton said, avoiding a useless reply to Gaskill.

O, no. That I will not. Money thrown away on newspapers is worse than wasted. I never heard of their doing any good. The time spent in reading a newspaper every week, would be enough to raise a hundred bushels of potatoes. Your Courier, in my opinion, is a dear bargain at any price."

Mr. Alton changed the subject, and soon after left neighbor Gaskill to his own fancies. A wise man was found willing to make one of the proposed club, and by them the five dollars were sent on, and the papers procured.

One day, about two months afterwards, they met, as they had done frequently during the intermediate time.

"Have you sold your wheat yet?" asked Mr. Alton.

"Yes. I sold it day before yesterday."

"How much did you get for it?"

"Eighty-five."

"No more?"

"I don't know that I had any right to expect more. Wheat hasn't been above that for two months past."

"But it is above that now."

"How do you know?"

"Why, I thought every one knew that the price had advanced to ninety-two cents! To whom did you sell?"

"To Wakeful, the store-keeper in R——. He met me day before yesterday, and asked me if I had sold my crop yet. I said I had not. He then offered to take it at eighty-five cents, the market price, and I said he might as well have it, as there was, doubtless, little chance of its raising. Yesterday he sent over his wagons and took it away."

"That was hardly fair in Wakeful. He knew prices had advanced. He came to me, also, and offered to buy my crop at eighty-five. But, I had just received my newspaper, in which I saw, by the prices current, that, in consequence of accounts from Europe of a short crop, grain had gone up. I asked him ninety-two, which, after some little higgling, he was quite willing to give."

"Did he pay you ninety-two cents?" exclaimed Gaskill, in surprise and chagrin.

"He certainly did."

"Too bad! too bad! No better than downright cheating to take such shameful advantage of a man's ignorance."

"Certainly. Wakeful cannot be justified in his conduct," replied Mr. Alton. "It is not right for one man to take advantage of another man's ignorance, and get his goods for less than they are worth. But, does not any man deserve thus to suffer, who remains wilfully ignorant, in a world where he knows there are always enough standing ready to avail of his ignorance. Had you been willing to expend one dollar and sixty-six cents for the use of a newspaper for a whole year, you would have saved, in the single item of your wheat crop alone, fourteen dollars. Just think of that! Wakeful takes the newspapers, and watches them closely. He knows every week, the exact state of the market, and is always prepared to make good bargains out of you, and some dozen others around here, who have not wit enough to provide themselves with the only sure avenues of information on all subjects—the newspapers."

"Have you sold your potatoes yet?" asked Gaskill, with some concern in his voice.

"O, no. Not yet. Wakeful has been making me offers for the last ten days. But, from the prices they are bringing in Philadelphia, I am well satisfied they must go above thirty cents here."

"Above thirty! Why, I sold to Wakeful for twenty-six cents."

"And a great dunce you were; if I must speak so plainly, neighbor Gaskill. It's only yesterday that he offered me twenty-nine cents for four hundred bushels. But I declined. And I was right. They are worth thirty-one to-day: and at that price I am going to sell."

"Isn't it too bad!" ejaculated the mortified farmer, walking backwards and forwards impatiently.—"There are twenty-five dollars literally sunk in the sea. That Wakeful has cheated me most outrageously"——

"And all because you were too close to spend one dollar and sixty-six cents for a newspaper. I should call that saving at the spicket and letting out at the bung-hole, neighbor Gaskill."

"I should think it was, indeed. This very day I'll send off money for the paper. And if any one gets a head of me again, he'll have to be wide awake, I can tell him."

"Have you heard about Sally Black?" Mr. Alton said, after a brief silence.

"No. What of her?"

"She leaves home to-morrow, for R——."

"Indeed! What for?"

"Her father takes the papers you know?"

"Yes."

"And has given her a good education?"

"So they say. But I never could see that it had done any thing for her, except to make her good for nothing."

"Not quite so bad as that, friend Gaskill. But to proceed. Two weeks ago, Mr. Black saw an advertisement in the paper for a young lady to teach music, and some other branches, in a Seminary at R——. He showed it to Sally, and she asked him to ride over and see about it. He did so, and then returned for Sally, and went back again. The Trustees of the Seminary liked her very much, and engaged her at a salary of four hundred dollars a year. To-morrow she goes to take charge of her classes."

"You cannot, surely, be in earnest!" farmer Gaskill said, with a look of profound astonishment.

"It is every word true," replied Mr. Alton. "And now, you will hardly say that newspapers are dear at any price, or that the reading of them has spoiled Sally Black."

Gaskill looked upon the ground for many minutes. Then raising his head, he half ejaculated, with a sigh:

"If I havn't been a most confounded fool, I have come plaguey near it! But I'll be a fool no longer. I'll subscribe for ten newspapers to-morrow—see if I don't!"

MARRYING A GENIUS.

BY MISS MARY ORME.

"I will not say I hate talented women, but I will say I fear them. I would never marry a genius. I want to be comfortable, and, in order to be comfortable, I want my own way; and these wise women are sure to interfere. Yes, begging your pardon, dearest Aunt Mary, I shall eschew literature in its concrete form."

Thus spake Horace Simmons to his good Aunt Mary Evans, who, he often said, had but two faults—one was, she was an old maid; the other, she was a "Blue;" consequently, in his opinion, though she made him and all her friends happy, she could not have made a husband happy.

"Seriously, aunty, dear, do you think you could live happily with a husband?"

"I am rather inclined, Horace, to let the wilful man have his way, and not answer your question, for I have the disadvantage of reasoning a priori. But, really, I do not flatter myself that I have talent enough to make a husband miserable, and I hope I have not the disposition."

"I know, aunt, you would not willingly make any one unhappy; but tell me whence comes the prejudice against talented women! It must have a foundation."

"I think I can tell you, Horace. In the first place, many duties devolve upon a wife. Too often, wearying labor and wearying care are hers, and any absorbing pursuit, be it literature or fashionable dissipation, interferes with the performance of these duties; and, consequently, interferes with the comfort of the husband and family. Another reason—men of much will and little talent are often united to women of genius. Their wisdom is a rebuke to the folly of their husbands, and is resented as such. A woman of a high order of genius will attend to all the duties of her position, as far as possible, and, if the cultivation of literature occasions the injury and discomfort of her family, she will cheerfully resign her tastes to their happiness. I am of opinion, that the highest earthly felicity must result from an union between two highly gifted and cultivated individuals, even though the wife were equally gifted, equally educated with her husband. Those ladies who neglect their duties to read novels, have generally the smallest possible claim to be considered literary women, or women of genius."

"Well, aunt, I presume you are right, but I am not yet in the mood for marrying a genius," and the accomplished Horace Simmons took up his hat.

"You must e'en make the journey of life as you will," said his aunt; and a tear came unbidden into her fine eye.

Horace caught his aunt's hand. "Dearest Aunt Mary, why do you weep? Have I wounded you by my foolish remarks? I dare say they were foolish. But, to speak truly, I have no more respect for the 'corporate Ishmaelism,' called matrimony, than you have."

Horace had answered to what he supposed was his aunt's thought. He concluded she despised marriage because she did not marry. Her answer undeceived him.

"Nay, Horace, you wrong me. It is this very feeling of yours which I deplore. You would respect marriage, were the deepest and holiest in your being living at this moment. Nay, you do respect God's most sacred institution. It is only the false which you condemn. Shall I tell you, my own Horace, (for, ever since your mother's death, I have considered you mine,) shall I tell you I am married? Yes, united in soul to one whom I can meet no more on earth. Think it not strange that your words grate harshly on my heart."

Horace looked at his aunt wildly and inquiringly, as he leaned against the wall for support.

"Do not misapprehend me, my dear nephew. I do not mean that I am married in the sight of men. But I was, years since, betrothed to one of the noblest beings ever given to earth. He left me, six years since, to travel in the East. His vessel has never been heard from. His memory is sacred to me. Our union remains the same, because all that made it union—the soul—is immortal. He did not fear the little learning and wisdom of your poor aunt. He loved me, Horace, deeper than the passions and fancies of a day, which consume in their own unhallowed fire."

Horace Simmons was deeply moved. He loved his gentle and gifted aunt truly. She was worthy of the affection of her friends, and she possessed it. Their love for her was little short of idolatry. Horace had never asked why his aunt remained unmarried, but took it for granted that her books and her pen were her idols. The gay and thoughtless young man saw not the great fact, that the fountain of love within made her the richly endowed one that she was. She loved knowledge—she loved beauty—she loved LOVE; and those in whom these were most fully incarnated, were her most precious friends. She did not repudiate the sensible life, nor was she clogged with it.

After her irreparable loss, she solaced herself, as best she might, in literature and philosophy. Daily she would say, in her heart—"I will study this or read that, because he loved it. I will cultivate all the faculties of my soul, that I may be more worthy of him—that our union may be more perfect." She had exquisite happiness in the thought that her beloved was ever with her, witnessing her efforts after the good and the true. She loved her nephew, and, though she saw in him a want of development that sometimes gave her a keen pang, still she trusted. She said—"God will finish His work, and, though this young creature may and must be perfected through suffering, such is the will of the Highest, and I will not murmur."

After this interview, Horace bent his steps toward his home, to the house of his guardian, Mr. Gordon. He was a clerk in Mr. Gordon's store, and lived happily in his family—for they well knew that he had a fortune of twenty thousand dollars in his guardian's possession. Mr. Gordon had two daughters—Harriet and Eliza. Harriet was a decided flirt, and this secured Horace against her. Eliza was quiet, domestic, and dignified. Her pride was "hid in the store rooms with her jams and jars," and shone in the beautiful worsted work that graced her ottomans and lamp mats. She was ever kind and attentive to Simmons. She gave him the strongest coffee and the hottest roll, and the sweetest butter. She wrought him the most elegant slippers. She saved the newspaper for him carefully in her work basket. Propinquity has made many a marriage—(I use the word marriage here by courtesy, as we call a mean fellow a gentleman because he wears the garb.) Simmons had committed himself with Miss Eliza, and had discovered a sad deficit of talent, before this conversation with his aunt. Hence his animadversions on genius, which were more to satisfy his own mind with the lot that he had chosen, or rather got entangled in, than his real convictions.

"After all," said he to himself, "if I cannot converse on all subjects with my wife, she will make my home comfortable, and let me have my own way."

Simmons had yet to learn that the stupid and uneducated are more often wilful and opinionative than any others. But he was pledged, and choose to keep the letter of his pledge, amid doubts of his ability to keep the spirit of it. He wedded Eliza Gordon. She congratulated herself that she had a nice house to superintend, and plenty of time to work worsted. Her husband was sure of a housekeeper, if not a companion. Truly, he was more favored than the man who gets neither.

A year from his wedding day, and a select company of friends and relatives were assembled at the home of his Aunt Mary. Let us look in upon them. Mary Evans is standing with her hand in that of a dark, not beautiful, but exceedingly interesting looking man; and the clergyman and the book are there also. Has she forgotten the "bridal of her soul?" Can she, the good and gifted, give herself to another, when she had said "I am married?" No, no. Her betrothed has returned, not from another world, but from China. He had been wrecked, and escaped, and had passed through many chances and changes; but Mary was his, and he was hers.

A year more, and Horace sat in his Aunt Mary's boudoir.

"Is it possible, dearest Aunt Mary, that you have written that beautiful book, and given dear uncle Marsden that sweet boy in the cradle, and cared for all else, as I know you have? Why, even Eliza, who never reads, has read the book, and she declares you wrote it on purpose to make me a better husband; and I added, 'and you a better wife.' "

"And you were both right," said Mrs. M.

"Oh, aunt, I wish to Heaven you had married first, then I should have known that a woman with a soul could make her husband happy."

"Horace, I shall preach you a sermon on contentment. Our unions are such as we are fitted for. When the world is worthy of something higher, it will be given. Do not complain of the inevitable. Your wife has read one book. Read to her—read with her. Unlock the treasures of her soul, as far as may be. Do not complain of her, dear Horace, till you have done your part. I have little sympathy with complaining husbands, or wives. Let them do all they can to make life tolerable."

Mrs. Marsden looked at her nephew. The tears were coursing down his cheeks.

"I see how it is, aunt. I have what I am fitted for, and I shall never be fitted for aught higher or better. The deepest, the holiest of my nature, will never be unsealed. I shall go to the grave a failure."

"If you are sure, my dear child, that this is your fate, bear it like a man. I am content to fail when I have done all I can. See that you do all in your power for yourself and Eliza. There are many successful failures in the moral world. You have lived to know the difference between a slip-shod novel-reader and a woman of genius. Perhaps your experience may yet be recorded for the benefit of those who fear or hate women of talent."

Simmons left his aunt and returned home, determined to do his part towards his wife's redemption. He found her with what he internally denominated "that infernal and everlasting worsted work."

"Eliza," said he, kindly, "Aunt Mary has sent you 'Home,' by Miss Bremer. Shall I read to you this evening?"

"Thank you," said Eliza; "I am puzzling over a new pattern, and I can't attend to reading and work at the same time. And pretty soon Charles will be awake, and he is not over fond of reading any more than most troublesome children of a year old."

Horace bit his lip, and swallowed a half formed malediction, and betook himself to his reading. He made effort after effort, with like success. His wife had so much to do. She was so attentive to his comfort, that she had no time to make him happy. She was an "excellent wife." She made pickles and preserves of a peculiar flavor. She always burned the coffee herself, and put it in a box, and shut it close, to be sure that none of the poison, alias goodness, should escape by exposure. Washing, ironing, baking, baby—all were duly attended to. She could trust no one with the oversight of her work. She wanted her house in order, and she was miserable unless it was so. The only solace of this hard working woman was worsted work. Oh! if men knew the glory of a superb pattern of worsted, the delight of the delicate shading of many beautiful colors, and the lustre of the linen thread and the brilliant beads, added to the most approved pattern, they would never sigh for military glory. But this happiness they never share with their wives. We might whisper to some bachelors, that girls and wives have been known to get as much absorbed in this fascinating employment as Mrs. Austin in Goethe, Mrs. Somerville in Astronomy, etc., and as little to the comfort of their lords. Had Mrs. Simmons loved her husband, she would have sacrificed her own wishes at times; she would have learned for the sake of her love. But she was fixed in very quiet indifference. Not that she would bear any attention of his to another. His partiality toward Aunt Mary was not over pleasant to her. She liked not talking, thinking and writing women. She could not see why married men should be attracted toward such women. Why could not Mrs. Marsden and Mrs. Little, and all those selfish literary women, talk to her as well as her husband? And why were these women so very attractive to gentlemen? These were questions that she answered in her own way, and to her deep dissatisfaction.

Time rolled on. Simmons loved his boy, and prized his wife's good qualities. His wife was his housekeeper—Aunt Mary his friend, his guardian angel. His boy was his idol. Horace Simmons cultivated his talents as well as one can who stands alone, and he was not wholly alone. Mrs. Marsden understood him. The world would have been sad, indeed, without her. Daily did he thank God for the gift of this friend, who sustained such a relation to him, that envious tongues could say naught against his communion with her. No lot is wholly evil. Everywhere, in the desert's gloom, in the prison's despair, amid the discords of an unhappy home, man finds some blessings, if he can but see and reckon them. To the loving, happiness comes unbidden. The indifferent and unloving seek it—at times they find the treasure. Simmons and his wife could hardly be said to be unhappy. They were busy, each in his and her own way. He was a man of principle, too good-natured and too lazy to quarrel. But the end of married life, joint happiness and usefulness, was far from being answered.

* * * * * *

Ten years from Simmons' wedding day, and Mrs. Marsden sat by his side in his elegant parlor. Three beautiful children, a son and two little daughters, surrounded him. He was weeping bitterly—most bitterly.

"Of Aunt Mary," said he, passionately, "I never valued my wife, whilst she lived, as I ought. She has often told me that I never would appreciate her till she was dead, and now I feel the truth of her words. She was such a careful mother. She kept my home so quiet, so nice, so orderly. What shall I do without her? Who will care for these dear children like a mother?"

"Let Charles stay at Mr. Wyndham's school, where he is so happy. Mary, Anna, and you, my own Horace, shall come to me. I will love you, care for you, do all I can to make you happy."

Horace embraced his aunt—his mother—and said—"Oh that all women were like you, wise and kind."

Time fled. Men advised Simmons to wed one of the many young ladies of his acquaintance. "No," said he. "Aunt Mary has taught me 'not to follow a giddy girl, but, with religious, ennobling passion, a woman with all that is serene, good and beautiful in her soul.' And certainly the bereaved father of a family must feel that care, and not love, belongs to him."

Simmons saw few women but his aunt and her friends. The teacher of his little daughters was pleasant to him, because she was kind and gentle to them. She often spent an evening with Mrs. Marsden, and Horace read to them; and though he sometimes felt a little vexed that she did not appreciate the tales and poems he read from their favorite books, yet he liked her gentle manners much, and he found her ever ready with thoughts upon any subject which he introduced. One evening, he read the "Village School Mistress" to the beautiful girl, but she had no word of praise for his favorite story. She only blushed, because, as he supposed, she, too, was a school mistress.

"Miss Crawford," said Simmons, rather bitterly, "I wish your taste ever corresponded with mine. I thought, when I first became acquainted with you, that I had found a second Aunt Mary; but Aunt Mary can appreciate a good story."

"And Jane Crawford can write one," said Mrs. Marsden, "for she wrote the 'Village School Mistress,' and the other tales you have been admiring for weeks; and she wrote them amid arduous duties, because she knew you took pleasure in such tales."

A year from this time, when Horace Simmons and Jane Crawford had become really acquainted, they stood together at the altar; and he answered truly when he said he took her for his wedded wife. Sacred, forever sacred, be that word—so full of all beautiful and blissful meaning.

Horace Simmons found his home as well appointed, and all material things as well cared for, as if spirit culture had been neglected. His wife often said—"There is time for all things." Her books, her work, her pen, her children, (they were hers because they were his whom she loved,) all had her attention as they deserved. Simmons sought to triumph in the world of mind with a glad heart. He knew that he was understood, appreciated, loved. The glad eye and smile of his wife welcomed all his new thoughts. His rough wisdom was polished by her taste. The sterling gold of his character shone all the brighter in the mild and beautiful light of her genius. They studied, read, wrote, and worked together—for many were the cares and labors that the loving husband learned to share and lighten.

At Aunt Mary's last visit, she found them in the library. Horace had written out a scientific paper

Jane was copying, polishing and beautifying his work.

"Are you not jealous of her ability?" said Mrs. M. Jane looked sweetly in her husband's face, as he twined his finger in one of her rich dark curls. He said to his aunt—

"Thank Heaven, I do not hate or fear women of genius."

THE LAST WILL.

BY MRS. MARY V. SPENCER.

It was a dark and dismal night, and the rain poured down in torrents. The wind whistled around the corners, or shrieked among the chimneys; the street lamps flared dim; and even the watchman deserted his post and shrank into a sheltered corner.

In an old, rickety tenement, in one of the narrowest lanes of London, sat a young couple with their only child. The mother was still young, scarcely eighteen indeed, but of unusual beauty; though sorrow had already began to make inroads on that fine countenance. Her husband was some years older, with a face of much character, though not of decided beauty; but the lines around the mouth, and the care-worn expression of the brow, showed that he had already warred with misfortune. In fine contrast to his face was the placid expression of the child's countenance, as it lay in its mother's lap, with the light of the lamp falling shaded across it. A smile was on its face as it slept. It seemed as if an angel looked out from it.

Suddenly a knock was heard at the door. The man gazed around on the bare and desolate apartment, and did not stir. The wife seemed to read his thoughts.

"Go, dear James," said she. "What matters our poor accommodations?" and she tried to smile. "Perhaps it is a bearer of good news; surely no one else would come out on such a night as this. How the wind drives against the panes!"

The husband advanced to the door, and opening it, a man in livery delivered him a note. At sight of the green and gold of the man's dress, he started back, but the servant, leaving the missive in his hand, was gone instantly.

"It's from my father's steward," said the husband, with an excited voice, as he broke the seal.

"God be praised!" said the wife; "he has relented. I knew he would. Oh! we shall yet see happy days," and she burst into tears. Her husband's agitation was scarcely less than her own, for his hand trembled violently as he held the note to the lamp.

His wife eagerly perused his countenance, and she seemed to gather hope as he read. At length he looked up.

"I must go, dearest," were his words. "My father is not expected to live over the night. He relents, for he has sent for me. God bless you, Mary, and our child," and a large tear rolled heavily down his cheek.

"I thank thee, Heavenly Father," said the wife, clasping her hands and lifting her swimming eyes on high, "my prayers have been heard. Oh! my sweet babe, thou shalt no longer want," and she clasped the sleeping cherub in convulsive joy to her bosom.

The husband dashed the tears hastily from his eyes, kissed the mother and her child fervently, and snatching up his hat and cloak, was rushing from the room.

"I will sit up for you, love," said the wife.

The husband gave her a look of unutterable fondness, and stepped out into the storm. It was raining fiercely, and, at intervals, the thunder shook the sky, an unusual occurrence at that season of the year.—While he is making his way on foot, against the driving tempest, to his father's princely mansion, let us hurry over the events which had reduced him and a lovely wife to penury.

Sir James Hengist was descended from one of those ancient families of England, which had been great while the Normans were still landless, and many of which still remain among the gentry of Cheshire and Lincolnshire, looking down with contempt on the new nobility. In the course of generations, however, the family had become poor, and Sir James, to rebuild its fortunes, had married a lady of great wealth in the city. Lady Hengist was as good as she was rich, and won all hearts in her exalted station. She lived to see her only son attain the age of twenty, and then died regretted by all, and by none seemingly more than by her husband.

Lady Hengist had a niece, the daughter of a favorite step-brother, whom she had educated from a child, and whose union with her son had been a favorite project. She had long secretly entertained this idea, and what then was her gratification when she beheld a passion growing up for each other in the young people's bosoms! Her niece was, at this time, but fifteen, yet already ripening into womanhood, and one of the most beautiful and accomplished of her sex. Sir James appeared to enter into his wife's plans, and no obstacle was placed in the way of the lovers, so that for nearly a year their lives passed away in that brightest of all dreams, a first love sanctioned by friends.

But Lady Hengist had been scarcely three months in her grave before a marked change came over Sir James, in his demeanor to his son. He was continually reproving the young man, who no longer could do anything to please him, and, being a high-spirited youth, the heir was at length driven from the paternal roof by this constant annoyance. Toward the lovely Mary Crawford, however, the conduct of Sir James had been unchanged, even when she ventured to expostulate with him, as she sometimes did, in behalf of his son. There were those, indeed, who said he had interested motives in this, and the truth of their suspicions became apparent after the son had sought a home elsewhere. Mary was now sixteen, in the full maturity of early English beauty; and Sir James, overlooking his tacit consent that his son should marry her, and, forgetting the noble-hearted woman whom he had lately followed to the grave, determined to make her his wife. He was still in the prime of life, and might have succeeded with others scarcely less beautiful than Mary. But her heart was already another's, and she turned away in disgust from his addresses. It was sometime before she was aware of his intentions, for she would not believe he could be guilty of such baseness, but when his attentions grew so marked as to become the kitchen gossip, she could no longer shut her eyes to them. She made no effort now to conceal her repugnance. But Sir James was not to be foiled. In his youth he had been a man of gallantry, and still piqued himself on his power over the sex. But he tried every art in vain. At length, however, it became impossible for her to remain any longer under his roof; and she would have left it before, only that she knew not where to go, and besides she had indulged a hope that by remaining she might bring about a reconciliation between her lover and his father.

The young heir had been, for some time, aware of his father's designs, and had urged Mary to elope with him, but as long as a hope of reconciliation remained she had refused. Now, however, there was no alternative. Hengist House was no more a place for her; and without a relative in the world to whom she could appeal, the orphan had no other resort but to throw herself into her lover's arms. Accordingly the young couple were married. And now began their sorrows.

The rage of Sir James, on hearing of this union, almost killed him. His passions were always violent, but they now seemed fiendish. He swore that he would disinherit his son, and immediately cut off the allowance he had hitherto allowed his heir. The appeals of the offenders were in vain. The father was inexorable. He wished to see them starve to death, he said, and then he could surrender life willingly. The letters which Mary, unknown to her husband, wrote almost daily, were returned unopened. Every one who might have otherwise assisted them, was turned against them by the powerful influence of the angry father, and in less than three months, the young heir found himself literally starving in the heart of London. His education, however, had not been neglected, and he sought among the booksellers for employment, determined not to give up in despair. For a long time he was unsuccessful, but finally found a paltry job, on which he managed to live, until his wife presented him with a lovely babe. After this, all means of regular subsistence deserted him. Yet he struggled on, endeavoring, when in the presence of his wife, to keep up a cheerful countenance, and almost consoled for his unavailing struggles during the day, by her sweet welcome and the smile of his babe at evening. But as winter approached, and his last guinea vanished, the iron began to enter into his soul. Several times he made abortive attempts to soften his father; and his wife also secretly tried for aid in the same quarter, but in vain. For more than a week they had now subsisted on their credit at a green grocer's shop, but this could not last long, and the almost distracted husband knew not where to turn, when, unexpectedly, this note arrived from his father.

His heart was full of high hopes, mingled with sorrowful feelings, as he hurried through the tempest. The knowledge that his only parent was on his death-bed awoke all the associations of childhood, bringing back the days when his father doated on him. The subsequent harshness of his parent was forgotten; and, with the glad hope that he was going to receive and bestow forgiveness, the son proceeded almost breathless to his early home.

The massive doors swung open at his knock, the well-known servant ushered him deferentially through the hall, a whispered consultation was held at the sick man's door, and then he was desired to enter.

With a palpitating heart he had waited during the delay, and now he rushed in, all eagerness to be reconciled to his dying parent. He saw nothing but the form supported on pillows, and the pale face of the invalid, and in an instant he was on his knees beside the bed and had clasped the sick man's hand in his, while tears gushed from him like rain; for in that moment, with the recollections of childhood had come back all its softness. But the hand was rudely jerked back, and a scornful laugh met his ear.

"Ha! ha!—you have come, thinking I am about to make you my heir," began the sick man, "have you? And so you begin playing your part in this way! I have sent for you for another reason, as you shall learn, you villain."

The young heir started to his feet. He could scarcely believe his ears. Could those brutal words, that scornful laugh proceed from a dying man, and that man his parent? He stared incredulously at those around, and then at the face of the invalid, but though he read pity on the former, hate distorted the latter. Again his parent laughed sneeringly.

"So you came here thinking I was about making you my heir, eh? Did your wife and child, sir, come along, to exult in my halls before I am cold?"

"Father—father—" said the young man, imploringly, as yet bewildered by this strange scene.

"Don't call me father, you unnatural child," said the invalid, half rising in bed, and shaking his clenched hands. "You have brought me to this—you have, you rascal. But I'll have my revenge. You shall starve, sir, starve—I hoped to live to see it—but I'll make it certain."

"Sir James," said the son, "I will go rather than to stay to hear these things. And may God forgive me and you for all that is wrong between us."

"Dare you, sir, talk of God forgiving you, you villain," shouted the sick man, almost foaming with passion, while the alarmed attendants, not daring to interfere, stood trembling, looking from father to son. "I tell you he'll let you starve, and you can't help it. I'll make it sure. Yes! and I'll live to see it," he exclaimed with a horrible oath. "I won't die—it's all a lie of the doctors. You and your paramour shall beg before my face, you shall—"

"Say what you will of me, but forbear my wife," exclaimed the young man, with flashing eyes, "here I stay no longer," and he moved towards the door.—But three or four servants interposed.

"Keep him in," fiercely exclaimed the invalid, "make him stay till the will is read and signed. He shall see it all," and again there was a terrible oath.

"I pray you, sir," said the conveyancer, now advancing, for the young man had not seen him before, "consider the place," he added, imploringly, as he saw the son about to knock down the servants who opposed his path: "it shall be hastened as much as possible if you will only hear it," he whispered.

The young heir, bitterly as he had been reviled, would not make his father's dying room the scene of a brawl, so he bowed at this expostulation, and, folding his arms haughtily on his bosom, prepared to hear the will. A look of bitter triumph passed over the sick man's face: it seemed as if his passions had transformed him into a fiend.

"Proceed, sir," he said, nodding to the conveyancer.

The man unrolled his parchment and began repeating the formal language of the deed, and as clause after clause was read depriving the young man of his just rights, the eyes of the invalid gloated over the agony he knew he was inflicting on his victim. The son, in spite of every exertion, felt that his feelings were betraying themselves in the convulsive twitches of his face. How could he look unconcerned when his last hopes were being crushed, and he saw inevitable beggary before his wife and babe, with the horrors of a jail, in prospect, for himself? But he closed his mouth firmly, choked back his emotions, and gazed sternly on the man of the law, ashamed that the lookers-on should perceive his emotion.

When the conveyancer had finished the deed, he advanced to the bed-side with it, two servants carrying a small table, on which were writing materials.

"Give me a pen, quick, quick," said the invalid, rising unsupported in bed.

The conveyancer hastened to obey, the parchment was spread out, and the pen was in the invalid's hand.

"Do you see this, sir?" he said, casting a look of triumphant malice at his son, and he placed the pen to the skin.

The storm, all this while, had been increasing in fury, and vivid flashes of electricity had begun of late even to penetrate through the closed shutters and heavy drapery of the windows. Just at this instant a peal was heard, stunning every one in the room, which seemed filled with a blinding light. Several fell to the floor in fright, and the whole house appeared to rock. For a second there was a breathless silence, and then the conveyancer spoke:

"Father in Heaven!" he exclaimed, in a tone of horror, and, advancing to the bed, he added, solemnly, "Sir James is dead!"

They rushed to his side and found it was indeed so. The lightning had run down the wall at the head of the bed, and, in a second, the soul of the baronet was in eternity. The parchment was shrivelled and black; while the pen, knocked three feet from the hand, lay burning on the rich counterpane.

A silence of horror chained every tongue. The death of the invalid, at that instant, seemed like a stroke of Providence.

At length the conveyancer turned to the son, and, grasping his hand, said—

"As there is no will, Sir James, you are the sole heir. And from the bottom of my heart, I congratulate you."

There is no happier woman now than the young Lady Hengist, for she is blest with a husband who adores her, and surrounded with a family of lovely children, who inherit the beauty and virtues of their parents.

THE BEREAVED.

BY AMELIA.

The moon within our casement beams,
Our blue-eyed babe hath dropt to sleep,
And I have left it to its dreams,
Amid the shadows deep,
To muse beside the silver tide
Whose waves are rippling at thy side.

It is a still and lovely spot
Where they have laid thee down to rest,
The white rose and forget-me-not
Bloom sweetly on thy breast,
And birds, and streams with liquid lull
Have made the stillness beautiful.

And softly through the forest-bars
Light lovely shapes, on glossy plumes,
Float ever in, like winged stars,
Amid the purpling glooms;
Their sweet songs, borne from tree to tree,
Thrill the light leaves with melody.

Alas! the very path I trace,
In happier hours, thy footsteps made;
This spot was once thy resting-place;
Within the silent shade,
Thy white hand trained the fragrant bough
That drops its blossoms o'er me now.

'Twas here at eve we used to rove,
'Twas here I breathed my whispered vows,
And sealed them on thy lips, my love,
Beneath the apple boughs.
Our hearts had melted into one,
But Death undid what Love had done.

Alas! too deep a weight of thought
Had filled thy heart in youth's sweet hour;
It seemed with love and bliss o'erfraught,
As fleeting passion-flower
Unfolding 'neath a southern sky,
To blossom soon, and soon to die.

Yet in these calm and blooming bowers
I seem to see thee still,
Thy breath seems floating over the flowers,
Thy whisper on the hill;
The clear, faint starlight, and the sea
Are whispering to my heart of thee.

No more thy smiles my heart rejoice—
Yet still I start to meet thine eye,
And call upon the low, sweet voice
That gives me no reply—
And list within my silent door
For the light feet that come no more.

Chapter I.

A STAGE AND THE ACTOR.

Mobile is rather a pleasant place, during its habitable season. Its populace, thrown together from every State in the Union, and from every country out of the Union, are almost of necessity sociable, hearty—hale fellows well met. A great place for cotton bales and conflagrations is Mobile; also, for oysters, odd-fellowship, and "orange-grove" speculations. Mobile is not without its specimens of taste and architecture. Its costly churches show that the people are not altogether irreligious—its magnificent drinking-houses evidence that they are not altogether pious. A merry, hustling, driving, thriving place is Mobile—reference, of course, is had to it as it appears during the business season, for in summer a sleeping volcano could scarcely be more quiet. The merchants go hurrying about as if propelled by steam, the negro draymen go rumbling through the streets, whistling, laughing, and singing, the loafers and candidates for the calaboose contrive to appear very busy doing nothing—and even the steamboats, as every hour they come drawing into the piers, with their fiery lungs puffing and panting, as if fatigued by their long journeys from the interior, seem to be quickened with the spirit of activity that presides over the city! Yea, and verily! a happy-go-lucky, merry, devil-may-care sort of a place is Mobile.

But now and anon yellow Jack breaks in upon its unwary inhabitants, and then there is trouble.—Aye, trouble, trouble, trouble! Wailing and despair, such as the mother knows when she sees her first-born struggling in its death-grasp; such as the fond husband knows when the blooming wife of his bosom lies before him writhing under the paralyzing stroke of the destroyer; such as the dutious child knows, when his parent falls, stricken by an arrow from the unerring archer. In vain do the hapless citizens flee to their darkened rooms, barricade their doors, and bar up their passage-ways. Bolts and bars are of no avail—and the silence of Death reigns in the proud mansion, as beneath the lowly roof. His step is noiseless, but his blows are certain. While the sky is blue and beautiful, while the sun shines on the plain and the valley, while the trees are green, and the summer flowers bursting into life, he is on his rounds, the deadly yellow Jack. He touches the shoulder of the trembling wight in the street, and says—Come! He confronts the brave man and the strong, face to face, and cries—Away! He lifts the hood of the meek sister of charity, and mutters—Follow! And all must obey. Onward they go, pell-mell, the old and the young, the weak and the strong, the withered and the lovely, the simple and the wise—pell-mell to the charnel house, and are gathered into the garner of Death, till the receptacles overrun, and a cry goes forth—"Room for the dead!" Such is Mobile.

It has almost become a proverb that a person partakes more or less of the characteristics of the place in which he resides. Such was the case with Trescot Blackmer, a young Mobilean, who will occupy a conspicuous place in this veritable history. Blackmer was tall, well-made, and powerful in frame, and possessed an eye and a forehead that spoke of intellect. He had the requisites for becoming a leader among mankind, but his parents had been too indulgent in his education, and the fallow ground of his mind gradually became overrun with briars, thistles and rank springing weeds—with, nevertheless, here and there brilliant-hued and fragrant blossoms, such as flourished not in the hot-beds of education. In short, he was like the city in which he dwelt, a compound of every thing. The worst feature in his character was his passion for the gaming-table. This amounted almost to a monomania in him, and hence arose the perils and troubles that, in his early career, rolled upon him, wave after wave, as the goaded billow of the tempest-ridden main roll in upon some unfortunate wreck on a lee shore. But we will not anticipate.

Chapter II.

A FIELD AND A FLOWER.

Spring Hill, which bears the relative position to Mobile that Harlaem bears to New York—that of a summer retreat, is a pleasant place, especially when the magnolias are putting forth their great, white, fragrant flowers, and the bloom of the catalpa, the orange, and the multiflora scents the air. How green, how luxuriant, how flowery, appear the woods and fields at such a time! how peaceful the white cottages, embowered in shrubbery, how blithe the singing birds, how balmy the atmosphere, how blue the sky, how glorious the sunshine. Nature then laughs at her own fantastic freaks, and if you listen, you may hear her laugh ringing through the wide old woods, and along the winding streamlets. Indeed is Spring Hill a paradise of a place, along in April and May, and Spring Hill is, for the present, the abiding place of the heroine of my tale, Gertrude M'Neal. She, too, partakes of certain characteristics of the place in which she resides—she is calm, retiring, beautiful as the first blushes of morning:

——"Like a soft landscape of mild earth,
Where all is harmony, and calm, and quiet—
Luxuriant, budding, cheerful without mirth."

Gertrude was not a Psyche in figure, being rather too full for the Grecian standard of symmetrical perfection. Neither were her features strictly regular, still they were possessed of a hidden charm, which drew all hearts towards her. Whence this arose, whether from the provocative pouting of a pair of cherry lips, or from the liquid brilliancy of her large, black eyes, which looked into one's very soul, eloquent of love; or from a complexion wherein the lily contended with the rose—or from the good nature which these combined charms shadowed forth, it would be difficult to define.

Gertrude was an orphan. Her father and mother both died while she was in her infancy, leaving her the sole possessor of an immense estate, real and personal. Her education, however, had not been neglected. An accomplished and pious maiden aunt, by the name of Ormond, had attended to it most faithfully. At present, Gertrude resided with her uncle—Col. Edward Ormond—in one of the prettiest cottages in Spring Hill.

If you have surmised, gentle reader, that Trescot Blackmer was the accepted suitor of this lovely demoiselle, you are in error. That they were on terms of intimacy, however, must be allowed; and to give you an idea how far this intimacy extended, it were as well, perhaps, to introduce you to a scene that took place in her uncle's back parlor, just after she had been taking a morning ride on horseback with the young man.

It was a superb apartment, that parlour, with its quaint and costly furniture, its fine paintings, (sweet landscapes of repose and sunshine,) and its rich silken window-hangings, through which the mellow day beam now stole with subdued influence, reflecting a rosy tint on every object within; and if you are fond of flowers, it were as well to mention a beautiful boquet that stood on the marble centre-table, among a profusion of engravings and richly-embossed annuals, gathered from the garden and placed there by Gertrude. The apartment was a fit place for dreams of love and happiness. However, it is with the tenants of the room, more particularly, with whom we have to do. Gertrude, as I have before observed, had just been riding her pony, in a race with Blackmer, and the excitement had quickened her spirits—had given a fresh glow to her cheeks.

On entering the room, she went dancing up to the piano, threw off her riding-hat—a straw one, with a wreath of golden oats—and seating herself, began singing to a lively air, stanzas as follows:

SONG.

The sun is ushering in the day,
Then up for a merry race—away!
Away to the praires broad and green,
E'er the timid wild fawn quits his lair,
While the grass is bent with the dew drops' sheen,
And the bright verbena scents the air.
Ho! the sky is clear, and the breeze is mild,
Then up, and away for the prairie wild.

Away! there is life in such a ride!
Mark how your courser's hoof is dyed
With the strawberry's crimson juice, and hark!
Those ringing notes, so round and clear—
'Tis the merry song of the prairie lark,
As he warbles it out to his nestlings dear;
Gay life is around us on every hand—
O, where is the like of the prairie land?

The song finished, she turned to Blackmer, who stood by her, absorbed in a brown study.

"How now, Sir Cavalier," said she, jocosely, "hast no words of commendation to bestow upon my song?"

"Commendation—ah!—yes!—I was thinking—that is—I like the song prodigiously—but—"

"Ah—yes—but! Sir knight, one would think thy wits had taken French leave of thee, this morning."

"Gertrude," said he, earnestly, advancing nearer and taking her hand—but here Col. Ormond, attracted by the music, entered the room, and the important avowal was nipped in the bud.

Time flew apace—autumn had taken the place of summer: still, from some cause or other, Blackmer had not yet finished the speech begun on that morning, although many opportunities had offered of so doing. The truth is, a more powerful mistress than love even—the excitement of the gaming-table—ruled him. Day after day, or rather night after night, had he been absorbed in the infatuating excitement. Latterly, he had lost large sums of money; but this only increased his thirst for play—and the effect of his constant watches began to be apparent in his countenance. Gertrude saw that something was wrong with him, and at times her heart was sorrowful; yet nothing had transpired, deemed of sufficient importance to break up the intimacy subsisting between them.

Chapter III.

A FAIR PROSPECT CLOUDED.

The blow had fallen at last. Trescot Blackmer paced his room, in a mingled fit of desperation and despair. His hair was matted and in disorder, his eye blood-shot, his cheek pale and haggard. He was a ruined man. All night had he watched at the faro-table. It had been a night of storm—wind, rain, thunder, and lightning. But the crash of the thunder-bolt, the roar of the great rain, the hollow voice of the winds—what were they to him? His every sense had been intensely concentered in the all-absorbing game, which resulted in the loss of all his property.

The morning was dawning in splendor—the birds without were carrolling their gladness, and nature, refreshed by the warm rain, was robed in smiles—but midnight was on the soul of the gambler. His eyes were at last opened, and as he walked the floor, despair kept dodging before him, mocking him with grim and distorted visions of the future. A pair of highly-polished pistols, lay on the untumbled bed, where he had thrown them on his entrance, and thitherward he occasionally turned a furtive glance. At length, the image of Gertrude M'Neal, the modest, the retired, the injured Gertrude, like some seraphic vision, glided before his mind's eye, and his countenance brightened.

"Why should I repine in poverty?" exclaimed he, with bitter emphasis. "Gertrude has wealth—houses, and stores, and stock in bank; and I am no reader of the heart if she does not love me! She thinks me wealthy, too: a little manœuvering and devotion may do it. And then, I bring not a heart to her untouched by affection. I am in want—this cursed propensity for gambling—why should I not win her, swear out of the gaming hell, and in the enjoyments of domestic life, forget my past follies and weakness? Why"—but here conscience logged in a poser, for Blackmer was not altogether debased—conscience whispered, "Would'st link the fortunes of a young and confiding girl with those of a broken-down gambler?" He swallowed the bitter reflection, however, in a tumbler of wine, and visions of connubial bliss, all the brighter for the clouds that had just threatened his path, opened a fair future before him.

He imbued his face in cold cream, to obliterate the traces of his midnight revel, arranged his toilet, and calling for his horse, or that which had been his, started for Spring Hill. But, good reader, let us, on the invisible steeds of imagination, dash on before him, and reconnoitre.

Chapter IV.

A WORM AT THE HEART OF THE FLOWER.

Gertrude M'Neal was wandering amidst the retired walks of her uncle's garden, where the transparent green of the China trees shielded her from the sun. There was a cast of thoughtful melancholy on her countenance; she felt neglected, for of late she had seen very little of Blackmer. She hears the distant gate swing, followed by advancing footsteps, and her heart beats quick. Still he cometh not. It is Col. Ormond.

"Gertrude," said he, drawing near, "you seem fond of retirement of late. I have been in search of you these ten minutes."

The fair girl looked up inquiringly.

"I have something of importance to communicate, my dear niece, respecting a young gentleman who, I believe, has at times shown a sort of partiality for you," continued he; "I refer to Blackmer."

"Any communication from my uncle, I am bound to listen to with respect," replied Gertrude, making an effort to cloak her feelings.

"My niece's happiness has always been one of my chief studies, and perhaps it may not be considered obtrusive on my part, when I express the hope that the intimacy alluded to has had nothing in it of an extraordinary nature—that is—you understand me."

Gertrude turned pale as the chiselled marble, for though no positive declaration of attachment had ever passed between them, a thousand little attentions, trifling in themselves, but when viewed through the medium of affection, of vast importance, led her to look upon Blackmer as the one destined to share her future fortunes.

"I see how it is," said Ormond, without giving her a chance for reply—"I am sorry that matters have progressed so far—but thank Heaven! it is not too late yet—the young man is wholly unworthy of you—you must discard him!"

"Dear uncle"——

"Yes, Gertrude, if you value your lasting happiness, you will forget him—discard his acquaintance once and forever. He is a gambler—given up body and soul to the excitement of play—has thrown away his all. I blush to own it, Gertrude, but, unperceived by him, I myself saw the sacrifice—and such infatuation never did I see before. Sum after sum he staked and lost, till he had no more. Then followed his plantation, negroes, houses and horses; he even proposed, when all was gone, to stake his own body! In vain his friends tried to persuade him from thus rushing headlong to ruin—they only received abuse and insult for their pains. But when all was gone, consciousness came, and he left the room in despair. No doubt his fertile genius will lead him to look to you to mend his shattered fortunes; but the thought of your marrying such a man makes me shudder. There would be no safety for you. A single night might see your fortune scattered to the winds, as a night has seen his."

Gertrude acknowledged the necessity, and promised, as well as her choaking utterance would admit, to break off all acquaintance with him—never to see him more!

Let us now return to the personage to whom this colloquy had reference. Mounted on his high-metled steed, all unconscious of the reception that awaits him, he is pursuing his way towards Spring Hill. The road is level, the rain has laid the dust, the re-invigorated trees are putting forth new shoots, the bright-winged orioles are glancing through the forest aisles, and the glorious sunshine enlivens the varied landscape. It is no time for despondency, even with the habitual misanthrope. A half hour's gallop brings him to the village, and giving his horse in charge of the servant at the hotel, he bends his elastic steps towards the cottage of Col. Ormond.

The servant who obeyed his summons, but half opened the door, and to his enquiries respecting Gertrude, replied that she was indisposed, and had given orders that no one should be admitted.

"Tell her that Mr. Blackmer waits her pleasure," said our hero, biting his lip.

"And he is de wery gemman ob all that she 'spressly indicate mus not be admitted under any pretexation whatsumeber."

Blackmer did not raise his riding whip to chastise the black for his insolence. Had the communication been couched in the most delicate language, it would have been the same with him—all that appealed to his understanding, was the humiliating fact that he had been denied admittance to the house. Had Gertrude been informed of his ruin?—If so, would she not see through the motive of his present call?—Words will not express the depth of his mortification. Mechanically he turned away and sought the hotel; and throwing himself upon his horse, left the animal to pursue his own course, and more than once came near being tumbled out of the saddle.

It is said a drowning man will catch at a straw—hope at length threw a straw in his way, and he grasped it with passionate energy.

"I will know the worst," he exclaimed aloud.—"The ban of ex-communication can scarcely extend to any note I may choose to write her."

Encouraged by the thought, he assumed the reins, and spurring his steed into a gallop, soon arrived at his hotel. Leave we him there, and return to the lone and lovely Gertrude.

She is sitting at the open window in the little back parlor heretofore described. Her long, glossy locks, which have escaped from comb and bandeau, are hanging in disarray over her rounded shoulder and snowy bosom—but of this she is unconscious. Fitfully the saucy zephyr, dallying with the pendant masses of multiflora and jessamine hanging about the casement, shakes down a shower of fragrant leaves upon her, but she heeds them not. Before her, opening out under the green waving China trees and broad-leafed catalpas, is spread a wilderness of bloom and blossoms: but her gaze is vacant, and on her eyelash, a tear-drop flashes and twinkles to a truant sunbeam, like a molten diamond. Calm and cool settles down the evening; the pilgrim of day is sinking to his rest without an attendant cloud, lone as a forsaken monarch—lone as Gertrude M'Neal. The faint and far-off low of home-returning cattle falls musically on the ear—the hum of the swift-winged bee is vividly distinct; every object partakes of the serenity and repose of evening, but Gertrude. Her heart is open to but one idea: the withering consciousness that she had cast off forever, the being in whom her whole heart's pure affections were concentrated. She had heard his well-known step approach the door—had heard her own name upon his lips, and the servant's taunting reply—she had listened to his dilatory and irregular footsteps as he retreated—and her heart was ready to break.

Gertrude was at length aroused from the stupor which enchained her, by the entrance of a servant. He brought a note superscribed in the well-known hand-writing of Blackmer. She broke the seal, and read a declaration of attachment, couched in most passionate and glowing language, and picturing scenes of domestic happiness which she alone had the power to transform to reality. The note wound up by conjuring her to let no idle report, or caprice of the moment, decide against him.

Gertrude's resolution wavered—the decision was almost too much for her. But principle at length triumphed. She returned an answer, discarding the gambler forever.

Chapter V.

A FATAL PLUNGE.

The following day, Blackmer received the missive which decided his fate. Long did he gaze at the cherished hand-writing, and scarcely could he realize the import of the lines. "Forever!" there was a sound in the word, as he abstractedly repeated it, which smote on his heart, like a death-pang. He dared not face the future—yet the blank, dread, gloomy pictures of futurity, in spite of him, would fight their way into his soul.

What must he do for a livelihood?—whither should he go? Something must be done, and done immediately; but having never had occasion to take the first step towards earning his own living, he was utterly at a loss how to proceed. To delve and toil, day after day, over moth-eaten and greasy ledgers like some of the pale clerks at the warehouses, or among the cotton-bales on the piers, or to figure in a subordinate capacity, on board some of the steamboats—such seemed his only alternatives—but was he competent for either of these stations?

The more he pondered, the darker his prospect seemed to grow. He owed his landlord, his tailor, and his servant. At last, as if to escape from thought, he rushed into the street, but the demon still dogged him. The night had set in with tempest, but of this he was hardly aware. On he hurried, almost the only person exposed to the inclement weather, while the wind moaned amid the walled labyrinths of the city, and the torrent rain swept around him as if all the "windows of heaven" were open. Presently, the brilliant light of a gas lamp, flashing on the swollen water course and streaming side-walk, induced him to raise his eyes, and he found himself in front of the gambling hell where he had lost his property. Mechanically he turned in. The shouts of Bacchanalian song and laughter, emanated from a side room.—There was wormwood in levity; he stopped his ears, and hurried on to the faro room. Here all was hushed as the tomb—not a sound, save the click of the counters, the rattle of the dice, or the shuffling of the cards, broke the spell. The gambler has no time for jolity.

Blackmer's former cronies eyed him furtively, as he entered; they knew that he had been plucked, and therefore would be a borrower rather than a lender for the future; still, more from habit than owing to any feeling of courtesy, they made room for him at the table.

Long did the ruined man watch the game—hours—for to the gamester there is a sort of fascination even in noting the freaks of fortune, although he may have no immediate interest therein; and for the while his perplexities were almost forgotten. At length he imagined, what many a ruined gambler had imagined before him, that he had discovered a turn in the game by which he would be sure of winning. But how should he obtain the wherewithal to make the trial? During his progress as gambler, he had had considerable experience in writing notes—which notes were generally discounted at a round per centage—and his first thought was to try to make a raise in this way; but would his name now pass? His evil genius, of late always at hand, suggested that he might borrow a name which would produce the specific, and that his winnings from a few turns of the cards would immediately make all right again. He drew off from the table, and stole out of the apartment, and on his return produced a note for $500, purporting to have been drawn by a well-known house in the city, which he had no difficulty in disposing of.

It hardly need be said that the certain method of winning, which he had hit upon, proved rather to be a certain way of losing. One hundred dollars was staked and lost;—he became excited. Another hundred followed;—he grew desperate; and the balance went at a single stake! The loss made him perfectly frantic; and drawing a bowie knife from his bosom, and striking a pile of ivory counters before him with such force as to sever them down to the table, he swore that he had been cheated, and that he would have revenge. Pistols were immediately produced, and knives drawn; and the fracas ended in his being turned into the street.

His cup was now come to the dregs. His first thought was to end his troubles with his existence, at once; but the idea of future retribution came upon him, and he threw his bowie knife and pistol into the river. Justice would be hard upon him as soon as the news of the forgery got abroad. He was in a dilemma as to what course to follow; when, seeing a steamer firing up at one of the piers, he got on board, and at daylight was dashing down the bay, on his way to New Orleans.

Chapter VI.

A STAR AMIDST THE CLOUDS.

It need scarcely be said that Blackmer's forgery was soon discovered and bruited about the city.—Gertrude M'Neal received the intelligence from her uncle. At first she would not believe, but the proof was too strong long to admit of doubt.

"But, my dear uncle, his necessities might have driven to it," said she.

"Don't commiserate the villain on that score, Gertrude," rejoined the Colonel; "the forged only to lose at the faro table. The money has gone, and so has he, no one knows whither."

Gertrude cared not to hear more. Her uncle departed, and she commenced pacing the room, a prey to the keenest anguish. At length a cheering thought seemed to strike her, and her countenance brightened. "I will do it!" she exclaimed, and immediately left the room.

On the afternoon of the day following that of the discovery of the forgery, Mr. Ostrander, the principal of the house by which the spurious paper purported to have been drawn, was surprised by a visit from a young female—a circumstance the like of which seldom transpired in the smoky region over which he presided. A cottage straw and green veil concealed her features, and whether they were fair or ugly, could not be decided; but if a form of faultless proportions, and a voice whose low, timid tones created a strange flutter about the heart, was indicative of loveliness, she must have been a perfect Hebe.

"Is this Mr. Ostrander?" inquired the fair incognito.

"It is, madam; at your service."

"I believe there was a forgery committed in your name, yesterday," said the lady, drawing further into the counting-room, as if to screen herself from the inquisitive gaze of a young clerk who was writing near.

"Yes—I,—I—think we discovered something of the kind."

"You may be surprised, sir, at the request I am about to make, coming as it does from one who is, and must remain, a perfect stranger to you; but oh, sir, I trust you will grant it. I came here to implore you to assume that fatal note as genuine, and have brought with me money sufficient to make you whole should you do so."

The merchant leaned forward and contracted his eyebrows, as if he did not fully comprehend her.

"Take upon myself a forgery!" said he. "Are you aware, young lady, of what you ask? I am fearful"——

"O, do not deny me!" interrupted the demoiselle. "I know it is an improper request; but, by complying, you may save the good name of a once proud family from an indelible stain—you may save a talented young man from utter ruin."

"Extraordinary! extraordinary!" ejaculated Ostrander, thoughtfully; "but I suppose you must have strong reasons for asking it, and it would, perhaps, be ungenerous for me to demur to the proposition, more especially as I shall not be the loser."

"Many thanks," replied the lady; "but, one other tax on your generosity. You may perceive by the course I have adopted, that secrecy has been thought very essential in this matter."

"Say no more, madam; I shall consider my honor concerned in keeping the transaction to myself."

The lady held out her hand—which was small and delicate as alabaster—in recognition of the kindness, then drew from her reticule a bundle of bank notes, and handed them to the man of cotton bales; and, having ascertained that the sum was correct, left the store.

Ostrander had an irrepressible curiosity to know more about his mysterious visiter; so, substituting a straw hat for his sleek beaver, and a thin frock for his shop coat, he sallied out to follow her.

The lady hurried on from one street to another, always taking the most retired, until at length she came to an enclosure just out of the city, where a slave with a couple of horses was in waiting. The negro helped her into one of the saddles, and taking the other himself, they set off at a hard gallop, and were soon out of sight.

"A very pretty adventure, by Jupiter!" exclaimed the merchant, turning on his heel; and, wrapped in a brown study, he took the nearest route back to his counting room.

Immediately on his arrival at his place of business, he despatched his confidential clerk in pursuit of the individual who was in possession of the forged paper, with a check to pay it, and orders neither to ask or answer any questions concerning the reason of the payment. In the course of half an hour the clerk returned with the note, and the merchant immediately committed it to the flames.

About a week after this, as Ostrander was standing in the door-way of his ware-room, a negro came dashing up, on a blood-horse, whose faultless proportions and spirited carriage attracted the admiration of every person in the street. Like the wild steed of the Ukraine, the animal

> "Looked as though the speed of thought

Dismounting, and securing him to a post in front of the building, the rider presented the merchant with a billet, and immediately hurried away a pied. Ostrander broke the seal, and read as follows:—

"Kind Sir—Please accept the animal in charge of the bearer, as a token of gratitude from the stranger you so generously aided in the matter of the forged note, and further oblige by making no inquiries."

The reader need hardly be informed that the lady actress in these scenes was no other than Gertrude M'Neal. She had her reward. The satisfaction of having taken a principal step towards relieving the name of her lost and ruined lover from obloquy, tended to allay the keenness of her disappointment; and she gradually became placid, but still pensive—like a sweet landscape after gale and tempest have swept over it, and left the willows drooping, the forest oaks in disarray, and the wild flowers with their faces in the grass; while yet

> Still shake the winding, silver stream,
> And fill its waves with sadness."

Chapter VII.

CORNED BEEF AND CABBAGE.

Turn we again to Blackmer. Gloomy indeed were his reflections as the boat dashed onward towards Lake Ponchartrain. All night he sat on the burricane-deck, and often did he cast a longing look at the water that fumed and sparkled in the wake of the boat. His thoughts at length reverted to his mother, and her dying advice to him, and courage at once sprang into his heart to reform—and, dropping on his knees, he fervently prayed Heaven to aid him in so doing. On arising, he felt a calmness of spirits to which he had long been a stranger;—hope told him that he might yet live to be respected and happy.

On the morning of the second day, the steamer came alongside the pier at the end of the Ponchartrain rail-road; and, jumping into one of the cars, in the course of half an hour Blackmer found himself amidst the confusion and bustle of the "Crescent City." The trackless forest, the arid desert, are not more solitary to the friendless and companionless wanderer, than are the teeming thoroughfares of a strange city; and while wandering about, at a loss as to what course he should pursue, all his recent despondency returned upon him.

He had made a resolve that he would scarcely rest, day or night, till he had accumulated a sufficient sum to refund the money he had obtained by the forgery. He would turn his hand to anything—would be a subordinate clerk, a porter, a steamboat hand even, if it would only enable him to accomplish something towards this object. But all sorts of business seemed to be overdone—everybody seemed to shun him. The storekeepers and the steamboat captains turned away from his applications with suspicious looks, and the shipping officers, abashed by his genteel appearance and urbanity, informed him that he was of too slight frame for their purposes. No course seemed left him at last, but to beg or starve; and towards night, weary and hungry, he stood leaning against one of the lamp-posts, on the levee, when a rough-looking sailor came reeling up to him.

"Holloa, shipmate," exclaimed the old tar, "what the deuce is to pay, that you have come to anchor there in mid-channel? Shiver my topsails! but you look as if you had just been spoken to by the Flying Dutchman—or had been kept on short allowance for the matter of a month's viage or so. Get underway, my hearty, and let's have a cruise together."

Blackmer seemed half inclined to go, but hesitated.

"Up anchor, man, and get under sail," persisted the jolly fellow.

"If I had the change, my first object would be to get me a supper," replied Blackmer. "I parted with my last half dollar in paying the rail-road fare from the Lake to the city, this morning."

"No rhino!" exclaimed Jack—"not a shot in the locker! Stove in my bulwarks! if you arn't just the chap I've been cruising for."

"You want ballast, too—your top-hamper is too heavy for your tonnage," continued he, as Blackmer staggered towards him, almost overcome by his kindness, though so roughly manifested.

"Scant of provisions! that's what I call the worst predicament that may come upon a man. I've seen some rough times in my time, I may say. I recollect I felt rather queerish like when my old flame, Lizzy Sprigs, cut adrift from my wake, and took up with a beggarly bargeman; I had a fit of the Newfoundland vapours, too, when I got jugged in a d—d French hole of a calaboose, where they didn't give us nothing to eat but a brown, blasted article they called *pain—and rightly named it was, as my jaws would have testified—and where all we got to drink was a beggarly stuff they called loo;† may I be keel hauled if it didn't look and taste like ditch water. Perhaps they would have called it Water-loo, only they didn't like the sound. But I never knowed what it was really to suffer till I got cast away on the Madagascar Reef, and we got short of provisions. Lord love you! it makes me feel keen set to think of it! Let's bear down on some of these beggarly parley-voos, and lay in stores."

Blackmer gladly acceded, for he had eaten nothing during the whole day.

They soon came to a restaurant, and the sailor hailed as he entered—

"Holloa! old vooly-voo-kick-shins-sharp-raizons, give us beef-steaks, rum and onions for six, and apple-sauce gimcrackeries to match—and bear a hand about it, or dash my vis! but I'll"——

"Ouir sair, tout suit," replied Monsieur, with a complaisant smile, accustomed to the ways of the sailors, and generally reckoning for their rough language in the bill.

The articles called for soon made their appearance on the table, and Blackmer commenced operations on the steaks as though he were eating for a wager. His mandibles had been doing great execution for about fifteen minutes, without cessation, when Jack, who in the meantime had confined his attentions almost exclusively to the stone bottle, thrust it towards him, exclaiming—

"Gadzo! my hearty—you go at it like a shark among a school of rudder-fish—take a sweetener!"

Our hero turned him out half a tumbler, and hurriedly drank it off, and was proceeding to a renewed attack on the beef and onions, when the jolly tar drew away the plate, with a look of astonishment, exclaiming—

"Heave short there, my hearty; you are loaded down to your bends already, and if you take in more cargo you'll be too deep to swim in anything like rough weather. A man as has been on short allowance should mind how he stows away his grub. Come—hurrah! now for a cruise."

Blackmer arose reluctantly from the table. But he had already eaten more than was consistent with prudence, and his head spun around so that he would have fallen but for the assistance of his new friend.

The latter seemed to look upon himself as the originator of the mischief.

"Douse my glims!" said he; "couldn't an old salt like myself keep a better look-out to leeward?—You're among the breakers already; we must get you into a snug harbor instanter. Where away shall we lay our course?"

"I am a stranger in the city," was the reply; "but leave me here, I shall be well enough in a few minutes."

"Leave you here? Gadzookees! it shall never be said that Ben Rawson ever forsook a ship-mate in distress. Come along with me; I am second-mate of the good ship Trenton, of Bath, away down east—by good luck our men have run away, so that we have plenty of spare bunks."

They accordingly sought the vessel, and Blackmer found comfortable quarters for the night. He arose betimes in the morning, in much better health and spirits than on the evening previous, and after agitating the matter over awhile, came to the conclusion to reveal his situation to the captain of the ship, and to ask his assistance. The captain, who possessed more than an ordinary share of the milk of human kindness in his heart, commiserated his destitute condition, and being satisfied from his personal appearance and address that he was a young man of no ordinary character, engaged him at good wages to take an account of the cargo then discharging. This duty was so well performed, and our hero proved himself so good a companion, that his patron became quite attached to him, and at last proposed that he should take a voyage to Europe, as clerk of the ship.

Blackmer gladly accepted a proposal which would put him out of the way of pursuit, and, in due time, the vessel, having loaded with cotton, sailed on her voyage.

The winter passed by, wearily enough for Gertrude; and Col. Ormond, wishing to draw off her mind from every thing that might serve as a memento of her discarded lover, proposed that she should accompany him in a visit to his plantation near the town of Selma, some three hundred miles up the Alabama river. Gertrude readily consented to go, and a bright day in May saw them on board a steam packet, sailing up the broad stream.

There is a magical influence in the rush of a powerful steamer, enlivening to one's spirits, especially on such a river as the Alabama—a river which, for untamed and luxuriant scenery, is scarcely surpassed by any in our country. The lofty bluff, draped with massy, flowering vines, the intricate forest crowding to the water's edge, the tufted cane-brake, through which no living thing but the lithe snake can penetrate, the emerald-green islet, and an ever-winding channel are the characteristics of this noble stream. And the influence of the scene was not lost upon Gertrude.

In due time they arrived at Selma, and Gertrude and her uncle retired to his plantation house. The calm beauty of the place delighted her, and she soon became contented, and, we might say, happy.

There was a vague presentiment in her heart, that she was yet destined to share her fortunes with Blackmer in life—but the summer, autumn, and winter, successively passed away, and nought was heard of him. Still, this presentiment, dim and and far-off as it was, induced her to reject several offers of marriage, when no objection could be named against the suitors, either as to personal appearance or character. But heart-rending intelligence was in store for her.

At that time the Creek Indians were engaged in hostilities against the whites, and daily came accounts of their fiendish cruelties perpetrated upon the weak, the defenceless, the young and beautiful. It was rumored that a white man was among them urging them on in the work of murder and rapine, and one of the scouts sent out to watch the motions of the savages, who had known Trescot Blackmer at Mobile, declared that this coadjutor with the savages was no other than our old friend, whom we last left on his way to Europe!

Gertrude heard these rumors, but was altogether incredulous. Conviction, however, came at last.

Early one morning, a courier dashed into the village, from the seat of conflict. His panting horse seemed ready to sink with fatigue, and he himself, in his haggard countenance and soiled apparel, bore the marks of a long and weary ride. He stopped at Col. Ormond's door. He brought the astounding intelligence that the town of Roanoke had been attacked by the savages and entirely burnt, and that the inhabitants had been destroyed, almost to an individual—himself and two others, a woman and her child, being all that had escaped.

The savages had been led on by a white man, whose name, it was ascertained, was Blackmer, and from the description given of his person, there could be no doubt as to his identity with the ruined gamester of Mobile.

Gertrude herself received an account of the desperate affair from the lips of their weary guest. He recounted all the particulars—the onset of the savage foe, the glare of the conflagration, the shrieks of mothers and children, the desperate deeds of fathers and sons, the yells of the painted Indians, as they flitted to and fro in the red light of the burning houses, like fiends from the infernal pit, and their wild exultation over their helpless victims. Could she believe that her lost lover, once the pride of the circle in which he had moved, had become so lost to every feeling of humanity as to incite to such deeds of hellish cruelty? But how disbelieve?

Overflowing with conflicting emotions, she left the room, and wandered out among the embowered walks of the garden, in hopes of calming her turbulent spirits.

She had seated herself on a rustic bench, at the foot of a shady locust, whose bending boughs, in concert with the feathery foliage of a cluster of accacias, screened her from observation, when a rustling among the leaves caused her to start, and, looking up, her eye met the keen gaze of the very person who was in her thoughts—the lost, the recreant Blackmer. His apparel was worn, and soiled with many a stain—perhaps of the blood of innocence—his hair long and matted, his beard unshaven, and his eyes bloodshot. Gertrude, in whose imagination the pictures of the recent savage outrage were vividly present, was about to flee in terror from him, but he bent upon her such an imploring look, that she was constrained to pause.

"Gertrude!" said he.

Pale as death, the trembling girl bent her fearful gaze upon him—but there was a fascination in his eye—she could not go.

"Gertrude," said he, "I have at length obtained a long-sought interview, but in sorry plight——"

"Oh, leave me! leave me!" burst from the lips of the frightened girl; "I cannot talk with one whose hands are scarcely now free from the stains of innocent blood!"

"What!" exclaimed he, "can you believe such a horrid tale? Then, indeed, am I watched, and the world for me in future will be but a hell."

"Can you deny it?" ejaculated Gertrude. "Your accuser—he who saw you in the midst of the savages at the burning of Roanoke, is now in the house; I have just been listening to a recital of the terrors and cruelties of that wild night—and you were named as one of the chief leaders in the fiendish massacre. Oh, Trescot! Trescot! the clotted blood still on you clothing but too plainly authenticates his relations."

"I shudder to say that appearances are strongly against me," replied Blackmer, "but so far from having innocent blood to answer for, I am the avenger of innocence—the stains you see are of the life blood of the savage myrmidons. They were about to bury their knives in the bosoms of two helpless females who had escaped from Roanoke—a mother and daughter—when I came upon them. The sight lent more than human strength to my arm. That mother and child are in safety, and the fiends who were about taking their lives, will never more raise the scalping knife. If, Gertrude, you will give me a hearing, I believe I can explain away present appearances."

Gertrude still hesitated—but her interest in the young man prevailed.

"You doubtless heard of my delinquencies at Mobile, after I had written you and received your answer, discarding my suit. On that fatal night, I committed forgery—forged a note and lost the money raised thereon, at the gaming-table; and, to escape the penalties of the law, fled to New Orleans. I cannot describe to you the horror I felt when a full consciousness of the crime I had committed came upon me, but it resulted in a determination that I would abjure gaming for ever, and win my way back to the station I had forfeited, if perseverance and economy would accomplish this object.—Soon after my arrival at New Orleans, I entered as clerk on board of a ship, and in this capacity went to Europe, and from thence to New York, where I entered the counting-room of a firm who owned a large amount of goods brought by the ship, at a high salary; the captain having been pleased to express to them his approbation of the manner in which I had conducted myself during the voyage. My first grand object now, was to hoard my earnings until I had obtained enough to pay the amount of my forgery. In a year's time, having realized enough for that purpose, I set out for the South; but in passing through the Creek country, the mail coach in which I was passenger, was fired upon by the Indians. A fellow-traveller was killed by the shots, but the driver and myself fell uninjured into the hands of the savages.

"We were stripped of everything we possessed, bound hand and foot, and given into the custody of the squaws of the tribe, as we supposed, to be put to death with torture at a more convenient opportunity. But there was one inducement for me to try to escape, if no more—that fatal note! As the only means of accomplishing this, I endeavored to ingratiate myself into the good-will of the Indians, and feigned to be very zealous for their welfare. My plan succeeded so far as to divest me of my bonds, but still I was watched by jealous eyes.

"The premeditated attack upon Roanoke, was kept a secret from me; otherwise I would have hazarded everything to have put its unconscious inhabitants on their guard. I was, however, taken to the scene of butchery and death, and hence probably the story of my having participated in these horrid excesses, originated.

"Amidst the confusion of the attack, I contrived to escape, and Providence afterwards put me in the way of rescuing the two females I told you of, from the savages. Have I convinced you Gertrude—or has one mis-step in my life prejudiced you against me forever?"

Gertrude's heart was almost too full for utterance. She saw there had been no endeavor to gloss over his misdeeds—she was satisfied that his character had been traduced, even at a time when he had risked his life against fearful odds, to rescue the helpless. Misfortune had only brought into play the better qualities of his heart, and all her fond affections and sympathies towards him were renewedly awakened.

"O, what can be done?" she at length exclaimed fixing her large, black, tearful eyes upon him. "You must flee hence—away, Trescot, this moment! They are going to offer a reward for your head, and under the present state of excitement and prejudice against you, it would be considered doing God service to take your life. Hasten! conceal yourself instantly. How can I—how can I contrive to hide you?"

Blackmer's face brightened, although but now informed that his life hung, as it were, on a hair. He perceived that Gertrude M'Neal still loved him, and there was elysium in the conviction.

"Gertrude—dear Gertrude!" said he, "you do then believe me innocent! And the anxiety you show for my welfare—O! could I but hope that I possessed a place in your affections, I should look upon this as the happiest moment of my existence, although surrounded as I am, by imminent dangers. Gertrude say but that you will think kindly of me hereafter. One word from those lips—but, penniless and an outcast as I am, how can I expect"——

"For mercy's sake—for my sake! Trescot, talk not thus," interrupted the weeping girl. "Do not tamper with your life. Leave this place—leave the country—hide yourself—even now the avengers of blood may be upon your track—fly!"

"Fly without anything to hope for—with nothing to live for?" persisted Blackmer. "One word will nerve me for a thousand perils! One word and I go. May I hope that for one year you will remain single?"

Gertrude extended to him her trembling hand, and hid her face on his shoulder—"I promise anything—everything, if you will but fly; for a year—for ever, dear Trescot. Never will I wed but with your consent—I am yours. Now, if you prize my love, go. Fly on the wings of the wind to the North Country, until you can establish your innocence by proofs.—Go—O do go instantly!"

Still she withdrew not her hand from his, so inconsistent were the workings of her better judgment with her inclinations.

Blackmer imprinted an impassioned kiss upon her lips—"a long, long kiss—a kiss of youth and love," to which she made no resistance. Reluctantly he then turned to go, but she still clung to him.

"O, what will become of me, should you fall into the hands of your enemies? Remember, Trescot"——

Here the sound of approaching footsteps caught the young lady's ear; she started and relinquished his hand. One gentle embrace, and the tall form of her lover was hid in the thicket of shrubbery—when, for the sake of rendering his retreat more secure, Gertrude turned into the main walk to meet the person advancing. It was her uncle, on his way apparently to the cottages of the slaves, which were situated just without the garden.

"Ah! Gertrude, it was you then whose tread I heard—I thought it was some one of heavier frame. Your eyes betray you—you have been weeping—you must not let your commiserations for the unfortunates of Roanoke, overset your reason."

"Dear uncle, do you believe all the stranger has said in regard to Trescot Blackmer?"

"Believe it!" exclaimed the colonel with some asperity—"I am sorry to hear you ask the question—I thought you had got over that weakness."

"Weakness! uncle—is it weakness to hold a man innocent before he has been proved guilty? I am convinced that Blackmer has been wronged in this matter."

"Pho, pho, Gertrude—it is idle to talk thus.—Accept my arm and let me wait upon you into the house."

"Uncle Ormond," said she, with emphasis, "beware that you take no part in the proceedings against Blackmer—he is innocent," and without waiting for a reply she dodged by him, and sought the retirement of her own chamber—there to remain in the most torturing suspense, fearing to hear every moment that her lover had been taken.

At the dinner table Gertrude's anxiety, which she endeavored in vain to conceal, was again noticed by the colonel, and thinking of it in connection with the conversation he had had with her in the garden, he began to suspect that she had received intelligence from Blackmer of a more definite character than had come to his knowledge. But by what means could this have been brought about? There was a mystery to be solved somewhere; of this the colonel was satisfied.

When he arose from the table, he informed her that he was about to leave home for two or three days, and expressed a hope to see her more composed and in better spirits on his return.

This announcement brought the crimson to Gertrude's brow in a moment, for she was convinced that Blackmer's safety or peril was concerned in her uncle's movements; and her anxiety was increased to the highest pitch when she learned that several of the most trusty slaves on the plantation, were to accompany him. Had he received intelligence that Blackmer was in the neighborhood? Her heart fainted within her at the thought. What could be done? At length she came almost to a determination to inform him of the interview which she had had with her lover, and the story the latter had then told in reference to his connection with the savages, but she dreaded lest the colonel should not give credence to the story. While she was hesitating as to the best policy to pursue, Ormond and his followers mounted their horses and rode off.

There was now no remedy, and all that remained to Gertrude was to suffer the pangs of suspense till the return of the party.

Chapter IX.

"WO WORTH THE CHASE"

Colonel Ormond, followed by his trusty servants, and a hound of keen scent, which had been used to trail runaway negroes, started off briskly on the road towards Roanoke. After travelling some five or six miles, the hound stopped at the turning off of a bye-path, and began to bay.

"Aha! Cora," said Ormond, "you have got on the wrong scent; it is no runaway negro that we are after now," and he put his horn to his mouth (a bullock's horn, such as is used in that part of the country by hunters, to call their dogs together), and blew a blast that echoed far through the forest. But in vain he summoned the dog. Cora could not be drawn away from the scent; and at length, impressed with the belief, from the pertinacity of the animal, that something of consequence might transpire, worth a few hours' delay, he concluded to follow her.

They accordingly struck off into the forest, whose dense foliage, impenetrable to the rays of the sun, created eternal twilight. The dog trotted on, snuffing the trail, hither and yon and athwart, leading them such a circuitous route, that more than once Ormond's patience was at its lowest ebb.

Sometimes the luxuriant wild grape, the flowering smoke vine, and masses of nameless twining and fibrous creepers, clinging from tree to tree, and from bough to bough, opposed a complete barrier to their progress, and was the occasion of a wide detour.—Then again an impenetrable cane brake would interrupt their path—anon a swampy jungle of the wild honey-suckle, a sluggish water-course, or a tangled gully, obliging them to dismount and lead their horses. Wilder and yet more wild grew the wilderness, and to appearance mortal footstep had never invaded its gloomy precincts before.

Col. Ormond would have turned back, but while revolving over in his mind Gertrude's confident asseverations as to Blackmer's innocence, he began to have vague suspicions that that personage, whose capture, it is hardly necessary to say, was the object of the expedition, was in the neighborhood, and possibly they might be now on his track; and the bare harboring of such an idea, was a sufficient motive to push him on. But at length they came to an apparently impassable swamp, and here the dog, for the first time, was at fault. At their approach, a company of water-moccasins* ran hissing into the tall reeds, and this circumstance convinced Ormond that no individual was harboring near.

The Colonel began to think they had had a long and rough ride for their pains, when Cora sprang upon a fallen tree, and with a loud bark, indicating that she had again struck the trail, started forward. Ormond and his followers could not cross the trunk on horseback, so securing their cattle to the trees, and seizing their fire-arms, they set forward on foot.

The dog, in the meantime, had got out of sight, but they hurried on in the direction they supposed she had taken, till suddenly her loud baying notified them as to her whereabouts, and assured them she had made a discovery.

But Ormond was again doomed to disappointment. The dog stood at the edge of a lofty bluff, the bank of one of the main river's tributaries, and so steep was it, and so deep the water, that it would be next to impossible for a person to cross at that point.

It was as wild a spot as imagination could conceive. The stream here took a sudden bend, and the current—during the spring freshets, perchance—had so undermined the bank, that many of the great trees had fallen from their upright position, and, still secured to the earth above by their tough roots, hung pendant with all their leafy honors, far over the deep, turbid water that flowed beneath. In the rear, the swamp oak and ash stood in thick array, like sable mourners, with their long beards of moss sweeping the ground, and patches of spindled canes trembled to an eternal current of pestilential miasma that swept from the impenetrable depths of the swamp.

Cora still continued to waken the echos far and near with her loud baying, and several times she attempted to go down on the trunk of one of the huge trees depending from the bank, but it was too steep for her. This led the Colonel to suppose that the object of their pursuit, whoever he might be, was concealed in its luxuriant bough; a more effectual place of concealment, indeed, could not have been selected. But how to ascertain for a certainty was the question.

The party scattered themselves up and down the bank, and climbed into the boughs of the neighboring trees on every hand, but the massy foliage of the pendant oak was impervious to their sight. Ormond, determined not to give up the chase, was about giving directions for one of the slaves to go to the nearest house, which was some miles off, for an axe, when lo! a coat tail dropped below one of the limbs of the tree. A wild shout of exultation burst from the negroes, and the Colonel called upon the owner of the coat-tail, whoever he might be, to give himself up to their custody. Echo only answered. What was to be done? Ormond was at a stand. The concealed individual was protected from their fire-arms, by the gnarled boughs of the oak, and the negroes were afraid to venture down, lest they should be fired upon.

After many ineffectual plans and traverses, Ormond at length, by mounting into the uppermost sought of a neighboring tree, succeeded in obtaining a view of the tacit hermit of the oak. It was no other than the unfortunate Blackmer, who had wandered hither with the intention of following down the stream to the main river, where he was in hopes of obtaining a conveyance by steamboat, to Mobile, which seemed to be the safest course left him.

The Colonel, whose mind was entirely under the influence of the horrid recitals he had heard from the man of Roanoke, was gratified beyond measure in thus recognizing the individual whom he considered as chief leader in those outrages, and whose capture had been the object of the expedition. He was ripe for summary proceedings, and could scarcely restrain his exultation.

"Aha! vile murderer," exclaimed he, "have I found you, and so soon? Surrender yourself at once, or I'll drive a ball through your heart."

Blackmer turned about and sat upright on the bough.

"Colonel Ormond," said he, "I warn you to beware what you do. If you fire, you may kill an innocent man. For Heaven's sake, be not so rash—for your niece's sake, hold your hand."

"Miscreant!" shouted Ormond, exasperated to the highest pitch, "dare you speak of her after what has passed? Surrender instantly, or, by ——, I fire!"

"Ormond, we were once friends," returned Blackmer, dejectedly; "do not heap injury upon one who for month's past has been the brunt of misfortune. Appearances were against me, and I sought to conceal myself from an infuriated populace till I could prove my innocence, and for that reason alone am I here. If you wish to see another happy day, I conjure you to leave me to myself."

"Ha! ha! ha!—And was this the compassion you showed towards the helpless sufferers of Roanoke?" cried Ormond, in a tone of derision, at the same time levelling his rifle. "I give you but a moment to come to terms. Surrender!—I never miss my aim!"

"Fire, then, and bring sorrow forever on your household. Time will show that I am innocent of the crimes with which I am charged, and the stings of remorse"——

The sharp crack of Ormond's rifle clipped the words on the tongue of the unfortunate man, and his lifeless body dropped with an ominous plunge, that reverberated with vivid distinctness through the surrounding woods, into the deep, sullen water below.

The negroes ran to the edge of the bank, and with outstretched necks and wondering eyes, stood watching for the reappearance of the body on the surface of the stream; but the bubbles ceased, and the water flowed on undisturbed. Many minutes did they listen, but a silence, deep and breathless, reigned through the sleeping forest, and not a ripple on the lethe flood below disturbed the spell.

It seemed as if the blacks dreaded to move, excepting so far as to edge towards each other—and even the Colonel himself was not altogether devoid of a sort of mysterious faintness of heart.

The forest aisles, by this time, began to grow dusk with the coming night, and Ormond gave orders to return; but the weight of gloom which oppressed the party was by no means lessened, when, on looking back, they saw a huge buzzard girating slowly on broad wing, over the place where poor Blackmer had fallen.

The tramp back through the woods was indeed a lonely one. By good luck they found the horses, ere the utter darkness which characterized the night came on—after which, their only course was to let the animals follow their own instinct. The hill-fox barked, and the screech-owl hooted far through the impenetrable blackness of the spectre woods; the venomous snake hissed, and the ignis fatuus, or jack o'lantern, moved to and fro over the murky surface of the morasses—and after floundering about till after midnight, heartily glad were they to heave in sight of the plantation house.

Chapter X.

RETRIBUTION.

When Ormond arrived at the house, he was surprised, and indeed somewhat alarmed, to find Gertrude still up. On hearing the tramp of the horses, she came running to the door to meet him, with her hair in disarray and cheek flushed.

"O, I am so glad you have returned!" cried she, eagerly, "he is innocent! he is innocent! as I told you he was. Here are the woman and her daughter in the house, whom he saved from the savages at the risk of his life."

"Who is innocent?" queried the Colonel, while a cold chill struck to his heart from apprehension.

"Why, Trescot Blackmer, to be sure. Come in—come into the house, and hear her tell the story—how, single-handed and alone, he rushed upon the three Indians, and"—

Here Gertrude stopped, for her uncle suddenly became pale as death, and caught hold of the door-post, as if his strength had left him. The excited girl beat a keen, inquisitive glance upon him—a fearful look, as if she would pry into his innermost soul—

[illegible] turned towards the trembling slaves, who still stood, holding their horses, in the light that streamed from the open door.

"Where is he?" she at length demanded, with an emphasis that amounted almost to a shriek.

No answer was returned.

A moment she stood, like the chiselled marble, then clapped her hands over her eyes, as if to shut out some dread image. Suddenly the blood gushed from her lips and nostrils, and she fell backwards upon the floor of the entry.

The whole house was immediately in an uproar. The servants ran to and fro, not knowing what to do; and he, who should have directed them, was almost as much stupefied as the senseless girl in his arms.

At length, the woman of Roanoke, alarmed by the cries of distress, came out. She had of late looked upon too many scenes of suffering to be disconcerted—and she ordered Gertrude to be taken at once to her own room, and laid on the bed. Long did the heart-stricken girl remain in a swoon, giving no signs of life, except by the deep sobs that now and then heaved her snowy bosom—every one of which caused the crimson blood to ooze with renewed violence from her lips, saturating the bosom of her dress, and the white counterpane. Pale and death-like,

"she lay,
As fair a thing as e'er was formed of clay."

She revived at last, but it was only to swoon away again as soon as consciousness came—until reason forsook its throne. For weeks she remained thus, sometimes raving of her lost lover, and heaping fearful imprecations upon the authors of his death—and, at other times, docile and happy under some pleasing hallucination—the fever, all the while, seeming neither to increase nor abate. But, by and by, when the cooler weather of autumn set in, the natural strength of her constitution triumphed, and phrenzy ceased. Still, memory seemed gone, or the past forgotten. Her mind was like the waters of the ocean, after a hurricane, windless, waveless—blank, dread and solitary. Like Byron's imaginary Haidee,

"She looked on many a face with vacant eye,
On many a token without knowing what,
She saw them watch her without knowing why,
And reckoned not who around her pillow sat!
Not speechless, though she spoke not—not a sigh
Revealed her thoughts; dull silence and quick chat
Were tried in vain by those who served—she gave
No sign, save breath, of having left the grave."

The unfortunate girl continued gradually to gain strength and consciousness, but she was not the Gertrude M'Neal that had once been the sunlight of all about her. She never, by word, look, or action, referred to the catastrophe that had blighted her dreams of happiness, but avoided all contact with her fellow-mortals, and for days would scarcely utter a syllable. And yet her heart must needs have something to lavish all its overflowing sympathies upon, and she turned for objects of affection among the wonders of nature. She looked to the wide-armed tree, under whose shade the ruminating cattle reclined; to the winding stream; to the bird soaring aloft on triumphant wing in the blue heaven; to the radiant sunset—and seemed to glean strength and instruction, for her countenance became serene. She shuddered when the wind swept by on rushing wings, and the monarchs of the wood fought the storm; and whispered strange words with the multiflora that hung about her window. Every thing in nature, aside from mankind—even the simplest flowret that opened its bell amidst the fern of the prairie, or the least insect that tried its gossamer wing in the sunbeam, were objects of her tender solicitude. Indeed, it might almost be said with truth, that she was in a semi-deranged state of mind.

In the mean time, Gertrude was not the only afflicted person in the house—for most keenly did her uncle feel the pangs of remorse for having been so hasty with his rifle. The ominous plunge of the lifeless body continually echoed in his ear—and often did the words of the hunted man: "take my life and you bring lasting sorrow upon your household," recur to his memory, and stir up his innermost soul.

Ormond was a stern, proud man, and he cared not to discover to those around him the workings of his heart. He still looked to the cultivation of his plantation as in his brighter days, yet he avoided the race-course, the gaming-table, and ever other haunt of amusement and dissipation, and his emaciated form and pale countenance gave evidence of the worm that was continually gnawing within. At times, he was sunk in the most profound melancholy, and during Gertrude's illness, whenever her phrenzied ravings fell on his ear, he would start up and leave the house, whether in storm or sunshine, in darkness or day, and wander off, no one knew whither. Once, however, he was seen by some hunters, just at nightfall, sitting on a decayed tree, near the lonely spot where Blackmer had fallen.

His friends in vain endeavored to rouse him—and at length, on the opening of Spring, his family physician, being satisfied that both he and his niece would find an early grave, unless some means were found to check their melancholy, insisted that they should take a summer's tour in the North. Ormond readily consented, and as for Gertrude, she was passive as a dove.

Change of scene—who has not heard of its efficacy in bringing relief to the sick, the weary, and the heart-broken? Gertrude and her uncle set off on their journey, and a month afterwards, when they arrived at the beautiful town of Cleaveland, on Lake Erie, an acquaintance would hardly have recognized in our heroine, the pale and half-deranged creature of Selma. Contact with busy life, and with the wild, the lone and beautiful of Nature, had done wonders in improving her. The whirl and flurry of Mobile and New Orleans, the broad Mississippi, rolling on with its myriads of fleet steamers, like the pathway of an ocean through the continent, the swelling hills and pastoral quiet of the Ohio, the wide-waving wheat fields, green meadows, and fragrant clover patches, that stretched away up the slopes and vallies on either hand of the Portsmouth Canal, had each, in turn, served to attract her interest, and arouse her dormant enthusiasm; and while gazing on the blue and boundless expanse of Lake Erie—the first extensive sheet of water she had ever seen—she was all admiration and delight.

But Niagara, whither they were tending, was still ahead, and Gertrude had long looked forward with impatience to the moment that should bring her in sight of the rushing waters. The time soon arrived, her heart thumped against her side, and her limbs trembled, as she neared their roar, and no sooner had her uncle secured rooms at the Eagle Hotel, than dragging him with her, she hurried away.

They passed over the bridge that spans the rapids, and following the beaten track through the brave old woods of Goat Island, suddenly found themselves on the edge of the American fall. Gertrude meant to have shouted and exalted in the roar of the waters, but the fountains of thought and speech were dried up before the majesty of the scene—she was dumb. She seated herself upon the trunk of a gnarled birch that leaned out over the abyss, and was lost in a fit of abstraction. The water leaped, the water plunged—down, down, into the unfathomable vortex; the solid rock trembled, and the mists went up, tortured and writhing, to the sky. Presently her gaze became still more fixed—for, on a sudden, the figure of a man sprang to view far below, on a projecting crag. At first, Gertrude doubted that she saw aright, but rubbing her eyes, she became satisfied that it was a bona fide specimen of the genius homo. But how was it possible for him to get to that apparently dangerous position? A cold sweat began to creep from her pores. She imagined the form bore a resemblance to that of her lost lover—and the longer she looked, the more close did the likeness become. She convulsively grasped the birch upon which she sat, and leaned out over the abyss to get a better view. The distance was considerable, and owing to the spray that momentarily concealed the man, the view was imperfect; yet every turn and gesture of the figure, were those of Blackmer.

Gertrude at length turned to her uncle; his eyes had been rivited on the same object; he was deadly pale—his thoughts had evidently been the same as her own. When she looked again, the figure had disappeared.

"Strange!" muttered Ormond, abstractedly: "it must have been a hallucination, however. I was in hope I had got over such things!"

Gertrude forbore to interrupt his soliloquy; she knew that any talk in relation to the apparition, would but tend to awaken harrowing reflections in the bosom of her uncle.

Ormond at length drew his niece away, with the remark that they had as yet seen but a small portion of the cataract, and they silently wended their way round to the great Horse Shoe Fall. A sight of the stupendous prospect, banished every other thought than those connected with it from Gertrude's mind. They were alone. In a fit of soothing melancholy, she leaned against a tree, and gazed on the tumultuous scene—the waters jostling and dancing to the dizzy verge, whence, in one vast transparent green mass, they fell headlong into the gulf of mist and shadow. A pillar of a cloud thence went up to the heavens, and a rainbow in the declining sun spanned it from side to side. She felt the earth shake beneath her, and the trees, in the windless atmosphere—the cedars that crowd to the brink of the torrent, finding sustenance in the fissures of the cliff, were tremulous as the aspen. Gertrude looked, almost with the expectation of seeing the whirling mass diminish. But on it rushed, as if an ocean had broken loose, seeming rather to increase than lessen.

Some sixty or seventy feet from the shore, as is known to those who have visited Niagara, stands a tall monument, on a solitary rock, built for the purpose of bettering the view of the falls. This is connected with Goat Island by a rustic bridge. Thither Gertrude at length resorted, but she was not yet satisfied. Seeing two or three heavy sticks of timber extending thence to a projecting rock at the very edge of the fall, which looked as though they had been intended for the string pieces of a bridge, she prevailed upon her uncle, who knew that her nerve was equal to any emergency, to accompany her out. The scene made her hold her breath. The water rushed by on each side of the precarious standing-place like lightning; and down it plunged, flashing, seething, and culminating—and rebounding half way up the fall, as if trying to climb back again! A gulph of fluctuating shadow, mist, and tempest lay beneath, in which the great black rocks seemed to be bounding up, and hither, and athwart, as if struggling to escape the merciless element. Gertrude, all enthusiasm, burst forth in the language of "Childe Harold"—

> ——"How profound
> The grief and how the giant element
> From rock to rock leaps with delirious bound,
> Crushing the cliffs, which, downward worn and rent
> With its fierce footsteps, yields in chasms a vent
> To the broad column which rolls on, and shows
> Like the deep fountain of an infant sea,
> Torn from the bed of mountains, by the throes
> Of a new world. * * * * Look back!
> Lo, where it comes, like an eternity,
> As if to sweep down all things in its track!"

Having satisfied her curiosity, she was about turning away, when her eye caught the upturned face of the figure she had seen beneath the falls on the other side of the island. The individual was far down among the trees and crags. His eye was fixed on her in apparent admiration; and although the mists that momentarily passed between her and him, disturbed her vision, she could but perceive that the lineaments of [illegible] countenance were those of her former suitor, except, perhaps, that they were rather thin. Gertrude knew that Blackmer had been shot by her uncle; it is not to be wondered at, therefore, that in the trepidation which the remarkable resemblance produced on her nerves, she came near losing her balance, and being precipitated into the wild vortex beneath.

Her uncle grasped her with nervous agitation. He, too, had seen the upturned face—seen it but for a moment, when the figure was lost among the rocks.

"Merciful Providence!" he exclaimed, "am I never to be freed from these strange visitations?" and he clasped his hands, and bowed his head in a paroxysm of agony.

The place where they stood, required calm nerves to make it one of safety. Sensible of this, Colonel Ormond and his niece retraced their steps to the green declivity of the island. The sun sank, and the shades of evening settled over the forest paths; the rainbow departed, and of a leaden hue became the spiral pillar of cloud; still they remained lost in gloomy abstraction, until, at length, the condensing moisture, dropping from the trees, induced them to seek their hotel.

After supper, Ormond sent his servant to inquire if any person of the description they had seen beneath the falls, was tarrying at either of the hotels. These inquiries were unsuccessful. One of the underlings, indeed, believed that a person of the name of Kidder, who had resided at the hotel on the British side of the river, with his sick father, would, in some respects answer to the description, but he had seen nothing of the person in question for several days, and thought he had left the neighborhood.

On the following morning, as soon as breakfast was over, Gertrude hurried her uncle away again to the falls. It had been planned that they should visit the British side, that forenoon, in company with several other individuals of both sexes. They accordingly sought the ferry—descending to the bed of the river by means of a spiral stair-case—and were set over. A regiment of Scotch Highlanders were en bivouac on the opposite side, and their glittering plaids and kilts, plumed bonnets and scarfs, glancing along the cliffs, and through the trees, were admirably in keeping with the romantic scenery of the place.

Sauntering leisurely along towards the Table Rock, they at length arrived in front of a small inn, from which a jolly Hibernian sallied out, greeting them with true Irish loquacity.

"Walk in, leddies—this way, jontlemin. Yeis 'll go undernaith the falls for sure; the half is nut sain till yees go below the fall."

Most of the party demurred—but Gertrude wanted no importunity, and it would have been useless for her uncle to object. Accordingly, having prepared themselves with oil cloth dresses, to protect them from the spray, they descended by a rickety staircase to the bed of the river, accompanied by an Indian guide.

A scene of frightful sublimity here presented itself. It seemed as if the whole mass, cliffs, cataract and all, were caving in upon them. The vast crags of the Table Rock, upwards of a hundred feet in height, depended far over their heads, and formed one section of the arch through which they were to enter. A breath might detach some of the loose masses to crush them. The other section of the portal to the terraqueous cavern was formed by the curve of the massive waters, which came thundering down, as it were, from the clouds, enveloping them in a whirlwind of foam and spray. A false step might consign them to the fuming vortex.

Still they pushed on, struggling and stumbling till they arrived at the termination rock—the ne plus ultra of the watery cavern. The roar here was perfectly deafening. The solid rock vibrated with the dissonance—and the whirling waters seemed ready to turn in upon them and whelm them forever. They remained here till their guide became impatient.

In returning, when about half way to the mouth of the cavern, they encountered another party, and suddenly Gertrude shrieked and fell. The pale, green light reflected through the falling sheet, had revealed to her the strange personage she had seen the day before, and bewildered by the deluging spray, she fancied, for the moment, that it was in reality Blackmer. Her cry, however, was not heard—had a park of a hundred artillery been discharged there at once, the sound would scarcely have been distinguished amidst the thundering din and turmoil of the place; and the guide, lifting her up, aided her to the open air, where she soon recovered—so that no one but herself knew of the surprise she had met with.

It need hardly be said that, upon calm reflection, Gertrude was satisfied that she was in error in regard to the person she had thus encountered, still the likeness, so striking, conjured up painful reminiscences, and she was taciturn and dull for the remainder of the day.

Col. Ormond and his niece remained about a fortnight at Niagara, during which time, Gertrude spent many a pleasant hour in wandering about the Falls, sketching the magnificent scenes in the neighborhood, and penning her thoughts in her journal, but neither she or her uncle saw anything more of the stranger who had so disturbed their equanimity.—Boston was the next place at which the Colonel proposed tarrying—follow we our travellers en route thither.

They tarried a day at Auburn, lingered awhile about Geneva and its placid lake, turned out of their way to look at the romantic Falls of Trenton, dropped in among the butterfly belles and gullibles at Saratoga, rattled on to Albany, and thence across the country to the metropolis of New England. They had become acquainted with two or three fashionable families while at Niagara, and through their means were introduced into society at Boston; and Gertrude soon found herself amidst a whirl of amusements, surrounded by admirers.

Chapter XII.

STRANGE MUTATIONS.

A grand fete was to be given by one of the most fashionable ladies of the city, and everybody was on tiptoe with expectation—that is to say, everybody who dwelt within the magic circle of the beau monde—concerning the all-important matter of invitations. We may not be able to throw much light on this head, but would be willing to depose that there were all sorts of Smiths and Johnsons on the docket—and of every grade of beauty; the pretty, the lovely, the tall, the short, the full, the fairy-like—graceful Carolines, lovely Isabellas, haughty Margarets, modest Louisas, and thoughtful Marys—belles, blondes, and brunettes. Of one fact we are assured, namely, that the fair Alabamian (as Gertrude was called) and her uncle were to be numbered among the guests.

It came at last, the evening of the much-talked-of ball, and those who had been slighted, became satisfied of the fact, and set about plotting revenge, and those who had been acknowledged Brahmins of the right caste, the recipients of invites, betook themselves to cold cream, cologne water, carmine, pomatum, and poudres de Paris, as the case might be, and thence to the theatre of glory.

That metropolitan fete was a magnificent affair—wealth could not make it more so; taste could not add to the blandishments of the occasion. The house seemed a fairy palace. Brilliant was the array of beaming countenances, wavy curls, floral crowns, snowy plumes, flashing gems and floating drapery, under the blazing chandeliers of that magnificent hall, that burst upon the view as the doors were thrown open; soft and silvery were the strains warbled from the orchestra, seeming rather to be inweaved with the atmosphere of the place than to emanate from any particular point, and how gracefully did the etherial forms move to and fro, to its cadences, in the undulating waltz or the intricate quadrille.

Some betook themselves to the dance, some to cards, some to the music room; some to schemes of matrimony, and not a few matches, for good or for evil, were the result of that night's festivities—all were busy, bustling and happy. All did I say? An exception must be made. One there was among the glittering throng, who—although to appearance amused with what was going on about him—held aloof from the medly. There was something in the countenance and demeanor of this individual which made him the subject of frequent remark. High and pale was his forehead, over which the slightly curled locks of his raven hair fell in profusion. Searching was the glance of his dark eye, and there was a cast of care on his countenance, as he moved among the young and happy creatures about him, which seemed to indicate that he had been accustomed to powerful emotions. Were it possible for a countenance to embody thought, his would have been read as saying—

"Revel on, fair creatures—enjoy yourselves while you may, for life has sorrows as well as pleasures—sorrows swift to overtake, and strong to bow down the careless and happy."

No one seemed to know or have fellowship with him. He was evidently a stranger. The interest among some of the young ladies, in regard to him, at length, became so great, that to satisfy their curiosity, they appealed to the lady of the mansion.

The gentleman bore the name of Kidder, Sangerman Kidder, and he was "rich as a salt or silver mine—having lately come into possession of an immense fortune."

This information, of course, did not diminish the interest felt for the proud stranger.

"Sangerman Kidder," exclaimed a sprightly, talkative miss; "what a name! and yet there is a—a—enphony to it I like—it is so odd too; I don't know that I should have any objection to changing mine for it."

"I think it a noble name," said a blue-eyed, retiring Hebe, casting a furtive glance towards the object of remark. "Don't you think him very handsome?"

"Not exactly handsome, Cally," was the reply—"but he looks as if he could sway it with a high hand wherever he chose."

"He is handsome enough; but handsome is that handsome does, is my motto," said a third, a plain young lady, whose accepted suitor had a sandy head, a freckled face, a hump back, and half a million, to render him interesting. "For my part, I think beauty of small account. Nobody knows him; and he appears so distant and gloomy, I should be afraid he had been a pirate, a robber, or something as bad."

Meanwhile the stranger, seeing their askant glances directed towards himself, sauntered away into the music room, and stationing himself where he could without interruption, hear the singing (which happened to be excellent) gave himself up to its influence.

Col. Ormond and his niece arrived late at the ball, having been detained at home by a friend from the South. Gertrude immediately became the centre of attraction, and was besieged by a crowd of fawning and flattering admirers, all eager to ingratiate themselves into her favor. However, she disliked such adulation, and was glad at length to escape to the company of a young lady—by the name of Caroline Marvel—with whom she had formed an intimacy.

"What a relief!" said she; "you cannot think how I have been harassed."

"How can you say so?" queried her friend; "Is it not gratifying to be looked up to and admired as you are?"

"What, Cally, you turned flatterer!"

"I did not mean to flatter."

"Well then, in answer, I would say, give me the devotion of one true, honest bachelor, even if he have nothing more than his heart and hand to boast, in preference to all their unmeaning flatteries."

"You are somewhat severe upon our Boston exquisites. N' importe; have you seen the stranger, the lion of the evening—if not, come along directly. He is so lordly and solitary, he would just suit your taste—such an odd name as he goes by, too, Sangerman Kidder—did you ever hear the like?"

"'What's in a name?'" said Gertrude, suffering herself to be led away.

They sought the music room, the stranger was gone—the card tables, he was not of the players—and were about giving over the search, supposing that he had left the house—when, pressing Gertrude's arm, Miss Marvel whispered, "Yonder he stands, leaning against the pillar of the orchestra."

Gertrude turned, and her eye became fixed on the stranger with the most intense earnestness. The blood flickered over her brow like distant lightning on a summer's evening cloud. It seemed as though a sudden and all absorbing terror had come upon her. She at length advanced a few paces towards the solitary being. "It is he! it is he!" she exclaimed, and fell senseless into the arms of her companion.

Immediately there was an end to singing and dancing, and the ball became a scene of wild commotion. Fierce glances were cast towards the stranger by the young bloods, the misses shrieked, the mothers stood aghast, and those who had not been at hand were clamorous to know the cause of the tumult.

Mr. Sangerman Kidder, however, perceiving only that a young lady had fainted, and owing to some unaccountable negligence, was likely to suffer for want of proper attention, hastened to her assistance. The crowd gave way before him as though he had been stricken with the plague spot, but every eye was intent on watching his motions. Wonder upon wonder! His arms became stiffened as it were with palsy, while in the act of extending them to help sustain the fair Alabamian, and his pale features assumed a still more ashy hue. A single exclamation, uttered in a low, deep voice that thrilled the nerves of all within hearing, told the keenness of his surprise.

"Gertrude! Merciful Heaven! can it be."

But the strange individual was evidently not one who cared to discover the workings of his heart to everybody. As if by an almost superhuman effort, he cloaked his feelings, and the same thoughtful melancholy reigned on his features as before, while he proceeded to bear the inanimate Gertrude to a sofa.

The behaviour of Col. Ormond was no less astonishing than that of Gertrude and the stranger. He had been engaged at a game of billiards in a distant room of the mansion, but hearing that his niece had fainted, now hastened forward. His eyes seemed ready to start from their sockets on seeing Gertrude's companion, and he put up his hand as if to shut out some dread image. He quickly recovered, however and bowing, but with averted eyes to the individual who had been the cause of all the excitement, took Gertrude, who had partially recovered, by the arm, and beckoned him to follow.

No sooner had they departed than a tempest of exclamations and inquiries burst forth. Choice food was there for the gossips; and many were the knowing surmises, ominous looks and expressive shakes of the head in all quarters of the hall. Who were these strangers? Where did they come from? Who could say that they were any better than they should be?

All that could be ascertained for a certainity was, that they were all in the dark respecting them.—However, most patient reader, most patient, if you have followed us along in this veritable history we suspect that you do not stand in need of enlightening in this respect. If you do, all we have to say is, that the proud stranger was in reality our old acquaintance, Trescot Blackmer. How can this be? would then be the natural inquiry—we saw him fall and sink into the tributary of the Alabama. A few words will explain the mystery.

When Col. Ormond discharged his rifle at Blackmer, the ball glanced from the limb of the tree upon which the hunted man sat, and did him no injury.—The colonel's aim, perhaps, was not so steady as though he had been shooting at a partridge. It immediately occurred to Blackmer that he might yet save himself by feigning death, dropping from the tree, and swimming to the shore. He did so, and favored by the coming shades of evening and the turbid state of the stream, escaped to the bank without being perceived; where, among the dwarf willows, he found a most effectual place of concealment, till Ormond and his followers had departed.

As soon as night had fairly set in, he left this covert, and after many perils and almost overpowering fatigue, arrived at Charleston, in South Carolina.—Thence he took passage for Boston, near which place resided an uncle, of whom he had often heard his relatives speak, but whom he had never seen. He found this uncle, whose name was Sangerman Kidder, living at the beautiful village of * * * *, on the sea coast, surrounded by all the appliances which wealth can produce; and upon making himself known, was most cordially received.

Mr. Kidder was one of your eccentric, but warm-hearted, old bachelors—rich as Crœsus, and liberal as rich. Our hero was the first of his relations that he had seen or heard from for twenty years, and he—the son of a once almost idolized sister—was looked upon as an object worthy of every thing short of adoration, and favors the most lavish were heaped upon him.

But the mutations in the history of Blackmer were not yet at an end. A short time after, he became an inmate of his uncle's mansion, the old gentleman was attacked with a violent fever, resulting from exposure during a sudden shower while abroad on a shooting excursion, which, after a run of some ten or twelve days, left him in a most debilitated state.—As soon as he had gained sufficient strength to bear the fatigues of journeying, travel was recommended by his physician, and, in company with our hero, he made the tour of the lakes, and visited Niagara. At the latter place, for the sake of retirement, he put up at the hotel on the British side of the cataract, which is not so much frequented as the public houses on the American side. It need hardly be said that it was in reality Blackmer, whom Gertrude and her uncle had seen about the Falls. Old Mr. Kidder derived no benefit from journeying. A day or two after the arrival of Col. Ormond and his niece at Niagara, he left for home, and by the time of his arrival at his mansion, he was so far gone that he had to take to his bed, from which he never again arose. Upon his demise, Blackmer, being his nearest relative, became his sole heir; coupled, however, with the condition that he should assume the name of the deceased in lieu of his own; and, in short, our hero became at once a man of wealth and Sangerman Kidder, Esq.

As soon as the estate was settled, Blackmer began to think of a trip to the South. He first forwarded a letter to our old acquaintance, Mr. Ostrander, enclosing a draft for one thousand dollars, on the Bank of Mobile—requesting the merchant to hunt up the holder of the forged paper, pay him the amount of its face and interest, and appropriate the balance as a remuneration for the trouble incident to these proceedings. This draft, it is hardly necessary to say, was returned, with the information that the note had been paid, and a detail of the circumstances connected therewith.

Who but Gertrude could be the young lady spoken of in the missive as the individual who had supplied the funds for the payment? There was elysium in the thought; it was proof that he had been loved from the beginning—and the conviction tended to enhance his affection for her in a ten-fold proportion if such a thing were possible. He immediately forwarded a letter to a friend in Salma, making inquiries concerning her. After nearly a month's suspense, an answer was returned, stating that Gertrude had become deranged, and had been sent away to Pass Christian—a village on Lake Ponchartrain—for the benefit of the sea air, &c.

Our hero at once determined to go, himself in quest of Gertrude, and, with this purpose in view, had come up to Boston, with the intention of taking passage to New Orleans. The ship was not quite ready, and, time hanging heavily on his hands, he accepted an invitation to the ball, which had been sent him at the instance of a friend. What followed is already made known to the reader.

Blackmer, or Kidder, as we shall now call him, at once became the accepted suitor of Gertrude, and an early day was fixed for their marriage.

Chapter XIII.

THE CONSUMMATION.

"This also will pass away," was the motto which one of the wise rulers of olden time chose for his signet ring. Laconic and simple as it seems, there is no aphorism extant that contains more hidden meaning. It tells us in our mirthful hours to be moderate, for they abide not. It prompts us when care and sorrow assail, to look forward to brighter prospects. It may be called to mind with profit under every vicissitude in life; and little need is there of artistical device to remind us of it. It is inscribed on the oak as on the wild flower of a day, on the mountain peak as on the sand hills of the desert, on the diamond as on the frozen dew-drop. We, good reader, have seen its truth examplified in the breaking away of the clouds and gloom that once hung over the fortunes of our hero and heroine.

The month that was to intervene before the marriage passed away—the happy day arrived. The wedding took place at the late residence of Kidder's uncle—in future to be his own residence. This was a brave, old-fashioned mansion, with protruding wings, porticoes, and deeply embayed windows, and might have reminded a wanderer from the mother land of some of the picturesque halls of Queen Anne's time. It stood amidst a cluster of venerable oaks, under the shade of which the green grass was smooth as velvet. Orchards, grain fields and meadow lands, irregularly interspersed with forest scenery, were spread over the undulating hills in the rear, while in front the rocky barriers of the ocean—here and there studded with a gigantic tree that had braved the storms of centuries—and the waste of waters, blue and boundless, finish the prospect.

The hour for the ceremony arrived. It was at the close of one of those mellow, hazy days that characterize the harvest month in New England. The mild heavens were rosy with the setting sun, and the broad waters lay calm as a cliff-embosomed lake, while far along the horizon a snowy sail or two became apparent in the slant day beam. The stirless fruit trees bent to the ground, under their autumn dowers, and the golden grain fields wherein the reapers had been all day at work, waved not to a zephyr. There was a delicious balminess in the atmosphere—every thing breathed of Acadian quiet and peace. and the serene and mild countenance of Gertrude, suffused with never so slight a blush, told that her heart was at rest in consonance, with the objects of inanimate nature.

There was no ostentatious display on the occasion—the ceremonies were such as are usually attendant upon a country wedding, with appliances becoming the wealth and position of the bride and bridegroom. The hall of the old mansion was filled to overflowing. There were the hale farmers of the neighborhood and their buxom helpmates, the young bachelors, and the stout, healthy, and happy misses, in snowy gowns and pink sashes—rejoicing in a general invitation, for Gertrude had so willed it.

The modest, retiring Hebe, Miss Marvel, mentioned as Gertrude's companion at the ball, and a young student at law, who had made some advances towards winning her favor, officiated in the character of bridesmaid and groomsman on the occasion. A feast followed the performance of the ceremony, and the evening passed most happily to all.

* * * * *

It is now something more than three years since Gertrude became Mrs. Sangerman Kidder. Col. Ormond has returned to the South; Kidder employs himself in literary pursuits, and Gertrude has enough to occupy her attention in training up a young urchin, the miniature likeness of herself, who has just began to grow mischievous.

As a good antidote to gloomy anticipations, we should all do well to recollect the saying of Sir Thomas More—

"If evils come not—then our fears are vain:
And if they do—fear but augments the pain."

THE SONG OF DEATH

BY B. KELLAR SHARRETTS.

On my paly steed, with the lightning's speed,
I travel o'er mountain and vale;
My quiver well filled at my back is slung,
My bow in my hand is tightly strung;
None may the force of my dart impede,
Or turn it aside from the mark decreed;
And I stop not to tell why I did the deed,
But I laugh as the friends bewail.

O, a merry time in every clime,
I have as I journey along:
'Midst the bright ey'd and joyous, the grave and gay,
Uninvited, unwished for, I find my way;
In the song of pleasure I cheerfully chime;
As the mirth increases I "bide my time,"
And strike at those who, proud in their prime,
Feel never so healthy and strong.

On the boisterous seas I sit at mine ease,
Awaiting the storm king's power;
The thunders may roar, and lightnings flash,
Wave upon wave o'er the frail bark may dash;
The thoughts of me only brings men to their knees;
From the terrified group I pick whom I please,
Sparing those who most willingly wait my decrees,
For it is not yet their hour.

In flood, fire and fray, by night and by day,
For victims I eagerly look;
When rivers spread wide as the vasty deep—
When the red flames wake from the midnight sleep—
When the sword grows dim in the bloody strife—
When rapine and murderous war are rife—
When brother strikes deep at a brother's life—
And blood flows free as a brook;

In the hurricane's blast my seeds are cast,
With a firm and skilful hand;
'Mid earthquakes and famine I gather my grain;
'Mid plague and pestilence bind it amain;
And tho' at my labors the world stands aghast,
Much fearing the future by knowing the past;
Still no rest I'll know whilst victims last,
And my powers are at command.

The thunder-bolt I can call from the sky,
And I never command in vain;
Quick as the light it flies through the air,
Nor feeble, nor aged, nor young doth it spare;
Nor piercing shriek, nor the faintest sigh,
Give note of the slightest agony;
But the senseless form, and the dull, glazed eye,
To the heart speak loud and plain.

In the palace of kings I fold my wings,
Whilst I lay the crowned head low;
Through the land is heard the notes of grief;
All mingle their woes, but the space is brief
Indeed, of the gloom which my presence brings,
For the thoughts of an empty throne soon flings
A ray of light o'er the sable things,
Which so lately told of wo.

The poor man's cot lays full in my route,
And here I do riot free;
Here hunger and cold, and many an ill,
Stop the beating heart, and the life-blood chill;
A rude box, and a grave in some lonely spot,
Is all that is left of what was, but is not,
And the name, and the place, are soon forgot,
In the world's variety.

And thus I ride, in my power and pride,
The weary wide world through;
Mankind is my foe, no distinction I know,
But strike indiscriminately all as I go;
This trust the Creator to me did confide,
I'll never betray it, or turn me aside—
Tho' Christians may fear me, and sceptics deride,
As long as I've work to do.

Washington City, 1844.

RABEQUISTA;

OR, ANNA THE SHEPHERDESS.

A PORTUGUESE TALE OF REAL LIFE.

On a dark night of last winter, there was a wedding ball in a certain village near the foot of the Mountain Estrella. The wedding-dinner was over at two o'clock in the afternoon; and from that hour till midnight, the clattering dance of wooden shoes had been almost incessant. During all this time, the merriment had been kept alive by liberal supplies of green wine, by love, and by a fiddle, the never-failing guest and companion of every merry-meeting in all the hamlets of this neighborhood. The fiddler, who possessed nothing in the world but a musical ear, (for which we do not know how much per centage he paid out of the hours of industry,) had been one of the numerous candidates for the bride; but having been supplanted by the pecuniary charms of his happy rival, he was here on this occasion—no unhappy man either, but in good humor with his ill-fortune. A philosophical fiddler, he had not only had the courage to attend the marriage ceremony without concealing himself behind one of the church-pillars and rushing forth at the critical moment with a romantic cry of despair, to the dismay of the assembly, but he had helped to twine the arches of pine-boughs for the passage of the triumphant couple. At dinner he had filled repeated bumpers to the health of both, and also of a tawny rustic lass who happened to sit next to him; and all the evening afterwards, and all the night, he animated, by his quaint old minuets, and his inexhaustible store of old-fashioned tunes, the fun of the dancers, male and female, of that economical club, whose vagaries were superbly illuminated by four classical iron lamps, stuck against four newly-whitewashed walls. Some malicious indexes of motives—for there are such even in the country—did not fail to set down his gratuitous perseverance to a lurking desire of putting off, as long as he could, the fatal moment when the company should disperse, and the doors of his ungrateful fair one exclude him from her presence. Others merely supposed that his zeal was inspired by a newly awakened fancy for another pair of bright eyes, and that he was naturally unwilling to quit a scene where the lady of his thoughts saw him playing the first fiddle. As to us, without rejecting or admitting either of these opinions, we think it more orthodox to believe, that his pure self-love, as an artist, is a sufficient explanation. Paganini, in the theatre at Paris, or on the stage of the opera-house in London, was not a greater personage than our poor fiddler, in a farm-house of the Estrella mountain.

During one of those brief intervals of the ball, when the din of music and feet ceased, only to give play to the much more uproarious clamor of conversation, our hero, whom we shall call Baptist, found his opportunity of insinuating a sly compliment into the ear of her to whom his looks had already been still more eloquent; a smile, and a modest look of pleased acknowledgment, gave him fresh force for a second attack; he dared to whisper the word love; he saw her blush, and once more he saw her smile, he ventured to seize a pretty little hand of this damsel fifteen years old; and from the moment of that audacity, he considered his felicity certain. He asks her name, Anna; her condition, single; her residence, another farm house, distance about half a league, in a locality that he is unacquainted with; but which she describes so minutely, that it is evident his visits there will be acceptable: "In our house," adds Anna, "there live only mother and myself. My mother keeps house, I tend our flock on the mountain in the day time, and at night work with my mother. Sometimes we sit together at our hearth with nothing new to say to one another, which is dull; now and then we have the company of some young women, who live about a quarter of a league from us; I came with two of them to-day, and we are to return together. But for them I should have missed this wedding; and that would have been a pity."

The dancing was renewed; Baptist surpassed himself, if that were possible. The fiddle seemed animated with all the fire, all the brilliant freshness of a newly rising passion. It imparted more life, more ecstacy to the dancers; and Anna, every time that the mazy whirl brought her near to the musician, showed by a look, a movement, an air, that she felt something more than gratitude for the performer.—The bow of Cupid, to use the phraseology of the poetico-arcadian schools, never twanged off more sharp and quick arrows than did the bow of a fiddle on this night. The bridegroom, fearing that the transport might not subside before sunrise, availed himself of a momentary pause to call Baptist apart into the garden, and there, after some trifling apologetical preamble, with which Baptist would have willingly dispensed, gave him to understand, in as few words as his embarrassment and the sense of his discourtesy would permit, that it was time to close the entertainment, and for the guests to retire. Baptist, who, like all happy lovers, had kept wholly out of view the fact, that such pleasure must have an end, and in whom (trust the hearts of men!) the thought of his first love, now hopeless, was already partially eclipsed by the radiant image of his new star—Baptist stood undecided for an instant whether he should obey the master of the house, thanking him for his good cheer, or break the fiddle about his ears. A visit to the cellar, to which the host sagaciously invited him, gave him time to recover his temper; and, thanks to a copious draught that prepared him for the journey, the inward strife that had arisen between the two spirits that contend for mastery in the human breast, terminated in the victory of the good angel. During this absence of the life and soul of the party, the greater number of the guests disappeared: and Anna, urged by her companions to withdraw, and persuaded, as were the rest, that Baptist would not come back, sadly set out on her way home.

Returning to the room, and finding it deserted by her who alone had filled it, Baptist wished his host good-night. Hardness of heart is not the vice of the truly happy. The bridegroom accompanied him a few steps beyond the threshold, and laughingly told him, in a key sufficiently loud to ensure his being overheard by his wife, that the beauteous Anna, the flower and envy of the night, was the best tender of flocks in the district; that she had a good fortune; excellent hands for the spindle, and a voice for singing that charmed all who heard her; that he therefore advised him to cultivate the good graces of the mother, for that he well knew the girl would think herself fortunate to be able to warble her youth away with such an accompaniment:

> Oh, life of my life!
> Who can show me your fellow
> At fiddle or fife
> On the mountain Estrella?

And with this he bade him farewell—but not before he had further explained, what Baptist had already known above two hours, that the house was situate at the top of a winding steep, between hills; that by day two great oak trees, standing close together on the right of the road, would show him that he was near the place; and that at night he would be led to it by the bleating of numerous goats folded in the pen, so that there could be no risk of going astray among those wilds. The night was still dark. Baptist at first, though his mind was all abroad, took the melancholy road that led to his home. But what was he to do there? Sleep? who ever slept on the first night of a new love-fever? To lie awake and sigh? that is better and more poetically done on the open stage of nature. To transcribe from the tablets of his heart an account of his sensations and wishes in a letter? Anna probably cannot read; and he himself, satisfied with his talent as a musical artist, never felt any ambition to accumulate knowledge. Baptist does not know how to write. All such of my readers as have passed through the paradise of youth will readily divine, without my telling them, whither the steps of Baptist led him against the bent of his wiser intention. As full of wine and passion as an elegy of Propertius, with his fiddle under his arm, and his Anna in his heart, and with as good speed as the obscurity of the hour, and the ruggedness and strangeness of the way permit, there he goes, entreating the solitude to favor his blind search of the temple of his divinity, and already, in spirit, making the tour of those walls which he fancies he discovers in every white stone that he discerns before him.

And what a wretched gratification is he seeking! He will not see her—no, he will not hear her voice. At such an untimely season of the night, he will not, even through some compassionate crack in the door, have his eyes fascinated by the flickering gleam of a lamp lighted by that very hand which so lately trembled in his own. She herself will not know to-morrow that he has been keeping watch near her, and surrounding her dreams with his love. No sign will remain to reveal to her the devotion with which he will have been kissing, as a pilgrim kisses a reliquiary, the insensible walls that enclose the talisman of his existence! When she shall arise and go forth with Aurora, placid and rosy like her, and, like her, hailed with delight by everything that beholds her, not a vestige of his kisses will be left on the stones of her house, on the threshold of her door; not one of all the sighs that night shall have gathered in its lap will be felt with the morning breezes as they sigh among the foliage. No—but he will have enjoyed, in three or four hours of careful vigil, whole ages of felicity. It is even possible, that something of reality may be mingled with his delicious reveries: it may chance that, while with ear applied to a casement, and breath suspended, he interrogates the silence of the sleeping house, some audible sound, some word addressed by the daughter to her mother, some rustling of the mattress, stuffed with the straw of indian corn, will aid his fancy to picture the interior of that Eden, and to perceive, as it were, through his ears, the position, the attitude, the expression, the thoughts, of the most beautiful of slumberers. He will, at least, hear the bleatings of her goats hard by; and, if the stars be not utterly hostile to his hopes, he may, in the morning, hiding himself where he cannot be discovered, watch her as she passes with her flock, blithely treading the dew in her little slippers of orange-tree wood, her distaff stuck in her girdle, a shade of soft anxiety setting off the sweetest smile that ever dawned from under the broad flap of a large black hat; and, perhaps, he might hear that chant of the mountain, and now, more than ever, the song for him, sent forth to the echoes by the most bewitching voice of the Beiralta—

> Oh, life of my life!
> Who can show me your fellow
> At fiddle or fife
> On the mountain Estrella?

As these fancies thickened upon him, Baptist, who was absolutely carried away with them, and was every moment quickening his pace, less attentive to the road than to the stars, with which true lovers have always an indefinable sympathy, suffered himself to be hurried on, he hardly knew whither, till he suddenly remembered—what none but a lover would have forgotten for a moment—that he ought to examine, by the notices which he had been warned to take heed of, whether he was on his right course or not. He stopped, he doubted, he was about to turn back, when lo! he observed, on the side of the path, certain trees, which might very possibly be the two oak-trees: he flies towards them; they are the very same; and that is the exact site—a site as familiar to him, now that he views it for the first time, as if he had been born there. He accelerates his speed—his heart leaps as if it wished to get there before him—the sandy and barren soil of the steep seems to him a gentle declivity, matted with rose-leaves; and, to crown his success, he hears the bleat of a lamb close by: he who hears the lamb cannot be far off from the shepherdess. He rushes towards the spot where so tender a greeting invites him. He already discovers the withies of the fold—he almost touches them. All at once the ground gives way under him, and he finds himself at the bottom of a pit-fall. Astounded with the shock, though he had lighted on his feet, with his fiddle safe under his arm, he at first imagined that some evil witch had laid this wicked trap for him; and he now called to mind that an old woman at the wedding had very constantly eyed him with an expression of countenance of no good augury:—but after his first confusion was a little allayed, he perceived that he was in one of those deep holes which it is the custom to excavate on the mountain to catch wolves. These holes are made wider at bottom than at top, so as to make it impossible for the prisoner to escape; the mouth is lightly covered with a few slender boughs, which, yielding to the pressure of any weight, lets it fall through, and being elastic, resume their deceitful appearance: as a lure to the beast of prey at night, it is usual to place behind this masked abyss, and within a strong fence of hurdles, a kid or a lamb, whose cries for the dam entice its enemy to certain destruction. The hopelessness of evasion from such a den, for the rest of the night, was evident to poor Baptist. He tried to accommodate himself to his situation. He had not room to console himself, as men incarcerated are want to do, by pacing to and fro to give life to his imprecations. He laid himself down in the pit to meditate on the abode of his love, which he had left above him in the land of the living. Nature makes but little difference between dreams and the visionary cogitations of lovers.

Baptist was now half-musing, half-sleeping, when he heard the treacherous roof of his den giving way again, and immediately afterwards down plumped some heavy substance. He jumped up in consternation—Who is there?—no answer. With hair on end, head dripping with cold sweat, and tongue tied with terror, he crouched hard against a side of the pit, and endeavored with eyes fixed in stupid amazement, to make out the companion of his misfortune:—and lo, a wolf, a great wolf, an immense wolf! He sees his eyes glaring like lamps, and that ferocious light shows, or seems to show, two rows of perfectly white teeth, with the formidable tusks; a sight sufficient to disconcert, not only one fiddler, but a whole philharmonical society. Without defence, or means of flight, or chance of succor, and watching the steady and gradually emboldened attention with which his adversary measured him, he was attempting in his agony to shrink into the very earth that immured him, when an involuntary touch of one of the strings of his fiddle caused it to sound—the animal was startled and recoiled two steps, which he had at last slowly and with a long pause between each made towards the musician. Baptist, therefore, suspecting that there may be some occult centrifugal virtue in the art of Orpheus, draws his fiddlestick with a tremulous hand across the bow. It is no the wolf's turn to shrink; he cowers as if he would bury himself in the ground; the rage in his eyes is subdued; he turns away his head; he manifests his fears by a thousand signs. Baptist, gathering courage from his enemy's cowardice, without farther preparatory tuning, flings him off a waltz, and, observing that the first effect of his instrument is in no wise diminished, overpowers him with an inundation of notes, in tune and out of tune, enough to rive the entrails of the earth. It was a genuine scene, worthy of the opera in the Rua-dos-Condes. Minuets, gavottes, country-dances, waltzes, cotillions, jigs, and rigadoons, succeeded one another without break or transition, and with a rapidity, a prodigality, that was marvellous; while now and then he wrenched his eyes off his crouching adversary to look up at the aperture for the glimpse of day, to which alone he could trust for his deliverance. But that night had sworn to last at least fifty hours, for the poor fiddler. The centrifugal charm of his violin appeared to have as much influence on Aurora as on the wolf; keeping them both aloof. The perspiration which his fears had at first drawn, was now streaming down him from sheer fatigue. His arm, before so laboriously exercised at the ball, was beginning to fail him, when at last the gleams of day peered through the false trellis-work over his head; and soon afterwards, steps, voices, and laughter, were distinguishable near the cavern. The shepherds who had laid the trap were coming to see if they had caught anything; and wondering at the strange subterranean music, they hastened towards it with a thousand wild conjectures. Having removed the boughs that covered the mouth of the pit, they looked down, eager to learn what this extraordinary revel could be. Baptist, fearing to lose, by one moment's intermission of his music, the safety he had won at so much cost, answered them in chanting prose, fiddling all the while, and huddling two or three words into every note—

"Pit of terror—Night of horror—How I tremble!"

entreating to be quickly released, and intimating that he would tell them all about it presently. A ladder was the first thing to be procured; one was immediately found in the nearest farm-house, the inmates of which, as anxious as their neighbors to gratify their curiosity, came running with the rest to witness such an unexampled sight. The pit was surrounded with people of both sexes. The ladder was hurdly fixed, when Baptist clambered up as fast as he possibly could, without the use of his hands—for he was still fiddling—till he reached the top, more dead than alive. Scarcely had he found himself amid kindly human faces, and in the light of one of the loveliest mornings that ever shone on the Estrella, when, laying down his fiddle to make the sign of the cross, he discovered at his side his own Anna. Hers was the ladder that had saved him; hers the neighboring farm-house; and the soft scarlet kerchief of cotton, that was instantly offered to him to wipe his forhead, was taken from her own neck.

He was conducted to her house, (it was possibly only because it was the nearest at hand,) and placed by the hearth, where mother and daughter vied with each other in making him comfortable, and, after serving him with a good breakfast, and giving him a thousand unequivocal proofs of their benevolence, they left him to take five or six hours of delicious repose on a well-filled and well-smoothed palliasse of Indian-corn straw.

In less than three months after that breakfast, Baptist was the husband of Anna. The artist who had figured so brilliantly at other people's wedding-parties, performed prodigies at his own. The wolf, which Baptist and Anna would not suffer to be destroyed, was carefully secured; and, being of a tamable age at the time of his capture, is now a part of the family, and is kept in better condition than ever wolf was kept before. The friendly evening gatherings at this farm-house are celebrated in the district; and all the neighbors hope and trust that the harmony which reign there will never be interrupted—that, in the mutual relation of husband and wife, and of mother and son-in-law, the fiddle will never be out of tune.

THE TRUE FRIEND.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"I believe I am one of the best friends he has. But, if he doesn't change a good deal, I shall have to cut his acquaintance," said a young man, named Ellis, pettishly. He was speaking to a group of two or three persons.

"So shall I," was replied by one of the company. "His manner, at times, is really insufferable."

"What is there in Gordon's manner so very peculiar?" asked another of the group, who had listened for some time in silence to sundry vague allegations against an absent friend. This individual's name was Carver.

"Enough to make him a very unpleasant companion at times. Have you ever differed in opinion with him?"

"Yes."

"Didn't he insult you before you were done talking?"

"No."

"Can you say as much?" addressing another of the company.

"No."

"How did he insult you?" asked Mr. Carver.

"By his words and manner. The first were rude, and the latter was anything but the manner of a gentleman. Have you never observed this marked defect in his character?"

"I certainly have noticed that he is sometimes very unfortunate in the choice of his words while engaged in argument, and that his way of expressing himself is not always as guarded as it should be."

"Humph! I should think not. The fact is, he is downright insulting."

"O no, gentlemen."

"Yes he is. He has insulted me over and over again, until I am out of all patience with him," replied Ellis.

"Insulted you over and over again!" said Carver. "That is strange! No man should ever insult me deliberately more than once. I wonder that you suffered him to repeat the outrage. An insult, of course, is in the intention of the person who offers it."

"I don't pretend to say that Gordon meant to insult me."

"Then it was not really an insult; for that must come from the will. It must be a deliberate act intended to give offence. You daily charge that upon him?"

"O no. But still his manner of speaking, and the words themselves that he utters, are often exceedingly unbecoming, and calculated to outrage the feelings of almost any one. For instance, it was only last evening that in conversing with him he said, with a slight curl of the lip—'You don't know what you are talking about!' Now I call that downright rudeness."

"So do I," returned Mr. Carver. "But do you think Gordon intended to be rude?"

"I am sure I don't know. I should hope not."

"Don't let your feelings carry you away. Are you not very certain that he was innocent of any such an intention?"

"Perhaps he was, but then there is no excuse for such conduct. It is easy enough to be a gentleman."

"Not so easy, perhaps, as you may think. Every one has something about him that offends more or less certain persons who come in contact with him, yet all the while he is perfectly unconscious of the fact, and innocent of any intention to offend. And yet this rough corner on his character may be one of the deformities of self-love, to which his partial eyes are blind. We should let our charity for each other stand upon a broad basis."

"That is, should tolerate what is wrong in others."

"We should tolerate it far enough to give us the power to aid others in its removal—not tolerate it by calling evil good. Suppose, now, you were to get angry with Gordon, because he suffered himself, in the warmth of an unguarded moment, to speak with seeming discourteousness—do you think that would help him to correct his fault of character?"

"I don't know that it would. But I cannot exactly see what I have to do with helping him to correct his faults; let him correct them himself.—Let him learn to be a gentleman if he expects to associate with gentlemen."

"So say I," was warmly responded by another of the company; "for one, I see no reason for tolerating such conduct. If a man doesn't know how to treat people, with whom he is allowed to associate, with common civility, he ought to be dropped. And I for one shall drop Mr. Gordon, if he doesn't take plagued good care of himself."

The individual against whom such severe things were said, was a young man who had graduated a year or two previously at Harvard University, with distinguished honors. He possessed many good qualities, but had all the faults so bitterly complained of by the persons just introduced. He was opinionated, and pertinacious in adhering to his opinions.—But what was worse, he forgot, in the warmth with which he maintained his own views, to respect the views of others. Therefore, it was a common thing for him to treat with a sort of contempt what others advanced in opposition to any favorite theory of science or philosophy that he held. It mattered little whether the opponent were a man of his own age or a man twenty years his senior. He treated one just as he did the other.

To balance this, were sincerity and a willingness to make sacrifices for the good of others. The defects in his character were marked, and so were the good qualities. Of both he seemed unconscious. No one had ever made free to tell him his faults, and as he was not aware that he possessed the particular fault complained of, he could not correct it.

Not long after the conversation given above had taken place, Mr. Carver fell in with Ellis, the young man who had expressed himself most warmly against Gordon. After a few general observations, the latter said—

"You remember what passed the last time I met you?"

"Yes."

"I have met Gordon since."

"Have you?"

"Yes. And it was as much as I could do to keep from insulting him. His manner was outrageous—If it hadn't been that there were ladies present, I don't know what I might have been tempted to do."

"You are wrong," was Mr. Carver's serious reply, "in permitting yourself for a moment to think of doing anything so highly improper. Why not rather go at once to Gordon, and tell him in a friendly way that, although he may not be aware of it, his manner is at times not pleasant, and that if he would endeavor to correct it, he would make himself much more agreeable to his friends."

"That is, humbly beg him to treat me with common civility. Oh, no, I hav'nt come to that yet. If he isn't a gentleman, he shouldn't be permitted to associate with gentlemen. I don't ask any one to tolerate me; to make sacrifices of feeling in favor of my boorishness."

"No. But it is barely possible that you may have peculiarities of character that are not always the most agreeable to your friends."

"Me! What do you mean, Mr. Carver?" The blood mounted to the young man's face.

"Simply what I have said. We are none of us perfect. One sins against his fellow in this way and another in that. We should all of us, therefore, be indulgent towards the faults of others, that are not violations of moral law."

"But what have you to bring against me, Mr. Carver?"

The young man's wounded self-love would not permit him to see any thing but the insinuation that he was not perfect.

"I didn't think you could bear to be told of a fault."

"Why not?"

"The mere intimation, on my part, that you are not perfect, has disturbed you deeply."

"Oh, yes I could. If you have anything to say, speak out plainly."

"And you will promise not to be offended?"

"Certainly."

"Very well. You never were at college?"

"No."

"But Gordon has passed through Harvard University."

"Yes, and I don't see that it has made anything wonderful of him. It hasn't given him common sense, nor a common perception of truth."

"The fact that he has been to college and you not, doesn't give you the right to offer him an indignity."

"Mr. Carver, that is rather a singular remark."

"No doubt it seems so, for the reason that you are perhaps as unconscious of having been rude to Gordon, as he is of having been rude to you."

"I rude to Gordon, or to any one? Impossible!"

"Not at all. Both you and I may, under certain excitements, be led to say or do a rude thing almost unconsciously."

The young man shook his head.

"Let me specify, then," said Mr Carver. "A few weeks ago I was present when, in conversation with Gordon, you made this remark. 'I never saw a college-bred man in my life, who had not about him a degree of self-sufficiency, or arrogance, that made his society only tolerable.' Do you remember having said so?"

"Yes, very well. And I meant to say it."

"Because you were conversing with a college-bred man, and meant to offer him an insult. Was that it?"

"Why, no, not exactly. I did not wish to insult him."

"Although you meant to hit him very hard."

"Yes, I certainly did."

"Reverse the matter, or rather change positions, and think how you would have felt had you been in his place. Do you think you would have treated the matter as coolly as he did?"

"I don't know that I would."

"Mr. Ellis—the fact is, I must say plainly that I think you have done a much more offensive thing to him than he has ever done to you."

"But he provoked me to it."

"Innocently; but you insulted him deliberately."

"No; don't say that."

"You thought about what you were doing."

Partially; but I was led away by an impulse. If I had reflected, I hardly think I would have said what I did."

"I am glad to find you so ready to see an error. Is it not possible, that if you were to speak as plainly to Gordon as I have spoken to you, he would be as quick to perceive his offensive peculiarity?"

"I hardly think he would."

"Why not?"

"Oh, he is self-sufficient and proud. He do wrong! Oh, no; that idea could not be entertained for a moment. I should not like to be the one to tell him of a fault."

"Because you think he would get angry, and take your kind effort as an insult."

"I certainly do."

"I must give you credit for one thing, at least."

"What is that?"

"The disposition to think the worst of your friends."

The young man felt much annoyed at this. His face colored and when he attempted to reply, his lip quivered. He was conscious that the charge was not without foundation; and the idea that another should bring it home to him, wounded his pride and disturbed his feelings.

"So you see, that even you are not without your fault," coolly remarked Mr. Carver, the moral force and consistency of whose character enabled him to speak to all his friends with great freedom.

"And you are not at all backward in telling me of them."

"How much better that I should speak to you of your faults. I might talk about them to others, but could that do you any good?"

"Certainly not."

"And you would think me very much to blame if I were to do so."

"I should, most assuredly; very much to blame. No man ought to talk about his neighbors disparagingly, unless he is guilty of some moral declension. It can do no good, and must do harm."

"The matter is clear enough, I perceive, when your good name is at stake. But you forgot this very sensible view when our friend Gordon was concerned."

Another flush passed over the young man's face. At first he felt angry and could with difficulty refrain from uttering a harsh reply. But he rallied his better feelings by a strong effort, and kept silence until he could speak as became him.

"You talk very plain sometimes, Mr. Carver," he said, forcing a smile.

"Isn't it always best to be frank and honest with our friends?"

"I suppose it is if we can be so."

"I have been perfectly frank with you, and I hardly think you are offended with me."

"Oh, no—no. Certainly not."

"I suppose you act with similar frankness towards Gordon. I have heard you say that you were one of his best friends."

"I cannot do it."

"Why?"

"I am sure he would not take it kindly."

"You are too positive. It is my opinion, that if some one would speak to him in the right spirit, and show him how offensive his manner often is, he would be very thankful for the hint, and strive to reform himself."

"He would never bear it. I know him too well."

"You do?"

"Yes. He is puffed up with his good opinion of himself. So much so that he would instantly fling aside any one who would presume to point out a fault."

"He has many good qualities."

"Oh, yes. With all the unpleasant features about him, I like him in many things."

"Are you anxious to give up his friendship?"

"Oh, not if I can retain both it and my self-respect."

"If it were not for his very unpleasant manners at times, he would be a general favorite."

"Yes. No one would be more liked."

"Then, it seems to me, that some one ought to go to him and plainly tell him his fault."

"It might, or it might not do good."

"Still inclined, I see, to think the worst."

"I can't help it."

"Because you are—— But I won't speak any plainer to you at this time."

"Oh, yes—speak out."

"Oh, it is not worth while. I shall have to go to Gordon, I see. You are all quick enough to notice the faults of your acquaintances and ready enough to complain of them, but how few of you have the moral courage to go forward and seek in a right spirit the correction of those faults. But here comes Gordon now. There can be no better time for an interview on this unpleasant subject than the present."

"Oh, no. Don't say anything about it now for the world," quickly replied the young man.

"Why not?"

"I don't care about his knowing that I made any complaint of him."

But Mr. Carver was not going to let him draw back from meeting the issue. Gordon came up at the moment and stopped with a pleasant salutation for his two friends.

"You seemed to be in grave converse just now, or I should judge so from the expression of your faces," he said.

"And so we were," replied Mr. Carver.

"What was the great and mighty subject?"

"Yourself."

"Me!"

"Yes."

"What have I done to cause a conversation about me to affect any of my friends so seriously?"

The companion of Carver, looked at him imploringly.

"I have heard a sad account of you," said Carver.

"What have I been doing?"

"Offending against the good laws by which social intercourse is conducted."

"I have?"

"Yes, and the complaints against you are loud."

The countenance of Gordon, which before was smiling, now changed into a serious expression.

"Are you really in earnest?" he asked.

"I certainly am; and if I had not met you now, should have called upon you at my earliest leisure."

"Who accuses me?"

"Here is one of your accusers," was promptly replied; and Carver looked at Ellis, who turned pale, and seemed very much confused. "He made out to stammer forth—

"I—I—don't—know—that I accused Mr. Gordon of anything. I—I—only objected to—to his manner of speaking sometimes."

"Is there anything offensive in my manner of speaking, Mr. Ellis? If there is, tell me at once what it is, and I will try to correct it. I shall not be offended, but really obliged to you."

"Spoken like a man, and just as I knew it would be," returned Carver, in an animated tone.

"But this is all a mystery, gentlemen. You allege something serious against me, and keep me in the dark as to its nature. Will you explain yourselves at once?"

"Its nothing of any consequence," remarked the weak minded Ellis.

"I think it is of consequence and so did you just now," was the rebuking reply of Carver.

"Am I accused of any crime?" asked Gordon.

"Only against good manners."

"Is that all. Well, I stand almost ready to plead guilty even before the specific charge is made, for I am well aware that I am not faultless. But let the axe fall, and if it take off my very head I will not murmur. In what way have I sinned?"

"In this," replied Mr. Carver; "You have not been generally courteous while engaged in animated conversation, especially if a difference of opinion arose. Your manner, and sometimes your language, is felt to be rude."

"Indeed!" ejaculated Gordon, dropping his eyes to the ground and standing for some moments deeply abstracted. At length he said;

"This may all be so and doubtless is, but I am utterly unconscious of it. For having called my attention to it, I am very greatly obliged to you. I feel deeply mortified to think that I could have so grossly violated one of the cardinal virtues of social life. But are you sure I have offended seriously?"

"I have heard several young men, Mr. Ellis here among others, complain bitterly of your offensive manner, especially while in argument. And I myself have noticed that your manner is often lightly sneering when an opinion opposite to some favorite one of your own is advanced. This cannot but give offence. In the eyes of gentlemen it is almost unpardonable."

"From my heart I thank you for what you have said," returned the young man. "I will endeavor to correct what is complained of as no more to injure the feelings of others. I would like to talk more about this now, but I was hurrying to fulfil an engagement when I came up and cannot stop a moment longer. So good-day, both of you. We will talk more about this hereafter."

And then Gordon hurried away, and left Mr. Carver and his companion alone.

"What do you think of Gordon, now?" asked the former.

Ellis tossed his head, and replied in a slightly contemptuous tone—

"He talks fair."

"And what is more, will act fair."

"We shall see."

And they did see. From that time, Gordon was very much changed. In conversation he was guarded, and was rarely betrayed into the rudeness of which so much complaint had been made.

I am sorry to have to record that the young man who had been most bitter in his complaints against the "college-bred" Gordon, never could forgive either him or Mr. Carver fully. Can the reader understand the reason?

In this rather imperfect sketch the writer has not succeeded in bringing out to his own satisfaction all that was in his mind on the subject discussed. But he hopes enough will be seen to point a moral, if not very richly adorn a tale. To all who complain of offensive peculiarities in their friends, he would suggest the propriety of imitating Mr. Carver in a frank avowal of the truth. In nine cases out of ten, it will be found that such a course will do good. We do not give to others half the credit they deserve for honest intentions and a generous desire to make themselves agreeable. Very few men are offensive from design, but generally so from some defect of character. A true friend will always seek to help another in the correction of his defects, rather than be angry with him or meet an unintentional rudeness by a deliberate insult.

"BRING BACK MY FLOWERS."

A child sat by a limpid stream,
And gazed upon the tide beneath,
Upon her cheek was joy's bright beam,
And on her brow, a blooming wreath;
Her lap was filled with blushing flowers,
And as the clear brook babbled by,
She scatter'd down the rosy showers,
With many a wild and joyous cry,
And laughed to see the mingling tide,
Upon its onward progress glide.

And time flew on—and flower by flower
Was cast upon the sunny stream,
But when the shades of eve did low'r,
She woke up from her blissful dream.
"Bring back my flowers," she wildly cried;
"Bring back the flowers I flung to thee;"
But echo's voice alone replied,
As danced the streamlet down the lea;
And still amid night's gloomy hours,
In vain she cried—"Bring back my flowers."

Oh, maiden! who on time's swift stream,
Dost daily see thy moments flee,
In this poor child's delusive dream,
An emblem thou may'st find of thee!
Each moment is a perfumed rose,
Into thy hand by mercy given,
That thou its fragrance might dispose,
And let its incense rise to Heaven;
Else, when death's shadow o'er thee lowers,
Thy heart will wail—"Bring back my flowers!"

CHRIST STILLING THE TEMPEST.

"But the ship was now in the midst of the sea, tossed with waves; for the wind was contrary."—St. Matt. xiv. 24.

Fear was within the tossing bark,
When stormy winds grew loud;
And waves came rolling high and dark,
And the tall mast was bow'd.

And men stood breathless in their dread,
And baffled in their skill—
But one was there, who rose and said
To the wild sea, "Be still!"

And the wild wind ceased—it ceased!—that word
Passed through the gloomy sky!
The troubled billows knew their Lord,
And sank beneath his eye.

And slumber settled on the deep,
And silence on the blast,
As when the righteous falls asleep,
When death's fierce throes are past.

Thou that didst rule the angry hour,
And tame the tempest's mood—
Oh! send thy spirit forth in power
O er our dark souls to brood!

Thou that didst bow the billow's pride,
Thy mandates to fulfil—
Speak, speak to passion's raging tide,
Speak and say—"Peace, be still!"

ONCE TOO OFTEN;

OR,

The Realities of a Coquette.

BY THE BARONESS DE CALABRELLA.

Doringcourt Park was situated in the rich and fertile county of Worcester; it was extensive and highly cultivated, and within its precincts, embedded in a wood, stood a red brick mansion, with its massive stone cornices, corbels and dressings—its deep bay windows and gable roofs. This mansion had been, for some centuries, in the hands of the Nugents—the great county family, whose ancestral honors might be traced back to the Normans, and whose arms may yet be decyphered in the blazonry of the Bayeux tapestry. Some hundred and fifty years ago, the inhabitant of this mansion was a solitary lady—a Lady Clara Nugent—whose mode of life and character formed a frequent subject for conversation and conjecture amongst the surrounding gentry. Of the personal appearance of Lady Clara, it may be enough to say, that her age was doubtful—her usual aspect sombre, and that she might have been supposed past the meridian of life; but, at times, when a smile of benevolence, an expression of content, beamed on her faultless features, giving life and brightness to her eyes, she seemed scarcely to have numbered thirty summers. Esteemed and courted by a populous neighborhood, she lived in great retirement; or, if she sought fellowship with any, it was with the poor and humble. Her village school was never neglected, and her most cheerful hours appeared to be those passed in the instruction of youth. In short, her beneficence was extended to all her poorer neighbours, among whom she was regarded with all the affection her bounties merited.

When she first came to reside at Doringcourt (for the property had only devolved on her by the death of two elder sisters, neither of whom had resided on the estate since their childhood), she was said to have received proposals from several gentlemen possessing fine estates in the county, but her determination never to marry was expressed with so much firmness, that it was considered irrevocable.

Early one summer's morning, the people in the village of Doringcourt were surprised to hear that Lady Clara had given orders for her travelling-carriage to be got ready. Twelve years uninterrupted residence at the Park, had induced them to fancy she could never leave it; but Lady Clara was going, without saying whether her absence would be long or short, nor to what spot she was proceeding. She made every arrangement for the continuance of her charities, and left instructions with the clergyman and her own steward, for the fulfilment of these plans.

Never could there have been a stronger proof of the inadequate value we are apt to set upon present blessings, than the aspect of Doringcourt village long after Lady Clara's departure. It was not merely the tribute of tears shed, as her carriage rolled rapidly through the assembled crowd, but a more lasting one in the overwhelming sorrow which seemed to paralyze their exertions. She whose counsel taught prudence and forethought—she whose smile of approval gladdened their hearts—she whose ready sympathy soothed the sorrows and dried the tears of the afflicted—she whose bountiful and judicious gifts took from the industrious the sting of failure—she was gone from them; her charities, her establishments were to be kept up, but the spirit which animated and rendered these things doubly precious, no longer dwelt among them.

After some weeks absence, Lady Clara returned almost as suddenly and unexpectedly as she had gone; but she returned not alone. She was accompanied by a young man who called her aunt, and on whom she lavished the greatest kindness. Whatever Captain Mortimer desired, was to be instantly procured. Whatever he did, seemed right in the eyes of Lady Clara; and, in truth, a mind like hers could not have had a fairer field for the indulgence of its tenderest sympathies. The young soldier's noble brow and honest bearing furnished him with a passport to every heart. He was in very bad health—five years' service on a West Indian station had robbed his cheek of its sunny brightness, and, in some degree, dimmed the lustre of his eye; and a low intermittant fever had prostrated, to almost childish weakness, his manly form.

Lady Clara tended and soothed him in his hours of pain and debility, and assumed a gaiety foreign to her disposition, when his spirits would bear it. At the close of a day, during which he had been unusually ill and depressed, she said—

"My dear Harry, why will you not confide in me? Why not avow the cause of a grief which may not be, as you think, without remedy?"

"Oh, yes, it is but too remediless," replied he; "but you have a right to my confidence, and shall not ask for it twice.

"Two years ago, I became ardently attached to the daughter of General Sir George Dormer, and had every reason to suppose my affections returned.—Eliza Dormer was beautiful and much admired; at times this admiration, which seemed pleasing to her, alarmed my tenderness, and, more than once, I ventured to tell her that her manner rather attracted than repelled, a mode of dalliance which I thought cruel to me. On these occasions Eliza would assure me that attentions were forced upon her—that her father's situation exposed her to them—that she could not be uncivil to any guest at the Government House; and, if not convinced by her arguments, I was overpowered by her bright and sunny smile, as she added—'you know, Harry, that I love only you.'

"Sir Charles Dormer was recalled to England, and, as Eliza would not cancel the promise she had exacted from me, of concealing our attachment from her father, I was forced to see her leave the island, and trust to her assurance that, ere I could obtain leave to join them in England, all should be acknowledged by her, and that she doubted not her father's consent would follow. 'At this moment,' said she, 'he is overwhelmed with public affairs, his mind is harrassed, his temper soured by a recall which he thinks unjust, and believe me, Harry, it were to risk our future happiness to apply to him at present.'—Perhaps, in this instance, my own reason took part with her arguments, but I bitterly reproached myself for having consented to the previous concealment.

"I saw them embark, and instantly applied for leave. Of the difficulties thrown in my way, you can best judge, for nothing short of your persevering kindness could have overcome them. But, during these negotiations, my health became affected by the climate, and my unceasing anxiety about Eliza brought on that cruel attack of fever from which, under your good nursing, I am but progressing towards recovery.

"Had you not been at Liverpool to meet me, hardly should I have desired to be carried on shore, so completely had illness prostrated all my energies.—From my agent, to whom I immediately applied on landing, I received two letters from Eliza, but they were not calculated to comfort me, for she persisted in the imprudence we should commit in acknowledging our attachment. This morning, I have received another, through the same channel, for I have not given her my address, not knowing whether you might not pursue your original intention of making a tour. This letter is, I think, more satisfactory than the former ones. She entreats me to make no attempt to visit her, and says she is leaving home with her father on a round of visits, and mentions among others that she is to spend some days at the Palace at Worcester."

While Captain Mortimer had been speaking, Lady Clara had remained silent, but evidently much agitated, at the conclusion of his recital, she said—

"Harry, the story of your grief has much affected me—it arises from a serious cause. Eliza Dormer is a coquette, and better link your fate with an unvenomed reptile than with such a being: let us hope that she may not be irrevocably one, for then would your sorrows be without avail. She may be but misled by youthful folly, and counsel may amend her. The Bishop of Worcester and his lady are well-known to me, I will call on them, and invite Sir Charles and his daughter here. If I find, after a diligent search into her character, that her heart is sufficiently healthy to ally it safely with yours, I will do my utmost to obtain her father's consent; but if it be cankered by that loathsome vice of coquetry, not only would I sooner follow to your grave than advance your marriage, but I will endeavor by every means to prevent it."

"My dear aunt, I must have done Eliza injustice; believe me, she is no coquette. What have I said to make you think so ill of her?"

"Alas! Harry, your description has left no doubt on my mind that hers is tainted by the germs of that dangerous vice; but let us hope that it may be but tainted, and not thoroughly diseased. I will go to Worcester to-morrow, pay my visit, and if I find Sir Charles Dormer, to whom my family are well known, I will invite him to visit Doringcourt ere he leaves Worcestershire."

Lady Clara was not one to promise and not perform, and early the next day she was on her way to Worcester. Her invitation to Doringcourt met with an immediate assent, and was fixed for that day week; their stay, Sir Charles said, could be but short, as they were expecting friends at home within a fortnight. Not a word was said of Captain Mortimer, and Lady Clara insisted on her nephew not apprizing Eliza of his being resident there. She wished to judge of her conduct under surprise at meeting him.

"You might, and I doubt not, would be easily deceived," said she; "but I shall not be so: every turn of her countenance, every word she may utter; her very silence will enable me to detect the extent to which she may be a coquette."

On the appointed day, Sir Charles and Miss Dormer arrived, and Lady Clara watched the latter most assiduously. On first seeing Captain Mortimer, which her hostess took care should not be under the restraint of her father's presence, she turned so pale, and was so violently agitated, that Lady Clara mentally exclaimed—"He is not indifferent to her, and all may be well." On first perceiving him she had started forward, but remembering Lady Clara's presence, stopped, trembling and irresolute. Harry, who was still feeble, and walked with some difficulty, caught her hands, and after a few indistinct words, said—

"Dear Eliza, my aunt knows all, I have told her of our mutual attachment."

"Oh, how imprudent!" exclaimed Eliza; "but you will not, madam: you will not, I trust, betray me to my father!"

"We will talk of that another time," answered Lady Clara; "for the present your secret, though an unwise and undutiful one, is safe;" and with these words she left them together.

Sir Charles Dormer's meeting with Captain Mortimer was most cordial; he evidently harboured no suspicion of the existing attachment. At dinner a large party assembled; for Lady Clara had purposely invited all the gay young men of which the neighborhood could boast. Eliza passed that day's ordeal without incurring the slighest censure from her hostess, who was too just not to perceive the difficult position in which she was placed, and that if she permitted her attention to be partly engrossed by some of the visitors, it might be the better to conceal her real feelings from her father.

Lady Clara took an early opportunity of conversing with Sir Charles Dormer, spoke flatteringly of his daughter's appearance and manner, and then begged to claim the privilege of an old friend of the family, and enquire if any alliance was on the tapis for Miss Dormer.

"That, madam," replied Sir Charles, "is an inquiry somewhat difficult to answer. A marriage was settled for her before she could well have chosen for herself, and my word pledged to an old brother officer to bestow her hand on his son, should I find their characters not too dissimilar. Eliza was left in ignorance of this treaty, but on meeting the young man (whose name is Denham), she appeared so pleased with him, that I acquainted her with the promise I had made his father. Would you believe it, Lady Clara, from that hour her conduct changed; she took every opportunity of avoiding him, and received the attention of any one in preference. At one moment I suspected her of liking your nephew, but since we returned to England others seem equally to have attracted her; and as I never mean to force my child's inclinations, I can only hope that Denham's excellent character and aimable disposition may in the end prevail."

Lady Clara's fears became strengthened; but she said as carelessly as she could—

"And so Miss Dormer's liking for my nephew was only transient; but had it been otherwise, Sir Charles, and there had been a mutual attachment, would the alliance have displeased you?"

"Certainly not, Lady Clara; I should have been sorry, as I shall be in any case, if my word to my old friend remains unfulfilled; but I know no one of whom I think more highly than of Harry Mortimer."

Lady Clara's next business was with Miss Dormer, who she invited to come and work with her in her private sitting-room. As soon as both ladies were engaged, Lady Clara observed—

"I have been speaking to your father of you, Miss Dormer."

"Oh! you have not betrayed us!" exclaimed Eliza.

Lady Clara related all that had passed, reproaching her warmly, yet not harshly, for the levity and coquetry her conduct had displayed.

Deeply affected, Eliza Dormer sunk on her knees and entreated Lady Clara to counsel, to protect and advise her.

"I am young, I am weak," she said; "no mother's counsel ever fell on my ear; till this hour I never thought my conduct could bear such an interpretation; for, in the midst of all my follies, my love for Harry was omnipotent, and henceforth I will strive to appear worthy of his."

Lady Clara raised the weeping supplicant as she said—

"May I find it so, and then it shall be my business to promote your marriage; but as a protection against yourself, I enjoin you to relate to Harry the substance of our conversation—the conviction your past conduct had forced on me, and the determination you have made of acting more circumspectly for the future. Your father dines out, and this evening I will make you and Harry acquainted with a tale which will force you both to loathe, as I do, the name of a coquette."

Faithful to her promise, Lady Clara repaired with her young guests to her private sitting-room, where she was sure of no interruption.

"You have often asked me, Harry," she began, "why I supposed myself so well able to discover of what a coquette is capable. Alas! alas! who should know better than myself? for I was a finished, a heartless coquette. Happiness in its brightest form wooed me; I was beloved by one on whom I doated, but the deadly sin of coquetry was too strongly interwoven in my nature. You, Henry, must, I almost fancy, remember some of the incidents I am about to relate, for your early years were passed with us, and though my poor sister was not your mother, never did any one perform a mother's duties more conscientiously than my dear Mary did to her husband's motherless boy; and when, at that husband's early death, your uncles would have relieved her from the charge, she begged you might remain with her till you were ten years old. You must surely remember Chaworth Castle, its turretted walls, its moats, its fastnesses?

"But to proceed with my tale, I was the youngest of three sisters; we were left orphans at an early age. My eldest sister died very young, and when Mary married your father (then a widower), I was consigned by my guardian to her care. I loved her tenderly, and save on one point, her wish was my law; but vain were all her tender admonitions against my besetting sin. Not to be admired by all, not to be singled out from the crowd, was a position too painful to be endured, and no sooner did a new face appear than every art was used, every effort was made by me, to attract attention—but, once secured, the charm was gone—conquest was my aim, its preservation I cared not for. I was in the very zenith of this disgraceful occupation, when your father's sudden death for a time arrested me. I really shared my poor sister's affliction: happy would it have been had the retirement into which it forced me been productive of more salutary effects. Mary, ever thoughtful for others, would not hear of this seclusion being prolonged beyond the period of my mourning. At first, I resisted her wish that I should again go out; but my entreaties to remain with her became fainter on hearing that one of the stewards appointed at the approaching races was a young, rich and handsome nobleman. It was not in nature—at least, not in my wicked nature, to leave the field open to my former rivals, and fully armed for the conquest, I departed with my chaperon, for the races. I had not been long in the grand stand when the stewards came up; one of them I recognized as an old admirer, the other was a perfect stranger. For the first time in my life, my manner was confused—I felt a timidity quite foreign to my character; and when the stranger addressed me, my voice trembled in giving the simple answer his question required.—The whole time I remained on the course, this feeling never left me, and during the drive home I scarcely spoke. On my return, my sister observed my agitated and reserved manner.

"'My beloved Clara,' said she, 'how selfish has my sorrow made me; I have allowed you to share my seclusion so long, that the first scene of gaiety is too much for your nerves, but this must not continue,' and turning to my companion she added, 'dear Mrs. Chisholme, I depend on you to take Clara to the ball this evening.'

"I made a faint resistance to this proposal, but my sister would hear of no excuse, and by the time my chaperon returned to conduct me thither, I had conquered my unusual nervousness, and was again myself. My toilette that evening occupied more of my attention than it had ever before done; and when my sister, with a burst of affection, pressed me fondly to her heart, and called me her beautiful Clara, I again trembled from gratified feeling.

"On entering the ball-room, the two stewards advanced to meet us, and the young and handsome stranger of the morning asked permission to lead me to the dance, which had been delayed till my arrival. That evening completed the infatuation of the morning, and, seating myself on Mary's bed, who was awake on my return, I told her that I trusted, for my sake, that she would not deny admittance to Lord Ernest Malvers when he called next day.

"'Assuredly not, my loved Clara,' replied that gentle sister, 'if you really are anxious to see him; but, dear one, you must not enlist me in your victimizing plans: they are unworthy of you, and——'

"'Oh! say no more, Mary,' cried I; 'see Lord Ernest, and then tell me if he is likely to be the victim of any woman.'

"And Mary did see Lord Ernest; day after day he came, and my very nature seemed changed. I lived but in his sight, and even the civilities of other men were sickening to me.

"The summer passed away like a dream; the autumn tints had already clothed the fine old trees in the park. Our walks, our rides were curtailed in length, but by a bright and cheerful wood fire, our evenings glided on in peace and happiness. One night, Ernest had been reading to us portions of Shakspeare's plays.

"'What a conception of mental agony must that man have had,' said Ernest, 'ere he could have portrayed Othello's first doubt of his wife!'

"'By-the-bye, Ernest,' said I, 'you have no jealousy in your disposition, I think.'

"'Rather,' replied he, 'I have no suspicion; to me it would be impossible to suspect the woman I loved—for, suspecting, I should cease to love.'

"'Then you will never be jealous of me?' I asked, as my hand rested in his.

"'Of you, Clara! Jealous of my influenced wife!

No, no, not even were an Ange to come between us. You have taught me to love you fondly, and therefore must I trust you fully. None but yourself could break the bonds of love and trust you have forged.'

"Half laughing, I answered, 'Shall I try?' Mary frowned, and saying it was late, arose, and passing her arm through mine, bid Ernest good night.

"As soon as we were alone, my sister lectured me for the silly speech I had just made. My besetting sin was once more roused, and fearlessly I replied—

"'Not so silly as you may think, Mary. I have for some time perceived how very sure Ernest feels; I must give him some alarm, or we shall, even before marriage, sink into absolute listlessness.'

"Greatly alarmed for my happiness, my sister warmly and tenderly expostulated against my folly, but in vain.

"Will it be believed, that from that hour my former acts were again resorted to? Just at that time, two visitors, Lord Beauvoir and his brother, Mr. Lister, came to pass some time with us, and I devoted myself to the task of captivating both. Ernest was so provokingly calm under my first outbreak, that I was piqued into a continuance of my folly.

"'Your sister's guests engross much of your attention, my dear Clara,' at length he observed; 'and I am jealous of the time you feel it right to give them.'

"Fool that I was! this very speech, so kind, so confiding, which should have made me blush at my treachery, seemed to inspirit me to do worse. Ernest had pronounced the word 'jealous;' he said he was jealous of the time I gave; but he must also be jealous of me or my triumph would not be complete; and, in defiance of my sister's remonstrances, I rushed headlong into the vortex of folly I had planned. One night Ernest had besought me to sing, and I had made a thousand silly excuses, when Mr. Lister, ignorant of the subject of our discourse, for we were standing apart, came up, and with one of his blandest smiles, entreated me to try some manuscript music which had just been sent him by a professional friend. I was about to refuse—my first impulse was good: I had been listening to Ernest for ten minutes, and something of his noble nature had infused itself into my mind—but my evil genius prevailed. What a crowning triumph this would be!—now he must be jealous—now he must be miserable. I beheld him in imagination at my feet, beseeching me to restore him to my favour: such an opportunity might not again occur, and taking off my gloves, I walked deliberately to the piano-forte, and was soon engaged in decyphering a sweet and plaintive melody. Once I looked up to see if Ernest was listening, but he was not within my sight, and though I began to tremble a little at what I had done, I proceeded to the end of the air. On quitting the instrument, I perceived Lord Beauvoir reading, my sister was bending over her embroidery frame; I could not be mistaken—a tear fell on it—and Lord Ernest was no where in the room. Half frantic, I rushed into the vestibule, and was told that Lord Ernest had gone out to walk. I ran as fast as my trembling limbs would permit to the terrace, where we had so often walked together, and in the temple where the first words of love had passed our lips—where our troth had been plighted—I beheld Ernest. His hat was off, his face was buried in his hands, his arms resting on the table before which he was seated. I sprang forward, and ere he was aware of my approach, was on my knees imploring him to forgive me. He raised his head and looked at me with a look of such intense pity, that I became speechless with shame and contrition.

"'Clara,' said he, 'what is all this? One of us must be under some strange delusion—explain to me what it all means. You, who I left a short time since directing your attentions to Mr. Lister, hastening to fulfil his slightly expressed wish, though the same wish had been refused when urged by me—are now here in a position unbecoming a woman. For God's sake, Clara, speak the truth; tell me if you have found that it is on Mr. Lister, and not on me, that your happiness depends. The discovery will be a bitter one; but be candid, and fear not; I will be your friend, though I may never be more.'

"Every word Ernest uttered was a dagger in my heart. Did he really talk of giving me up to another? Oh! the very thought was torture. I clung to his knees, I adjured him to hear me; I protested that I cared for no one but him—but that I had wanted to make him jealous.

"He started as though an adder had stung him. Never shall I forget his colourless face as he said—

"'Great God! can it be possible that such an unworthy, wicked thought existed in the heart I so fondly worshipped?'

"He seemed literally choked with emotion. The sight of his anguish was too much for me; and I fainted. On recovering my senses, I found myself on a sofa in my sister's dressing-room; that dear sister and Ernest were bending over me; the latter still deadly pale. On my attempting to speak, he raised my hand to his lips, and said, very gently—

"'Clara, for your sake and mine, do not, I entreat, agitate yourself. Now that I see you restored to animation, I can leave you: to-night we had best give to reflection, to-morrow we will talk.'

"I grasped his hand and tried to retain him; but, bidding my sister good-night, he left the room.

"During many hours of that eventful night, did Mary try to soothe and comfort me.

"'Oh, he is hurt—he is angry with me; had you but seen the look he bent on me just before I lost my senses, you would not wonder at my anguish.'

"Towards midnight, worn out by crying, I fell asleep; but Ernest's words, 'Is it on Mr. Lister that your happiness depends?' rung in my ears, and with a painful shriek I awoke. Thus passed the night, and in the morning I was too feverish to rise. My sister told me that after I had left the drawing-room the preceding evening, Lord Beauvior had received an express, summoning him and his brother to their mother's death-bed, and that they had left the castle without loss of time. This was a great relief to me; how could I have met them? besides, I had fancied that some dreadful scene might ensue between Ernest and Mr. Lister, if the latter continued to pay me those attentions my manner had drawn on me. In the afternoon, I was able to leave my couch, and my sister led me into her dressing-room, where Ernest was awaiting me. I could but cast myself on his breast, and weep in utter helplessness.

"'My beloved Clara,' said Ernest, 'calm yourself I entreat: a few words will suffice for all we need ever say on this subject. You have thoughtlessly made a silly, forgive me, a wicked trial of your power; this time you have found it triumph over my better reason, or I should not now be here; but beware of venturing on a second trial, for remember that I, loving you above all earthly beings, tell you, that it would sever us for ever!'

"For some days I could not recover from this scene. I fancied that Ernest's manner betrayed more of pity than of love. He was called away suddenly, and his daily letters formed my world; not one phrase, not one line, but made me feel his worth, and often did I ask myself how I could have gained the affection of such a noble heart? His absence had been caused by the return of a widowed cousin from India, who, with her baby, was shipwrecked off the Isle of Wight. No lives were lost, but the vessel sank, and every article of property went to the bottom; all Mrs. Murray's papers, her Cashmeres, her pearls, which were of great value, and which her straitened circumstances rendered doubly so, were engulphed. Ernest spoke constantly of his cousin, of the deep sorrows with which she had been visited, and of her noble and high-minded sentiments; he hoped, he said, that we should be friends—he was sure I must like her. At first, I felt disposed to do so, but the reiteration of her good qualities awoke some of my bad ones, till at length Ernest's praises of another became wormwood to my vanity, and I resolved on his return, which was daily expected, to show him by my manner that I was hurt by his warm commendations of his cousin. When he did return, the joy of again beholding him, drove, for a time, all other thoughts from my mind. But ere he had been with us long, his frequent mention of Mrs. Murray piqued me; and when he spoke of her, I either turned away, or hinted at some unworthy motive having, perhaps, prompted a line of conduct which he represented as perfect. One day he uttered something which my ill-disposed mind construed into a desire to hold his cousin up as an example to me, and this was an offence which neither my love nor my pride could tolerate. I spoke harshly and unguardedly. Ernest, who had not intended to offend, made no concession, and, but for my dear sister's interposition, we should have quarrelled seriously. She, who was candour and truth itself, could have no suspicion of the hidden deformities of my mind; and when she assured Ernest that it was my great affection which rendered me so sensitive, she dreamed not that the besetting sin of my youth was again rife within me. Her good offices dispersed the threatening storm—but from that hour I resolved once more to make trial of my power, and force Ernest to expiate his offence. What! should I, the reigning beauty, the flattered idol of a little world, his own betrothed one too, be told to take pattern by a Mrs. Murray—by a woman whose name had never been heard of—whose beauty had never formed the dream of poet or painter? Forbid it vanity! Forbid it coquetry! In vain a remembrance of the scene which followed on my former trial recurred. I would be guarded. I would not give him any real cause for umbrage, but once more I would see him harrassed with doubt and jealousy.

"My sister—my noble sister, I dared not trust with my plan, and alone I could not execute it with effect. You, Harry, were selected as my innocent agent."

Captain Mortimer started—Lady Clara did not notice it, but continued—

"One morning, when all was prepared, I affected to have some business in the village, and requested Ernest to employ himself in my absence in answering a letter I had received from his cousin. 'I will send you the letter by Harry,' said I."

Lady Clara paused.

"Oh, I remember it all, now," exclaimed Harry; "it all becomes present before my sight. You gave me a letter to take into the library; you bid me, on some pretence, entice Lord Ernest to the window; you also desired me not to say you were in the house, but as soon as he opened the letter, to come softly and hold back the curtain in front of the window, that you might see him reading it. But dear Lady Clara—" and both her auditors rushed to her assistance—"you are ill—your hands are cold as marble. Oh! what have I said to affect you thus?"

It was some moments ere Lady Clara could speak; but when sufficiently recovered to do so, she replied,

"You have only continued a relation my courage failed under."

"Do not distress yourself by adding another word," entreated both Captain Mortimer and Miss Dormer.

"Oh! yes," exclaimed Lady Clara, "the self-sacrifice shall be complete, and may the lesson not be thrown away. The letter I gave you to deliver to Ernest was not the one he expected, but one which I had cunningly and infamously fabricated as if addressed to me by some favoured admirer. No sooner was it out of my hand, than I became terrified at what I had done; but it was too late to retract, and nerving myself with all the courage I could assume, to watch the effect of my unworthy stratagem, I stole softly into the room where my sister was sitting—sat down by her, and, as a sort of refuge from my fears, leaned myself against her shoulder. The curtain was soon slowly raised, and I beheld Ernest standing at the widdow, with the letter open in his hand. My heart beat tumultuously—my head grew giddy—the idea of treating it as a jest passed over my mind, and I burst into a loud laugh, which my discordant feelings rendered hoarse and frightful.—Ernest suddenly turned, cast one withering look on me, and vanished. That look proclaimed that the second trial had, indeed, severed us for ever!"

Early on a bright autumn morning, a travelling carriage was seen rapidly traversing the sweep in front of Doringcourt. There was a bustle of servants, and the usual flutter attendant on a departure for a journey. Shortly a lady of grave aspect appears, leaning on the arm of a gentleman, who hands her into the carriage. She is followed by a lady much younger, in whose eyes there sits an expression of serene happiness, directed apparently towards a sleeping infant who has just been placed beside her in the carriage. The whole party are now seated—the postilions spring to their horses—there is a cracking of whips, and a murmur of voices from the domestics, who gather at the doors and windows to make their respectful adieus, and, amidst prayers and blessings, the carriage departs.

It is Lady Clara Nugent, who leaves Doringcourt Park for a journey into Germany. She is accompanied by her nephew and his wife; and it is already whispered in the neighbourhood that her godson, Ernest Mortimer, the sleeping infant, is to be heir of Doringcourt.

WHO SHALL HAVE HIM?

OR,

THE UNMARRIED PREACHER.

BY MRS. SARAH H. HAYES.

"The doings of the Lord," said Deacon Murphy, as he walked to church one Sabbath morning, with a newly-arrived resident of their flourishing town—"Verily the doings of the Lord are marvellous in our eyes. Twelve months since, I should not have hesitated to denominate that man a madman who had predicted the change which has taken place with respect to religion among us; we seemed sunk in the gall of bitterness, and the bonds of iniquity—but now, praise be to God, the moving of His spirit is visible among these dry bones."

"I am pleased to hear so favourable a report of your village," said Mr. Liston. "As the father of a growing family, I am rejoiced that my children can enjoy the privilege of worshipping their Creator among His followers. But it appears your community has not always borne this character;—to what do you ascribe the great and happy change which has taken place?"

"To the presence of a real servant of the Lord," said Mrs. Murphy, speaking before her husband could open his lips—"to the presence of a man who is, in deed and truth, a Christian. Our old parson, Mr. Black, had entirely worn out among us. I really think the man was destitute of experimental religion; his notions were so old-fashioned, nothing seemed to prosper in his hands; and with his helpless wife and family, I must consider his removal from our parish a blessing."

"And who is the Brainard or Swartz you have among you now?" said Mr. Liston, in a tone of surprise. "I was totally unacquainted with his high reputation."

"He is a young man," said the Deacon, "who has been with us but a few months: but in that short space of time you can form no conception of the awakening on the subject of religion. Girls, who before thought of nothing but how to laugh, to talk, or sing, seem now to be earnestly enquiring the way of salvation, and women who have hitherto occupied their precious time in a round of giddy amusements, now appear to be examining into the doctrines of Grace as taught in the Gospel. Our Dorcas Society and Bible Association have both been revived—the flourishing state of the Bible Class and Sabbath School, exceed our most sanguine expectations, and praise be to God, I have no complaint to make of the state of religion in our highly-favoured place."

To this panegyric, Mr. Liston made no reply—but walked on with heightened interest and curiosity, to the small, neat country church. It was already more than half filled, and as group after group gathered in, he looked with wonder (and after so glowing a description of their zeal in the good cause, we may say with admiration also,) on the many young and lovely females who crowded the pews. He noticed, too, that the countenance of each wore the appearance of placid seriousness so becoming the sanctuary of the Most High—and now, when all were seated, a deep and holy quiet seemed to pervade the whole congregation; it was the interval of repose which usually takes place before the commencement of the services, and which appears so peculiarly fitted for the laying aside of every worldly care—the stilling of each beating heart, and which should be employed by all to the utmost of their ability, in endeavouring to prepare in every breast a resting-place for the Heavenly Dove which seems brooding among them.

At length the second Sabbath bell pealed forth its glad summons, and immediately after, the Preacher entered, and proceeding up the aisle with measured but graceful tread, ascended the pulpit. He was young, with a tall elastic form, dark intelligent eyes, and a high, pale forehead, shadowed by a mass of sullen black hair; his voice was deep and sonorous, and his gestures rapid, but graceful; and when he commenced his address, every lovely eye seemed bent upon him with thrilling and expectant interest. Mr. Liston, too, had wrought himself into a perfect fit of enthusiasm—but he listened in vain for the strains of impassioned eloquence which he expected would greet his ear. The young minister appeared to feel himself a watchman upon the Tower of Zion, and he spoke well, very well—he told his people of their duties to God and man—expressed his pleasure at the attention given to religious subjects among them,—exhorted those who had recently joined themselves to the people of the Lord, to fight the good fight, and hold fast to the faith; and gliding rapidly over the conclusion, dismissed them with a fervent but common-place prayer, for their temporal and spiritual welfare.

Mr. Liston's feeling at this moment was one of extreme disappointment—he had listened, but in vain, for any thing new or inspiring—any thing which could entitle him (the speaker) to the high character for eloquence he appeared to sustain. But he consoled himself immediately with the idea that this sermon was perhaps inferior to the generality.—"The young man," said he, mentally, has doubtless spoken under some disadvantages. I will not judge him hastily." But he was soon obliged to change this opinion, by the audible encomiums from many fair lips, which reached his wondering ears as he threaded the aisle. "Beautiful!" "glorious!" "divine!" were echoed on all sides, and the old Deacon's wife's hearty "He out-did himself to-day," induced the Yankee Mr. Liston to shrewdly suspect the amiable divine owed his popularity to something else than his preaching.

Mrs. Davenport was a widow lady in rather slender circumstances, inhabiting, with six marriageable daughters, a small house in the outskirts of the village of N——. Notwithstanding her income, however, she had always managed to keep up appearances; and as five of her daughters, it was supposed, had been hopefully converted under the ministry of the new Preacher, Mr. Sorley, and as they were devoted to works of charity, and employed a great portion of their time in relieving the poor, and attending Church, they happened at this time to be great favourites among the good people of N——.

We will now take a peep into their little parlour, on a warm July afternoon, some weeks after the commencement of our story. Mrs. Davenport herself was seated at a table in the centre of the room, busily engaged in cutting out some coarse work, and talking very rapidly upon some subject apparently altogether foreign to her employment. The young ladies were grouped around, each engaged at some work of charity and self-denial, with the exception of one, who was idly stationed at the venetian blind, though for what purpose does not at present appear.

"Ma, do stop talking one moment," said the elder, Miss Susan; "for I wish to speak about something important, and that is just this: when I finish this jacket, the idiot may do without clothes for me, and I verily believe it is useless for me to try any longer, for the last time Mr. Sorley was here, he was vastly more attentive to Alice than to any one of us."

"Well, child," said the old lady, "earnestly, and with surprise; "would it not be a sufficient matter of rejoicing, if we could even succeed in getting him for your sister?"

Now Alice was next to the youngest, and by far the prettiest of the whole family. She was a regular attendant at preaching—had professed to experience a change of heart—and, to do her justice, had never harbored the idea of making a conquest of the young Minister; there were so many candidates in the field, she had never dreamed of being able to make an impression; therefore, her sister's remark took her quite by surprise; and the blush, having its origin in delight, which mounted to her very temples, had scarcely time to subside, before the young lady who was stationed at the window, called out—

"There, he has just come out of Liston's, and is crossing the street, and he is coming here as sure as the world!"

"Now, girls," cried Mrs. Davenport, as she moved to the door to admit him, "be very much engaged at your work, and as you know you cannot all have him, why endeavor to set your sister Alice off to the best possible advantage."

Agreeably to this command, the head of each young lady was immediately bent to the work upon her lap, and Mr. Sorley was in the very midst of them before they were at all aware of his approach, when he was recognised by a unanimous cry of delighted surprise.

"As pleasantly and profitably employed as ever, my dear young ladies, I see," said he with a smile of animated pleasure, as he entered.

"We can do but little, sir," said Miss Susan, as she eagerly offered him a chair, "but that little is done very cheerfully. I have, however, just been telling our dear Alice that she has exerted herself almost too much to-day; she looks weary."

"I trust not weary of well doing, Miss Alice," said Mr. Sorley, with considerable archness; "but," added he quickly, still addressing her to whom his attention was thus called, "the first consideration should be our own health; and I should be sorry to see any one of my fair charge injure themselves even by their devotion to the interests of the poor."

"It would be difficult for us to become weary of well doing, my dear sir," returned Mrs. Davenport, smiling, "if we look to our pastor for an example; the exertions he makes for the spiritual benefit of all are notorious; and my advice to his flock would be, to press forward as their shepherd leads."

"You overrate my endeavors, madam," said the young Minister, striving to speak with composure, yet coloring with embarrassment at this flattery.

"Oh, not at all; not at all!" cried all the young ladies, in one breath.

"We never knew," continued the mother, "what it was to enjoy religious privileges till you came among us; look at the flourishing state of all our institutions—at the number who have come out from the people of the world, and proclaimed themselves on the side of the Lord—look at the situation of things now, and what they were six months since, and you must acknowledge, my dear sir, we do not overrate your abilities."

"You should give the glory to God, Mrs. Davenport," returned Mr. Sorley, in a tone of slight displeasure, "not to one unworthy as myself. I am far from taking the credit of any thing which has been done; for I very well know that 'Paul may plant, and Apollos water, but God alone can give the increase.' "

"I admire humility," replied the lady; but instantly perceiving that enough had been said upon the subject at present, she skilfully shifted her ground, and mentioned a case of distress which had lately come under their notice, and in which her daughters felt great interest.

"It is an old man," said she, "employed as a woodcutter, who was so unfortunate some time since as to have one of his limbs broken by the falling of a tree; his wife is extremely helpless, and they are burthened with a large family; among others, a wretched idiot, for whom Susan has been employed in making a jacket. We have done all we can to assist them, but I think the old man will scarcely recover, and I fear, although living under the very sound of the gospel, his soul is in worse than heathen darkness."

"It will afford me great pleasure," cried Mr. Sorley, whose sympathies were strongly awakened, "to call and converse with him; and I certainly feel that I have been greatly deficient in this respect. It is the imperative duty of a Pastor, to make extensive inquiries as to the spiritual state of the afflicted and needy, in his immediate vicinity, and this I have totally neglected."

"You have been so short a time among us, my dear sir," said Miss Susan, earnestly, "and have already been so fully occupied, that we are really beginning to fear your labors are almost too much for you. It is impossible you could so early learn the situation of all the poor in the neighborhood, and I beg you will not reproach yourself on this account."

At this rhapsody, Mr. Sorley smiled, but made no reply; he imagined he despised flattery—but the draughts daily and hourly presented for him to drain, were so large, that it was impossible for him to avoid swallowing a small portion, and insensibly it had its effect. He learned to listen with composure to what had at first shocked his pure, pious, and humble mind; and when, after a lengthened visit, he rose to depart, it was with a considerably more elevated opinion of his own importance, and in company with Miss Alice, who volunteered to direct him, he set out to the wood-cutter's hovel.

"I think I managed to admiration, to-day, girls," said Mrs. Davenport, as the door closed on their retreating figures. "He listens now a good deal more complacently to his own praises, than he did when he first came to N——, but I can tell you it requires some tact to flatter a man of discernment, and this I must say I think we all possess in an eminent degree."

"If Alice only plays her card well," said Miss Lizzy, who, being extremely homely, and, moreover, next in age to Miss Susan, had no thought for herself; "If Alice only plays her card well, I really think she may yet be Mrs. Sorley; for to tell the truth, she is very pretty, and he appears vastly more pleased with her than with any of us."

And thus for hours would this amiable mother and daughters continue to speculate, and form plans for the future; for their views were wholly selfish; and although they could converse fluently upon religious subjects, being altogether destitute of vital piety, their whole aim appeared to be, to do their alms before men; and by these and other means equally insincere and hypocritical, to bring about a desired end. Yet in this they were not singular—it is a common plea that the object in view justifies the means; and if that object is the advancement of their own interests, how few pause to enquire whose progress in the cause of Christianity may be retarded by the course they pursue. Mr. Sorley was simple and unsophisticated, wholly unlearned in the arts of the people of the world, and when he came to N——, entirely devoted to the cause of his Master. He was conscious, however, after some months' residence there, that this heavenly peace of mind was fast departing. He felt more anxious to please, more satisfaction at his own doings, and his thoughts more frequently reverted to himself than was wont, yet he could assign no cause for the apparent change—it was impossible that it could be flattery, for the praises to which he hourly listened were but the promptings of unfeigned love, and although they sometimes embarrassed him, their motives were so pure that he could not censure.

Ah! had he possessed the fabled mirror, with what horror and affright would he have shrunk from that "hideous sight, a naked, human heart!"

"Mamma," cried Caroline Allan, as she came in from church one Sabbath, and advanced to the mirror—"Mamma, did not Mr. Sorley look handsome to-day! I really," continued she, taking off her bonnet and arranging her shining curls, "I really have a serious notion of joining the church."

Now Mrs. Allan herself had been for several years a member in very good standing; she went regularly to meeting, and as she was very wealthy, and at the head of the ton, contributed liberally to every charible subscription presented to her; therefore nobody presumed to censure any thing in her conduct, with the exception of her excessive indolence, and as the Sabbath in question was excessively hot, and she was seated in her easy chair, busily engaged in fanning herself, she must be excused for merely laughing at her daughter's remark, and replying:

"I hope you will join some day, my dear, but I trust from a better motive."

"A better motive!" echoed Cornelia, who, as she was the prettiest girl in N——, and an only and spoiled child, chose to consider every thing she undertook as perfectly proper. "I could not possibly have a better motive—half the girls have already joined on this very account; and pray, mamma, as a member of church, do not let me hear any insinuations from you."

"You are a sad girl, Cornelia," said Mrs. Allan, fanning herself more violently.

"I am serious, I declare mamma," returned the young beauty, laughing; "I hear there is a company with several fine officers attached to it, about taking possession of the old fort,—if this report is correct, well and good, I shall remain as I am; but if it should prove unfounded, you may depend upon my becoming serious; I will not be the only black sheep in the flock, and you shall see I will yet bear off the palm, and win the heart of Mr. Sorley."

"Cornelia," said Mrs. Allan, now seriously displeased, "Mr. Sorley is an entire stranger to you; we were ignorant of his existence, until his arrival among us, and he has always resided at a great distance; he may, for all you know, be engaged—do not be so silly."

"Mamma, mamma, have mercy; do, do not breathe such a thing," cried Cornelia, interrupting her, and assuming, at the same time, an attitude of so much alarm and affright, that, to avoid participating in her mirth, Mrs. Allan was obliged to get up and leave the room. And perhaps it was well for Cornelia Allan that she had not earlier resolved to play the hypocrite—for on the next Sabbath, Mr. Sorley acquainted his congregation that for the two following Sabbaths they were to expect no preaching. This notice as it was entirely unexpected, of course occasioned some surprise: and many of his new and zealous members felt that it would be almost impossible to spare him, even for this length of time—but as he appeared anxious to re-visit his native place, and as no reasonable excuse for denying his request could be alleged, he prepared for his departure, amid the fondest professions of regard, and accompanied by the kindest wishes of his numerous friends. And we will not say how many fair and tearful eyes watched, as it lessened in the distance, the coach that contained his cherished form—and how slowly rolled around those three weary weeks, and how often did many a being, famed for her gentleness, feel disposed to chide the laggard time.

"How much we miss him," groaned Miss Susan Davenport.

"Yes," cried Cornelia Allan, to whom this sentence was addressed, almost laughing in her face; "and," added she, running her hand lightly over the piano, "how applicable to your case is that beautiful line in Bishop Heber's address to his wife—'I miss thy kind approving eye, thy meek, attentive ear,' for I understand your quarters was a favorite resort of our young minister."

At this remark, Miss Davenport did her utmost, without succeeding to get up a simper, and a blush, and heartily despising the conceit she affected to ridicule; Cornelia again touched the keys with some skill, and sang, with considerable archness—

"Ah! souls that well might soar above,
To earth will fondly cling;
And build their hopes on human love,
That false and fragile thing."

But at length the wished-for period arrived, when the expecting congregation were to hail the return of their beloved pastor; and we will not enumerate the many youthful hearts which fluttered at the pleasing anticipation, nor say how often the dial-plates of the clocks, in that particular neighborhood, were consulted on the memorable afternoon: but, true to its time, the state coach did at length wind into town.

Mr. Sorley really had arrived, and, to the utter horror and consternation of half the population of N——, accompanied by a young and lovely wife!! Even his old hostess, whose three unmarried daughters had recently connected themselves with the church, and who had hastened forward, the first to welcome him, in the surprise and agony of the moment, raised her hand in the face of the stranger, and started back in pitiable astonishment, as he introduced her—and before one half hour, the news had spread like wildfire over the village, and gathering in its onward course, "left clamour and dismay behind." Many, however, affected to disbelieve it, they could not credit what would thus utterly, and at once, crush every hope, demolish every air-built castle, and leave them tormented by the conflicting emotions of anger, mortification, and disappointment; but on the following day, which was Sabbath, the audience, who had crowded the church to overflowing, many of them for the purpose of gratifying their curiosity, found the report confirmed by proof strong as holy writ.

Their preacher, alas! no longer unmarried, entered, with a young and elegant female leaning upon his arm, and with all a husband's pride, he escorted the timid stranger to a seat, before proceeding to occupy his own elevated station. That day, Mr. Sorley really did outdo himself. What it was that inspired him, we know not; whether he felt with peculiar force the awful responsibility attached to his high calling, or considered that he had hitherto been remiss in not exerting to their utmost his slumbering powers, we cannot say; but, as it was, he poured forth from a lip, where "sleeping thunders seemed to lie," sublime and beautiful truths, in words of thrilling, burning eloquence. Yet the look of kindling interest, which it had always been his pleasure to note in the countenance of the female portion of his audience, was wanting. The listlessness and inattention, too apparent, surprised and grieved him—and on recurring to the fact in the solitude of his own chamber, he failed not to attribute it to the novel presence of a gay company of young officers and soldiers, who graced many of the pews—for the military had really arrived during his absence, taken possession of the old fort in the neighborhood, and in time to prevent the becoming serious of Cornelia Allan, who had been escorted to church by the handsome young captain, and, as it chanced to be on the very day of the first appearance of the minister's bride, we will not say with how much ill-concealed exultation she looked around on the disappointed faces of her numerous acquaintances.

"I have just been thinking, my love," said Mr. Sorley, to his gentle wife, some months afterwards, as they were seated alone in their quiet parlor—"I have just been thinking of the wonderful change which has taken place in the village since the arrival of the military. Before they came among us, you can scarcely conceive the attention paid to religious subjects. So great a blessing seemed to follow my labors, so crowded were our now empty pews, and so highly complimented was I on my poor endeavors, that I feel, and, with the Psalmist, I may say, 'My feet had well nigh slipped.' Now our young people appear to have put every thing serious far from them. They think of nothing but gaiety and amusement—I must confess, I did hope better things of them, particularly the Miss Davenports, they engaged with so much fervor in every good work—but, Oh! what a falling off is there!"

"We can do nothing, my beloved, but pity and pray for them," returned the young wife, raising her dewy eyes to the face of her husband, with an expression of so much tenderness, that, although he had loved her from childhood, he felt he had until that moment never fuly appreciated the Christian sweetness of her disposition. But she added no more, for she was aware of the extent of female influence, and would not pain him by the disclosure of a discovery which her woman's penetration had enabled her to make, but from which she knew the mind of her husband would instinctively recoil, viz: that he owed his popularity, not to the sterling goodness of his character, nor the zeal and fervor with which he preached the words of truth and soberness, but to the simple fact of his being an UNMARRIED PREACHER.

THE OLD MAID.

BY MRS. AMELIA B. WELBY.

Why sits she thus in solitude? her heart
Seems melting in her eye's delicious blue,—
And as it heaves, her ripe lips lie apart,
As if to let its heavy throbbings through;
In her dark eye a depth of softness swells,
Deeper than that her careless girlhood wore;
And her cheek crimsons with the hue that tells
The rich, fair fruit is ripened to the core.

It is her thirtieth birthday! with a sigh
Her soul hath turned from youth's luxuriant bowers,
And her heart taken up the last sweet tie
That measured out its links of golden hours!
She feels her inmost soul within her stir,
With thoughts too wild and passionate to speak;
Yet her full heart—its own intrepeter—
Translates itself in silence on her cheek.

Joy's opening buds, affection's glowing flowers,
Once lightly sprang within her beaming track;
Oh, life was beautiful in those lost hours!
And yet she does not wish to wander back!
No! she but loves in loneliness to think
On pleasure past, though never more to be:
Hope links her to the future—but the link
That binds her to the past—is Memory!

From her lone path she never turns aside,
Though passionate worshippers before her fall;
Like some pure planet in her lonely pride,
She seems to soar and beam above them all!
Not that her heart is cold! emotions new
And fresh as flowers, are with her heart-strings knit:
And sweetly mournful pleasures wander through
Her virgin soul, and softly ruffle it.

For she hath lived with heart and soul alive
To all that makes life beautiful and fair;
Sweet thoughts, like honey-bees, have made their hive
Of her soft bosom-cell, and cluster there;—
Yet life is not to her what it hath been—
Her soul hath learned to look beyond its gloss,—
And now she hovers, like a star, between
Her deeds of love—her Saviour on the Cross!

Beneath the cares of earth she does not bow,
Though she hath oft-times drained its bitter cup,
But ever wanders on with heaven-ward brow,
And eyes whose lovely lids are lifted up!
She feels that in that lovelier, happier sphere,
Her bosom yet will, bird-like, find its mate,
And all the joys it found so blissful here,
Within that spirit-realm perpetuate.

Yet, sometimes o'er her trembling heart-strings thrill
Soft sighs, for raptures it hath ne'er enjoyed,—
And then she dreams of love, and strives to fill
With wild and passionate thoughts the craving void.
And thus she wanders on—half sad, half blest—
Without a mate for the pure, lonely heart,
That, yearning, throbs within her virgin breast,
Never to find its lovely counterpart!

THE STOLEN CHILD.

A THRILLING STORY.

It was towards the commencement of the month of December, 1826, that I was going down the Mississippi in the steamboat Feliciana. We had arrived in the neighborhood of Hopefield, Hampstead county, when one of our paddles struck against a sawyer,* and was broken to pieces. We were obliged in consequence to cast anchor before the town.

Hopefield is a small town on the west bank of the river, about six hundred miles from New Orleans, and five hundred below the junction of the Ohio and Mississippi. It consisted, at the time of which I speak, of about fifteen houses, two of which were taverns and shops of the usual kind found in such places—their stock in trade consisting of a cask or two of whiskey, a couple of dozen knives and forks, a few colored handkerchiefs, some earthenware, lead, powder, and the like. Our party was composed of ten ladies, the same number of young men, and several elderly gentlemen. Nothing appears so desirable, during a long voyage in a river steamboat, as a stroll upon shore; and, as there was nothing to be done at Hopefield, the proposal of one of our number to take a ramble in the forest, was met with unqualified approbation by all the young men. We equipped ourselves: each with a rifle, and a bottle of wine or brandy, to keep the vapors of the swamps out of our throats; the son of one of the tavern-keepers, who offered himself as a guide, was loaded with a mighty ham and a bag of biscuits, which we procured from the steamboat; and, thus provided, we sallied forth on our expedition, attended by the good wishes of the ladies, who accompanied us a few hundred yards into the wood, and then left us to pursue our march.

I have often had occasion to notice, that the first entrance into one of our vast American forests, is apt to reduce the greatest talker to silence. In the present instance I found the truth of this remark fully confirmed. Whether it was the subdued half-light of the luxuriant wilderness through which we were passing, the solemn stillness, only broken by the rustling of the dead leaves under our feet, or the colossal dimensions of the mighty trees, that rose like so many giants around us, that wrought upon the imagination, I cannot say; but it is certain that my companions, who were mostly from the Northern States, and had never before been beyond Albany or the Saratoga Springs, became at once silent, and almost sad. The leaves of the cotton-tree, that giant of the South-Western forests, had already assumed the tawny hues of latter Autumn; only here and there a streak of sunbeam, breaking through the canopy of branches that spread over our heads, brought out the last tints of green now fast fading away, and threw a strange sparkling ray, a bar of light, across our path. Here was a magnolia with its snow-white blossoms, or a catalpa with its long cucumber-shaped fruit, amongst which the bright-hued red birds and paroquets glanced and flattered.

We walked for some time through the forest, amused more than once by the proceedings of two young clerks from Boston, who saw a wild animal in every thicket, and repeatedly levelled their guns at some bear or panther, which turned out to be neither more nor less than a bush or tree-stump. They pestered our guide with all sorts of simple questions, which he, with a true backwoodsman's indifference, left for the most part unanswered. After about an hour, we found ourselves on the borders of a long and considerably wide swamp, formed by the overflowings of the river, and which stretched for some five miles from north to south, with a broad patch of clear bright-green water in the centre. The western bank was covered with a thick growth of palmettos, the favourite cover of deer, bears, and even panthers; and this cover we resolved to beat. We divided ourselves into two parties, the first of which, consisting of the New Englanders, and accompanied by the guide, was to go round the northern extremity of the swamp, while we were to take a southerly direction, and both to meet behind the marsh, on a certain path which led through a thicket of wild plum-trees and acacias. Our guide's instructions were not the clearest, and the landmarks he gave us were only intelligible to a thorough backwoodsman; but as too many questions would probably have puzzled him, without making matters clearer to us, we set off, trusting to our eyes and ears, and to the pocket-compasses with which several of us were provided.

After another hour's walk, during which we had seen nothing but wild pigeons and squirrels, and a few moccasin snakes warming themselves in the sun-beams, which latter, on our approach, drew hastily back under the heaps of dry leaves, we arrived at the northern extremity of the swamp. Proceeding a short distance westward, we then took a northerly direction, along the edge of the palmetto field, with the marsh upon our right hand. It was a sort of cane-brake we were passing through, firm footing, and with grass up to our knees; the shore of the swamp or lake was overgrown with lofty cedars, shooting out of water four or five feet deep, which reflected their circular crowns. The broad streak of water looked like a huge band of satin, and the slightest motion of the leaves was immediately perceptible in the mirror beneath them. From time to time, the least possible breeze rustled through the trees, and curled the water with a tiny ripple. The water itself was of the brightest emerald-green; and the forest of palmetto stems that grew along the edge, was reflected in it like myriads of swords and lances. In the small creeks and inlets, flocks of swans, pelicans, and wild geese, were sunning themselves, and pluming their feathers for their winter flight. They allowed us to come within a score of paces of them, and then flew away with a rushing, whirring noise.

We had been for some time plodding patiently along, when our attention was suddenly attracted by a slow but continued rustling amongst the palmettos. Something was evidently cautiously approaching us, but whether panther, stag or bear, we could not tell—probably the last. We gave a glance at our rifles, cocked them, and pressed a few paces forward amongst the canes; when suddenly a bound and a crashing noise, which grew rapidly more distant, warned us that the animal had taken the alarm. One of our companions, who had as yet never seen a bear-hunt, ran forward as fast as the palmettos would allow him, and was soon out of sight. Unfortunately we had no dogs, and after half an hour's fruitless beating about, during which we started another animal, within sight or shot of which we were unable to get, we became convinced that we should have to meet our friends empty-handed. It was now time to proceed to the place of rendezvous, on the further side of the palmetto field, which was about half a mile wide. The man who had gone after the bear, had rejoined us, and from him we learned that the brake was bordered on the western side by a dense thicket of wild-plum, apple and acacia trees, through which there was not the least sign of a path. On arriving there, we saw that his account was a correct one; and, to add to our difficulties, the nature of the ground in our front now changed, and the cane-brake sank down into a sort of swampy bottom, extending to the northern extremity of the lake. Our situation was an embarrassing one. Before us, an impassable swamp; to our right, water; to our left, an impenetrable thicket; and four hours of the eight that had been allotted to us already elapsed. There seemed nothing to be done but to retrace our steps; but, before doing so, we resolved to make a last effort to find a path. To this end we separated, taking different directions, and for nearly half an hour we wandered through the thicket, amongst bushes and brambles, tearing and scratching ourselves to no purpose. At last, when I for one was about to abandon the search in despair, a loud hurrah gave notice that the path was found. We were soon all grouped around the lucky discoverer; but to our considerable disappointment, instead of finding him at the entrance of the wished-for road, we beheld him gravely contemplating a cow, which was cropping the grass quite undisturbed by our approach. Nevertheless, this was no bad find, if we could only ascertain whether it was a stray cow that had wandered far from its home, or a beast of regular habits that passed each night in its master's cow-house. An Ohioman solved the question, by pointing out that the animal had evidently been milked that morning; and as we were debating how we should induce Brindle to proceed in the direction of its domicile, he settled that difficulty also, by firing off his rifle so close to the beast's tail, that the bullet carried off a patch of hair, and grazed the skin. The cow gave a tremendous spring, and rushed through a thicket, as if a score of wolves had been at its heels. We followed, and the brute led us to a tolerably good path through the wilderness, which we had thought impenetrable. It was doubtless the path that was to take us to the appointed place of meeting; and we now slackened our pace, and followed the cow's trail more leisurely. We had proceeded about a mile, when a strong light in the distance made us aware that we were coming to a clearing; and on arriving at the place, we found several maize fields enclosed by hedges, and a log-house, the smoking chimney of which bespoke the presence of inhabitants.

The dwelling was pleasantly situated on a gentle slope, roofed with clapboards, and having stables and other out-houses in its rear, such as one usually finds in backwood settlements of the more comfortable kind. Peach trees were trailed against the house, in front of which stood some groups of papaws. The whole place had a rural and agreeable aspect.

We were scarcely within the hedge that surrounded the domain, when a brace of bull-dogs rushed upon us with open jaws. We were keeping off the furious brutes with some difficulty, when a man came out of the barn, and, upon seeing us, again entered it. After a few moments, he appeared for a second time, in company with two negroes, who were leading by the horns the very same cow which we had so unceremoniously compelled to become our guide. We greeted the man with a "good morning;" but he made no answer, merely gazing hard at us with a cold sullen look. He was a tall, broad-shouldered, powerful man, with an expressive, but extraordinarily sad, gloomy, and almost repulsive countenance. There was a restless excitement of manner about him, which struck us at the very first glance.

"A fine morning," said I, approaching the stranger.

No answer. The man was holding the cow by one horn, and staring at the tail, from which a drop or two of blood was falling.

"How far is it from here to Hopefield?" asked I.

"Far enough for you never to get there, if it is you who've been drivin' my cow," was the threatening reply.

"And if we had driven your cow," said I, "you would surely not take it amiss? It was a mere accident."

"Such accidents don't often happen. People don't shoot cows, if they haven't a mind to eat other folk's beef."

"You do not suppose," said the Ohioman, "that we should wish to hurt your cow—we, who have no other intention but to shoot a few turkeys for the voyage. We are passengers by the Feliciana—one of our paddles is broken, and that is the reason that our boat is at anchor in front of Hopefield, and that we are here."

This circumstantial explanation seemed to produce little effect on the backwoodsman. He made no reply. We walked towards the house, and on stepping in, found a woman there, who scarcely looked at us, or seemed aware of our entrance. There was the same appearance of fixed grief upon her countenance, that we had remarked in the man; only with the difference, that the expression was less morose and fierce, but on the other hand more mournful.

"Can we have something to eat?" said I to the woman.

"We don't keep a tavern," was the answer.

"The other party cannot be far off," said one of my companions. "We will give them a sign of our whereabout." And so saying, he passed out at the door and walked a few paces in the direction of a cotton field.

"Stop!" cried the backwoodsman, suddenly, placing himself before him. "Not a step further shall you go, till you satisfy me who you are, and where from."

"Who and where from?" replied our comrade, a young doctor of medicine from Tennessee. "That is what you nor any other man shall know who asks after such a fashion. If I'm not mistaken we are in a free country." And as he spoke he fired off his rifle.

The report of the piece was echoed so magnificently from the deep forests which surrounded the plantation that my other companions raised their guns to their shoulders, with the intention of firing also. I made them a sign in time to prevent it. Although there could hardly be any real danger to be apprehended, it appeared to me advisable to hold ourselves prepared for whatever might happen. The next moment a shot was heard—the answer to our signal.

"Keep yourself quiet," said I to the backwoodsman, "our companions and their guide will soon be here. As to your cow, you can hardly have so little common sense as to suppose that five travellers would shoot a beast that must be perfectly useless to them."

As I left off speaking, there emerged from the forest our other detachment and the guide, the latter carrying two fat turkeys. He greeted the backwoodsman as an old acquaintance, but with a degree of sympathy and compassion in the tone of his salutation which contrasted strangely with his usual rough, dry manner.

"Well, Mr. Clarke," said he, "heard nothing yet? I am sorry for it—very sorry."

The backwoodsman made no reply, but his rigid sturdy mien softened, and his eyes, as I thought, glistened with moisture.

"Mistress Clarke," said our guide to the woman, who was standing at the house-door, "these gentlemen here wish for a snack. They've plenty of every thing, if you'll be so good as to cook it."

The woman stood without making any reply; the man was equally silent. There was a sort of stubborn, surly manner about them, which I had never witnessed in backwoods-people.

"Well," said the doctor, "we need expect nothing here. We are only losing time. Let us sit down on a tree-trunk, and eat our ham and biscuits."

The guide made us a significant sign, and then stepping up to the woman, spoke to her in a low and urgent tone. She did not, however, utter a word.

"Mistress," said the doctor, "something must have happened to you or your family, to put you so out of sorts. We are strangers, but we are not without feelings. Tell us what is wrong. There may be means of helping you."

The man looked up; the woman shook her head.

"What is it that troubles you?" said I, approaching her. "Speak out. Help often comes when least expected."

The woman made no answer, but stepped up to our guide, took a turkey and the ham from him, and went into the house. We followed, sat down at the table, and produced our bottles. The backwoodsman placed glasses before us. We pressed him to join us, but he obstinately declined our invitation, and we at last became weary of wasting good words on him. Our party consisted as before mentioned, of ten persons; two bottles were soon emptied; and we were beginning to get somewhat merry whilst talking over our morning's ramble, when our host suddenly got up from his seat in the chimney corner, and approached the table.

"Gemmen," said he, "you mus'n't think me uncivil if I tell you plainly that I can have no noise made in my house. It an't a house to larf in—that it an't, by G—!" And having so spoken he resumed his seat, leant his head upon both hands, and relapsed into his previous state of gloomy reverie.

"We ask pardon," said we; "but really we had no idea that our cheerfulness would annoy you."

The man made no reply, and half an hour passed away in whisperings and conjectures. At the end of that time, a negro girl came in to spread the table for our meal.

After much entreaty, our host and hostess were prevailed on to sit down with us. The former took a glass of brandy, and emptied it at a draught. We filled it again; he drank it off, and it was again replenished. After the third glass, a deep sigh escaped him. The cordial had evidently revived him.

"Gemmen," said he, "you will have thought me rough and stubborn enough, when I met you as you had been huntin' my cow; but I see now who I have to do with. But may I be shot myself, if, whenever [illegible] him, I don't send a bullet through his body; and I'll be warrant it shall hinder his stealin[illegible]ore children."

"Steal children!" repeated I. "Has one of your negroes been stolen?"

"One of my niggers, man! My son, my only son! Her child!" continued he, pointing to his wife. "Our boy, the only one remaining to us out of five, whom the fever carried off before our eyes. As bold and smart a boy as any in the back woods! Here we set ourselves down in the wilderness, worked day and night, went through toil and danger, hunger and thirst, heat and cold. And for what! Here we are alone, deserted, childless; with nothin' left for us but to pray and cry, curse and groan. No help; all in vain. I shall go out of my mind, I expect. If he were dead—if he were lyin' under the hillock yonder beside his brothers, I would say nothin'. He gave, and He has a right to take away! But, Almighty God!"—And the man uttered a cry so frightful, so heart-rending, that the knives and forks fell from our hands, and a number of negro women and children came rushing in to see what was the matter. We gazed at him in silence.

"God only knows," continued he, and his head sank upon his breast; then, suddenly starting up, he drank off glass after glass of brandy, as fast as he could pour it out.

"And how and when did this horrible theft occur?" asked we.

"The woman can tell you about it," was the answer.

The woman had left the table, and now sat sobbing and weeping upon the bed. It was really a heart-breaking scene. The doctor got up and led her to the table. We waited till she became [illegible]e composed, anxiously expecting her account of [illegible]s horrible calamity.

"It was four weeks yesterday," she began; "Mister Clark was in the forest; I was in the fields, looking after the people, who were gathering in the maize. I had been there some time, and by the sun it was already pretty near eleven; but it was as fine a morning as ever was seen on the Mississippi, and the niggers don't work well if there's not somebody to look after them—so I remained. At last it was time to get the people's dinner ready, and I left the field. I don't know what it was, but I had scarcely turned towards the house, when it seemed as if somebody called to me to run as fast as I could; a sort of fear and uneasiness came over me, and I ran all the way to the house. When I got there I saw little Cesy, our black boy, sitting on the threshold, and playing all alone. I thought nothing of this, but went into the kitchen, without suspecting anything wrong. As I was turning about amongst the pots and kettles, I thought suddenly of my Dougal. I threw down what I had in my hand, and ran to the door. Cesy came to meet me: "Missi," said he, "Dougal is gone."

"Dougal is gone!" cried I. "Where is he gone to, Cesy?"

"Don't know," said Cesy; "gone away with a man on horseback."

"With a man on horseback?" said I. "In God's name where can he be gone to? What does all this mean, Cesy?"

"Don't know," said Cesy.

"And who was the man? Did he go willingly?"

"No! he didn't go willingly!" said Cesy: "but the man got off his horse, put Dougal upon it, and then jumped up behind him, and rode away."

"And you don't know the man?"

"No, missi!"

"Think again, Cesy," cried I; "for God's sake remember. Don't you know the man?"

"No," said the child, "I don't know him."

"Didn't you see what he looked like? Was he black or white?"

"I don't know," said Cesy, crying; "he had a red flannel shirt over his face!"

"Was it neighbor Syms; or Banks, or Meddling, or Barnes?"

"No!" whined Henry.

"Gracious God!" cried I. "What is this? What has become of my poor child?" I ran backwards and forwards into the forest, through the fields. I called out. I looked everywhere. At last I ran to where the people were at work, and fetched Cesy's mother. I thought she would be able to make him tell something more about my child. She ran to the house with me, promised him cakes, new clothes, every thing in the world; but he could tell nothing more than he had already told me. At last Mister Clarke came."

Here the woman paused, and looked at her husband.

"When I came home," continued the latter, "the woman was nearly distracted; and I saw directly that some great misfortune had happened. But I should never have guessed what it really was. When she told me, I said, to comfort her, that one of the neighbors must have taken the child away, though I didn't think it myself; for none of the neighbors would have allowed themselves such a freedom with my only child. I shouldn't have thanked 'em for it, I can tell you. I called Cesy, and asked him again what the [illegible] was like: if he had a blue or a black coat? He said it was blue. 'What sort of a horse?' 'A brown one.' 'What road had he taken?' 'That road,' answered the boy, pointing to the swamp. I sent all my niggers, men, women and children, round to the neighbors, to seek for the child, and tell them what had happened. I myself followed the path that the robber had taken, and found hoof-prints upon it. I tracked them to the creek, but there I lost the trail. The man must have got into a boat, with his horse and the child, and perhaps crossed the Mississippi, or perhaps gone down the stream. Who could tell where he would land? It might be ten, twenty, fifty, or a hundred miles lower down. I was terribly frightened, and I rode on to Hopefield. There nothing had been seen or heard of my child; but all the men got on their horses to help me to find him. The neighbors came also, and we sought about for a whole day and night. No trace nor track was to be found. Nobody had seen either the child nor the man who had carried him off. We beat the woods for thirty miles round my house, crossed the Mississippi, went up as far as Memphis, and down to Helena and the Yazoo river; nothing was to be seen or heard.

"We came back as we went out, empty-handed and discouraged. When I got home, I found the whole county assembled at my house. Again we set out; again we searched the forest through; every hollow tree, every bush and thicket, was looked into. Of bears, stags and panthers, there were plenty, but no signs of my boy. On the sixth day I came home again; but my home was become hateful to me—everything vexed and disgusted me. My clothes and skin were torn off by the thorns and briars; my very bones ached; but I didn't feel it. It was nothing to what I suffered in my mind.

"On the second day after my return, I was lying heart and body sick in bed, when one of the neighbors came in, and told me that he had just seen, at Hopefield, a man from Muller county, who told him that a stranger had been seen on the road to New Madrid, whose description answered to that which Cesy had given of the child-stealer. It was a man with a blue coat and a brown horse, and a child upon his saddle. I forgot my sickness and my sore bones, bought a new horse—for I had ridden mine nearly to death—and set out directly, rode day and night, three hundred miles, to New Madrid; and when I arrived there, sure enough I found the man who had been described to me, and a child with him. But it was not my child! The man belonged to New Madrid, and had been on a journey with his son into Muller county.

"I don't know how I got home again. Some people found me near Hopefield, and brought me to my house. I had a fever, and was raving for ten days; and during that time the neighbors advertised the thing in all the papers in Tennessee, Arkansas, Mississippi, and Louisiana. We had ridden altogether thousands of miles, but it was no use. No!" continued he, with a deep groan; "if my child had died of a fever, if he had fallen in with a bear or panther, and been killed, it would be bitter, bitter sorrow—he was my last child. But, merciful God—stolen! My son, my poor child stolen!"

And the man cried aloud, sprang from his seat, and wrung his hands and wept like an infant. Even his wife had not shown such utter agony of grief.

"When I go to work," continued he, after a pause, "my little Dougal seems to stand before me, and my hands fall to my sides, as stiff and heavy as though they were lead. I look round, but no Dougal is there. When I go to bed, I put his bed beside mine, and call him, but no one answers. Sleeping or waking, my poor boy is always before me. Would to God I were dead! I have cursed and sworn, prayed and supplicated, wept and groaned, but all—all in vain!"

I have seen many persons suffering from distress of mind, but never did I meet with one whose sorrow was so violent and overpowering as that of this backwoodsman. We did our utmost to console him, and to inspire him with new hope, but he was inconsolable; his eyes were fixed, he had fallen into a sort of apathy, and I doubt if he even heard what was said to him. We ourselves were so affected, that our words seemed to choke us. Time passed, however; it was impossible for us to remain any longer, nor could we have done any good by so doing. We shook the unfortunate couple by the hand, promised to do all in our power to learn something of the child's fate, and took our departure.

It was six weeks after the time above referred to, that I found myself compelled by business to make a journey to Natchez. I had often thought of poor Clarke's misfortune, and, in conjunction with my friends, had done all in my power to discover the villain who had robbed him of his child. Hitherto, all our endeavors had been fruitless. The facts were circulated in every newspaper, were matter of conversation at every tea-table in the country; rewards were offered, researches made, but not the smallest trace of the boy or his stealer was to be found.

It was a bright January afternoon when I landed at Natchez. In company with some acquaintances, I was ascending the little hill between the lower and upper town, when we heard an unusual noise and bustle; and on reaching the summit, we saw a crowd assembled before the door of Justice Bonner's house. Upon going to see what was the matter, we found the mob consisted of the better class of people in Natchez, both women and men, but especially the former. Every face wore an expression of interest and anxiety; and, upon making inquiry, we learned that the child-stealer had been at length discovered; or rather, that a man had been taken up on strong suspicion of his having stolen Mr. Clarke's son, of Hampstead county. I was heartily rejoiced at the news, and endeavored to press forward through the throng, in hopes of hearing some particulars; but the crowd was so dense that it was impossible to get through. I stood there for nearly two hours, the concourse all the while increasing, none stirring from the places they occupied, while every adjacent window was filled with eager, anxious faces.

At last the door opened, and the prisoner, guarded by two constables, and followed by the sheriff, came out of the house, and took the direction of the town prison. "That is he!" whispered the women to one another, with pale faces and trembling voices, clasping their children tighter, as though fearing they would be snatched from them. The countenance of the culprit was the most repulsive I had ever seen—a mixture of brutal obstinacy and low cunning, with a sort of sneering, grinning expression. His small green-gray eyes were fixed upon the ground; but as he passed through the lane opened by the crowd, he from time to time partially raised them, and threw sidelong and malicious glances at the bystanders. He was rather above the middle height, his complexion of a dirty grayish color, his cheeks hollow, his lips remarkably thick and coarse, his whole appearance in the highest degree wild and disgusting. His dress consisted of an old worn-out blue frock, trousers of the same color, a high-crowned shabby hat, and tattered shoes. The impression which his appearance made might be read in the pale faces of the spectators. They gazed after him with a sort of hopeless look as he walked away. "If that is the man who stole the child," murmured several, "there is no hope. The boy is lost!" I extricated myself from the throng, and hastened to Justice Bonner, with whom I was acquainted, and who gave me the following particulars.

About four weeks after our excursion in the neighborhood of Hopefield, Clarke had received a letter, signed Thomas Tully, and stamped with the Natchez postmark. The contents were to the effect that his child was still living; that the writer of the letter knew where he was, and that if Mr. Clarke would enclose a fifty dollar bank note in his answer, he should receive further information. On receipt of the said sum, the writer said he would indicate a place to which Mrs. Clarke might repair, unaccompanied, and there, upon payment of two hundred dollars more, the child should be delivered up.

Upon receiving this letter, the unfortunate father consulted with his friends and neighbors; and, by their advice, he wrote immediately to the Post Master at Natchez, informing him of the circumstance, and requesting that the person who applied for his answer might be detained. Four days afterwards, a man came to the window of the Post Office, and inquired if there was any letter to the address of Thomas Tully. The Post Master pretended to be searching for the letter amongst a pile of others, and meanwhile a constable, who was in attendance, went round and captured the applicant. Upon the examination of the latter, it appeared that he was an Irishman, who had some time previously been hanging about Natchez, and had endeavored to establish a school there. As he, however, had been unable to give any satisfactory account of himself, of where he came from, or what he had been doing up to that time; and as his manner and appearance were moreover in the highest degree suspicious and repulsive, he had not succeeded in his plan, and the few parents who sent their children to him had speedily withdrawn them. He was known at Natchez by the name of Thomas Tully, nor did he now deny that that was his name, or that he had sent the letter, which was written in a practised schoolmaster-like hand. It was further elicited that he was perfectly acquainted with the paths and roads between Natchez and Hopefield, and in the neighborhood of those two places, as well as with the swamps, creeks, and rivers there adjacent. He was fully committed, till such time as the father of the stolen child should be made acquainted with the result of the examination.

In five days Clarke arrived with the negro boy Cæsar. The whole town showed the greatest sympathy with the poor man's misfortune: the lawyers offered him their services free of charge, and a second examination of the prisoner took place. Everything possible was done to induce the latter to confess what had become of the child; but to all questions he opposed an obstinate silence. The negro boy did not recognize him. At last he declared that he knew nothing of the stolen child, and that he had only written the letter in the hope of extorting money from the father. Hardly, however, had this been written down, when he turned to Clarke, with an infernal grin upon his countenance, and said—"You have persecuted and hunted me like a wild beast, but I will make you yet more wretched than you are able to make me." He then proceeded to inform him of a certain place where he would find his child's clothes.

Clarke immediately set out with a constable to the indicated spot, found the clothes as he had been told he would do, and returned to Natchez. The accused was again put at the bar, and said, after frequently contradicting himself, that the child was still alive, but that, if they kept him longer in prison, it would inevitably die of hunger. Nothing could persuade him to say where the boy was, or to give one syllable of further explanation.

Meantime the Quarter Sessions commenced, and the prisoner was brought up for trial. An immense concourse of persons had assembled to witness the proceedings in this remarkable case. Everything was done to induce the accused to confess, but all in vain. Promises of free pardon, and even of reward, were made to him, if he told where the child was; but the man maintained an obstinate silence. He at last again changed his story, retracted his previous declaration as to his knowledge of where the boy was, said he had found the clothes, which he had recognized by the descriptions that had been everywhere advertised, and that it was that which had put it into his head to write to the father, in hopes of making his profit by so doing. In the absence of witnesses, although there was strong suspicion, there could be no proof of his having committed the crime in question. In America, circumstantial evidence is always received with extreme caution and reluctance; and even the fact of the child's clothes having been found in the place the prisoner had pointed out, was insufficient to induce the jury to find the latter guilty of the capital charge brought against him. Many of the lawyers, indeed, were of opinion that the man's last story was true, that he had found the clothes, and, being a desperate character, and in needy circumstances, had written the letter for purposes of extortion. Of this offence only was he found guilty, and condemned, as a vagrant and impostor, to a few months' imprisonment. By the American laws no severer punishment could be awarded. This one, however, was far from satisfying the public. There was something so infernal in the malignant sneer of the culprit, in the joy with which he contemplated the sufferings of the bereaved father, and the anxiety of the numerous friends of the latter, that a shudder of horror and disgust had frequently run through the court during the trial. Even the coolest and most practised lawyers had not been free from this emotion, and they declared that they had never witnessed such obduracy.

The inhabitants of Natchez, especially of the upper town, are, generally speaking, a highly intelligent and respectable class of people; but upon this occasion they lost all patience and self-control, and proceeded to an extreme measure, which only the peculiar circumstances of the case could in any degree justify. Without previous notice, they assembled in large numbers upon the night of the 31st of January, with a firm determination to correct for once the mildness of the laws, and to take the punishment of the criminal into their own hands. They opened the prison, brought out the culprit, and after tying him up, a number of stout negroes proceeded to flog him with whips of bullock's hide.

For a long time the man bore his punishment with extraordinary fortitude, and remained obstinately silent when questions were put to him concerning the stolen child. At last, however, he could bear the pain no longer, and promised a full confession. He named a house on the banks of the Mississippi, some fifty miles from Natchez, the owner of which, he said, knew where the child was to be found.

The Sheriff had, of course, not been present at these Lynch-law proceedings, of which he was not aware till they were over, but of which he probably in secret did not entirely disapprove. No sooner, however, was he told of the confession that had been extorted from the prisoner, than he set off at once in the middle of the night, accompanied by Clarke, for the house that had been pointed out. They arrived there at noon on the following day, and found it inhabited by a respectable family, who had heard of the child having been stolen, but beyond that knew nothing of the matter. The mere suspicion of participation in such a crime, seemed in the highest degree painful and offensive to them. It was soon made evident that the prisoner had invented the story, in order to procure a cessation of his punishment the previous night.

The fatigues and constant disappointments that poor Clarke had endured, had worn him out, and at last again stretched him on a bed of sickness. His life was for a long time despaired of, but he finally recovered, and shortly afterwards the term of imprisonment to which the child-stealer (for the public persisted in considering Tully) had been condemned, expired. There was no pretext for detaining him, and he was set at liberty. Clarke was advised to endeavor to obtain from him, by money and good treatment, some information concerning the child. Both father and mother threw themselves at the man's feet, implored him to name his own reward, but to tell them what had become of their son.

"You have flogged and imprisoned me," replied the man, with one of his malicious grins; "you would have hung me if you could; you have done all in your power to make me miserable. It is now my turn."

And he obstinately refused to say a word on the subject of the lost child. He left the town, accompanied by Clarke, who clung to him like his shadow, in the constant hope that he would at last make a revelation. They crossed the Mississippi together, and on arriving behind Concordia, the bereaved father once more besought Tully to tell him what had become of his son, swearing that, if he did not do so, he would dog him day and night, but that he should never escape alive out of his hands. The man asked how long he would give him. "Six-and-thirty hours" was the reply. Tully walked on for some time beside Clarke and his wife, apparently deep in thought. On a sudden he sprang upon the backwoodsman, snatched a pistol from his belt, and aimed it at his head. The weapon missed fire. Tully saw that his murderous attempt had failed, and apprehensive doubtless of the punishment that it would entail, he leaped, without a moment's hesitation, into the deepest part of a creek by which they were walking. He sank immediately, the water closed over his head, and he did not once reappear. His body was found a couple of hours afterwards, but no trace was ever discovered of the Stolen Child.*

* Various particulars of the above incident may be found in the Mississippi newspapers of the years 1835-6.

"OTHO AND CORRELLO."

The balmy breeze of the Grecian Archipelago was wafting its sweetness over the beautiful isle of Scio, which seemed to repose with quiet on the bosom of the glassy sea of isles, while the Turkish satire desolated the noble land of Greece; and while the inhabitants of this favourite isle fancied themselves secure from the horrors of war, the Turks, with all that barbarity which characterises their nation, invaded their peaceful homes of the Sciotes, and at once massacred them in a savage manner.

It was about a month previous to this direful catastrophe, that my story commences. In one of the most beautiful bowers of this Arcadian land, on one of the richly decorated seats peculiar to these bowers, sat a female, who seemed to her youthful companion the loveliest maid of Scio; and truly, the sparkling of her large dark eyes, the luxuriance of her raven curls, contrasted with the pearly teeth adorning her really finely formed mouth, together with the rosy brunette complexion, were allurements sufficient to win the admiration, if not the ardent love, of many a heart more tried in Cupid's snares, than the youthful Otho, for it was no other, holding a tete-a-tete with Corrello. Otho, though humble in birth and fortune, was blest with as brilliant an intellect, as daring a spirit, as ever animated a Grecian breast. While Corrello, adorned with the highest mental as well as personal endowments, seemed fitted to link her destiny with that of Otho. The tale of love was already breathed into her ear, and an observer might have noticed with what a bursting fondness she confided to his care her heart; and a promise to be his, was whispered in the softest accents: but, is there no cloud hovering over this scene, destined soon to burst upon the unconscious lovers with relentless fury?

Como, a wealthy and influential citizen of Scio, has too felt the charms of Corrello—his head, though not frosted over with age, and though no furrow courses his cheek, yet he is void of charms sufficient to captivate the beautiful Corrello; and though he could lay down the wealth of a Cœsus at the feet of Corrello, yet her faith, her heart's first warm and ardent love is plighted, and he is almost in despair—but ambition, which often sacrifices the dearest interests of mankind, (and how often too is that sacrifice the heart's first offering!) is destined almost to crush the hopes of Corrello. Her father, though ever vigilant to attain the happiness of his beloved child, was ambitious that she should become mistress of the extensive domains and coffers of gold possessed by Como, for the purpose of displaying her extraordinary beauty to the greatest advantage, the father of Corrello announced to her his intention of giving a large feast, at which she should appear in all that refulgence of beauty which jewels and the most splendid array might secure.

We will pass over the few intervening evenings before the arrival of the anticipated brilliant festival. The elegantly carved walls of the splendid mansion of Corrello's father were already decorated with myrtle, laurel, or the most fragrant roses, the thrilling music of the harps, employed for the occasion, sounded merrily from room to room. The halls were already crowded when Corrello, leaning on the arm of her ambitious father, made her appearance; but what a spectacle was here to mar the joy of her young heart—her father having concealed from her his intention of making this her bridal eve, by joining her to the hated Como. The sight of a Priest in his official robes, with the book ready opened to unite them in that accursed wedlock, was too much for her delicate frame. After sinking in a swoon upon the nearest sofa, the company were employed in each one administering cordials to restore her—they succeeded in restoring her to life, and placed her by the side of Como, before the Priest—but hark! the sound of the war-cry and the tramp of horses is heard at a distance. With a vehemence of manner, and a courage of spirit unequalled by any guest at the festival, Otho rushed forward, and seizing Corrello in his arms, cried out to the astounded company—

"Escape—escape for your lives: the Turks are upon us!"

It may easily be imagined that the crowd dispersed in the greatest consternation; soon to be overtaken and massacred in the most brutal manner.

Otho, having provided in a neighboring isle a retreat for his beloved Corrello and himself, escaped unharmed from the massacre, and, while others were struggling in the quiet moonlight, for their lives, a little boat might have been discovered wending its way with the two lovers, to another and a happier clime.

The only dark spot in the memory of Corrello was the murder of her father, but Otho soothed her sorrows by his faithful love, and she was once again comparatively happy.

MY MOTHER.*

"That love was mine, but it hath flown,
And I am left on earth alone."

Alone on earth, and desolate indeed,
Amid a world of social joys and ties;
Alone, depressed, a bruised and trembling reed,
A famished mind, where minds on dainties feed;
Assigned to breathe to vacancy my sighs;
A tie is rent, which had existed long,
By close communion rendered doubly strong.

My dear companion constantly thou wert,
More near since fate had frowned, than when she smiled;
What joy thy coming footsteps could impart!
Their sound was music, thrilling to my heart.
When doomed to darkness sat thy lonely child,
Thou wert life's sunshine, thou my all on earth,
A ray to bless me ever since my birth.

Successive years thy tenderness beheld,
Thy kind attentions, thy untiring zeal,
Full many a sorrow from my heart expelled;
How much thy love in faithfulness excelled;
How keenly all my sorrows couldst thou feel.
That love is lost, for ever lost to me;
One silver lock is all remains of thee.

Oft when disease had darkly veiled me round,
And thou with transient illness near me lay,
I've heard thee breathe, what joy was in the sound,
And bow my heart with gratitude would bound,
That thou wert not transformed to lifeless clay.
Oh! I was blest that thou wert still alive,
Though the stern messenger might soon arrive.

What varied feelings would my mind engage,
When thou wouldst read, while I was listening near,
Some favourite hymn; or from the sacred page,
In accents weak and tremulous with age,
'Tis sweet, but oh! so soon to part I fear.
That tongue which moves so oft to cheer my mind,
Must soon, alas! to silence be consigned.

Thought would intrude, but oh! the dreaded blow
Is struck, is past, and scathed I sit alone,
Recalling images to soothe my woe;
Then round my room a searching glance bestow;
But mother, precious mother! thou art flown.
My eye unconscious seeks thy favorite chair,
But all is solitude and silence there.

Oh, could the heart its deep-toned feelings speak,
Could language its intense emotions tell,
Descriptions adequate how would I seek;
But oh, 'tis poor, 'tis impotent and weak,
When chords too strong for boldest tropes impel,
'Tis then the big convulsive sigh is heaved,
A short relief to filial love bereaved.

Pensive I lay me down, when darkness reigns,
Invoking sleep, where last I saw thee lie;
Here I beheld thee, weak, oppressed with pains,
'Till wasting sickness broke thy mortal chains,
And in this spot was breathed life's latest sigh;
Here thou wert laid, when vestured for the grave,
Here thy cold forehead my last kiss I gave.

There is a charm which seems to bind me here;
A sacredness that cannot be expressed;
The couch, the pillow, all to me are dear
Mementos of affection so sincere;
Where thou wert waiting the sweet hour of rest,
'Twas good to see thee, patient and resigned;
Such meek serenity possess'd thy mind.

Since that event, have weary months passed by,
And still my loss is equally severe;
Upward how oft I lift a longing eye,
And wish the hour of sweet release were nigh,
To join my mother in a purer sphere,
Where the freed spirit meets its kindred bands,
Back to its source led by Jehovah's hands.

Father in Heaven! I thank Thy holy name,
Who didst that life preserve so many years;
I own the hand from whence the blessing came,
And since my mother Thou hast pleased to claim,
Meekly may I submit, and dry my tears.
Oh, may my soul take hold on Thee in prayer,
And find its resting place to centre there!

To sacred peace this restless mind transform,
Great Parent, whom I love, and whose I am;
Oh, grant me friends with feelings kind and warm,
Shield my defenceless heart from every storm;
Temper the wind as to the new-shorn lamb;
Unite my soul to Thee, no more to roam,
'Till Thy good pleasure shall conduct it home.

MARY.

* Composed by an afflicted lady, who has been for the last twenty-five years deprived of the use of her eyes, and most of the time has been unable to walk. In consequence of her loss of sight, she is under the necessity of committing her compositions to memory, until some friend may find it convenient to become her Amanuensis. Under such circumstances, the loss of that dear mother, (whose death she mourns with so much sincerity,) is doubly severe.

"CHANGE OF SCENE."

BY MRS. A. M. F. ANNAN.

Chapter I.

"Your case is by no means singular, Mr. Clayton, though, I admit, the malady is not very common to persons so young as yourself. You say you are twenty three?"

"But a few months wanting of it."

"I have but one prescription for you, sir, and that is, change of scene."

"Why, doctor, it is change of scene that will be the death of me. I left college at nineteen, graduated, and since then have been changing scene as often as a shifter in a theatre. I have been at every place of resort in the country, from the extreme north to the extreme south; at as many as four or five watering places in one season."

"And what did you do there?"

"What other people did at such places, of course. I ate and drank, and walked, and danced, and played billiards, and all that. Then, during the winters, I gave mode visits to the different cities."

"And in them what did you do?"

"Pshaw, doctor, no quizzing!—what other young men in my position usually do; I saw all the lions, and was introduced to all the reigning belles; received and accepted invitations, and so forth."

"It appears to me that such a course does not differ materially from what you pursue at home."

"Why, on consideration, I believe not materially, as you say. One street is pretty much like some other streets, one theatre like another theatre, one fashionable dinner or soiree like the rest; and, as to the ladies, I have found pretty much of a family likeness amongst them all—the same style of dress, manners, and accomplishments; some more or less one thing, some another. For the past winter, I made up my mind to stay at home, and to confess the truth, doctor, as you always seemed to pay very little attention to my complaints, I consulted one of your professional brethren about my headaches and lassitude. His advice was that I should try all sorts of gymnastic exercises, but one soon tires of such things. It seems to me a very brute kind of life, that of living merely for the preservation of health."

"Did you ever vary your pursuits by study?"

"Not perseveringly enough to make it a habit. I did commence reading law a year or two ago at my father's suggestion, but only got through a few volumes of Blackstone. I am no bookworm, and I must have some incentive to study with profit. At college I had that of taking an honor; here I have none. I am beyond the necessity of following a profession, and I have abundance of scholarship to pass creditably in society. I wish, doctor, you would decide that a trip to Europe is indispensable to me, and persuade my father of it."

"I cannot do that, Mr. Clayton; under present circumstances, a trip to Europe would be of no benefit to you whatever. But change of scene is necessary, notwithstanding. I shall probably, however, see your father and give him my opinion of your case. If he decide to send you thither, I will accommodate you so far as to offer no objection."

Dr. L. smiled somewhat sarcastically as the slight though elegant figure of the young ennuye disappeared from his office. "And this is the consequence of being the son and heir of a rich man," thought he; "thank Heaven, I was not one!—it is unaccountable to me how a man like Judge Clayton, an active, energetic, enterprising man, with abundance of shrewdness, and with so much industry as to discharge the duties of a responsible office, notwithstanding his ample fortune; that such a man should be so blind as to risk the destruction of his only child by his prodigality of indulgence. He has some reason for his fondness though; the young fellow has many good points, too many to be thrown away, if it can be helped. He is modest, quite free from any profligate habits and inclinations, which is remarkable, considering his associations, and he by no means lacks ability. I shall certainly call on the Judge about it; he is an old friend, and I cannot conscientiously remain silent when I see his son so nearly ruined by mere idleness."

Chapter II.

A few days after his consultation with the doctor, young Clayton entered his father's library. The Judge was busied in looking over bundles of papers, and, laying aside a few sheets which he had unfolded, he said—

"I wish, Harry, you would sit down and copy these articles for me."

"Certainly, sir, if you can wait awhile. Just now I feel somewhat indisposed; with a slight headache," he added, fearing the expression was too ambiguous.

"It grieves me to see that your indispositions have become so frequent of late, Harry," remarked the old gentleman, gravely; "and I am still more grieved to say that it is at a time when uninterrupted health is more necessary to you than it has ever been in your life."

"Why so, sir?" asked the young man, looking surprised.

Judge Clayton hesitated before he answered the question, and then, looking gravely into the youth's face, he returned—

"You consider yourself, Harry, the son of a man of wealth?"

"Certainly, father," Harry replied, and, as the judge preserved his grave and expressive silence, he proceeded: "I hope, I trust, my dear sir, that the difficulties and disturbances of the times, which have brought misfortune to so many, have not, in any measure, been disastrous to you?"

"If you hope that for my sake, Harry, I thank you; if for your own, I pity you. Imagine the worst, and endeavor to reconcile yourself to the necessity of relying upon your own exertions for support in the time to come."

The judge evidently expected an outbreak of feeling on the part of the young man, but was mistaken. He replied calmly, after a moment's reflection, "Is it indeed so serious?—believe me, sir, it is for your sake that I am chiefly concerned. If you can retain sufficient to secure the comforts to which you have been accustomed, I shall hold the labor required for my own maintenance light work, indeed, and shall engage in it much more cheerfully than you can believe."

"You are a fine fellow, after all, Harry," said the old gentleman, shaking his son's hand with a brightening countenance; "you have taken a load from my mind already; don't ask any particulars just now, but reflect upon my communication till to-morrow."

"Change of scene enough even to satisfy the doctor," was the thought of Harry; "I shall get at his prescription without any effort of my own." He retired to his own room to cogitate upon his new position, and a much sounder sleep that night was the effect of the excitement, than he had usually enjoyed after an opera, or an oyster-supper.

He left his bed the next morning much before his common hour, and repaired to talk with his father, who was habitually an early riser. "Astir already, Harry?—I am glad to see it," said the judge; "you have, no doubt, deliberated upon our conversation of last night?"

"I have, sir, seriously!"

"And the result?"

"Is a self-conviction of how sadly I have neglected and misused the advantages which your kindness has always held out to me. I must now submit to the penalty; and I feel all the anxiety of having nothing definite to rely upon, now that your allowance will be unavoidably withdrawn. Apart from this consideration I have nothing to depress me, for I am satisfied that useful employment will be beneficial to me, both in body and mind. I have concluded to resume, or rather to commence, the study of law, if it meet your approbation."

"It does, decidedly; it is the course I should have pointed out to you. But one point must first be settled. It will take you at least two years before you will be prepared for practice, and perhaps much longer before you get any. How are you to live all this time? You remember how anxious I was when you left college that you should read under my direction; I should still be happy to be your preceptor, though you must first know exactly how you will be situated. My peculiar circumstances require me to give up this house and go to lodgings; and, if I take you with me, they will have to be what you will consider very humble ones. Such as they may be, you will be welcome to share them with me; I am willing to submit to much privation for your sake."

"But you shall not, my dear sir, if I can help it.—What a reproach would it be to me to be regarded as an idle, helpless young fellow, depending for subsistence upon the slender means which, without such a burthen, would be a comfortable provision for his father! I could not think of it, though, as yet, I confess I cannot clearly see any means which will enable me to avoid it. Can you counsel me?"

"Thank you, thank you, my dear boy, for your considerateness. I know of but one resource likely to be available to you, and that is, taking a school in the country, while you pursue your own studies. A large number of the most distinguished lawyers in the country have prepared themselves for their profession in that way. I really think you would make a capital schoolmaster. You have an excellent temper, and your acquirements, owing to your ambition at college, would render you quite competent to conduct a school of the better class. But, if you cannot obtain that, an humbler one would, at least, afford you enough to pay your boarding. As to your wardrobe, I will myself occasionally furnish you with a suit of clothes. I shall be able to do it, and will with pleasure."

"The very plan for me, sir; that is, if I can obtain both the school and instruction for myself in the same place. But where would I be likely to find such a one? for that I must depend on your assistance, for, to my shame I now confess it, I always, in travelling, proceeded as if with my eyes shut, observing nothing, and making no acquaintances that could be of any service to me."

"Luckily, my course has been different, and I think I can make a favorable arrangement for you. In the mean time, feel yourself perfectly easy where you are, as your associates have none of them any reason to suspect a change in my affairs."

At the expiration of a fortnight, Judge Clayton called Harry into his library. "My inquiries have been successful," said he, laying his hand upon an open letter, though without presenting it; "I have just received this from one of my most chosen friends, an old college chum, of whom you have heard me speak—Wallace Malcolm. I wrote to him about our peculiar situation, and, in reply, he kindly offers to aid us in our projects. He will superintend your reading quite as well as I could do it myself. He is one of the ablest lawyers in the whole range of my knowledge, notwithstanding he has always declined attaching himself to a city bar. He says he has no doubt he can immediately find you a school, and, as he is a man of influence, he will hardly fail. The village of A., in which he resides, is a delightful little place—quiet, healthful, and beautifully located, with a circle of select society, and no inducement to dissipation nor expense; in short, exactly what will suit a young man in your circumstances. Mr. Malcolm urges me to send you on immediately, and I see no reason for my delay."

Chapter III.

The close of another week saw our hero deposited at a snug inn of the little county town. The day of his arrival was Saturday, and he was anxious to go immediately in quest of his father's friend, but, in making inquiries as to his residence, he ascertained that Mr. Malcom was absent, attending a neighboring court, and so he had to restrain his impatience till Monday.

The next morning the village population went to church, and Henry went too. He had always been accustomed to going to church once every Sabbath—a habit enforced by his father, but though it was ostensibly to hear the renowned D. D.'s of a city's sanctuaries, he could not have recollected that he ever listened to a sermon throughout. To-day he heard every word. The preacher was a young man, of scarcely more than his own years, and while, after a recognizance of this fact, his attention was commanded by a strain of chaste and impressive eloquence, he was assailed irresistibly with a humiliating sense of his own mental inferiority. The theme, too, was one suited to his present frame of mind—the uses and misapplication of the gifts of Providence, time, wealth and talents; and in carrying away with him a more vivid description of the higher objects for which they were bestowed, than the mere gratification of the senses, and even the intellect, Harry was already benefitted by his "change of scene."

The crowd principally passed from the church door to the main street of the village, but Clayton, in traversing it on his way back from his lodgings, had occasionally caught a glimpse of a more rural and inviting road, and toward it he now turned. The day was a glowing, balmy one in the prime of May, and he strolled leisurely along, pausing sometimes to look into the flourishing gardens on each side of him, which were fragrant with lilacs and the latest bloom of the apple trees, and were already beginning to flaunt in tulips, peonies, and irises. Occasionally he had heard the patting of a light foot close behind him, and at length he looked back. A faultlessly smooth white dress and a tasteful new bonnet met his glance. He walked so slowly that any industrious pedestrian would have been excusable in attempting to pass him, and their fair wearer did so. He now caught a view of a face redolent with the utmost sweetness, freshness, and brightness of seventeen, and after he had had full opportunity to remark the elasticity of her figure, which was small, but firmer and more rounded than is usual to girlhood, and to admire the graceful carriage of her head and shoulders, the thought struck him, "the lady must think me a lazy lounger to allow her to outstrip me." Accordingly, he crossed the narrow lane, and was soon pacing step for step with her on the opposite side. Then, in the expressive phraseology of the western minstrel, "he looked at her, and she looked at him," and then both looked straight before them. To any one troubled at the same time with curiosity and mauvaise honte, such a walk is peculiarly trying, and, much to his own surprise, Harry felt both. Not so the lady. She stepped along as composedly as a fashionable belle, daily accustomed to the gaze of hundreds, and when, before they parted at the door of his inn, he essayed another encounter of the eyes, she received it with the benevolent serenity of an amiable matron of forty.—There was no one at hand of whom he could have asked the natural questions concerning her, and, even if there had been, it is likely that the rules of aristocratic ostracism would have prevented his taking advantage of it; so he trusted to time to satisfy him.

The next day, at what he supposed was a seasonable hour for country visiting, Harry set out to call on Mr. Malcolm, whose residence was at one end of the village. He had never before seen so small a "cottage of gentility." Overhung by trees, and half buried in blossoming shrubbery, it might have reminded him of a bird's nest, a bee-hive, a flower basket, something pretty and picturesque, to which nothing but pleasant associations could have been attached. He learned that Mr. Malcolm had returned, and was shown into a library of confined limits, but surrounded on all sides, from the floor to the ceiling, by a solid wall of books. Its proprietor sat at a table covered with green baize, and, while receiving the letter of introduction, he regarded the young stranger from beneath a pair of broad, heavy eyebrows, with a look of the most formidable keenness. He was a tall, spare man, advanced in life, and of, what Harry pronounced to himself, "a decidedly General Jackson air and aspect." After glancing over the letter, he remarked, "I am glad, Mr Clayton, to welcome you so soon. Your promptness in complying with my proposition is an evidence to me that you do not shrink from the new course which has been marked out for you. The life of study and labor before you is very different from that you have hitherto experienced; but I hope you will have the wisdom to avail yourself of its advantages, and the manliness to submit cheerfully to its privations. I expected to obtain for you the situation of assistant in our academy, but I found the principal unwilling to entrust the office to one unpracticed in its duties. I therefore was forced to accept for you that of a teacher in one of the public schools. It is certainly an humbler vocation, but I hope you will not object to it."

"By no means, sir; that is, if the salary will be sufficient for my expenses in your village."

"Amply sufficient, for your necessary expenses here will be extremely moderate. As to your studies with me, you will, no doubt, wish to commence them as soon as you are settled at your new occupation.—You will then find me at your service. In the mean time, I shall arrange your order of reading."

A few inquiries on the part of Mr. Malcolm, and our hero arose to take leave, but when he had reached the entrance door, his attention was arrested by a snatch of the most bird-like music he had ever heard from a human voice. Glancing toward an open window, through which it seemed to proceed, he beheld the fair partner of his yesterday's walk, on a latticed veranda, and under what circumstances, think you, gentle reader?—daintly attired, and attitudinizing for a tableau in elegant idleness, or at some classical occupation, as she should have been for the embellishment of our story, and for the captivation of her refined observer? no, indeed! She was dressed in a simple wrapper of light chintz, and a little black silk apron, and employed in arranging the dinner-table; smoothing its snow-white cloth, and disposing its shining plates, knives, and spoons with the most housewifery precision. Harry had stopped short in the middle of a sentence, and could not recollect how he had intended to finish it, when he caught the piercing glance of Mr. Malcolm fixed upon his face.

"Excuse my forgetfulness, Mr. Clayton," said the old gentleman; "I should have invited you to dine with me; I shall be happy if you will stay."

Harry declined confusedly, and made a precipitate retreat.

"Has Mr. Malcolm any family?" he asked of his landlady, on returning to his lodgings.

"None but a daughter—have you not heard of her? Amy Malcolm, the belle of the whole country."

Homely as it was, she had left a very charming picture in his memory, with her buoyant movements, and with the sunshine, broken here and there by the curtains of vines which surrounded her, glancing down upon the smooth bands of her dark hair, and her complexion rendered dazzlingly pure and brilliant by the summer air and her gentle exercise.

After a few weeks' trial of his new scheme of life, Harry wrote to his father, minutely and gaily reporting his progress. He described himself as devoting the calm hours of early morning to the studies arranged for him by Mr. Malcolm, and then as he sat daily in the common school of the village, mending pens, criticising blotted copy-books, fingering greasy slates, and thumbing dog-eared primers. "The evenings," he added, "I give up to social engagements, though much of the intercourse, to which I have been admitted, I cannot yet style recreation. You will, perhaps, not be surprised to know, though I was, that in this remote district there is really a circle, not only refined, but of high mental cultivation; people who, secluded from the excitement and frivolities of a city life, have devoted their retirement to diversified attainment, to whom the jargon of a city idler is an unknown tongue, and among whom I seldom present myself without a twinge of shame or regret for my own wasted opportunities. Yet I do not despair of yet reaching their level."

Concerning his farther pursuits, we shall steal a few passages from his diary.

"Monday.—Finished the day in the enjoyment of listening to — —'s voice and guitar." (Which two blanks, par parenthese, meant Amy Malcolm.) "Her music is wonderful in its expression and melody, and, considering her very slight advantages of instruction, must be the result of real genius for the art. And how graceful she looks at her different instruments!—but then she is graceful at every thing."

"Tuesday.—My learned preceptor has his weak points, notwithstanding his stateliness. This morning found him indulging in a fit of irritability, and wreaking a scolding on his fair daughter—the old sinner!—and how sweetly she softened his evil mood!—mixed him a glass of lemonade, brushed his hair, and showed him another pair of those interminable stockings she has been knitting for him. I should have no objections to being coaxed out of an ill-humor in that way myself."

"Wednesday.—In discussing some point in mathematics with Mr. M., could not recall what I once knew, and would have made a mortifying blunder, had not A. helped me out. She is not called accomplished, perhaps, because she knows nothing of the routine of the boarding-schools; but every day she surprises me with some new evidence of a thorough education. Her father has been her instructor, and he has a supreme contempt for any thing superficial. The result is a thinking woman, with perfect simplicity and modesty of character."

"Thursday.—It is suprising that our young ladies do not more generally practice gardening as an exercise healthful, graceful, and peculiarly suited to their wants. — — has an enthusiasm for it. Spent half an hour in assisting her to tie up vines, and reset shrubbery, and became very much interested in the employment."

"Friday.—A little sore throat still, and had to beg a piece of flannel. Got a nice, soft, white strip from — —, which, I dare say, will soon cure me."

"Saturday.—Felt inclined to wish, with some of the school children, that it was always Saturday—question if any of the boys enjoyed their weekly holiday as much as did their master. In the afternoon, joined a party on a pic-nic excursion. As usual, — — was 'the star of the goodly companie.' She seems to have fascinated the whole community, old as well as young, and no wonder!—where else can be found, in an equal degree, manners so gay and gentle, and frank and kind?—how securely she preserves the admiration and esteem of all the young fellows around her, and that without coquetry or design!—danced with her twice, notwithstanding the competition, and how she does dance! Terpsichore might well be jealous."

"Sunday.—Heard, as usual, an admirable sermon. By-the-by, that young clergyman is exceedingly winning in his manners, as well as commanding through his intellectual gifts. Should like to know what he had to say to — —, when he hurried to shake hands with her in the aisle, and to talk with so impressive a countenance. No doubt, though, it was about the Sunday-school, in which she is so very devoted. Asked her, but she only smiled, and would not tell. Walked home with her, by the round about way, and reminded her of our first encounter on the same road. Presumed she must have thought I behaved very awkwardly, and she did not contradict me. Shall I ever excel in my profession as that fine-looking young man does in the pulpit? I fear not."

Such entries had found their way into our hero's diary for three or four months, when, one day, on his presenting himself in Mr. Malcolm's library for a book, the old gentleman remarked, with a keen glance of his quick gray eyes, which always imported more than his words—

"I am afraid you are becoming too much of a ladies' man, Mr. Clayton, to continue a very close student."

"You are mistaken, sir," replied Harry, coloring; "I spend no time with any lady, except Miss Malcolm."

"And why do you spend so much with her?—I am interested to know."

"Because, sir," returned Harry, divining that an evasion would be a desperate expedient; "because I love her."

"Humph! your candor with me is commendable, but I hope you have not been equally explicit toward Amy?"

"I have not, sir," answered Harry, proudly; "I am not now able to offer my hand, with honor, to any lady, and, until I shall be so, no one shall hear fro" me such an avowal."

"That's right, that's right," returned Mr. Malcolm, cordially; "I did not suspect you of any want of proper spirit on that subject, but feared that the impatience natural to youth might have got the start of your better judgment. I observed your increasing attachment to her society, and thought it my duty to speak to you about it, not on her account, but your own; for, as a faithful friend to you, I could not passively see you running yourself into a silly love scrape. How silly it would be to make her your object, you may judge, when you know that, from the sentiments which have been instilled into her, she would never think of receiving the addresses of any man who has not attained a more than common elevation of mental and moral character, and who has not, besides, a prospect of distinction in his profession, whatever that may be. You are just beginning the ascent, and, before you achieve it, your predilection for her may be supplanted by a succession of others. But whether in that I prove correct or not, you will then, at least, thank me for having spoken so plainly to you. Now, that you are on your guard, we will let the subject drop between us. The library of my house is still yours, as heretofore, and I shall feel perfect confidence of your acting with a manly prudence."

Chapter IV.

The term of the student's probation had expired, and, in the intellectual looking lawyer who emerged from the court-house, after the triumphant termination of his first cause, it would have been difficult to recognize the languid, listless young exquisite, whom we introduced previous to his being thrown upon his own resources. Harry Clayton was the centre of observation that day. He had much improved in appearance. His form, through regular habits and vigorous exercise, had expanded to full and masculine proportions, and his face, not, indeed, "sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought," but elevated in its expression by the healthful action of an expanded mind, seemed to be formed of nobler lineaments.

His case was an important one, involving a beautiful and valuable estate, which lay a short distance from the village, and the possession of which depended upon a contested will. It had been placed in his hands by Mr. Malcolm, as agent of the deceased owner, in full security of his success, and his speech was pronounced one of the ablest remembered at a bar, where, before then, master spirits had striven. The veterans of the profession gathered around him, offering congratulations on the impression he had made, and even his opponents accorded him honor for the signal talent and courtesy with which he had accomplished their defeat. Before reaching his room, he had received proffers of business to an extent seldom accumulated in the first year. But all this success, inspiriting as it was, fell short of imparting the pleasure he received from the grasp of the hand and the grateful smile of his old preceptor.

"You may now safely give up your school, and hang out a sign, my dear fellow," said he.

There was so much kindly interest in his manner, that Harry was encouraged to ask, which, however, he did with some trepidation—

"And when may I think of Amy?"

"Your father's sentiments must decide that," replied Mr. Malcolm, with his accustomed gravity.

"I design writing to him immediately—he will be anxious to know how my debut passed off."

"Then do not forget to tell him how proud I am of my pupil, and that he has equal reason to rejoice in his son."

For fear, however, that it should be forgotten, Mr. Malcolm made it the subject of a letter to Judge Clayton, from himself.

The estate to which we have alluded, as the object of our hero's first legal effort, and which bore the name of Leaston, was, as we have said, but a short distance—half a mile or so—from A. It was an extensive and rich domain of field and wood, adorned by a mansion of such elegance of design and solidity of construction, as is rarely seen among the ever-changing structures of our change-loving country.—It had been erected several years before by an English gentleman of taste and fortune, who had been allured by the beauty of the scenery to establish himself as a resident of the neighborhood. But soon tiring of agricultural amusements and natural panoramas, which he could only enjoy at the expense of the domestic luxuries to which he had been accustomed, he had abandoned them, for a time indefinite, and died without having returned. Now that the ownership was decided, the whole property was to be offered for sale, for the benefit of its several heirs; and as its beautiful groves and shrubberies had been a favorite resort to the young people of the town, ever since the house was vacated, much interest was felt as to the hands into which it would fall; the more so that its estimated value placed it, in a great measure, beyond the competition of provincial fortune.

Mr. Malcolm, as superintendent of the estate, had granted to a poor, sickly widow, a protege of his daughter, the occupancy of a small edifice, which had been intended for a porter's lodge. Thither, one evening, when her father was absent at a neighboring village, in company with young Clayton, Amy had walked alone, on one of her regular visits of kindness. She found the object of her care in great concern about the proposed sale.

"What will become of me then, Miss Amy?" she said; "they'll have to be great grandees that can afford to buy and live in the big house, and such as them wouldn't like to have a poor woman, half the time so lame with the rheumatiz that she cant 'tend to the gate,' limping about their nice little fancy building here. How I do wish that some fine, rich gentleman, that would just happen to suit you, would come along and buy it, and bring you into it!—don't you, Miss Amy?"

"I should be very willing to come out to Leaston," returned Amy, smiling; "but there is no probability of any fine rich gentleman suiting me."

"Well, it's a great pity that some that would suit you don't happen to be rich enough," responded the widow; and while Amy was unconsciously blushing at this simple remark, a handsome old gentleman, with gold spectacles and a very thick walking stick, stunned up to the door.

"I wish to go through the gate, to take a look at the mansion house, my good woman," said he; "is there any one who can attend me?"

The widow was greatly flustered. "Johnny had gone to town for salt and molasses, and little Sally had gone into the woods after the cow, and she herself was so lame that she could not budge a foot. Couldn't the gentleman please to wait awhile?"

But the gentleman thought the afternoon too far advanced for delay, and asked if he could not have the keys, and be allowed to go over the premises alone.

This, however, was contrary to orders, and Amy came forward and offered her services.

The old gentleman, whose address was marked by much cheerfulness and urbanity, entered readily into conversation with his fair guide, occasionally casting a glance of admiration at her light figure, as she tripped along at his side. "I came into your village a few hours ago," said he, "and not finding the friend, whom it was my business to visit, at home, I concluded to walk hither, as an agreeable way of passing the time. It is a good many years since I saw this structure, but I have always remembered it as one of the finest specimens of domestic architecture to be seen on this side of the Atlantic. We have here, generally, too little money, and too little time for a proper study of the subject to excel in tasteful and commodious habitations. Have there been any applicants yet for the purchase of this property, can you tell me?"

"I think not, sir. My father, however, can give you any information you desire concerning it; he is the agent of the owners," replied Amy.

"Ah! are you the daughter of Wallace Malcolm?" he asked.

"I am, sir. Are you acquainted with my father?"

The old gentleman fixed his eyes for some moments upon her lovely and genial countenance, without answering, and, observing the colour to deepen in her cheeks at his gaze, he returned, as if well pleased with his scrutiny, "I beg pardon, my dear young lady, I had not taken a good look at you before; I have known Mr. Malcolm for many years. I inquired for him in the village, and understood that he was not at home. At what time shall I be able to see him?"

"This evening, sir. I shall expect his return in an hour or two. He was called away by some business relating to this property—he and a gentleman who managed a recent suit for him, concerning its proprietorship."

"I have heard of it. Clayton is the name of the young man you refer to, is it not?—Harry Clayton—I knew him before he came into the country—an idle, helpless, money-spending youngster. The case must have been a very clear one, or the lawyers on the opposite side very great ninnies, if he could have it decided in his favor."

"I beg pardon, sir," said Amy, warmly, "his opponents were men of acknowledged ability; and if the character of Mr. Clayton was, in the city, such as you represent it, an entire transformation must have taken place on his coming amongst us. My father, whose student he was, is not very tolerant of such traits as you have attributed to him, and not easily deceived with regard to them, and he has the highest opinion of Mr. Clayton's talents, intelligence and industry."

"Indeed! His father would, no doubt, be glad to be satisfied of that. He used to fear, and with good reason, that his son would turn out to be very little credit to him."

"Perhaps his father was to blame for it," observed Amy.

"Perhaps he was," returned the old gentleman, glancing around the walls of the spacious library, and catching a cobweb on his cane.

"There is a very beautiful view from here," said Amy, passing into an alcove, and opening a large casement, which afforded egress to the grounds.

"Yes, indeed, it is altogether charming, and this little nook is quite the cosiest part of the whole edifice," answered the stranger; "now, if I were a resident here, this should be my especial lounging place. I would have the deepest of chairs, and the softest of footstools brought into it; a book-stand placed just there, to form a partial barrier between me and the main room; a picture, so good that I would not tire of it through a whole season, should hang on either wall, and some choice flowers should be arranged outside on this little portier; and then I could take my seat, and look at the sun setting behind your village steeple, in perfect luxury. It would be the very place for an old fellow like myself, wouldn't it?"

"But a few days since I heard it coveted by a young gentleman for his father," said Amy, smiling.

"He must have been a very unsophisticated young gentleman," remarked the stranger; "the fashion of acknowledging fathers seems to be considered obsolete among young men, generally, now-a-days." Amy forbore to reply that the one alluded to was Harry Clayton.

The visiter now being satisfied with his tour over the premises, Amy returned the keys to the lodge, and repaired homeward, attended by her new acquaintance, who had proposed accompanying her.—He accepted, without hesitancy, her invitation to enter the house and wait for her father; and, conversing with increasing cordiality, he seated himself at door of the little parlor, which opened upon a vine-covered porch.

In less than an hour, Mr. Malcolm drove up to the farther side of the house, unperceived, and, advancing toward the front, stopped, with some surprise, to witness a scene which seemed to afford abundance of entertainment to its several actors. Amy was within at her piano, playing, con amore, a lively air, while a number of children, who had been attracted into the yard by her music, nothing unusual, indeed, were attempting the evolutions of a country dance on one of the grass-plots. The old gentleman was directing their movements with his cane, from the porch, and calling the figures with great spirit:—"Down the middle, Curly-head and Pigeon-toes—now right and left with Poppy-cheeks and Chatter-box!" all of which, and similar appellations, the children enjoyed amazingly.

Mr. Malcolm beckoned to Harry, who had remained behind to unpack some books from the buggy, and a single glance sufficed for him. He hastened forward, much to the astonishment of Amy, with extended hands, and a joyful exclamation of "Is it possible?—my father!" The old gentleman was no other than Judge Clayton.

They spent the evening together, the old friends and their children. Whilst Amy presided at the little tea-table with her own womanly grace, and sung to her guitar with her own inimitable sweetness, the judge watched her so intently, yet so fondly, that Harry felt his cause to be in perfect safety from him. Then, while the old gentlemen were employed in reminiscences of their college days, the young people sat in the moonlight on the little porch, talking less, and in lower tones than was their wont. Harry's long kept secret was "told in his eyes," and Amy feared to raise hers to his face, in her new consciousness of the relation which had been growing between them.

At length Judge Clayton arose to withdraw, and Harry offered him his arm at the gate. He accepted it long enough to whisper—

"I can get along very well without you. Go back, go back, my dear boy, and pop the question before you let me see you again. She is a little darling—exactly what I want for a daughter; I have come all this journey to satisfy myself as to your choice.—There is her white dress still at the door—make some excuse to go back—yes, I have forgotten my stick, go back and get it."

"And supposing she refuse me?" said Harry.

"No danger, no danger—I've been watching you both."

Harry did go back, and imagine the result, dear reader, to be all that he wished.

Chapter V.

The wedding took place in the following autumn, and Judge Clayton insisted upon a visit to himself as their bridal trip. He received them at a pleasant boarding-house, where he had made preparations for their entertainment. The morning after their arrival, he presented to his son a well filled pocket-book, the contents of which, he remarked, he had been saving for the occasion. Harry thanked him in terms commensurate with the sacrifice, through which, he presumed the kindness was rendered, and observed that, as Mr. Malcolm had offered him a home in the cottage, he would make use of part of the gift to add some modern embellishments to its interior.

"Stop, stop," said the Judge, as Harry was hastening away; "before you go to make your purchases, I wish you to look over this paper;" and he unfolded a professional looking document. It was a title, signed by Henry Clayton, senior, securing to Henry Clayton, junior, the possession of the Leaston estate, with the sole reservation of "the western alcove of the library."

He dropped the paper in amazement. "I cannot understand this, my dear sir," said he.

"Can you not?" said the old gentleman; "then I'll let you into the mystery. It was all a sham about my loss of fortune—I deceived you to make a man of you. You were going to ruin so fast, that I saw if I did not separate you at once from your idle companions, and furnish you with some employment for your mind, your existence would become a burthen to yourself, and your character a reproach to me. You understand now?"

"I do, my dear sir, and thank you!—but this paper?"

"Well, when I saw you, I was so well satisfied with the result of my experiment, that I purchased the property which you and Amy seemed to admire so highly, and I now offer it as a token of my affection for both."

"My dear father!"

"I did intend adding a clause, making the possession conditional on your persevering in a life of usefulness, but I have the confidence in you to believe that you will proceed to perfect the course which you have so commendably entered upon."

"I trust I shall merit your confidence, that I shall pursue from principle what I commenced through apparent necessity. But did Mr. Malcolm know of your plan?"

"Certainly. I told him all before I consigned you to his tutelage."

"And Amy?"

"Not a word; her father is too much the man of honor to betray what was entrusted to himself alone."

"Then, I must go and tell her."

"Do so, and you must call on Dr. L., who, I confess, first suggested the propriety of the measure I adopted; for, in my blind partiality, I should, no doubt, otherwise, have gone on still longer in my system of unwarrantable indulgence."

"I remember now. I bored him with my complaints, and he strenuously insisted upon 'change of scene.' As the doctor is a nice casuist, I must ask him how he could reconcile so flagrant a deception with the laws of morality."

"He will tell you that 'desperate diseases require desperate remedies,' that your case was beyond the reach of common means, and, as your question might apply to myself also, my answer is, that of two evils I chose the less."

MORGAN.

A TALE OF SEVENTY-FIVE.

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

A paragraph has lately been going the rounds, to use the phraseology of the daily papers, to the effect, that "the remains of Gen. Morgan, the distinguished Revolutionary hero, repose in a church-yard in the town of Winchester, Virginia, without a stone or an inscription to preserve them from insult." Now, with proper deference to the source from whence the concoctor of this paragraph obtained his information, we beg leave to advance our belief that the grave is marked by both a stone and an inscription; for we have, at this moment, a distinct recollection of having, no great while since, clambered over the dilapidated wall of the church-yard in question, and of having found, in the south-eastern corner of it, beneath the shadow of a very ancient, but still lusty-looking locust tree, a cracked and time-darkened marble slab, bearing the inscription, perfectly legible, "Major General Daniel Morgan, departed this life," &c., with an appropriate panegyric of his valor and patriotism, and the eminent services which he rendered to his country during the war of the Revolution. The following is the inscription, copied literally from the time-honored tomb-stone:

MAJOR GENERAL DANIEL MORGAN, DEPARTED THIS LIFE
ON JULY THE 6TH, 1802,
IN THE 67TH YEAR OF HIS AGE.
PATRIOTISM AND VALOUR WERE THE PROMINENT FEATURES OF HIS CHARACTER:
AND
THE HONORABLE SERVICES HE RENDERED TO HIS COUNTRY
DURING THE REVOLUTIONARY WAR
CROWNED HIM WITH GLORY, AND WILL REMAIN IN THE HEARTS OF HIS COUNTRYMEN
A PERPETUAL MONUMENT
TO HIS MEMORY.

The tomb is an humble one, it is true, and the decay and neglect with which it is surrounded, speak not much for the boasted patriotism and chivalry of the sons of the Old Dominion; yet it may be added, in some sort of extenuation, that there are attached to this crumbling relic, associations of so hallowed a nature, that it would seem very sacrilege to molest it. Did we approach it with the irreverent thought of repair, the spirit of the past which guards it, would bid us pause, and as we gazed, with reverential awe, upon the honored stone, which his fellow soldiers' hands—for a remnant of the gallant band who shared his captivity at Quebec, were present with tearful eyes and swelling hearts, to take part in the solemn occasion of his interment—placed above the brave old hero's resting place, we should perhaps wonder that even merciless Time himself should have the temerity to deface it with his ruinous touch.

The place is not often visited. The tall grass springs gracefully and silently there, bowing proudly to the passing breeze, as if conscious of its safety from the tramp of the intruder in that lonely burial place; while the old stone church, with its shattered windows and mouldering door-frames, its cracked walls and leaky roof, stands among the ghostly sepulchres as solemnly desolate, (though in looking back through the lapse of a few gone years, it seems but yesterday that its paved isles rang with the footfalls of the little flock who came up with their heart offerings to the living God,) as if the Spirit of Solitude had been its tenant for the last century. And here reposes the valorous Morgan—his lowly resting place unregarded, almost forgotten, by the busy multitude, who enjoy blessings which he expended the vigor of his manhood to secure.

Perhaps Virginians merit the reproach which the paragraph quoted at the commencement was intended to convey; but we should be glad if we could attribute their neglect to other causes than a lack of that grateful regard to which Morgan's memory is entitled. It would be but generous to suppose that a feeling of reverence, a sacred respect, restrains them from disturbing the crumbling sepulchre which contains his ashes. The pomp and magnificence of a proud monument are too often only an evidence of great and selfish ambition; but in the plain, humble stone, inscribed to the memory of Morgan, you behold nothing but what reminds you of the stern simplicity which characterised our Revolutionary sires—plain, honest, virtuous men, who fought, not for glory and a gilded grave, but for freedom and the rights of men, and were content that, as a reward for the perils and toils they underwent, they could leave to their children "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." If there were such a thing as resisting the devouring touch of Time—if the tomb of Morgan could be preserved as it is—we would say, let it stand; no fitter memento can be placed above him. But this cannot be. It must be rebuilt, or there will soon be, in truth, neither "stone nor inscription" to designate the spot.

In earlier days, we spent many an hour by the hearth of a sturdy patriot, who bore arms with Morgan, in the "times which tried men's souls," and listened with no unwilling ear to his narrations of—one of which we shall here chronicle, as near as memory serves, in his own words. A little group of us were seated in thoughtful silence, by a cheerful fire, in the old man's hospitable mansion, on a cold November day; the wind was howling fiercely without, and there was, perhaps, something in the incessant rattling which the little bullets of hail kept up against the window panes, which reminded him of the stirring scenes of his youth. He laid his hand upon my shoulder, his usual mode of announcing that he was in the vein for "fighting his battles o'er again," and commenced as follows:

"Hair-breadth 'scapes i' the imminent deadly breach,"

"This time forty years ago, and in pretty much such weather, I was traversing the bleak forests of Maine, in company with eleven hundred half-starved and half-frozen, but iron-hearted men. It was in the expedition against Quebec, in the year '75, under Arnold, who, traitor as he afterwards proved, showed himself to be, on that occasion, both a brave man and a skilful soldier. I have passed through many severe campaigns, but the dangers and difficulties of them all were exceeded by the horrors of that expedition. We looked lightly upon the first hardships which assailed us, and plodded merrily and bravely onward, for we had been pretty well used to rough weather, rough work, and rough fare; but when we reached the Highlands, where we encountered the commencement of a northern winter, and were short of provisions too, our troubles began in earnest. The stoutest of us quailed a little then, for it is not so slight a thing to contemplate death, when it comes with starvation in a wilderness, and a winding sheet of snow, as it is to face it on the field of battle.

"I was in the van-guard, led by Morgan, and formed by three rifle companies, one of which was composed of his own picked men from this place, and truer marksmen and braver or better souls, never pulled trigger on a foe. There were six of us in the corps who had from boyhood ever been inseparable companions. Three of us were right-handed and three left-handed men. We messed together, fought together, shared the same prison in Quebec, and returned here to our homes together when our captivity expired. We were all descendants of the good old German settlers of Pennsylvania, and had emigrated to this State, about the same time that Morgan came here from New Jersey. We were called the 'Dutch Mess,' and were always foremost on duty, and the last to shrink from danger, and shared no little of the Captain's confidence—(he was only a Captain then.) He was by no means unapproachable by the men on account of higher rank—indeed, I have heard it said that he was more familiar with those in the ranks than became his station. That, however, is not a question that I am going to discuss here. I have often heard him say that if he had a regiment of such men as his 'Dutch Mess' was composed of, he could storm Tophet and take the D—l himself.

"As I was saying, our troubles commenced in the Highlands. The surface of the country offered obstacle enough, even if the weather had not been inclement, to have deterred any but men, whose wrongs had made them desperate. We were compelled to hew our own way through thickets which seemed almost interminable, and our clothing, which was but too scant under any circumstances, was literally torn from our backs by the brambles. Sometimes we were hours wading through morasses and swamps, covered with a thin crust of ice, which cut and bruised our flesh as we broke through it, in a manner that was excruciatingly painful—it was like rushing upon the naked points of bayonets. At other times, we climbed precipices, breasted impetuous torrents, and leapt yawning chasms—becoming, at length, so exhausted with fatigue and hunger, that we could scarce drag our lengths along.

"Many incidents, deeply distressing, occurred during the expedition, but the remembrance of one day's scenes, particularly, haunted me with painful vividness for years afterward. It was somewhere about the first of November, I think; the last of our provisions had been divided the day before, and we were told to shift for ourselves. We were astir at early dawn, making preparations to move forward—but it was with heavy hearts and drooping spirits that we contemplated the prospect of that day's tedious march, for we were in nearly a starving condition. All the dogs belonging to the detachment had been killed and eaten, but one, which belonged to a tall, melancholy-looking young rifleman, named Davis.—This one had been spared at the tearful entreaties of its master, who seemed as much attached to the poor creature as if it had been a human being. But this morning the men decreed that the dog must die. Davis remonstrated valiantly, but finding all his efforts to save his faithful companion vain, finally consented; stipulating, however, for the privilege of killing the animal himself. 'If it must be done,' said he, 'I want it done decently. Here, Ralph!' The dog, who was dozing among the leaves at a little distance, roused up at the familiar sound, stretched his gaunt limbs, shook his half-famished sides, and as if he thought it his duty to look cheerful, though he did not feel so, approached capering and frisking, and crouched at his master's feet. Davis regarded him silently for a few moments—then said, hardly able to speak for emotion—

"'It's hard to part, old Ralph; but your time's come, that's certain; and I don't know, after all, but it will be a mercy to put you out of your misery, for you're starving, like the rest of us.' He knelt down by the dog, and laying his hand upon his neck, continued, 'Say, my old dog, can you die like a soldier?'

"The dog seemed to have sufficient sagacity to comprehend, from his master's altered tone and manner, something of his impending doom, for he raised his eyes imploringly, and uttered a long, low, mournful whine. Davis drew his knife, averted his face, and with one blow plunged it to Ralph's heart; then rose, and walked away to weep.

"The dog was soon cut up, roasted, and devoured; but Davis, though almost perished from want of food and fatigue, refused to touch a morsel. Nor could we of the Dutch mess swallow our portion after the affecting scene we had witnessed, notwithstanding the ridicule we incurred by our squeamishness, as it was called. We were sorely pressed, though, before the day was over, and, for myself, I heartily wished I had taken a bite of old Ralph. The mess was reduced to the necessity of dividing an old shoe, which, difficult of mastication as it was, sufficed to keep life in us.

"But poor Davis did not long survive his old companion. His health, for months previous, had been precarious, and the men prophesied, days before, that he would never reach Canada. This day ended his troubles. I was by his side once during the afternoon, and spoke a few words of encouragement to him. I wanted him to be placed upon the sick list; but he persisted that he was not more unwell than usual; yet I could see that he was staggering forward only by the greatest exertion.

"'I am sorry,' said he, anxious to divert the conversation from himself, 'that it was my hand that gave old Ralph his death-blow. I don't think I ought to have done it. But, then, if I hadn't, I should have hated the man that did, and I didn't want to hate any man for what couldn't be helped. I didn't want him kept in misery, either. He's been a faithful dog to me ever since I was a child. We grew up together, and my friends forsook me, but old Ralph was always at my side. He seemed to know my griefs, and tried to console me with his affectionate capering. Many a time when I have thought there was nothing to bind me to the world, and that I might as well die, I've felt it my duty to live just to protect and feed that dog—and now I'm his murderer!'

"The tears streamed from his eyes as he spoke, and the men laughed at his weakness, and said he was no soldier; but I respected his feelings, for I knew there was not a braver man in the corps, nor one that would risk more to serve a friend. I said all that I could to console him under the circumstances, and when I left him, I felt very much like crying myself; I had a foreboding that he could not hold out much longer, and his sad tones were all the while ringing in my ears.

"We halted earlier than usual that day, having reached a large morass, which it would have been impossible to cross before night closed in. The spot upon which we encamped was a bit of rising ground, with, upon one hand, the morass, and upon the other a narrow glen, through which a small, swift stream dashed foaming along its rocky bed. Poor Davis sunk upon the ground immediately upon halting, and in fifteen minutes afterwards was a corpse. We were ordered to bury him in the glen, and a sad place it was—dark, cold, and shadowy—a fit abode for the lonely dead. We hewed out a rough coffin for him, and buried him there in that solitary vale, far from home, and far from human habitations. A short prayer was breathed over his remains, and the toil-worn, emaciated, and ghastly-looking companions of his wearying march gathered silently around his grave, like spectres in the gloom of evening; while the deep moan of the wind through the sombre pines, whose branches arched above us, mingling with the roar of the turbid stream beneath, and now and then the slow and solemn roll of the drum, rising upon the blast, formed a requiem so unearthly, and melancholy, that every living soul of us shook with an indescribable fear.

"This was the only occasion on which I ever harbored a doubt of Morgan's courage. The dusk was setting in, and I had withdrawn to some distance from the group that surrounded the grave. I was leaning against a pine, watching the dim and shadowy figures of the soldiers stealing, in quiet and sorrowful squads, back to the camp, when I was startled by a voice near me, which pronounced several times, in slow and measured accents, 'The valley of the shadow of death!' I turned, and beheld Morgan. There was just enough of daylight left to enable me to distinguish that his features were blanched, his eyes fixed in the direction of the grave, and his frame agitated, as if under the influence of fear. Surprise, for the moment, mastered the feeling of dread that had crept over me. Here was a man, whose valour was the boast of the country, unmanned by a blast of wind above a soldier's grave in the wilderness. I had heard him before express a horror of death, and say, in a jesting manner, 'he could wish to live forever;' and as I saw him quaking there, and called these things to mind, I was tempted to believe him a miserable coward. I was convinced of my mistake, however, by his subsequent gallant conduct on more than one occasion; and when I reflected more upon this strange inconsistency in his character, what I had then thought cowardice became one of the surest evidences of true bravery. Some men have gained a reputation by recklessness: incapable of forethought, they rush fearlessly into danger, and only tremble when they have met the shock, and are awakened to the reality of its terrors. But the genuine test is, where a man, fully aware of the extent of the emergency, proves himself equal to it. Such a man was Morgan. He dreaded death, yet, at the call of his country, he faced it unmoved and undaunted. He was never known to flinch or waver in the hour of battle.

"We were now among the mountains which divide Maine from Canada; and though we were subsisting almost entirely upon roots, and what little game we could take, we were buoyed up with the prospect of speedily reaching our journey's end. When we finally reached the sources of the Chaudiere, and beheld the first Canadian hut, with a wreath of blue smoke rising gracefully from its clay-plastered chimney, and the spot of cultivated ground surrounding it, I cannot describe to you the uncontrollable expression of joy which burst from our little band. You could not conceive the delight with which we hailed it, without having traversed, as we did, those dreary wilds for weeks, oppressed with hunger and fatigue, without beholding a human dwelling, or meeting with a single trace of the existence of civilized men. We were kindly received by the Canadians, who cheerfully furnished us with what provisions they could spare from their little stocks. After a short halt, we pushed on, refreshed and invigorated, until we reached Point Levy, opposite Quebec. The night before we arrived at this place, the Dutch mess was seated around a cheerful fire, talking over the incidents of the expedition, when Morgan came and called me aside.

"'Peter L——, I am going to see an old friend,' said he; 'get your rifle and keep me company.'

"I did so. We passed the guard, and found a Canadian boy waiting to guide us. We walked several miles through woods and fields, and at last came to a small cottage, with lights gleaming from the windows; and our ears were greeted with the sound of voices and laughter within, which ceased upon our knocking at the door. After some delay, we were admitted into a large, roughly-furnished, but clean and comfortable apartment. A cheerful-looking woman was seated near the fire, with a book in her hand, from which she appeared to have been reading to the grey-haired man who, with a pipe in his mouth, occupied a bench opposite her. Several girls and lads, of various ages, were standing about the room, in positions which indicated that they had been interrupted in some childish game. When Morgan entered, the old man rose, looked intently at him a few moments, with an expression of astonishment—then rushing forward, seized him by the hand, and exclaimed—'It is Daniel, really!' Wringing his hand with the cordiality of an old friend, he led him forward and presented him to his wife.

"'Nelly, dear, an old friend, Daniel Morgan. But to what chance do we owe the pleasure of this unexpected visit? Come, these are all my boys and girls, don't mind them, but explain. Came on with the rebels, eh?'

"'Exactly so,' replied Morgan, 'to have a bout with your red-coat neighbours across the river, and as you were so near our route, I could not pass without giving you a call.'

"A couple of seats were placed before the fire for us; the whiskey bottle was set out, and we became a convivial party. Morgan chatted of old times with the old gentleman, whom it seemed he had met many years before in the Jerseys. For myself, I soon became quite familiar with the young folks, who gathered around me, and whom I entertained with a history of what was going on in the States. There were five of them—three girls and two boys. The eldest was a beautiful creature of about twenty, with a rich, healthful complexion, large blue laughing eyes, and light ringlets, which fell in grateful confusion about her snowy neck. She was animated and intelligent, and possessed that greatest of all charms in a female—modesty.

"We were very plain people in those days, with but little of foolish romance in our composition. I had left, moreover, a wife and three children at home, and of course had long given up the wild dreams of youth for the sober realities of life, so that you will scarcely charge it to the partiality of an enamoured fancy, when I assert that a lovelier being than Fanny Rea was not to be found between the St. Lawrence and the Gulf of Mexico. She was graceful as a fawn, and the beautiful symmetry of her form, the ivory neck melting into the exquisitely rounded shoulders, with all her girlish charms swelling like the fresh petals of an opening rose, into the maturity of womanhood—these were well calculated to fire a young heart with the wild emotions of passion; but she possessed other qualities, which, even in the few hours I spent with her, endeared her to me as a daughter. There was something so inexpressibly sweet in the tone of her voice—something so engaging in her artless vivacity, the playful simplicity of her manners, and the purity of her thoughts—and the smile which dimpled her rosy mouth was so warm and sunny, that it was impossible not to love her.

"The two sisters of Fanny Rea were giddy romps, of apparently sixteen and eighteen, and the two masters Rea, who were the youngest of the party, were stout lads of fourteen or fifteen. With this little group I sat chatting until near midnight. The dame had retired, and Morgan and Rea were talking, smoking, and sipping their whiskey. The boy, who had served as a guide, had been left, during this while, to amuse himself; and in casting his eyes about the room, he had spied an old flute, lying upon one of the window sills. This he eyed, for sometime, so wistfully, that one of the girls, noticing it, asked him if he could play. He replied in the affirmative; she reached him the instrument, and he immediately struck up a lively air. The Captain, who was, by this time, a little warm from the effects of the 'old rye,' dropped his pipe, sprang to his feet, and proposed a dance.

"'Come, John,' said he to the old man, 'we danced a jig to that tune twenty-five years ago—you had a light foot then—come, let us see how much of your suppleness you retain.'

"'None at all,' replied Rea; 'I am unhinged with the rheumatism. But there are enough of my boys and girls to help you through a figure.'

"'If you are lame, we can't compel you to duty, of course,' rejoined the Captain; then turning to Fanny, he took her hand, and led her out upon the floor, adding to me as he did so—'Get your partner, Peter L——, and we'll show John what mettle there is in a merry rebel's heel after a two months' tramp.'

"I led out the next oldest daughter, and the two boys paired off, leaving the youngest girl alone.

"'And what am I to do for a partner?' cried she, with a burst of childish laughter. Here the little musician pointed with his instrument to the opposite side of the room, and said significantly—

"'As there is no chance for your getting a rebel, you had better try for a red coat.'

"The boy's gesture and words startled the girls, and Morgan and myself followed with our eyes the direction he was pointing. The door of a small closet, standing partially open, revealed to us a glimpse of a British uniform within it, and while Morgan's sword flew from its scabbard, I rushed to the corner where my rifle was leaning. Fanny uttered a scream, sprang to the closet, secured the door, and stood determinedly before it—her beautiful lip quivering with alarm, and her blue eyes, swimming with tears, fixed imploringly on the Captain. Morgan's brow grew dark, and turning to Rea, who sat unmoved with his pipe in his mouth, he said, sternly—

"'John, I little suspected you of being a tory.'

"'Nor am I,' he replied, warmly. 'I am not able to bear arms; and if I were, I have a large family, whose claims upon me for protection would compel me, in this place, to be neutral. My oldest boy, and he is a noble fellow, is at this moment with Montgomery, fighting for the States.'

"'Then, why are English soldiers concealed in your house, and I, who come to it on a friendly visit, unwarned of the danger?'

"'There is but one, and he, like yourself, is an unbidden, though I cannot say, unwelcome guest. He came to-night, ignorant, until I informed him, that Arnold's forces were in the neighborhood. We heard the knock at the door—we suspected you were Americans, and to prevent an unhappy collision, I prevailed upon him to bestow himself in that closet.'

"'You could not doubt,' continued Morgan, 'that your guest, even though he wore a red coat, would be sacred from my hand.'

"'How could I know it was you who knocked?'

answered the old man,—then looking archly at his daughter, he added: 'the fact is, Fanny there, like a good patriot, has been carrying war into the British camp, and the red coat is her prisoner. She captured him though, I believe, before you Southerners thought of commencing hostilities.'

"'Oh! I understand,' returned the Captain, good humoredly, returning his sword to its sheath; and then addressing the girl, whose face was now suffused with a blush, he continued, "and I suppose he is so well reconciled to his captivity that there is little danger of his attempting an escape. Let him out a while on parole, Fanny, and perhaps we may be able to make up our set for the dance. You can closet him again when we get through, and if he proves refractory, you can put matrimonial fetters on him.'

"Fanny dashed the tears from her eyes, smiled, and opening the closet door, the object of the parley, a young British officer, stepped forth.

"'Captain Hilliard—Captain Morgan,' said Fanny. The Englishman bowed stiffly, but Morgan advanced, and extending his hand, said, in his blunt way—

"'I never give my hand to a coward, young man, and I'll take your face for assurance that you are not one, though you did hide from a couple of ragged rebels.'

"The Englishman did not relish the allusion. 'Sir,' he returned, receiving the proffered hand coldly, 'you may one day find a stronger assurance of it in my steel.'

"'Edward!' exclaimed the girl, laying her fingers reproachfully on her lip.

"The lover immediately checked the indignation which was flashing from his eye, and added, carelessly—

"'The terms of the truce you have entered into with our good host, Captain Morgan, makes us friends at least for the night. We may have occasion, soon enough, in the course of our respective duties, to try each other's mettle.'

"'I hope such an occasion may never occur,' replied Morgan, 'for I already feel a father's interest in my little partner here, and I should be sorry to destroy all her bright hopes at a blow.'

"'At a blow! ha! ha!' laughed the Englishman, as he took the place assigned him in the dance with the youngest of the girls. 'Well, if you are as good at fighting as you are at boasting, we shall no doubt have some hot work, before we send your army crippled home again.'

"'No doubt,' grumbled Morgan, a little nettled by the youth's derisive tone. 'The music, boy—we are ready.'

"The dance commenced; and I cannot but laugh, even now, to think what a contrast we, in our tattered and dirty apparel, made by the side of the graceful young Englishman, in his unsoiled and splendid uniform. Notwithstanding, we kept it up merrily for an hour, and would probably have danced till day-light, had not our music broke down—the boy having blown himself, as he expressed it, 'altogether out of breath.'

"At a hint from the old gentleman, the girls now retired, Morgan having taken the liberty to kiss them all round before they went, and the Englishman being playfully repulsed in an attempt to exercise the same privilege upon the lips of Fanny. We then drew ourselves around the table, upon which the bottle stood, and spent an hour longer, drinking healths, and cracking jokes. As the night wore, the Captains became acquainted, and better pleased with each other, and their sarcastic thrusts were changed to soldierly compliments, and expressions of kindly regard. At length, as it was getting well on to morning, I gave Morgan a hint that it was time to be getting back to camp.

"'So it is,' said he, raising his glass; 'here, John Rea, here's to your young guest and future son-in-law—I believe he is a man of some soul, and will one day learn to respect the cause in which we fight.'

"'He does already,' responded Rea. 'I have convinced him that the States are right, and'——

"'Then, why don't he fight for them?' interrupted Morgan.

"'I am no American,' interposed the youth.—'Would you have me brand myself as a traitor. No, no, Captain Morgan; I hope you have a better opinion of me. Though I may not altogether approve of the acts of our Government, yet as a loyal Englishman, I hold that I am bound to fight for my country right or wrong.'

"'There is reason in what you say, and my question was unthinking,' said Morgan. 'I am the last man who would tempt you to desert; for if there is one creature I despise above all others, it is a traitor. Still, I should think it a disagreeable task to fight, when one is conscious that his cause is wrong.'

"'Perhaps our worthy friend a little misrepresented me,' returned the Englishman, 'when he asserted that I was convinced the Colonies were right. I admit they have cause for complaint, yet I think that their grievances might be adjusted without a resort to bloodshed, and that they are by no means justifiable in their rebellion.'

"'I might convince you of the contrary, if I had time to argue,' Morgan rejoined—and continued after a pause: 'I am glad, at least, we have your sympathy, though your Sovereign claims your duty. It is not often we meet with one born in affluence across the water, with friends and money to stick a commission in his pocket, without having to earn it by hard service in an humble capacity, who is willing, or sufficiently free from prejudice, to view our wrongs impartially.'

"'I was not born in affluence,' returned the Englishman, 'and I did earn my commission by the drudgery of the ranks. I cannot say, though, that my epaulette has made me a whit happier than when, a light-hearted lad, I drove a market-wagon to Manchester.'

"'I honor you the more,' exclaimed Morgan, grasping his hand warmly, 'that you have gained your rank by your own merits. I have been a wagoner myself.'

"He paused, and an expression of sadness came over his frank features as he resumed—

"'You have a soldier's arm and a soldier's heart, Hilliard, and I tremble at the thought of meeting you in the field.'

"'Captain Morgan surely jests,' said the other, in a tone of surprise, as he surveyed the patriot's powerful frame. 'I think I should have but small advantage in a personal contest with you; and even were the odds double in my favor, you are not the man, if I may judge upon so slight an acquaintance, who would shrink from the encounter.'

"'You misunderstand me. I tremble not for myself, but for you. Day does not succeed night more surely than death to the British officer who faces a Virginia rifle.'

"'You vaunt largely of your skill,' remarked Hilliard, with somewhat of incredulity in his tone.

"'Not idly, however, as you shall see, if you choose to witness a trial of it.'

"Hilliard assented, and Morgan, taking the bottle from the table, we all proceeded to the area in front of the cottage. The bottle, with the cork nicely balanced upon the mouth of it, was placed upon a log, with a light beside it. Morgan then took my rifle, stepped off fifty paces and fired. The cork was carried away by the ball, while the bottle remained unmoved. A burst of admiration escaped the Englishman's lips, and the Captain, handing me back the rifle, said—

"'Now, Peter L., you may try your hand.'

"'Very well,' said I, 'I will snuff the candle!'

"I need not give you a description of the feat—you have doubtless seen it performed. Suffice it to say, I did it, to the no small amazement of the young Englishman.

"'What do you think of those shots?' asked Morgan.

"'I never saw any to equal them,' was the response.

"'You see, then, I have good reason for hoping we shall never meet on the day of battle.'

"'Pshaw!' ejaculated the Englishman, contemptuously, 'I do not know, Captain Morgan, whether you suppose me to be a paltroon, that you make such an appeal to my fears; but you may rest assured that fifty of your rifles, levelled at his breast, would not deter Edward Hilliard from the performance of his duty.'

"'I believe it, and I honor you for the spirit,' said Morgan, taking his hand; 'I meant not to offend you; for the sake of John Rea and his gentle daughter, I would be your friend. Farewell, young man—farewell; John, give my regards to the wife and children. If fortune does not desert me, I will see you again.'

"And after a warm shake of the hand all round, and a 'God speed us in the good cause,' from the old man, we wended our way back to the camp.

"The next day we reached Point Levy, opposite Quebec. The British, having been notified of our approach, by the miscarriage of a letter from Arnold to Gen. Schuyler, had removed all means of conveyance from this side the river, and made active preparation for the defence of the place. What followed, as a matter of history, is familiar to you all.

"One morning, about the middle of December, some time after we had been joined by Montgomery, (who, as you will remember, had taken Montreal, and had been repulsed in an attack upon Quebec,) the Virginia rifle corps were stationed in a stone house some distance from the town, when a small party of the enemy came out under cover of a huge bank of snow and ice, and planted a small piece of ordnance within about eighty or a hundred yards of us. The first intimation we had of this movement, was a ball which entered the window, took off the post of a bed upon which Morgan was at that moment sitting, in earnest conversation with a junior officer, and passed through a door upon the opposite side of the house.

"'Boys!' exclaimed the Captain, starting up, and noting through the window how matters stood, 'that gun must be silenced, or we shall have the house about our ears in ten minutes.'

"The Dutch mess, as usual, were first at the window. The three right-handed men were stationed upon one side, and the three left-handed men upon the other, so as to be able to load and fire in the most rapid succession. By this time, the enemy's piece was re-loaded, and directed point blank at the window. A soldier issued from behind the snow-bank with a lighted match; but, before he could reach the gun, which was only a few paces out from their cover, the first rifle of the mess had carried the Captain's compliments, and he measured his length upon the ground. Another, and another followed, each sharing the same fate. Still they seemed undaunted in the accomplishment of their object, and another, and yet another, rushed to the same death. Five of the mess had discharged their rifles, and each had the satisfaction of seeing his man fall. The next shot was mine. In an instant I brought my piece to rest, and was glancing my eye along the barrel for a sight of the next victim. But there was a few moments' delay. No more, it seemed, were willing to expose their lives to such unerring aims. At length a sixth man made his appearance—evidently venturing with the greatest reluctance. I waited for him to make another step, but he halted, and I perceived that several bayonets were thrust at him from behind the snow-bank, to urge him on. He wavered, and then, overcome with fear, sprang back, despite of all opposition to his return.

"The next who ventured was a young officer, and a feeling of the most deathly horror crept to my heart at the sight of him, for I recognized our young acquaintance of the Canadian cottage, Captain Hilliard. It is said of the rapidity of thought, that a dream, which seems to be of many hours' duration, is in reality but the work of a single moment; and so it was with me on this occasion. Although I was afterward assured that he sprang toward the gun with the quick bound of a hunted deer, it appeared to me that he moved with the most singular deliberation, even with a slow and measured step, so painfully active was my mind, and so many contending emotions were rushing through it. Not only all the incidents of the night at the cottage passed in review before me, but I thought of the consequences of the death I was about to inflict—of the sorrow of old John Rea, and the anguish of his beautiful daughter: busy imagination even depicted Morgan brushing a tear from his ingenuous features. A film passed before my eyes as I fired, and lowering my piece, I brushed the tears away, and strained my sight towards the place, in the endeavor to distinguish among the corpses around the gun, that of the young Captain. At that moment I was pushed roughly aside by my companions, and a hiss of scorn fell upon my ear. Had I, then, missed him? A strange, almost absurd hope agitated me, and I held my breath a moment in suspense. But, if my aim had proved untrue, how did he disappear, and that, too, without firing the gun? I turned with an interrogatory look to Morgan, who was standing by, watching the proceedings. A smile, which others might have interpreted of scorn, but in reality, of satisfaction, was playing about his lips, which he vainly endeavored to suppress.

"'You have disgraced the Dutch mess, Peter,' said he; 'you have lost your reputation as a shot.'

"The thrill of inward delight I felt at these words, was ample recompense for the loss; an oppressive weight was raised from my heart, and I breathed free once more. It was true, I had missed him. My ball had, strangely enough, struck the match from his hand, and he had sprung back to the snow-bank. It seemed he had only returned for another match, however, and he endeavored to issue forth again; but he was forcibly detained by the hands of his comrades. About ten minutes now elapsed, when we had the satisfaction of seeing the party, who had abandoned their loaded gun, retreating to the city. The mess sallied out, and brought the deserted piece in triumph to our quarters. It was afterwards used to advantage against the enemy.

"Several days after this incident, towards sundown, while I was picketed before the house, Morgan came in from head quarters. He appeared to be agitated, and as he passed me, he remarked—

"'Peter L., if you had aimed at that young fellow's heart, instead of his hand, you would have saved him the mortification of dying by a halter, as well as your own reputation for sharp-shooting.'

"He passed out again soon after, and I had no opportunity of enquiring what he alluded to. When I was relieved, I entered the house, and being almost worn out with the fatigues of the previous night, threw myself on the floor to sleep. I awoke about nine o'clock, and found the mess in close confab about a strange interview between the Captain and a girl in a blue cloak. She was so closely muffled, none of them had seen her face. Morgan, they said, had seemed much moved, and as they passed out together, was heard to observe, 'There was little hope, yet he would risk his life for her sake.' I made no remark, and stretched myself again upon the floor—but I had my thoughts about the matter, and could not sleep. Near midnight, my companions were all snoring around me, when I heard some one challenged by the sentry at the door. I raised myself on my elbow to listen, and the next moment, Morgan, entering, came directly to me.

sions had been divided the day before, and we were

"'Up, Peter, and come with me,' he said.

"I arose, and followed him in silence. He took the direction of the river, and a walk of about twenty minutes brought us to its steep banks. Here was a small hut, which we entered, and found sitting by the fire an old woman, with thin and wrinkled features. She raised her head and nodded as we entered, and stretching out her skinny arms, drew a couple of small seats near the hearth, and motioned us to be seated.

"'Not come yet?' asked Morgan.

"'Nay,' replied the woman, in a voice so mild as to astonish me—for I had been unfavorably prepossessed by her appearance—'Nay, Captain, it has scarce been an hour since you both left, and such errands are not done quickly.'

"This was all mystery to me, though I suspected that our visit here must have some connexion with the fate of young Hilliard. I knew by the expression of Morgan's face, when we started, that he was in no very communicative mood; and, much as my curiosity was excited, I refrained from questioning him.

"We seated ourselves by the old lady's side, and Morgan, taking up a stake which lay upon the hearth, commenced poking the fire in silence. After thus occupying himself some minutes, he turned to the old lady, and said—

"'Are you not very lonely here, good mother?'

"Ay, ay—lonely enough, but not altogether deserted;' and she drew from a little box, by her side, a tattered Bible; 'I have this to comfort me.'

"Morgan was silent again; and the old lady carefully replacing the Bible, commenced fumbling her bony fingers, as if absorbed in some mental calculation. When she had finished, she sighed deeply, and said, 'It's just thirty months next Friday since my poor husband was murdered.'

"'Murdered?' enquired the Captain; 'how was that?'

"'Why,' said she, 'a villain named Simms Hilliard, a miserable vagabond—whose life he had once saved, while they were fishing on the river, and who had eaten many a meal in this house, when he could get a morsel nowhere else—waylaid him one night, when he was coming home from the city, and stabbed him to the heart for the few pieces of gold he had about him.'

"'Simms Hilliard!' exclaimed the Captain; 'he is the very man we want to catch, to-night!'

"'Ay, ay—I knew he would not be suffered to go long unpunished. Was it him that wronged the poor girl?'

"'O no, mother; she is an innocent child. A young soldier, very dear to her, has been taken, and condemned to be hung. He has been mistaken, it seems, for the Simms Hilliard you speak of, who joined the American army at Fort Chambly, and deserted at Montreal—murdering a fellow-soldier in cold blood, before he left, and conveying to the English information which had nigh proved fatal to Montgomery. The price of his treason, it is said, was a captaincy in Carleton's army. The young man who is now under sentence of death admits that he is the only Captain Hilliard in Carleton's troops, but denies that he ever was in the American army. He was taken on the other side of the river, by a party of our men, while returning from a visit to the young lady who was here with me, and who is his betrothed. He has been identified by a whole corps, and also by Montgomery and several of his officers, as Simms Hilliard, the deserter and murderer; so that, if he is not the man, there must be a remarkable resemblance between them—and the only way in which he can be saved, is by bringing the real Simms Hilliard to justice. Now, I have some intelligence which leads me to believe that Hilliard never received a commission for his treachery, and that he never even joined the British army, but that he is keeping a tavern in Quebec. If such be the case, I am going to take him this night, or die in the attempt.'

"He had scarce uttered the last words, when Fanny Rea entered the hut. She was wrapped closely in a blue cloak, and attended by one of her little brothers. As she nodded to me in recognition, I perceived that her face was pale, and her eyes swollen, as with weeping. Morgan arose, took her hand kindly, and asked, 'Have you learned the countersign?' She whispered something in his ear, and he replied, 'Well, cheer up, Fanny; I hope all may be well.' Then turning to the old woman, he continued,—'Now, good mother, the bundle;—let's have it.'

"'There it is, behind the door,' said she, 'and Heaven speed you!'

"Morgan caught up the bundle, and drew me with him behind a screen, formed by a tattered coverlet hung up in one end of the little apartment. Here he unrolled the bundle, which contained a couple of disguises, and, following his directions, I was in a few moments transformed, as well as himself, into a Canadian fisherman. We left the hut, and were soon at the gates of the city of Quebec. Through Morgan's adroitness we were admitted. He was detained some moments in conversation with the corporal of the guard, and I apprehended some difficulty; but we were finally suffered to pass on. Morgan leading the way, we penetrated the town, and met a solitary reveller, reeling to his lodgings, from whom we managed to obtain a direction to the sign of the 'Three Horns,' of which Hilliard was landlord. We reached the tavern, knocked for some time at the door, and were at length admitted by a sleepy Irish boy.

"'Where is the landlord?' enquired Morgan, abruptly, closing the door behind us, when we had entered.

"'In bed,' was the drowsy response.

"'Rouse him up, and send him hither, quickly.'

"The boy departed to obey, manifesting his displeasure at our unseasonable interruption of his slumbers by a muttered oath. We waited not many minutes for the appearance of the person we sought; and when he came into the room, so striking was his resemblance to the young English captain, that at first sight I could scarcely realize the fact, that they were not one and the same person. A more deliberate survey of his features, however, showed a sinister and stupidly malignant expression, which would have distinguished him from any other being under the sun.

"'How are you Simms?' said Morgan, slapping him familiarly on the shoulder.

"'How are you?' returned the fellow, with an air of shyness.

"'You don't know me, Simms? Well, I know you; and, hark ye!'—and as Morgan spoke, he drew a pistol and deliberately cocked it—'I want your agreeable company in a short walk to-night. Be particular not to forget, as we go along, that the first word you speak to a living soul, without I bid ye, will be your last. Utter but a syllable above your breath, and your knavish brains shall leak out through a bullet hole.'

"The fellow stood petrified with fear and astonishment. Ere he had time to recover his astounded senses, we each of us thrust an arm through his and led him unresisting from the house, retracing our steps towards the gate through which we had entered. On reaching it, we found several of the guard collected around it, in some commotion. Happily for us, the object of their attention was without, and we quite reached the gate, which was just then slowly swinging back upon its hinges, without being observed. To pass, however, without exciting suspicion, would have been impossible; for the reluctant steps of the trembling wretch we forced along would have betrayed us. To make our situation still more critical, who should appear from without, panting, as from a recent chase, but the young British captain, himself!

"'The d—l!' exclaimed Morgan, 'he has taken French leave of his hangman. But one of the na... is as good as the same, they say. To your heels—for your life, Peter!'

"As he spoke, he dexterously lifted the landlord of the 'Three Horns,' from his feet, shouldered him, darted through the gateway, and ran so swiftly, notwithstanding his awkward burden, that I, who followed, could scarcely keep pace with him. The guard must have been very dilatory, or very stupid, for we had gained nearly thirty yards before they sent a leaden messenger after us. The ball whistled by my ears in such fearful vicinity as to assure me that we were not yet beyond the reach of danger, and I sprang on with accelerated speed. In another instant we were saluted by a volley from three muskets, and Morgan's burden fell heavily from his shoulder to the hard snow. As I stepped over him, I saw by the faint moonlight, which was streaming occasionally from the broken clouds, the blood gushing from his mouth, and his features contorted in the agony of death. A ball had pierced his heart.

"We reached the hut, where we found Fanny awaiting our return, with feverish anxiety. It is useless for me to attempt to portray the grateful delight with which she received the tidings of her lover's safety. We left her under the protection of the lone old woman for the night, and, having laid aside our disguise, returned to our quarters. The next day we were busy making preparations for an attack upon the city, and though Hilliard's escape was discovered, in the excitement of more weighty matters, it created but little surprise. He had effected his escape through the carelessness of his guard.

"On the morning of the remarkable 31st of December, we attempted to carry the city by storm. Of the events of that day—of the death of the gallant Montgomery—of the intrepid conduct of Morgan and his Virginia Riflemen, and of the melancholy result of the action, you are doubtless well informed from history. That night, the Dutch mess were resting in the dungeons of Quebec. It was about two weeks afterwards that I received, in prison, a kind visit from Captain Hilliard, and his lady,—the beautiful Fanny Rea. Morgan, who was then on parole, had danced at their wedding."

TIME ENOUGH YET.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

"Procrastination is the thief of time."
[Young's Night Thoughts.

It was ten o'clock in the morning, and Robert Melmond, with a pamphlet in his hand, was reclining indolently upon a sofa in his dressing-chamber, when a servant entered and told him that there was a lady below, who wished to speak with him. He half rose from his recumbent posture with a yawn, and said in an enquiring tone—

"A lady—who can she be?"

"Your aunt Ellis," said a middle-aged woman, stepping into the apartment.

"What can have brought you here so early in the morning?" said he, advancing to take the hand which she held out to him.

"Early do you call it?" said she. "Why I have come twenty miles in a chaise this morning, and ate my breakfast before I left home."

"And I am just going to take mine, as you see, and as you must certainly be ready for another by this time, you must join me."

"By no means—I ate heartily at six o'clock, and shall need nothing more till I dine."

"But you must know that I don't dine at twelve as country people do."

"I presume not: but I expect to dine at Mrs. Hart's, where I shall board during my stay in town, and she is old-fashioned, like myself. Ah, I see your countenance brightens. You imagined I was so inconsiderate as to suppose a young man keeping bachelor's hall, would like to be encumbered with an old aunt from the country. There, don't attempt to deny that you would esteem it an encumbrance, and now I will answer the question you asked when I first entered the room, and tell you what brought me here. The truth is, Robert, I have, of late, suffered much anxiety on your account. I am told that you have given up all thoughts of studying a profession, and that you have made no attempt to engage in any kind of business."

"As to a profession," he replied, "there is time enough yet for that. I have been out of college only a year, and am only twenty-three years old."

"It is true you have idled away only one year, which is, I am afraid, only preliminary to wasting more. You know what your father thought upon the subject, and though he did not exact a promise from you that you would study a profession, he earnestly requested it."

"I know that he did, and though, as he left me a large fortune, I could see no reason for the request, I for some time, fully intended to comply with it, but somehow there was always something to prevent me."

"I am sorry to say it, Robert, but that something which you complain of was your own idle, procrastinating disposition. If you set about it immediately, however, there is, as you say, time enough yet."

"O, aunt, if you only knew how hateful only the thought of it is."

"Well, the next best thing which you can do towards realizing your late father's wishes, will be to engage in some mercantile pursuit."

"The thought of which is more hateful still. My income is amply sufficient for my maintenance, and why should I not indulge——"

"In idleness," said his aunt, finishing the sentence for him. "I am afraid that it has already become a habit: for I find that though there are a dozen or more pamphlets and magazines lying upon the table, the leaves of not one of them are cut. Since you have made up your mind to live on the income of your property, I hope it is safe?"

"O, yes, perfectly. It is all in the hands of Blakeney, who is one of the richest merchants in the country."

"What security have you?"

"His note."

"Nothing more?"

"I want nothing more."

"What if he should fail?"

"There is not the least danger."

"On the contrary, I think there is the greatest danger, for I have been informed that this Mr. Blakeney is in the habit of engaging in large speculations, and I believe all who do are in danger of failure. I should therefore advise you to lose no time in having your property well secured."

"There is no danger: but to gratify you, I will see about it soon."

"Why not see about it to-day?"

"I will, if I should feel in the right mood."

"That you are not sure to do—so exchange that gay dressing gown for a coat of sober black, and set out immediately. I will wait in the parlor till you are ready."

"Now, aunt, in sober truth, I have a headache, and cannot venture out in this blazing sun. I give you my word that I will call on Mr. Blakeney this evening."

"And I give you my word, that I will wait in the parlor till you are ready, if it should be till tomorrow morning."

"That good aunt of mine has a will of her own," he muttered to himself, when she had left the chamber. At the same time he rang the bell in order to summon a servant to assist him to dress.

"I should have been ashamed to be so long dressing, even on my wedding day," said Mrs. Ellis, when her nephew joined her in the parlor. "I have been waiting more than an hour."

"I assure you, aunt," he replied, "that I am quite exhausted with the haste I have made. I have not exerted myself so much for these six months."

They now commenced their walk towards Mr. Blakeney's. On their way, they met several dashing young men of Melmond's acquaintance, who looked not a little surprised to see a woman on his arm, who was neither young nor handsome, and who showed, by her air that she resided in the country. The sidelong glance he gave his aunt, accompanied by an expressive wink, conveyed to them in a manner sufficiently intelligible, how fully sensible he was of the ludicrous effect produced by the juxtaposition of so elegant a personage as himself, and a middle-aged, plainly-dressed woman, inclining to embonpoint, whose demeanor so unequivocally evinced her rusticity. They soon arrived at their place of destination. Melmond enquired for Mr. Blakeney, and was informed that he had left home to be absent a week. He breathed more freely, for the business which had been to him as a lion in his path, was removed to a greater distance. He even might not have to attend to it at all, as his only inducement to undertake it was the importunity of his aunt, from which he would soon be released, as she would be obliged to leave the city before Mr. Blakeney's return. He found, however, that he was not likely to come off as easily as he had anticipated, as previous to her departure, she did not fail to extort a promise from him that he would attend to the business under consideration, the first opportunity.

A few evenings afterwards, he attended a large party, the first he had honored with his presence for some time, as he had of late decidedly begun to prefer the delicious indolence of reclining on the sofa and watching the smoke of his cigar, as it curled itself in fantastic wreathes above his head, to the exertion which was necessary to appear in society.—There were few, if any of the young men, moving in the same circle, who could compare with him in elegance of person, and none, when he seriously set himself about it, who could dress with so much taste. The air of languor, which his extreme indolence seldom permitted him to shake off, was by many considered the perfection of grace, and not a few were at great pains to veil an excitable temperament, under an affectation of apathy in order that they might resemble him. When he arrived at the mansion of Mrs. Waldo, the lady who gave the party, he found he had a rival in a young gentleman by the name of Parkman, who was the son of a rich West India Planter. After finishing his studies at the University of Oxford, in England, he had spent several years in travelling on the Continent, and was now sojourning in the city, where most of his mother's relatives resided.

Melmond and Parkman formed a perfect contrast to each other. Melmond was considerably above the middle size, and possessed a form of great elegance. His skin was of almost feminine fairness, and his light brown hair clustered round his forehead and temples in large wavy curls. A handsome and rather full mouth disclosed teeth of unrivalled beauty when he spoke or smiled, and his hands were as white and delicate as a lady's. Parkman was full three inches shorter, and had a form of the most exact symmetry. His complexion was pale, though of a hue perfectly healthful, and his intellectual though not high forehead was shaded with numberless glossy jet-black curls. Eyes large and brilliant, and of the same dark hue as his hair, imparted animation to a countenance, over which the faultless and bust-like features might otherwise have diffused an air of too much repose.

Nor was Parkman the only new star to give brilliancy to Mrs. Waldo's party. Cecilia Laurens, heiress to a splendid fortune, whose entrance into society had been retarded by the decease of both her parents, was, incomparably, the most beautiful girl present. An unsullied complexion, where mantled the rich hues of health; dark, starry eyes, beaming with softened light beneath the shade of their long black lashes, a lovely mouth, at the corners of which hovered the softest of dimples whenever she smiled, might have been deemed minor advantages, when compared with the naivete and indescribable grace of her manners, and the charm of her voice, which thrilled upon the ear with the dulcet sweetness of midnight music.

At sight of her, Melmond was aroused from his habitual indolence. He sought an introduction, entered into an animated conversation with her, and was as much pleased with himself as with her, when he found that his mind contained a store of really good ideas, which had long lain as useless as the miser's gold. For half an hour he had sustained with her a conversation delightfully piquant, when his old feeling of listlessness came creeping upon him as stealthily as the shadow creeps upon the sun-dial. With difficulty he suppressed a yawn, and it was with sensations of real pleasure that he recollected that he had already engrossed her attention as long as etiquette would permit. His energies were, however, again roused when he found that Parkman had taken his station by her side, and was evidently fully sensible of her fascinations. The party of Mrs. Waldo was only the prelude to a series of brilliant fetes and soirees. Melmond and Parkman attended them all, and Miss Laurens was seldom absent. Among the many admirers who knelt at her shrine, Parkman was the most earnest and assiduous, except at intervals, when the jealousy of Melmond was roused by fear of his success. Cecilia Laurens, who was entirely free from the vice of coquetry, had not yet mixed enough in society to acquire the art of concealing her feelings further than what was prompted by a naturally sensitive and delicate mind. It was easy, therefore, for those who felt interested enough to watch her deportment, to perceive that Melmond was the person most likely to win her preference. The case would undoubtedly have been different could she have had the opportunity to observe them when freed from the restraints imposed by society—could she have followed each to his own apartment, and beheld the one lazily lounging on a sofa with a cigar in his mouth, the other sedulously engaged in striving to acquire a knowledge of that science which, according to the opinion of Burke, "does more to quicken and invigorate the understanding than all other kinds of human learning put together."

Melmond soon became aware that his star was in the ascendant, in spite of the almost equally handsome and far more intellectual Parkman. This, at first, by awakening his pride, gave an impulse to his energies. He became more earnest and marked in his attentions to Cecilia, so much so, that the impression became general that he was already, or would soon be, an accepted lover. While the affair wore this aspect, a young man of Melmond's acquaintance, by the name of Sheldon, called at his room. The conversation turned upon Cecilia Laurens, and they both concurred in the opinion, that she was a very lovely girl.

"What hinders you," said Sheldon, "from proposing at once? There is not the least doubt but that you would be accepted."

"I intend to," was Melmond's reply; "but there is time enough yet."

"But why not immediately? With such a rival as Parkman, although you are, at present, evidently the favorite, I should make haste to secure the prize."

"I see no necessity for hurrying," said Melmond. "As you say, it is plain to see that she prefers me to Parkman, so that I may just as well let the matter rest as it is till opportunity presents for me to introduce it naturally and gracefully."

"That would do, if you knew she had made up her mind decidedly in your favour, which I am well assured she has not. Parkman is a man who improves upon acquaintance, and Cecilia possesses a mind fully capable of appreciating his superior attainments as well as his highly cultivated taste."

"With all his superior attainments and cultivated taste," said Melmond, in a tone that showed he was somewhat irritated, "I am not afraid of him."

"Nor would you have reason to be," said Sheldon, "if—I may as well say it as not—if you did not suffer all your good qualities to be hidden by the rust of indolence. Excuse me, Melmond, for if I were not your friend I would not risk your displeasure by speaking thus plainly. You have the privilege of calling on Miss Laurens. Take my advice and permit not another day to pass before you offer her your hand."

"Well, upon the whole, it may be best," replied Melmond; "I will think about it."

Melmond reflected on what his friend had said, after his departure, but could see no reason why he should be in a hurry. Sheldon had admitted that Cecilia appeared to regard him with more partiality than either of her other admirers, not even excepting Parkman, and when he viewed his handsome person in the mirror he thought she would not be likely to change her mind.

About three weeks after the conversation with Melmond and Sheldon, Cecilia was sitting alone with Mrs. Tileston, her aunt, with whom she resided. Cecilia's spirits were evidently depressed, and they had both been silent for a long time.

"It appears to me," said Mrs. Tileston, abruptly breaking the silence, "that Robert Melmond is a trifler. One hour he is all assiduity and attention to you, the next, to all appearances, perfectly apathetic; and, to confess the truth, I am not well pleased to have my niece always ready with her best curtsey and sweetest smile for one who may, or who may not deign to notice her."

Cecilia blushed deeply, but made no reply.

"My remaks occasioned you pain," said her aunt. "I trust your affections are not yet so far engaged as to blind you to what is due to yourself. I forbore to mention the subject until I was convinced that he had no object in view beyond the selfish vanity of his triumphing over those who would scorn to be guilty of similar meanness. He now, I suppose, considers himself secure, for he has, of late, very much abated in his attentions to you."

Of the truth of this last remark, Cecilia, on several occasions, had been painfully conscious, but neither of them thought of attributing it to the true cause. How, indeed, could they imagine that a young man of his age could be so completely under the dominion of indolence as to cause what usually proves the most engrossing of all passions, to yield to its powers?

Mrs. Tileston forbore to point out the superior delicacy perceptible in the earnest, yet quiet attention of Parkman, as what she had said of Melmond, had, she imagined, prepared the mind of Cecilia to make the discovery herself. The same evening the parties were all brought together at one of the most splendid fetes of the season. Melmond was very late, and when he arrived Cecilia was engaged in conversation with Parkman.

"Will nothing wake you up, Melmond?" said Sheldon, addressing him in a low but earnest voice. "Don't you see that Parkman is rapidly gaining ground in Miss Laurens' favor?"

"Am I to be frightened if she speak to any person but myself?" said Melmond.

"Certainly not; but there are few ladies who like to be neglected, or who like to wait week after week to see whether a gentleman intends to offer himself or not. If you really have serious views with regard to her I advise you to trifle no longer."

"I see no cause for alarm," replied Melmond. "I always find Miss Laurens quite ready to receive any attention I feel disposed to bestow on her."

That it might be apparent that his boast was not a vain one, he walked up to the spot where she was and made her a careless bow. She acknowledged it by one so cold and distant that it was impossible for him not to perceive a change in her appearance.—She immediately directed her attention to some fine engravings which represented several delicious views in Italy with which Parkman was familiar, the peculiar beauties of which he was, with much enthusiasm, pointing out to to the notice of Mrs. Tileston and several other ladies, who had not, like him, been favored with a view of the original scenes.

"What did I tell you?" said Sheldon, when he again had opportunity to speak to Melmond apart.

"She is a little capricious," he replied, "but I have nothing to fear."

In this he was mistaken. The remarks of her aunt had awakened Cecelia's pride, and as the sentiments with which she regarded Melmond had not yet settled down into that absorbing passion which alike veils the faults of its object and the excellencies of every rival claimant, her mind was in a situation to be influenced by the peculiar charm of Parkman's conversation and manners. That evening settled Melmond's fate. The weight had been thrown into the hitherto wavering balance, and it had preponderated in Parkman's favor. In a little more than a week, he was Cecelia's accepted lover. Melmond, who had felt for her as lively a regard as it was possible for one so incorrigibly indolent and thoroughly selfish to feel for any person but himself, deeply regretted that he had not taken Sheldon's advice. What added poignancy to his regret was, that in addition to her beauty, and many amiable qualities, she was in possession of a fortune of at least fifty thousand dollars. He had seldom, if ever, been so painfully agitated as when he was first apprised of Parkman's success; but the acuteness of his feelings was rapidly subsiding under the sedative influence of a cigar, when it occurred to him that he had never fulfilled the promise he made his aunt Ellis in reference to obtaining better security to his property.

"I will," said he to himself, "certainly call on Mr. Blakeney the first thing I do in the morning.—We can talk the matter over, if we do no more; and as he always has been esteemed an honorable man, I dare say he will tell me, if he thinks all is not right."

He had just come to this consolatory conclusion, when his old friend, Sheldon, entered the apartment. There was that kind of melancholy gravity in his countenance and demeanor which seemed to indicate that he was the bearer of evil tidings.

"Is not the principal part of your property in the hands of Blakeney?" he enquired.

"It is," replied Melmond; "and just before you came in, I was thinking I should take the advice which a careful aunt of mine came twenty miles before breakfast to give me, and obtain more substantial security for it than I have at present."

"It is too late," said Sheldon; "he has failed for an immense sum, and will not, it is said, pay a cent on a dollar."

Melmond started to his feet, dashed his cigar behind the grate, and clasped his hands together with the action of one who was for the moment, at least, thoroughly aroused from his habitual supineness.

"Are you sure of what you tell me?" he at length asked.

"I am. I would not call on you till I had fully ascertained its truth."

"I am a beggar, then."

"What, with your health and strength?" said Sheldon, "and with, I doubt not, half a dozen talents done up in a napkin, which will come to light, if you only take the pains to hunt for them?"

"I can do nothing," replied Melmond, in a voice of despair. "Health and strength are of no more consequence to me than they would be to a child."

"You are altogether mistaken," said Sheldon. I should not wonder if this change in your fortune should ultimately prove conducive to your happiness; for, to make use of the remark of a writer, who has made human nature a study, I think your indolence is rather the vis inertiæ that often attends genius, than the ordinary listlessness or aversion to labor, that marks little minds. Did you not, at one time, have thoughts of studying law?"

"I did. It was my father's wish that I should, but I have kept delaying it, with the idea that there was time enough yet. On the contrary, it is now too late."

Sheldon, before he left him, did his best to convince him that it is never too late to make proper exertions. Imaginary obstacles had melted away before the arguments of his friend, only to give place to those which were real. Upon investigation, he found that all the property he could command in the world, would barely suffice to pay his debts, leaving him entirely without the means of subsistence, during the long period it would take for him to acquire a profession. He was alone prevented from sinking into despair by the unavoidable exertion required by the change in his circumstances, for as it was impossible for him to any longer support his present establishment, he was obliged to offer the costly furniture for sale, and give up the magnificent suite of apartments where he had, for two years, lived in the ease and splendor of an Eastern prince. His task was at length completed, and he sat down by the fire in his dressing-chamber, in the only remaining chair, to spend his last evening previous to occupying more humble lodgings. The naked floor, which had been covered by a Turkey carpet of the most gorgeous hues, and the bare walls, despoiled of their mirrors and richly tinted pictures, either from the pencils of the old masters, or ably executed copies, gave a desolate aspect to the apartment, and tended to deepen the gloom of his mind. In the morning he was to remove to a cheap boarding-house, and even there he could not long remain, unless he could find some employment for many of those hours which ought to be devoted to relaxation or repose. Through the friendly interference of Sheldon, he gained admission into the office of one of the most eminent lawyers in the city. Much to his own surprise, he soon began to feel confidence in himself, and to experience a great accession of spirits, while his energy ever seemed to be in proportion to the necessary exertion demanded for the accomplishment of whatever object he had in view. Compelled to withdraw from the society of the fashionable and gay, he never saw Cecelia Laurens except at church. Her beauty and grace seemed, if possible, to increase every time he beheld her, and he could not help wondering at the apathy with which he had regarded her, as long as she seemed attainable. Yet it was doubtless better as it was, so he tried to make himself think, as the demands on his time and attention were too engrossing to suffer them to be diverted to any other object. He heard nothing from Mrs. Ellis, his aunt, and he forbore to appriza her of the loss of his property, as it could only give her pain, and would, he was afraid, draw from her a severe lecture for neglecting to fulfil his promise to her. He little knew with what earnest solicitude she regarded him, or he would not have imagined that she remained ignorant of what had happened. She was delighted to find, now that necessity had thrown him upon his own resources, that he improved them with a diligence and vigor of which she had thought him wholly incapable. But, for the present, she determined not to extend to him a helping hand. She felt that it would be injudicious to throw in his way any alleviation, before his habits of industry were established, as it might cause him to relax his exertions.

Melmond soon found that the rugged path he had chosen, abounded in sunny nooks and flowery recesses, which, as they generally greeted him unexpectedly, afforded the keener enjoyment. Yet he still pressed forward towards the glittering "pinnacles of fame" that rose in the distance, even while he bathed his brow in the sunshine, and plucked the flowers at his feet. While his fancy and imagination were kindled by the eloquence of the declaimer, his emulation was excited by the assidious labor and perseverance of those who excelled in the severer and less showy branches of the profession he had chosen. The deeper he drank of the waters of Helicon, the sweeter they were to his taste.

When he felt confident that he had fully conquered his habits of indolence, he wrote to his aunt Ellis. He mentioned his loss of property as a fortunate circumstance, as he had, he said, enjoyed more real happiness since he had been employed, than during the whole of the time he spent in idleness.

"I rise early," he added, "study hard all day, and post books, by which I earn enough to pay my board, in the evening. I find exercise in walking from the office to my boarding house, which I purposely selected nearly a mile distant."

His aunt immediately answered his letter, and while she encouraged him to persevere, she forbore to upbraid him for his negligence in not attending to her advice. After she had concluded her letter, she felt a strong desire to add by way of postscript, that if he at any time found himself in want of money, to apply to her. Upon reflection, however, she forbore, and hastily enclosing a small sum, she sealed her letter, lest the temptation of offering her assistance, should grow too strong to be resisted. In one year from the time he commenced his forensic studies, she paid him a visit, and found him so earnest and devoted a student, that she was convinced that nothing would tempt him to relapse into his former idle habits. Though he made no complaint relative to his pecuniary embarrassments, she believed that she might now safely take measures to render him efficient aid. Before parting with him, she exacted from him a promise to spend Christmas with her, which was then near at hand.

On Christmas morning, Melmond rose long before sunrise, and put on what a year previous had been a fashionable and very elegant dress suit of black, and by the time the sun was fairly above the horizon, he was seated in a sleigh, passing swiftly over the hard beaten snow-path, to the merry jingle of bells. His aunt had told him that she should delay her breakfast for him one hour. He arrived exactly in season, for by the time he had divested himself of his overcoat, and held his somewhat benumbed hands to the fire till he felt the blood tingle his fingers, the hot coffee was diffusing its fragrance through the apartment, and various edibles, prepared in the nicest manner, under the immediate superintendence of Mrs. Ellis, were smoking on the board. He perceived that the table was laid for three, and just as they were ready to seat themselves, a fair blue-eyed girl, her complexion brightened with a color delicate as the rose-tint that tinges the snowy cloud, with a profusion of pale gold hair, entered the apartment. Mrs. Ellis introduced her by the name of Clara Mervyn, and gave Melmond to understand that she was the daughter of a particular and very estimable friend.

Several persons of both sexes, near Melmond's age, had been invited to partake of the dinner, which embraced all the essentials of a true Christmas dinner, to which were added a variety of dainties of a lighter and more delicate kind, which did great credit to the culinary skill of Mrs. Ellis and her assistants. It was the first holiday Melmond had spent since the loss of his property, and he could not help comparing the zest with which he entered into its simple enjoyments, to the apathy with which he formerly witnessed the most exciting amusements, frequently purchased at great expense.

The ensuing morning, when he was ready to leave, his aunt put a letter into his hand, directed to himself. On opening it, after his return home, he found that it contained a sum of money sufficient to defray all necessary expenses for a number of months, much good advice, and a closely written page, from which the following is an extract:

"A short time before your father's decease, being afraid that you would not have the energy and perseverance to study a profession, he placed in my care a certain sum, to be held in trust for your benefit, in case of any unfortunate change in your fortune. This sum, at the rate of six per cent interest, will, I find on computation, amount to about ten thousand dollars by the time you have completed your studies, provided you are not obliged to appropriate any part of it previous to that time. I should have informed you of this the moment I heard of your loss, had I not thought it best for you to have nothing to depend on but your own exertions. The result has, I think, proved that I was right. You have shown yourself equal to conquering greater difficulties than you will again be likely to meet, should your health continue good. Go on and prosper. I would just mention that Clara Mervyn will for some time remain with me. She is a very amiable girl, and has received the right kind of education. She has, moreover, recently received a present of twenty thousand dollars from an uncle, who is a bachelor, and has lately returned from a sojourn of eight or ten years in China, where he accumulated a large fortune."

This allusion to Clara Mervyn, who had been the principal theme of his musings during his drive home, gave him a secret pleasure for which he could not account, as he had long since concluded in his own mind, that it would be impossible for a person who had ever known and admired Cecelia Laurens, to regard any other lady with sentiments warmer than those of friendship. When he came to draw a comparison between them, he could see no reason why jet-black eyes should be considered lovelier than those which in color resembled a sunny sky in June, nor why raven tresses should be more beautiful than golden ones. Neither, on reflection, did he think that regular features were at all necessary to render a countenance perfectly agreeable. On the contrary, he thought it rather detracted from a certain piquancy which threw an indescribable charm over the countenance of Clara. If common report had always said that Cecelia was amiable, his aunt, in whom he had much greater confidence than in common report, had told him that Clara was likewise amiable. What then prevented her from being equal, if not superior, to Miss Laurens?

As spring advanced, he began to feel impatient that his aunt, who now wrote to him regularly, did not invite him to spend a day with her, now that the fields began to look green, and the trees were almost ready to bloom. She could not help knowing that the country must be particularly refreshing at such a season, to one who had for so long a time been pent up in the close and noisy city. He had a great mind to go without an invitation, but he did not, and at length his aunt invited him to come some early day in June, as Clara, who had been absent a number of weeks, would then be with her.

After this visit, he never entertained a doubt but that Clara was superior to Cecelia, and though he refrained from making any formal declaration of his passion, each felt sure of the other's regard. It was not until he had for some time been admitted as a member of the bar, and there was a prospect of his taking a high stand among his brother practitioners, that he became her acknowledged suitor.

THE

NAMELESS GRAVE.

A Tale of Mount Auburn.

BY EDWARD WEBSTER.

There is no lovelier spot in the world for the repose of the dead, or one more calculated, by the calm majesty of nature, to soothe the troubled spirits of the living, than the cemetery of Mount Auburn, in the vicinity of Boston. Away from the smoke, and dust, and tumult of the city, and surrounded by influences that tend to tranquilize the stormy passions, and to call forth the purer and holier emotions of the human heart, no one can visit it without reflecting upon the vanity of human greatness, and feeling a keener sense of the mutability of all earthly things. The silent but awful admonition of the sleeping multitude, brings home the solemn truth with greater weight, that urge on the car of life which way we will, the grave must be its goal at last. Accompanied by a female friend, who was making the tour of the eastern cities, in the fall of 18—, I visited this lovely spot. Some relatives in the city, who were well acquainted with the location of the ground, as well as with all the interesting places connected with our Revolutionary history, and who had pointed out to us, during our frequent rambles, many spots familiar to us in story, but which we had never seen, were our companions. The day was a delightful one, and we felt a relief as we left behind the dense atmosphere of a crowd, and inhaled the purer breezes of the country air. We wandered round the grounds for several hours, examining the monuments erected by the living, as last tokens of respect and love to departed friends.

"Here," said our city friends, as they led us to a plain grey slab, "is a grave that has caused much speculation, and excited a great deal of curiosity. It bears no name or date. The person was supposed to have been a lady, but no one knows from whence she was brought, or who she was. The initials upon the stone do not correspond with the name registered upon the books of the corporation, and the inference is that she has been buried under an assumed name. The authorities say that a person in appearance about thirty years of age, but pale and wan as if deep grief was preying at his heart, came one day to the office and purchased a spot for a grave. He only said that the body should be brought next day at two o'clock. At the hour appointed, a hearse drove up to the entrance of the ground, accompanied by a single carriage, containing the gentleman alone who had purchased the grave. It had been prepared as directed, by the laborers connected with the ground; and after the body had been deposited in its last resting place, this tablet, which a carman brought from the city, was placed over it. The gentleman gazed upon the proceedings with folded arms and lip compressed, that told plainly the agony he felt; but no tear bedewed his cheek—no groan escaped his breast. When the last green turf had been replaced around the slab, and the workmen were gathering their implements to depart, he started as if a sudden pang shot through his heart, and exclaimed: 'Oh, God! what more is left for me on earth.' Then recovering himself with quivering lip, he said to the men who had filled the grave, 'I thank you, gentlemen, for your aid;' and giving them a sovereign in addition to their fee, he waived an adieu wildly with his hand, entered the carriage hastily, and drove away. No one that we know of has seen him since, and the mystery of this grave will probably remain unsolved; but the story circulates among the young, that it is the resting place of some one who fell a victim at the shrine of love; and lovers, as they meet around it, renew their solemn pledges to each other, and breathe an inward prayer that their affections may have a happier issue."

We read the inscription upon the stone. It was a simple verse, but full of sentiment:

"She lived unknown, and few could know
When Mary ceased to be;
But she is in her grave, and oh!
The difference to me!"

Various comments were made upon the subject by our party, and after having sufficiently indulged our curiosity, and hazarded our speculations, we turned away. As we were departing, a man of gentlemanly appearance approached us. He was at the period of life that might almost be called old age, but with weather-beaten countenance, and iron-like frame, that showed his life had been spent amidst scenes of activity and danger. He enquired if we could inform him where a grave was to be found which, by the description, we knew to be the one we had just left. We pointed it out to him. He approached it, and as his eye rested upon the stone,

"Poor broken heart," he said, "your partner sleeps in the bosom of a Western prairie, but your spirits, I trust, have met in Heaven."

We asked him if he knew the history of "The Nameless Grave."

"I learned it from the lips of him who laid her here," he replied, "and I myself closed his eyes in the Western wilderness, far away from the home of his fathers."

We requested him to relate the story to us, telling him of the many speculations indulged in by those who visited the spot, and our desire to know its history.

"I am wearied with rambling," the stranger rejoined, "and if you have an hour to spare, we will rest ourselves in the shade of this old oak, whilst I tell you all I know respecting it. In doing so, it will be necessary first to give you something of my own history, and the manner of my acquaintance with the individual who related the circumstances.

"I am a New Englander by birth, and was originally a clerk in the establishment of one of our distinguished Boston merchants, long since dead. Being faithful to my employer, and winning the confidence of the mercantile community with whom he dealt, I entered early into business as a shipper on my own account. Although possessing little more than an unsullied reputation, by careful attention to business I was rapidly amassing a fortune, when the embargo previous to the commencement of the last war, and the subsequent disasters to our commerce, blighted all my expectations, and reduced me to bankruptcy. My old employer, from his own pecuniary embarrassment, was unable to afford me aid, although he would willingly have done so, had it been in his power. So, giving up the hope of repairing my shattered fortunes there, I bade farewell to my native city, and started for the West.

"All the Western States, except a narrow belt along the chain of the Great Lakes, was a wilderness, and inhabited by Indians, for the most part hostile to Americans. I engaged in the fur trade, and have continued in it up to the present time. As the Western States began to fill with emigrants, the trade advanced in the same direction, until an expedition has lately extended beyond the Rocky Mountains; but it is now almost broken up by a foreign Company, that wields a mighty moneyed power, prejudices the natives against us, and by an unequal competition drives us from our just rights, and the soil of our own territory. A few seasons since, our company were making preparations for more extensive operations than we had made before; the unusual success of the previous expedition having furnished us with the means of doing so. Men were enlisted, ammunition and stores laid in for a long and hazardous excursion. As we were about setting out, an individual accosted us, and asked permission to join the expedition. He was noble in his appearance, and in the prime of life; but deep melancholy was upon his brow, and an occasional wildness would gleam from his eye, that told us reason was half unsettled from its throne. He asked no pay, he said; he only wished to engage in some exciting employment, to drive away mad thoughts; and he beat his clenched fist against his brow, uttering an involuntary groan. We told him our complement of men was full, but as he wished to join, we would furnish him with arms and provision like the rest; that in return he should occasionally aid us in making purchases of the Indians and resident trappers, and if necessary lend his services as a soldier. He readily assented to the conditions, and set out with us. Our expedition was a long and dangerous one. We travelled over the Rocky Mountains to the head waters of the Columbia, where American traders had rarely been before. But the Indians were prejudiced against us by the agents of the British Company, and several times manifested a hostile spirit; but the strength of our party, and the cautiousness of all our movements, gave them no opportunity for surprising us. The individual who joined us was a most efficient member of our corps; no dangerous enterprise was set on foot in which he was not the first to volunteer. He seemed wearied of life, and cared not how soon he might be relieved of its burden. A mystery hung about him that our party strove to penetrate in vain. He talked but little, and never revealed his name to any one; but still he was kind and generous; and the deep sorrow that seemed eating at his heart, won the friendship and sympathy of all. And whenever 'The Stranger,' as he was called, happened to be mentioned, the wild, boisterous recklessness of the hardy backwoodsmen would soften down, and they would speak of him in tones of unwonted sadness.

"We had finished our trading operations about the commencement of Autumn, and had commenced our return march with our heavy wagons loaded with packages of buffalo robes and beaver skins, and other peltries. We had conducted all our movements with the greatest caution, and got far back in safety towards the settlements. For some days previous, however, we had observed straggling Indians hanging about our line of march, seeming to observe our movements. We avoided the woods, keeping as much as possible upon the open prairie. One day's march more would have brought us within the protection of the American outposts, and aware that the enemy (for we had no doubt that one was hovering around) would attack us that night if at all, we formed our baggage wagons into a circle, placed packages of buffalo skins within, as a protection against bullets, and having gathered forage from the prairie for our horses, we placed vigilant sentinels upon all sides, and laid down upon our arms. The night had nearly passed, and the first faint streakings of the dawn were making their appearance in the east, when an onset was commenced by the savage foe. Quick as lightning we were upon foot, dealing death upon them from within our camp.

"The Indians evidently did not anticipate so ready a reception, and after two or three desperate attempts to break into our enclosure, they retired, dragging away their dead and wounded. Their being no fire within our camp, the enemy could only see to shoot by the uncertain flashes of the guns; and as we were protected by a breastwork impenetrable to a musket ball, only two or three of our men were wounded and some of our horses killed. Within eighty yards of us, a portion of the prairie was overgrown with weeds and high grass, in which the Indians concealed themselves as it grew light, and from which they kept up a scattering fire upon our camp. We attempted to dislodge them by shooting at the places from whence the smoke arose, but a breeze that was blowing transversely across the place so dispersed it, as to render our aim uncertain; and, what was worse, our ammunition began to fail, for we had bartered away more than we had been aware of in our summer's traffic. It was therefore determined not to fire unless sure of our mark, and consequently the firing almost ceased on our part.—The day wore on until it became evident that the enemy intended to hold their position until nightfall, and then, under the cover of darkness, attempt to carry our camp.

"'They must be dislodged in some way before night,' said an old hunter, 'or our scalps will not keep their places another day. We must make an assault upon them and drive them from their skulking place. Some of us will fall no doubt; but it is better so than all to stay here and be shot down like dogs.'

"A consultation was held as to the best way of making the assault. We were all armed with rifles, and had no bayonets, a weapon almost indispensable for an attack of the kind we meditated; but there seemed no alternative, and we resolved to make the attempt. It was agreed upon to reserve our fire until the enemy could be seen; and then, after the first discharge, to meet them with their own weapon, the hatchet. All preparations had been completed, and we were about to sally forth, when the stranger offered to set the grass on fire in which the Indians were concealed. All stopped short, and looked at him in surprise. We, who had seen before the headlong fury of the flame driven by the wind over the dry and withered grass of the prairie, knew full well, if it was practicable, that the enemy would be scattered like the leaves of the forest before the blasts of Autumn; but the utter madness of the attempt made the stoutest heart shrink back; for though certain death awaited some of us if we made an onset in a body, yet each rather chose to run his chance of life, where probably a majority might escape unharmed, than to rush alone and single-handed upon inevitable death. We pointed out to him the madness of the attempt.

"'I comprehend the danger perfectly,' he said, 'and am prepared to meet it. If we make an onset in a body, more lives than one will be sacrificed, with a less prospect of success. You all have something to live and to hope for;—my dreams of earthly happiness are done, and I have long desired to find quiet—in the grave. If by sacrificing my life I can ensure the safety of you all, I would wrap the winding sheet about me as cheerfully as the drapery of a couch.'

"We endeavored to dissuade him from the undertaking, for we loved him like a brother, and all would willingly have encountered any danger in common, rather than by his destruction to be ensured of the safety of the whole party; but he remained steadfast to his purpose.

"'Do you all endeavor to cover me as much as possible by your fire: for though I do not expect to escape, yet if I do not succeed in setting the grass on fire, my life will be thrown away, and you remain in the same peril as before. Besides,' he added, 'I had rather not have my body mutilated by the Indian knife.'

"We held our breath in suspense as he rushed forth from the enclosure waiving his flaming torch above his head. The enemy seemed to comprehend the movement in an instant, for a half suppressed yell broke forth from their hiding place, followed by a general discharge. Still he kept on, apparently unharmed, to within a dozen paces of the spot where he intended to apply the match, and then staggering a step or two, fell forward to the earth. An Indian sprang from his hiding place, and brandishing his scalping knife above his head, rushed toward him—but he had scarcely left his covert when a discharge of rifles from our men pierced him with half a dozen balls, and bounding into the air with a yell, he fell headlong by the side of his prostrate foe. His sudden fall seemed to stagger the Indians for a moment; and at that time our hero raised himself upon his feet, drew his hands across his brow, as if to clear his vision, and then waiving his torch again for an instant, sped on, and dashed it into the dry and withered grass.

"Quick as lightning, the flames leaped up, swayed back and forward for an instant, with an uncertain motion, and then swept off over the prairie with the speed of the wind. The savages gave forth a yell of mingled rage and disappointment, and when the smoke cleared away, were seen with scorched and half-naked bodies making off across the plain. Several of our party went out to meet the returning hero, and brought him into the camp.

"'I have received my death wound,' he observed, 'but I am not sorry. You have treated me with kindness, and I leave you all my blessing. You have more than once manifested a desire to learn the story of my life. I will tell it to you now—but first try to stop the flow of blood for a time, that it may not rob me of my breath before you have heard me out! The wound is here,' he continued, laying his hand upon his breast.

"We removed the clothing from the place. The blood was flowing freely from the wound, and it was plain that though his life might be prolonged for a few hours, his mortal race was well nigh run. All the aid that could be, was afforded to the sufferer.—We staunched the blood as well as we were able; gave him some water, which he desired, and placing him upon a couch, formed from dry grass of the prairie, overspread with a buffalo robe, he began the story of his life.

* * * * * *

"My father was a farmer of considerable property in England, and held a life-lease of a productive and valuable farm. I was his only son. It was his intention to rear me to the same occupation, and until fifteen years of age, I lived at home. Our landlord, a man of enlightened and liberal views himself, believing that an enlightened tenantry were happier amongst themselves, and more profitable to the proprietor, exerted himself to afford the means of education to the children, and to diffuse general knowledge amongst them as much as possible.

"From my first commencement as a pupil, an earnest desire to acquire an education took possession of my mind; and in a very few years I became master of all the branches taught in the common school. I then solicited my father's permission to attend a grammar school kept in a neighboring village, for the purpose of acquiring the rudiments of a classical education. He refused me for a long time, saying my education was sufficient for the station I was designed to fill; but at length, finding my heart set upon it, he yielded his consent. That was a joyful day to me; and a vision of future greatness danced before my eyes and mingled with my dreams.

"With the humble wardrobe of a peasant's son, I set out to place myself under the instruction of a clergyman, who had charge of the sons of the gentlemen residing in the vicinity, preparing themselves for college. It was a new thing to have the son of a yeoman mingling with them in the higher branches of learning, and they looked upon me with no favor; but the instructor, a man of honor and liberality, would not permit them to treat me with the rudeness they desired.

"After undergoing a satisfactory examination, I entered upon my studies, and in a short time, notwithstanding the contempt with which my classmates had regarded me at first, I stood before them all. In two years time, I was prepared to enter college. It was no very difficult task, after having obtained my father's consent to enter the grammar school, to prevail upon him to let me pursue my studies, backed as I was by the recommendation of my teacher.

"'But,' said he, 'I see plain enough it will spoil you for a farmer, and I fear the little I have saved by toil, will be squandered by you in endeavoring to keep up the appearance of a gentleman.'"

"His scruples, however, being overcome at last, I entered upon my collegiate course. It is unnecessary to dwell upon this portion of my life. My means were not sufficient to enable me to mingle much in the expensive pleasures of my fellow students, and as a compensation, I applied myself more diligently to my studies. At the end of the course it proved no loss—for it resulted with us as it ever will: that those who spend most time in idleness and dissipation, hold the lowest place in the rank of scholars.

"After having obtained a degree, I determined to enter upon the study of the law, and went to the metropolis for that purpose. There was at that time a distinguished lawyer practising in the English courts, who, by superior powers of mind and indefatigable exertions, had raised himself from obscurity as low as mine. He had been knighted by George the Fourth, and had held under him an important post in the British Cabinet. I made application to him, and shewed my credentials from the University. He questioned me with vigorous severity, and being satisfied, consented to my studying with him.

"It was stipulated that after the first year, a small salary should be allowed me in addition to his instruction, for various services he might wish me to perform. Though in many respects a man of fine feelings, ambition had become his God; the pursuit of fame and the enrollment of his name amongst the aristocracy of the realm, the all-absorbing purpose of his soul. He had bent all the energies of his nature, and made all the prospects of earthly happiness subservient to the attainment of this end. He had married the younger daughter of a nobleman of distinguished family but decayed fortune, and though her dowry was small, her connection was in every respect honorable and herself worthy of his love.—Nevertheless his own success as a professional man, aided by the liberal salaries he had received in several lucrative public offices, yielded him in the course of a few years, a handsome private fortune. His wife possessed all the traits a man could hope or expect to find in woman: kind, benevolent, and pure: and during her life exerted an influence over him like that of a guardian spirit. I need not say he loved her with devoted tenderness—but she died during her period of greatest usefulness, leaving him a widower with a daughter two years old.

"After the shock of his bereavement had passed away, he seemed to renew his favorite pursuit with increased intensity, and the end of his ambitious views were centred in his child. He attended most carefully to her education, and she was every way worthy of his care. She was not the most beautiful girl I have ever seen, but sufficiently so to attract attention at first sight; and her fascinating manners, intellectual and moral excellence, won the admiration and love of all who made her acquaintance. I was in my twenty-second year when I commenced the study of the law, and she at that time was nearly seventeen.

"It happened that I called at the residence of Sir John Temple, for that was her father's name, to settle some preliminaries upon the morning of my entrance as a student in his office, and was shewn in by a servant: who, saying that his master would be in soon, left me alone in the drawing-room. Whilst waiting there, his daughter came in. She evidently did not know that any one was present, for she was bearing a vase of flowers; her bonnet was thrown carelessly back, and her rich and flowing tresses were waiving loosely about her snow-white neck.—She was somewhat confused at first, but recovering herself, and placing the vase upon the marble mantel-piece, she saluted me, and removing her bonnet, took a seat. I told her I had called to see Sir John. She replied that he was in his library; that she had heard the servant announce my name, and supposed I had been shown up. I answered that the servant said he was engaged for a short time, but would soon be down. We conversed for a few moments before Sir John came in.

"I had mingled very little in society, and had but few opportunities of conversing with females of rank and education, but I had formed for myself an ideal image of womanly grace, and I felt in that short time, that all my imaginings were more than realized in her. Sir John coming in, interrupted our conversation, and his daughter, for from a personal resemblance I was convinced that she was such, immediately retired.

"The preliminaries were soon arranged, and I entered upon the long and trying study of the law. For a year or two I was called but rarely from my duties in the office, but as I began to master the mysteries of the profession, I was occasionally employed to execute important legal transactions; and as a consequence, sometimes consulted Sir John at his own house. His daughter had in the meantime completed her education, and was mistress of her father's mansion. I was necessarily thrown into her society, and I need not say that she made a deep impression upon my mind.

"Sir John's cares and business did not permit him to mingle much in fashionable society, and the retiring and reflective mind of the daughter induced her to follow his example in this respect. Still, an heiress and daughter of so distinguished a man could not remain unknown; and many schemes were set on foot by fortune-hunters to obtain the prize. Sir John imagining his daughter's happiness would be secured, and his own ambitious views realized by obtaining for her a name and rank, looked to gaining a titled suitor to her hand. Oh! how fatally, as many fathers have done before, did he mistake the happiness of his child!

"There was a young nobleman, by the name of Alfred ———, who graduated in the same class with myself. He was a wild and reckless student whilst he was in college: of little moral principle, and often conducted himself so disgracefully, that had it not been for family influences, he would have been expelled. Immediately after his college course was ended, being allowed free reins by the death of his father, and the acquisition of the paternal estate, he, in a short time, by gaming and other extravagancies, deeply embarrassed his pecuniary affairs.

"Finding at length that he had almost irretrievably ruined his fortunes, he suddenly pretended reform, dismissed his worthless associates, and looked around for the purpose of relieving his embarrassments by a matrimonial alliance. The daughter of the eminent barrister, Sir John Temple, was regarded as affording an excellent opportunity for that purpose; for, although his wealth was large, common report had magnified it, and the known ambition of the father, he was convinced, would second his suit. Accordingly he opened a negotiation with Sir John, who overcame his scruples of moral delinquences by testimonials of reform—for, with ambitious fathers, titles cover a multitude of sins—and obtained his consent to address his daughter. This having been accomplished, he waited upon her with the greatest confidence of success, and offered himself a suitor for her hand. His character was not unknown to her, and he was the last one whose addresses she would have favored; consequently, although she endeavored to do so without wounding his pride, she firmly declined his offer.

"Chagrined beyond measure by his unexpected repulse, he resolved to gain his end or be revenged. He waited upon her father, reported his ill success, and declared that some villain unknown to them had stolen her affections. Sir John, naturally irritable, and soured in his disposition by a recent defeat in the acquisition of some political honor on which he had set his heart, was exasperated against his daughter. He pledged the nobleman that she should become his wife—and returning home in a state of excitement, he accused her of receiving the addresses of some suitor without his knowledge; at the same time forbidding her to see him, whoever he might be, and commanding her to receive as a suitor the nobleman she had so lately refused.

"She denied the accusation alleged against her, and plead with tears, by the love he bore her mother, not to compel her to receive the addresses of a man whose moral character she detested—declaring that she had rather endure a life of poverty and want; and lie down alone in an unhonored grave, than to tread the marble halls of wealth, the wife of a libertine and a wretch.

"Her father was softened by the appeal, and promised to give her time to reflect. Meanwhile, my probation as a law student was rapidly drawing to a close. My calls at Sir John's house on professional business became more frequent, and I was happy in finding an excuse for doing so; for though I had not even made the confession to myself, his lovely daughter had made a deep impression upon my mind.—Strange as it may seem, Sir John had never suspected such might be the result, and I was permitted to mingle in the society of his daughter frequently, although it might easily have been seen that it was at the hazard of both her peace and my own. But I was a student, of no family, and poor; she the daughter of a man high in the estimation of all distinguished men—and, viewing the disparity between us, he did not dream it would be forgotten by his young and ardent child.

"The season passed away, and at the sitting of the court I was admitted to the bar. Sir John was deeply engaged in another political contest, and having confidence in my legal knowledge, he entrusted to me the management of an important suit, with the advantage of its fees in case of a successful termination. Most laboriously did I prepare myself for the trial, knowing well that success at the outset is all important to a prosperous professional career. The opposing counsel, when they learned who was to manage the suit, did not make even the usual preparations, thinking a young practitioner could easily be led astray, and confounded, amidst the intricacies of the law; consequently they were thrown completely off their guard, and the result was a signal triumph on my part. I now considered my career as fairly begun, for two more cases were put into my hands before leaving the court; and in high spirits I called upon Sir John. He was not at home, but his daughter received and congratulated me upon my success. I was gratified that she was sufficiently interested to learn the result so soon; and taking courage from the circumstance, without thinking to consult her father, as I ought to have done first, I unhesitatingly declared my love, entreating her not to think me presumptive, but to give me hope, upon the achievement of professional eminence, to obtain a return of her affections. She was greatly agitated at my declaration, confessed the deep impression I had made upon her heart, but told me of her father's determination to marry her to the nobleman of whom we have spoken before.

"'My God!' I exclaimed, 'will he consign you over to such a wretch?'

"'I will never consent,' she answered. 'I have told my father I had rather die. Although I am pledged to receive the addresses of no one but him, yet I will live single for your sake.' And she raised her eyes to mine with a look of confidence and affection, that thrilled my inmost soul, and impelled me irresistibly to clasp her to my heart.

"At that instant Sir John entered the room. A sudden suspicion, that I was the cause of Count Alfred's rejection, flashed across his mind like lightning, and his face was pale with rage.

"'Daughter! to your room!' he said; and she hastened away, overcome with confusion.

"'And now, young man, this is the way you have repaid my kindness! You have entered my house, and like a viper stung the bosom that warmed you into life! This accounts for her dislike to my choice of Count Alfred, but I swear he shall have her now, or I'll banish her from my house forever.'

"I plead with him—plead as I would not have done for my own life. I deprecated his anger, not on my own account, but hers. God knows, if it had been for me alone, I would have given him taunt for taunt. He forbade me his house. I rented an office immediately, and commenced the practice of my profession. Although I executed faithfully whatever was entrusted to my care, and though my business slowly increased, yet my anxiety of mind for the fate of Mary Temple, did not permit me to take that active position necessary to ensure success. Rumor began to be rife that Count Alfred was to be married soon to the daughter of Sir John Temple; and driven almost to madness, I bribed a servant of the family to convey a letter to her. I besought her to tell me truly if the rumor of her union with the Count was unfounded. He brought back an answer the next day, stating that her father had endeavored to coerce her into the hated match, but though she would willingly undergo almost any suffering to gratify him, in this she felt she could never yield. The letter was blotted with tears, and closed by pledging eternal faithfulness to me. I wrote again, begging an interview with her, and sent it back by the servant. As chance would have it, Count Alfred came round the corner of the street just as the servant was leaving my office, and suspecting some plot, passed back unseen, where, waiting till the menial came up, he took him into a private room in a hotel near by, and partly by promises, and partly by threats, obtained possession of the letter. Then bidding him wait below until he called, he melted the wax before the grate, opened and read the epistle; then sealing it anew, he called the servant, and giving him a sovereign, bade him when he returned with an answer to call again. The servant did as directed; and after the Count had read this as he had done the former one, he sent it on to me. Mary stated in her letter that she had yielded, with many doubts of its propriety, to my request; that she would see me once more, since our parting had been so sudden, at a bower in her father's garden, that night, at twelve, and then she must bid me farewell, perhaps forever. In the mean time, Count Alfred called upon Sir John, and revealed to him the secret of our meeting, inventing a falsehood to cover the meanness by which he had obtained his information, and declaring that we were frequently in the habit of meeting clandestinely.

"'If what you say is true,' Sir John replied, in a passion, 'she shall never enter my halls again. I will disown her before the world, and cut her off with a shilling!'

"'You will be convinced to-night,' rejoined the Count.

"We met at the hour appointed. The calm, full moon was shining through the lattice-work of the bower, her silver rays glistening in the dew-drops that sparkled like so many diamonds amidst the foliage of grape and honeysuckle that twined around it, as I pressed the maiden to my heart, forgetful of every thing but the bliss of the moment. It was a tearful meeting on her part. The thought of the risk of reputation that she ran, and the disobedience of her father's mandate, preyed upon her mind. We were engaged in a whispered consultation, and vows of eternal constancy to each other, when two shadows passed before the entrance to the bower, and looking up, we beheld Sir John and Count Alfred standing before us. The rays of the moon fell directly upon their faces. That of the Count was lit up with a smiles of gratified malice; that of Sir John was calm and pale, but the quivering lip and flashing eye betokened the tempest in his soul.

"'Take her!' he said to me, 'but take her with a father's curse! And now begone!—you must not trespass again upon my grounds.'

"'Oh spare me, father!' exclaimed the daughter, sinking upon her knees before him, 'it is my first transgression.'

"'Whom does she call?' enquired Sir John. 'Her father? I am not her father. She is a stranger within my gates. Here, James,' he called to a porter who was attending him, 'thrust these intruders without the portal of the garden.'

"I entreated him to spare his child—declared the fault was mine, and pledged myself to relinquish all my hopes—but it was in vain; Sir John was inexorable. Count Alfred himself approached to bear her out, but I placed myself before him, and drawing a dagger that I happened to have about my person, I bade him approach at his peril. Although armed himself, he shrunk back like a cowed hound, for he was as much a coward as he was a villain.

"But it was useless to linger, and lifting the inanimate form of the lovely girl—for she had fainted—in my arms, I bore her through the portal, which was locked after us. I carried her to a public house which was near at hand, by no means a reputable one; but I thought not of that, for she was in a death-like swoon, and my only thought was to call her back to life. A cordial soon restored her, and she enquired hastily what had been done, and where she was. I told her all.

"'I must see my father in the morning,' she said; 'but if he refuses to recognize me as his daughter?—Oh God! where will this matter end?'

"I persuaded her to rest, adding that I would call upon her father in the morning, and hoped that all might yet be well. She became more calm, and sunk to rest upon the sofa where she had been placed. Nature was completely exhausted—but the working of her countenance showed plainly that her mind was ill at ease. I watched by her couch until the dawn, when she awoke. She seemed a moment lost, but soon collecting her thoughts, she arose and said—

"'I must go home; surely my father cannot be so cruel as to cast me off.'

"I persuaded her to remain until I had first gone and seen Sir John; and having provided her with some refreshments, I hastened away. I rang at his door, and received for answer that he was not at home. I tried to bribe the servant to admit me, but it was in vain; and, with heavy heart, I returned to announce my ill-success.

"'I will go myself,' said she; 'it is not possible that admittance will be denied to me.' And putting on her bonnet, she left the inn.

"My mind was too much agitated to permit me to rest; so leaving the inn after her, I passed down an adjoining street, until I came to a position where I could watch the door of her father's house unseen. From there, I saw her ring. A strange servant answered the summons, and after staring at her for some time in affected wonder, told her that Sir John had gone into the country. She attempted to pass in, but he thrust her back, and shut the door in her face. She tried to open it, but it was locked, and then sitting down on the steps, she gave way to an agony of despair. Persons going by gazed at her, some with curiosity, and some with pity, for they thought her insane. The sight maddened me, and rushing to the spot—

"'Mary,' I said, 'this is no place for you; it is plain that your unfeeling father has cast you off, and on my account. Would to God I had died before bringing this calamity upon your head.'

"'Do not reproach yourself as the cause,' she replied, 'nor make yourself unhappy for another's fault. Count Alfred is the one who has done it all. He is the wretch who has shut a father's house against his child.'

"'Come, then,' I said, 'and whilst Heaven spares my life, you shall not want. I will toil day and night, and esteem it happiness, if I but receive your smile as a reward.'

"We turned from her father's mansion, never to go back. With difficulty I obtained a boarding-place for her in a respectable private family, for the rumor went abroad that I had ruined the lovely daughter of Sir John Temple, and that her father had disowned her in consequence. Rakes and libertines called me a brave fellow, but all honorable men regarded me with indignation. Mary was unwilling to become my wife, fearing it would make the estrangement between her and her father irremediable. Her clothes and jewels had been sent on the following day to the inn where I had carried her at first, but no message accompanied them. She attempted to see her father several times, and wrote many letters, protesting her innocence of the accusation, but all in vain.

"The reports that went abroad prejudicial to my character, ruined my prospects of success in my profession, and clients that had begun to crowd to my office, fell off one by one, until absolute want began to stare me in the face. Many sad consultations were held between Mary and myself, and at length, when all hopes of reconciliation with her friends were at an end, she consented to become my wife, and embark with me for America. The marriage ceremony was solemnly performed by a clergyman of our mother church, and being duly attested, was published to remove the stain that rested upon her character in public estimation. Then, having written a last epistle to her father, in which she sought his forgiveness for any undutiful step she might have taken, we collected the little property remaining to us, and embarked. With tearful eyes we beheld the white cliffs of our native land receding from our view, until all we had held dear in early life sunk below the horizon's verge. But we were left to each other, and we felt that was the greatest happiness of all.

"Eight weeks from the time we left England, our vessel entered the harbor of New York, and moored by one of the wharves on East River. I hastened on shore to seek employment, for my funds were beginning to run low. Bitter disappointment was in store for me; for notwithstanding my professional skill and the long term of study in my native country, I could not be permitted to practice in the higher American courts until I became a citizen, and that required a residence of five years. I next tried to get employment in a mercantile establishment, but the city was crowded with young men from the country, wishing to exchange the quiet labors of agriculture for the dusty and toilsome road of commercial life; and moreover the rascalities that had lately been perpetrated by swindlers from the Old World, caused the mercantile community to regard all foreigners with suspicion. I went back to the vessel unsuccessful, and we disembarked. I rented a small, comfortable house, and managed to pay the rent for two quarters as it came due, but after that we were obliged to change our residence for a couple of rooms in a large building, inhabited by the poorer classes of citizens. Unable to find employment in any business adapted to my abilities and education, I was driven at last to work as a common laborer in the street. Even in this I was unable to find steady employment, and all I could earn in addition to what Mary received from the proceeds of her needle, were scarcely sufficient to furnish the necessaries of life.

"During the long and dreary winter that succeeded, we were obliged to sell one by one the few valuable articles of furniture, &c., that remained to us, until finally my law library, which I had retained until the last, was disposed of for half its value, to save us from hunger and from cold. Thus we passed a year. Mary was always cheerful, and in the deepest hours of my despondency, when adversity seemed closing around with darker folds, her soothing words would quiet my troubled spirit, and inspire me with fresh hope. Yet I could not but note the paleness of her cheek, and a consciousness that sorrow and privation were gnawing at her heart, almost drove me mad. We had no news from home, and as spring came on we resolved to leave New York, and try our fortunes in some of the manufacturing villages of New England. We had proceeded on our way as far as Boston, when the want of funds and the illness of my wife compelled me to stop; and there, in a strange city, penniless and without a friend, we were left in the open street. I obtained a miserable room, and removed our scanty furniture therein. We had not even a crust to eat, and in despair I rushed into the street, and wandered over the city. As I passed up one of the avenues, I encountered a crowd of men engaged elevating the heavy pillars of some building, and almost unconsciously I joined the group. The workmen had spirits furnished for their use, and as they passed around the fatal beverage, I drank deep and madly; and as the shades of evening fell, I crossed the miserable threshold of my sojourning place—for I will not call it home—a drunkard. The cup of my wife's misery was then full. She sank upon the bed, and for the first time gave way to a paroxysm of agony and despair. When I recovered myself in the morning, shame and repentance took possession of my mind. I swore upon my knees beside her bed, that, come what might, I would never touch the fatal cup again; and then hastened out to obtain food and medical attendance for my wife. It happened that the first physician I called upon was a humane man, and when he had heard my story, procured me the necessary articles of food and medicine and went with me. Every provision was made for her comfort, and the physician departed, promising to call again next day. A New York paper that he had in his hat happened to fall out unperceived, and was left upon the floor when he went away.—Glancing over it, my eye fell upon the list of advertised letters, in which were two directed to my wife. I instantly wrote to the postmaster to have them forwarded, and, on the second day after, they came to hand. They were sealed with black, and directed with a strange hand, but bore the impress of her father's arms. I hastily broke the seals and read them to her. The first was written by an attorney, who said he was doing it at the dictation of her father on his dying bed. That Count Alfred, having been injured fatally by a fall from his horse, had, in a moment of remorse, confessed the villainous agency he had in alienating Sir John and his child. That Sir John had become convinced he had done both her and me deep wrong, for which he asked our forgiveness, and bestowed upon us his parting blessing.—That he had made us joint heirs of all his property, and desired us to return immediately and enjoy it. A postscript was added by the attorney, stating that Sir John died soon after the letter was finished. The other was a bill of exchange on New York for a thousand pounds. Mary wept long and bitterly at her father's loss, for despite of his harshness, she loved him with all the fervor of a generous heart, but the recollections of his forgiveness and parting blessing restored her tranquility of spirit. I obtained a discount of the bill at one of the Boston banks, and had her conveyed immediately to as comfortable a place as could be obtained in the city, and the physician who first called upon her, and who was eminent in his profession, continued his attendance; but it was all too late. Consumption, the fiend that never looses his grasp, had fastened upon her, and in six short months laid her to rest in the quiet slumbers of the grave. But her last days were sad to her only at the thought of my bereavement, and she cheered me with the hope of a happier meeting in another world. She sank to rest calmly as the summer sun to its setting, with the certainty of rising another day. I buried her alone in Mount Auburn, under a plain grey slab that bears only the initials of her name, and a simple verse. The name registered upon the books is an assumed one, and none knows the history of her resting place but ourselves. Near the close of her life, she requested the attendance of a legal adviser, acquainted with both American and English law, and in a will which I was desired to open after her death, I was left sole heir to all her father's estates. But I could not receive them; life was bereft of enjoyment, and earth of peace. I bestowed all as a donation upon charitable institutions of my native country, and started for the West. The rest you know already."

His voice faltered as he approached the end of his narrative, and as he ceased speaking, he moved his lips in silent prayer——breathed one sad sigh, and died. Our men were gathered around his couch in breathless attention, their rough natures were completely overcome, and weather-beaten cheeks that had been strangers to a tear for fifty years, received the falling drops like rain. We buried "the stranger" in the bosom of the prairie—fired a parting salute over his grave, for we felt that we were paying honors to a hero who had saved our lives at the expense of his own; then, driving our wagons over his last resting place to keep the Indians from finding and mutilating his remains, we turned away with saddened hearts.

THE ENGLISH COTTAGE.

BY WILLIAM DEAN.

On the brow of yon hill is a neat rural cot,
Whose latch you may lift without fear,
Though its owners partake of obscurity's lot,
True happiness says, "I dwell here."

Then stay your researches for a moment or two,
To contemplate this rustic retreat;
Wherever you turn, you will find something new,
Though 'tis not of grandeur the seat.

What a well-managed garden surrounds the abode!
With what care all its stores are disposed!
Observe on the side that lies nearest the road,
By a neat quickset hedge 'tis enclosed.

The external part of this plain little pile
Attracts every passenger's sight;
And the ivy which climbs in a negligent style,
Has equalled the thatch in its height.

The walls of the cot are a delicate white,
The floor a smooth pavement is made;
On a shelf in the corner, the Christian's delight,
That treasure, the Bible, is laid.

Partly furnished with wicker, and partly with oak,
The tables reflect every face;
And if neatness and taste you desire to invoke,
Resort to this sweet little place.

When the evening comes on, round a cheerful wood fire,
You the happy young circle may see;
The rosy-faced prattlers expecting their sire,
All anxious to sit on his knee.

Soon the mother appears in her dark russet gown,
With a countenance calm and serene;
And seldom or never gives place to a frown,
The sure index of comfort within.

Having stirred up the embers, and swept up the hearth,
The kettle is placed on the fire,
And sweetly amused by her little one's mirth,
She feels but one further desire.

This soon is obtained, for the father draws nigh,
And the youngsters enjoy the fond kiss;
All of whom now most anxiously vie,
To add to the cottager's bliss.

After talking awhile of the Saviour's great love,
And perusing their Bibles with care,
They present their devotions to Jesus above,
In humble thanksgiving and prayer.

Thus with consciences cleansed from guilt and from sin,
They calmly retire to their rest;
Protected without, and true comfort within,
These cottagers surely are blest.

SONG OF THE DYING POET.

BY EDWARD J. PORTER.

This is thy latest song, my lute,
Yet ere its last wild breathings swell,
Ere its lone murmuring tones are mute,
I fain would breathe a fond farewell.
Companion of my earlier hours,
I leave thee, not without a sigh,
Though withered be the blushing flowers
I've crowned thee with in days gone by!

From thee my boyhood's spirit learned
A joy that thou alone could'st fling,
When o'er thy frame the song-wreath burned,
And softness floated from each string.
In vain even then the world put on
Those frowns that hovered round my way;
I swept thy strings—the shades were gone,
Dispelled by joy's bright roseate ray!

Thou'st breathed of love, and rapture came,
So fraught with passion's breath, that all
The senses, wrapt in living flame,
Were held the while in pleasing thrall.
Thou'st whispered to my soul of bliss,
And all was tranquil as the waves,
When winds are hushed, and moonbeams kiss
The gems that sleep in ocean's caves.

Thou'st sung to me in manhood's day,
When sorrow's voice would breathe despair;
Thou'st chased the wearying thoughts away,
That else a withering shade would wear.
Then well may I, with tear-filled eyes,
Companion of my soul! lay by
The frame that lent its sympathies,
The strings that charmed with every sigh.

No more, sweet lute! wilt thou bestow
The raptures once so all thy own;
The hand that wakes thee, falters now,
Its pulses all will soon be flown;
And the lone heart, that thou hast taught
To glow beneath thy gentle spell,
Will soon be hushed; and calm each thought;
Lute of my younger years, farewell!

The Dangers of Coquetry

A SPANISH STORY.

BY THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

There dwelt not a fairer lady in all Castile than Donna Maria d'Alfarache, and although many asserted that she was somewhat too well assured of this fact, it was, nevertheless, an undisputed one, even the envious among her acquaintance, and they were not few, admitting it. Her family, too, was descended from a long race of proud hidalgos.—Many were the suitors for the hand of Donna Maria, who, notwithstanding that she liberally accorded smiles to all, refused to give a preference to any, alleging that he to whom she could confide her destiny had not yet appeared. In vain did each plead his own suit, and as vainly did her father dwell on the high rank, large possessions, and ancient lineage of the separate pretenders, urging her to select one of them for his son-in-law. The fair Donna Maria refused to yield up her liberty, and dealt her smiles so impartially to each, that hope lingered in the breasts of all. In truth, hers was so pleasant a state of life that she felt in no hurry to change it, or sacrifice general admiration and homage for individual love. Having lost her mother while yet in her infancy, she had been placed under the care of Donna Lucretzia Santiago, an aged maiden, of high family, but of fallen fortunes, who enacted the double role of gouvernante and duenna. Donna Lucretzia was a woman of a kind nature, but of weak understanding; who, pleased with her position in the family of Don Alfonso d'Alfarache, in which she enjoyed the advantages of a liberal stipend, a luxuriously-served table, and undisturbed siestas, thought only of securing the continuance of these comforts, and imagined no better mode of effecting this point than that of yelding a ready assent to the wishes of her employer, and a careful avoidance of thwarting those of his daughter. The result may easily be guessed. Donna Maria soon acquired an unbounded influence over her gouvernante, who by turns flattered and coaxed, instead of directing and counselling her pupil. A smile could persuade, or a frown convince the weak-minded Donna Lucretzia of the necessity, if not the prudence, of any measure desired by the young and capricious beauty, who, doted on by her father, and spoilt by her preceptress, exercised a power never yielded with impunity to persons of her youth and inexperience. At length a person appeared, who, though no aspirant for her hand, excited a much more lively interest in her heart than did any of the suitors who had so assiduously sought to please her. Don Guzman d'Izguerdo, a grandee of Spain, of great wealth, and said to be descended from no less a personage than Ruy Dias de Bivar, so celebrated as the Cid, was deemed one of the proudest as well as the noblest men in Spain. He had been previously wedded to a lady of rare beauty and merit, who had died in giving birth to a son; and so great was his grief for her loss that, although six years had elapsed since the sad event, he had never been tempted to break through the resolution he had formed during the first months of his bereavement, of never again entering the pale of wedlock. This determination had become known, and was often commented on in the families of those hidalgo's who would willingly have given him one of their daughters to fill the place of his departed wife. Some declared that Don Guzman could know no second love, while others maintained that, despairing to find so peerless a beauty as her whose loss he still deplored, he had abandoned the notion of giving her a successor, or of placing a step-mother over his son. Donna Maria had heard these reports, and they excited no common interest in her mind. The vanity of which she possessed no ordinary share, whispered that it would be a triumph worthy of her beauty, to efface the remembrance of his lost lady from his heart; and she impatiently longed to behold Don Guzman, in order to achieve the conquest she meditated. The opportunity was presented at a visit to the house of a neighbouring nobleman, to whom Don Guzman was nearly allied. The grave beauty of his countenance, the stately and well-proportioned figure, to which his proud bearing lent additional dignity, and the melancholy expression of his dark and lustrous eyes, joined to the reserve and coldness of his manner, made an impression on Donna Maria, which had hitherto never been effected by any of the gay and flattering hidalgos who courted her smiles. Unlike them, Don Guzman seemed scarcely conscious of her presence, and while all other eyes turned with admiring gaze on the conscious beauty, he stood apart, nor sought to approach her. This unusual indifference mortified and piqued her; she became restless and anxious to attract his notice, and in proportion to the difficulty of the task became her desire to accomplish it. What! was it to be borne, that she who had hitherto won all hearts should now seek in vain to conquer the stern one of the proud and haughty Don Guzman? This question she more than once asked herself, as her eyes rested on his stately form and lofty brow; and she vowed that she would leave no effort untried to attract and vanquish his indifference. Actuated by this resolve, Donna Maria approached the side of the apartment where Don Guzman stood, and entered into conversation with an old lady who was seated near him. But, although he must have seen, as well as heard her, so close was her vicinity, he still appeared as regardless of her presence as before; and, unable to conceal her mortification, she moved on, and entered a gallery into which the room she had left opened through arches, supported by marble columns. She had reached a spot in it parallel to the one where Don Guzman stood, when she heard, through the open arch, her own name pronounced by the old lady with whom she had been conversing.

"So you do not admire her?" said the lady.

"I hardly observed her, senora," was the answer.

"Yet Donna Maria stood close to you for some time."

"I was not conscious of her presence."

"How strange! for she is the most admired of all the young senoras far and near."

No answer being made to this remark, proved how little the subject of it interested Don Guzman; and Donna Maria, vexed and angry, retired to the privacy of her chamber, there to reflect on the strange indifference of this the only man who had ever previously resisted her charms.

On leaving her room, some hours after, she encountered a beautiful boy, returning with his attendant from a walk. She paused to address him, and, on inquiry, discovered that he was the son of Don Guzman d'Izguerdo. The child, pleased at being noticed, abated the shyness peculiar to him, and the bribe of a few bon bons, and two or three interviews in her apartment, established between him and Donna Maria, not only a perfect familiarity, but so great an attachment that his attendant found some difficulty in separating him from his new friend.

As might naturally be expected, the boy spoke to his father of the beautiful senora who was so kind to him; extolled her goodness; and declared he loved her better than any one, except papa. This praise, though coming from one so dear to him, nevertheless failed to awaken any interest towards the object of it in the breast of Don Guzman d'Izguerdo. Conscious of the remarkable beauty of his son, he thought it only natural that any or every lady must be attracted towards him, and deigned not even to inquire the name of the child's especial favourite.

A few days after, Donna Maria encountered Don Guzman in one of the galleries of the castle, walking with his little son; and no sooner did the child catch a view of her, than he let go his father's hand, and rushed eagerly to her side, grasping her robe so roughly, in his anxiety to embrace her, that he tore the delicate and costly lace that adorned it.

The joy of Donna Maria at the meeting seemed no less sincere than that of the boy, who half suffocated her with kisses; and never, perhaps, had she looked more lovely than at that moment, when her cheeks suffused with blushes, and her beautiful ringlets, disordered by his rough contact, she paid no more attention to the huge rents he had occasioned in her fine lace, than did the child himself.

Not so with Donna Lucretzia Santiago, who cried out—

"Forbear, forbear, young senor! See you not that you have torn to pieces a trimming of as fine point as ever left Alençon? Ah! senora, you care not what mischief he does, so infatuated are you by him."

Not a word of this speech was lost on Don Guzman d'Izguerdo, whose eyes became rivetted on the beautiful girl before him; and who, having approached, bowed profoundly while apologizing for the ardour of his son, and for its consequences on the drapery and fine lace of Donna Maria. The gracious smile, so seldom seen on his lips, and which displayed a set of the finest teeth imaginable, let a new attraction to his handsome face; and Donna Maria acknowledged to herself that she had never previously beheld one so perfectly to her taste.

It was, perhaps, this conviction that gave an unusual softness to her lustrous eyes, as they half-timidly met his, while she assured him, that the damage done to her lace was easily repaired, and of not the least importance.

"Easily repaired, indeed," reiterated Donna Lucretzia; "why, there is not a hand in all Castile that could mend it properly; but Heaven knows that if the young senor tore all the lace that Donna Maria has—and no senora in Spain, save our good lady the Queen, has more—she would not mind it a bit. It was only ten days ago that he—"

"Silence, good Donna Lucretzia," interrupted Donna Maria; "you must not reveal the secrets of my chamber."

"Come, my son," said Don Guzman d'Izguerdo; "you must no longer detain the senora;" and he took the boy's hand.

"No, I will not leave her," answered the child; and he clung more closely to her than before.

"What! will you not come with me?" asked Don Guzman. "Surely you will not let papa go away alone?"

"You may stay with us, and hold her other hand," said the boy, "but I will not leave her."

This speech made Donna Maria blush a more rosy red, and led to another smile from Don Guzman, while it drew from Donna Lucretzia the sage remark, that the young senor must not fancy that because he was a privileged person with the senora, others would be permitted to take such liberties.

"But I will put papa's hand in hers," said the child, as if to vex Donna Lucretzia, who was no favourite of his; and, suiting the action to the word, he seized the hand of Donna Maria, drew from it the glove, and placed it in that of his father; who, though he held it but an instant, was sensible of a slight electric shock from its contact; and, moreover, had, even in that brief space of time, observed that he had never beheld a more beautiful one.

"You must not, young senor, thus violate etiquette and propriety," said Donna Lucretzia, with some asperity, to the laughing boy.

"I crave your pardon, senora," replied Don Guzman. "My son has not yet learned the politeness due to ladies; when he is older he will be more respectful."

The child felt that some reproof was meant him by Donna Lucretzia, and, unused to it, he turned angrily to her, and said,

"I will make papa love pretty Donna Maria as well as I do, that I will; and make her love him, too."

The cheeks of Donna Maria became again suffused with blushes, while her eyes were cast down, the long lashes that veiled them half shading those rosy cheeks to which they lent additional beauty.

Don Guzman felt at that moment as if his son's threat of compelling him to love Donna Maria would not be a very difficult task to accomplish; and half wished that the portion of it which related to her being made to love him, could be as easily achieved. And this was the cold stern man who had determined never to love again, and who, until the last quarter of an hour, had believed that he could adhere to his resolution!

"You will love her, won't you, papa?" said the child.

"He may well deem himself happy who is permitted to love Donna Maria d'Alfarache," answered Don Guzman, bowing lowly to the lady, who raised her snowy eyelids, and half met his gaze. "But I intrude; pardon me for forgetting that I was doing so. Come, my son!" said Don Guzman.

"You will go with your father, will you not, dear Guzman?" whispered Donna Maria.

"I want to stay with you always," replied the boy.

"But to please me you will go with your papa?" resumed Donna Maria, as she bent and imprinted a kiss on his brow.

And the child at once gave his hand to Don Guzman, saying,

"You know I always do what you wish."

Don Guzman thought that never before had his name sounded so sweetly as when pronounced by Donna Maria; and he envied his son the kiss bestowed on his forehead by those beautiful lips which attered it. Donna Maria moved away, or he could not have torn the child from the spot; but, truth to say, the son was scarcely less unwilling to go than was the father; and when the boy turned again to catch the last view of her receding figure, Don Guzman checked him not, for he had more pleasure in marking the graceful movements of the beautiful Donna Maria than had the child, because more capable of appreciating them.

No longer had the senora reason to complain that her attractions produced not as great an effect on Don Guzman d'Izguerdo, as on the host of admirers who had hitherto sought her hand. Yet there were moments when the memory of that lovely and gentle being whom he had lost, would rise up as if to dispute the empire of his heart with its new enslaver; and he would reproach himself that he could forget her who was sleeping in her early grave, or love another. But then would his child's affection for Donna Maria and her's for him, recur to his mind; and he would soothe his conscience by the notion that his attachment to Donna Maria originated not in selfishness, but owed its birth even less to her charms, rare as he acknowledged them to be, than to her love to his motherless boy, the son of his long-mourned wife.

Donna Maria, awed by the grave and dignified deportment of Don Guzman, as well as by the reserve of his manner, imposed a restraint on her natural levity and spirit of coquetry until she believed that her influence over his heart was too firmly established to be shaken by the faults of her character, even were they bared to his view. She, therefore, continued to maintain the decorous reserve she had adopted to captivate him, until, to her great joy, his proposals for her hand were made in due form. Now it was, that sure of her prize, her high sense of its value began daily to diminish, and the tender lover, of whose heart she felt certain, appeared far less interesting in her eyes than the proud hidalgo who had, in the commencement of their acquaintance, passed her charms unnoticed. Nevertheless, she still admitted his vast superiority over all her former admirers, and loved him as well as a coquette can love aught save self.

Don Guzman d'Izguerdo being now the affianced husband of Donna Maria d'Alfarache, it became necessary for him to return to the castle to prepare for the reception of its future mistress. She, too, was to accompany her father and Donna Lucretzia to her paternal home, to arrange her nuptial dresses, and pressed so anxiously that Don Guzman's boy should be left with her, that the fond father who had never previously been separated from his son, consented to comply with her request.

The parting of the lovers was a tender one; but the sight of his castle recalled so vividly the image of his beloved wife to Don Guzman's recollection, that he almost wondered how he could have so far banished her from his mind, as to have not only loved, but arranged to wed another. Every chamber was so pregnant with associations of past happiness, and fond regrets, that the dead chased for awhile the living from his thoughts. It seemed like a sacrilege to put away those objects, appropriated to, and used by, his first love, in order to make way for others for her successor; and there were moments when he wished that he had not broken through his resolution of never wedding again. Now that Donna Maria was no longer present with her irresistible beauty to captivate, and her sweet accents to soothe, those attractions seemed to fade away; while memory had none of those thoughts to dwell on, created by sympathy of feeling, and communion of tastes and opinions, which form the strongest links in the chain of affection, when parted from the loved object. He tried in vain to recall her sentiments on any of the subjects on which they had conversed, but could remember nothing but beaming eyes and sweet smiles, with a tacit assent to all he said; and these, however delightful when present, cease to satisfy when absent.

Not so were his recollections of her who had gone down to her early grave while in the zenith of her beauty. Her calm reflecting mind, her deep sympathy in all his tastes and feelings, that mild pensiveness, as far removed from gloomy melancholy as from heartless gayety, and those long and frequent interchanges of thought which had cemented their union, and rendered every recollection of it inexpressibly dear to his heart, now returned with revived old and tender associations to chase the image of Donna Maria from his heart; and never, perhaps, was his lost wife more fondly remembered, than while he felt he had gone too far to recede in giving her a successor. My boy, at least, will find happiness in the new union I am about to form, thought Don Guzman, for he passionately loves Donna Maria, and she dotes on him. And this reflection was the most consolatory to him who, a few days before, longed for the completion of those nuptials from which, were it now in his power, consistently with honour, he would have willingly withdrawn.

But such is man! Ever desirous of some imagined good, which loses its value when the hour of attainment becomes certain. A month rolled away before Don Guzman left his castle to seek that of his future father-in-law. It had been arranged that the marriage should be celebrated the day after his arrival; and a vast concourse of the friends of both parties were to be assembled on the occasion. Previous to leaving home he took from his breast the miniature of his lost wife, with the long ringlet of raven hair that accompanied it, and which had never been removed since her death, with the intention of depositing both in his escritoire; but when he looked on that beautiful and gentle face, with its soft and pleading eyes, his tears dimmed the crystal that covered it, and he had not resolution enough to part from it.

Change of scene produced its usual effect. The power of association was broken, and Don Guzman began to think less of the dead, as he receded from the scenes with which the memory of the departed was identified. The sight of the lovely Donna Maria, more blooming than when he had left her, again awakened a new interest in his breast; and although he admitted to himself, that he would have preferred seeing her cheek a shade paler, as proof that his absence had been felt, he nevertheless could not resist admiring its bright tint, which heightened the effect of her dark and lustrous eyes.

The castle of d'Alfarache was filled with guests come to do honour to the marriage, and a more beautiful bride or a more noble looking bridegroom were seldom seen, than Donna Maria and Don Guzman, as they knelt before the altar to receive the nuptial benediction. All was festivity and rejoicing; and as the new-made husband gazed on his lovely consort, sparkling in jewels, and attired in a dress that displayed to great advantage the symmetrical beauty of her graceful person, he wondered how, a few days previously, he could have regretted the union now completed. Don Guzman found his child so elated and occupied by a magnificent costume presented to him for the occasion of the wedding, that he had little time to devote to his father, who, to say the truth, was so far engrossed by his fair bride, that for the first few days after his marriage, he thought of little else.

It happened, however, one day, that while the boy sat by his sire, Don Alfonso d'Alfarache observed, that he was glad to hear his kinsman was so much recovered as to be able to leave his chamber. "Don Miguel d'Alcantaross is a brave and accomplished hidalgo," said he, addressing Don Guzman; "and will, I hope, my son, win your esteem."

"I like Don Miguel," interrupted the child, "for he gave me my pretty dog; and Donna Maria likes him too; don't you, mother? And poor Don Miguel is very unhappy, and sighs, and has tears in his eyes whenever he speaks to Donna Maria; and Donna Lucretzia was angry when I said so, and told me I must never say anything about it."

Don Guzman looked at his bride, and beheld with no less surprise than pain, that she blushed deeply, and appeared very much confused.

"You know not what you say, young senor," observed Donna Lucretzia. "I only told you that children should not speak until they were spoken to."

"But I do know what I say," resumed the boy, angrily; "and poor Don Miguel did weep when he told mama that he should die soon, he was so wretched."

Donna Maria's cheeks changed from crimson to a death-like paleness, as her eyes bent beneath the stern and haughty glance of her husband; and Donna Lucretzia betrayed an agitation which she vainly sought to conceal. Don Alfonzo d'Alfarache, who was very deaf, heard not the child's words, and noticed not the change that had taken place in the countenances of the bride, bridegroom and duenna.—Don Guzman left the chamber; his mind a prey to emotions as new as they were painful; for jealousy, for the first time in his life, made its baleful influence felt in his breast. His was a nature so sensitive, proud and delicate, that the bare notion that the woman affianced to him could listen to the vows of another, even though she sanctioned them not, inflicted a deep wound; and how otherwise than that had she listened to such vows, could he interpret the words of his artless child? Yes, it was plain, that during his absence, in those hours which he believed had been devoted to fond thoughts, and regrets for him, Donna Maria had permitted another to sigh, nay, to weep, and talk of soon dying. Don Guzman, unwilling to meet his bride while undergoing the first violence of the new passion that tortured him, retired into an orange-grove at a short distance from the castle, and throwing himself on the grass, sought, but, alas! for a long time in vain, to recover the self-control he felt to be so essential to the maintenance of his dignity in the present trying emergency.—While reflecting on the painful position in which he found himself, he heard the sound of his child's voice speaking to his attendant as they walked in a pleasure ground, only separated from the orange-grove by a myrtle hedge, which effectually concealed him from their view.

"I will not do as naughty Donna Lucretzia tells me," said the boy; "she is always so cross and unkind;" and the child sobbed. "She says I must never tell papa any thing about Don Miguel; and she scolded me so, because I said that he sighed, and had tears in his eyes when he spoke to Donna Maria."

Don Guzman writhed as he heard the innocent child reveal to his domestic what had inflicted such pain on himself, and experienced a sense of deep humiliation as the impression, which such a communication must make on the servant's mind, flashed on his own.

"And Donna Maria does not love me now as well as she did at first," resumed the boy; "and when papa was away, she liked much better to listen and speak to Don Miguel than to me; and when I said so, she was angry, and so was Donna Lucretzia."

Every word that his son spoke confirmed the suspicions of Don Guzman. What, then, had he been hired into an attachment by the wiles of an artful coquette; and had the child on whom he doated been made the medium to dupe him into an engagement, which, had he not been assured of Donna Maria's love for the boy, he never would have formed. It was not to be borne. No; he would avenge the injury inflicted on his honour and peace, however terrible the result might prove to himself or others. If guilt attached not to the acquaintance of Donna Maria and Don Miguel, why should the duenna chide his son for naming him? But even if no actual guilt had been committed, had he not proof in the words of his innocent child that, in his own absence, his betrothed bride had shown a marked preference for the society of Don Miguel; and was not this fact alone enough to justify his anger against her? While, then, painful thoughts were passing in his mind, Donna Maria was in deep consultation with Donna Lucretzia, how best to evade the displeasure of Don Guzman, which, from his clouded brow as he left the chamber, they dreaded having incurred.

"I warned you, Donna Maria," said the duenna, "not to encourage the attentions of Don Miguel. I foresaw that no good could result from it, and you see that what I feared has come to pass."

"What do you call encouragement?" demanded Donna Maria. "Did I not command him to speak to me no more of his passion? Did I not remind him, over and over again, that I was the affianced wife of Don Guzman?"

"That may be," replied Donna Lucretzia, "but why, in the commencement, did you walk and talk so much with him; and when he first spoke of love, why did you not avoid his presence?"

"Because I had not the heart to condemn him to despair without endeavouring to soothe the ill-fated passion I could neither sanction nor reciprocate."

"You should have been more reserved, more dignified at first, Donna Maria, and then Don Miguel would not have presumed to confess his passion to you, who were affianced to another. Ah! when I was young, I was so dignified that few would have had the presumption to love, or the temerity to make me a declaration."

"Perhaps it was not your dignity alone that precluded such declarations," said Donna Maria pertly, looking with complacency at the reflection of her own image in the mirror before which she stood; and which, truth to say, offered a striking contrast to that of the withered old maiden beside her. "But what is now to be done? Don Miguel will appear at dinner to-day, and his impassioned glances at me, as well as his extreme dejection, will confirm the suspicions unhappily excited in Don Guzman's breast by the prattle of his son. How tiresome children are!"

"Ay, so I have often told you, and how dangerous too; but you would not listen to me."

"A thought strikes me," said Donna Maria. "I will go out on the terrace, when Don Miguel will be sure to see me from his window, and will, as surely, join me. I will tell him what has occurred, and I will entreat him not to appear at dinner, or if he does, not to look at me, or betray any symptoms of dejection."

"But are you aware, Donna Maria, that this very interview, should Don Guzman discover it, may, by confirming his doubts, destroy forever your happiness with him? and should he not detect it, consider that by such a confidential communication with Don Miguel, you place yourself in his power, and give him an encouragement still more dangerous than hitherto."

"You object to everything I propose," replied Donna Maria, angrily; "yet suggest nothing yourself. But the die is cast; I will seek this interview, which shall positively be the last. You look incredulous; but I swear it shall be so, and, for the result, I must leave it to chance."

Donna Lucretzia shook her head disapprovingly, and would have again counselled the wilful Donna Maria against the measure she intended to take; but the proud and spoilt beauty abruptly quitted her presence, and, in a short time after, was on the terrace, where, as she had anticipated, she was quickly joined by Don Miguel.

It happened that the orange-grove, where Don Guzman lay reclined, brooding over his cause for anger, adjoined a pleasure-ground, with which the terrace communicated by flights of steps; near the bottom of the last of which, a fountain cast up its crystal waters towards the azure sky, cooling the sultry air. This spot had been a favourite one with Donna Maria; and often, during the last month, had she frequented it with Don Miguel. To it she now proceeded, accompanied by him, and eagerly watched by her husband, who could plainly see her, and her companion, and who jealously noted the impassioned gestures of Don Miguel. While they still conversed, Don Guzman's son, perceiving them, broke from his attendant, and followed by his favourite dog, the gift of Don Miguel, joined his step-mother, who, fearful of the child's repeating what might be said, bade farewell to her admirer, and ascended to the terrace, leaving Don Miguel behind.

Don Guzman marked, with jealous rage, his bride turn to bestow a parting glance on Don Miguel, while he, lifting his hat from his brow, stood gazing on her, as if he could not tare himself from the spot. Phrenzied by the sight, the enraged husband only waited until every one, save Don Miguel, had left the pleasure-ground; when, rushing from his place of concealment, he drew his sword, and defied his supposed rival to instant combat. When Don Miguel would have spoken, he reproached him with want of courage; nay, threw his glove in his face, which so enraged the other, that he, too, drew his rapier.—They fought desperately, each animated by a burning hatred, until both fell, bathed in blood, and mortally wounded. When discovered, Don Miguel had ceased to live; and his adversary was dying. He was borne to the castle, when Donna Maria, frantic with horror and grief at the terrible consequence of her levity, threw herself at his feet, and implored the pardon his lips could no longer utter. He breathed his last in a few minutes after, his dying eyes fixed on his child.

. . . . . Donna Maria retired to a convent dedicated to our Lady, on Monte Serrado, so celebrated for the piety of its sisterhood, where she passed the remainder of her days, in penitence and prayer; and died at an advanced age, venerated and beloved by all in the convent.

CLARICE DEVEREUX.

BY MRS. MICHEL.

Nature had nowhere been more lavish of her favours, than on the small, but surpassingly beauteous domain, belonging to the family of Devereux.

It was a lovely evening in the month of June; the sun had scarce sunk beneath the horizon, when seated under a wide-spreading oak, in silence enjoying this scene of summer brightness, was one whose remains of beauty told, that that form had once been the cynosure of all eyes; brighter, alas! and better days had been hers, but deep sorrow had been there; the gaze of melancholy told she had quaffed the cup of misery to its dregs!

At her feet was seated a bright form, which could scarce have seen sixteen summers, whose arch look and buoyant laugh told she had yet to learn the harsh lesson of worldly wisdom—that wisdom which can alone be taught by painful experience! The world to her was a scene of happiness, and her flow of uncontrolled spirits at times appeared as if they would overpower so fragile a frame, and snap the slender cord that bound her to existence. Each smile of joy, each sally of mirth, told that the spirit within was at peace with God and man, that nought but content and happiness reigned within that bosom!

Her raven hair formed a striking contrast to the snowy whiteness of her skin, and the jetty lash added deeper expression to the full and brilliant eye, "so dark, so deep, so beautifully blue;" but on her cheek, alas! there dwelt that tint of red, which, ever wearing an unearthly appearance, suddenly mantles it, and as suddenly disappears, too truly telling the bitter tale, that death will early snatch its victim from the trials and miseries of a cold and heartless world!

The mother turned and looked upon her lovely child, and a glance of anxiety replaced the gaze of sorrow.

"No shawl! no cloak! Clarice, my own child, how is this?—for my sake, for your poor mother's sake, cherish your health"

"Forgive me, mother," said the girl, as she threw herself upon the neck of Lady Devereux, and again and again kissed her cheek; then suddenly rising, bounded over the lawn, and returned muffled in a cloak, and carrying in her hand a shawl, which she threw over the shoulders of her mother.

"Look! yonder comes old Mary," she exclaimed; "poor thing! she can scarce walk! I will go and fetch her." Saying which, she again crossed the lawn, and aided the decrepid woman in finding a seat.

With painful anxiety Lady Devereux's eye would watch every movement of her child, and now, as she followed her light step, and smiled upon that act of kindness, she sighed to think that she could not for ever keep her thus happy, thus free from anxiety and care.

Why should the sunshine of happiness ever forsake that breast? why should that step lose its lightness, that voice its tones of joy, that eye its flash of mirth, that smile its brightness? Oh! why should the "Glow of early thought decline in feeling's dull decay?"

Clarice was again seated at her mother's feet

"The idea even of your marriage makes me miserable, my child; when you are gone, I shall be a lone and wretched woman; but, indeed, I have overcome my selfishness, and you shall, ere long, be a useful and ornamental member of society. Your life must not be spent by the fireside of your old mother; indeed, I am no longer the selfish being you have hitherto known; and yet I fear——"

"I would you were, my mother," replied Clarice, interrupting her; "for I will not leave you for all this world can offer."

"But, Clarice, you may soon think otherwise," said Lady Devereux, smiling.

"Oh! my dear, dear mother, how can you speak thus? indeed, you know not how few there are whom I could ever love."

"Time, my child, will tell us all; but the dew is heavy, you shall no longer stay without. I have most bitter reasons to dread the blasts of night!"

Sir Edward and Lady Devereux had mourned the death of no less than three children, who, ere attaining the age of maturity, had been carried off by that most deceitful and insidious of all diseases, consumption!

It was no wonder, therefore, that the only remaining link of their affection should have been loved with an almost painful intensity. Fate decreed that the father should never behold the ripening beauties of his child, for at an early age death deprived Clarice of her father, and the heart-broken mother directed every thought and feeling to the happiness of the only being who now cheered her widowed heart, and blessed her existence. Clarice deeply loved her mother, and strove to realize her most darling hopes; their disparity of age seemed forgotten; the thoughts, the hopes, the fears of mother and daughter grew as it were together, and became the same.

Clarice entered life the admired of all who beheld her beauty, the esteemed of all who knew her worth! There was that poetry about her nature, that brightness of romance about her every thought and feeling, that is so seldom understood by the heart of man, but, when understood, is ever most highly appreciated, which, elevating the object of his affections far above the common level of her sex, more truly approximates her to that spirit of virtue, grace and beauty, for which he ever sighs, and which has been the minister of the most worldly philosopher's day-dreams. Nor is it a vain tale that such bright beings love with greater intensity, and are loved with greater devotion, than those whose feelings are cast in nature's ordinary mould; their happiness is greater, and, alas! so is their misery; for their very sensitiveness teaches them to weep with the wretched, and rejoice with the happy. By such natures is the cup of misery most deeply quaffed, their golden dreams are ever broken; their fond desire for true and eternal love; the fresh and lovely feelings of devotion, "run to waste, and water but the desert!"—or, chilled by the ingratitude of man, break the bursting heart, which finds no solace but in religion, no rest but in the grave!

Clarice had attained her seventeenth year, ere thoughts of her marriage had entered the mind of either mother or daughter.

* * * * *

The eve was dark and louring, rain fell in torrents, though the dryness of the ground told that it had but just commenced, and a break in the clouds gave hope that it would be of no long continuance.

A horseman, muffled in a cloak, sought shelter in a cottage, in the lovely neighborhood of ———. His tall and well-proportioned form, his mild and polished manner, bespoke nobility of birth. He started, on entering, to behold the figure of a surpassingly beauteous girl kneeling by the bedside of a dying woman. Her raven locks had strayed from the cheek to the shoulder, whilst her small hand clasped a Bible, from which she had evidently been reading to the invalid.

The stranger paused, as if to gaze upon the bright scene before him—of beauty heightened by the act of piety! The voice of an elder woman offering him a chair, broke his reverie; Clarice turned round to ascertain to whom the offer had been made, and on beholding the form of the stranger she arose, slightly blushing.

"I greatly fear," he said, "I have interrupted your work of charity, fair lady; but let me assure you that I am not so hardened by the world's vanities, as to take no delight in witnessing acts of piety."

"You have in no way interrupted us," she replied; "in fact, my task was over ere you entered; but the rain has ceased, and I have other work ere night closes."

Then turning, she addressed the invalid, and bowing to the stranger, quitted the hut. She had scarcely departed, when an impatient, "Who is she?" burst from his lips, and deeper and deeper grew the interest with which he questioned them concerning Clarice; but the extent of their information consisted in praising and blessing their angel, as by the poor of the village she was oft denominated.

He left the hut, and was soon joined by one whose dress betokened the soldier.

"Does not your sister, Lady Devereux, reside in this neighbourhood, Desmond?" said the stranger, after a pause of some minutes, "and her lovely daughter?"

"Yes," replied Desmond; "my sister, Lady Devereux, resides in this neighbourhood; and a lovelier or a better being exists not than Clarice Devereux; though, I fear, that both her beauty and her worth are soon to be sadly thrown away."

"How!" anxiously exclaimed the other, his heart sickening at even the idea that the intelligence conveyed.

"First, then, let me know why Lord Clifford is so deeply interested in the fate of Clarice Devereux?"

"The tale first," he replied, "and perhaps my reasons afterwards."

"Well, well, be it so," resumed Desmond. "You must know, then, that scarce eight months have elapsed, since I was called from England by military duties. Clarice, just then seventeen, cared for none, and no one seemed likely to satisfy the overflowing feelings of her young heart. Her mother seriously spoke to me of her daughter's marriage, as in case of her decease, Clarice would become an houseless orphan, the property being entailed on my elder brother, who is not on terms with Lady Devereux. My wandering life precludes my ever having a home to offer my niece, and Clarice, my sister said, was too weak in health, and too attractive in person, to be alone, exposed, at so early an age, to the trials and miseries of such a world. Lady Devereux, becoming nervous from long suffering and solitude, fancied her own health was on the decline, and that ere long she might be numbered with the dead. On my return, I learn that Clarice is engaged to the only man I despise, as well as dislike. Without heart or principle, or, in fact, aught that ennobles the character of our sex, he will soon replace her smiles of joy by the tear of misery. They tell me, also, that she cares not for this Sir Charles Everard; but having vainly sought the being of her dreams, one whose devotion she could appreciate, and to whom she could unrestrainedly offer every fond feeling of her young and pure mind, she forsakes the cherished hope, thus satisfying herself that this world contains not the intense love she had sighed for; that nought but heartlessness and vanity is to be found in this vale of tears! My sister seems quite fooled by the man, who pretends to worship her daughter, and has promised never to separate Clarice and her mother. The deed, I fear, is well nigh done; no power of mine can now remedy the evil; but poor, poor Clarice, from my heart I pity!"

Lord Clifford spoke not—his heart was full, but ere they parted, it was agreed that on the morrow, Colonel Desmond should conduct Lord Clifford to the house of Lady Devereux. Ah! wherefore does man thus blindly seek temptation? which too often terminates in the irremediable misery of the only being he loves.

* * * * *

The marriage was over. The honey-moon was past, and the health of Clarice was fast declining from the dissipation of London, into the midst of which her husband, ambitious to be himself known amongst the highest circles, and determined to make his wife's charms the passport, has cast her. She soon became the reigning beauty, and the desires of the selfish baronet were amply gratified. The season was scarce over, when the physicians shook their head at Lady Everard's state of debility, and insisted upon her leaving England for the more salubrious air of sunny Italy. With his usual indifference the husband consented, and, as his duties kept him in town, Clarice departed, accompanied only by her mother.

The feelings of Clifford towards Lady Everard had daily become more rooted and strengthened; honour bare him shun her too fast fascinating society, as he could not but perceive that she preferred him to the many that offered incense at this shrine of beauty; but when chance threw them together, he seemed absorbed in her every word and action, and with the care of a mother, would forbid her encountering the air of night, or would shield her chest from its deadly influence; and when, amid the dance, the low short cough distressed her fragile frame, he would gaze upon her with a depth of melancholy that told he too clearly beheld the finger of death upon that brow of marble; and then he would sigh and turn away, as if fearful lest that gaze might have been perceived by her all-seeing eye!

But the eye is keen when love is in the heart; and Clarice reflected with delight upon the heartfelt conduct of Lord Clifford, which lost nought of its value, by being compared to the vain and foolish bearing of those who surrounded her. All was cold, save his kindness; "all vanity and vexation of spirit," save his society. She looked upon him, as a being superior to the common herd—as one who reflected and suffered, whilst others grew cold and hardened; and who possessed those intense feelings of love and devotion which she had imagined dwelt not in the heart of any Lord of the creation.

His manner was of that species which, by its captivating softness, deeply penetrates the inmost recess of woman's heart, and even engages the affections of that being to whom its homage is offered. There was a sweetness in his smile—a deep tone in his voice, which is ever endearing to woman's fond and wretched spirit.

Clarice had never repressed any feeling towards Lord Clifford. Assured of her own strength—scorning the idea of danger, she had never endeavored to subdue the growing evil, when alone it was to be subdued!

"Why," she would reason to herself, "may not Lord Clifford be even as a brother to me? Why should I deprive myself of my kindest friend, my sagest counsellor? Why should not real friendship exist between us?" Alas! vain philosopher, thou leanest on a broken reed! 'Tis ever thus we deceive our hearts, ever too willing to be deceived. 'Tis ever thus we gloss over our feelings—banish the fatal truth from out minds, until sin or misery, too late, bids us, with severity, check the smallest beginning of evil—with deep scrutiny examine the inmost feelings of our deceitful hearts, and with rapidity fly from the scene of danger!

The woman who loves her husband is ever safe; but she who does not must oft be beset by severe temptation, and, oh! who can say she will stand the trying hour?

* * * * * *

'Tis Italy—bright Italy! In solitude Clarice gazes from her casement upon a scene of surpassing beauty; her cheek has lost its bloom; her eye its brightness; her work lies untouched; her book unopened; her flowers die of neglect, and as she kneels in prayer one image stands between her soul and heaven! One form too dearly and too madly loved!—Alas! she now felt how little her selfish husband had ever shared her fond and wretched heart! Her days of true happiness have past—her hours of pure joy have fled! But he (for he had followed her)—he—approaches, her color mantles her cheek, the smile plays around her mouth, and happiness beams in every feature! Alas! how delusive. Absorbed in the ecstasy of the present, she forgets the evil and wretchedness such love must bring, and, for a while, even conscience sleeps.

* * * * * *

The sun's last rays gild a room which clearly demonstrates by its elegance and comfort, that the hand of woman had been there! The eve is soft and lovely! The balmy breath of summer plays o'er a couch where lies reclined the form of one, whose unconfined tresses hang in luxurious profusion around her shoulders, and whose dim eye tells the tale of suffering. But in her glance can be read that he who bends o'er her is dearer than existence itself; that for his sake she could endure all! The long concealed tale of love and of misery has been told—she has listened to the voice of the charmer, who now watches every change of her illness, anticipates every desire of her mind. The tale of passion has been told, and the wretched woman now greedily devours those tones, breathing nought but that love which had so long burned within her breast!

"Do you love me, Clarice?" said Walter, as he smoothed her pillow. She answered not, but gazed upon his manly brow, and that gaze was sufficient!

"Bless you! God bless you, mine own!" he replied.

A God bless you—that oft rung in her ears when he was by; that to her was sweeter than any earthly melody! Who has not felt thus? What woman has not cherished in her heart the loved one's deep solemn "God bless you," even amid long years of misery and of absence! Woman alone knows how deeply one unkind expression, or one affectionate regard may for ever influence her destiny!

A violent fall from her horse had brought on fever, and confined Lady Everard to her couch. At night the half-distracted mother never left her daughter's, aside, but during the day was obliged to seek that rest which her enfeebled frame so much required.

Lord Clifford was one whose early hopes and aspirations had been blasted by the world; and who seemed to cling to her affection as his only, his last remaining hope of earthly happiness; and oft as he had loved, or fancied he loved, he never loved as now! Nought but her attachment could dispel his hours of darkness and gloom; nought but her smile restore him to happiness!

The religion that had so adorned the youthful character of Clarice, was not sufficient to resist such a temptation. Ah! woman too late learns how true, how great must be that sense of piety that will uphold her in the hour of trial,—that will snatch her undefiled from the burning furnace! Religion alone can save her, when all combines to work her fall!—Nor can the strength of her piety be known until tried by severe temptation. The religion that teaches youth to do good, to practice charity, to solace the wretched, to attend the ordinances of its God, to love the Gospel of its Saviour, is oft too weak to stand against the temptation of the world, or to overcome in the hour of trial. 'Tis easier to do good than to avoid evil—'tis easier to practice the virtues that our hearts are not averse to, than to give up the evil that we love! Tell the young artless girl that the religion which taught her infancy to pray, and her youth to practice goodness, unless it strengthens with her strength, and grows with her growth, will nought avail her when love guides her mind, or passion blinds her reason, and deceitful man appeals to the loving heart!

* * * * *

The sound of music and of revelry rent the air;—mirth and laughter echoed through the spacious halls! Every countenance beamed with joy, and every mind seemed engaged in the soul-stirring scene.—Every eye was directed to one spot, and curiosity was depicted on every face.

"Who is she?" said a lisping dandy to his companion.

"I would I knew," said the other; "for by my faith I ne'er gazed upon a lovelier form."

"And her tournure is exquisite," said the first.

"This unknown beauty will drive me mad," said the young Lord de Carency. "Come, let's to our fair hostess, mayhap she can enlighten our minds!"

The trio departed, but ere reaching the young Duchess de ——, stopped on meeting one whose distingue appearance placed him far above his fellows.

"Clifford," said De Carency, "you can, perhaps, satisfy our curiosity; who is yonder lovely creature, who, angel-like, has dropped from heaven, to teach our French belles the difference between dress and grace, paint and beauty?"

"Lady Everard," he coolly replied, "the daughter of the late Sir Edward Devereux;" and passing on, stationed himself at a door, where, unperceived, he could watch the dance. A superficial observer might have said, he was deeply plunged in meditation, but it required no very strict scrutiny to discover that his eye followed every movement of the being, whose beauty caused so much inquiry; that he watched every word she uttered; and once their eyes met with an expression that spoke but of deep misery and deep devotion!

Lord Clifford sighed and turned away, and no where amid the festive scene was he to be found.

She heard that sigh—she watched his departure, and darkness to her impassioned eye overspread the brilliant apartment as his loved form vanished! Yet she laughed and talked, she smiled, and danced, as if a wretched feeling, or a sinful love had never gained entrance into that broken heart, that devoted spirit!

Clarice, on this night, looked her loveliest. Her hair formed a striking contrast to the wreath of white roses that encircled her brow; the full blue was unusually bright; the whiteness of her brow dazzling.—Alas! as unearthly and as exquisite was the tint which so clearly, even amid revelry and mirth, told the tale of death.

The dance has ceased, and all had flown into another apartment; to listen to some famous singers.—Clarice alone refused to move: one moment and she was alone.

"You are tired," said a voice behind her.

"No, no," she replied. "But I am faint, and I would breathe the fresh air." They sought the garden.

"Walter, Walter," she exclaimed, "my heart is bursting! Where, how, can all this end?"

"Be mine," he replied, "and, forsaking the world, we will live for each other!"

"Oh! my mother, my poor dear mother, I cannot break her heart; you know not the extent of her affection towards me, and did she but know one tenth part of her child's transgression, her lone and widowed heart would break."

The moon shone fully o'er her face; he turned and gazed upon it; emotion had choked her utterance, and tears sparkled in her eye.

"Clarice, Clarice, my own loved Clarice, you are young, the world is all before you! Felicity must await you. Oh! wherefore do you speak thus to your wretched Walter, whose every feeling is turned to bitterness, every hope blasted, and who clings to love as his remaining all of earthly happiness.

"Happiness!" she, with bitterness exclaimed;—"and where can I look for happiness? I love thee better than life itself, and fate has forever divided us! Even at this parting for a few short days, my heart bleeds. Oh! what shall I do when we part, perhaps never to meet again?"

He pressed her to his bosom, and imprinted a kiss upon her forehead.

"Oh! Clarice, why did we not sooner meet, or never meet at all?"

"Alas! why?" she sighed, and then resumed; "You know not, Walter, all I now suffer, or how I valued my conscious feelings of purity—how I cherished my virtue; and now, when I reflect, I feel that I am a sinful woman; perhaps, in the sight of heaven, no better than the worst of my sex; my brain is maddened, and I feel as if my senses were forsaking me! May God forgive me!"

"And this, this is all my devilish work," he exclaimed. "Oh, ought I not to be accursed for thus blasting the feelings of such a heart! Wretch as I am, forgive me, Clarice, forgive me!"

"Speak not thus, Walter—think what, what should I be without thee?"

"A happy being," he replied; "for, though ignorant of that rapture of love, still, absence of misery is an apathet species of happiness!"

"No! no! thou art all the world to me—all else is insipid and cold; thou hast taught me the power of love; thou didst first teach me the deep feelings this breast contained! Oh! Walter, Walter how can I live without thee?"

She sunk upon his breast, and Lord Clifford felt there was no sacrifice too great for him to make that could conduce to her happiness.

"Clarice, my own blessed Clarice, let me solemnly ask thee whether any sacrifice on my part, any act of mine, can alleviate thy misery. Even separation for ever, though it be the death-knell to all my feelings and hopes of happiness, shall be endured! for my existence is thine; and though the deprivation of thy love will tear from me the last, the only thing I now cherish on earth, still be it so; I care not, as long as 'tis for thy welfare, and this too wretched heart be broken! Let me but feel that even by the sacrifice of all I love dearest on earth, I have contributed to thy happiness, and I shall die content: and then I shall no longer cling to this world of shadows; death——"

"Oh! do not talk of death, Walter," she interrupted him, "'tis I should talk upon such a subject, with so many examples before me; may I not——"

"Hush, Clarice," he said and with energy exclaimed, "God grant the same grave may cover us!"

* * * * * *

The festive scene had passed away! Clarice lent upon her hand over a table, where the wreath of roses and the dress of gaiety lay neglected. By a small lamp, she was attentively perusing the Book of God: absorbed in thought, she raised her head, and again her eye fell upon the Sacred Word! Repose had in vain been courted; but sleepless nights were no novelty to the frame of Clarice. Approaching a couch upon which the moon's rays were brilliantly reflected, and sinking upon her knees, she invoked that God who is never deaf to the cry of faith! She wrestled in spirit—she strove with her Maker in anguish of heart—again and again she fell upon her knees, and again and again prayed to her Saviour and her God! Violent sobs at length relieved her overloaded bosom, and rising from her knees, she unclosed her desk, and wrote as follows:—

"You will open this, Walter, when we are parted for ever! when this guilty yet loving heart looks to Heaven alone for support—to the grave alone for rest!

"My brain is burning—my heart is breaking—and I feel as if my spirit would forsake its earthly tabernacle ere I could commit to paper the last few lines that you will ever receive from the wretched, heart-broken Clarice! from one whom you have too dearly loved, and will, I fear, love for ever! I have prayed to heaven for guidance. Walter, I have given myself over to the mercy of the Most High! My spirit has breathed in prayer: I rise from the throne of Grace, in the presumptuous hope that He will deign, in such an hour, to guide the pen of even such a wretch as I am! I write that which I feel will break this bursting heart. I bid thee—Walter, I who have so fondly hung upon thy every look, so madly devoured thy every word,—I, who love thee better than existence's self, and would rather in wretchedness and poverty be thine, than amid happiness and affluence, the wife of a monarch! Yes, Walter, I bid thee—I ask thee—to leave me for ever! for ever! 'Tis a cold, a harsh, a bitter sound! but it must be! Walter, we are parted, and for ever! The spell is broken! I tear thee from my soul, and vow to lay the fragments of my broken heart before the throne of mercy and forgiveness, to be by His atoning blood purified and cleansed, ere death doth snatch me from this world of sin and misery! We are nothing to each other! I ne'er shall behold that loved form more!

"My God, my God, support me through this agonizing task, not from fear of the world's sneers, nor from any minor feeling do I thus act; think'st thou to gain the approving smiles of a vicious world I could agonize myself, and the being to whom I love better than self? believe me, religion alone thus forcibly strengthens its unworthy votary to fly temptation! To fly ere we irretrievably fall, ere guilt has for ever chained us as its victims! Before that fatal illness, Walter, the sound of affection was never heard between us, though looks and acts too clearly spoke to our senses; but since that period, since thou didst nurse me with a mother's care, the words of passion and of love have passed between us, and we have existed but for each other! The bright dream is past! and I am a lone and wretched being! I scarce can bid thee forget me, Walter, I feel it impossible that such love as thine should forget! but I bid thee pray for me, pray for me, whilst life inhabits this weak frame, and when I am gone, visit the spot where I lie, and pray, pray for our re-union hereafter. Pray that Heaven may forgive our sin, that God may forget our iniquity. Pray that my repentance may be sincere! And now, for the last time, I will call thee mine own, own love—my dear, dearest Walter—my first, my last, my only love! farewell; a long farewell! Farewell for ever!

CLARICE."

The deed was done; even then she felt that they had parted! The letter was sealed, directed, and the desk secured. Nothing could now turn that noble mind from its magnanimous resolve. Again she knelt, and poured out her spirit in thanksgiving. The tears of misery soon exhausted her feeble frame, and sleep befriended that spirit, over which angels had kept watch, and the King of Heaven in mercy smiled upon the repentant sinner.

Clifford would, of course, appear to bid them "adieu" ere departing—'twas then she determined to place in his hands the letter.

* * * * * *

Three hours had elapsed since the dawn of day, and Lady Devereux, seated by the couch of her child, watched her slumbers.

"Clarice," said the mother, as she awoke, "your uncle, Colonel Desmond, has just arrived from England; rise, and dress, my child, that you may be able to see him on his return."

"Return!" said Clarice, "where is he gone?"

"To Lord Clifford's," said Lady Devereux, "who has so much to hear from Srmes about England and his English friends, that he has deferred his departure until to-morrow."

"I shall be delighted to see my uncle," said Clarice, "but what brings him here?"

"Is it not natural," said Lady Devereux, "that he should pass his leisure in the society of his sister and niece?"

It was true—Colonel Desmond had arrived—but wherefore? To communicate to his sister the sudden death of Sir Charles Everard! He wished the event to be immediately broken to Clarice, but Lady Devereux loudly protested against the measure, as she wished nothing to be done until Dr. May had been consulted, fearing that so great a shock might bring on a relapse.

"But supposing your physician agree with you, Emma," said Colonel Desmond, "when is Clarice to be told of her husband's death?"

"When her strength is greater," replied Lady Devereux.

"How is it then that she was allowed only last night to attend a ball?"

"It is the opinion of Dr. May that mind has a great deal to do with the illness of my child, and he has recommended my allowing her to mix in society, and wishes me, by every means, to divert her mind."

To Lord Clifford the intelligence of that man's death, whom he scarcely knew, and had ever despised, conveyed but one thought, one idea: the season of mourning over, Clarice was—his for ever! New existence seemed to diffuse itself through his frame! joy danced within him! his future life would be a scene of happiness! he was no longer a lone and wretched being with nothing to look forward to, with every past hope blasted.

* * * * * *

The eve was calm—scarce a breath stirred—all nature seemed to foretel some coming storm. The sun was setting in unusual glory, when Clarice, complying with the request of Lord Clifford, had sallied forth: they sought a spot where, far from the "cruel of the cold," they might breathe their last vows.—After ascending some rocky and undulating ground, they reached a large rock, by which was a curious cave, the lower part of which was filled with water. Weeping willows and other trees of equal beauty appeared to mourn around the melancholy spot, and the stillness of death was there! An unearthly feeling of cold issued from the cave, and the frame of Clarice quivered as she sat on the water's edge.

"You are cold—Clarice, you are ill."

"'Tis nothing, nothing," she replied, nearly choked by a short and painful cough.

"Indeed, indeed, you are not well," said Walter; "for the last few hours I have seen it; tell me what you feel."

"Nothing but a cough, from which I have so often suffered, and which, therefore, can be of no moment."

The father of Lord Clifford had, through Colonel Desmond, sent a verbal message to his son, to beg his immediate return so England, on account of some private business. He had also received a letter to the same effect; but the verbal message rendered non-compliance with the mandate impossible. His sanguine hopes and feelings of happiness soon vanished, as the time drew near that was to separate them for an indefinite period, perhaps for ever! For, as this fatal hour approaches, the heart of man ever sinks within him, and—

"Howe'er we promise, hope, believe, there breathes despair."

"We part, Clarice, perhaps for ever!" said Walter.

She spoke not, but tears of agony told how deep were her sufferings.

"Oh! to think," she at last faltered, "that the voice I so much love, the gaze I more than love, may, ere to-morrow's sun is set, be lost to me for ever!"

The wretched woman leant upon his shoulder, and, in anguish wept.

"You talk to me of happiness!" she wildly exclaimed; "of the cares, of the pleasure that may engross my existence—alas! alas! too well, you know, Walter, that I have but one source of happiness amongst the things of this life—where—oh, where, but to that heaven, whose laws I have spurned, dare I look now for solace?"

Man, who ne'er sheds a tear at the world's joys and griefs, and who ever scorns to display his inward suffering among the giddy crowd, is overcome, as he listens to the accents of misery wrung from the heart of the only being he loves,—as he gazes upon the young and lovely woman whose hopes and happiness he has for ever blasted!

Lord Clifford bent his head upon his hand, and wept from agony of spirit—aye, wept as a child might weep! Rising, he lent against a rock, upon which their initials were engraved."

"There, Clarice," he said, "may our love be as indelible as those letters! But hark! it thunders! we must away! Let us part—let us here part—alone, and far from the gaze of man! We must here part—I must here leave you; grief, such as ours, brooks not the vulgar gaze. I have arranged all; ere ten minutes have elapsed, my trusty Enrico will await you a few yards hence, and conduct you to your home."

His arm was passed round her waist, she placed a letter in his hands, and falteringly, said—"Read it, when we are parted."

"May God in Heaven bless and forgive you, Clarice," he replied; but ere another word had issued from his lips, with one piercing shriek she sank within his arms. Again and again was that dear form pressed to his bosom, whilst upon that forehead was imprinted the kiss of intense affection. The lurid lightning now shot across the cave and was succeeded by peals of thunder. Rain fell in torrents; the storm raged; darkness covered the face of the earth; the lightning became dazzlingly vivid, the thunder drew awfully near.

Clarice, almost senseless, clung to her protector; his fears that she might suffer, and his consequent agony of mind was indescribable. His coat was thrown off and cast over her. Rain soon drenched them to the skin; and the cold air of night struck with force upon the weak chest of Clarice. He felt her quiver in his grasp, and his feelings became insupportable.

At last, a faint light gave hopes of shelter, and the exhausted Walter hastened towards the cottage from whence the glimmer issued. Admission was soon gained, and every care bestowed upon the now senseless form of Clarice, for oft had the inhabitants of this very cottage partaken of her bounty, and blessed her kindness.

She had watched by the sick couch of the very girl, who now in sorrow knelt beside her, even as she had administered to the illness of the poor woman, by whose bed-side the artless and happy Clarice Devereux first encountered that glance which had such an effect upon her future destiny.

Amid the darkness of the night and violence of the storm, it was evident that Walter had lost his way. He now distractedly hung over her lifeless form, using every method to restore animation.

She was ere long restored to feeling, but a raging fever succeeded, which soon brought on delirium.—The midnight hour had passed, and medical aid at length arrived—the poor girl whom Clarice had, in sickness succoured, ran to the abode of Lady Devereux.

Walter never left her, and, amid her most incoherent wanderings, she ever recognised him; it was he who strove to warm her lifeless form; it was he who now sat with maddened gaze, and listened to the ravings of the only being he loved on earth;—'twas he who held the cool draught to her burning lips, and slaked her deadly thirst; 'twas his gaze alone she met as she looked around for earthly aid; 'twas his voice alone she recognized; 'twas his tones alone that conveyed any meaning to her wandering mind.

At last she slept, and Walter knelt in thanksgiving to Heaven. But the sound of a carriage approached—it stopped at the door, and the distracted mother rushed into the cottage.

Two hours elapsed, and Clarice awoke in perfect possession of her senses; and, recognising her mother, said—

"I feel I am dying; I know it, I feel it here—(placing her hand upon her heart.) May God bless and protect thee when I am gone, my own dear affectionate mother! Mother, bless thy child!"

Afterwards, she slowly muttered, "Yes, I have deeply sinned, but God has been gracious, and I have repented;" and, turning to Lady Devereux, said aloud, "Mother, forgive, forgive thy child, for she has sinned against thee!"

"I have nothing to forgive," sobbed the wretched mother; "you are too good for this world, too good for me. Oh, God! spare her, spare her, or let me perish likewise!"

"Kiss me, my mother, ere I die," but Lady Devereux had swooned, and was removed to another part of the cottage.

Clarice watched every movement, and on seeing that her mother was gradually recovering, she turned to him who had never quitted her side.

"Kneel and pray, Walter," she said solemnly; and the wretched man who in spirit had prayed ever since he beheld her danger, knelt by her bed-side.

Lady Devereux approached and knelt also.

"Oh! that I could feel that I sin not in loving thee!" she said, turning to Walter.

"Thou dost not, thou dost not, my child, my child," exclaimed the mother.

"Oh, that I could think so! I should die a happier being!" and then, as if a thought flashed across her brain, she whispered in her mother's ear.

"Yes, yes, my child, and you may love freely and without sin," replied Lady Devereux.

Clarice was silent—the murmur of prayer never left her lips, and Lady Devereux and Lord Clifford knelt by her side.

She slept no more; her spirit, absorbed in prayer, seemed dead to every earthly object; a low "pray for me," once escaped her lips, and again she was silent.

The dawn of day now faintly appeared in the east; the breeze of morn was fresh and balmy,—the stillness of death pervaded the cottage.

With knit brow, and lips compressed with agony, the wretched Walter watched the first dawn of that day which he felt might prove the most miserable on earth. He saw there was no future for him in the world—with her would vanish all his hopes of happiness. The deep agony of such moments, the inexpressible bitterness of such feelings, baffle the power of human pen.

> By those, that deepest feel, is ill express't,
> The inanimeness of the suffering breast;
> No words suffice the secret soul to show,
> For truth denies all eloquence to wo.

For a few moments he had quitted the room that contained all he had loved upon earth, imagining that his absence for a short time might be a relief; but anxiety, as long as she was out of sight, nearly maddened his brain, and he soon returned to the chamber of sickness.

Preparations had commenced for removing Clarice to her mother's house, so favorable had been her last two hours.

The sun was rising in universal splendor, and she requested to be removed to the window, that she might watch its rising beams. Her features brightened as she gazed upon this scene of glory. She clasped within hers, the hands of Walter and her mother, and in silence gazed upon the orb of day.

After a few minutes, she faintly said—"Live, my mother—live, Walter, to the glory of God, forgetting the world and its vanities;—serve Him! serve Him!" She appeared exhausted, but showed no symptom of suffering, save the cough, which was frequent and distressing. Her hand burned—her cheek was flushed—her eye unusually bright—a holy calm overspread her features—a smile played around her mouth, and a few unintelligible words issued from her lips. Walter started up, and wildly looked upon her. Her lips moved as if in prayer—her gaze was fixed upon the sky—she stirred not—he could bear no more; and in agony of spirit pronounced the name "Clarice." His existence—his more than existence depended upon the answer. She turned—thank God! she lives!—"Heaven bless you both!" she feebly uttered. "Remember my last, my dying request." A solemn reply in the affirmative issued from the lips of each and all again was still.

An eloquent pressure of the hand—a slight dimness in the eye, again caused the heart of Walter to die within him. With distended eye-balls, he, in madness, watched every movement. Another pressure of the hand—the jaw fell! A wild, unearthly shriek, from the inmost recesses of the mother's heart, rang through the cottage. He rose—he gazed, and wildly pressed that hand to his lips;—he gazed again, and called aloud upon "that vainly echoed name."

He threw himself upon that still lovely form—he clasped the corpse of Clarice Everard! Her spirit had fled to the God who gave it, to adorn "a brighter mansion, and a better world!"

MET AND PARTED.

Chapter I.

THE MAID OF HONOR.

The clustering jewelry of night never twinkled on a fairer scene—a living picture of such exquisite beauty, replete alike in soft surpassing loveliness and dazzling splendor. It was twilight in the gardens of the royal palace of Francis I., and the dim voluptuous light half shrouded the scented shrubbery, as it bowed to kiss the sweet brow of the dying zephyr fluttering in the embrace of night. The pleasant trilling of the feathered day-choir was hushed, and naught was there of sound save the heavy breathings of a fair young creature leaning over the Parian balustrade of a silent fountain, with one tiny white hand pushing back the long dark hair flowing from a brow of almost ashen paleness, and the other clasping the fretted marble railing with nigh convulsive earnestness. I have said that the young girl was fair—but the weak syllable doth not convey a tithe of that exceeding beauty which was ere long destined to bewitch the feelings of even England's licentious monarch. But now her face grew darksome from impatience, and her small foot beat pettishly on the stone floor, as if it fain would hasten on the coming of some anticipated object. Suddenly the clear chime of the tower clock tolled out the hour; echoing most musically through the dense foliage of the garden, it died in broken murmurs amid the far off hills.

"Eight—eight!" whispered the young girl, and her voice was full of tremor—"So late! Indeed—so late! If he meant to play the laggard with me, I'll e'en be even with him—cost what it may! I'll prove no apt subject for a slow-paced interview, and he shall rue it, else am I no woman. Ah! there—'tis his step—a tread among the million! Percy! Percy!" she cried with a low quiver of tumultuous joy in her voice, as she sprang forth from the shadows of the shrubbery, and stood revealed in the broad promenade.

"A truant! By our loves, Percy, an errant truant!" exclaimed the young girl; as the richly attired figure of a tall and comely court cavalier rushed from the thick copsewood, and caught her eagerly to his bosom.

"Be merciful, sweet Anne!" replied the youth, and his voice was low and musical—"be merciful—nay, be just. The king would have it that I should join him in the hunt, and so I could not say nay. By our blessed Lady! but 'tis a merry sight to see these nervous Frenchmen lagging with sheer intimidation when the shrill bay of hound and scent of flying hart invites them on. Oh! for the blithe hunters of merry England!"

"And her blithe dames, too—ha! is it so, Percy? Hast tired so soon of Anne? Well—well! thou art free to go!" and the young girl started from the bosom on which her fair head had rested, whilst a bright tear came peering through its dark lash, and her voice grew tremulous with emotion.

"No—no! Not that, Anne—not that! Never will I leave these shores of France till thou goest with me! I spoke but of the chase—the wild, glorious chase. Our own broad parks and proud old oaks—tall elms, far-spreading beeches, and scented hollies; our crouching deer, and oven the tiny, sly burrowing rabbit; our dense groves, where the ancient Druids might have held their orgies, with the solemn brow of nature all around. And the cheery sound of the unleashed hounds, sporting wildly mid the green glades and tall fern; the beautiful falcon, perched upon its lady's finger, and it jesses ringing sweet music as they trotted merrily along. They were thoughts akin to those that made me wish for England"—

"And not the bright eyes of Catharine's court!" interrupted the young girl, with a bright smile playing round her rosy lips—half jest, and half in earnest.

"They were bright, indeed, sweet Anne," he replied, bending fondly over her, till their dark tresses mingled, "could they out-vie the tell tale harbingers of love that even now are glistening with the tear-drop of imaginary wrong."

"You say not this to lull me, Percy—be sure of it! There are many tales abroad here in this licentious court—tales that redound naught to thy credit—tales of ill-requitted love, and heartless sacrifices"—

"Tut! tut!—Sweet Anne, this is cruel—unjust. Ha! there's a step in yon pavilion!" suddenly whispered the young noble, as he drew the trembling girl beneath the darker foliage shadow.

"Pray God! it be not the king!" murmured Anne, as she crept close to the side of her companion till both arms were twined around his bending neck, and her face buried in his jewelled vest—"If it be he, I am lost—undone!"

"Nay, fear not, Anne! Where be great England's king himself, he would not dare to do thee harm, and Percy thy espouser!" and the noble gently lifting her from his bosom, unsheathed his glittering rapier, and would have rushed into the pavilion, had not the young girl wildly caught his arm, and bade him pause.

"Stir not, Percy! on thy life, stir not!" she said. "The queen thinks me in my own quiet chamber, for I plead sickness to meet thee here, and if I am discovered the foul tongue of slander will brnit to the world!"

And even as she spoke, a loud strain of music came floating from the festal halls, and the light laugh of toysome dame and high-toned jest of flattering courtier were heard, as the festive revellers descended to the gardens, and mingled in its many labyrinths.—Anne quickly caught the sound of footsteps approaching their concealment, and with a shudder crouched down behind the seared trunk of a large tree, trembling like an aspen. The echoing footsteps of the intruders grew nearer, and the heart of the young girl throbbed still more wildly. Suddenly the moon broke through a mass of fleecy clouds that had half hidden her bright beams, and piercing down an open space through the leafy canopy, shone full upon the lovers. With a short, stifled cry of terror, Anne sprang quickly into the deeper shade. Her companion forced back the crimson blossoms of a creeping vine that twined around an alcove by his side, and the young girl darted into the flowery recess.—The young noble gently laid his hands upon the lower limbs of the densely foliaged tree, and with a light spring vaulting among its branches, his concealment was perfect.

Near and still nearer came the noisy revellers, crushing the dew-sprinkled greensward beneath them as they approached, until at last they stood beneath the foliage that hid the noble. With a burst of enthusiastic delight, one young creature pointed out the beauties of the creeping vine, and the fluttering heart of Anne grew more tremulous, her low breathings came in broken gasps, and a misty film gathered beneath the intensity of her gaze.

"Oh! what a sweet spot!" broke forth from the midst of the gay assembly—"look! how jealously yon creeping vine doth play the sentinel to that charming grotto!"

"My life on it!" exclaimed another, "but we could find some stray, love-seeking troubador lurking amid its fragrant labyrinths!"

"Dare you be the first to enter, Count?" asked the first speaker of a gentleman at her side.

"Ay," he replied, "right willingly, madam."

"What!" said she, laughing, "even if the spot be guarded by some envious dragon?"

"Yes, madam—even then."

"Without axe, or mail, or lance, or holy relic?"

"Still then!"

"Or scarf, woven by thy lady-love?"

"Yes!"

"Then thou wert most rash—nay, unthinking, and not fitted to be knight of mine! I'll none of thee, Count! Why, thou wouldst be vanquished in sheer want of common prudence!"

"Nathless, Sir Count," cried another lady—"thou might as well rouse up the jealous beast—so, I'll beg of thee to enter!"

"I am more than bounden to thee, lady," replied the gentleman, in a mincing tone, in mockery of that supercilious gallantry, so much in vogue—"and will forthwith obey!"

"Not so—not so!" cried a voice from the foliage above them, and the form of young Percy sprang lightly to the greensward, and stood a barrier to the grotto. "Stand back, Sir Count! You enter not here!"

A loud laugh followed the sudden appearance of Percy, from the group assembled, and the lady who had spoken before cried out, laughing all the while with right true glee—

"There—there! Said I not so, Sir Count? By our Holy Mother! but this dragon hath a goodly shape! Maybe he guardeth some light-o'-heart for himself—if it be so, he is a most selfish beast, and will need reproving! Go on, Sir Count—go on!"

Again the somewhat intimidated Count made a feint to pass, but the young Percy stepped promptly forth, and bade him pause, in no very courtly terms.

"It is impossible, Sir Count, that you should pass—and if you be a true gentleman you will not seek to meddle where you are not concerned!"

"Oh, ho!" again laughed the blithesome lady—"'tis a courteous dragon that will make peace at all. Profit by it, Sir Count—I prithee, profit by it! Let him not show his teeth, or he may frighten the wits from us poor women!

"Oh! what a goodly outside falsehood hath!"

"There, now—I'll give you something better to do than plagueing a poor dragon. Come with me—come!" and then her shrill musical laugh rang out again, making a thousand echoes on the night wind, until she paused for very want of breath.

"Even as you wish, lady, answered the Count—though, in sober truth, it be something new here in this Court of France, for any, save the King himself, to make restrictive laws within the royal gardens. It shall be looked to!"

"As soon as may be!" impatiently replied young Percy, "as soon as may be! I will answer to the King in person."

Fearing lest a quarrel might come of such argument, the ladies moved slowly from the spot, and Lady Francine De Marc, she who had tempted the fuming Count to enter the flowery grotto, now tripped pleasantly to his side, and taking him by the arm, whispered, hurriedly—

"Tush, man—tush! Never speak of certainties again, for you are blind! It is the young and favored Englishman, Lord Percy; and he is as rash and hot-headed a youth as ever balanced a true rapier. Thou can'st get nothing from him—so content thyself."

"Not so—not so! I'll be even with him yet, or there is no valor in all France. Why, sweet Lady Francine, I trow you would have us bow to these presumptuous Englishmen, in mean submission to their every will, as if we were not lord and master of this fair soil."

"Which, I doubt me much, whether you truly be—but enough of this. If there be certainty at all, it is that Percy has some light dame concealed within the grotto—now who it is, I think I can divine.—What say you to a queen's maid?"

"Nothing, but that it be rank calumny!"

"We shall see, Sir Doubtful! Our fair sister Anne left the royal presence an hour ago to cure her headache. Methinks she might have chosen a more apt place than the damp greensward, with the heavy dew springling around. What think you, Sir Count?" and Lady Francine De Marc looked full in the face of her companion, and noted well the effect her playful bantering had upon his darkened countenance.

It had been hinted among the thousand rumors of the Court, that the Count d'Aubri, the young, gay, and gallant Count, had bowed in homage to the charms of the queen's beauteous maid of honor, Anne—and that his proffered love had been seemingly well thought of by the young Englishwoman, for she had avowed her preference for him in many light words of jest, which had been, more than once, set down for sober earnest. The Count, too, had boasted of his success, and in all the drinking bouts of the young noblemen, no name sounded from the flashing brim of Count d'Aubri's glass save that of "Anne." Lady Francine De Marc had probed his feelings, and the magic of her words spoke boldly out in the flushed face of the Count, and his vain strivings to restrain his rising anger. When they had gained the principal balcony which overlooked the gardens of the palace, Count d'Aubri proffered an apology and immediately withdrew.

Chapter II.
THE PLOT.

It was full two hours past midnight, ere the brilliant throng that crowded the vast receiving chambers had deserted their enchanted precincts. The loud bursts of boisterous mirth had sunk into the feeble shout for lagging retinues, and the dismal rumbling of the cumbrous vehicle that bore its tired inmate from the varied scene of exulting triumph or biting disappointment. The dull gleam of the waning night-orb flitted in grotesque shadows amid the manifold abutments, and grooved doorways, and arched recesses of the stupendous masonry, rendering them alive with countless forms, and then as quickly merging all in impenetrable gloom.

Pacing with rapid and impatient strides a paved corridor leading to the garden promenade, was the cloaked figure of a cavalier, his face shaded by a cluster of black plumes, bending from the front of a richly jewelled hat, that was drawn far down upon his forehead. He was booted and spurred, too, for his hasty strides gave out a dull, ringing echo from the marble pavement, and the steel point of a rapier now and then glittered beneath the edging of his cloak.

"Hist! hist! Marie!" muttered the cavalier, and he suddenly paused in the centre of the corridor, as if some sound had caught his ear. "Hist! I say. Marie—girl—is it you?" he again repeated; but no answer came to his questioning, and he resumed his rapid gait with more impatience than before.

"In the fiend's name! why doth the girl tarry thus beyond the time. Ere long the unwelcome light of day will be upon us, and then—ha! Marie!" he suddenly exclaimed, as the girlish form of a soubrette came tripping lightly from the gardens with a shaded night-lamp hid 'neath the folds of some dark drapery that hung loosely from her head.

"Here! cavalier! Quick! for Heaven's sake!—The Queen is suddenly ill—a moment more, and the whole household will be astir!" she hurriedly repeated, in an almost breathless voice, whilst the cavalier drew from his bosom a small, neatly folded billet, and placed it in her hands.

"You have admittance to the Queen's chamber—say you not so?" asked the cavalier; and for a moment he drew back the shade from the flame of the lamp, so that the light fell full on the well-filled purse he hung across her arm. The same gleam displayed the frowning features of the cavalier—they were those of Count Claude D'Aubri.

"Yes," replied the soubrette; "what then?"

"You will drop this as if by accident—but so that it may draw the attention of the Queen, for whom it is intended. Choose well your time, and you will be successful."

"But—but if discovered? It may be treason, or what not, Sir Cavalier, and then the penalty would be the dungeons of the inquisition, or maybe, the block, or"—and the girl's voice grew trembling, and her face blanched with fear.

"Fear nothing—you take not the slightest risk, and no harm can come of it!" quickly and impatiently answered her companion. "But should you be questioned how you came by the billet, then say you had it from the young Englishman, Percy, and was bid to deliver it to Mademoiselle Anne, the Queen's favorite Maid of Honor."

"Then—then, there is no treason?"

"Wilt be a fool?—I tell thee, no! Be cautious, and you have earned a fortune."

The echo of footsteps suddenly came from the entrance to the corridor, and D'Aubri drew the soubrette into a recess, as the low sound of voices came floating on the still air.

"Look, Percy!—the lights are moving from window to window, as if some commotion, sudden and unusual, had roused the household. What can it mean?"

"Nothing, love—the revel held long to-night, and it must be the palace attendants seeking their beds."

"God grant it may be so, Percy,—but I am nigh dead with fear! Would the morrow were come!—There was a world of meaning in the light words of Francine de Marc—she has ever stood between me and the favour of the Queen, and I do think she means me harm. Her majesty once hinted to me of our loves—I mean you and I, Percy—and then I had to blush and droop my head, for the serpent-eyes of de Marc were bent upon me, and I could not help thinking she knew something of our meetings. So when I made no answer to the Queen, she laughed outright, and then reviled you as a debauchee, and worse—a betrayer!"

"Indeed—indeed! Did she so, Anne? Did she dare speak thus in the presence of her Majesty?"

"Yes—and more. She spoke of what it becomes not a young maiden to think of, and what I dare not tell."

"Well, sweet—mind her not! She did, indeed, well nigh frighten thee to death to-night, for when they had all gone, and I drew thee from the grotto, fainting, and cold, and pale, I thought thou wert dead. And so long did I chafe thy temples, and call thee back to life, with thy head buried in my bosom, like a sick child's, that I feared me thou would'st never revive."

"But I was frightened, Percy—indeed I was! I thought that flippant, odious Count would pass you, and then"—

"Hark, there! listen!" suddenly exclaimed Percy. "By Heaven! there is some one in the corridor!—Good night! God bless you, Anne! Good night!" and the young nobleman quickly flung open an entrance-door to the left, whilst Anne darted in, and flew along the lighted halls till she reached her own chamber.

"Now, then," said Percy, as he drew his rapier, "if it be an eaves-dropper, he suffers by this hand! Ho, there! lights this way!" he continued, as a number of the palace servants passed the corridor entrance with lighted torches. The men paused at the abrupt summons, and in an instant the long hall was illuminated from end to end. But no sign of human being was to be found secreted; a profound stillness reigned, interrupted only by the suppressed mirth of the men at the palpable perplexity of the disappointed Englishman. Percy rudely grasped a torch from the hands of one of the attendants, and peered into every corner and recess of the corridor, but nothing of life was visible. Still he doubted not the acuteness of his own senses—he could not be deceived as to the sound of a human voice!

"He must have escaped in the dark, Sir Cavalier!" said one of the men, with a low chuckle.

"There be no outlet, an' I know of it—so he e'en must have passed us as he entered, which I vow he did not!" said another, with sinister seriousness.

"If it be the devil, now!" repeated one in the background.

"The Saints protect us!" echoed another; "then he has dropped through the pavement."

"Silence, sirs!" shouted Percy, his face flushed with ill-concealed anger. "Dare you lie thus to the face of a gentleman? Do you take me for a fool, or worse, that I know not these licentious Courts of France abound in well-hidden door-traps, and sliding panels for guilt to refuge in? Begone—begone! or, by Heaven, I flay the whole of ye!"

With a stubborn murmur the men moved off, and again young Percy stood in the dim light that flickered from the half-hidden stars of heaven. It were bad enough that his interview with Anne had been listened to, but to thus open himself to the envious jeerings of the whole Court, was more than his proud spirit could brook—and so he paced the garden paths, muttering all the while like some chafed lion, till he reached one of the park gates, where, to his great surprise, he found a well-caprisoned steed fastened to the drooping limbs of an ancient oak, champing and pawing the earth, as if eager to snuff the fresh night wind at a full gallop.

"So, so!" said the young nobleman, "if this be fair dealing, I know naught of intrigue. Ha! the colors are those of Count Claude D'Aubri, who would feign

"Is it not natural," said Lady Duval, "that he should have edged his way to Lancelot's side while my sweet Anne was crouching, half dead with fear. And now I do bethink me, he is in some way concerned with to-night's mysteries. There are footsteps, as I live, coming this way!" And Percy started back to the dull shadow of the trees, whilst Count Claude d'Aubri, with a loud and eager tread, appeared in the open glade, accompanied by a slight youth attired in the rich habit of a court page.

"You will fail in none of my instructions," said D'Aubri, as he loosened the reins of his steed from the tree bough, "and more particularly have a cautious eye on the movements of the soubrette, Marie."

"I'll be watchful as the lynx, Sir Count," replied the page; "for I do mistrust the girl Marie. She was the waiting-woman of the Queen's maid Anne, when she first came from the English Court, and I do think she will yet slide her allegiance."

"Well, she must be cared for!" was the answer of D'Aubri; "for she, too, overheard the parting interview of this hot-brained Englishman and his coy damsel. Now, then, adieu—and if inquiry is made, you will remember that the Count d'Aubri left Paris for Versailles an hour before midnight."

Saying this, D'Aubri gave a free rein to his horse, and in an instant was out of sight, whilst the page disappeared down the glade.

"Ha! ha!" laughed Percy, as he came out from his concealment, and waved his clenched fist after the receding horseman—"A courtly rat this! By Heaven! I gave not the dull-headed Frenchman credit for half so much brain! Go on, sir—go on! The meshes must be thickly strewed that can entrap a Percy! Ha, ha!—I like this—it grows spicy, and makes one blood tingle with the hope of action. Come on, rare tricksters! In defiance, and in the full face of the whole Court of France, I'll win thee yet, my sweet Anne—and wear thee too! So help me God!"

And with another mocking laugh, and his brave heart throbbing in the wild energy of his purpose, Percy wended his path back to the Palace.

Chapter III.

THE ACCUSATION.

The grey shadows of the morning were peeping from the East, and still the brightest star in the firmament of that proud Court, the sweet and gentle Anne, sat in the solitude of her own quiet chamber, with her young heart beating wildly between hope and fear. And yet it was more like a dream to her than aught else—for never before had the sweet sunshine of her life been dimmed by a single shadow—never before had she felt the bitter agony of doubt. She had poured forth the rich jewels of her heart at a hitherto strange altar, and her woman's soul trembled at the sacrifice. She felt that she was loved—she knew it—and yet she was afraid! The whole enthusiasm of her being was turned toward him, and she thought of him the more that she was forbid by the imperious sway of Court intrigue. And he—so true, so noble, so brave, and yet so gentle. The romance that he had woven in his own mind did not admit a particle of the cold ceremonies of courtly etiquette; he had loved to figure it as something apart from the world. A life with her he loved, of ardour and passion, and sunny hours, unclouded by regret, unchilled by reserve, but all boundless confidence and unrestrained affection. And who is there that has not dreamed so once?

As the bright beams of the day-god spread wider and brighter, Anne wondered much that none had been to summon her attendance upon the Queen or to hope her better from her sickness. Her fair head was bent down upon her hand as it rested on the crimson surface of a pile of velvet cushions, and her low breathings came as from one who stands in some imminent danger, made more appalling from uncertainty and darkness, and tottering between the slow-tongued voice of doubt, as it falters—"stand?"—or else, "go on!"

A low, hesitating knock echoed from the grooved panels of her chamber door, and with a quick start, she sprang to her feet.

"Come—come in!" she uttered, in a voice tremulous with emotion, and then added—"Who is it?"

"I—only me, Mademoiselle," replied the soubrette Marie, as she slowly opened the door, and, with a hesitating step, entered the apartment.

"A sweet morning, Marie—has the Queen risen? I have been well nigh dead with this torturous aching in my temples," and Anne pressed both hands tightly to her brow as she added: "or else I should have paid my respects. Did her Majesty rest well? There was some noise in the courts below during the night—and I feared me much they would disturb her."

A torrent of crimson mounted to the burning brow of the soubrette, and she stammered forth something to the purpose that the Queen had been unwell, and wished for her attendance immediately. The young girl promised a hasty compliance, and the soubrette withdrew.

Anne stood gazing after the retreating form of Marie, and then, when the closing door had once more left her alone, she sank down upon her knees, and, prayed fervently—she felt that she was threatened, and she prayed for strength to abide her trials—she knew that the malignant shafts of envy would catch at the slightest web that closed around her, and she prayed that the treacherous toil might not circle him—that he might stand unscathed, while she bowed to the storm,—that his heart might overleap the adversities which surrounded them, and if it could be so she was content to suffer.

She rose to her feet refreshed and strengthened, and without a moment's more delay, hastened to obey the sudden summons of the Queen. As she passed through the saloon leading to the waiting-room of the Queen's apartments, she thought a coldness brooded in the manners of even those sycophantic Court gossips who were ever alike ready to fawn upon the favored, or tread upon the unfortunate. She missed with wonder those seeming anxious inquiries as to her night's repose; and the same lips that had always welcomed her with a smile, now passed her with a mocking curl.

Sickened at heart, poor Anne entered the Queen's presence—she had heard the sound of many voices in loud debate ere she entered the chamber, but her appearance, like some fearful spell, brought with it instant silence. An icy coldness pervaded the manners of each as they returned the usual salutations of the morning, and Anne, all alone amid so many souls that sought her ruin and disgrace, trembled like a child.

The Queen rose instantly to her feet, with ill-becoming haste, and cried out in a harsh tone, such as the poor girl had never heard from her before—

"So, Mademoiselle! you have come? These are rare times, indeed, when the majesty of France must abide the will of a tire-woman as to her presence, or not."

"Your Majesty!" exclaimed Anne, almost angrily, for there was much of taunting scorn in the Queen's words: "I understand you not! and never have I known a lacking of respect in this fair Court until the present moment!"

"Fair words!" repeated the Queen, now roused to unrestrained anger; "but know they avail you nothing here! Fair words, in truth! What, Mademoiselle, are our very Courts of France to be made a rendezvous for ingratitude and low intrigue"——

"Intrigue!" interrupted Anne, quickly; "intrigue! What means your Majesty?"

"Good Heaven defend us! That so much guilt should put on such a show of innocence, is most unnatural and outrageous. See here!" and the Queen drew from beneath the cushions that lay beside her, a small billet, stamped with the seal of the young Lord Percy. "You know this, Mademoiselle?" exclaimed the Queen, as a flush of crimson lit up the pale face of Anne; "you know this!—or else that tell-tale blush knows not the heart from which it sprang—Read, Lady Francine—pray read this precious billet!" and she handed the note to the Lady Francine de Marc who stood immediately beside her, and who, in a loud, clear tone, read aloud—

"Sweet Anne—To tarry longer here will be as death to our loves—we must away from this irksome Court, as hateful to you as to all who love truth and innocence, and in the quiet of some more happy spot, end our days in peace. The eyes of malicious envy are around us, all eager for our ruin—why then linger in the midst of so much treachery and deceit?

P."

The crimson flood had grown deeper and darker upon the brows of Anne, at every word the reader uttered—and now, when she had finished, and still stood with the billet held out triumphantly towards her, the swelling heart of the young girl broke forth in words—

"It is a vile forgery—my life, my soul on it!—What!—will your Majesty give credence to such an offspring of hate and envy? Indeed—indeed you know him not! for never could his noble spirit stoop to council wrong, even to his enemies. Why, your Majesty, it bears upon its very face the impress of a falsehood: for how came the billet in other hands than mine, if he had so directed it?" and at the thought of driving back the lowering clouds that hung around his name,—for she reckoned not of her own reputation as suffering too—a bright smile of earnestness lit up her beautiful countenance, that might have banished malice even from the heart of a fiend.

"Subterfuge!—subterfuge all, your Majesty!" exclaimed the Lady Francine de Marc, seeing that the Queen waivered in her mind as to Anne's guilt—"The maid Marie is here to prove its source—so there can be no doubt! Let her step forward."

The soubrette stood out from the throng of attendants, at the summons, pale and agitated.

"You received this billet from the young Englishman, Lord Percy—say you not so?" And Lady Francine bent her basilisk eyes full on the flushed face of the soubrette, as if to force the quivering falsehood from her lips.

"Stay, your Majesty!" exclaimed Anne, "in love of justice, I pray you pause. You see the girl hesitates—she answers not willingly. By our holy mother! the cankering lie that trembles in her untrue heart, dares not breathe its venom."

"Too warm—too warm by half!" said Lady Francine, in a mocking tone, and bending her head to the Queen's ear—"You see, most gracious lady, that our English sister fears the girl's answer."

"If she utters truth," interrupted Anne, whose quick ear had caught the words whispered to the Queen—"if she utters truth, I fear nothing!"

"In God's name, then!" said the Queen, "let the girl speak! What say you, mistress, from whose hands came the billet? Speak out, and mind it be the truth!" And turning to where Anne stood, the Queen said, "Will the girl's answer content you, madam?"

"I dare say it will, your Majesty," answered Anne, "for I cannot think the girl means ill of me, who has ever been a kind mistress."

The maid stood confounded—her eyes were bent down to her feet, and the crimson tinge came and fled from her face like the lights and shadows of a mirror trembling in the sunlight.

"If it be—if it be the truth then"—stammered the girl—"why"——

"If it be aught else than the truth, girl," exclaimed the Queen, angrily, for the maid's hesitation had turned the tide of feeling in her naturally kind heart, to the side of her favourite—"if it be aught else, I say, by heaven, the blessed light of day shall be closed upon thee for life!"

"Then—then—it was"——

"Who—who, girl?" exclaimed Lady Francine De Marc, stepping from the side of the Queen, and grasping the maid rudely by the arm, her eyes flashing, and her whole being grown desperate in the intense excitement of the moment.

"Justice!—shame!" was echoed from the throng, and Anne, darting quickly forward, caught up from the floor a woven purse, which had fallen from the clothes of the soubrette at the instant Lady Francine had grasped her arm.

"Look—look, your Majesty! if these be not the colors of the Count d'Aubri, there's no truth in heaven!" And Anne held up the purse to the gaze of the whole company. "Now if the billet came not from the same source"——

"It did!" gasped the soubrette—"it was given me by the Count d'Aubri, who bade me say it came from my young Lord Percy!"

"Thank heaven for that!" murmured Anne, "his name is yet bright and clear as the sun's light! I am indeed content, your Majesty, for truth has triumphed! This same Count d'Aubri has long been a disregarded suitor of my unworthy favors, and thinking my Lord Percy stood in his way, he has no doubt planned this most odious plot to ruin his rival—if he be so at all!"

At the instant the young girl ceased speaking, a loud cry of "Treason—treason!" rose from the palace garden, and Anne, springing to a window that overlooked the courts below, saw a mass of human beings swaying to and fro towards a centre, where, quick as thought, her glance singled out the tall plume of Lord Percy. A hundred blades were glittering in the sunlight, but above them all flashed the bright rapier of the English nobleman—it sank—and when it rose again, was darkened by a crimson stream of dripping blood! Then rose a scream—so wild—so thrilling—so intensely piercing,—that the whole passionate multitude beneath was lulled to a fearful, death-like silence—a shriek which seemed to echo a whole life's agony, concentrated in one awful moment!

Anne lay senseless in the arms of the Queen!

Our tale ere this hath run its allotted course. The brighter side of that mysterious picture, Love, has been held towards us; but now, when gloom, and doubt, and insincerity cast their shadows like a deep pall upon the fair surface of our painting, 'tis time to pause. Revenge was satisfied—but its triumphant echo was the dying moan of Feeling!

They had met—Percy and d'Aubri—but the hot passions of the Englishman had goaded him to words of insult, which met with defiance from his opponent. They fought—and life was the forfeit of the Frenchman's treachery.

The tribunal of justice and the laws demanded atonement—so the victor's wreathing laurels were gathered in the prison cell. It was a brief detainment, though—for when the shades of night had covered up the earth, an angel form had come to cheer his heart's deep solitude, and, by the mighty talisman of power, to fling apart the stubborn bars that held him captive. A steed, strong-limbed and well caparisoned, stood champing the forest's marge, to bear the prisoner to a sea-port town—and thence to England!

So this was the parting interview of Anne and the young nobleman—there were vows, and prayers, and protestations of fidelity,—and bitter tears and choking sobs—but why need we linger here—they were all spoken—all forgotten! It was a dream, that while they slumbered in its phantasy, took all the gorgeous hues of endless happiness and bliss.—But years had fled, and waking time had come. It was the last earthly meeting of Lord Percy and Anne Boleyn.

THE VEILED LADY; OR, WHO CAN SHE BE?

BY NED BUNTLINE.

"With the rough blast heaves the billow,
In the light air waves the willow,
Every thing of moving kind
Varies with the veering wind;
What have I to do with it or,
Dull, unjoyous constancy?!"—JOANNA BAILLIE.

"Up! thy charmed armor don,
Thou'lt need it ere the night be gone!"—DRAKE.

"Dulce, will you go to the masquerade ball, to-night?" said I to my lesser-half, on a bright evening during the gayest part of the "carnival season," in Cuba.

"No, my amor," answered she; "I am ill this evening; don't go out to-night, but stay by my side, and let your cheering presence save a doctor's fee."

"Madame, you know that I had made up my mind to go out in my new cabellero's dress: you are not very ill; and I shall be dull company for you if disappointment holds a berth in my mind. You had better consent to my going; I will return early."

"Do as you please, sir," she responded, poutingly; "but if you neglect me thus in the first year of our marriage, how shall I be treated when Time's shadow shall darken my brow, and dim the light of my eyes; when my spirits shall droop, and my beauty fade, before the wintry frosts of age?"

To shorten my yarn, reader, I rigged myself and went to the ball, my heart beating a "conscience-tattoo" against its casing all the way; for well I marked the soft reproach which my wife's full dark eye spoke when I left her side.

Having arrived at the ball-room, I mingled with the gay maskers, listened to the music, and in the sparkling wine-glass sought for excitement; yet that perpetual drum-stick of conscience kept thumping against the parchment-head of reflection, and I could not feel happy. Dressed as attractively as possible, I sought and danced with the fairest maidens in the throng; yet still, Thought, that nettle in life's garden, kept Joy in a distant offing, and Pleasure far in my wake.

I was about to give up the chase for enjoyment, and had dutifully made up my mind to return home and moor myself alongside of my little wife, when a fair hand was laid gently upon my arm, and a tremulous, musical voice asked me, in a whisper, to retire a little from the crowd. The hand was delicate, and seemed smaller even than my wife's: and the taper fingers were encircled by rings of rare value, such as could only be worn by the rich and the titled. The lady was closely veiled in black; yet I caught one glimpse of eye-light through the thick crape. In the blackness of a night-storm, I have seen the clouds for a moment open and permit a star to glance with supernatural brightness down on the agitated ocean; and even so fell that glance on me. The voice was one of those which, when it falls upon the ear, vibrates along every nerve until it reaches the heart-strings, where it echoes and re-echoes, till Memory "catches the tune," and too truly for it ever to pass from her grasp.

I followed the stranger's invitation; and as I gazed on the fairy form which flitted before me, I forgot my little invalid at home. The "mask" was but little if any larger than my wife; yet there was a fullness and elegance of figure, a grace and voluptuousness of motion in the former, which I had never observed in the latter. My wife had beautifully soft, glossy curls of jet, but they could never compare with the black tresses of twining silk, which hung nearly to the feet of my strange charmer.—When we had got clear of the throng, she again spoke:

"Are you a gentleman?—one on whom a lady may in all honor depend?"

I answered, that to the best of my knowledge and belief I was, and thought I might be depended upon.

"Would you risk your own life, or destroy that of another, for a lady, if her honor required, and her love would reward the act?"

"For one so fair, so angelic as yourself, I would risk more than life!"

A shudder seemed to pass through her form; her little feet stamped the tesselated floor impatiently; her fingers were clasped together until they were bloodless, as she continued:

"Have you ever loved?"

"I may have felt a school-boy's passion," I replied, with assumed indifference.

"Then you are not married?"

"I have been," was my reply. Even so deceitful is man; even so is woman often lost; for while he pours forth his flattering tale, she listens; listening, she loves—loving, she is lost.

Again she showed marks of impatience and excitement, as if some great trouble rested on her mind. This I pressed her to reveal to me, offering every aid in my power to defend her, or even to avenge past wrong. I besought her to have confidence in my affection, new-fledged though it was, and to test its strength, even as she might direct.—She faltered, hesitated for a moment, and then, requesting me to await her return, hastily left the ball-room.

"Now," thought I, "here is a scrape for a sober married man to get into! Perhaps she may be some beautiful syren, who has laid a trap to inveigle and rob, and perhaps to murder me! Shall I await her return?—or shall I fly the danger? But I am armed—why should I fear?"

I began also to think of my poor invalid wife; and these thoughts, coupled with my fear of betrayal, by the aid of a little more solitude, would have conquered me, and sent me home; but, at this critical moment, the "mask" returned, bearing in her hands a heavy black veil. She beckoned me to follow her into a neighboring street, where, in a moment, we stood beside a close-curtained volante, into which she sprang, I following her. She immediately enveloped my head in the veil which she had brought, cautioning me on my life not to attempt to remove it, unless at her request.

The carriage started off with speed; indeed, the driver seemed to be urging his horses to a rapid gallop. Our road was long; for even at this speed we must have ridden for two hours, some of the time over rough, rocky roads, and then along smoother ways, when at last the panting animals were brought to a stand.

Immediately thereafter I heard a creaking noise, as if a port-cullis were suddenly raised, or some old gate swung back on its unoiled hinges.

"Speak not a word, whatever you may hear; attempt not to raise the veil, or your life and mine may be the forfeit!" whispered my fair guide; and while she spoke I felt that she trembled from head to foot. Her hand was cold as ice, and her impetuous voice stifled and husky. Before we advanced from the carriage, she also made me vow by all the saints in Heaven, never to reveal what I might do or see in that night's adventure.

She then led me cautiously on, apparently through a large garden, for the cool night-breeze bore the perfume of orange, citron, pink, lemon and spice blossoms to my cheek. We soon arrived at another door, which creaked rustily as it opened before us; and then our way seemed up a winding stone staircase, through a passage so still, so solemnly silent, that it even echoed the light foot-fall of my companion, while my own heavy tread rang, like groans in a cavern, through the still, damp air.

Until now, the lady had not spoken since we had stepped from the volante; but, as we arrived at the top of the stairs, and passed into a warmer atmosphere, she whispered that the hour to test my courage and love had arrived. We stepped across a soft carpet, and she seated me on a yielding cushion. I could see nothing through the thick veil which she had thrown over my face, yet a kind of blueishness in the darkness before me, convinced me that I was in a lighted room. No sound could I hear, save the suppressd breathing of my trembling companion, and the beating of my own heart. After remaining for a moment on the ottoman, which shook from her nervousness, she again addressed me:

"You are armed with pistol and dagger?"

"I am," said I, inwardly praying that I might have no occasion to use them.

"You will please give me those weapons," said she.

"Ah!" thought I; "I am betrayed; and she asks my weapons of defence, that I may be made an easier prey! Let me ask," said I, "your reasons for this strange request?"

"A true lover never asks for reasons from one in whom he confides," answered the "mask," adding—"The business I have in hand for you has need of courage, calmness and prudence: but your weapons could avail you nothing. They will not be required." She shuddered as she spoke; adding quickly: "Such as they have already done too much!"

She paused a moment, and seemed to be schooling herself to some dreadful task. Again she addressed me:

"I have a tale to tell you, sir; no, not a tale, but some questions to ask. Had you an only sister, one who was young, fair, innocent, and ignorant of the world's wickedness, and thus unprepared to cope with vile art and sinfulness; and should she meet with one who was in appearance all full of nobleness, purity, generosity, and true manliness; and, in her own full-heartedness, should she love him only as woman in nature's simplicity can love; and should he taking foul advantage of her affection for him, work her ruin, and having succeeded, then scornfully leave her without reparation, an outcast from even his bosom; a dark thing upon the world; unwilling to live, unprepared to die; and should she, in the hour when he spurned her, a dishonored thing, from his feet; even when she was pleading for the love and protection of one who with hellish art had wrought her ruin; should she in that dire moment of crowded miseries strike a poinard to his heart——"

"She would nobly do her duty!" cried I, excited to madness by the painful picture.

"Would you aid her in removing all the proof of crime?" continued the 'mask;' "would you assist that poor girl to place beneath the dark earth all that was earthly of her defiler?"

"I would! If thou art she, lead on. I am ready; ay, ready to do more! Would that my hand instead of thine had sent the recreant's soul to its hissing home! I love thee now better than before. True, thou hast been dishonored, but thou art avenged!"

"Be not too hasty, sir," said she; "let me sketch you one other picture, before I call on you for action. Again I will suppose you have an only sister. I will suppose her, with your full knowledge and consent, to have given her affections and her hand to one whom you believe to be noble, manly, and in every way calculated to make her know the true bliss of existence. She loves him, even over the bounds of this world's adoration; watches for his smile as the flower beaten down by the rain waits for the sunshine; sighs and droops when the clouds of sorrow cast their shadows over him; joys when his hopes brighten; ministers to every comfort, and seems a being as closely bound to him as light is to the diamond. Suppose that he to whom you have entrusted her, the innermost heart-jewel of yourself, the bright corner of your domestic fire-side; imagine that he should grow cold and unmindful of her peace; that his love for her should fade; that her smile should fall upon him cold as torch-light on a funeral pall; that her voice should no longer be music to his ear, that he should seek for other smiles, and give to other ears the words which were alone her due; when you saw her drooping, fading, dying, beneath the shadow of his neglect, what would you do?"

"Slay him! by the HAND which made me! I would slay him as a dog that had bitten or a serpent that had stung me!"

Even as I spoke, I thought of my own deserted wife, and Conscience "took a pull at the halliards" of my heart, and wrung it to the very core. I felt as if I could have given a world, had it been mine to give, if I could be placed alongside the couch of my lonely bride; and I vowed in my soul never to grieve her again, should I return unharmed from the dreadful scenes of that night.

"Lady," said I, "if your first tale be, as I feel it is, true: if you have slain him who wrought your ruin, and have chosen me to aid you in your dreadful task, I pray you hasten the deed. Let there be no delay."

"Then follow me!" said she; "you need not follow far."

She led me on a few steps, into what I supposed to be another room; here she bade me to pause, and calm myself. I must acknowledge that I felt greatly agitated; but mustering all my self-possession and presence of mind, I prepared to cast aside the veil, at her bidding and determined not to shrink from the horrible duty which lay before me.

She lifted the veil from my head. A blaze of light forced me to close my eyes; and then I dared not open them. Imagination painted a scene before me which I feared to gaze upon. At last shame unclosed my eye-lids, and I gazed around. . . . Surprise almost stunned me.

It could not be!——yet so it was! I stood within my own bed-room! The stranger raised her mask. My wife's large black eyes looked sorrowfully out upon me; she cast the long tresses of glossy hair from her head; and then appeared her own soft curling ringlets playing about her neck. She had fallen upon this plan to punish me for seeking pleasure at a time when she, by reason of sickness and suffering, could not enjoy it with me. She had indeed taught me a lesson of conjugal fidelity.

My own volante had driven me at full speed over half the city! I had been led through a back-gate and had traversed a part of my house which I had never before entered; and all through the contrivance of my witch of a wife! Borrowed jewels had disguised her hands; she had spoken in an altered voice beneath her mask; and I, had actually fallen in love with my own wife!

What a 'fix' for a married man to be in!

THE GOVERNESS.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

One evening, as Doctor Winterson was sitting alone in his office, busily engaged in perusing a recent number of some medical work, a letter was put into his hand from an old class-mate by the name of Norman. It was now nearly thirty years since they bade each other farewell at the University, where each had been a successful student. During this time they had always maintained a friendly correspondence, though they had never met. Doctor Winterson, who was heir to no hereditary wealth, had a long and severe struggle with poverty, and did not find himself in a situation to conclude a matrimonial engagement into which he had entered while studying his profession, till he was upwards of thirty.—Norman, on the contrary, came into possession of a valuable estate by the decease of his father, soon after he left college, so that there was no obstacle to his marrying a beautiful girl, to whom he had been affianced since his boyhood. His object in addressing his friend on the present occasion, was to inquire if he could recommend some young lady, who would be a suitable governess for his two unmarried daughters, one of whom was fourteen, the other twelve.—

His eldest son, he informed him, who was to inherit the greater portion of his wealth, was travelling in Europe, and his second son, Arthur, who a year previous had completed his studies at the University, was in the office of a celebrated lawyer four or five miles from home.

Doctor Winterson, after reading the letter, recalled to mind every young lady of his acquaintance, whose education fitted her for a governess, and whose situation, in a pecuniary point of view, would make such an employment desirable. He could only think of one, whose name was Ann Westbury. He immediately sought his wife, named the subject to her, and she agreed with him in thinking that Miss Westbury was well qualified for the station. It would likewise be a very desirable situation for her, as her father had recently met with several heavy losses, which had sunk the family from a state of affluence into one of decided poverty. He therefore called at Mr. Westbury's, found the family at home, and read to them Mr. Norman's letter. Mrs. Westbury was somewhat appalled at the distance being several hundred miles, but Ann, full of hope and energy, was delighted at the prospect of engaging in an employment which would be the means of bringing back to the roof-tree, many of its former comforts. Doctor Winterson answered his friend's letter by the next mail, informing him that he had engaged a young person by the name of Westbury, as governess for his daughters, and that she would, nothing in providence preventing, be at his house in about two weeks time.

Miss Westbury, who was unable to make any addition to her wardrobe, immediately commenced repairing it. Her cousin, however, an orphan and an heiress, whose name was Harriet Westbury, determined in her own mind to supply every deficiency from her own purse, and to give Ann and her parents an agreeable surprise by sending a well-filled trunk just as she was ready to leave home. This she could do without difficulty, as the cousins were so nearly of a size that an article of dress made for one, would exactly fit the other. Three days, however, previous to the one appointed for her departure, from overworking and from the excitement produced on a somewhat nervous temperament at the idea of leaving home, and of the duties on which she expected to enter, Ann was seized with a violent fever. Doctor Winterson, who was immediately summoned in his professional capacity, was not without apprehension that the disease might terminate fatally, more on account of the restless and painful anxiety she manifested at the idea of being unable to fulfil an engagement which had promised to bring so much comfort to the family, than from its possessing any peculiar malignancy. He had just been to make her a visit and was musing upon what might prove the best means of allaying her excitement, when he met her cousin, Harriet Westbury. He mentioned the subject to her, and likewise dwelt with much regret on the disappointment of his friend, Mr. Norman.

"I have thought of a plan which will put all to rights," said Harriet, after a few minutes' reflection.

"I should like to hear what it is," said the Doctor.

"I will go to Mr. Norman's myself."

"Go yourself! Surely, you are not serious."

"I never was more so, in my life. I should like a change of scene—above all, some useful employment: for I have been dying of ennui ever since I left school. It is true that I don't need the compensation, and intend, therefore, to give every cent of it to Ann, who, the moment she gets well enough, can take my place. Such an arrangement will, I think, be more likely to quiet her than all the anodynes that were ever invented. But you may not think that I am qualified for the situation."

"As far as a knowledge of those branches of learning you will be required to teach, you certainly are, but the duties of a governess involve a great deal more."

"Certainly—I am fully aware of that. May I ask in what particular you think I shall be mostly likely to fail?"

"As I am both old and old-fashioned," he replied, "I will at the risk of being considered ungallant, confess that I think you will prove deficient in both patience and perseverance. Conscious wealth, too, may, without your being aware of it, cause you to assume an independence of manner not altogether proper in a governess, or which, at least, might not be well received by your employers."

"Doctor Winterson, I have more energy and perseverance than you think I have. Should the proposed plan please my cousin, I am determined to take her place, and I am likewise determined to acquit myself in such a manner, as will meet the approbation of those who employ me."

"Then I think you will succeed," he replied. "A person resolutely bent on performing a duty properly, seldom fails."

When Ann was made acquainted with her cousin's intention, she not only acquiesced, but as Harriet had imagined, gradually dismissed the subject from her mind, now that there was a prospect of her obtaining the situation, as soon as her health was re-established.

Harriet Westbury arrived at the mansion of Mr. Norman on the day appointed, about an hour before sunset. It was Saturday, and Arthur, according to custom, had come home, that he might spend the Sabbath with the family, who had all assembled in the parlor, as eager to see him as if he had been gone months, instead of a week.

Mr. Norman, who was about fifty, looked younger than he was, his complexion being fresh and healthful, and his black hair untouched by the frost of time. Though his manners were equally cordial and urbane, the lambent fire of his clear, grey eye, indicated the irascibility of his temper. Mrs. Norman was a stately and still beautiful woman, with regular features, while her whole countenance was rendered brilliant and animated by her fine black eyes, such as, according to the poet's song, sometimes hide their beams behind the Spanish mantilla. Her parents were, in truth, natives of Spain, and her large, lustrous eyes, her dark, but clear skin, and her graceful and queen-like carriage, were such as not unfrequently distinguish the daughters of that sunny land. The two daughters, who were to be her future pupils, were as totally unlike in personal appearance as in disposition. Hesther, the eldest, had her mother's clear, dark complexion, and her father's keen, grey eye, and her features, though neither handsome nor regular, had a frank, agreeable expression. Ella was a beautiful, fairy-like creature, bearing no likeness to any other member of the family. Her father said she was the exact resemblance of his only sister, who died in childhood, and he thought with regret on the time when the sunny light of her soft blue eyes would be dimmed by those thoughts of sadness which maturer years ever bring even to the lightest and happiest heart. Arthur, who was a very fine-looking young man, had his father's handsome mouth, all his warmth and cordiality of manner, and a spice of his irascibility. In other respects, he was more like his mother; inheriting her fine black eyes, her dark, clear skin, and something of her natural grace and dignity of deportment.

It was the employment of only a few minutes for Harriet to note these individual traits, for as tea was nearly ready, she soon left the apartment to exchange her travelling dress for one more suitable to appear in at the tea table.

"How handsome our governess is," said Ella, the moment she had withdrawn. "I know I shall like her—don't you think you shall, Arthur?"

"I cannot form an opinion as soon as you," he replied, passing his hand caressingly over the light brown curls which clustered in rich profusion round her forehead.

"Ella thinks she shall like her because she has blue eyes and light hair, like her, I suppose," said Hesther.

"O, no—it is not that, Hesther. It is because she has such a calm, sweet look, and such a soft, gentle voice. And Arthur, did you mind how little and how white her hands are, and that her mouth is just like the one in the picture you admire so much?"

Arthur had minded all that had taken so strong a hold upon the imagination of Ella, for he delighted in whatever was beautiful. But his was the admiration of an artist. Viewing a fine picture, or statue, would have afforded him similar sensations of pleasure; for the idea that Harriet was his sisters' governess, effectually checked those sentiments with which he would have regarded so lovely a girl in a more exalted station. Mrs. Norman, with still higher notions of birth and rank, treated Harriet with a kind of benign condescension, not remarkably flattering to one who had been accustomed to rank with the first in the polished society of her native place. Mr. Norman, who cared less about what he considered were, at best, very unsubstantial distinctions, had made up his mind for Arthur, as a remedy for want of fortune, to marry an heiress. He had made no secret of this, his favorite scheme, and Arthur knew, that unless he should find some lady of wealth who would be willing to lay her riches at his feet, he should be obliged to earn a livelihood by toiling at his profession. This knowledge had hitherto served as a kind of armor to ward off those arrows from Love's quiver, which otherwise might have found him as susceptible as the young men of his acquaintance. From Harriet Westbury, the governess, there could, of course, be no danger, and precaution, which had been an ever watchful sentinel, was suffered to sleep. Mr. Norman was the first to perceive that there was danger. Though Arthur now found occasion to visit home twice and even thrice a week, instead, as formerly, only once, he had, as yet, never given himself the trouble to analyze the new set of feelings which were springing up in his bosom. He knew that Harriet was very beautiful, and very fascinating, but then was she not a poor governess? He could not, therefore, as the phrase is, be in love with her. Mr. Norman, as already mentioned, was more clear-sighted; and one evening, when Arthur, his thoughts full of the delightful ramble he had agreed to take with Harriet and his sisters, alighted from his horse at the head of a shady avenue which led to the spot where he expected to meet them, stepped from behind a tree, and in a stern voice told him he wished to have some conversation with him. As he at once saw that his father was in no mood to receive excuses, he assumed an attitude of attention, though his eyes would wander, now and then, to catch glimpses of some snowy drapery that gleamed through the openings of the distant shrubbery.

"My object in now addressing you," said his father, "is to advise you to give up the study of the law, and learn a trade."

Arthur's large flashing eyes opened wide with astonishment at the conclusion of his father's speech.

"Now, I dare say," resumed Mr. Norman, "you think I am joking."

"What else can I think?" replied Arthur.

"I will tell you, sir, I am not joking. I advise you seriously to learn a trade—a shoemaker's trade, for instance, for people are obliged to have shoes, though they may not be obliged to employ a lawyer."

"I don't know why that should be an argument for my abandoning the study of a profession which I chose in preference to undergoing the misery of idleness, rather than with the expectation of its proving a source of much gain."

"But affairs have now, it seems, assumed a different aspect. The question now is, not how you may escape the misery of idleness, but how you may earn your bread."

"I don't understand you, sir. Has anything happened?"

"Nothing that I know of, except that Mr. Arthur Norman seems to be in a fair way to win Miss Harriet Westbury, for a bride."

"I protest, sir," said Arthur, coloring, "I not only never attempted to win her for a bride, but I never thought of such a thing."

"How, sir," said his father, angrily, "are you villain enough to entertain dishonorable intentions towards a poor and friendless girl?"

"I am no such villain," replied Arthur. "That Harriet Westbury is a very lovely and fascinating girl, I confess. I will confess, also, that her charms have exercised great power over me; but till you presented the subject to me in a palpable form, I was not aware that I was standing upon such dangerous ground."

"The perceptions of the lady have been less vague, I apprehend. I should not wonder if she were in daily expectation of receiving a formal offer of marriage from you."

"O no, that cannot be," said Arthur. "Indeed, I don't think, were I to make her such an offer, that she would accept it."

"Were she a girl of real, sterling sense, she would not, but she is, doubtless, like other girls, and has her day-dreams of love in a cottage, without once considering that when poverty comes in at the door, love flies out at the window."

Mr. Norman was mistaken in his opinion respecting Harriet, for she had no expectation of receiving an offer of marriage from his son. By several casual remarks made by the latter, in the course of a conversation on the subject of marriage, she found that his views fully concurred with his father's, and that he felt himself obliged, if he married at all, to select a person for a wife who would bring him wealth.—She knew, likewise, that he had thoroughly imbibed the aristocratic sentiments inculcated by his mother; so that he would not be likely to entertain any serious thoughts of marrying a person who filled what he considered so humble a station. From the time she had been able to form an opinion as regarded his sentiments, she had determined not to inform him or any member of the family, under what circumstances she had undertaken her present task. She was not so blind as to be unable to see that he derived pleasure from her society, nor could she forbear observing with what ill-disguised uneasiness Mr. Norman, and subsequently Mrs. Norman—who, at first, put more faith in her son's unyielding pride—regarded every mark of civility he bestowed on her, however trivial. This, at times, though she felt that it was reprehensible, afforded her a kind of mischievous pleasure; for she knew it would have been their most earnest wish to promote a match between her and their son, had they known that she was not only an heiress, but connected with people with whom even the exclusive Mrs. Norman would be proud to associate.

The conversation with his father, caused Arthur to examine the state of his heart, which resulted in the firm persuasion that Harriet Westbury was exactly the person to make him happy. Still, he shrunk from the idea of marrying a portionless girl; for although he felt that he had the talent to rise to eminence in his profession, would it not, he asked himself, be a species of desecration, to make talent the means of earning his daily bread? This question was asked, not without certain misgivings, whether he possessed the energy and perseverance necessary to turn his education and talents to such a practical use. He finally determined, as the most prudent course, to exile himself from home as much as possible, restricting himself to one weekly visit, and then to sedulously guard every word and every look in his intercourse with Miss Westbury. All this self-communion was the work only of a few minutes, and as soon as he had adopted the above named resolution, he went in search of her and his sisters, that he might apologize for breaking his engagement. Ella, who saw him coming, ran to meet him, and considering it to be the safer way, he requested her to be the bearer of his apology to Miss Westbury, and then hastily turned away from her in the midst of her half playful, half earnest upbraidings. His mother, who from the window saw that it was not his intention to call at the house, was in season to intercept his retreat.

"My son," said she, "will you not give me a few minutes of your time? I wish to have some conversation with you."

"I am in haste now," he replied; "will not another time do as well?"

"No; the subject is of moment, and ought not to be deferred—but a few words may suffice. I wish to warn you against the arts of the governess. She is evidently using every effort to inveigle you into offering her your hand."

"You are mistaken, mother. Harriet Westbury is incapable of what you lay to her charge. Her intercourse with me has uniformly been marked with a reserve approaching, I have sometimes thought, to dignity."

"Poor girl," said Mrs. Norman, her lip curling slightly, with a somewhat scornful smile, "I should be gratified to know, whether her dignity is derived from wealth or exalted station."

"From neither, I presume, but from self-respect and conscious worth. Pardon me when I tell you that my views have changed with regard to certain particulars, within the last half hour. By making use of my own understanding, instead of leaning on that of others, I have come to the conclusion that real worth is dependent on neither wealth nor rank, and were it not that I have learnt too well, and enjoyed too long the many comforts derived from a judicious use of wealth, to be able to dispense with them, I would prefer to marry Harriet Westbury before any lady I ever saw. But do not knit your brows, my mother, for even were she willing to accept me, which I much doubt, I would not condemn her to the miseries of unmitigated poverty, which must be her lot were her fate united to mine."

"Really, Arthur Norman, I should imagine that you had been learning heroism and high-flown sentiment from plays and romances. You have placed the governess on a pedestal, and to carry out your romantic views, have nothing to do, but to worship in silence. But let me assure you, that if you dare to breathe a word of your foolish passion to its object, I will never again regard you as a son."

Saying thus, she turned from him, and with a proud and stately air walked towards the house.—Arthur, though he might have received advice, or yielded to entreaty, was not of a spirit to brook defiance. There was another consideration, likewise. The merit of the resolution he had taken, of avoiding Harriet, would now be attributed, by his mother, to her influence rather than to his own discretion and self-control, which was by no means gratifying to his feeling of pride and independence. The moment, therefore, that he parted with his mother, he would have sought Harriet and confessed his passion, had not the spectre, Poverty, still presented itself before him, and restrained his impetuosity.

Mrs. Norman, not content with warning her son, as soon as Harriet had returned from her walk, took her into her chamber and threatened her with instant dismissal, if she attempted to walk, ride, or even converse with him. Harriet very quietly, and without the least appearance of anger, promised to acquiesce, and even proposed remaining in her room whenever he came home.

Mrs. Norman fixed upon her, her keen, flashing eyes.

"Such entire, unresisting submission," said she, "I do not like. You over-act your part."
