"I am not acting a part, Madam," replied Harriet, with kindling resentment. "I came here in the quality of a governess, with no other design or wish, than to discharge my duties faithfully. Whenever I fail to do so, I am ready to leave at any moment."

"I accuse you of neither incapacity nor unfaithfulness; but there is madness in the idea, that a son of mine, in whose veins flows some of the noblest blood of Spain, should be in danger of yielding to the fascinations of one so infinitely beneath him."

Harriet, who with some effort suppressed her rising anger, contented herself with assuring her that she should religiously adhere to her promise, and then requested leave to retire to her own apartment.

Time passed on, and Arthur restricted himself to one weekly visit. Harriet, true to her promise, studiously avoided him. But the obvious care with which she shunned him, only served to give a more rapid development and greater intensity to the passion he was laboring to check. At length his feelings obtained the mastery over his discretion, and as he found it impossible to obtain an interview with her, he wrote to her in language that showed the sincerity and fervor of his passion; but while he implored her to consent to be his, he was generous enough to [illegible] the many privations which, as his wife, must unavoidably be her lot, unless he were able to gain that high stand in his profession, which, while it binds round the brow the wreath of fame, lays the golden gifts of Plutus at the feet. This letter he confided to the care of Ella, who promised to give it to Harriet when no other person was present. After carefully perusing it, she decided to accept his proposal. As long as she suspected that he considered wealth and high connexions of greater importance than personal worth, though she could not view his many noble and brilliant qualities with indifference, she kept a vigilant guard over her heart, determined not to yield its affections to one, who might feel degraded as well as flattered by the unsolicited gift.

She had spread a sheet of paper before her, and dipped her pen into the ink, with the intention of answering the letter, when Ella ran breathlessly into the apartment, saying that a gentleman, who had just arrived in a splendid carriage, was in the parlor, and wished to see her. Harriet cast her eye out at the window as she passed, and instantly knew that the carriage and horses belonged to her maternal uncle, whose name was Lansing, and who had, for several years, been a distinguished member of Congress.—Mr. and Mrs. Norman, who were present, were somewhat surprised, that a person of so much distinction as Mr. Lansing should be so very glad to see a governess.

"I thought," said Mr. Lansing, addressing Harriet, "that, by this time, you might be weary of your employment, and have, therefore, come a few miles out of my way, to offer you a conveyance home."

The surprise of Mr. Norman and his wife, was not diminished by his addressing her in this manner; nor by the reply of Harriet, who said she would embrace the opportunity to return with pleasure, if her employers would consent to release her.

"We certainly shall not compel you to stay," said Mrs. Norman, "but I should think that we offer a very generous compensation for the comparatively light duties attached to your situation."

"The compensation is generous," said Mr. Lansing, "but as that is no object to my niece, possessed as she is of an ample fortune, the restraint which she must unavoidably be subjected to, may be somewhat irksome."

"Did I rightly understand you?" enquired Mr. Norman. 'Did you say that Miss Westbury is in possession of an ample fortune?"

"I did, and presumed that you were aware of the fact." Then, turning to Harriet, said, "you have not then explained to Mr. and Mrs. Norman, under what circumstances you undertook your present engagement?"

"I have not," she replied, "for as the nature of our reciprocal obligations could in no wise be affected by such an explanation, I considered it unnecessary."

"I will, by your leave, explain them myself, then," said he, "for as you were actuated by motives of philanthropy towards your cousin, who will now be able to take the place, which she could not, were it filled by another, I think there is nothing which need be concealed."

When he had finished his explanation, Mrs. Norman rose and took Harriet's hand.

"I would," said she, "ask you to forgive certain things I said to you a few weeks since, did I not think you to blame for concealing what Mr. Lansing has just made known to us, and thus suffer those deep-rooted principles, or you may call them prejudices, if you prefer—as regards the distinctions of society to take alarm, which education has taught me ought not to be violated. As it is, let us all agree to suffer the waters of oblivion to cover whatever has been unpleasant in our past intercourse."

Harriet expressed her willingness to accede to this proposal, and Mrs. Norman, who had now nothing to fear on account of her son, appeared so amiable and fascinating, that Harriet could hardly believe that she was the same stately and haughty lady, who always when in good humor, put on such an air of condescension whenever she deigned to notice her. The full tide of good fellowship already prevailed, when Arthur—no person having noticed his arrival—entered the apartment. He soon saw that the ice of his mother's dignity and reserve towards Harriet had melted away, but under the influence of what auspicious star, he was unable to conjecture. He soon, however, became one of the initiated, and that very evening Harriet Westbury, the governess, was his affianced bride.

THE DOOMED CAPTIVE.

BY THE LEYDON BARD.

Barr'd in the lonely cell he stood,
In thoughtful, melancholy mood,
With dark contracted brow;
A captive in a foreign land,
Imprisoned by a tyrant's hand,
Subdued by his supreme command,
So humble seemed he now.

Anon he paced the cold damp floor,
And glanced upon his prison door
At every passing sound;
The fatal hour was drawing nigh,
When he a traitor's death must die,
Condemned to lasting infamy—
In her foul fetters bound!

Yet flattering hope still lingered there,
As though to prompt his contrite prayer,
And bid his heart rejoice.
Mercy would hear his pla ntive tone,
And from her sympathising throne
Descend to make his freedom known,
As her wise, happy choice.

"Where linger now the vaunting brave,
Who swore to snatch me from the grave?"
The grieving captive cried.
"Why come they not to set me free
From this dark dungeon's misery,
And trample down the proud decree
Which has my life denied?

"And have they then forgotten now
That fervent, consecrated vow,
First made in days gone by?
When at the solemn signal word,
They met to draw the slaught'ring sword,
And from each trembling lip was heard,
'Let us be free or die!'

"Was it for this I braved the foe,
When every friend had fallen low
Upon the battle-plains?
For dashing 'mid the carnage cloud,
Where death shots thundered long and loud,
Is my reward a felon's shroud—
My grave a felon's chains?

"Ah no—I dream—it cannot be;
They sleep, no more to pity me,
Beneath the conflict's flood.
Their bones now whiten every hill,
Their homes are desolate and still;
Whilst every brook and mountain rill
Flows crimson'd with their blood!

"Oh, liberty—resplendent flame!
What crimes, performed in thy pure name,
Have shook thy sacred shrine!
Bereft of thee I gladly fall,
A victim to the tyrant's thrall,
Despised, defamed, unwept by all—
Justice shall yet be mine!

"Life, thou art sweet—but still more dear
When freedom's languishing career
Hangs on thy final breath.
I proudly raised the shield anou,
And led the raging legions on;
Their doom was, soon to be undone,
And mine, a traitor's death!"

Hark! now the dismal signals ring!
With fierce and fearful echoing
The populace replies!
The hoary deep-toned prison bell
Peals forth its solemn startling knell;
He casts around a last farewell;
He kneels—he bows—he dies!

'Twas done—the fatal deed was past!
But dim'd eyes sighed, and tears fell fast,
For that young captive's fate.
Then pity struggled to reply
To his full just imploring cry,
And fain would lend her sympathy,
But, ah! 'twas heard too late.

Years in their silence roll'd away,
The culprit long forgotten lay,
In his forsaken grave;
'Till friendship's hand, amid the gloom,
Reared up a simple marble tomb,
With flowers that shed a sweet perfume
Around the captive brave.

One night as shrieked the howling storm,
A pale and spectral female form,
Was seen to linger by.
She knelt, and gazed upon the stone;
Long mourned the dear departed one;
Then traced this epitaph thereon:
"He died for Liberty!"

THE SILENT GIRL.

BY REV. SAMUEL GILMAN, OF CHARLESTON.

She seldom spake; yet she imparted
Far more than language could;
So bird-like bright, and tender-hearted—
So natural and good!
Her air, her look, her rest, her actions
Were voice enough for her;
What needs a tongue, when those attractions
Our inmost hearts could stir?

She seldom talked; but uninvited,
Would cheer us with a song:
And oft her hands our ears delighted
Sweeping the keys along;
And oft, when converse round would languish,
Ask'd or unask'd, she read
Some tale of gladness, or of anguish,
And so our evening sped.

She seldom spake; but she would listen,
With all the signs of soul;
Her cheek would change, her eye would glisten,
The sigh, the smile upstole.
Who did not understand, and love her,
With meaning thus o'erfraught?
Though silent as the sky above her,
Like that, she kindled thought.

Little she spake; but dear attentions
From her would ceaseless rise—
She check'd our wants by kind preventions—
She hush'd the children's cries.
And, twining, she would give her mother
A long and loving kiss;
The same to father, sister, brother,
All around, nor one would miss.

She seldom spake; she speaks no longer—
She sleeps beneath yon rose;
'Tis well for us that ties no stronger
Awaken memory's woes.
For oh! our hearts would sure be broken,
Already drained of tears,
If frequent tones, by her outspoken,
Still lingered in our ears.

HARD TO PLEASE;

OR,

SHE MUST BE PERFECT.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

It was the misfortune of my brother, Henry Calvert, to lose his wife, a most amiable and interesting woman, and as he had not come into the popular doctrine that the true way of proving affection for the first wife, is by instantly marrying a second, I was invited to take charge of his family. It consisted, beside himself, of two children: Charles of the age of eight, and Julia, some two years younger. Were I writing for effect, I should describe them as prodigies of beauty and goodness, but truth being my object, I shall not invest them with attributes to which they could lay no claim. Julia was a quiet, affectionate little girl, with a reasonable share of comeliness and good sense, and Charles was manly and intelligent, with an honesty and singleness of purpose that augured well for his success in life, but still—he was a boy. Politeness and good breeding do not come by nature, and if the observance of the common courtesies of life require such constant enforcement, what must it be with the conventional usages of polite society. "Hoc opus, hic labor est" (indulge me, learned reader, with a touch at the classics), and though such continuous drilling cannot but be wearisome to the flesh, yet doubtless it is beneficial to the spirit,—as it certainly was in my own case, since it kept me in one perpetual hymn of thanksgiving that the sphere of my exertions was not more extensive. Charles was probably neither better nor worse than most of his contemporaries. He clattered about in shoes no way remarkable for their small size or high polish, and his fondness for personal neatness could not, strictly speaking, be said to amount to a passion. Interested in the auxiliaries of education, rather than in the cause itself, he was an adept in the manufacture of lead hatchets, red ink, and pounce, and gave practical proof of his belief in home industry, since his pockets were never free from choice bijouterie, in the shape of old nails, black wax, and elder pin-boxes. "Let not grandeur hear with a disdainful smile" of these simple pleasures;—they at least were innocent, and life is made up of small occurrences. At all events, they contributed to his happiness, and his smile was always pleasant, with the exception, perhaps, of that particular period when dental science levied her tax upon him, when it could not be denied, that it was more open than becoming. This special point in early existence is the least interesting portion of childhood, and furnishes a clue to the singular fact why so few marry those they have known from infancy, since there is nothing so killing to sentiment and young romance, as an early vision of your would-be lover "a-sitting on a rail," munching gingerbread, with a barn-door opening in his front teeth.

But to return to our hero. Years brought their usual changes:—in due time the kink got out of his back, the magic games of Hul-gul and Three Men Monis ceased to interest, and he could be induced to pay some trifling civilities to his sister, without invoking the parental mandate. His collegiate course was an honorable one, and when he graduated, with the highest honors of his Alma Mater, our pride was not a little gratified: He had grown up tall—"an excellent thing in" man; and though he could lay claim to no superior beauty, yet with his talents, his correct habits, and his frank and gentlemanly manners, he was a welcome guest in every circle. But, for who is not obnoxious to a but? he had his weakness. Possessed with a strong taste for reading, he had devoured every thing within his reach, and unfortunately the popular literature of the day had claimed a large share of his attention. The result was an unhappy one;—he was fastidious in his tastes, loathed everything that was dull and common-place, and was looking for a degree of perfection, at least in the female world, that never was and never could be realized.

The lumbering machinery of legal science, it was hoped, would act as a sedative upon his ardent imagination; but he passed through the initiatory studies, and entered upon its practical details, without its having any perceptible effect; and he would indite a sonnet upon the very heels of a case of trover, or concoct one of his most extravagant essays upon the back of that embodiment of dullness and tautology, a bill in Chancery. He was not, however, a mere idealist; he was fond of female society and frequented it, but none equalled the beau ideal of his imagination. One was too short, another too fat, and though occasionally he might meet with one who approximated reasonably near to his ideal standard of perfection, yet there was always some material objection; in short, he seemed in a fair way of remaining a bachelor for life, for the mere want of some perfect specimen of humanity upon whom to bestow the rich treasure of his affections.

It is one of the advantages of domestic life, that weaknesses of character stand little chance of becoming permanent from want of being properly exposed, and Master Charles's enthusiastic nonsense was treated with a degree of ridicule that would have angered a less amiable temper. His father, eminently rational and practical, had little sympathy with such refined absurdities, and was loud in his wishes that "he would settle in life," form a "suitable matrimonial connection," etc. etc.; phrases that were perfect gall and wormwood to his son's romantic ear, and which led to innumerable discussions.

"But," said I, one day, after a more than usually brisk debate—"if such consummate beauty is essential to wedded life, what is to become of that vast army of ordinary women that we are surrounded with? Are they to remain mere useless drones in the body politic?"

"Why, you seem to forget the promise," said he, "there swims no goose so grey, etc., and intended expressly to comfort your sex. You must remember there is an equal number of my own of precisely the same description, who stand ready to appropriate them. But you women have no just views on this subject—you receive our devoirs as a matter of course; whereas it is no small thing to offer to support, absolutely maintain a woman during her natural life, sick or well, just as it comes. Depend upon it, you have much to answer for on the score of ingratitude."

"Well, well,—the more merit then on your part, since you meet with so few returns; but self-imposed trials are not much entitled to sympathy. However I admit that such disinterested goodness would be unaccountable and perfectly intolerable to a generous mind, were it not for a sort of equalizing process going on in the world. You believe in the doctrine of compensations. Is it nothing to have a person always at hand upon whom you can exercise your spleen with perfect safety? No being turned neck and heels out of doors, no being incarcerated in a gloomy prison, which you surely would be, if such conduct took place anywhere but at your own hearthstone. Answer me that."

"Come, my esteemed aunty, you are getting quite too ferocious. You are a lone woman, and have been treated very ill, in your day, I've no doubt, but let 'bygones be bygones.' What I say, is the same that I have said a thousand times before, that I shall never marry a plain woman; I couldn't love her, at least in that relation," he added, hastily, in compassion, doubtless, to the old puckered visage that was gazing at him; "and I shall never consent to 'sign, seal and deliver,' until I have seen some person more attractive than I have met with yet."

"Oh! very likely your time has not come yet, but mark my words, young man, you will never meet with such a being as your fancy paints, for the best of all possible reasons, that such an one never had an existence."

"Well, then there never will be a Mrs. Charles Calvert, that's all."

"Oh! what pre-eminent selfishness, such an agreeable creature as you are, and such an ineffable happiness as you could confer—the only thing is, it would be too much for any one. However, just recollect my words, you will not only marry a plain woman, but you will confess to me on your bended knees, the absurdity of your former notions."

"Never, never," said he gaily, "but enough for the present."

Poor Charles had no better success than the cynic of old who went about with a lighted lanthorn in the day-time in pursuit of an honest man, and yet so earnest was he in his delusion, that I verily believe he never took his daily walk without believing some angel face would beam upon his path, or leave the city without a secret expectation that in some sylvan nook or secluded dell, a cottage maid would burst upon his sight with the usual captivating accompaniments of gipsey-hat, sunny ringlets, and wild flowers.

It was during a temporary absence of his from town, that Julia received a letter from a former school-fellow, accepting her oft-repeated invitation to visit her. Miss Murray was the daughter of a retired country gentleman, and though a constant correspondence had been maintained between them as beseems a boarding-school friendship, yet circumstances had prevented their holding any more direct intercourse. The announcement was received with unfeigned delight, and Julia was never weary of the praises of her friend.

"I hope Charles will like her," she exclaimed, as she read for the twentieth time her letter; "and I am sure he will; but I should hope for a stronger feeling, were it not for his absurd vagaries as to personal beauty; but Mary, though sufficiently well-looking, is not beautiful, and would not be considered so, and has, moreover, none of the languishing graces of a heroine. Her education has been solid rather than showy, and the only accomplishment she possesses is that of music, and this, too, not in a way to please a fashionable ear, for she has none of that oo-oo-ooing style of singing, like blowing through a tube, so universal among modern performers."

Miss Murray arrived in a few days, as per order, and my first impressions were agreeable. She struck me as well-bred and lady-like, with no particular beauty of features, but with a refined and intellectual expression. A short time convinced me she had been over-estimated:—she was full of mind and energy, with great warmth and enthusiasm of character, but with an utter abhorrence of affectation in all its forms, and particularly that of false and sickly sentiment. Were I inditing a fancy sketch, instead of a veritable history, I should paint her to suit the taste of a certain class of my gentlemen readers (if I have any) as a gentle, dependent creature, formed only to love and be loved, and who would hang, as it were, about their necks all the days of their lives; but Miss Murray was none of these, for though no termagant and sufficiently feminine, she had her own opinions and could maintain them; and there was a point and originality in her remarks, that might have degenerated into satire, had it not been controlled and checked by a severe self-discipline. When I add the crowning grace of her character, a deep and habitual sense of her responsibilities as a rational and accountable being, our visiter is before you.

I was not a little curious to observe the effect she would produce upon "our nephew," and I was kept not long in suspense, for he reached home a few days after arrival. Her reception of him was frank and cordial, as one of whom she had often heard, and with none of that simpering consciousness which seems to say, "Oh! here's a beau—what will he think of me?" There was, therefore, little occasion for reserve, and they were soon conversing with the ease and familiarity of old acquaintances. Contrary to his usual practice, under the plea of unusual fatigue, Charles spent the remainder of the day and evening at home, and a merrier party never gathered round the social fireside. When the usual adieus for the night had been exchanged, he reseated himself, and seemed disposed for conversation.

"So Miss Murray has been with you a week?"

"Yes, and is to remain a fortnight longer."

"Indeed—I wonder Julia did not write me. My services might have been of some use to them."

"Why, in the first place we were ignorant of your whereabouts, and in the second we might have interrupted a delicious affair with some angel beauty, and received little thanks for our pains; and as to services, there is no want of those where Miss Murray is, to say nothing of Julia."

"Is there anybody in particular?"

"Oh no; but she is a very agreeable girl, as you perceive; pity she is not a little handsomer."

"Why, she is not strikingly ordinary, I am sure; and no one can know her, without considering it a matter of small consequence whether she is beautiful or not. She certainly is, as you say, uncommonly interesting. Oh! there's nothing like mind and talent, after all."

"Of course, I think so; but some persons, you know, have an antipathy to plain people, and can tolerate no one unless they are beautiful. But how long is it since you became so enamoured of good sense, and such every-day qualities?—since to-day noon?"

"Why, when did you ever hear me speak disparagingly of such qualities?"

"Never, perhaps, in terms; but this is not what I wish to say. We are all so delighted with Miss Murray, that we are anxious to retain her here.—Who do you think I have selected for her?"

"I cannot imagine."

"John Gray."

"Has he ever seen her?"

"No, he has been absent; but I want your co-operation. Do invite him here. I am sure she would just suit him; neither too handsome, nor too plain, but just right."

"Well, indeed, I believe I must decline the honor. I never have turned my attention to match-making, and I think I never shall. But why are you so solicitous for Mr. Gray's happiness?"

"I told you my reasons if you had attended to them; but I suppose you liked Mr. Gray; I am sure I once heard you say that you thought any woman's happiness would be safe with him."

"All that may be true, and still it may not be one of the duties of friendship to provide our friends with partners for life. Most people claim that privilege for themselves; and Miss Murray, too, she may not like to be so unceremoniously tranferred to your favorite."

"Oh dear! I perceive you are in anything but a blessed frame to-night, so we will put an end to the whole matter. Mr. Gray shan't have Miss Murray, and Miss Murray shan't have Mr. Gray; each shall 'act conjunctly for himself,' that is, if you will let them."

It required no great penetration to discover what would be the result of all this so far as Charles was concerned; but it was not so easy to arrive at a satisfactory conclusion with respect to Miss Murray. It certainly would not have been surprising if a young girl, brought into constant proximity with an agreeable young man, and one too, who, do his best, could not conceal that he was getting desperately in love, should make the discovery that some people were vastly more interesting than others; but however this might be, Miss Murray had too much maidenly reserve and delicacy to voluntarily afford the slightest clue as to the estimation in which she held him.

Whoever wished to marry her, must ask her, and she would scarcely have been willing, even for the sake of securing that inestimable treasure (when a treasure at all) a husband, to follow the advice of a Reverend author, that if a lover hung back longer than was needful, "to throw yourself a fair enchanting object upon his generous protection."

However, spectacles and experience are not given for nothing, and old bodies often see and understand more than is suspected. There was a mighty shaking of hands one night previous to separating, in which Charles figured somewhat conspicuously, and when it came to Mr. Calvert, senior, he in the warmth and plenitude of his affection,—for the undeviating good temper and sprightliness of Miss Murray had completely won his heart—blundered forth something about adopting her as his second daughter.—Now it was an old man's speech, and nothing more; and yet Miss Murray must needs color and avert her face, and as to Master Charles, he seemed wholly absorbed in contemplating the toe of his boot, just as if he did not know before that it wanted a patch.

But while we young folks were thus enjoying ourselves, to our hearts' content, our happiness received a cruel interruption by the arrival one morning of a young Master Murray, charged with special instructions, from the home department, touching the return of our young friend. His reception was not particularly cordial; but conscious rectitude and self-respect prevented him from feeling it the least. The dinner hour passed gloomily enough; an unwonted taciturnity prevailed, and poor brother and myself were at the expense of the whole conversation, sustained in a way I would fain trust that was not suggestive of second childhood and "garrulous old age." At tea it was not made better, and again we took the field, and by a series of rapid and brilliant manœuvres succeeded, in some degree, in restoring the spirits of the party.

At length, like old King Cole, we called for some music; and Charles, for the first time, roused himself, handed Miss Murray to the piano, and prepared to do the needful. Now it was natural, at such a moment, when one young guest was so soon to leave us, that I should lay aside my knitting and look at her. I appeal to the reader if it were not so; and yet, innocent as a lamb as I was, and thinking of nothing at all, I saw, despite my failing vision, something that looked the least bit in the world like incipient love-making. Whatever it might portend, of this I am certain, that Charles, after giving a hasty search among the music, at length selected a song, and quietly calling her attention to the title, placed it, with some significance, before her. Now whether it was the sentiment which pleased him—

"Lady, farewell! but ere we part, Accept my vows so true!"—

or whether it was the vignette, which represented a lover kneeling before his mistress, with his hand on his heart, placed somewhat lower and more central than physiologists usually assign it, I am unable to say. I only know that Miss Murray sang with less self-possession than usual, and that when she had finished it, she rose and left the instrument.

The next day Miss Murray left us, and the very spirit of dullness took possession of the family.—Charles seemed to make himself over to a sort of tender melancholy, which lasted several days; till finding it excited no particular solicitude, he very wisely concluded no longer to let concealment prey upon his vitals, but to come forth and "own the soft impeachment." A favorable moment soon occurred, and after considerable beating about the bush, which I was determined not to understand, he continued:

"Yes, Julia is, indeed, most fortunate in her choice of a friend. Ah! if she could only be persuaded to make us another visit."

"Perhaps you could persuade her," said I, carelessly.

"Do you think I could? Do you think I could?" said he, with much more animation than my remark seemed to call for. "Can you give me any hope?"

"Hope? for what? If it's a visit you mean, certainly. She is an obliging girl, and if she knew you had set your heart upon her spending another month with us, I dare say she would strain a point to accommodate you."

"But, then, if that visit was for life!"

"For life!" said I, laying down my work, and looking as if the idea had for the first time presented itself. "What do you mean?"

"Why, to ask her to become my wife, if I must put it in plain English. You seem wonderfully obtuse to-night?"

"Your wife! You are not serious?"

"Perfectly."

"Oh, impossible, impossible! What, you, with your romantic notions of exquisite perfection, marry a plain piece of flesh and blood like Miss Murray? I'm dreaming. Give me a pinch to wake me!"

"Why, in the first place," continued he, evidently nettled, "I do not agree to the truth of your remark that she is so plain; these things are mere matters of opinion. I never expected to go round with a pair of dividers and ascertain how near the woman I fancied approached to the Venus de Medici. And in the second place, if I've come to my senses, it ought rather to be a matter of congratulation than ridicule."

"Well it is, it is, I assure you; but you must allow for the disappointment of not having a perfect angel united to the family; for though I think Miss Murray is sufficiently well-looking, you must admit she is not much like those ethereal creations you have raved all your life about. I have seen many who had the advantage of her. How much you must have suffered in relinquishing your long-cherished notions! I declare, my heart bleeds for you."

"You may spare your pity, every bit of it;—but the next question is, shall I succeed?"

"That's for her to say, not me; but I did everything for you in the way of commendation, while she was here. 'He may have his faults,' said I; 'undoubtedly he has, but they are all good, respectable faults,—he has no weaknesses of character, no romantic notions,—he is so eminently practical, and takes such common-sense views of life. It is really refreshing to meet with such a character!"

"Oh, I've no doubt you did, and made me ridiculous enough; but there's one comfort, if you ruined my case, you will suffer nearly as much as I shall. But as all lovers say, anything is better than suspense. I shall leave to-morrow; if I am prospered, then you may exercise you wit ad libitum."

He was absent a week, and when he returned the bright smile which illumined his features as plainly assured me of the result of his 'mission' as did the two short words which he breathed into my ear as he bent over to give me his usual affectionate salutation.

"But the particulars," said I, when the usual hour had arrived for uninterrupted communing. "I've a right to know the love affairs in my own family."

"Well, my experience confirmed the truth of the remark respecting 'the course of true love,' but unfortunately my difficulties might all be classed under the head of ridiculous. I found Miss Murray in the midst of her family, rejoicing in the possession of some half dozen brothers, all younger than herself;—not fancy boys, but the genuine article, with turned-up noses and dirty fingers, and who manifested quite as much curiosity to learn the business of their visitor, in despite of family winks and private nudges, as was consistent with perfect good breeding. She seemed much embarrassed at meeting me, and so many times inquired particularly concerning your health, in apparent forgetfulness that the subject had been thoroughly exhausted, that I began to fear you were suffering from some secret malady, of which I had been kept in ignorance. The family, of course, were inclined to treat me with hospitality, but how to find an opportunity to declare the object of my visit, was the question. The truth is, never was poor mortal so troubled to give it even the semblance of sentiment. A morning call, with little bullet heads glancing in and out of the room, was no time; it was too cold for an evening stroll, and pitch dark into the bargain; and a ride over the frozen grounds would have been utterly inadmissible, so that I feared I should be absolutely driven to ask her to give me a private interview in another apartment, and without any circumlocution put the question—'Pray, will you marry me, dear Ally Crocker?' However, 'where there's a will there's away.' In due time I blundered forth something which she understood, and in due time she accepted me, and there's the entire history of the affair; and I can assure you, the whole scene and its accompaniments were as little in accordance with my preconceived notions on this subject as you can well imagine."

"You expected she would bury her head on your shoulder in a transport of gratitude, I suppose."

"If I did, I was disappointed. I believe she would as soon have thought of cutting it off—and I am not sure but I like her the better for it. As to any emotion she displayed, the deponent saith not."

"No doubt, every thing was 'virtuousest, wisest, discreetest, best,' and then there was the asking Pa and Ma."

"Yes! but it was much less embarrassing and awkward than I anticipated. It seemed the most natural thing in the world that I should ask them for their daughter; and knowing her as they did, they must have expected as a matter of course that I should fancy her; but it cost them a great effort to resign her. Why, he said, and he grasped my hand warmly as he spoke, 'that she was the very joy of his heart,' and when I endeavored to express my sense of obligation for so priceless a treasure, his eyes moistened, and I am not sure but my own twinkled a little."

"But the time?—when is the happy moment?"

"Ah! there's the rub, I thought I was very good that I named no earlier period than next month; but will you believe me they would not listen to it before Spring, and Mary, too—she turned traitor and only laughed at my agonies. It was in vain that I entreated and implored, and expended eloquence enough to have immortalized me if it had only been in court or in Congress. I left nothing undone; I humbled myself upon my knees, I loaded her with reproaches, and her parents, till finding I could not be silenced, will you believe it, that she, the uncompromising advocate of liberty of speech and opposer of gag-law, went the unjustifiable length of putting her hand over my mouth. I think she did not get it away in a hurry! However," said he, pausing to recover breath, "our wooing was a most proper one, and I attended as strictly to the 'proprieties' as do dramatic authors to the 'unities.'"

"But, said he, after a brief silence, "it is not alone her unrivalled powers of conversation, or her delightful manners, that have won me—(here I am willing to abjure my former heresies, and admit that a fair outside is but of small consequence)—it is her strict religious principle, her noble and elevated views of duty for which I admire and love her, and would fain imitate her."

"Thank God," said I, much moved with the depth and earnestness of his manner, "and may He give you strength to do it."

"And now, my dear aunt, good night," said he, rising and affectionately kissing my cheek; "I believe I owe half my success to her love for you; but be that as it may, she's a dear good girl, and I wish she was here this minute."

Winter, tedious winter, at length passed away, and our hero was made happy by the possession of the lady of his love. The winding up was like all other similar occasions, the bride looked beautiful—(everybody looks handsome once—I wonder if I should!) the bridegroom tried hard to avoid the look of silliness, so universal in young connubial happiness, and the young Masters Murray, in imitation of their elders, squeezed out a few tears until the passing round the creature comforts rendered further sorrow utterly impossible.

And here we will leave them—Charles to rejoice that his eyes have been opened to discover, that there is "something than beauty dearer;" and both to realize, that life is made up of sunshine and sorrow, and that as we use or abuse it, it will be our happiness or our misery.

THE GAMBLER
OUTWITTED.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

One day last Fall, a knot of two or three well-dressed men were standing on the levee at New Orleans, talking and looking about them somewhat curiously, as an attentive observer would have seen, though an inattentive one would have deemed them little more than idlers. Several flat boats were at the wharf near by them, the owners of which were engaged in landing their cargoes. Three or four of these were laden with flour.

"Do you see that fellow on the levee, just over the largest of those three flat boats?" said one of the men alluded to, speaking in an under tone.

"I do," was the reply.

"He's the owner."

"Yes, I think that's clear."

"Keep your eye on him."

"I'll try; and if he gets beyond me, he'll be smarter than I think him."

"Look sharp. While you are dogging him, I'll attend to the whereabouts of the other flat boat Captain, the sleepy one who is sitting upon one of his own barrels of flour. I'll make something out of him."

The third individual of this hopeful trio, had said nothing. Now he merely remarked, sententiously:

"Be wide awake, both of you. There's good game in the field. You may depend upon me being in at the death, and no mistake."

"We mustn't be seen too long together," remarked the first speaker.

"No. Let us go into the city and then separate. We can return in a little while."

As suggested, the three went into the city, and there parted from each other. That night they met in a private room at a tavern in an obscure quarter of the city.

"All right, Jackson?" asked one of them, as they drew up to a table on which were decanters and refreshments.

"All right. The flour is sold to Mark & Blair. Five hundred barrels at five dollars."

"And paid for?"

"No. It isn't all delivered yet."

"What is the owner's name?"

"Morgan."

"Where is he from?"

"Cincinnati."

"And puts up———"

"At Randall's, in ——— street."

"He's rather green, I judge."

"Rather. I took supper at Randall's, and pumped out of him, after we left the table, all that I have told you. He says he will make a first rate trip, and clear at least four hundred dollars."

"He's not so sure of that!" was said ironically.

"No. Ha! ha! Not if I can get a fair chance at him: which I will, before he has his money in his pocket three hours. But, what have you done, Hamilton? How is your sleepy subject?"

"First rate. There's good plucking about him."

"The feathers will come easy?"

"Oh, yes—even without scalding."

"Who is the purchaser of his flour?"

"Old Garcia."

"Indeed! He's fleeced him, then, out of at least half a dollar a barrel in the price."

"So I thought, when I learned who was doing his business for him. But it isn't the case—he got five and a 'bit' for it, and that's a tip-top price."

"How came that?"

"He stuck out, and the old fellow had to come to."

"When does the settlement take place?"

"In a day or two. Meantime, he has bills to the amount of five or six thousand dollars to collect for merchants up the river. It will be a week or ten days before he gets through."

"Where does he put up?"

"At the Planters'."

"Do your work on him slow, but surely, Hamilton. Remember, that, sometimes, these sleepy looking subjects are rather hard to manage."

"There'll be little difficulty with old Slack."

"Slack?"

"Yes. His name is Slack. This is his first trip down the river."

"And it will, no doubt, be his last."

"Perhaps it will." This was said with a sinister chuckle, in which the other two joined.

Enough may be gathered from the conversations already detailed, to enable the reader to guess pretty accurately as to the character and occupation of the three men introduced.

About a month previous to this time, a man named Morgan, who kept a small store in Cincinnati, came home from his business one evening, looking gloomy and dejected. This was noticed by the quick eye of his wife, who said to him—

"You look troubled, James. Has any thing gone wrong?"

At first the man did not reply. But his wife was not to be put off. She came and stood close by his side, and laying her hand upon his shoulder, said—

"You know, by past experience, that to tell me of all that disturbs your mind, will not make your burden any harder to bear."

"I know that, Eliza. I know that you have even more fortitude than I have," was replied. "But, you have your cares at home,—why should I compel you to share mine?"

"Business is not good?" Mrs. Morgan said, in answer to this, preferring to lead him on to speak of what she instinctively perceived to be the trouble, rather than argue with him the point advanced.

"I am sorry to say that it is not, Eliza. To-day, I have made a thorough investigation of my affairs, and find that I am two hundred dollars worse than nothing. This distresses me beyond measure. Mr. Talbot, who so generously set me up in business, and who has for the past year been so untiring in his good offices, will, at this rate, be the loser by me. I cannot bear the thought. I did hope, and I have struggled hard to realize this hope, that in the effort I have been making to get fairly on my feet again, I should be successful. Now, I despair."

"Do not utter, my dear husband, that word which should be stricken from our language. There is no such thing as despair to any human being who will keep on striving to the end. Rather say, confidently, 'If I fall, I will rise again,' for this is a truth which every man will experience, if he but keep steadily onward. Do not forget that One sits above the clouds, to guide the whirlwind and direct the storm, permitting them only to devastate just so far as purification is necessary."

"Eliza! I do despair!" the husband replied to this, with bitter emphasis. Have I not been struggling for ten years with an honest purpose, and untiring industry, but struggling in vain? If, for a moment, I rise upon a wave, it is but to sink deeper the next moment. It is hard, very hard. Other men can get along—other men who think it no crime to cheat—but I, aiming in all things to do justice to my fellow man, find myself like a horse in a mill, again and again upon the spot from which I started. It is enough to make a man despair."

Finding her husband in such an unhappy mood, Mrs. Morgan said nothing in return, but let him murmur on until he had exhausted his complaints.—On the next morning he was in a calmer frame, but still much depressed.

"Something will turn up, James," said Mrs. Morgan. "It will not always be dark. I do not fear.—We have weathered many a gale, and will, I am sure, ride safely through all the storms of life."

"Perhaps so, Eliza. You are always full of hope, and it is, doubtless, much the best. But I cannot but be troubled when every thing around looks as gloomy as it now does. As to something turning up, that is pretty clear. I shall have to hand over everything to Mr. Talbot, who has been so kind to me, and have the satisfaction of knowing, that I have injured my benefactor. After all is realized that can be made out of my stock, there will be a deficit, as I before told you, of two hundred dollars, and that loss must fall, for the present, at least, upon Mr. Talbot."

"It cannot be so bad as that, James, surely," the wife said, betraying, in spite of herself, the real anxiety she felt.

"Yes, it is that bad, if not worse. I mean well. I strive to be honest in my dealings with all men; but, strange to tell, I am even injuring, pecuniarily, my best friends."

This was said with so much bitterness and despondency, that his wife did not venture to reply to it, lest her words should only have the effect to make him still more gloomy. She remained silent, and he showed no further inclination to converse.

On the next day, Morgan called in to see the individual he had mentioned as his friend.

"What ails you, Morgan, you look distressed?" remarked Mr. Talbot.

"And I really am," he replied.

"Why should you feel so, Morgan?"

"For the best of reasons. I cannot get along. I think there are not many who try harder than I do. But it's no use. I go backwards instead of forwards."

"What in the world does this mean? You seem to have given up all at once. Has any thing particular happened, that you are disturbed so deeply?"

"I have been making a thorough examination into my affairs."

"Well, what is the result?"

"I am at least two hundred dollars worse than nothing."

"Why, Morgan!"

"It is true," continued the man, emphatically, compressing his lips tightly, and looking Mr. Talbot steadily in the face.

"But how is it, Morgan?"

"I know but one reason."

"Name it."

"My expenses are greater than my profits. Business has been dull with me for some months. At this time, I am little more than making my rent."

"Humph!" ejaculated Talbot, and he cast his eyes upon the floor, and mused for some time.

"I wouldn't mind it so much," resumed Morgan, "if no one suffered but myself; I could bear to come down to the ground, if no one else were hurt by my fall. But I believe I am fated to injure every one who dares to become my friend."

"That is all folly, Morgan," Mr. Talbot interrupted him by saying. "No man should suffer himself to despond, for it is despondency that makes failure, while confidence is the forerunner of success."

"But, what am I to do? There is one fact that cannot be got over by any degree of confidence. I am two hundred dollars worse than nothing. Will confidence remedy that?"

"It will."

"Don't trifle with me, Mr. Talbot. I feel too serious to bear any thing just now."

"I am not trifling—I am in earnest. Confidence creates the means of success. A man who desponds when he gets into difficulties, looks down, and sees nothing but the hard, uneven ground at his feet; but he whose confidence is strong, looks up and around, and soon discovers new paths in which to walk.—Look up and around you, then. Think—but not of the desperate condition in which you find your affairs—that can avail nothing; think concerning the means of extrication from your present difficulties: that may and will avail much. If your present business does not give you a support, connect something else with it, or change it entirely."

"But see, Mr. Talbot, the strait I am in. How can I change it, when I have nothing to change it upon? My stock of goods ought to be sold off at once before they are reduced still further, and the proceeds paid into your hands."

"When, according to your own statements, I should be the loser by some two hundred dollars."

"It is too true." This was said in a gloomy way.

"How much better, then, will it be for you to seek some new channel of operations, instead of giving up your present efforts. Morgan! you must be more of a man. A true man never desponds but for a very brief season. He has confidence in well-directed efforts, and will make them."

"It is very easy to talk, Mr. Talbot—but what can I do? I have thought, but thought returns like the dove, weary. It finds no rest for its feet."

"Suppose I think a little for you?"

"Do, for mercy sake! If you can think to any good purpose."

"Have you confidence in your clerk?"

"Yes."

"In his honesty and capability?"

"I have the fullest confidence in both."

"Do you think your business would suffer if you were absent a few weeks?"

"No."

"Very well. Then I think I can help you to an idea. Try a couple of boat loads of flour down the river."

"There are too many in that trade now."

"That is only an assumption. The flour is the thing. If you go down to New Orleans with flour, you can sell it, and clear something neat."

"Where is the flour to come from?"

"Don't throw difficulties in the way. Are you willing to try?"

"Certainly I am, if there is any use in it, and I can get a cargo."

"If there is any use in it? I am really out of patience with you, Morgan! But to come at once to the point. I have about five hundred barrels on hand, and if you will go with them to New Orleans, I will charge you four dollars a barrel, and you may get what you can."

"The last quotation was at four and three quarters, I believe."

"Yes, and that will pay you very well."

"Yes, it certainly will; and if you do not see cause to change your mind, I shall be glad to make the trip."

This was said with a brightening eye and a more cheerful tone of voice. Hope had revived. There was something tangible presented to his mind, and he grasped at it eagerly.

In about two weeks, Morgan parted from his family, and with two well-laden flat-boats, commenced his voyage towards the Crescent city. Without accident from "bar," "snag," or "sawyer," he arrived in New Orleans; the period of time in making the descent of the Ohio and Mississippi, being just that required for his boat to float down with the gliding current. Much to his gratification, he made a quick sale of his flour at five dollars, and received a good price for the lumber of which his flat boats were composed. Altogether, the clear profits of the trip were very near four hundred dollars, after all expenses were paid.

Morgan felt very much elated at the success of this transaction, and could not refrain from speaking of it to one of the boarders at the hotel, a very pleasant, affable man, who had shown him many little attentions, both at dinner and tea time, and who seemed not only inclined to converse with him, but to take a good deal of interest in his affairs. To this individual, he communicated freely, all the particulars of his business, and was gratified to find in a stranger one who could sympathize with him, and find pleasure in his success.

"Come, take something to drink," he said to this individual, after they had left the tea table, and smoked a cigar together.

"No objection," was the quiet reply, and the two went up to the bar and took a stiff glass of brandy together. They then sat down in the public parlor, and entered into a very friendly conversation.

"Cincinnati, I am told, is a very pleasant place," remarked the new acquaintance.

"It is, certainly. Have you never been up the river?"

"No. My business keeps me close in New Orleans. And, as I am a business man, I never like to be absent from my post."

"That is right. In what line of business are you engaged?"

There was a slight pause, and then—

"I keep a hardware store," was replied.

"You do? Where is your store?"

"At No. 90 ——— street."

"Well, I must call in before I leave the city, and make a few purchases in your line. I have a store in Cincinnati, and generally keep an assortment of nails, hinges, locks, etc."

"I shall be happy to see you," returned the friend a little coldly. Then, after a short pause, he said—

"Your trip, this time, has turned out very well, I think you told me?"

"O yes; it has netted me handsomely. It is the first I ever made, but it shall not be the last."

"The river trade is quite profitable."

"So I find."

"How much flour had you?"

"Five hundred barrels."

"So much?"

"Yes."

"It sold very well?"

"O yes. Five dollars is a very fair price."

"Who bought it?"

"Mark & Blair. A good house, I believe?"

"Why—yes—tolerably fair. But—have they settled your bills yet?"

"No"—with a look of alarm. "Don't you think them safe?"

"O yes, I suppose they are safe enough. But I would advise you, as a friend, to settle with them as early as convenient. I tell you, but it is in confidence, that, to my knowledge, they are pretty hard run just now. No danger, I am sure; still, as I feel a friendly interest in you, I would suggest a settlement of your accounts as early as possible."

"I am really indebted to you more than I can express," Morgan said, with warmth. "The first thing I do in the morning will be to see after a settlement of my bills. If I were to meet with any losses here, it would completely break me up. Every thing depends upon the successful termination of this adventure."

"Don't be alarmed. There is no particular danger. Only it is best to be fully on the safe side."

"That it is. And I will put myself there right early to-morrow morning."

At dinner time the next day, Morgan again met his new friend, whose name was Jackson, at the table. The latter managed to get a chair beside him.

"Well, how are you to-day?" said Jackson, with a frank familiarity that pleased Morgan.

"Bright as a new dollar," was replied.

"I am glad to hear it. All right, I suppose, with Mark & Blair?"

"O yes—thanks to your kind hint. I had all my bills arranged this morning, examined and settled by a check for twenty-five hundred dollars."

"Which you cashed, of course?"

"Of course. Bank bills, any day, before private checks, say I. O yes, I got their check cashed in ten minutes after I received it, and here are the bills safe enough," placing his hand upon the breast of his coat, over against the pocket that contained his pocket-book. "I shall not leave for a day or two yet, as I have a number of purchases to make," he continued; "and but for your kind hint, for which I am greatly obliged to you, I should have left my money in the hands of Mark & Blair, and, perhaps, have lost it."

Jackson turned his head partly away to conceal the expression of his face. The pleasure which the communication just made, gave him, was so lively and so sinister, that he feared his companion might be roused into suspicion by it. As he did so, his eye glanced across the table. He perceived that an individual was looking at him, who, he had reasons for knowing, understood very well his character and profession. From that moment, he had less to say to Morgan, and before the latter had finished his meal, he arose from the table and left the dining room.

The individual, whose eye had disturbed Jackson, remarked the fact of his having left the table, to a person by his side.

"Yes; I observed him leave," was returned. "Do you know him?"

"I know who he is. Don't you?"

"No. Who, or what is he?"

"A villainous blackleg. A scoundrel, who has ruined more young men of our city, and fleeced more of the up-river folks, than any two of his abominable craft!"

"Indeed! I should never have suspected that beneath his open, bland countenance, was so black a heart."

"It is true, nevertheless."

"Do you think that is one of his companions with whom he has been chatting so closely?"

"No. You rarely see two of that trade very familiar in public. They ordinarily meet as perfect strangers, the more surely to act in concert when the time comes."

"He can't be a marked victim."

"Doubtless he is. Some man, probably, engaged in the river trade, who has just sold out, and has his pockets well lined with money."

"Some one should put him on his guard."

"Yes. It would be a charity to do so. But, one hates to meddle himself in these matters."

"True. But such a reluctance should be conquered in a case like this. A scoundrel should never be allowed to sacrifice an ignorant man, if a mere hint of the scoundrel's character will save him."

"True; but one don't like to be interfering in what is none of his business."

"It is every man's business to warn the unsuspecting of danger."

"Will you warn the stranger opposite?"

"H-h-em! I suppose, according to my own doctrine, I ought to do so. But it is a delicate matter to broach. And, after all, instead of a victim, he may be an accomplice in villainy."

"Exactly! And suppose it should so turn out? A man would feel pretty confoundedly queer, I'm thinking."

"So do I. Though, I am clearly of opinion, that it is every one's duty to warn the unsuspecting of danger, I also clearly believe, that in doing so, he should be very cautious that he does not wake up the wrong passenger."

"Upon the whole, I think we had better let this green one, if such he be, look out for himself. It may do him good to get his fingers burnt a little.—Any man who can be tempted to gamble, ought to pay a pretty severe penalty. Do you think a really honest-minded man could play at cards for money?"

"That's a pretty close question. Men who would resent an imputation of dishonesty with instant indignation, and, perhaps, shoot you for your trouble, play cards for money."

"I know that. But can such men reflect that it is not a high-minded, honest way of making money?—That, in gaming, there is no exchange of equivalents; no mutual good derived in the transaction. But as perfect an abstraction of money on the part of him who wins, as if he had picked his companion's pocket."

"I rather think your views of the matter too broad. I cannot assent to it. Persons who play cards do so freely, aware of the risks they run. If they win, it is all fair, and if they lose it is the same. I have known persons, who were not at all grasping, or money-loving, in their characters, who would play cards night after night, from the mere excitement of the thing, sometimes losing considerably, and sometimes winning. I do not call such dishonest men; but, rather, weak men."

"No doubt, there is a distinction to be made, such as you present; but, I cannot help thinking, that any man who is lured by a stranger into gaming, has in his mind a latent vein of dishonesty. He hopes to win, or he would not play. And I call that man dishonest in heart who desires to win money instead of earning it. To win money, is to take what belongs to another, without giving him something of equal value in return—and that, as I have said, I call dishonest."

The other made no reply to this: and the conversation ceased.

When Morgan left the dinner table, which he did soon after his new friend had retired, he looked around in the bar-room and parlor for Jackson, and felt some what disappointed at not finding him. After smoking a cigar, he walked out, intending to purchase some goods for his store, and have them packed for shipping the next day. He had only walked half a square from the hotel, when Jackson met him, and, smiling blandly as he stopped, said—

"Ah, well—how are you now? I had particular business to attend to, and had to hurry from the table. Which way are you bound?"

"I have a few goods to buy, and wish to attend to it this afternoon. Your store is No. 90, I believe."

"Yes."

"I shall call in. I want two or three kegs of nails, and several other articles in your line."

There was a pause; then, with a slight hesitation in his manner, Jackson returned—

"I am sorry that I shall not be at the store this afternoon. I have engagements that necessarily keep me away. Can't you come in to-morrow morning as well. I wish to sell you our goods myself."

"O, yes, I suppose so."

"Ah, well. I am glad of that. You expect to be engaged all the afternoon?"

"Yes."

"I'll see you at supper time, I suppose?"

"If you are at the hotel."

"I shall be there. I am regular in my habits, and never miss a meal."

At tea time, Morgan was pleased to find his agreeable friend at his side. They strolled out together after supper, and walked for half an hour, during which time Morgan was highly pleased with the affability and intelligence of Jackson. They were passing down a rather obscure street, when the latter, pausing before quite a common-looking coffee house, said—

"Come, let us have something to drink."

"Not here?" objected Morgan.

"Why?"

"Isn't it rather a low place? I don't like its appearance."

"Come in and see. It's one of the most fashionable places in New Orleans."

"Why is it such a common looking concern, then?"

"It's kept by an eccentric genius, who has got rich in the business. He won't move, nor fit up the outside of his house. But within, every thing is costly and elegant, and the eating and drinking first rate."

The two men then entered. Jackson hadn't exaggerated in speaking of the interior arrangements of the house. The bar-room was spacious, and brilliantly lighted with more than a dozen gas lamps, that were multiplied almost infinitely by reflections from mirrors, that sent back the rays in all directions. The room was actually lined with mirrors. The bar itself was marble, and all the fixtures of the most showy and costly kind.

There were about twenty persons present. Some were drinking at the bar; others sitting at tables, comfortably discussing their liquor and newspapers; while others conversed in small groups, or sat apart, with eye intent upon all the movements within.

"Is No. 10 engaged?" asked Jackson, in a low tone, as he stood beside the bar.

"No."

"Then send Dick up in a few minutes."

"Yes, sir."

"Come! Let us get out of this public place into a quiet room to ourselves up stairs. I'm sure it will be more pleasant to you."

"Certainly, certainly."

"This drinking of good liquor, standing at a bar, or sitting at a table, in a crowded room, is, at best, a low, animal gratification. But, a social glass, with a friend in a quiet room, is delightful."

"You are right," returned Morgan. "I, for one, never enjoyed drinking at a public bar."

This conversation, which took place after the two men had entered a small but elegantly furnished and brilliantly lighted room, was broken into by the entrance of Dick, the waiter, with his bow, and

"What will you take, gentlemen?"

"I'll take a stiff glass of hot whiskey punch?" said Jackson. "What will you have, friend Morgan?"

"The same."

"Two hot whiskey punches, good and strong, and half a dozen principes."

Dick vanished quickly. In a short time he reappeared with the smoking compound and cigars.—At the first sip of his glass, Morgan thought it tasted pretty strong—but this thought did not again cross his mind.

"Our friend below is unequalled in whiskey punch," said Jackson, filling his long glass a second time. "I never drink anything else here. Isn't it superb?"

"It is truly so."

"Did you ever taste anything like it?"

"No—never."

"I'll endorse that. Nobody ever has, except in this place."

In similar conversation about a quarter of an hour was spent, when Jackson had the satisfaction to perceive that the unequalled whiskey punch was doing its work on his intended victim, to his perfect satisfaction. The truth was, both the barkeeper and Dick the waiter understood the matter thoroughly, and had managed to get into the hands of Morgan a glass of punch of more than double strength.

We will not proceed further in detail here. It is enough to say that Morgan was introduced to several of Jackson's friends during the evening, and, finally, induced to play. Half intoxicated, or, rather, half insane from drink, he was led on from one heavy stake to another, until, when he rose from the table, he had not one dollar left out of his twenty-five hundred. He had played at poker with Jackson and two others. His losses nearly sobered him, before he was completely ruined. As his mind grew clear, he perceived that he was playing with men who were perfectly at home in the matter, and who ventured large sums with startling promptness. Determined, if possible, to cause his fellow players to throw up their hands rather than venture so heavy a stake, he put down his last five hundred dollars, and asked to see their hands. Jackson doubled that, and repeated the oft-uttered sentence—"I'll see your hand." Morgan could venture no more—all was upon the table. The other two players seemed to be in the same condition, or afraid to risk anything further. All the cards were shown. Jackson had three aces! He, of course, swept the board.

Instantly it flashed upon the mind of Morgan that he had been victimized by a regular black-leg. A feeling of angry desperation seized him. Springing, with a sudden impulse, to his feet, and bending over the table, with clenched teeth and hand, he exclaimed, in a loud voice,

"Infernal villain! Your cards were stocked."

The words were scarcely articulated, before poor Morgan fell backward, and struck heavily upon the floor. A blow from one of the party rendered him instantly helpless and insensible.

When Morgan's consciousness returned, he found himself lying on the floor, with his head under the table at which he had been playing cards, with such disastrous results. It was some minutes before he could set his mind in order sufficiently to obtain a realizing view of his condition. That was a moment of terrible agony in which the whole truth became presented vividly to his mind. His brain reeled, his bosom became oppressed with a feeling of suffocation. For a little while, it seemed as if life must become extinct every moment. To this succeeded a state of almost pulseless calmness, in which he thought distinctly of his wife and family—of his benefactor, whose money he had lost—of the consequences, to himself and all concerned with him, of his recent act of criminal folly.

"Madness!" he suddenly exclaimed, striking his hands against his forehead, and springing from the chairs, into which he had dropped on rising from the floor, as these thoughts awoke into a wild tumult the elements of his mind. "What shall I do? Where shall I go? I am ruined forever. Oh, my poor wife! My poor children! My injured friend!"

Descending, now, with a quick step, to the bar, as a sudden thought of his betrayal crossed his mind, he stalked up to the person who attended there, and said, abruptly—

"I have been robbed!"

"Indeed!" was the only reply; while a cold, incredulous smile passed over the features of the man.

Three or four persons only were in the bar-room, as it was late. These, startled by the tone and words of Morgan, gathered round him.

"Robbed?" said one of them.

"Yes, by a cheating scoundrel, with stocked cards."

"Oh!" was uttered in a tone of indifference, that said—"Is that all?"—just as plainly as the words themselves.

"Do you know the man who came in with me this evening?"

"No," replied the bar-keeper, with a slight curl of the lip; "nor you either. If you are fool enough to play cards and lose your money, have sense enough to pocket your loss and say nothing about it. Don't come brawling here. We know nothing about these matters, and care less."

At this rebuff, Morgan turned hastily away and left the house, his mind as wildly agitated as the waters of a whirlpool. Walking hurriedly along, without thinking or careing where he was going, he continued on until he suddenly paused beside the deep, dark waters of the Mississippi, that were rolling heavily onwards towards the gulf. The crescent moon, and bright company of stars, threw a faint light around, while their rays glittered upon the rippling surface of the river. No waking mortal was seen. Alone the distracted man stood, and looked down into the mysterious waters. Dark thoughts crossed his mind.

"Yes—yes," he murmured—"this buries all. Here the heart will grow still. I cannot go back. No—no—never! What! Meet my uncomplaining wife?—No! She will not chide me—she will only bid me hope. But I have cruelly wronged her, and cannot bear to look into her patient face. And he? Can I meet him? No—no—no! Never! Here all this may end. Here all had better end. So far in life I have injured every one who has loved me or befriended me. This shall be no more."

A sudden resolution to commit an act of self-destruction was about to be as suddenly taken, when there stole softly but clearly forth from the cabin of a boat lying near, a voice, singing a familiar song. The air was one which the lips of his wife had often warbled, and it brought up before his mind his home again, and his bosom swelled with new emotions—emotions of deep and yearning tenderness.

"Shall I forsake you now, dear ones?" he murmured, as his head sunk upon his bosom. "Shall I leave you alone and helpless in the world? I cannot—I must not! I will not!"

And turning from the river as he spoke, he took his way toward his hotel, where he passed the night, but not in sleep. On the next morning he looked about him in vain for his very kind friend. He did not make his appearance at the breakfast table. On enquiring for him at the bar, he could not make the bar-keeper understand who he meant.

"I'll find him at his store," he said, as he left the house. But the moment he uttered the sentence, it occurred to him that the store about which the man had talked, might only be a ruse to mislead him.—He, however, went to 90 —— street, and found that the house bearing that number was a dwelling instead of a hardware store. As he turned from it, his heart lying so heavy in his bosom that its pulsation was scarcely felt, he met Slack, the flat boat captain, to whom allusion was made at the opening of our story. They had become slightly acquainted, while unloading their flour at the levee.

"Good morning, Mr. Morgan! Why, my dear sir, what is the matter? Are you sick?" said Slack, speaking with surprise and concern.

"Yes—sick as death!" was the reply, while a shudder passed through the speaker's frame.

"Have you pain in the back or head?" This was asked with concern.

"No."

"Have you any pain?"

"Yes."

"Where?"

"In my heart."

"Morgan,—what ails you? You look wild and strange."

"No wonder. I have been robbed."

"What?"

"I sold my flour for twenty-five hundred dollars; received a check for it yesterday, and now every dollar is gone."

The poor victim wrung his hands bitterly as he spoke.

"Gone! Where? How? Robbed, did you say?"

"Yes. Robbed by an infernal blackleg!"

"You havn't been playing?"

"I was wheedled by a specious fellow into the insane idea that he was a merchant here, and took a friendly interest in me. He enticed me into a den of thieves—made me half drunk, and then won all my money from me by stocking the cards. I know he must and did stock them. When he showed his hand, he had three aces and two kings."

"The scoundrel! But, can't you find him?"

"No. And if I did, what more could I do now than blow out his brains? And I don't see what particular good that will do me."

"Humph! This is a devil of a place!"

This was said half to himself, by Slack, who remembered, at the moment, that a certain pleasant gentleman at the Planters' Hotel had been very friendly with him, and had invited him to the theatre on the night before; an invitation that he would have accepted, had he felt well enough to go out.

"Havn't you any thing at all left?" he asked, after nearly ten minutes' silence, looking into Morgan's face with a feeling of commiseration, as he spoke.

"Not one dollar."

"I am really sorry for you. Have you no acquaintances here?"

"None. And if I had, I am sure I should not call to see them now."

"You will want money to pay your expenses here."

"Yes. But"——

"You must call on me. I feel really sorry for you. And as your misfortune has, in all probability, saved me from the snare that is doubtless set for my unwary steps, I shall claim the right to meet your expenses here, and pay your passage up the river. I will return in two or three days, and shall be glad of your company. In the mean time, look about for the villain who has betrayed you, and if you can find him, and can do no better, why"——and he cracked his finger and thumb, to imitate the click of a pistol lock.

"I am deeply indebted to you," returned Morgan, with earnestness;—"but I cannot think of going home."

"Why?"

"A friend loaned me money to go into business. I did not succeed. My expenses ate up both profits and capital, and I was unable to return to this kind friend the amount he had advanced me. But he did not reproach—he encouraged me; and still further to assist me, he sold me five hundred barrels of flour at the lowest rate, and sent me to this city. I sold it handsomely, and netted something like five hundred dollars. But the flour is not paid for—and how can I return?"

"A trying case, indeed. Have you a family?"

"Yes. A wife and several children."

"Then you must return, and brave all. No man has a right to forsake his family."

"I feel all that with great force. I love my family. My wife is deeply attached to me, and will neither chide nor complain. But, see to what a condition my folly has reduced me! Ah! the thought almost drives me mad!"

"Who is your benefactor?"

"Mr. Talbot."

"Of Cincinnati?"

"Yes.

"I know him well. A more generous heart than his never beat in a man's bosom."

"True—true. But I have wronged that generous heart."

"I will see him myself. I will stop a day or two as I go up the river, and explain it all. He shall not think you regardless of him, or reckless of what he entrusted to your care."

"Thank you! Thank you! From my heart I thank you! I shall need your kind representations. But, even after all you can say, every thing will look black, and he cannot but justly reproach me."

Three days subsequent to this time, the three men, at first introduced to the reader, and whose profession, from their conduct and conversation, was so apparent, met one morning in a private room in the very house where Morgan had been fleeced.

"Nothing done yet, I suppose, Hamilton?" remarked one of them.

"No, Jackson. My sleepy subject is too dull to become inspired with even a desire to play."

The man addressed as Jackson, was very different in appearance to the one who had won Morgan's twenty-five hundred dollars. He had dark whiskers, and wore spectacles. Morgan's friend had neither.

"He has some six or seven thousand dollars, has he not?" was asked.

"Yes. That much, all told."

"And leaves in the Gazelle, this afternoon?"

"Yes, in company with your very particular friend, Morgan, who looks as if he had suffered from the seven plagues of Egypt."

"Ha! ha! He was easy to come over. I wish I could find his counterpart every day. I would retire from business in a twelve month."

"So would I. But this Slack must not escape us."

"No. We must give him chase."

"Shall we take passage in the Gazelle?" asked the third.

"I think we had better. I am sure that pidgeon can be plucked."

"And must be."

About four o'clock on the afternoon of that day, Morgan, feeling almost as bad as a man on his way to the gallows, accompanied by Slack, went on board the Gazelle. In about half an hour, the steamboat was pushed off, and commenced her voyage up the river. There were nearly a hundred passengers.

For the first day or two, there was a general reserve, such as is felt among strangers. After that, a more sociable spirit began to prevail. The ladies favored the company in the cabin with music.—Dancing was then proposed, and the second evening spent in a manner agreeable to all—Morgan, perhaps, excepted, who could not be interested in anything—his own unfortunate condition filling all his thoughts.

"Do you know," said Slack to him, during the morning of the third day, "that we've got the very kind gentleman on board who tried his hand on me in New Orleans, but without success."

"Are you sure?"

"Yes. I thought the voice of the man in the green coat, white vest, and scarlet cravat, had a sound familiar to my ear. And there was something in his manner that kept reminding me of some body I had seen."

"But why didn't you recogniza him before?"

"This man wears spectacles."

"The other did not?"

"No. But it's an easy enough matter to put on glasses. He may not be the same. But I have my suspicions."

"You mean the man sitting at the table now?"

"Yes."

"What are they going to do? Cards, as I live! Cursed be the day I ever saw a card!"

"Cards, ha! Well! Let us look on and see what course things are going to take."

The two men stepped into the cabin, and drew near to the table at which four persons had commenced playing. The game seemed more for the sake of amusement than anything else. The stake was only a 'bit, as it is called at the South—a twelve and a half cent piece. Nothing beyond this sum was put into the pool. After looking on for nearly an hour, Morgan and his friend went out upon the guards.

On the next morning, immediately after breakfast, the playing again commenced. Before dinner time the stakes were beginning to increase. A good many five dollar bills changed hands. Slack noticed that the individual he suspected did not join in playing, as he had done the day before. He observed him very closely, and began to doubt his identity with the very pleasant personage who had cultivated his acquaintance at the Planters' Hotel.

"I may be mistaken in that man," he remarked.

"Very possibly you are. But, do you know, I have felt strongly impressed for the last twenty-four hours, with the idea that the black whiskered, blue-spectacled man, who is playing at the table this morning, is the scoundrel whom I shall have cause to remember for many a day to come."

"Indeed!"

"Yes—but in disguise. These fellows readily change their appearances. Oh, if I was only sure of it, I would have his life, or my money!"

Morgan clenched his teeth, while his face expressed the murderous feelings he had uttered.

On the fourth day, Slack was asked by three or four different persons if he wouldn't take a hand, several tables having been formed, as the company generally were seeking to pass away time with cards, draughts, and chess. But he declined all invitations to play. At several of the tables, the stakes were getting high, and much money changed owners.

It was on the fifth morning that Slack, after having looked on for some time, went out of the cabin and stood musing upon the guards. While there, the individual who had excited his suspicions came up to him, and commenced a conversation on general topics, which gradually came down to the particular matter of steamboat conveyance, and the irksomeness of a two weeks' voyage on the river.

"Our friends inside are killing time, I see," he finally said.

"Yes," was the brief reply.

"And who can blame them?"

"No one, I suppose. Though I should call their manner of killing time rather dangerous."

"O no. I've been looking over, and playing myself ever since day before yesterday, and I havn't seen any sums of consequence bet as yet. I have been as high as twenty dollars out of pocket, and then it has all come back again. There are none but gentlemen here, and the playing is only for amusement. There isn't a single one of your black-leg gentry on board."

"Are you sure?"

"O! yes. Positive. I believe I know nearly every passenger with the exception of three or four. Oh, no! Every thing is fair and honorable here. If I didn't think so, you wouldn't catch me fingering a card."

After saying this, the stranger stepped from the guards into the cabin, and in a little while took a hand at one of the tables. The captain of the boat came along, soon after, where Slack was standing.

"Your passengers seem to be enjoying themselves," remarked the latter.

"Yes, and some of them will do so, before they are done, to their sorrow, if I am not mistaken."

"Why so, captain?"

"I think there are some gentry aboard who would not tread my deck for an hour, if I was only certain that they were all I suspect them to be."

"I have my own suspicions on that subject?"

"Have you, indeed? Come with me, then, I would like to have a little chat with you;" and the two walked away to the upper deck.

An hour afterwards, Morgan and Slack were sitting in the cabin, near one of the tables at which two men were playing at poker for trifling sums. One of them was the man whom Morgan had mentioned as having something about him that had excited his suspicions;—near the table, sat the individual who was suspected by Slack.

"Won't you take a hand, friend?" asked one of the players of this person.

"I don't care," he returned, rather indifferently. "But who'll take the other hand?"

"You will, wont you?" and the speaker looked at Slack.

"As you seem short-handed, I will do so, although I don't care much about playing," Slack returned. Morgan looked surprised, and whispered an objection in his friend's ear, which the latter did not seem to notice, but took his place at the table. A close observer might have seen, by the expression of the countenances of the three strangers to Slack, that they were not a little pleased at the fact of his having joined them.

Five cards were dealt to each of the players, and the ante determined. It was fifty cents each.

"The stakes are so small I'll go one dollar blind," said the first speaker.

"I'll see that and a dollar better," said Slack.

"I'll see that and go a V," said the third

"I'll see that and go an X," came promptly from the dealer.

His left hand man paused a moment, and then said—

"I won't see it," and threw up his hand.

"I'll see it," said Slack.

"And I'll go out," said the third hand.

"I call you." And Slack looked into the face of the dealer who sat opposite to him.

"I have three duces," was that individual's quiet remark.

"Then I'm beat," returned Slack, and so he was.

The dealer pocketed the stakes, and then dealt out the cards again.

"Make your bets, gentlemen."

"Let's go a V at once. This is dull work," said Slack.

"No—no—don't!" whispered Morgan, who stood near, and began to feel very uneasy. But his companion paid no attention to his remark.

Each of the players now put a five dollar note into the pool. But minute detail is needless. A game at poker is quickly played. Game after game passed off, Slack sometimes winning, but oftener losing.—With each new game the stakes were increased. As the stakes became larger and larger, one and another became attracted to the table, until a number of spectators stood looking on, each one feeling more and more interested in the games, as they became of more and more importance. At last, the ante, as named by Slack, was one hundred dollars. Half smothered expressions of disapprobation escaped from several of the spectators. This game bid fair to hold on longer than any of the others. When five hundred dollars were named, two of the players threw up their hands, and left the field to Slack and the dealer. They were, as has been said, seated opposite to each other. Several thousand dollars were now upon the table.

"I'll see that and six hundred better," said Slack, laying six one hundred dollars bills upon the table.

"Ditto, and go you seven hundred." This was said with a confident air, and the money was thrown down.

"Too bad!—too bad!. He'll ruin him!" was whispered by two or three. The men who had thrown up their hands, continued to look on with eager interest.

"I'll see that, and put eight hundred on top of it." coolly returned Slack.

"Will you? Ah, well. Then I'll go you nine hundred, and see your hand."

"I'll go you a thousand more!" said Slack, his voice becoming husky and tremulous from excitement, throwing another thousand dollars upon the table, that now held over ten thousand dollars.

There was an exclamation of surprise and displeasure from the crowd that had gathered around. The way in which the card-player who was now engaged with Slack had conducted the game, and the boldness with which he played, awakened the suspicions of several that both he and his companions were of the regular profession. The captain and his clerk were among the spectators. The former seemed much excited. He was so nervous that he couldn't stand still for a moment. Poor Morgan was almost beside himself. He stood directly behind the chair of his friend, and looked on with intense interest.

"Madness!" he muttered between his teeth, as he saw the last venture of his friend go upon the table, from whence he was well satisfied it would never return to him.

"You are a bold player; but I think my hand will stand even that. I go you eleven hundred better," said the dealer.

"I'll see your hand. What have you got?" The voice of Slack was still more husky as he said this.

The individual whose hand he had asked to see, could not conceal the pleasure he felt. He knew that his hand must be the strongest at the table, and therefore he was satisfied that he should win. He paused a moment, glanced around at the company, and then, with a triumphant smile, exhibited four aces and a queen.

Morgan staggered back, and leaned, sick at heart, against a berth. But his friend, with a loud laugh, threw five aces upon the table, and then, in the twinkling of an eye, scraped the whole contents of the table into his hat, that had been held ready between his knees, and passed it to the captain, who clutched it with eager hands.

"Stop!" shouted the holder of the four aces, in a loud, angry voice, bending over towards Slack, and grappling at his throat

"You infernal villain of a blackleg! I know you!" roared Slack in return, springing to his feet, and presenting a pistol, that clicked as the cold barrel was pressed against the cheek of his opponent.

But further contention was prevented by the entrance of four or five deck hands, who, at a signal from the captain, seized the three men, and pinioned their arms.

All was uproar and confusion in the cabin for many minutes. At length order was restored, and explanations made by the captain. He stated, that from many circumstances, he had been led to suspect as regular gamblers the three men who had just been treated so roughly, and that he had taken from two packs of cards the aces, and given five of them to the individual who had used them so well, in order to let them have a little payment in their own coin. He was now ready to try them by a jury of the passengers, and if he had wronged them, to suffer himself any penalty which that jury might award, after sitting, in turn, upon his case.

This seemed the fairest way to get at the truth of the matter, and so a jury was empannelled, and witnesses examined. First of all, Morgan, now beginning to open his eyes, and understand what was going on around him, was asked, at the request of the captain, who had heard his story and his suspicions from Slack, to tell his adventure in New Orleans, which he did with much feeling.

"Which of these men do you suspect?" asked one of the jurors.

Morgan pointed him out.

"Take off his spectacles," was peremptorily ordered.

"Now try if his whiskers are real or false."

The whiskers were soon lying upon the table.

"The very man!" exclaimed Morgan, striking his hands together, and springing up at least a foot from the cabin floor.

The eyes of Jackson, for he it was, fell to the floor, and his face flushed, confirming by its expression the accusation of Morgan. All were satisfied.

"Now let us have your particular friend unmasked, if he is here?" said the captain to Slack.

One of the trio was pointed out, and soon his appearance became greatly changed.

"I can swear to him!" was Slack's confident remark. "He was exceedingly kind and attentive to me while I was in New Orleans, and tried hard to get me into some of the dens of thieves with which the city abounds. But I was a little too cautious For three days he has been trying to induce me to take a hand at cards, and at last he succeeded. But I reckon he won't want to try me again!"

"And the third—what of him?" was now asked.

No one accused him, and he was released.

"Here are some ten or eleven thousand dollars—what shall be done with them?" asked the captain.

"Let justice be done, though the heavens should fall," replied a juror.

"How much did you stake?" said one, turning to Slack.

"Three thousand dollars."

"Let that be returned to him."

All agreed to the decision.

"And twenty-five hundred to this poor fellow, here, who has been robbed of his all."

"Right! right! Let it be done!" was the response.

Morgan looked wild and incredulous for a moment. Then bursting into tears, he dropped into a chair, and leaning his head upon a table, sobbed aloud, while his whole frame quivered.

"There are five thousand dollars left. What shall be done with them?"

"Give back to the unaccused party the amount of his stake, and divide the balance between the two gamblers. We have no right to make any other disposition of the money."

After some debate, this was approved, and the money apportioned accordingly.

"And now what shall be done with these gentlemen robbers?"

"Set them ashore!"

"Aye—aye—aye!" ran round the cabin.

"It shall be done," said the captain.

And it was done. As the boat, in which the two men, with their arms still bound, were placed, was about pushing off, the third person who had been suspected, sprang from the deck into it.

A loud shout greeted him as he did so. The Gazelle remained at rest until the small boat in which the gamblers had been landed returned, and then shot ahead under a heavy pressure of steam, leaving the companions in crime on a lonely shore, miles from any village or human habitation.

Morgan has not since had cause to visit New Orleans, and he has no desire to do so. The four hundred dollars cleared on his flour has given him a new start, and he is now doing well. But the story of his loss he has never related to Mr. Talbot, nor even to his wife. He has not the courage to do so.

MAN'S CONSTANCY.

BY JAMES M. LATTA.

In early life, when griefs were few,
And hopes were bright, and joys sincere,
And early buds expanding grew,
To fill with flowers the gladsome year;

I loved as youth can only love,
A gay, glad creature of the spring;
And fondly in my bosom strove
To shield from harm the gentle thing.

My morning worship, and the prayer
At dewy eve, to her were given,
And every song that floated there,
On wings of love went up to Heaven.

Sylph-like and fairy as the forms
That come in love to guide the young;
And guard the opening buds from storms
That round our path so oft are flung;

My Ellen lived the life and joy,
The angel of that sunny hour,
When merges youth the blushing boy
In manhood's fast-increasing power;

Ere yet a cloud, 'mid all the blue
Of yonder bright ethereal sky,
Had dimmed the morning's golden hue,
As zephyrs moved in fragrance by.

Nor thought of ill, nor thought of woe,
Nor troubled dream that we must part,
Disturbed the ever peaceful flow
Of love and bliss within the heart.

And yet amid these scenes of bliss,
Upon my bosom resting there,
My drooping flower sought one last kiss,
And all for me was dark despair.

So young, so fair, the angels came
To bear to Heaven this precious flower,
In glittering robes, like golden rain,
That fall at sunset's gorgeous hour;—

The music of whose circling band
Swept o'er my soul full-toned and sweet,
While soaring upward to that land
Where parted ones again shall meet.

Since then, for me the seasons bring
No gladness with their cheerful day;
Nor song of bird, nor voice of spring,
Awakes for me one joyous lay.

While withered hopes and flowers that lie
Forever crushed within my breast;
Wake yearning for that home on high,
Where now my sainted Ellen rests.

"A Fine, Generous Fellow."

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

My friend Peyton was what is called "a fine, generous fellow." He valued money only as a means of obtaining what he desired, and was always ready to spend it with an acquaintance for mutual gratification. Of course, he was a general favorite.—Every one spoke well of him, and few hesitated to give his ears the benefit of their good opinion. I was first introduced to him when he was in the neighborhood of twenty-two years of age. Peyton was then a clerk in the receipt of six hundred dollars a year. He grasped my hand with an air of frankness and sincerity, that at once installed him in my good opinion. A little pleasure excursion was upon the tapis, and he insisted upon my joining it. I readily consented. There were five of us, and the expense to each, if borne mutually, would have been something like one dollar. Peyton managed every thing, even to paying the bills; and when I offered to repay him my proportion, he said—

"No, no!"—pushing back my hand—"nonsense!"

"Yes; but I must insist upon meeting my share of the expense."

"Not a word more. The bill's settled, and you needn't trouble your head about it," was his reply—and he seemed half offended when I still urged upon him to take my portion of the cost.

"What a fine, generous fellow Peyton is!" said one of the party to me, as we met on the next day.

"Did he also refuse to let you share in the expense of our excursion?" I asked.

"After what he said to you, I was afraid of offending him by proposing to do so."

"He certainly is generous—but, I think, to a fault, if I saw a fair specimen of his generosity, yesterday.

"We should be just, as well as generous."

"I never heard that he was not just."

"Nor I. But I think he was not just to himself. And I believe it will be found to appear in the end, that, if we are not just to ourselves, we will, somewhere in life, prove unjust to others. I think that his salary is not over twelve dollars a week. If he bore the whole expense of our pleasure excursion, it cost him within a fraction of half his earnings for a week. Had we all shared alike, it would not have been a serious matter to either of us."

"Oh! as to that, it is no very serious matter to him. He will never think of it."

"But, if he does so very frequently, he may feel it sooner or later," I replied.

"I'm sure I don't know any thing about that," was returned. "He is a generous fellow, and I cannot but like him. Indeed, every one likes him."

A few evenings afterwards, I met Peyton again.

"Come, let us have some oysters," he said.

I did not object. We went to an oyster house and ate and drank as much as our appetites craved. He paid the bill!

Some days afterwards, I fell in with him again, and, in order to retaliate a little, invited him to go and get some refreshments with me. He consented. When I put my hand in my pocket to pay for them, his hand went into his. But I was too quick for him. He seemed uneasy about it. He could feel pleased while giving, but it evidently worried him to be the recipient.

From that time, for some years, I was intimate with the young man. I found that he set no true value upon money. He spent it freely with every one; and every one spoke well of him. "What a generous, whole souled fellow he is!" or "What a noble heart he has!" were the expressions constantly made in regard to him. While "Mean fellow!" "Miserly dog!" and other such epithets, were unsparingly used in speaking of a quiet, thoughtful young man, named Merwin, who was clerk with him in the same store. Merwin appeared to set an undue value upon money. He rarely indulged himself in any way, and it was with difficulty that he could ever be induced to join in any pleasures that involved expense. But, I always observed that when he did so, he was exact about paying his proportion.

About two years after my acquaintance with Peyton began, an incident let me deeper into the character and quality of his generosity. I called one day at the house of a poor widow woman who washed for me, to ask her to do me up some clothes, extra to the usual weekly washing. I thought she looked as if she were in trouble, about something, and said so to her.

"It's very hard, at best," she replied, "for a poor woman, with three or four children to provide for, to get along—especially if, like me, she has to depend upon washing and ironing for a living. But when so many neglect to pay her, regularly"——

"Neglect to pay their washerwoman!" I said, in a tone of surprise, interrupting her.

"O, yes. Many do that!"

"Who?"

Dashing young men who spend their money freely are too apt to neglect these little matters, as they call them."

"And do young men, for whom you work, really neglect to pay you?"

"Some do. There is at least fifteen dollars now owed to me, and I don't known which way to turn to get my last month's rent for my landlord, who has been after me three times this week already.—Mr. Peyton owes me ten dollars, and I can't"——

"Mr. Peyton? It can't be possible!"

"Yes, it is though. He used to be one of the most punctual young men I washed for. But, of late, he never has any money."

"He's a very generous-hearted young man."

"Yes, I know he is," she replied. "But something is wrong with him. He looks worried whenever I ask him for money: and sometimes speaks as if half angry with me for troubling him. There's Mr. Merwin—I wish all were like him. I have never yet taken home his clothes, that I didn't find the money waiting for me, exact to a cent. He counts every piece when he lays out his washing for me, and knows exactly what it will come to: and then, if he happens to be out, the change is always left with the chamber-maid. It's a pleasure to do any thing for him."

"He isn't liked, generally, as well as Mr. Peyton is," I said.

"Isn't he? It's strange!" the poor woman returned, innocently.

On the very next day, I saw Peyton riding out with an acquaintance in a buggy.

"Who paid for your ride, yesterday?" I said to the latter, with whom I was quite familiar, when next we met.

"Oh, Peyton, of course. He always pays, you know. He's a fine, generous fellow. I wish there were more like him."

"That you might ride out for nothing a little oftener, hey?"

My friend colored slightly.

"No, not that," he said. "But you know there is so much selfishness in the world; we hardly ever meet a man who is willing to make the slightest sacrifice for the good of others."

"True. And I suppose it is this very selfishness that makes us so warmly admire a man like Mr. Peyton, who is willing to gratify us at his own charge. It's a pleasant thing to ride out and see the country, but we are apt to think twice about the cost before we act once. But if some friend will only stand the expense, how generous and whole-souled we think him. It is the same in everything else.—We like the enjoyments, but can't afford the expense; and he is a generous, fine-hearted fellow, who will squander his money in order to gratify us. Isn't that it, my friend?" I said, slapping him on the shoulder.

He looked half convinced, and a little sheepish, to use an expressive Saxonism.

On the evening succeeding this day, Peyton sat alone in his room, his head leaning upon his hand, and his brow contracted. There was a tap at his door. "Come in." A poorly-clad, middle-aged woman entered. It was his washerwoman.

The lines on the young man's brow became deeper.

"Can't you let me have some money, Mr. Peyton? My landlord is pressing hard for his rent, and I cannot pay him until you pay me."

"Really, Mrs. Lee, it is impossible, just now; I am entirely out of money. But my salary will be due in three weeks, and then I will pay you on the whole. You must make your landlord wait until that time. I am very sorry to put you to this trouble. But it will never happen again."

The young man really did feel sorry, and expressed it in his face as well as in the tones of his voice.

"Can't you let me have one or two dollars, Mr. Peyton, I am entirely out of money."

"It is impossible—I havn't a shilling left. But try and wait three weeks, and then it will all come to you in a lump, and do you a great deal more good than if you had it a dollar at a time."

Mrs. Lee retired slowly, and with a disappointed air. The young man sighed heavily as she closed the door after her. He had been too generous, and now he could not be just. The buggy in which he had driven out his friend on that day, had cost him his last two dollars—a sum which would have lightened the heart of his poor washerwoman.

"The fact is, my salary is too small," he said, rising and walking about his room uneasily. "It is not enough to support me. If the account were fully made up, tailor's bill, bootmaker's bill, and all, I dare say I should find myself at least three hundred dollars in debt."

Merwin received the same salary that he did, and was just three hundred dollars ahead. He dressed as well, owed no man a dollar, and was far happier. It is true, he was not called a "fine, generous fellow," by persons who took good care of their own money, while they were very willing to enjoy the good things of life at a friend's expense. But he did not mind this. The want of such a reputation did not disturb his mind very seriously.

After Mrs. Lee had been gone half an hour, Peyton's door was flung suddenly open, and a young man bounded in, and with extended hand came bustling up to him.

"Ah, Peyton, my fine fellow! how are you? how are you?" And he shook Peyton's hand quite vigorously.

"Hearty!—and how are you, Freeman?"

"Oh, gay as a lark. I have come to ask a favor of you."

"Name it."

"I want fifty dollars."

Peyton shrugged his shoulders.

"I must have it, my boy! I never yet knew you to desert a friend, and I don't believe you will do it now."

"Suppose I havn't fifty dollars?"

"You can borrow it for me. I only want it for a few days. You shall have it back on next Monday. Try for me, there's a generous fellow!"

"There's a generous fellow," was irresistible. It came home to Peyton in the right place. He forgot poor Mrs. Lee—his unpaid tailor's bill—and sundry other troublesome accounts.

"If I can get an advance of fifty dollars on my salary to-morrow, you shall have it."

"Thank you! thank you! I knew I shouldn't have to ask twice when I called upon Henry Peyton. It always does me good to grasp the hand of such a man as you are."

On the next day, an advance of fifty dollars was asked and obtained. This sum was loaned as promised. In two weeks, the individual who borrowed it was in New Orleans, from whence he had the best of reasons for not wishing to return to the north.—Of course, the generous Henry Peyton lost his money.

An increase of salary to a thousand dollars, only made him less careful of his money. Before, he lived as freely as if his income had been one-third above what it was; now, he increased his expenses in a like ratio. It was a pleasure to him to spend his money—not for himself alone, but among his friends.

It is no cause of wonder, that in being so generous to some, he was forced to be unjust to others. He was still behindhand with his poor old washerwoman—owed for boarding, clothes, hats, boots, and a dozen other matters—and was, in consequence, a good deal harrassed with duns. Still, he was called by some of his old cronies, "a fine, generous fellow." A few were rather colder in their expressions. He had borrowed money from them, and did not offer to return it; and he was such a generous-minded young man, that they felt a delicacy about calling his attention to it.

"Can you raise a couple of thousand dollars?" was asked him by a friend, when he was twenty-seven years old. "If you can, I know a first rate chance to get into business."

"Indeed! What is the nature of it?"

The friend told him all he knew, and he was satisfied that a better offering might never present itself. But, two thousand dollars were indispensible.

"Can't you borrow it?" suggested the friend.

"I will try."

"Try your best. You will never again have such an opportunity."

Peyton did try, but in vain. Those who could lend it to him, considered him "too good hearted a fellow," to trust with money; and he was forced to see that tide, which if he could have taken it at the flood, would have led him on to fortune, slowly and steadily receding.

To Mervin, the same offer was made. He had fifteen hundred dollars laid by, and easily procured the balance. No one was afraid to trust him with money.

"What a fool I have been!" was the mental exclamation of Peyton, when he learned that his fellow clerk had been able, with his own earnings, and a salary no larger than his own, to save enough to embrace the golden opportunity which he was forced to pass by. "They call Mervin mean and selfish—and I am called a generous fellow. That means, he has acted like a wise man, and I like a fool, I suppose. I know him better than they do. He is neither mean nor selfish, but careful and prudent, as I ought to have been. His mother is poor, and so is mine. Ah, me!" and the thought of his mother, caused him to clasp both hands against his forehead. "I believe two dollars of his salary have been sent weekly to his poor mother. But I have never helped mine a single cent. There is the mean man, and here is the generous one. Fool! fool! wretch! He has fifteen hundred dollars ahead, after having sent his mother one hundred dollars a year for five or six years, and I am over five hundred dollars in debt. A fine, generous fellow, truly!"

The mind of Peyton was, as it should be, disturbed to its very centre. His eyes were fairly opened, and he saw just where he stood, and what he was worth as a generous man.

"They have flattered my weakness," he said, bitterly, "to eat and drink, and ride at my expense. It was easy to say, 'how free-hearted he is,' so that I could hear them. A cheap way of enjoying the good things of life, verily! But the end has come to all this. I am just twenty-seven years old to-day. In five years more I shall be thirty-two. My salary is one thousand dollars. I pay one hundred and fifty dollars a year for boarding. One hundred and fifty more shall clothe me, and furnish all my spending money, which shall be precious little! One year from to-day, if I live, I will owe no man a dollar. My kind old mother, whom I have so long neglected, shall hear from me at once—ten dollars every month I dedicate to her. Come what will, nothing shall touch that. After I am clear of debt, I will save all above my necessary expenses, until I get one or two thousand dollars ahead, which shall be in five years. Then I will look out for a golden opportunity, such as Mervin has found. This agreement with myself I solemnly enter into, in the sight of heaven, and nothing shall tempt me to violate it."

"Are you going to ride out this afternoon, Peyton?" said a young friend, breaking in upon him at this moment.

"Yes, if you'll hire the buggy," was promptly returned.

"I can't afford that."

"Nor I either. How much is your salary?"

"Only a thousand."

"Just what mine is. If you can't, I am sure I cannot."

"Of course you ought to be the best judge. I knew you rode out almost every afternoon, and liked company."

"Yes, I have done so. But that's past. I have been a 'fine, generous fellow,' long enough to get in debt and mar my prospects for life, perhaps. But I am going to assume a new character. No doubt the very ones who have had so many rides, oyster suppers, and theatre tickets at my expense, will all at once discover that I am as mean and selfish as Mervin. But it's no great odds. I only wish I had been as truly noble and generous in the right quarters, as he has been."

"You are in a strange humor to-day."

"I am in a changed humor. That it is so very strange, I do not see—unless for me to think wisely is strange; and perhaps it is."

"Well, all I have to say is, that I, for one, do not blame you, even if I do lose a fine ride into the country now and then," was the frank response.

Peyton went to work in the matter of reform in right good earnest. But he found it hard work. Old habits and inclinations were very strong. Still he had some strength of mind, and he brought this into as vigorous exercise as it was possible for him to do, mainly with success, but sometimes with gentle lapses into self-indulgence. His mother lived in a neighboring town, and was in humble circumstances. She supported herself by keeping a shop for the sale of various little articles.

The old lady sat behind her counter one afternoon, sewing, and thinking of her only son.

"Ah, me!" she sighed, letting her hands fall wearily in her lap, 'I thought Henry would have done something for himself long before this. But he is a wild, free-hearted boy, and I suppose spends every thing as he goes along, just as his father did before him. I'm afraid he will never do any thing for himself. It is a long time since he wrote home. Ah, me!"

And the mother lifted her work again, and strained her dimmed eyes over it.

"Here's a letter for you at last, Mother Peyton," said the well known voice of the postman, breaking in upon her just at this moment; "that boy of yours don't write home as often as he used to."

"A letter from Henry! oh, that is pleasant! dear boy! he doesn't forget his mother."

"No, one would think not," muttered the postman, as he walked away, "considering how often he writes to her."

With trembling hands Mrs. Peyton broke the seal. A bank bill crumpled in her fingers as she opened the letter. A portion of its contents were:

"Dear Mother—I have had some very serious thoughts of late about my way of living. You know I never liked to be considered mean. This led me to be, what seemed to every body, very generous. Every body was pleased to eat, and drink, and ride at my expense; but no one seemed inclined to let me do the same at his expense. I have been getting a salary for six or seven years, and, for a part of that time, as much as a thousand dollars. I am ashamed to say that I have not a farthing laid by; nay, what is worse, I owe a good many little bills. But, dear mother, I think I have come fairly to my senses. I have come to a resolution not to spend a dollar foolishly. Thus far I have been able to keep my promise to myself, and by the help of heaven I mean to keep it to the end. My first thought, on seeing my folly, was of my shameful disregard to my mother's condition. In this letter are ten dollars. Every month you will receive from me a like sum—more, if you need it. As soon as I can lay by a couple of thousand dollars, I will look around for some means of entering into business; and as soon after as possible make such a provision for you, that your last days shall be spent in ease and comfort."

"God bless the dear boy!" exclaimed Mrs. Peyton, dropping the letter, while the tears gushed from her eyes. The happy mother wept long for joy. With her trembling hand, she wrote a reply, and urged him by the tenderest and most sacred considerations, to keep to his good resolutions.

At the end of a year, Peyton examined his affairs, and found himself freed from debt. But there were nearly one hundred dollars for which he could not account. He puzzled over it for one or two evenings, and made out over fifty dollars spent foolishly.

"No doubt the rest of it will have to be passed to that account," he said, at last, half angry with himself. I'll have to watch closer than this. At the end of the next year, I'll not be in doubt about where a hundred dollars have gone."

It was but rarely, now, that you would hear the name of Peyton mentioned. Before, every body said he was a "fine, generous fellow." Every body praised him. Now he seemed to be forgotten, or esteemed of no consideration. He felt this. But he had started to accomplish a certain end, and he had sufficient strength of mind not to be driven from his course.

"Have you seen Peyton of late?" I asked, some two years after this change in his habits. I spoke to one of his old intimate associates.

"No, not for a month of Sundays," was his lightly spoken reply. "What a remarkable change has passed over him. Once, he used to be a fine, generous fellow—his heart was in his hand. But now he is as penurious as a miser, and even more selfish. He will neither give nor take. If you happen to be walking with him, and, after waiting as long as decency will permit to be asked to step in somewhere for refreshments, you propose something, he meets you with—No, I thank you! I am not dry, or hungry, as the case may be! It's downright savage—it is!"

"This is a specimen of the way in which the world estimates men!" I said to myself, after separating from the individual who complained thus of Peyton. "The world is wonderfully impartial in its judgement of men's conduct."

At the end of five years from the time Peyton reformed his loose habits, he had saved up and placed out at interest the sum of two thousand dollars; and this, after having sent to his mother, regularly, ten dollars every month during the whole period. The fact that he had saved so much, was not suspected by any. It was supposed that he had laid up some money, but no one thought he had over four or five hundred dollars.

"I wish you had about three thousand dollars," said Merwin to him, one day. Merwin's business had turned out well. In five years, he had cleared over twenty thousand dollars.

"Why?" asked Peyton.

"I know a first rate chance for you."

"Indeed. Where?"

"There is a very good business that has been fairly established, and is now languishing for want of a little capital. The man who has made it will take a partner if he can bring in three thousand dollars, which would make the whole concern easy, perfectly safe, and sure of success."

"It's more than I have," returned Peyton, in a voice that was slightly sad.

"So I supposed," Merwin said.

"Although such needn't have been the case, if I had acted as wisely as you, through life."

"It's never too late to mend our ways, you know."

"True. But a year mis-spent, is a whole year lost. No matter how hard we strive, we can never make it up. To the day of our death, there will be one year deficient in the sum of life's account."

"A just remark, no doubt. How much would every man save, if he would take good care of not only of his years, but of his weeks and days. The sum of life is made up of small aggregations."

"And so the sum of a man's fortune. A dollar mis-spent, is a dollar lost, and never can be regained. You say that it will require three thousand dollars to admit a partner into the business of which you just spoke?"

"Yes. Nothing less will do."

"I have but two thousand."

"Have you so much, Peyton?" Merwin said, with a brightening face.

"I have."

"Right glad am I to hear it. I only wish that I could furnish you with a thousand more. But it is out of my power entirely. Our business requires the use of every dollar we have; and it would not be just to my partner to draw so large a sum out for the purpose of assisting a friend in whom he can feel no interest."

"No, of course not. I neither ask nor expect it. I will wait a little longer. Something else will offer."

"But nothing so really advantageous as this. Let me see. I think I might get you five hundred dollars, if you could borrow as much more."

"That I cannot do. I never asked a favor of any one in my life."

"Though you have dispensed thousands."

"Foolishly, perhaps. But no matter. I will wait."

A week afterward, Peyton, who dismissed all thought of embracing the proposed offer of going into business, paid a visit to his mother. He had not seen her for a year. She was still cheerful, active, and retained her usual good health.

"I think it time you gave up this shop, mother," he said to her. "You are too old now to be working so closely. I've got something saved up for a rainy day, in case any thing should go wrong with me for a time. You'll give up this shop, won't you?"

"No, Henry: not yet. I am still able to help myself, and so long as I am able, I wish to do it. If you have saved any thing, you had better keep it until an opportunity for going into business offers."

"Such a chance has just presented itself. But I hadn't capital enough."

"How much have you saved?"

"Two thousand dollars."

"So much? How much is required?"

"Three thousand dollars."

"And you have but two?"

"That is all—though a friend did offer to get me five hundred more. But twenty-five hundred is not sufficient. There must be three thousand."

Mrs. Peyton made no reply. She sat a few minutes and then arose and went up stairs. In about ten minutes she came down, and approaching her son, with a warm glow of pleasure upon her face, placed a small roll in his hands, saying as she did so—

"There is all you need, my son. The money you sent me so regularly for the last five years, I have kept untouched for some such moment as this. I did not feel that I needed it. Take it back, and start fairly in the world. In a few more years I may need rest, as life draws nearer to a close. Then I trust you will be in circumstances so good that I needn't feel myself a burden to you."

"A burden? Dear mother! Do not speak of ever being a burden to me," the young man said, embracing his parent with tearful emotion. "No—no," and he pushed back her hand: "I cannot take that money. It is yours. I will not risk in business the little treasure you have saved up so carefully. I may not succeed. No—no!" and he still pushed back his mother's hand—"it is no use—I cannot—I will not take it!"

The roll of money fell to the floor.

"It is yours, Henry, not mine," urged the mother. "I did not stand in need of it."

"Your son owed you much more than that. He was wrong that he did not double the amount to you, in order to make up for former years of neglect. No—no—I tell you, mother, I cannot take your money. Nothing would tempt me to do it. I will wait a little longer. Other opportunities will soon offer."

It was in vain that Mrs. Peyton urged her son, until her distress of mind became so great that he was almost forced to receive the money she pushed upon him—although in doing so, it was with the intention of leaving it behind him when he returned to the city. But the deep satisfaction evinced by his mother, on his consenting to take it, was of a kind that he did not feel it would be right for him to do violence to. When he did return to the city, he could not find it in his heart to leave the money, just six hundred dollars, on the table in the little room where he slept, as he had at first resolved to do. He took it with him. But with the intention of investing it for her in some safe security.

When he again met Merwin, he was urged so strongly to make an effort to raise the capital requisite to become a partner in the business, that had been named to him, that, after some severe struggles with himself, he at last consented to use the money he had brought home with him. His friend loaned him four hundred dollars to make up the required sum.

The business succeeded beyond his expectations. In a few years he was able to marry, and live in a very comfortable style. He would hear none of the objections urged by his mother against living with him, but shut up her shop in spite of her remonstrances, and brought her to the city. No one who saw her during the remaining ten years of her life would have called her unhappy.

I know Peyton still. He is not now, by general reputation, "a fine, generous fellow." But, he is a good citizen, a good husband, and a good father; and was a good son while his mother lived with him. He has won the means of really benefitting others, and few are more willing than he is to do it, when it can be done in the right way. He is "generous" still—but wisely so.

THE WILL;

OR,

HOW MUCH DOES THAT MAKE?

BY ROBERT A. WEST.

Donald McDougal was the eldest son in a large family. He was early initiated into the mysteries of systematic penuriousness, so that the last latent spark of generosity which might have saved him from actual congelation was well nigh extinguished. In addition to the art of keeping, he was also favored with a complete practical education in the art of obtaining property, for he had been compelled to earn his bread before he ate it, even at the hands of his father. Mr. McDougal, senior, inculcated the maxims of covetousness under the reputable character of lessons of prudence. He instructed Donald in many practices of secret dishonesty, under the pretext that the world was now grown so deceitful and wicked, that no man was safe unless he determined to secure himself, by always acting as if it were plainly understood that each would cheat his neighbor wherever the opportunity occurred; and that the only disgrace was to do it with so little ingenuity as to be detected. Donald had often been told that nature was very moderate in her demands, and that she always resented any imposition upon her powers as an unwelcome burden; that excess in eating and drinking was the grand cause of disease, that if he would really enjoy life and enjoy it long, he must learn to abridge himself of all luxuries and nearly all comforts, and measure the supplies to all corporeal requirements by the sheer necessity of the case.

Nor was Donald without example as well as precept. His father embodied his whole code of maxims in his own conduct, and showed their full dimensions and spirit and beauty! There was no matter connected with dollars and cents in which he was not perfectly an adept, for he seemed to have an intuitive perception of the proper side of all "profit and loss" questions. He could calculate to the most remote and improbable consequences, and was as faithful in seizing as he was ingenious in the discovery of all chances of interest. Partly by indefatigable industry and partly by indefensible artifice, he had amassed a large fortune; though few would have so concluded from the house he inhabited, or the style in which he lived. At length his constitution yielded to the joint effects of starvation, care and age, and the old man died before he had learned this plain lesson—how to enjoy his property.

After his death, the will was read, and it was found, (greatly to Donald's chagrin and astonishment), that though all the property was left to his hopeful son, the old man had been so bent upon Donald's establishment in the principles and practice of prudence, that he forbade the property to be touched until his son had first realized a certain sum; he was then to take possession of both principal and interest. Mingled feelings now agitated the breast of Donald. At one moment he felt so enraged that he was disposed to revenge himself on the departed spirit of his father by squandering all his present property in enjoying himself and seeing the world; at another the sum to be hereafter realized and the result of his father's pains and labor, awakened a ray of hope in his almost desponding heart. He resolved to try. It needed little time or consolitary reflection to sooth him under the loss of such a parent; he shed no tears, partly because he was now enraged and partly because he cared less about his father than his father's property.

Donald McDougal, by the double influence of early precept and example, became a successful merchant. He enlarged the sphere of his father's business, was more exorbitant in his prices, more usurious in lending money, more devoted and laborious in his employment. In short he became a complete shark. He was covetousness personified. His dark eye glanced like lightning from under the thunder clouds of his knit eyebrow; his forehead was deeply wrinkled with furrows which anxious care had ploughed; his wan visage told a piteous tale of a famished stomach, while his aquiline nose, screwed mouth and protuberant chin, reminded one of—I cannot find an illustration worthy of the thing to be illustrated. He never married, for a family would be expensive; nor kept a servant, for he said it was the glory of man to be independent. He soon realized the sum required by his father's will, and took possession of all the property, which, in the course of seven years, had accumulated to a vast sum. But his acquisitions brought him no additional satisfaction beyond the inconsiderable pleasure of knowing that he possessed it. He dare not touch his property, for with every increase of it, came an increased desire still to accumulate.

The spare regimen which he had adopted, and considerable bodily fatigue, soon impaired his health; or perhaps a more powerful cause than either, was his deep, incessant solicitude, which, like a canker-worm at his heart, eat out the very vitals of all happiness and comfort. His eye lost its lustre and his nerves became a perfect barometer. Suspicion fixed her seat in his watchful eye and misery laid her rude fangs upon his heart. He had no rest by day, nor sleep by night. For some time he rejected the advice of friends and neighbors, who, knowing but little of the true cause and character of the complaint, entreated him early to take the opinion of an eminent physician. At length, however, he consented, but it was of no avail, and finding that to have a physician quartered upon him was very expensive, and never having had much confidence in the efficacy of the materia medica, he soon dismissed him without having derived any advantage from his attendance—for "Who can minister to a mind diseased?"

He was now compelled to give up his business, which he disposed of to some advantage. He gathered in all his debts and called in such sums of money as were out at interest, for he had not the confidence or satisfaction in the entries upon his ledger, and stamped papers and parchments, that he knew he should feel when all his property was converted into hard cash. In the true spirit of a miser, and under the suspicion that he would soon be confined to his bed, he converted every thing he possessed into gold, selling even the house he occupied, reserving only a life tenancy at an easy rent, and the major part of his already scanty furniture.

His suspicions were soon realized. He became much enfeebled, and found it necessary to make a nurse the inmate of his dreary abode. And now the miser became truly wretched. The demons avarice, suspicion and despair, haunted him night and day.—He relished no food, nor derived spirit from any cordials. His intellect had evidently suffered prior to his confinement, but he had now frequent attacks of delirium. His conversation was at all times about his money, and he required his nurse fifty times a day to rattle the large tin boxes which contained his gold. If he dreamed, he would talk about his treasures, and often was heard to hold earnest conversation with some of those with whom he had formerly done business; more than once he awoke himself by struggles with some sprite of imagination who was wresting his wealth from him. In order to be fully assured that he had really lost nothing in such conflicts, he would often, at the dead of the night, have the whole contents of his cash-box counted over before him. The nurse, somewhat alarmed by his conversation and conduct, refused to stay with him, unless she had some female to bear her company; whereupon he mentioned his wish that Maria, a niece to whom he had always been partial, should be sent for, and she too became an inmate of his dwelling.

At length it was found neccessary to inform him that his end was approaching, and that his will must be made. He reluctantly consented. Morton, a neighboring pettifogging attorney, was sent for, as McDougal had before employed him in two cases, on the prudent principle—"of two evils choose the least." Morton was a shrivelled up, shrewd little fellow, with a keen eye for the main chance, and not burdened with much tenderness of conscience. With a very scanty knowledge of law, he had managed to insinuate himself into a tolerably extensive and lucrative practice. But he had a ready insight into human nature, a considerable tact in seizing the reigning principle or passions of his employers, and the precise point for striking in with them, so as to accomplish his own purposes under pretence of personal and generous sacrifices for their advantage.—Blinding his clients with flatteries exactly suited to their different minds and habits and circumstances, he offended none, but greatly pleased everybody—and himself more than any other. His first business with McDougal cost him some address and produced him little profit, but he had his eye on the future.—In the second affair he was equally moderate in his charges, but hinted, since so mutable were human affairs, that a man of Mr. McDougal's property should have his will made. So long as business was effected and charges were small, they neither of them thought much of principal or character.

Morton came to make McDougal's will. He offered many kind inquiries and feigned very great concern to find his old and generous friend, the mere ruins of his former self. The nurse was seated by the bedside and Maria stood near, deeply affected at a sight she had never before beheld,—the final adjustment of temporary things—the prophecy and decree of what was to take place when her uncle should be no longer of this world. Morton sat down on the side of the bed, and made his knee serve as a writing desk. McDougal raised himself—the presence of the man of laws roused him from his torpors; his eyes shot out again, like spirits coming forth from sepulchres.

"Morton," said he, "the world's a cheat. I ought to have had a good round sum by this time, and should—but the world's a cheat."

"True," replied the lawyer, "and it must have been difficult and painful for a man of your principles, Mr. McDougal, to acquire a competency; but you know I was always ready to see you righted."

"You were, and I'll not forget it."

"Oh! thank you, Mr. McDougal," said Morton, with a graceful inclination of the head, "but you and I always settled with mutual satisfaction, I believe, sir?"

"Well, Morton, I have only a hundred and fifty thousand dollars to dispose of. I must leave it, I find, and my relations have the first claim. To each of my four brothers I leave fifteen thousand; to each of my sisters, twelve thousand; to my nephew Henry, two thousand; to my niece Maria, whom I have always loved——"

Here his feelings well nigh got the better of his feebleness—but, after a pause, he continued—

"I leave her fifteen thousand; and to nurse here, three hundred."

Maria hid her face in the folds of the bed curtains, and nurse turned aside and let the tear fall upon her sleeve.

"And now," said McDougal, who felt a cloud drawing over his intellect, and his memory refusing to do her office, "how much does that make?" And he put his hand to his head as if to cool his fevered brain.

The lawyer was subtle, and knew that this was the only time for him. He came with the purpose of making a good thing of it.

"Well, Mr. McDougal, after the expenses of your funeral there will be something left, perhaps a hundred dollars, or a hundred and fifty."

"Then," said McDougal, making a vigorous effort and feeling conscious that nature was failing fast—"Morton, you are welcome to the remainder; now read it and let me sign it."

Morton read just as McDougal had dictated, but the artful Judas had, in the case of the brothers, substituted in the writing "hundreds" for "thousands."

McDougal, with considerable effort, signed—just saw his niece and the nurse attest it—and expired. Relations and friends soon assembled at the tidings of his death; the will was read, and it was no difficult matter to divide the property.

But sorely did Morton suffer for his temerity and wickedness. Not unaccustomed to acts of fraud, his conscience long slept upon this new iniquity. That slumbering monitor was at length, however, awoke from its lethargy, and Morton felt its voice. Yet he long resisted its earnest remonstrances, until other ministers of warning were invoked to its assistance. He could not rest, for strange and dismal noises were heard in his house every night. Soon they seemed to proceed from the very closet where he kept his gold, as if it was poured out of one vessel into another—then portentuously scattered up and down the room. More than once, when retiring to rest, he thought he heard some one following him up stairs. At length the very form of McDougal appeared at his bed-side, and turning aside the curtains, looked upon him with the very same ghastly paleness and piercing eye, and asked "How much will that make?"

Morton arose, dressed himself, and, lighting a small lamp, retired to his library and awaited the dawn of day, trembling and half resolved to restore the property, yet, half yielding to his covetuousness and false shame which again got the better of his fears.

He was, however, yet to suffer farther tortures. Hastily despatching his matin meal, he departed for his office, to bury amidst his musty papers the uneasiness he could not otherwise overcome. Abruptly turning the corner of a neighboring street, he suddenly came upon two uncouth looking men, one of whom, the moment before Morton came in sight, had placed in the hands of the other, two or three small sums of money; startled by the lawyer's sudden appearance, he turned his face towards him, as he said—"How much does that make?" And Morton averted his eyes, turned pale, and hurried onwards.

The duties of his office, however, did not allay the feverish excitement under which he labored; and taking up a bundle of papers, he went down to the law courts to make some inquiries relative to his profession. Just as he entered, a witness was detailing some petty thefts to which he had been subjected by a dishonest clerk. He had mentioned several separate sums—

"Well, sir, and how much does that make?" asked the prisoner's counsel, having his eye directed to the door by which Morton had entered, for in his agitation he had closed it with a peculiar bang.

"How much does that make?" repeated the witness, whose attention was also drawn to Morton, and with his eye still fixed upon the now trembling lawyer, he added, with a leer, "I don't know exactly—but I know them that does."

There was a malicious titter in the court, and the spectators, following the direction of the witness's eye, also fixed their gaze on Morton.

He could bear it no longer. Seizing the handle of the door, he would at once have made his escape, but the force with which he had shut it, caused the door to stick. His exertions to open it only increased the confusion, and the presiding judge, with some asperity and in a loud voice, so as to recall attention to the proceedings, repeated the question—

"Answer, sir, HOW MUCH DOES THAT MAKE?"

This was enough. With a convulsive effort, Morton wrenched open the door, staggered to his office, wrote to the parties a confession of his fraud, restored the property, and left the country, taking with him this important lesson—that no dishonest gains can eventually prove of any advantage.

THE COTTAGE.

"My eyes make pictures when they're shut."—[Coleridge.

——A little cottage stands
Half hid in climbing green;
Spreading along the jagged eaves
And o'er the roof 'tis seen.

Before it are a few meek flowers,
Yet garden there is none;
But grass with flowers—as Art at first
His toil had there begun;

Then shamed by Nature, fled, and left
These flow'rets to her hand,
That hence to wild flowers changing seem,
Where 'mid the grass they stand.

A grandame at the open door
Sits knitting in the sun;
Who looks at her, need not be told
Of friends and kindred young and old,
That vanished one by one.

Bloom to her cheek returns no more,
And soon her smiles depart:
But he that sees no beauty there—
He hath none in his heart.

A little child is sitting near,
A white lamb's by the child—
And surely it must be sweet lore
Its eyes and lips are spelling o'er,
To read that grandame mild.

"Sweet Mary Malone."

There's a spell in the glance of sweet Mary Malone,
Whose charm no weak heart can defy;
And more precious by far than "philosopher's stone"
Is the diamond that gleams in her eye.
Like the pole star at night,
Clear, glist'ning, and bright,
That cheers and that guides the lost mariner home,
When out at sea,
Is that eye to me,
The bright, beaming, blue eye of Mary Malone;

Each poet has sung of his "Chloe" or "Chloris"—
Such heathenish names I disown:
The only fair goddess I love and adore is My dear simple Mary Malone.
In form, or in face,
The goddess of grace,
Might, haply, excel her, I freely will own,—
But—that soft eye of blue,—
That bright eye of blue!—
She had not an eye like sweet Mary Malone!

How oft, mutely gazing, spell-bound I've remained,
On the light of thy beautiful face,
By its softening lustre allured—but restrained
By thy modest majestical grace!
Then thy dark, raven hair,—
Thy bosom so fair,—
Thy roses!—such never in gardens have blown:—
But—oh! that blue eye,
That loving blue eye!
'Twas that won my heart, my sweet Mary Malone.

Chapter I.

"The purest treasure mortal times afford,
Is—spotless reputation; that away,
Men are but gilded loam, or painted clay."

I hate to write a long introduction! and many readers, I know, dislike as much to read one. Therefore, with your permission, dear reader, we will proceed to tell our tale in a plain, straight-forward manner, without any of the metaphorical circumlocution generally employed by the "story tellers of the present day.

Eva Lincon was the daughter of an opulent merchant in the city of New York. She was an only child, and doated upon by both father and mother; and well might they feel proud of such a daughter: for she was beautiful as the poets fancy when they dream of love; and although she had been through the whole formula required for a "fashionable education," she was not in the common parlance of the day "a spoilt child"—for, proficient as nature had been with the exterior, the mind had not been neglected. And, with discriminating sense, she refused to be trammeled or confined by the opinions of her over-fastidious companions.

Her father was a very plain man, in manners and appearance. He had acquired his fortune (which was large) by assidious industry, and a close economical management of business. He left the whole management of domestic affairs to his wife, who was very discreet in such matters, always looking well to her own interest, even if others suffered in consequence. She was the daughter of a wealthy man, but through the ignorance, perhaps, of the male sex, as regarded her qualifications, she had reached an age something beyond girlhood, before she was united in hymen's holy bands. She had married Mr. Lincon not for love, for this was a feeling that she had probably never experienced, but because it was an eligible match, and an only offer.

It could not be expected that one who had never loved, would possess much sympathy for another's dealings with the blind God. Nor did Mrs. Lincon: as the following conversation will show.

"Who was that visited you this morning?" asked she of her daughter, on the morning our tale commences.

"No one but Henry Grey."

"And why was he here?"

"I am sure I do not know—why does any one visit us?"

"To enjoy our society, and to form an acquaintance I suppose."

"Well, that was probably the occasion of his calls."

"But he comes very often."

"Not too often, mother!"

"Not to suit you, perhaps; but I had rather his were more like angels' visits."

"Why so, mother?—what harm has he done to you?"

"None that I know of—but I do not like him."

"But he is not to blame for your dislikes."

"That may be: but I can't comprehend what there is in him you see so inviting."

"Nothing more in him, mother, than in every respectable, honorable young man."

"But you have a preference?"

"Perhaps—who has not?"

"And because you have a foolish liking for this Grey, I must admire him too."

"I said not that, mother," replied Eva, calmly.

"But you do admire him."

"I have not said that I did."

"But actions speak louder than words. And, Eva, I do not, for your sake, and for the credit of the family, wish you to associate with him."

"Why not? Is he not of good standing, and admitted into the best society?"

"He was when he first came here: for he was well recommended by Doctor Mason, of Albany."

"He is some connection of the Doctor's—is he not?"

"So it was thought at first: but George Marvin says he is not."

"How does he know?"

"Why he has been living in Albany, with his sister, for some months past, and he says that he is a poor boy that the Doctor took out of charity, and no relation whatever."

"I cannot believe this story, mother, for you know that George owns Henry no good will, at least."

"Why, George is a gentleman, and will expose any one that pretends to be what they are not."

"But what difference can it make provided he is no connection of the Doctor? I cannot see."

"Why if he is not, he is an impostor; and has been admitted into society above his birth and standing."

"I cannot see it in this light; for you say he was recommended by the Doctor, as being a worthy young man."

"That may be, and still descended from the very dregs of society."

"But if this is the case, and he conducts himself in a gentlemanly manner, it ought not to be any disgrace to him."

"Why, Eva! I dare say that if his father and mother had both died in the poor-house, you would say it was no dishonor to him."

"So I should, mother, and think that he was worthy of more respect, having raised himself to his present standing by his own exertions."

"But, Eva," said her mother, solemnly, "would you marry him were this the case?"

"I should wait until I received proposals."

"But I do not wish to have him propose: for he is not a suitable match for you, even if his parentage were good."

"Why, mother?"

"Because he has only commenced his studies, and"——

"But you forget he is already practising."

"Well! that makes no difference—he is, as I said before, just commencing business, and having nothing to commence with, it must necessarily be some time, even if he has remarkable success, before he can be in a situation to support a woman in the style, in which you are used to living."

"It is because he is poor that you do not admire him, you would say?"

"That is one reason, Eva."

"But he is in the same condition that my father was when he commenced business."

"Your father was wealthy when I married him."

"That may be: but you would not have refused him had he been pennyless."

"Yes I would; and I advise you as a mother who feels for your welfare, to look well to your own interest. And as regards this report respecting Grey's parentage, if I find it to be true, I shall not receive his visits in future." Thus saying, she left the room.

Eva was surprised at the turn the conversation had taken; and although she doubted not but that her mother had spoken the sentiments of her heart, yet thought she, "My mother never loved! She must ever have been a stranger to that high and holy feeling—that ardent affection which invades my heart. Her cold calculations are not the language my feelings would dictate towards—but no! I will not be won unsought! I will not love to have my fondest hopes blasted by disappointment—and to feel that I am despised. But I care not for this silly story of George Marvin. Him I have once refused, and his mean mind could suggest no better revenge than thus to slander one who is far above him, in every thing but wealth—which is with me, but a secondary object."

Chapter II.

"Men that make
Envy, and crooked malice nourishment,
Dare bite the best."
* * * * * * *
"'Tis a cruelty,
To love a falling man.—[KING HENRY VIII.

Henry Grey was a young man of fine appearance, and commanding talent. His natural ability had been much inproved by a course of studies under the direction of his friend and guardian, Dr. Mason. The doctor well knew that Henry was dependent upon his own exertions; and he doubted not but that with a good education he would, in time, win for himself a name and reputation which would be far more lasting and of more benefit than a princely fortune.

With this view he had, a few years before our story commences, written to a friend of his, an eminent member of the Bar in New York, to superintend the studies of his ward. And accordingly Henry had taken up his residence in that city.

He was immediately admitted into the most refined society, and attracted by the beauty, at first, of Eva, he was led to form an acquaintance with her, which resulted in a feeling of congenial attachment. And though neither had spoken of their passion but by bright glances, that told of love to eyes that looked love again: yet both felt certain that there was a reciprocal feeling existing between them.

Henry was admired by many for his ready wit, and playful, pleasing manner of conversation. I say by many, for there were some who envied him his good fortune; and among this number was George Marvin. He saw that his rival was greeted with evident pleasure, and his appearance welcomed with smiles, where he only received a cold, formal welcome. And when he proposed for the hand of Eva Lincon, and was refused, he cursed his more fortunate rival, as he considered Henry, and swore to be revenged.

But Henry cared not for him, nor his revenge; he knew that the wealth of George Marvin was all that he possessed, and had it not been for that, he would have been shunned, instead of courted: for he was gifted with but very little common sense, and was as unprincipled as he was ignorant.

But there are characters in every community who are always ready to retail slander, no matter from what source it originates. And it was so in this case. At first few believed the story industriously circulated by George Marvin. And he told, he said, only what he had heard; he did not vouch for the truth of the report. But

"Rumor was the messenger
Of defamation, and so swift that none
Could be the first to tell an evil tale."

In this way it was whispered around, at first, that Henry Grey was no better than he should be. That he was not what he seemed. And it was finally boldly asserted by some that he had been taken from the "poor-house" by Doctor Mason, and who his parents were was never known. These reports caused quite a sensation among the aristocratic members of the community: for none could be admitted into their circles whose birth was not acknowledged to be of respectability, unless, forsooth, they possessed fortune, and then this was overlooked, or not enquired after. In this manner was Henry's reputation and standing injured in the estimation of many, before he was aware that there were any such reports in circulation. In fact, he was not aware of it until one day, George Marvin, wishing to see what effect it would have upon his victim, called at the office where he was employed, and asked in a friendly manner if he was to attend the party that evening.

"What party?" asked Henry.

"Why have not you been invited?"

"I do not know to what you refer."

"Why, Mrs. Lincon gives a splendid fete to-night, to which all the elite are invited."

"I have not heard of it."

"And you are not agoing to attend?"

"Of course not."

"No! no! of course not, without an invitation: but why you have been overlooked, I cannot see."

"Nor do I care," said Henry, in a nonchalant manner.

"But I should care, for all the respectability are to be there."

"Then I am not respectable," said Henry.

"You are aware, then, of the reports, are you?"

"What reports? I have heard none."

"Concerning your——"

"My what?"

"Don't be excited—I should not have mentioned it, if I had supposed that I was telling any news."

"Well! well, what is it? out with it, man; nothing horrible, I hope."

"Oh! no! nothing for which you are to blame: only I have heard it said—in fact it is generally believed—that your parents were——"

"Were what? let me know: were what?"

"Were never known; in fact, that you are the offspring of——of——"

"Say no more, sir!" exclaimed Henry, "I have heard enough."

This was what George had wished, and a smile of satisfaction stole across his features, when he saw that the shot had taken effect.

Henry was surprised; this was something which he had never dreamed of as being derogatory to him. But he now saw at a glance what use would be made of the circumstance to complete his ruin in the estimation of those he held most dear. He, however, recovered his composure in a few moments, and said—

"I had not been informed of this before: and am indebted to you, sir."

"I am sorry," said George, "that I have wounded your feelings, for, believe me, I had no such intention. And I cannot doubt but what this is why Mrs. Lincon has neglected you. Give me leave to contradict this foolish report."

"No—I do not condescend to notice every idle rumor by those who prey upon the reputation of honorable men."

"But I am innocent of any intentions to injure you."

"I have accused none, nor shall I, but my business calls me away." So saying, he left the office.

George Marvin had done his worst: for this was a subject upon which Henry was particularly sensitive. That his birth was involved in mystery to all but himself and his guardian, he was aware; but he fondly hoped that upon this subject he would never be questioned; nor did he consider that he was responsible for any one's actions but his own. "But now," said he, "this must be trumpeted through the town by every retailer of scandal, as though on me devolved the responsibility of my parents' actions. But, dear, sainted mother, I can suffer nothing in comparison with thy sufferings, and I will not complain, though my fate is hard. But Eva! can she believe this slander? I know she does not. She is far above those simple, simpering ones, who view with horror those who cannot trace their origin back to some noble house, which, thank Heaven, I can do, if I would. But her mother must needs shew her consequence by looking above such low born ones as me. Well, I care not. In this country, every one is the maker of his own fortunes, and I will yet win a name by my own exertions, of which I can never be deprived by the subtle, slanderous tongue."

Chapter III.

"Hope is a lover's staff; walk hence with that,
And manage it against despairing thoughts."

The evening of the party came. The spacious rooms of Mr. Lincon's superb mansion were filled to overflowing with the beauty and talent of the city.

There was music, rich in sweet sounds; and the poetry of motion was shown in the giddy dance. All seemed to be joyous and happy. Yet there was one who sat sorrowfully apart, and would not mix with the gay throng. She who should have been the gayest of the gay, felt not, nor hardly noticed, that gay scene. She cast her eyes around the room—beauty, elegance, and wit, were on every side; but one was wanting. There was a vacancy in her heart that the adulation of flatterers could not fill. And, sighing, Eva Lincon wondered why he was not there.

"Come," said Mrs. Lincon, approaching her daughter, "you must dance the next set with George Marvin."

"I cannot dance to-night, mother."

"Cannot! you must. See, they are waiting for you now."

"Ah! Miss Lincon, you are looking superb to-night. Do you dance?" said George Marvin.

"I think not."

"You are not fond of the amusement?"

"Not very."

"Ah, Mrs. Lincon," said he, as the old lady approached. "Splendid party!—all the fashion of the city, I believe, are here. It goes beyond every thing of the kind this season."

"I intended it should," said the old lady.

"And it does. I have been wondering why Eva, here—I mean Miss Lincon—does not dance. But I forget; she is probably engaged to Mr. Grey?"

"Mr. Grey is not here."

"Not here! I thought he was a favorite of yours?"

"You thought wrong, then, for I did not invite him, even."

"Ah!" thought Eva, who overheard her mother's remark, "that, then, is the reason of his absence. But why should this be so? I will know the reason of this neglect."

So saying, she asked her mother, who just then came round—

"Why have you not sent Henry an invitation?"

"Because I did not desire his presence."

"But, mother—"

"I don't want to hear any of your 'buts!' He is not admitted into select circles now; and I shall not break through the established rules of etiquette, just because you have a foolish preference for some low-born impostor!"

Thus was Eva answered by her mother, who would have destroyed her own and her daughter's happiness, rather than to have had any of her aristocratic friends think that she demeaned herself by associating with any one as low in birth as report announced Henry Grey to be.

Eva wondered how her mother could be so regardless of her feelings; and, with a sorrowing heart, she soon retired to her own apartment, to muse in silence and alone.

In the mean time, Henry remained at home, deeply engaged in reading a manuscript which he had received some years before from Doctor Mason.

"Yes," said he, folding up the paper, "yes, Eva, you shall see this, at least, and be undeceived as regards me! For the rest, the unfeeling ones, I care not. And when you have read what my poor mother in her last days wrote for my benefit, I will venture to ask the richest boon that can to mortal man be given."

Chapter IV.

"And that should teach us,
There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
Rough-hew them how we will"

[Julius Cæsar.

When Henry again visited Eva, he was received by her with evident pleasure; but her mother scarcely deigned to speak with him. This Henry did not seem to notice, and she left the room.

"Eva," said he, as soon as her mother had retired, "it has been some time since I was so fortunate as to form an acquaintance with you; and subsequent events lead me to think that some history of myself may not be uninteresting."

"It would be very gratifying to me," said Eva.

"And reports, of late, derogatory to me and my parentage, I understand, have been in circulation.—Perhaps you may have heard them?"

"I have, but I did not believe them."

"Thank you! thank you!" said Henry. "I have one friend, then."

"You have many, I hope."

"I fear you hope against certainties. But, to my tale—if you will condescend to listen?"

"I shall hear you with pleasure."

"Some time since, Doctor Mason, who is a worthy man, and one whom I respect, informed me that many years previous he was called upon to visit a woman, who lay sick in a house near his residence. He found, when he arrived, a young woman, who had been there some four weeks. She was a stranger, but she had fallen among those who pitied the distresses of the unfortunate, and were ever ready to extend the hand of charity to those who were suffering. The sick woman was very low—already beyond the reach of medicine—and in a few days she died. The Doctor had taken some interest in her, and, at her decease, she was decently buried, at his expense. That woman was my mother! I can just recollect of following her remains to the grave—the last resting place of all! She was my last, my only friend—and the sorrow that my young heart then experienced, I hope you may never feel. I stood at the head of the grave, and silently watched the clods of earth, as one after another they fell upon the coffin. And when the task was done, the grave closed up, and my mother hidden forever from my sight, I turned away, and wept in agony! I had now no friends—no home—and I wished, ardently wished, that I had been buried with her.

"While thus I stood, absorbed in my grief, the Doctor came and took me by the hand, and in a kind manner tried to console me for the loss of my parent; and at last he persuaded me to accompany him home. And a home, indeed, his house has ever been to me. And the love which I bear him could be no greater were he my father.

"When he informed me of these circumstances, he gave me a manuscript written by my mother. I have read it, time and again, and if you will, I wish you to peruse it. I can say no more—for my feelings overcome me when I think upon this subject. Adieu for the present—I leave the story of my mother's wrongs with you."

Eva was much surprised at what she had heard, and she almost revered the old Doctor for his kindness towards her lover.

When she had composed her feelings, she took the paper which Henry had left, and read with interest the following:

"To my son Henry:

"For your benefit I employ the few remaining days allotted me here on earth, in writing a short account of myself and your father, whom you have not seen since you were two years of age.

"I was the daughter of obscure parents residing in England; for there all are obscure, who are not titled. My father was a good liver, although not wealthy; and upon me he doated, for I was an only child. My time passed pleasantly away, without any care or trouble to render me unhappy, until I was about sixteen years old. I then lost my mother, as you, my Henry, are about to lose me. And may God protect you, for you have no other protector! I deeply felt the loss of my parent; but the young are not naturally inclined to sorrow, and my grief soon wore away.

"It seemed as though my father's love for me increased after the death of my mother. And I cannot look back to our once happy home, even at this day, but the tear of sorrow will dim my eye.

"When I was nineteen, I became acquainted with James Grey, second and youngest son of Lord Grey, upon whose estate my father lived. He had been hunting, when he was caught in a severe shower, and sought shelter in our cottage. He was young—not more than twenty—and, as I thought, of remarkably good appearance. After our first interview, he frequently called at the cottage—and, Henry, I loved him, with pure, ardent love; and I have no doubt but that the feeling was reciprocal—for like an honourable man, as he assuredly was, he proposed marriage. I was aware of the great difference in our respective stations, and told him that his father would never consent to our union. Of this he too was well convinced. 'But,' said he, 'I am a younger brother, and have but little or nothing to expect from my father. I might, perhaps, by managing, marry an heiress, and live a splendid life of misery; which I will not do. I am determined to go to America, that land where all are on equal terms; where all can be lords if they will only strive for the prize. I shall there be shackled by no laws which bind a younger brother down—and I will win for myself a name and fame which will be lasting. Will you go with me? Say you will, and happy in that land of freedom we will live.'

"Thus urged by one I dearly loved, I referred him to my father; and in a short time we were privately married, my father being present at the ceremony.

"As was expected, Lord Grey heaped curses upon the head of his unworthy and undutiful son, as he was pleased to call him. He disowned him for ever, and refused to see him. But this we expected, and were therefore prepared for it But there came a blow which I had not anticipated—and that was, the death of my father. Just as we were ready to embark for this country, he suddenly sickened and died. If I had felt sorrow for my mother's death, much more did I feel it now; for I was deprived of an only parent—he whom I had expected to accompany me to my new home in a distant land. But all my hopes were fled; and sorrowing, we bid farewell to our native land for ever. But I must hurry on to the conclusion, for I find my strength is hardly adequate to the task.

"When we arrived in New York, (where we first landed,) your father could not find business, as he had expected. In fact, America was not the El Dorado he had anticipated. He was a total stranger, unacquainted with the manners and customs of the people; and many were ready to say that he was an impostor. For nearly a year he procured no business—we in the mean time living upon what we had brought with us from England. But this was fast dwindling away, and what course to pursue we knew not.

"One day, when you, my son, were about two years old, your father informed me that he could close a bargain with an importing merchant, formerly from England, on advantageous terms, if I would consent to his leaving me for a year—for he was to go to the West Indies as an agent. What could I do? In a strange land—with no friends—I could not bear to have him leave me even for a month.

"But something must be done; our means of support were fast growing less—and I was at last obliged to consent to his departure—and with many protestations of unalterable love, and promises to write often, he set sail. How long seemed the first month of his absence!—how desolate and cheerless was my home! But I had you for my comfort and solace.

"Mr. Smith, your father's employer, advanced money, which was left for my support while he was gone. He had been away about three months when I received his first letter. He was doing well, he wrote, for himself and employer. I wrote him back a cheerful a letter as I could, and waited impatiently for the end of the year, when I should again see my husband.

"Mr. Smith, in the mean time, was very accommodating, attending to all my affairs, and at every opportunity giving me news of my husband.

"Things had gone on in this way for more than half a year, when I received news that he was very sick. Oh, how I longed to see him!—to soothe him in his distress, and administer to his wants! But this privilege was denied me. Anxiously I waited to hear again from him. At length it came. Mr. Smith received a letter from some one there, saying that his agent, Mr. Grey, was dead!

"Oh, the agony of that moment! I cannot describe it! It seemed as though my brain was on fire, and I prayed long and fervently that I might die! I lost all recollection, and was, as I have since been informed, for weeks insane. A raging fever had deprived me of reason, and almost of life. But my constitution bore up under all my afflictions, and I slowly recovered, to feel anew my irreparable loss.

"During my long illness, Mr. Smith was very constant in his attentions towards me, anxious that I should want for nothing; and I thanked him for all his kindness—it was all I could do—all I had to give in return! And I besought him to furnish me, if possible, with something to do, whereby I might earn for myself a sustenance—for I was entirely dependant upon his goodness.

"He told me that I need not fear. I should never want while he lived—and for a time I was satisfied. Here, my son, is where I failed! I had not the energy to look about me and procure employment—and day after day passed away, without my considering how much I was indebted to Mr. Smith. But I was soon awakened from my dream, as it were, and made to feel the error of my ways.

"One day Mr. Smith, as was his usual custom, visited me, and after he had sat some time in silence, asked me what arrangements I had made for the future. I had made none. He presented a long bill of expenses which he had incurred on my account, and demanded payment. What could I do? I had no money, and he knew it;—he insisted upon his pay immediately, or he would say no more about the debt, and see that I was well provided with every comfort for the future, if I would be his!

"'I cannot,' I exclaimed, 'think of marrying again. My husband still lives in my remembrance, and—'

"'But,' said the old man, interrupting me, 'I do not ask you to marry me; I have one wife already.'

"I was surprised—amazed—at the villain's boldness, and I drove him from my presence. But he only smiled in scorn, as he left the house; 'for,' said he, 'you are in my power, and must be ruled by me.'

"This, then, was why he had been so kind!—this was why he had paid so much attention to me, and advanced me money, that at last he might ensnare and ruin me!

"That day, within an hour after he left the house, I took you by the hand, and bid a long farewell to my home, and to all earthly happiness. I wandered around, from place to place. At last I came to this city—found some kind friends, who employed me—and now, I cannot work, they are attending to me, and rendering me every assistance in their power.—God bless them for their kindness!

"Doctor Mason has called to see me;—he says I cannot live. Alas! I know it!—nor would I ask to, were it not for you, my son.

"I have informed the doctor who I am, and how I was reduced to my present situation. He says he will protect you as his own son. Thank God, I can now die in peace. And, Henry, heed my last prayer. Be virtuous, be honorable—and you will be happy.

"Enclosed you will find the certificate of my marriage with your father;—keep it; it may be of use to you at some future day. The doctor will give you these my last words when you arrive at years of discretion. That you may be happy is the last prayer of your dying mother,

"Mary Ann Grey."

Chapter V.

"Marriage is a matter of more worth
Than to be dealt with by attorneyship.
For what is wedlock forced but hell,
An age of discord, one continued strife?
Whereas the contrary bringeth forth bliss,
And is a pattern of celestial peace.—[King Henry V.

When Eva finished reading this account of the sufferings of Henry's mother, her respect and love for him were increased; and she despised those who could wound the feelings of one who had suffered so much already. When Henry again visited her, he asked her if she had read the history of his patient and unfortunate mother.

"I have," replied Eva, "and with surprise."

"But why with surprise? You do not doubt the authenticity of it?"

"With surprise, that man could be so great a villain, and woman bear so much; for I never dreamed of doubting its truth. In fact, Henry, I could not DOUBT anything emanating from you or yours."

"Thank you, Eva! And I am not despised by you, because I was left an orphan at an early age, with no kind parents to watch over and guide me aright."

"I have never despised you, Henry."

"I know you have not—and I have come to offer you my hand and heart, which my ardent love prompts me to do. Will you accept the adoration of one who, though humble, adores you?"

Eva did not answer; and in a few moments Henry again asked—

"What means this silence? Am I rejected?—have I been deceived?—my affections trifled with? Answer, tell me it is not so!"

"It is not so, Henry! You have not been deceived in me, at least."

"And you will be mine! Thank you!" said he, seizing her hand; "thank you, my love, for this happiness!"

"Nay, Henry, I said not that; I——"

"Not that?"

"No! But for myself I would say it readily; but my parents—I fear they will not consent."

"Your mother, Eva, I know does not favor my suit; but your father, I have heard, is an honorable man. Surely he will not object?"

"I cannot say."

"I have your consent to apply to him?"

"You have."

"And I will do it immediately; for this suspense I cannot bear."

So saying, he left the lovely girl to seek her father. He found him in his counting room alone.

"I have come," said he, "to see you upon business of importance. Have you leisure to hear me now?"

"Yes, if it is anything urgent."

"It is, sir, of great importance to me, at least."

"Well, proceed; I am all attention."

"I have to request your consent to my marriage with your daughter."

"Ah! yes—your name is——"

"Henry Grey, sir."

"Yes, I recollect—my daughter, you say. Does she give her consent?"

"If otherwise, I of course should not have troubled you," said Henry, not liking the manner and enquiries of the old man.

"Yes, well, I will see. You are a lawyer?"

"I am."

"Your parents——"

"Are dead."

"Ah yes—strange I did not remember. Well, call again to-morrow, and I will give you an answer."

"Good morning, sir."

And Henry left the office. He did not doubt but that the old man would grant his wishes; and he was comparatively a happy man.

That evening, Mr. Lincon, after tea, drew his chair near that of his daughter, and asked—

"Well, Eva, what do you suppose that young lawyer had to say to me to-day?"

"I don't know, I am sure."

"Don't know? Yes you do, for he said he had your consent."

"Her consent to what?" asked Mrs. Lincon.

"Why, he wants to marry her—that's all."

"But you did not give your consent."

"How do you know?"

"But did you?"

"You say I did not."

"Why, husband, do tell me. You are always trying to bother me."

"Well, then, I thought I would see you before I gave him any answer."

"You did right."

"Yes, I always do, don't I?"

"Yes, yes; but I shall object to this match entirely; for he is a low-born, poor, indigent fellow."

"No, mother, he is not!" said Eva, who could not bear to hear her lover thus slandered, even by her mother.

"Well, well, Eva," said her father, "your mother and I will settle this little affair. You are a party interested, you know."

Eva left the room, and the result of the conference was as usual in like cases—Mrs. Lincon persuading her husband, as she always did; and he, in the end, after some show of resistance, yielding to her wishes.

Accordingly, when Henry called the next day, to learn his fate, he was surprised with a flat refusal. "Disappointment is my lot!" muttered he, as he left the presence of the old man. "Just as the prize is within my reach, it must be rudely snatched away because I am poor and friendless. But the constancy of my lovely Eva I do not doubt; and we may yet be happy, even without the consent of her father.—But no—I will not induce her to such a step; honorably or not at all; no private, clandestine marriage. But I will seek fame and fortune, and the day will yet come when even the proud and haughty Mrs. Lincon will consider my acquaintance an honor."

With these thoughts, Henry applied himself to business with increased energy. He was already looked upon as a rising young man; and many prophecied that he would be an honor to the profession.

He was not denied the pleasure of occasionally visiting the object of his affections; and her love cheered him on in the path of duty.

Chapter VI.

"I see men's judgments are
A parcel of their fortunes: and things outward
Do draw the inward quality after them,
To suffer all alike."—[Shakspeare.

'Twas nearly a year after the date of our last chapter, when Henry received the following note:

"Dear Henry—

"Call and see me immediately. I have news to tell you—or something at least which I think will please, and be of importance. At least call as soon as you can, and you will much oblige.

"EVA LINCON."

Henry could not imagine what should make her so urgent for him to call immediately, for he had visited her only a few days before. And what the news could be, he could not think. He, however, immediately waited upon her.

"You recollect," said she, that my cousin Emma and her husband, some months since, started on a tour through England?"

"Yes, I remember it; but why do you ask?"

"They are now in London. I received this paper from them, with that advertisement marked.—They know who you are, and I presume they think this notice is concerning you. Read it."

Henry took the paper and read—

"INFORMATION WANTED

"Of James Grey, youngest son of Lord Grey, of Yorkshire, England—his eldest son, the late Lord George Grey, being deceased—and the title and estate, of course, will descend to the youngest son, James, if living; and if not, to his heirs, as the late Lord George at his decease left no issue. James was married and removed to America, and it is believed he died there, leaving a son. If this should meet his eye, he will learn something further, by applying to Strong & Ring, in London.

"American papers will please copy the above."

"Can it be possible!" exclaimed Henry, as he finished reading the above notice.

"I have faith to believe that means you," said Eva.

"Yes, but why is it not copied into our city papers?"

"Why I received this paper as soon as the English mail arrived; and they have not had time yet."

"Yes, yes; well, we will wait. I hope and fear, but we will wait."

The next morning the advertisement was copied into almost all the daily papers, and many of them with comments like the following:

"Our readers will see by an English advertisement, which we have copied, that our enterprising citizen, H. Grey, Esq., is, by the death of his uncle, raised to the title and estate of Lord Grey, one of the nobility of England. We are rejoiced to hear of his good fortune, for he is a young man of energy and talent. We hope, however, that he will not leave us to settle in England, for we cannot well spare so enterprising a citizen. We understand the income of the late proprietor was nearly ten thousand pounds per annum. It will probably not vary much from that now. Again we say, we wish him success."

Numbers who had despised Henry, and helped to slander him, now called to congratulate him upon his good fortune; and among the first of these was Mrs. Lincon. She was very "happy indeed of the good luck which had befallen him—hoped she should see him often." To all of which Henry replied in a kind manner: for it was not his nature to revenge wrongs done him, even if he knew that they were intended as such.

In a short time he embarked for England. When he arrived, he found none to dispute his title: for the certificate of his mother's marriage was sufficient to establish his right.

He took possession of the property; attended to some necessary business, and again returned to New York—for what purpose the reader can easily guess.

He again asked Mr. Lincon's consent to a union with his daughter—and this time he was not refused.

We have but little more to tell—save that the wedding of Henry Grey (otherwise Lord Grey, as Mrs. Lincon called him,) and Eva Lincon, was the best attended of any that season; and the old man, (Eva's father) after scolding his wife for not knowing that Henry was a Lord in disguise, declared that he had always intended they should be married: only he wanted that Henry should work and earn something—for wives were very expensive things. And thus were all parties well satisfied.

THE ONLY SON.

BY MRS. JANE WEAVER.

Mr. Harcourt sat alone in his study. The walls were crowded with book-cases, filled with the massy tomes of the law: his table was covered with papers of importance; and a pile of notes, which had just been paid him by a client, lay close at his elbow.—The costly lamp that hung above his head threw its light full on the upper part of his face, bringing the massy brow out into bold relief, and giving additional sternness to his cold and inflexible features. All at once he rang the bell.

"Is master James arrived?" he said, abruptly, when the servant entered.

"Yes, sir."

"Show him in, then."

In a few minutes the door of the study opened again, and the lawyer's only son stood in the presence of his father. He was a youth of about seventeen, fair and manly to gaze upon, but with that look of dissipation in his countenance which mars even the noblest beauty. An expression of feminine softness and irresolution in his face, contradicted the proud and self-willed glance of his dark, glowing eye. He seemed, indeed, to judge from his looks, to be wholly a creature of impulses.

"So you have been in another scrape, sir," said the old man, harshly.

The youth bowed his head and bit his lip.

"It cost me four hundred dollars to pay for the carriage that was broken, and the horses foundered in your drunken frolic. What have you to say to that, sir?"

The young man's eye wandered irresolutely around the room, without daring to meet his father's face. Nor did he make any reply.

"How long is this to last?" said his parent, in a more angry tone. "Have I not told you, again and again, that I would disown you if these things went on? You are a disgrace, sir, to me—a blot on my name. Thank God your mother did not live to see you grow up!"

The youth had been evidently nerving himself to bear his father's rebukes with as much indifference and coolness as possible; but at the mention of his mother's name his lip quivered and he turned away his head to hide the tears that gathered in his eyes Had that stern, irritating old man known how to follow up the chord he had struck, his son might yet have been saved; but he was a hard, correct man, unaccustomed to making allowances for difference of character, and he resolved to drive his son into obedience by the strong arm of parental authority.

"You turn away to laugh, you rascal, do you?" said he, enraged. "You believe, because you are my only child, I will not disinherit you. But I would cast you off if you were ten times my son; and I made up my mind, to-day, to tell you, at once, to go.—There is a pile of notes, five hundred dollars, I believe: take it; and to-morrow I will make it a thousand, before you depart. But, remember, this is the last night you shall spend under my roof—the last cent of my money you shall ever touch."

When his mother was alluded to the youth had almost made up his mind to step forward, ask pardon for all his evil courses, and promise solemnly hereafter to live a life of strict propriety; but the sharp and angry tone in which Mr. Harcourt pursued the conversation, and the words of banishment with which it closed, seemed to make him irresolute. He colored, turned pale, and parted his lips as if about to speak; then he clasped his hands half in supplication; but the cold, contemptuous look of his father checked him, and he remained silent. The angry flush, however, rose again to his cheek, and became fixed there.

"Not a word, sir," said the father. "It is too late pleading now. Don't be both a blackguard and a coward. I told you if you ever got into such a discreditable difficulty I would disown you. But the warning did no good. You must reap as you have sown. Will you go?"

The youth seemed again about to speak; but his words choked him. The spirit of the son, as well as that of the father, was roused. He felt that the punishment was disproportioned to the offence, even great as it had been. He took the notes which his parent held out to him, crumpled them hastily together, and, flinging them scornfully back, turned and left the room. The next instant the street door closed with a heavy clang.

"He has not gone, surely?" said the father, startled for a moment. But his brow darkened as his eye fell on the notes. "Yes, let him go—the graceless villain—he is hereafter no son of mine. Better die childless than have an heir who is a curse and a disgrace to your name. Did I not do my duty to him?"

Ay! old man, that is the question. Did you do your duty to him? Were you not harsh when you should have been lenient—did you not neglect your son for years after his mother's death, careless of what kind of associates he consorted with—and when he had been led astray, did you not, in total disregard of his wilful character, the result of your own indulgence, did you not, we say, attempt to coerce him by threats when you should have drawn him by the gentle chords of love? Look into your own heart, and see if you are not just as unreasonable as your son. Can a character be reformed in a day? Your profession should have taught you better, old man.—But the boy has gone from your roof forever, for well he knows how inflexible is your stern, self-righteous heart; and, indeed, with a portion of your own pride, he would sooner cut off his right arm than solicit for your aid. Yes! take up that mass of complicated papers and endeavor to forget the past scene in their absorbing details, but yours must be a heart of adamant, if, in despite of your oft-repeated reasonings, you can justify your harshness to it. Remember the words you have uttered. They may apply to more than one. "As you have sown so you shall reap!"

James Harcourt went forth from his father's house in utter despair. Pride had supported him during the last few moments of the interview, and he had met his stern parent's malediction with bitter defiance; but when the door had closed upon him, and he turned to take a last look up at the window which was once his mother's, the tears gushed again into his eyes, and covering his face in his hands, he sat down on a neighboring step and sobbed convulsively.

"Oh! if she had been living," he said, "it would never have come to this. She would not have left me to form associations with those who wished to make a prey of me—she would not have galled me by stern, and often undeserved reproaches—she would not have turned me from my home, with no place whither to go, and temptations around me on every side. Oh! my mother," he said, casting his eyes to Heaven, "look down on and pity your poor boy!"

At that instant the door of his father's house opened, as if some one was about to come forth. A momentary hope shot through him that his parent had relented. But no! it was only a servant who had been called to close the shutters. Ashamed to be recognized, the youth hastily arose, turned a corner, and disappeared.

Years rolled on. The lawyer rose in wealth and consideration; honors were heaped profusely on him; he became a member of Congress, a Senator, a Judge. His sumptuous carriage rolled through the streets daily to bear him to and fro from Court. An invitation to his dinners were received in triumph, they were so select. In every respect, Judge Harcourt was a man to be envied.

But was he happy? He might have been, reader, but for one thing. He had no one to love. He felt that people courted him only from interested motives. Oh! how he sometimes longed to know what had become of his discarded boy, confessing to himself, now that years had removed the veil from his eyes, how harshly he had used the culprit.

"Perhaps, if I had borne with him a little longer he might have reformed," he said, with a sigh. "He always had a good heart, and his poor mother used to say he was so obedient. But he got led away!"

At this instant a servant cautiously opened his library door.

"It is almost ten o'clock, your honor," he said, "and the carriage is at the door."

"Ay, ay," said the judge, rising, as the servant disappeared, "I had forgot myself. And that desperate fellow, Roberts, is to be tried to day for the mail robbery."

Many an obsequious bow greeted the judge as the officers of his Court made way for him through the crowd, for the trial was one of unusual interest, and had collected together large numbers. He smiled affably to all, and, taking his seat, ordered the business to proceed. The prisoner was brought in, a large, bold, fine-looking man, but the judge, occupied with a case he had heard the day before, and in which he was writing out an opinion, gave little notice to the criminal, or indeed to any of the proceedings, until the usual formalities had been gone through, and the serious part of the evidence began to be heard.—Then the judge, for the first time, directed a keen glance to the prisoner.

"Surely, I have seen that face before," he said. But he could not remember where; and he turned to scrutinize the jury-box.

The case was a clear one. The testimony, when completed, formed a mass of evidence that was irresistible. Two men swore positively to the person of the accused as that of one of the robbers; and the jury immediately gave a verdict of guilty, after a bitterly severe charge against the prisoner from the bench. The punishment was death.

On hearing the verdict, the prisoner set his mouth firmly, and drew himself up to his full height. But, before sentence was pronounced, he asked leave to say a few words. He did it in so earnest a tone that the judge immediately granted it, wondering that a man who looked so courageous should stoop to beg for his life.

"I acknowledge my crime," said the prisoner, "nor do I seek to palliate it. But neither do I ask for mercy. I can face death as I have faced it a dozen times. But I wish to say a word on the causes that brought me to this place."

Every neck was stretched forward to catch the words of the speaker: even the judge leaned over the bench, controlled by an interest for which he could not account.

"I was born of reputable, nay! distinguished parents," said the man, "and one at least was an angel. But she died early, and my father, immersed in ambitious schemes, quite forgot me, so that I was left to form my own associations, which, therefore, were naturally not all of the most unexceptionable kind. By and by, my irregularities began to attract the notice of my father. He reproved me too harshly. Recollect, I was spoilt by indulgence. I soon committed another youthful folly. My punishment, this time, was more severe and quite as ill-advised as before. I was a creature of impulse pliable either for good or bad—and my only surviving parent fell into the error of attempting to drive me, when he should have persuaded me with kindness. The fact is, neither of us understood each other. Well, matters went on thus for two years and more; I was extravagant, rebellious, dissipated; my parent was hard and unforgiving.

"At length," continued the speaker, turning full on the judge, until their eyes met, "at length, one evening, my parent sent for me into his study. I had been guilty of some youthful folly, and having threatened me about a fortnight before with disinheritance if I again vexed him, he now told me that henceforth I was to be no child of his, but an outcast and a beggar. He said, too, that he thanked God my mother had not lived to see that day. That touched me. Had he then spoken kindly—had he given me a chance, I might have reformed; but he irritated me with harsh words, checked my rising promptings of good by condemning me unheard, and sent me forth alone into the world. From that hour," continued the prisoner, speaking rapidly and with great emotion, "I was desperate. I went out from his door a homeless, penniless, friendless boy. My former associates would have shrunk from me, even if I had not been too proud to seek them. All decent society was shut against me. I soon became almost starved for want of money. But what needs it to tell the shifts I was driven too? I slept in miserable hovels—I consorted with the lowest and vilest—I gambled, I cheated, and yet I could scarcely get my bread.—You, who sit in luxurious homes, know not the means to which the miserable outcast must resort for a livelihood! But enough. From one step I passed to another, till I am here. From the moment I was cast out from my father's house, my fate was inevitable, leading me by constantly descending steps until I became the felon I now am. And I stand here to-day ready to endure the utmost penalty of your laws, careless of the future as I have been reckless of the past."

He ceased; and now released from the torrent of his passionate eloquence, which had chained their eyes to him, the spectators turned toward the judge to see what effect the prisoner's words had produced. Well was it, that no one had looked there before, else that proud man had sunk cowering from his seat. They would have seen how his eye gradually quailed before that of the speaker—how he turned ashy pale—how his whole face, at length, became convulsed with agony. Ay! old man, remorse was now fully awake. In the criminal he had recognized his only son! He thought then of the words he had once used, "as you sow, so you shall reap!" But by a mighty effort he was enabled to hear the prisoner to the end, and then, feeling as if every eye was upon him penetrating this terrible secret in his looks, he sank, with a groan, senseless to the earth.

The confusion that occurred in the Court House, when it was found that the judge had been taken suddenly ill, as the physicians said by a stroke of apoplexy, led to the postponement of the prisoner's sentence; and before the next session of the Court, the culprit had received a conditional pardon, the result, it was said, of the mitigating circumstances which he had urged so eloquently on his trial. The terms on which a large proportion of citizens petitioned for his pardon required that he should forever after reside abroad. It was said that the judge, although scarcely recovered, had taken such an interest in the prisoner, as to visit him in a long and secret interview the night before he sailed for Europe.

About a year after these events, Judge Harcourt resigned his office on the plea of ill-health, and, having settled his affairs, embarked for the old world, where he intended to reside for many years. He never returned to America. But travellers said that he was residing in a secluded valley of Italy, with a man in the prime of life, who passed for his adopted son. It was the reclaimed outcast. A smiling family of grand-children surrounded him. The happy father could say, in the language of the Scriptures, "this my son was dead and is alive again, he was lost and is found."

COURT OF CONTENT.

BY F. STILES JEWETT.

A cheerful cottage in a vale of green,
Where grew the wild rose with the fern and thyme,
Peace made her temple, and full well, I ween,
She sheltered love beyond its usual prime.
A cheery pair there dwelt in olden time,
But they lived not as men now live—ah me!
I love to paint them in my Gothic rhyme—
Albeit grieve when I look around and see,
What now is earthly bliss, to what such bliss might be.

'Twas like some quiet Eden where they dwelt—
Hight Goodsonne Rest, a little realm and rare—
And Nature with her choicest offerings knelt,
And paid a meek though courtly homage there;
Love seemed to linger in the very air,
And found with joy, 'mid shrub and blossom, rest,
For haply joy was smiling everywhere,
And mirth was oft but ne'er a wayward guest
In that sweet vale—and all were most supremely blest!

Like branches side by side, they sprung from earth;
All human passions, save the few which held
With Truth and Virtue right of equal birth,
They ne'er had known, or, knowing once, had quelled.
With pristine habits and with mien of eld,
They hand in hand walked gladsome from their youth;
By nature taught, men's fashions they repelled,
And art to them seemed shapeless and uncouth,
And vain whate'er surpassed simplicity and truth.

Their locks were frosted with the dew of years,
Though on their brows there was no trace of care;
Their eyes were dimmed by time, but not with tears,
They yet were soft, and kindness glimmered there.
Life had to them like glassy sea been fair,
If roffled ever, stirred by healthful gale;
Their comforts few, but thankful for their share,
They asked no more, and loved their own sweet vale,
Nor knew of aught beyond, nor sought life's other tale.

No lordly pride was theirs, for noble blood
Had blotted ne'er their annals of descent,
A pride they had—the pride of doing good,
Nor Fame to this her gaudy wing had lent:
So bliss is born twin-sister with Content,
And life is calm, although the lot be low:
The mountain-stream in harsh uproar is spent,
Whilst in the valley—silent, silvery, slow—
The tide is kissed by flowers, and peace conducts its flow.

With holy sway smiled sweet Content around,
Dispelling care and crowning toil with ease,
And ne'er the old man, whilst he tilled the ground,
Had dream of kings or pageants o'er the seas;
There was a music 'neath his own shade-trees,
In tones of innocence and sinless mirth—
There was a greeting in the morning breeze,
That woke with joy each day's auspicious birth—
And truth's elysium bloomed in that green spot of earth.

And peaceful plodding through their sphere of life,
None other seeking, they from Nature drew
A pleasing inspiration, which the strife
Of fortune's slavish minions never knew.
Few means of joy were theirs, their blessings few,
Yet care sate ne'er beside their humble door—
The meekest flowers beside their threshold grew,
And rich were they in Him who made them poor,
Whilst Wisdom's meed was theirs without scholastic lore.

Of great ambition and the hero's aim,
They little knew, and little cared to know,
But had some vague conception of men's fame,
For they had heard of glory—and that woe
Enthralled the heart when chaplets bound the brow!
They wept at tales of strife, of garlands twined—
Or paused in wonder, doubting it were so,
For they were lenient judges of mankind,
Nor willingly believed such bauble chained the mind.

So passed their days in peace; and thoughtful care
Stalked never in with sorrow's ghostly mien,
Save when they bore of grief a mortal's share,
When perished ties that had their idol been:
Then, in that hour of grief, they learned to wean
The soul from earth—for earthly love had won—
And, in no idle guise yclad, between
Returned Content, and lasting reign begun,
Whilst passed their vain regrets, like clouds from off the sun.

Life calmly waned, and night approached apace,
And gloom approached where cheer was wont to dwell,
Yet age to trust exalted yielded place,
And light appeared where hope's false beacon fell;
So faith's clear beams the darksome shades dispel;—
With tears of joy the pilgrims kissed the rod,
Turn'd back from earth—nor sigh'd, nor bade farewell—
And, hand in hand, went down the shadowed road,
Chastened, and firm in hope, and leaning upon God.

That cottage now is loveless—they are dead!
Love hath its hour, and time will claim its own!
The flowers are choked upon the weedy bed;
The rank vine creepeth, and the grass has grown
About the crumbling door and mossy stone—
While the green ivy round the grey roof clings,
And triumphs over all—and all is lone!
Yet Peace is floating near on azure wings—
O'er the sad scene she weeps, but dreams of changeless things.

Ye who do pine in poverty, and who
Have slow belief in cottage happiness,
Regard the picture, and by action woo
The angel Peace—deserve, and she shall bless:—
O, none are wedded hopeless to distress;
The soul is unsubdued by toil or care;
And sad 'soe'er the weary burthen press,
Of voluntary weakness comes despair—
The soul from its resolve may nerve itself to bear.

Ah, me! how oft in error pity flows,
When penury's submiss the kind espy!
And deems the world that they in tattered clothes
Are wedded ever to the tear and sigh;
But oft the sunniest cheek, and dryest eye,
And lightest heart, do meet in plain attire,
And narrow means with narrow wants ally:—
Who hold the staff to troublous lot aspire,
But earth's pure bliss proceeds from limited desire.

Peace will obey the bidding, and true joy
Oft, like an echo, answereth the call;—
The world is not all tears:—whoso employ
Aright the blessings which around them fall,
Shall in them find a means to govern all
Creations of consistent hope; and though
Toil and the weight of haggard years appal,
Content returns, whilst genial passions glow,
Rallies the mood of care, and jostles human woe!

THE ANGEL GUARD.

BY MRS. NORTON.

But deep in each man's heart some angel dwells,
Mournfully, as in sepulchral tomb;
Set o'er our nature like calm sentinels,
Denying passage to bad thoughts that come
Tempting us weakly to our final doom,
Patient they watch, whatever may betide;
Shedding pure rays of glory through the gloom,
And bowing meek wings over human pride—
As once in the lone grave of Him the crucified!

Angels of grief, who, when our week eyes tire
Of shedding tears, their sad sweet lessons teach;
Angels of hope, who lift with strong desire
Our mortal thoughts beyond a mortal reach;
Angels of mercy, who, to gentle speech
And meek forgiving words, the heart incline,
Weaving a link of brotherhood for each;
Angels of glory, whose white vestments shine
Around the good man's couch in dying life's decline.

Need of such heavenly counterpoise have we
To bear us up when we would grovel down;
To keep our clogged and tarnished natures free
From the world rust that round our hearts hath grown
Like mouldering moss upon a sculptured stone;
To soften down the cruelty and sin
Of crabbed selfishness that stands alone,
With greedy eyes that watch what they may win,
The whole wide world a field to gather harvest in!

"NOT IMPOSSIBLE."

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

"Know that 'Impossible,' where truth and mercy and the everlasting voice of nature order, has no place in the brave man's vocabulary."

A brilliant sight is that of the Centre Fountain Market, or, as it is more commonly called, Marsh Market, in the fair city of Baltimore, upon a summer's Saturday night. The immense stacks of vegetables, the luscious heaps of fruit, and blooming display of flowers, of every variety and color, all glittering in the resplendence of innumerable gas-lights, and tallow candles—the busy, rosy, laughing huckster women, the jolly butchers, brandishing their bright cleavers—the medley of carts, wagons, horses and dogs—the hum, and bustle, and the noise of shuffling feet—all combine to form a scene so lively, so gay, and so animating, you might almost fancy it a matter of impossibility, that there could be a human being in all that motley congregation who was not as happy and delighted as yourself. Yet you would fancy wrong, for there are oftentimes some very miserable beings in that crowd. The one, with whom it first comes within the province of this story to deal, was extremely miserable—that is, if appearances are any guide to judgment in such matters. He was a very ragged and forlorn-looking man, and had the bleared eye and bloated face of one addicted to the vice of intemperance. As it is not absolutely indispensable to the purpose in hand to specify the date of the particular Saturday night on which this individual figured, as we are about to relate, in the crowd at Marsh Market, we will merely mention that it was some years ago. He elbowed his passage half way down the space, and paused in front of the Arcade. For a few moments he gazed at the huge transparency over the upper story, which exhibited a full length (and breadth) portrait of Daniel Lambert, and advertized that all sorts of unheard-of curiosities, jugglers, balancers, an alligator, and an Egyptian mummy, could be seen, up stairs, for a shilling. After his eyes were satisfied with the figures on the transparency, and his ears had drank in a sufficient quantity of the cracked sounds of tamborine and violin, which were ringing jovially out from behind it, he passed into the avenue of the Arcade, eyeing the different persons who were trafficking at the stalls there, with a seemingly interested curiosity. At length he stepped boldly up to a sprucely dressed young fellow, who was bargaining with a dark-eyed Jewess, for a pair of kid gloves, and asked, in the usual phrase, though not with the whining accents of a common beggar—

"Young man, could you spare me a small sum to relieve my distresses?"

"Impossible!" was the rejoinder; "I have more little necessities myself than my money will supply. Besides, I never encourage beggars."

Before the sentence was finished, the mendicant had turned away, and was repeating his petition to a youth in home-spun, who was looking over a book-stall.

"Could I spare you a small sum?" returned the latter, raising a face upon which there was an expression of frankness and good nature, and speaking in a tone of such unsophisticated seriousness as betrayed him but a recent participator of city life—"that depends upon what use you will make of it. Are you sure you don't want it to buy rum?"

The beggar hesitated a moment, and then, as if in spite of the degradation which reduced him to beggary, he scorned to lie, answered—

"I am sorry to confess, I want it for that very purpose."

"I'm sorry to hear you confess it," said the young man; and laying his hand upon the inebriate's arm, he drew him aside to a spot a little retired from the crowd. Here he again addressed him—

"Have you a family?"

"A wife and one child," replied the beggar.

"And what is your occupation?"

"I have none. I was clerk in a house on Market street—it failed, and I could not obtain employment. My troubles drove me to drink, and brought me to this condition."

"Don't you think, if you were to stop drinking, you could now get employment, and make yourself, and your wife and child happy and comfortable?"

The man lifted his eyes to the face of his young monitor with a stare that betrayed these queries were becoming unpleasant, and perhaps that he thought them a little impertinent, coming from so inexperienced a source; but the ingenuous interest with which the youth regarded him, induced him to answer complacently—

"The fact is, I have become so habituated to drink, that it would be impossible for me to break off."

"Impossible—pshaw!" said the other; "I don't believe there is such a thing as an impossibility any more. Why, I'll tell you what—when I came to this city, three months ago, I had not the first cent in my pocket—for it had taken my all to pay my passage down from Frederick—and I did not know a soul in the place. I looked about all the afternoon for employment at my business—I am a silver-smith—and when night came on, I had not found any. About eight o'clock I sat down in one of the stalls of that market house. I was tired and sick. I had not eaten a mouthful since I started from Frederick in the morning. I thought it was impossible for me to get any thing to do, or any thing to eat, when an old lady, who kept a cake stand, and who had got out of patience waiting for her husband, offered me sixpence to carry her basket home. I agreed; and she gave me not only the sixpence, but a good supper; and when I had satisfied her that I was not a runaway apprentice, offered me lodging for the night. I started out next morning, and before night I found a situation. It's a hard one, to be sure, and I don't make much; yet it isn't impossible for me to give you a dollar, if you'll make the right use of it; and, poor as we both are, it isn't impossible that you and I may be rich and happy men some day."

At the conclusion of this story, which the ragged man had listened to with a show of impatience, the unsophisticated youth slipped the amount mentioned into his hand, and left him abruptly. The man passed down the space to a tavern, and paused at the door, as if debating in his mind whether to enter and spend the dollar he had received for rum, or take the advice of his young benefactor, and strive to reform. The struggle seemed to be a strong one, and after some five minutes' hesitation, he turned and walked onward, with the slow and irresolute step of one whose course was undecided.

We will now return to the generous youth, who, after the charitable act related, bent his steps homeward, soon forgetting, in the multitude of objects that attracted his attention, the little incident in which he had been the chief actor. He found it possible, on his way, to assist an old lame porter, who was staggering along under the weight of a large leather trunk; without hesitation, he took hold of one end of it, and supported half the burden. Nor did he relinquish it until it had reached its destination, although the charitable office led him several squares out of his way. When the trunk was at length set down on the steps of a three-story brick in Lexington street, he concluded to pause a while, partly because he had too much of obligingness in his disposition to interrupt the loquacity of the porter, who was earnestly detailing the circumstances of a firemen's row which had occurred the night before, and partly because he was pleased with the sound of a piano, accompanied by a soft voice, which came floating through the window blinds from the house. While he was standing there, a gentleman, with the usual accompaniments of a traveller, an umbrella under one arm, and a great coat dangling across the other, came up, and drawing out his purse, demanded of the old man his charge.

"Twenty-five cents," was the reply.

"And yours?" he continued, turning to our hero.

"Oh," returned Hite Ellery—it is time we had mentioned his name—"Oh, I shall be satisfied with the privilege of a seat upon the step, until the lady within finishes her song."

"You are moderate," said the gentleman; "but if you will come in, you can hear it to better advantage."

This was said in a matter-of-course tone, which seemed to anticipate no refusal; and the door being now opened, Hite, so abashed by the unexpected invitation that he knew not how to decline it, was ushered into the hall, and thence, after the gentleman had met and saluted his wife, into a handsome little parlor, where he was left, without even the ceremony of a word of explanation, with a girl in a faded calico dress, and unfashionable leghorn bonnet. She appeared, from the last named article of her attire, to have been upon the eve of departure, and to have merely paused to amuse a child of eight or ten, who, perched upon a chair, reclined its head delightedly upon one end of the instrument she was fingering. The child no sooner became aware of its father's arrival, than it ran from the room, thus leaving the youth entirely alone with the unknown female, who now abruptly ceased her song, and sat running her fingers idly over the keys of the instrument. He felt embarrassed. He had not been much accustomed to the society of the softer sex, and had none of the set phrases of the gallant at command. Feeling constrained to say something, and yet ignorant what form of address etiquette might require in his particular case, he resolved upon a plain statement of the circumstance which brought him there, as the best mode of introducing himself. Hite seldom judged character by dress; and the faded calico caused him as much timidity as a shining silk could have produced; it was, therefore, with some trepidation, that he walked up to the piano and said—

"I ask pardon, if I have interrupted you, Miss. I was listening to your song at the door, when the gentleman who has just arrived, kindly invited me in. If you are so inclined, I shall be pleased to hear you finish it."

"Certainly," replied the girl, turning towards him a set of features, which a pair of brilliant eyes partially retrieved from the plainness which the misshapen leghorn threw over them. She then re-commenced the air she had been peforming. Hite, though no connoisseur, soon perceived that she possessed great musical talent, and with very natural curiosity, was wondering if she were not a teacher of the art, when the lady of the house entered the room. When the piece was finished, she approached the girl, and placed something in her hand. The young musician thanked her in a low tone, but the words were distinctly audible to Hite.

"I am very, very much obliged to you," she said, "but do not give me all now—keep this much until I came again. If I go home with all this, he will take it from me, and spend it in the manner that I told you."

"As you will, child," returned the lady. "Whenever you need it, call, and any time you should need assistance, do not hesitate to apply to me. Perhaps I may want you again next month, or the month after, at all events."

"Thank you," said the girl; "I shall always be happy to oblige you. And now I must go before it grows late."

"I would not let you go alone," said the lady, "but Mr. B. is so much fatigued from his journey, and a little unwell too."

As she spoke, she glanced at Hite, who, anticipating her wish, immediately offered his services. The girl hesitated, perhaps from a doubt as to the propriety of placing herself under the escort of a perfect stranger. But the lady whispered that "he looked like a good-hearted fellow, whom nobody need fear." Thus assured, she of the faded calico turned to the young man with a courtesy, and accepted his offer.

When his companion, at the door, placed her hand in his arm, Hite was conscious that it trembled, and this fact would have contributed to his embarrassment, but he had perceived, from what had passed in the house, that she was a child of want and trouble, and his benevolent feelings surmounted his diffidence. His heart had a great affinity for all kinds of human distress. One drop of water has not a greater propensity to unite with another, on coming in contact, than had his sympathies to mingle with the sorrows and sufferings of his fellow beings. The language which springs from such feelings seldom fails to find its way to the heart of the hearer, and Hite succeeded, though without the remotest design of engaging her affections, in making such an impression on the girl's mind, that it was not likely she would soon forget her young stranger gallant of that evening. He, too, ere they reached her home, was interested by something more than the manifestation of distress which had at first claimed his sympathy. There was a charm in the softness and melody of her clear voice, which rivetted the tones upon the memory; and there was an elevation of thought and feeling in her words which commanded his respect. It was a little singular, however, that, notwithstanding the intimacy of sentiment to which they attained before the end of their walk, they parted without either having learned the other's name.

Once more Hite turned towards home, which he reached this time without being interrupted by any further tax upon his benevolence. He found his employer and his employer's wife in some concern at his long absence, for he had never kept late hours, and, in fact, was now not a little suprised to learn that it was near twelve o'clock, and that his fellow apprentices had long ago retired.

"Why, Hite, what has kept you out so late? Come, give an account of yourself," said Mrs. Foil, in a tone which indicated more of solicitude than displeasure. Hite was thinking of the strange girl, and colored.

"Really! how he blushes," continued the lady to her husband, with good-natured railery—"he has been doing something very bad—don't you think so, Mr. Foil?"

"Why, you know there is nothing impossible with him," returned Mr. Foil, smiling at the youth's increasing confusion.

Hite now attempted to exculpate himself, by relating his adventures. This was a superfluous task, for they had as much confidence in his good principles, as they had in the correctness of the sun-dial, by which Mr. Foil had regulated his time pieces for the last twenty years. His story ended, the lady expressed her conviction that it was not impossible he might oversleep himself in the morning. Taking the hint, he lighted his lamp, and retired.

Hite's was one of those natures which we meet with only here and there in the throng which crowds the pathway of life, and in which there is always a correspondence of conduct with sentiment. He never assumed a virtue which he did not possess, and never strove to conceal or palliate an error of which he was conscious. He not only despised duplicity in others, but he strove to guard against it in himself—and he so far succeeded, that he possessed the unlimited confidence of all who knew him. There is scarce a lovelier feature in the human character than candor. It was a feature in Hite's character, which, though it sometimes subjected him to the derisive taunts of what in modern phrase is termed verdancy, yet invariably proved a key to the respect and esteem of all with whom his destiny brought him in contact.—Even the most subtle of those who glory in the appellation of "knowing ones," while they smiled at his ingenuousness, could not withhold the tribute of inward respect to this quality of his heart. Nor did he ever find it to his disadvantage in any one pursuit of his life—that old adage, (too generally, we are sorry to say, received into practice in society of the present day) that "it is safest to meet the devil with his own weapons," to the contrary, notwithstanding. In fact, he was often able to foil, by the simple force of truth, the arts of those, whom others, equally skilled in duplicity, had opposed in vain.

Another trait in Hite's character was, his willingness to encounter any obstacle which opposed the accomplishment of duty or social obligations, and his rejection of that favorite plea of indolence and imbecility—"the impossible." No task was required of him by his employer—no favor by a friend, or by any reasonable creature, which he did not undertake with the expression, "I believe it's not impossible." And his case was a happy illustration of the force of example. His fellow apprentices, and, indeed, all the members composing Mr. Foil's household—who had not, before his arrival amongst them, been very remarkable for industry or kindly feeling—were first won to esteeming him for his system of "doing things," and from esteeming him to emulating him, until they at length all adopted his admirable motto as a rule of conduct, and, as the worthy silversmith himself subsequently had occasion to remark, the only things that seemed, any more, impossible with them, were discord in their daily intercourse and delinquency in their daily duties.

But to resume again the immediate thread of the story. Upon the second Sabbath ensuing the Saturday night, the incidents of which we have sketched, Hite started out to call upon the girl of the faded calico, whose sweet voice, and engaging manners, and above all, whose apparent distress had, more than once during the week, been the theme which occupied his thoughts. He found the house to which he had escorted her, but much to his surprise, found it also untenanted. He made some inquiries among the neighbours, but none of them could inform him whither the family had removed, or even their name, for they had lived there but a short time, and in a very secluded manner. He returned with a feeling of no slight disappointment. He afterwards made several attempts to discover a clue to her whereabouts, but they proved fruitless, and at length, in the diversion of his thoughts to other matters, her memory passed from his mind.

We will now make a hiatus in our narrative of four years, the end of which period brought Hite to the 22d year of his age. Collision with the rough corners of the world, is apt to rub off those good qualities of a man's nature which are only surface deep; but his were not of this class, and therefore remained unimpaired. In fact, time had much improved both his heart and his mind. Mr. Foil had found it so far inconvenient to dispense with his services, that he had taken him into his business as a partner, and he was now in a fair way to acquire a comfortable fortune. With regard to his personal appearance, it will be sufficient to state, that the ladies generally thought him decidedly handsome—and their judgment must be respected in such matters.

As soon as Hite found himself in the road to a comfortable living, he naturally began to think of finding some gentle maid to share it with him. Some modest, amiable, intelligent being, he proposed to himself, who might be pining in indigence and sorrow, whom his home and fortune might make happy, and whose true love might make him happy in return. But the contrary deity who presides over man's affections, soon manifested a determination to set his benevolent calculations at defiance. About this time a young lady, the daughter of a wealthy New York merchant, arrived in Baltimore on a visit to a friend. She was very beautiful—had large dark eyes, which sparkled with intelligence, and feeling, and refinement—a soft, clear complexion, with just such delicate color in the cheeks as peeps from one side of the most delightful peach to be found in a ten acre orchard—lips which nature had chiselled to utter nothing but syllables of love—a form whose gracefulness enchanted, and a voice whose melody thrilled one with rapturous emotions. Her beauty, accomplishments, and reputation as an heiress, drew about her, of course, a larger number of admirers, or lovers, if the reader so pleases to term them, than ought, in reason, to fall to any one lady's share.

It chanced that Mrs. Beal, the lady upon whom the honour of the heiress' visit was conferred, was an intimate friend of Hite's—yet, though he possessed this facility to an acquaintance with the attraction of the season, he did not seek an introduction. He had by this time seen enough of female society to lead him to the conclusion that great belles generally were great coquettes, and that great coquettes were heartless, senseless—in short, very despicable creatures, altogether unworthy of an intelligent man's admiration. He would, therefore, rather have shunned than courted the society of the New York heiress. But fate would not have it so. His female friend called one day to purchase some article of plate, and reproved him for his remissness in visiting her of late, adding a pressing invitation for that evening. He had no alternative, and went. The heiress he found quite as beautiful as report had stated her to be. She was surrounded by several young bloods, whose company she seemed rather to tolerate than enjoy. He was presented, and she received him with the most bewitching affability imaginable—nay, almost with the easy familiarity of an old companion. Further than this, she soon manifested a pleasure in his unpresuming remarks, while she discouraged the more forward attentions of the rest of the company.

"Art, art," thought he; "the hearts she has captured she trifles with, and now turns to me as a new victim."

And yet with this very self-warning, he began to yield to the spell of her fascination. He saw the danger, but could not avoid it—like the mariner who feels that he is nearing the vortex of the Maelstrom, while he is unable to resist its whirling current. Of the history of that evening, it needs but to add that, in the very face of reason and caution, he became desperately enamoured. He went home,—revolved the matter in his mind—called himself a silly-pated mushroom, and various other hard names—but could not rail himself out of love with the coquette. Her words would come back upon his ear, seeming to mock his efforts to forget them. Her smiles had wreathed themselves, like the fond ivy, around his memory, and lived there. The beams of her lustrous eye had fallen upon the mists of his heart, and were reflected before his mind in a rainbow that would not fade. He gave it up at last, and yielded entire submission to the spell. Evening after evening found him by the side of Miss Clara Bently, and by the end of a fortnight he had progressed so far towards intimacy, that he could scarce believe he had only known her that length of time, while his own passion seemed to have been one of years of duration, instead of days. Deeply fascinated as he was, and blind as love is said to be, he had not, however, neglected any opportunity to study her character with the most cautious scrutiny, and the result was a conviction that there was nothing of the coquette about her—but that she was as artless and amiable as she was beautiful and accomplished. Satisfied upon this point, he determined to—we may as well use the plain old phrase, even at the expense of being thought unpoetical—pop the question. Accordingly, two weeks after his first introduction, he called upon her for that purpose. Fortunately, she was alone. His task was one of exceeding delicacy, as every one knows who has ever tried it. Hite was agitated, made several unmeaning preliminary remarks, and then mustering resolution, asked if her affections were unengaged. Clara betrayed some emotion, and murmured—"No; they have long been engaged."

Hite was dumb. He had been sadly deceived. She was a coquette, then, after all. His situation was now deplorable. Her unequivocal answer rendered it useless to advance further, and he knew not how to retreat gracefully. He sat in awkward silence, and Clara seemed greatly embarrassed. Indeed, there was something in her uneasy manner which seemed to indicate that she repented the reply she had made, and would have liked to recall it, or qualify it, had he urged his question further. But he had heard enough, and had no idea of making another attampt. At length the lady essayed to break the silence, by remarking something about the fairness of the evening. Hite responded an assent, and added, pointing to the pale rays which fell through the window upon the floor:

"How prettily those figures in the carpet appear, illuminated by the moonlight."

"Moonlight?" enquired Clara.

"Ah, what a ridiculous blunder," he exclaimed, looking up and discovering that the light proceeded from the gas lamp upon the other side of the street; "I had forgotten that the moon does not rise until twelve o'clock. And, really," he added, taking out his watch, and examining the hands by the gas light aforesaid—"it is near that hour now."

"Twelve?" repeated the lady, in a tone of surprise.

He loooked again.

"Pardon me—I have mistaken the minute hand for the hour hand. It is just nine—and I perceive, too, my time is exact with your clock."

His perceptive faculty was evidently considerably confused; for it was only the ringing of the door bell. His embarrassment was now painful in the extreme, and he knew of no way to end it, but by ending his visit. The same disturbed faculty which led him into the foregoing blunders, also prevented his remarking that Clara was as much agitated as himself, and that she betrayed an evident reluctance to his departure—as though there were some explanation she desired to make, but which delicacy prohibited, unless he should demand it, or lead the way to it. He took his leave with an abruptness, which, though not so palpable as to clash seriously with etiquette, yet upon subsequent reflection caused him to feel a little mortified. In the hall he met a servant ushering in a middle-aged gentleman, who had that day purchased a gold repeater from him. A nod of recognition passed, and Hite made his exit.

He reached home, and sat himself down to indulge in a melancholy retrospect of his situation. The sudden stifling of his hopes had in no whit abated the fervour of his passion, although it had shown him the necessity of combating it.

The following day, the gentleman Hite had passed in the hall at Mrs. Beal's, called to have his repeater regulated—it having manifested a propensity to "run before the time." While our hero was engaged at it, the stranger made some allusion to their casual meeting, which led to a conversation upon Mrs. B. and her fair visitor, in the course of which he asked Hite's opinion of the latter.

"She is very fascinating," was his reply, "but a most accomplished coquette."

"Indeed?" said the stranger, "I was not aware of that fact, but you, perhaps, speak from experience?"

Hite colored deeply, and the gentleman continued—

"Yet I think you must be mistaken. My own impression is that sincerity is one of the leading features of her character, and you, I doubt not, could woo and win her without difficulty from the foible you assign her."

"Impossible!" replied Hite, with his usual frankness, and in the confidence of his own knowledge, making use of a phraze which but rarely indeed had found a place in his vocabulary.

"Four years ago," rejoined the customer, regarding him with singular earnestness, "you did not believe there was such a thing as an impossibility."

The young man scrutinized the speaker's features in turn, in an endeavor to call to mind where they had met before, as these words seemed to imply they had—but he had repeated the expression so often, and to so many, that it afforded no assistance to his memory. The latter personage, smiling at his perplexity, now pleaded an engagement, and, saying he would call again for the watch, left him.

This incident set Hite to cogitating. This person, who seemed so singularly acquainted with both himself and Clara, had said he must be mistaken, and doubted not he could win her. When he called to mind the blunders he had made in his embarrassed intercourse of the evening before, the idea grew plausible, that he might have misapprehended her answer in regard to the state of her affections. The more he pondered upon this, the more plausible it appeared, until he became elated with hope again, and resolved upon another effort.

"I will stick to my old motto," he mentally averred; "there is nothing impossible."

Hite's second effort proved, to his infinite delight, more successful than his first. Nine o'clock that evening found him and Clara side by side, happy in the revelation of mutual love. After the first transports, consequent upon such revelations were over, our hero ventured to open the way to an explanation of the misapprehension of the previous evening.

"My dearest Clara—for I may well call you so now," he said, "how did my ears deceive me last evening in understanding you to say that your affections had been long engaged?"

"They did not deceive you," she replied, "those were my words. My affections have been long engaged—and by yourself."

"My me? You surprise me! I did not dream we had ever met before my introduction to you, in this house, a few weeks ago."

"Perhaps I can brighten your memory. Do you not recollect some three or four years ago, having assisted a porter to carry a trunk to a house in Lexington street, on a Saturday night, in June, I think—and having been asked in, to hear a poor, forlorn girl drum a tune upon the piano—of having accompanied that girl to her humble house—of having spoken kindly to her, and sympathized with her misfortunes as with those of a sister—and?"—

"And having fallen so desperately in love with her, that I forgot to enquire her name. Yes, I remember it all! I sought you afterwards, but you had gone, no one knew whither. And now for the rest of the story."

"Not now. There is a little mystery in that, which shall be a surprise for you another time."

"Well, then," said Hite, "nothing remains now, but to name the happy day which shall make yourself and your mystery both mine."

"You are hasty," exclaimed Clara.

"Surely not"—he replied—"after a mutual attachment of four years."

"Now, deceiver, I will catch you. Do you pretend that the attachment has been mutual, when this very night you have made love to me, not dreaming of my identity with the distressed girl you met in Lexington street four years ago."

"But then," returned Hite, "the poor girl was spirited away—dead, for all I could discover—and tonight I only brought the New York belle, second-hand affections."

"More likely third, or fourth, or fifth hand affections," interposed Clara.

"No—I assure you! The girl of the crumpled legborn was my first, and Clara Bently my only love."

"Well, as a dutiful daughter, I can only now refer you to my father."

"I shall write to him."

"You may see him—that is doubtless his hand at the door bell, you mistook it for the hand of the clock last night."

A few minutes after, the middle-aged gentleman —Hite's customer of the previous day—entered, and was introduced as "my father." Clara soon found an excuse to retire, and Hite did not delay to open his mind, for he felt conscious that no difficulty need be apprehended in this quarter. The reply was prompt:

"As her affections are yours, it would be ingratitude in me to object—for it is to your generosity that I am indebted for the wealth and happiness—perhaps even the very life I now enjoy."

"I do not comprehend you!" iterated Hite, in a tone of the utmost amazement.

"I can soon explain myself," pursued Mr. Bently. "Four years ago, one Saturday, in the Arcade, on Marsh Market space, you gave a dollar to an inebriate beggar, with an admonition which led to his reform. During the following week he found means to remove to New York, where, by keeping in view your maxim, that "there is nothing impossible," he acquired wealth, which is now increasing, and bids fair to swell to a handsome fortune. Your words are verified. It was not impossible that we should both live to be rich and happy men. The particulars of my history since that night would be too long to detail now—you shall hear them at another opportunity."

"And to your reproof yesterday, for the forgetfulness of that maxim," said Hite, seizing the old man's hand with emotion, "I owe the happiness of the present moment—the happiest of my life; so that we are now even in point of obligations."

In due time Clara Bently became Mrs. Ellery, and it is needless to say that she made a noble and excellent wife. Hite ever since has adhered to his good maxim, and has conquered a great many apparent impossibilities, which others have shrunk from encountering. He has made a snug fortune by persevering industry, with which he finds it not impossible to do a vast amount of good, and to minister to the wants and comforts of others as well as his own.

The Heart's Unwritten Poetry.

The heart's unwritten poetry!
Oh! who shall call it forth,
Since Scotia numbers with her dead,
The Wizard of the North!
And leaves to moulder on his bier,
That harp which once thrilled every ear!

The heart's unwritten poetry!
The gushings of the soul,—
That will not come at Reason's call,
But yields to Love's control!
And gentle as the viewless wind,
Leaves breath of fragrant flowers behind.

The heart's unwritten poetry!
Who hath not felt its power,
And 'neath its silent eloquence
Bowed at the trysting hour;
When heart and brain, and soul and eye,—
All thrilled with love's intensity!

The heart's unwritten poetry!
The language love expresses—
When heart to heart first makes response,
And each their love confesses,—
When hand in hand, and side by side,
A lover views his future bride.

The heart's unwritten poetry!
Oh, call it not of earth!
Though mortal form may call it forth,
'Tis yet of Heavenly birth!
The breathings of a harp divine,—
Heaven's incense at an earthly shrine!

Stanzas.--To A.....

Why is it that thy form so fair,
Should pass before, in fitful gleams,
My fancy's wakeful hours of care,
As well as those that pass in dreams?

Why should those eyes, whose gentle light
Seems caught from some fair orb in heaven,
Beam softly on my 'raptured sight,
Like ling'ring rays at dewy even?

Why should the pressure of that hand
Send to my heart a gle wing thrill,
Who's throbs heed not the stern command,
Which bids its quicken ed pulse be still?

Why should those lips, whose tempting bait
Allures me, if it were a sin,
Inviting smile, and seal my fate,
One blissful moment thus to win?

Why should they not?—I am but man—
An angel well might leave the bliss
In yon fair world, such charms to scan,
And ling'ring wish to dwell in this.

Then blame me not when thus I take
My harp, and bow at beauty's shrine;
The cords of feeling all must break,
Or vibrate to a touch like thine.

And harp and heart their tribute pay,
Responsive to love's gushing charms;
My harp shall yield its tuneful lay;
While I would fold thee in my arms.

With what delight my breast would swell,
To pillow there thy head to rest;
Like some fair nymph in ocean shell,
Rocked by the billow's heaving breast.

But, oh! a thought must break the spell,
Which fondly nestles round the heart;
That those whose hearts could love so well,
Are coldly doomed to dwell apart.

Though there are vows that sunder here,
They are of earth and must be riven;
Our spirits in some happier sphere,
May blend in ecstacies of heaven.

THE FAMILY CIRCLE.

The Mother and her Dying Son.

A BEAUTIFUL SKETCH.

The mother breathed deeply when she saw herself alone with her son. She folded her hands, and raised her eyes to Heaven with an expression which through he whole of the foregoing days had been foreign to them. It was no longer resistless, almost murmuring anxiety; it was a mournful, yet at the same time, deep, perfect, nay, almost loving resignation. She bent over her son, and spoke in a low voice out of the depths of her affectionate heart.

"Go, my sweet boy, go! I will no longer hold thee back, since it is painful to thee! May the deliverer come! Thy mother will no longer contend with him to retain thee! May he come and make an end of thy sufferings! I—will then be satisfied! Go, then, my first born, my summer-child; and if there may never more come a summer to the heart of thy mother—still go! that thou mayest have rest! Did I make thy cradle sweet, my child! so would I not embitter by my lamentations thy death-bed! Blessed be thou! Blessed be He also who gave thee to me and who now takes thee from me to a better home! Some time my son, I shall come to thee, go thou beforehand my child! Thou art weary, so weary! Thy last wandering was heavy to thee; now thou wilt rest. Come, thou good deliverer, come thou beloved death, and give rest to his heart; but easily, easily. Let him not suffer more—let him not endure more. Never did he give care to his parents!"—

At this mo ment Henrik opened his eyes, and fixed them calmly and full of expression, on his mother.

"Thank God!" said he, "I feel no more pain."

"Thanks and praise be given to God, my child!" said she.

Mother and son looked on each other with deep and cheerful love! they understood each other perfectly.

"When I am no more," said he, with a faint and broken voice, "then—tell it Gabriele prudently; she has such tender feelings—and she is not strong. Do not tell it to her on a day—when it is cold and dull—but—on a day—when the sun shines warm—when all things look bright and kindly—then, then tell her —that I am gone first to greet her—and tell her from me—that it is not difficult—to die!—that there is a sun on the other side!"—

He ceased, but with a loving smile on his lips, and his eyes closed their lids as from very weariness.

Presently afterward he spoke again, but in a very low voice. "Sing me something, mother," said he, "I shall then sleep more calmly, 'They knock, I come!'"

These words are the beginning of a song which Henrik had himself written and set to music some time before, during a night of suffering.

The genius of poetry seemed to have deserted him during the latter part of his illness; this was painful to him, but his mind remained the same and the spirit of poetry lived still in the hymn which his mother now, at his request, sang in a trembling voice:

They knock! I come! yet ere on the way
To the night of the grave I am pressing;
Thou Angel of Death, give me yet one lay—
One hymn of thanksgiving and blessing.

Have thanks, O Father! in Heaven high,
For thy gift, all gifts exceeding;
For life! and that grieved or glad I could fly
To thee, nor find thee unheeding.

Oh! thanks for life, and thanks too for death,
The bound of all trouble and sighing;
How bitter! yet sweet 'tis to yield our breath
When thine is the heart of the dying!

By our path of trial thou plantest still
Thy lilies of consolation,
But the loveliest of all to do thy will—
Be it done in resignation!

Farewell, lovely earth, on whose bosom I lay;
Farewell, all ye dear friends, mourning;
Farewell, and forgive all the faults of my day:
My heart now in death is burning!

"It is burning!" repeated Henrik, in a voice of suffering. "It is terrible! Mother! mother!" said he, looking at her with a restless glance.

"Your mother is here," said she, bending over him.

"Ah! then all is right," said he again, calmly.— "Sing, my mother," added he, closing his eyes, "I am weary."

She sang—

We part! but in parting our steps we bend
Alone towards that glorious morrow,
Where friend no more shall part from friend,
Where none knoweth heartache or sorrow!

Farewell! all is dark to my failing sight,
Young loved forms from my faint gaze rending,
'Tis dark, but oh! far beyond the night
I see light o'er the darkness ascending!

"Oh! if you only knew how serene it is! It is divine!" said the dying one, as he stretched forth his arms, and then dropped them again.

A change passed over the countenance of the young man; death had touched his heart gently, and its pulsations ceased. At the same moment, a wonderful inspiration animated the mother; her eyes beamed brightly, and never before had her voice so beautiful, so clear a tone as while she sang—

Thou callest, O Father! with glad accord
I come! Ye dear ones we sever!
Now the pang is past! now behold I the Lord—
Praise be thine, O Eternal, forever!

THE BLIND PREACHER.

BY WILLIAM WIRT.

It was Sunday, as I travelled through the county of Orange, that my eye was caught by a cluster of horses tied near a ruinous old wooden house, in the forest, not far from the road-side. Having frequently seen such objects before, in travelling through the States, I had no difficulty in understanding that this was a place of religious worship.

Devotion alone should have stopped me to join in the duties of the congregation; but I must confess, that curiosity to hear what the Preacher of such a wilderness could say, was not the least of my motives.

On entering, I was struck with his preternatural appearance. He was a tall and spare old man; his head, which was covered with a white linen cap, his shrivelled hands, and his voice, were all shaking under the influence of palsy, and in a few moments I ascertained that he was blind.

The first emotions which touched the breast were those of mingled pity and veneration. But ah! sacred God! how soon were all my feelings changed! the Sun of Plato were never more worthy of a prognostic swarm of bees, than were the lips of this holy man; It was the day of the administration of the sacrament; and the subject, of course, was the passion of our Saviour. I had heard the subject handled a thousand times, I had thought it exhausted long ago. Little did I suppose that in the wild woods of America, I was to meet with a man whose eloquence would give this topic new and more sublime pathos, than I had ever before witnessed.

As he descended from the pulpit, to distribute the mystic symbols, there was a peculiar, a more than human solemnity in his air and manner, which made my blood run cold and my frame shiver.

He then drew a picture of the sufferings of our Saviour, his trial before Pilate; his ascent up Calvary; his crucifixion; and his death. I knew the whole history; but never until then, had I heard the circumstances so selected; so arranged; so colored— it was all new; and I seemed to have heard it for the first time in my life. His voice trembled on every syllable; and every heart in the assembly trembled in unison. His peculiar phrase had that force of description that the original scene appeared to be at the moment acting before our eyes. We saw the faces of the Jews, the starting, frightful distortions of malice and rage, with a flame of indignation; and my hands involuntary clenched.

But when he came to touch on the patience, the forgiving meekness of our Saviour, when he drew to the life, his blessed eyes streaming to Heaven, his voice breathing to God a soft and gentle prayer of pardon on his enemies: "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do."—The voice of the Preacher had all along faltered, and grew fainter and fainter, until his utterance being entirely obstructed by the force of his feelings, he raised his handkerchief to his eyes, and burst into a loud and irrepressible flood of grief.

The effect is inconceivable. The whole house resounded with the mingled groans, and sobs, and shrieks of the congregation.

It was a long time before the tumult had subsided, so far as to permit him to proceed. Indeed, judging by the usual but fallacious standard of my own weakness, I began to be very uneasy for the situation of the Preacher. For I could not conceive how he would be able to let his audience down from the height to which he had wound them, without impairing the solemnity and dignity of his subject or perhaps shocking them by the abruptness of the fall. But—oh, the descent was as beautiful and sublime as the elevation had been rapid and enthusiastic.

The first sentence with which he broke the awful silence was a quotation from Rosseau:—"Socrates died like a philosopher, but Jesus Christ like a God!"

I despair of giving you any idea of the effect produced by this short sentence; unless you could perfectly conceive the whole manner of the man, as well as the peculiar crisis in the discourse. Never before did I understand what Demosthenes meant by laying such stress on delivery.

You are to bring before you the venerable figure of the Preacher, his blindness, constantly recalling to your recollection old Homer, Ossian and Milton and associating with his performance the melancholy grandeur of their genius; you are to imagine that you hear his slow, solemn, well accented enunciation, and his voice affecting melody; you are to remember the pitch of passion and enthusiasm to which the congregation were raised; and the few minutes of portentious, death-like silence which reigned through the house; the Preacher removed the white handkerchief from his aged face, (even yet wet from the recent torrent of tears,) and slowly stretching forth the palsied hand which holds it, begins the sentence—"Socrates died like a philosopher"—then pausing, raising his other hand, pressing them both clasped together, with warmth and energy, to his breast, lifting his sightless balls to Heaven, and pouring his whole soul into his tremulous voice—"but Jesus Christ—like a God!" If he had been in deed and in truth an angel of light, the effect could scarcely have been more divine.

Whatever I had been able to conceive of the sublimity of Massillion, or the force of Boaurdalone, had fallen far short of the power which just before rushed in a hurricane upon my brain, and in the violence and agony of my feelings, had held my whole system in suspense, now ran back into my heart, with a sensation which I cannot describe: a kind of shuddering delicious horror! the paroxysm of blended piety and indignation to which I had been transported, subsided into deep self-abasement, humility, and adoration. I had just been lacerated and dissolved by sympathy for our Saviour as a fellow creature; but now with fear and trembling, I adored him as—"a God!"

THE PROMISE.

An Instructive Story from Real Life.

George Belmont was in his nineteenth year when he received a summons to attend the sick bed of his father, who, after maintaining a high reputation as a tradesman during the greater portion of his life, had failed in business, and whose constitution, already shaken by cares and disappointments, sunk under the combined evils of poverty and a keen sense of the degradation he believed attendant upon his bankruptcy. George was his eldest child. He had received a liberal education, and been intended for a physician; but his father's difficulties having deprived him of the means of completing his professional studies, he had obtained a situation in the countinghouse of an extensive manufacturer in the town of C——. Up to this period of his life, George had manifested no extraordinary energy or ability, but was regarded by his employer as a steady, well-disposed youth, possessing merely business talent sufficient to enable him to discharge his duties in a satisfactory manner.

Young Belmont, who was considerably disappointed in not being able to follow the profession he had chosen, and who imagined that he had a distaste for mercantile affairs, contented himself with the bare performance of his prescribed duty, indulging secretly the hope that something might yet turn up more congenial to his wishes. From this dream of the future he was, however, effectually aroused when standing by the bedside of his dying father—a sense of the responsibility attaching to him as the eldest child, and only son of a widowed mother, came home to his understanding and to his heart.

On George's arrival at home, he found that his father had been some hours speechless, though it was evident to his afflicted relations that he retained full possession of his faculties. With the anxious, searching look so common to the dying, he gazed now on his wife, now on his little daughter, and then his eager eye sought the countenance of his son, who, struggling with emotion, made a vigorous effort to conduct himself with manly fortitude. Replying to the wistful and touching look fixed on him, George said—

"My dear father, I will, by the help of God, endeavor to supply your place to my mother and sister. I am young and strong. For your sake and theirs, I will devote myself to business, and do not doubt but I shall be able to make them comfortable."

And as the youth uttered these words, in a voice tremulous with grief, he bowed his head, and tears fell thick and fast upon the almost rigid hand he held in his own.

But it now became evident that, though George had in part rightly interpreted his father's wishes, something yet remained unexpressed, which disturbed his last moments; for he made violent efforts to speak, and with much difficulty articulated—

"I wish to say more—something more."

George stooped to listen, but could only catch the words—

"Should it ever be in your power—my son, promise me——"

It was agonizing to witness his ineffectual efforts to proceed; but just then the truth flashed across his son's mind, and he exclaimed with earnestness—

"I understand you, dear father, and I do most solemnly promise, that if it should be in my power, I will pay your creditors to the uttermost farthing; and may God prosper me as I fulfil this promise."

A beam of joyful satisfaction illuminated the countenance of Mr. Belmont. He grasped the hand of his son, and appeared to invoke a blessing upon him. The weight removed from the mind of the sufferer, he peacefully closed his eyes, and in a few hours George Belmont was fatherless.

This sad event proved an epoch in the life of the young man. The affecting scene he had witnessed, the solemn engagement he had entered into, together with his new and heavy responsibilities, combined to endow him with strength of purpose to apply vigorously to business. Though very young, he soon rendered himself useful and even necessary to his employer, who was glad to secure his services by such an increase of salary as, joined to a trifling annuity secured to the widow, enabled the family to live in comfort and maintain a respectable appearance.

Shortly after her husband's death, Mrs. Belmont removed to C——, where she not only had the advantage of her son's society, but was also enabled to place her daughter Emily at a good day school.

It is well known that success in any employment, naturally begets a fondness for it; and thus it proved with George Belmont, whose activity and devotion to business increased with increasing years. Nor did his prosperity tempt him to swerve even in idea from his intention to pay the debts which so heavily weighed down the spirit of his poor father; but George had yet to learn that there may be opposing motives, which may render the performance of duty distasteful and difficult. This lesson he was taught by painful experience.

Amongst Emily's schoolfellows there was one with whom she formed a close intimacy, and from whose society she derived both pleasure and advantage. Anna Burton was about three years older than Emily. Her father was a Solicitor, and though not rich, he moved in society to which the Belmonts had not access. Childish intimacy ripened into friendship as the two girls approached womanhood.—Through the interest of Mrs Burton, Emily, when in her eighteenth year, obtained a situation as daily governess, which furnished her with the means of independence, and enabled her still to enjoy the society of her mother and brother. The amiable qualities of Miss Burton, her beauty, talents, and above all, the attention she paid to Mrs. Belmont and Emily, won the esteem and affection of George, and inspired him with fresh motives to exertion. Receiving as much encouragement as a timid and respectful lover can expect so long as his sentiments remain undeclared, George for a time indulged in blissful anticipations of future happiness, though without distinctly examining the foundation on which they were placed. A cessation in the visits of Miss Burton first led him into a train of uneasy reflections on this subject, and compelled him to deal faithfully with his own heart, and to investigate his intentions. From his sister, George learned that there was no diminution in Miss Burton's regard for her. On the contrary, Emily declared that she found her increasingly kind and attentive, with this only difference, that she avoided all occasions of intercourse with her brother. It was evient, then, that she was influenced either by coquetry or the wishes of her friends. A little consideration convinced George that the latter was the true reason.

And now followed a struggle between duty and inclination—the most severe, perhaps, to which a young man similarly circumstanced can be exposed. From the period of his father's death, young Belmont had observed the most rigid economy, denying himself even the reasonable and proper indulgences suitable to his age, in order to lay by a part of his earnings towards the accomplishment of that object which he looked upon as the most sacred and important of his life. Though his pious fund was not yet sufficient to enable him to redeem his pledge, he was master of a sum large enough to place him in a situation to ask the hand of his beloved Anna. Delay might endanger the happiness of his life. He could not bear that the woman he loved should labour under the imputation of indulging a preference for one who did not possess the sanction of her parents, or who was regarded by them as an inferior. Besides, it would only be delaying the payment of his father's debts; his intention would remain the same—his exertions receive additional stimulus from Anna's approval and sympathy. With such arguments did George for a time endeavour to persuade himself that he might, without injustice, defer the execution of his long-treasured project; but, finally, a sense of right triumphed, and his renewed determination to redeem his pledge, imparted to his agitated and troubled spirit a degree of peace to which he had been for some time a stranger.

The affection which George Belmont bore his mother, operated as a powerful motive to his perseverance in the path of duty. Her confidence in him was, he knew, unbounded. The hope that he would be the instrument of wiping away the only blot upon the memory of her beloved husband, had hitherto proved the cordial which had sustained and cheered her during the seclusion and privations of her widowhood, imparting to her declining years something of the hopefulness of youth, as she fondly pictured the time when, through the medium of the son, the honour of the father should be fully established, and her children receive the reward of their virtuous exertions and self-denial, in the respect of the wise and good. To disappoint these cherished hopes, and betray the trust reposed in him, George felt to be impossible; and he regarded it as most fortunate that, just at this time, he was requested by his employer to undertake a journey to America. The mission about to be entrusted to him was important and confidential. The period of his stay was uncertain; but, on the other hand, the pecuniary advantages it held out were considerable; and it was even hinted that a partnership might prove the result of a satisfactory arrangement of the business.

When George communicated to his mother the offer he had received, she at once advised him to accept it, adding, that the loss of his society would be more than compensated for by her conviction that both his bodily and mental health would be benefited by the change. With cheerful alacrity did this judicious parent superintend the necessary preparations for his departure, wisely avoiding all unnecessary and sentimental regrets; and whilst both mother and son refrained from explanations respecting the principal reason which reconciled them to the separation, they fully understood and appreciated the generosity and delicacy of each other.

We hope our readers will not condemn George if we confess that he actually sailed for New York without making a single effort to communicate with the object of his affections; and Anna—but we forbear investigating minutely the state of the lady's feelings; it will suffice to say, that, allowing for the due proportion of the self-inflicted torments to which lovers are liable, she believed that she discerned the true state of the case, and, strong in faith, she hoped for the best.

We will pass over the eighteen months spent by Mr. Belmont in the United States, and introduce him again to our readers at the end of that time, greatly improved both in manner and circumstances. Extensive intercourse with the world, joined to the information he had gained in his travels, had done much to correct the too retiring and almost bashful demeanour of the clerk, whose sedentary and retired habits had kept him ignorant of the forms of polished society. Having skilfully transacted the business on which he was sent, he had received as the reward of his exertions a small share in the lucrative concern to whose interest he had unremittingly devoted himself for the last ten years; and though but a month had elapsed since his arrival in England, he had had ample time to prove the truth of the proverb—"Men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself."

—"A month! can it be only a month since my son's return home?" thought Mrs. Belmont, as she sat awaiting the return of the young people from an evening party given by George's late employer, for the express purpose of introducing Mr. Belmont to a select circle of his friends: "and yet how many events seem crowded into that short space. My dear George a servant no longer, but a partner in the most extensive concern in C——; his long-hoarded and hardly-earned savings increased to an amount sufficient to enable him to call together the creditors of his father, and satisfy all their just demands; and my daughter—my modest, affectionate Emily—enabled, by his means, to mix on terms of equality with the society she is fitted to adorn. 'Surely, goodness and mercy have followed me,' and my 'mourning is turned into rejoicing.'"

As these and similar reflections passed through the mind of the mother, her heart swelled with emotions of gratitude to Him who has styled himself the God of the fatherless and widow. She was aroused by carriage-wheels, and in a few minutes was joined by her children.

"Oh, mamma!" exclaimed Emily, as she warmly embraced her, "you should have been with us this evening to witness your son's triumph. I assure you Mr. Belmont has created quite a sensation, and been the lion of the party."

"Nay, you do injustice to the successful debut of Miss Belmont," observed her brother, gayly; "what think you, mother, of our little demure governess setting up for a belle?"

"But, seriously," pursued the young lady, "it has been highly amusing to witness the polite attentions we have both received from persons who lately would have treated us as inferiors. Mr. Burton, especially, was extremely cordial, and so pointed in his behaviour to George, that Anna was evidently distressed by it, and I thought her unusually reserved. If I am not mistaken, he gave you a pressing invitation to his house, Mr. Belmont?"

"Yes," replied George, "I am happy to say he did. And now, mother, if you are not too tired and sleepy, I should be glad to ask your advice on a subject of great importance to me."

"I understand you, my dear son, and my advice is—marry. Hitherto your position and circumstances have prescribed silence as your wisest and most honourable course. Now, your altered situation and excellent prospects, leave you at liberty to urge your suit. I hope and believe you possess the esteem of our dear Anna. You have my cordial approbation and blessing."

"Thank you; this is only what I expected of you, dear mother; but I feel far from sanguine as to my success. I think—that is, I hope—Anna and I understand each other; but, notwithstanding Mr. Burton's apparent cordiality, I apprehend some difficulty respecting the disposal I am about to make of my ready money. You know I cannot marry without funds, and I fear he will neither make me any advance nor sanction the necessary delay. In that case, what I am to do is the question?"

"Would it not be advisable to wait until you have met the creditors, and settled the business?" suggested Mrs. Belmont.

"Dear mother, no. I cannot consent to keep Anna longer in suspense. I am no stoic, and my experience this night has convinced me that it would be unjust to her to postpone my declaration. No, no—I will seal my fate to-morrow; and if Mr. Burton raises objections, Anna will at all events know that I am not to blame."

Having made this magnanimous resolve, George went to bed, but not to sleep. Excited by his recent interview with Miss Burton, whose unaffected delicacy and womanly reserve had charmed and touched him, and agitated by doubts and fears as to the result of his interview with her father, he lay ruminating upon his prospects; and when at last he fell into an uneasy slumber, his dreams were but a continuation of his waking reveries.

With a beating heart did our hero knock at the door of Mr. Burton's house on the following morning, and request a private audience of that gentleman. On being ushered into the library, George at once explained the object of his visit with the eloquence which true feeling never fails to inspire, urging his long-cherished affection, and touching slightly upon the pain and anxiety he had endured whilst following the course he deemed honourable with his sense of the relative positions of Miss Burton and himself. So far all seemed prosperous.—Nothing could exceed the urbanity of Mr. Burton, who warmly commended the line of conduct pursued by his young friend, and expressed himself much obliged by it; but when George proceeded to state briefly and simply the obligations which devolved upon him, previous to his settlement in life, he was listened to with constrained politeness. In vain did he pause in his relation for an expression of sympathy or look of approbation. A silent bow was the only token vouchsafed by his auditor. Embarrassed, he scarcely knew why, George found himself at the end of his story, with a consciousness that he had utterly failed in making the impression he had desired. After a pause of a few moments, during which Mr. Burton appeared waiting in expectation of some farther communication, he said—

"You are not so young a man, Mr. Belmont, nor so ignorant of the world, as to entertain any romantic notions respecting love in a cottage, I presume; I am therefore at a loss to understand your precise motive in honouring me with this explanation."

With increased confusion George replied that he had hoped for Mr. Burton's advice, (he had well nigh said assistance) He considered it his duty thus explicitly to state his circumstances previous to making any attempt to ascertain the sentiments of Miss Burton towards himself, a point on which he felt naturally most solicitous; and his prospects being now good, he trusted a little delay would not prove a serious objection.

"Certainly not," was Mr. Burton's reply, "but since you have expressed a wish for my advice, you must allow me to say, that I think the intention you entertain relative to your father's affairs, though it does great credit to your filial feelings, is rather singular, and the obligation more imaginary than real. It is well known that your father's misfortunes were the result of untoward circumstances, and not of any misconduct on his part. He acted throughout in an upright manner, and no blame can possibly attach to his memory. It appears to me unnecessary that you should inconvenience yourself for the sake of doing what neither law nor equity requires of you."

"I will not attempt to argue the point with you, sir," George modestly answered; "but I must remind you, that I am bound by a voluntary and solemn promise, given at a time when such engagements are deemed most sacred."

"Well, well," rejoined Mr. Burton, "there is no need of hurry. Let me recommend you to take time to reconsider the matter. Do nothing in haste, my young man. A few years cannot affect the spirit of the promise. Allow me to recall your words, 'I hope a little delay will not prove a serious objection.'"

Here Mr. Burton indulged in a patronizing laugh; then, rising, he added—

"In the meantime, I shall be happy to introduce you to Miss Burton, with whom you can talk over this weighty affair. The influence of the ladies is, we know, most powerful; and should you decide to make use of the cash for a time, I shall raise no obstacle to your wishes, and regret that my affairs will not admit of my doing more at present."

The mortification and disappointment George had experienced during this conversation, were amply atoned for by the cordiality with which Anna sympathized in his views, and strengthened his purposes. Had her father commended his intentions, and offered to find him means of marrying without delay, he could not have had a lighter heart, or more buoyant spirits, than were the results of his explanation with the daughter, in whose affection and constancy he felt unbounded reliance. True, their union must be postponed, and that to an indefinite period; but they should commence life free and unshackled, indebted to their mutual prudence and self-denial for that independence which they can only appreciate who have known the misery arising from a load of debt.

About a week after George's interview with Mr. Burton, that gentleman, whilst seated at breakfast, glancing over the county newspaper, observed, to his no small surprise, an advertisement addressed to the creditors of the late Mr. Belmont, appointing an early day for the examination and discharge of their respective claims. With a mixture of sarcasm and vexation, he commenced upon what he styled the quixotic folly of the cool and unimpassioned lover he congratulated his daughter on possessing. To his remarks Anna listened in silence, but the expression of her fine countenance, and her whole demeanor, evinced such perfect contentment, such calm and settled happiness, that the man of the world was abashed, as the conviction flashed across his mind that his child enjoyed a felicity superior in kind, and more lasting in devotion, than ever could result from the realization of the most brilliant schemes of a merely selfish nature. There are moments when the most wordly characters are compelled to believe in the existence of disinterested value; and it is seldom such belief reaches the understanding through the medium of the affections, without exercising a beneficial and softening influence. Certain it is, that from this time, Mr. Barton refrained from any allusions to George's folly; and though he stood aloof from rendering active service to the lovers, he offered no obstacle to Mr. Belmont's visits as his daughter's affianced husband.

A little more than a year elapsed after Mr. Belmont's return from America, before he found himself able to offer a home to his beloved Anna. It would doubtless have required a much longer time, had not her wishes and views been moderate as his own.—Who can describe his happiness as he sat by the clear, bright fire on his own hearth, his wife by his side, fully alive to the sweet influences of home and domestic enjoyment, heightened by the consciousness that to his own persevering exertions he was indebted for his present position and prospects?

The young people had been married only a month, and had that day returned from their wedding tour. The friends assembled to welcome them were departed. The skill and good taste of Emily, who had during their absence arranged their little establishment, had been warmly commended by the bride, who was by no means insensible to the importance of being mistress of a house she could call her own. It was Saturday evening. The morrow must usher them into the little world of which henceforward they should form a part; and there are few young couples, with affections as true and strong as theirs, but regret the termination of the marriage excursion. To mix in general society, give and receive the visits of mere acquaintances, and engage in the every-day business of life, appears, under such circumstances, no inconsiderable sacrifice. So thought our bride and bridegroom, who discussed their future plans, and indulged in past reminiscences on this evening, with as much seriousness as if they apprehended it was the last they should spend alone.

"And now, Anna," inquired George, "tell me candidly, do you not regret advising me to reject the offered loan of my partner, that we might have commenced life with a little more style?"

"No, indeed, I do not."

"But, dearest, only consider the remarks your genteel acquaintances will make on the very plain and unpretending furniture, and the smallness of the house."

"Fortunately I shall not hear their remarks," returned she, laughing; "and if I did, I could assure them that I have more pleasure in knowing that what we possess is truly our own, than all the borrowed style in the world could afford me."

"To say nothing of the pleasure your generous heart experiences in the sacrifice you made for my mother," added her husband, with tenderness.

"Oh, George, let that subject never more be mentioned between us. You humble and mortify me by such allusions. I must indeed be selfish to hesitate between the comfort of our dear parent and a silver tea-service, which after all would have been rather out of place here."

"Yet your father gave you money for that express purpose, and how can you account to him for its non-appearance?"

"Oh, as to that, I shall preserve a discreet silence. I hardly expect he will inquire into the history of my magnificent dowry."

"If he should, I will provide you with an answer," said George, rising and unlocking a small closet placed in a recess, and displaying to the astonished gaze of his bride a handsome collection of plate, consisting of tea and coffee equipage, silver cake basket, and candlestick.

"My dear George, how came you by these expensive articles?" she inquired.

Her husband placed a letter in her hand, and, gently drawing her to the sofa, sat by her side as she read it. It was from the creditors of the late Mr. Belmont, and was dated two months previous to the time of George's marriage. Its purport was to inform him that, wishful to offer him a testimonial of their esteem, they had made a selection of plate, which they trusted would prove acceptable in the interesting circumstances in which they understood him to be placed. To this announcement was subjoined a list of the articles. Various were the emotions of the young wife as she read. Feelings of gratified affection, however, predominated; and, finding no words to express them, a few unbidden tears fell on the letter as she refolded it. Her fond husband kissed them away.

"You do not inquire why I kept this affair a secret," he remarked.

"I suppose you wished to give me an agreeable surprise?" she replied.

"I did at first; but when your father presented you with money to purchase plate, and you insisted upon applying it to your mother's use, I loved you so dearly for your self-denial, that I almost feared to break the charm by telling you of our riches; so I put it off, that I might the longer admire my wife's superiority to the foibles of her sex."

"Your wife thanks you; but you overrate my philosophy if you imagine that I shall not feel pride and pleasure in the possession of this delicate and well-timed present."

"Then you will not think it out of place even in our small house, eh, Anna?"

"No, truly; I can think nothing out of place which serves to remind me that your noble and disinterested conduct has gained the esteem and approbation you so well merit."

"Rather, my dear wife, let this costly gift serve to inspire us with a thankful recollection of the past, that, in all our future struggles between inclination and duty, we may be enabled to exercise the self-control which at this moment so greatly augments our happiness."

With such views and principles, it is almost needless to add that the Belmonts continued a prosperous and happy family. In the course of time Emily married, with the approbation of her mother and brother. In the house of her daughter, Mrs. Belmont found a comfortable home, and lived many years, surrounded by her children's children, fully realizing the truth of the wise man's saying—"The just walketh in his integrity, his children are blessed after him."

MY COUSIN AND MYSELF.

AN EXCELLENT STORY,

WITH A VERY USEFUL LESSON.

BY HENRY R. NAGEL.

Eighty years!—Yes, four score long years I have moved upon the earth, and yet it seems to me as if my days had been but short! For two score years have I watched the sun rising and setting, hoping that each successive one, as it passed by, might be the last I should behold; and in anxious waiting of my end, my hair has grown gray, and my limbs become warped and bent by Time—and yet it comes not! Aye! Death that vanquishes the strong, and makes the heart quake before his presence, has no terrors for me! I have courted him—have marked him as he has passed me by, again and again, and stricken down the young and lovely from my side—until he has wrenched my household from me, and left me quivering and alone—the last of my race—without an arm to support my tottering steps, or a heart to feel for my adversities! And yet, he will not take me, too—though I have prayed him to end my miseries, but in vain. And I stalk through the world, a cypher in the sum of its concerns—a prey to all the horrors of a guilty conscience, which burns within my bosom like a consuming fire,—binding my spirit in the atmosphere of the tomb! Thus must I endure in life, a horrid death!

Julia Vincent and myself were cousins. We had been born on neighboring estates, and passed the whole period of our childhood in each other's company. That period,—the honey-moon of life—when the mind is innocent and unbiased—before the world has stamped its unholy impress upon the heart. I look back, through a long vista of time, and can find no epoch in history that is bright, save that; all else is dark—dark!

I said we passed our childhood together. We went to the village school, studied and played together. I baited the tiny hook that she might fish; I ran with her in the fields to cull the flowers, or in the woods to gather berries, or fright the squirrel and wild bird with our gay hallоо.

Julia was formed for love. She was giddy and thoughtless, but ardent in her feelings, and when her affections were enlisted in an object, her heart went with it. To know her was to love her. I was somewhat wayward myself, but I could not witness her beauty developing itself, and be exposed to the battery of her charms, without feeling a decided affection ripening within me, that soon became a moving principle, and awakened a jealousy when it appeared fearful of being misplaced.

I was about twenty years of age, when the Revolutionary War broke out between the two counties. Our neighborhood became infested with the British skirmishers, who ravaged our granaries, and sometimes quartered on us for weeks together.

Among these parties was one commanded by a young officer of about twenty-seven. He was very handsome, and his manners were winning and polite, but somewhat haughty; and he was so well pleased with our accommodations, as to make my uncle's house almost a permanent station. This created no concern on my part, until I found that it was not without an object, and that he was aiming all his charms at my handsome cousin. I was naturally of a hasty and uncontrollable temper, and my spirit aroused within me, at what I supposed an invasion of my privileges. But this was augmented to the highest pitch when I found, that although shy at first, she soon received his advances with familiarity, and I found he had acquired the position which I had, or fancied I had held in her affections.

I met him alone in the room, one morning, and said to him, rather caustically,

"It strikes me, Lieutenant Sandford, that there must be a treasure somewhere near, that my uncle's house has need to be converted into a barrack."

He evidently saw my intention to foster a quarrel. But he curled his lip, and uttering the word "insolent," turned on his heel, and walked away.

I clenched my fist, and stepped after him, intending to knock him down, in the fullness of my anger, when the door opened and Julia entered the room, when taking his arm and bowing to me, they left me alone.

"She is unworthy my love," thought I, as I went home; "like a child that is fond of gay colors, she has been taken with this dastard's red feather, and gilt epaulettes. But go on, sir Britisher—some evil spirit may yet throw you in my path, and I promise that you will rue this day."

Day after day he lingered there, while I, completely shut out from favor by his presence, spent my time in hunting and riding.

I was returning one evening from an unsuccessful hunt, weary and hungry, which in no degree tended to sweeten my temper, when turning an angle in the road, I saw Sandford and Miss Vincent, accompanied by two dragoons, returning from a ride, at some distance ahead. The road ran through a thick wood, and at a short space was a deep and dangerous ravine. I turned aside, and pursuing my way along its brink, came in advance of them, and taking a position where I could not be seen, waited for their coming. I saw them chatting and laughing together, as they passed along. So as soon as they had got opposite, I took aim, coolly, at the epaulettes, and fired. He reeled, and in a moment fell heavily to the earth. Julia shrieked, and suddenly threw herself from the saddle and rushed to his side. The steeds, left to themselves, speeded along the road toward home.

The dragoons appeared to be almost stunned at the occurrence, but immediately one gave chase in the direction of my post, while the other remained with the sufferer. I turned my horse, and fled along the hill, thinking to get off undiscovered, but the other was well mounted, and soon came within hail. Finding flight useless, I clubbed my gun, and turned on him. He evaded my stroke, but wounded me in the arm slightly. Again I struck at him, but he was too quick, and escaped, but returned it by giving me a slash across the head, which cleft my hat to the brim, and slightly scarred my head. I ground my teeth, and wheeling suddenly, bounded my steed upon him and bore him over the edge of the ravine. He tried to recover himself, but the loose earth gave way, and with a plunge, horse and rider went headlong to the bottom. I heard the death-groan he made as his body bounded from the rocks, but heeding it not, sped for home. On arriving there, I put up my horse;—finding my wounds were of no account, I went over to my uncle's house, to defeat suspicion.

On opening the parlor door, I was astounded to see Sanford, whom I supposed lying dead on the highway, sitting on the sofa, with Julia reclining in his arms—her head affectionately resting on his shoulder. My fire, I ascertained, had merely scratched him. I uttered a curse upon them both, and slamming the door, walked off.

My happiness was destroyed, and I gave way to fits of despondency, in one of which, perfectly careless of what might be my future destiny, I galloped to the American camp, and entered the service, with a Lieutenant's commission. But a few days had elapsed before we had a considerable engagement. I went into it with the ferocity of a bull-dog, looking hither and thither for my enemy; but I found him not. I wished to wreak my pent-up anger on his head, on equal terms. Squadron after squadron were levelled in the dust; and when the roar of the artillery had died away, and the smoke had rolled off, the ground was spread with bleeding bodies, and "groan on groan salute our willing ears." Still they returned to the charge—and when the sun set in the west, unwilling to give up the contest, we encamped on the ground, within sight of each other, to renew the battle on the morrow. Guards were placed, camp fires lighted, and soon all was quiet.

It was about twelve o'clock. I had tossed on my bed for hours, but could not sleep. Whenever my eyes would close in a gentle slumber, the form of Lieutenant Sandford would stare at me, with that bitter lip curling in my face. I rose and walked out in the open air. I said it was midnight. The night was one of great splendor. The moon was at her height, and she sat, unclouded, amid a constellation of stars, throwing a flood of light on the battle-field, giving it an unearthly brightness. As far as the eye could take in the view, the ground was unbroken by a single hill, while at the extremities of the line of vision were spread the snow-white tents of the belligerents. The space between was covered with bodies of the dead and dying; and ever and anon the death-groan of some poor wretch would come faintly on the ear. All else, save the heavy breathing of the multitude of sleepers, and the measured tread of the sentinels on their weary rounds, was still as death.

I became so intent upon my own thoughts, that I saw not where my path was leading me. Striking my foot against a substance which nearly threw me down, I looked and started back. It was the body of a pious young officer, who had belonged to my own company. He lay upon his back, with the moon shining full upon his blanched features, while the blood oozed from a wound in his breast. His eyes were wide open, staring upwards at the sky, the sightless balls protruding from their sockets. It seemed as though they were trying to pierce the vast chaos of space, and trace the passage of his spirit in it as it took its flight above. I shuddered—and turning into the thick wood that flanked the ground, strolled leisurely along a bridle-path that led through it.

I know not how far, or how long I had walked, when I heard the sound of hoofs coming in the opposite direction. Stepping in the shadow of a large tree, I waited in silence. As the horseman drew near, he raised his head, and I saw that it was Sandford—no doubt on his return from a visit to Julia Vincent.

"Now," thought I, "thy evil genius has served me a good turn at last."

He came up swiftly, but, ere he had passed, one hand grasped his bridle, and another his throat.—With a curse, I wrenched him from the saddle, and flung him to the earth. He seized me, and struggled manfully to regain his feet—but I possessed the advantage, and in a moment pinned him to the ground. Placing my knee upon him, I drew his sword (being without my own) from the sheath. He begged me not to murder him in cold blood—to give him a chance at least, for his life, on equal terms. But such was not my purpose. I scowled at him, and, smiling coldly, passed the weapon into his body. He shrieked and struggled; but I withdrew it, and stabbed him again and again. Then rising, stood over him, with my arms folded, and watched his expiring efforts, until his jaw dropped, and his limbs stiffened. And then I left him—a prey to the elements and the carrion-bird.

Although considerable excitement was caused, by the murder of Sandford, in the camp, suspicion never glanced at me; and I thought the deed buried in oblivion. But, ah! it stood out in my heart, bright and glaring, and like the canker-worm has been gnawing at my vitals ever since.

I thought, now, that no obstacle existed between myself and my cousin, and hoped ere long to regain my former influence. But the horrid death of her lover had turned back her life-blood in its channels, and already the color had left her countenance, her form had lost its elasticity and buoyancy, and "Consumption, like a worm i' the bud,

Fed on her damask cheek."

She regarded me ever after with a jaundiced eye, as though a perceptible odor of the black deed hung around me. The very measures which I took to gain my end defeated it, and rendered my life miserable. I saw her droop, day by day, like a blasted flower—one whom too rude a breath had withered in the heyday of her life, and she sank quietly into the tomb With her was buried all my peace for ever.

I have travelled by sea and land—have visited foreign countries, and plunged into scenes of excitement and gaiety—to flee from my own memory. But it would come back, and bring before my eyes, with increased vividness, all my evil deeds. I sought to drown it in the intoxicating draught; but when I lifted the cup to my lips, I saw in its red depths the form of Sandford. They may talk of future torment, and even embitter the life by anticipation; but there is no punishment so great as a guilty conscience, and the searings of remorse, which is ever killing, but never kills.

NANCY NEWELL

AND THE FORTUNE TELLER.

"O, where is a happier maiden than I,
As gaily my light wheel I turn all the day;
Let the high dames of fashion go mincingly by,
And look from the cottager proudly away.

"I care not, a cottager still would I be,
With no thought roaming wide from my woodbine-wreathed door,
Like a land-bird afar o'er the desolate sea,
Wing-weary, yet seeking in vain for the shore."

Thus sang Nancy Newell, gaily, to the music of her spinning-wheel, the lightest hearted maiden in the village of Maybank. No idle longings for a condition above that which she filled with cheerfulness, had ever disturbed her quiet bosom for a moment.—Maybank was her little world, and there she expected to live and die. We will not say that no fond dream of a lover's smile, of a pleasant cottage with one dear one, blessing and blessed, had ever lingered in her fancy. Doubtless such thoughts often stirred the pure waters of affection that lay calm and deep in her woman's heart. But they took nothing from the happiness, but rather quickened her bounding pulses, and made her feel that she had, indeed, something for which to live.

"A blessing on your sweet face, Nancy!" said a harsh voice, breaking in upon the maiden's song.

Nancy turned quickly, and recognized at a glance, an old crone, who wandered about from village to village, telling fortunes.

"Ah, is that you, Mag?" she said, pausing in her work, and offering her hand to the old woman, who had frequently urged her, on previous occasions, to have her fortune told, but never could succeed in her efforts to read the maiden's fate in her hand, as she always made a laughing, but effectual resistance.—This time, Mag, as she was called every where, by old and young, retained her hold upon Nancy's hand, and turning up the palm, said—

"Come, Nancy, I must read your fortune for you."

"It's no use, Mag. All you can say won't alter what's to come."

"But I can tell you what is to come, and of course you have an interest in knowing whose wife you are to be, if nothing else. Ha! ha!" laughed the old crone, seeing the color mounting to the maiden's cheeks—"I knew you wished to know that, for all your trifling. Bless me! What is this?" she added in a serious tone, her countenance instantly assuming an expression of solemn importance, as something in the palm of Nancy's hand arrested her attention.—From that moment, the maiden's hand lay passively within hers.

"I never saw that mark in but one hand before," continued Mag. "And that hand was claimed by the richest and handsomest man in the whole county. It's an unfailing sign of high connections in marriage. I thought the first time I looked into your face, that you would not long stand beside the spinning wheel. Let me see—a rich marriage—young, handsome—four children—ah! what is this? Trouble at last—but here is a good omen again. Yours will be a long and happy way, Nancy, with but few dark days, and they quickly succeeded by skies without a cloud."

"All nonsense, Mag," replied Nancy, affecting to laugh, but her laugh was not so gay and careless as before.

"So you all pretend to say," replied the crone, "but I never yet told a fortune that didn't come true. Didn't I tell Ellen White that there would be a death in her father's house before three months? And where now is she? Cold in the church-yard! And didn't I tell Mary Hope that she would receive bad news in a week? Don't you remember that? And how they got a letter saying that her brother had died in the South before the week was out? I never tell wrong Nancy. I know my art too well. Here let me look at your hand again. Ah! There is something I overlooked. A rich husband. Yes—that is true. But there will be trouble before that. A lover will be turned away, and it will cost some tears. But it must be done; and the wound will soon heal. Good bye, Nancy! I only had a minute to spare. Good bye, dear! I'll call to see you when you become a great lady. Good bye!"

And so saying, Mag turned away and left Nancy with but little inclination to resume her song or her humming wheel.

About ten minutes after, old Mag glided into the cottage of Mrs. Brown, where she found her daughter Mary Brown, alone.

"Did she let you tell her fortune, Mag?" asked Mary, with a look and tone of interest.

"O yes," was the reply.

"What was it?"

"She is to marry rich. But first, a lover will be turned off. That is Harry Glenn."

"But will she turn him off, Mag?" Mary asked, looking the old fortune teller steadily in the face.

"Certainly she will. But even if she don't, he'll not marry her, for havn't I told you that you are to be the wife of Harry Glenn. That is your fortune. I can read it in your hand as plain as if it were written there in words."

The old woman spoke in a positive tone, and the effect of her words was to make the eye of Mary Brown sparkle, and her cheek glow.

After the departure of the fortune teller, Nancy Newell stood musing for some time, her heart fluttering with the involuntary belief that she was to be a rich lady; at the same time that a feeling of sadness came over her at the idea of giving up Harry Glenn whom she really loved, but who had not yet ventured to speak to her of the kindred emotion that warmed his own bosom. At length she resumed her work, but the wheel did not perform its revolutions with accustomed velocity, nor was her voice once heard rising clearly and gaily above its monotonous hum, during the whole day. Her thoughts were not there; and her mother's quiet cottage seemed no longer a pleasant spot, where, with a happy heart, she could spend her days.

Evening at length came, and soon after tea, Henry Glenn, now almost a daily visitor, dropped in to spend an hour with the maiden. She could not receive him with her wonted frankness and cordiality: nor could she take any interest as before, in the subjects of conversation, introduced by the young man. Harry felt, instantly, that there was a change, and it pained him very much—for it indicated either that something had occurred to give her trouble, or that she did not feel his presence to be welcome. After vainly endeavoring to draw her into cheerful conversation, he went away at an early hour, feeling oppressed and wounded.

As for Nancy, she was far more unhappy than her humble lover, towards whom, in despite of all her efforts to restrain them, her affections would go out.—She was conscious, too, of wrong, in thus casting off a young man whom she really loved, and who was worthy of her love, upon the faith of a fortune teller's assertion that she was to marry rich, and be a great lady. But Mag understood human nature, and knew how to play successfully upon the heart of a maiden like Nancy Newell. She had her own reasons, too, for what she was doing.

During all the succeeding day Nancy felt agitated, and passed nearly the whole time in a dreamy state of mind. Her thoughts roamed far beyond the quiet hamlet where she had so long dwelt in peace, nor felt a hope that was not limited to its precincts; while her fancy pictured the form, face and bearing of the noble unknown who was to seek her out, and bear her off in triumph to grace his splendid halls.—When night came, she was less prepared than on the evening before, to receive Harry Glenn with affectionate courtesy. Her manner towards him was not only cold, but it seemed to him a little haughty. This he could not bear. During the preceding visit, his affection for her had been wounded—now his pride was touched. On the third evening, instead of calling, as usual, at the cottage of Mrs. Newell, he dropped in to see Mary Brown, and found her more agreeable than he had ever before thought her.

The absence of Harry on the third evening, when Nancy's truant imagination had begun to feel some inclination to return, troubled her a good deal, and she blamed herself for having paid any attention to old Mag's silly predictions. The next evening and the next, saw her still unvisited by her lover, who had found Mary Brown so much more agreeable than she had ever before seemed, that his thoughts turned towards her involuntarily, as soon as the evening twilight began to fall.

But the old love was not to be put off so easily by either the man or maiden. Towards the end of the week, each began to feel a yearning desire to meet again. The new charms of Mary Brown began to pall with Harry, and the rich anticipated lover to fall in his influence upon Nancy's sobered imagination.

Since Tuesday evening, they had not seen each other until their eyes met at church on the next Sunday. Precious little of the sermon could either of them remember, when the minister closed his Bible, and proceeded to give out the last hymn. As they came out of church, Harry found himself, he hardly knew how, by the side of Nancy, whose smile never seemed so sweet, nor her voice so musical to him before Mary Brown had to walk home alone and disappointed. That evening saw Harry and his old sweetheart, sitting for more than two hours alone, he just ready to put the question, and she momently in expectation of receiving an offer, which her cooler judgment, as well as her affections, prompted her to accept, if made. But Harry's heart fluttered so, whenever he attempted to form the required words in his mind, especially as thoughts of the unexplained coolness came up to haunt him with doubts and fears, that he could not speak out the proposition he was ready to make. At last he went away as he had come, still only the lover of Nancy.

During the week, his visits were continued with their former regularity; but there was something in the manner of Nancy that repelled him whenever he thought of a proposal. Mag had been to see her again, and had awakened anew in her imagination thoughts of a higher condition than that of a mere farmer's wife.

On the next Sunday a stranger appeared unexpectedly in the little village church. No one knew who he was, or from whence he came. But all admitted that he was young and handsome, and one whose sphere of life was far above that of the humble tillers of the soil who made up the largest portion of those who people the village of Maybank. Every maiden's eye was upon him, much to the grief of the good minister, who was pained to perceive that even in that place, sacred to solemn worship, the heart was too prone to wander away in search of strange gods.

As for Nancy, when she first saw the young stranger enter, and move slowly and with a dignified step up the aisle, the blood mounted to her cheek, and her heart beat so rapidly that she felt like suffocating.—In despite of all she could do, her eye would wander towards him, and more than once fell beneath his steady gaze, that was several times turned towards her during the services of the morning. Harry was by her side as she emerged from the church, and walked with her home, but she made but brief answers to all his remarks. When he left her at her mother's door, he turned away pained at the maiden's coldness and strange reserve. He did not visit her that evening, nor during the ensuing week. But the stranger had been there. He had dropped in professedly to make some trifling inquiries, and finding Nancy alone, had remained and chatted with her for half an hour. During that brief period, her heart was completely won.

Slowly did the lingering moments pass away, until the next Sabbath arrived, and Nancy repaired to church, her heart fluttering in hope of again seeing the stranger who had occupied all her thoughts since the morning her eyes first rested upon him. He was there already, and gently smiled and bowed to her as she came in. During the services, whenever she looked at him, she found him regarding her so intently that the blushes rose to her cheeks as she dropped her eyes each time to the floor. When the congregation were dismissed, the stranger was by her side as she stepped from the door, and accompanied her, the envy of every other maiden, to her home.

"Who is that young man, Nancy?" asked Mrs. Newell, in a grave tone, as Nancy came into the house, after remaining to chat with her companion for a few moments.

"I am sure I do not know, mother."

"Then why did he take the liberty of walking home with you?"

"I cannot tell that, either," the maiden replied.

"Well, I do not like his looks, nor the freedom he has taken," Mrs. Newell said.

Nancy made no reply to this, but went into the next room and took off her things, and then avoided all conversation that would lead her mother to speak of the stranger.

That evening he came in, gracefully apologizing to the mother for the freedom he had taken;—but, being a stranger in the village, he had felt the time hanging heavily on his hands, and had, therefore, been driven to seek for company somewhere. The blandness of his tones, the elegance of his manners, and the smoothness of his speech, softened Mrs. Newell very much, especially as he paid her particular attentions, and introduced subjects of conversation that were peculiarly interesting to her. When he went away, she found herself highly prepossessed in his favor. Twice during the week did he repeat his visit. On the last evening spent with the mother and daughter, he alluded to the hollow-heartedness of the great world of wealth and fashion, in which he had mingled, and how he had stolen away from it in the hope of finding truth and nature somewhere in quieter places. He said that he had, in passing through Maybank, contemplated remaining only a day or two; but that something congenial to his feelings in the place had caused him to linger, and he still felt disinclined to go. As he made this remark, he looked at Nancy steadily for a moment or two. She felt that in that look was contained a meaning, and her heart gave to it its own interpretation.

Her mind was now made up to treat Harry Glenn so coldly as to repulse him at once. Mag's prediction had evidently been a true one. The place she was destined to fill, was one to which he could never elevate her.

On the next Sunday, the stranger called for Nancy, walked with her to church, sat beside her during service, and accompanied her home. All this, of course, did not escape the eye of Harry, towards whom Nancy did not once deign to look. He revenged himself by transferring his attentions to Mary Brown, and making her an offer of marriage before the week was out.

Ellmore, that was the stranger's name, now became a daily visitor at the house of Mrs. Newell. He would come in, and sit with Nancy, as she turned her wheel, for hours, talking to her of the gay scenes of a city life, and filling her young fancy with an ardent desire to mingle in them. At length, he seriously proposed a marriage—stating that he lived in New York, and was heir to almost unbounded wealth.—The mother neither consented nor refused. He was but a stranger, she frankly told him, and as a mother she was bound to withhold her consent until she had undoubted proof that his statements were correct. To this he assented, as right, and said, that in a short time he would produce evidence that would remove all doubts from her mind.

About four weeks from the time Ellmore came to Maybank, he left the little hotel at which he had been staying, immediately after tea, and proceeded at a fast walk in a direction leading away from the village. It was dark when he arrived at a little open space in the road, about a mile away, where he paused, and listened as if in expectation of meeting some one in that secluded spot. He had stood thus only for a few moments, when some one emerged from the deep shadow of a tree and came forward.

"Ah, Mag, is that you?" he said quickly.

"Of course, did I ever fail in an engagement?" replied Mag, for she it was, sure enough.

"True as steel!" ejaculated Ellmore. "Well, I've got the girl safe. She's mine now, and no power can save her."

"Good! I thought I had the way well paved for you, but didn't think you could bring down the prize so quickly."

"I'm hard to beat, you know, Mag. No girl ever yet was too much for me, when I laid myself fairly out for her. But this Nancy is a lovely one though, isn't she? Won't she create a sensation when I get her in New York?"

"No doubt of that. She is the flower of Maybank. But I've had a standing spite against her for her mother's sake, who has always treated me as if I were a Heathen."

"I wish you'd get up a standing spite against some half a dozen more just like her."

"Perhaps I may. But when do you think of leaving here?"

"To-morrow, if I can. Nancy is engaged to ride over to Maysville with me. As soon as I get her fairly out of Maybank I shall dash off in another direction at railroad speed."

"But won't she refuse to go with you?"

"She? No! I've got her too tightly bound to me."

"Well, you are a rare one, Tom!" ejaculated the old hag, with a malignant, chuckling laugh. "A match for the very old boy himself."

"So I consider myself; though I'm of the opinion, sometimes, that he'll pay me up for it at last. But no matter. Let him first catch me."

"You are to pay me twenty dollars," was Mag's next remark, in a business tone.

"Yes, and here is the amount; good service always finds punctual pay. But where next are we to operate, Mag?"

"Meet me in three weeks at the cross roads, two miles from Landreth, and I'll put you on another track."

"And the prize. Is that worth pursuing?"

"You will think so, when your eyes rest upon it. But you'll have to be swift-footed if you win it."

"At what hour?"

"At twilight."

"I'll be there, dead or alive. But, good-bye, Mag. I must see Nancy to-night."

And then the two separated, Ellmore hurrying back to the village.

In a day or two a rumor became prevalent in Maybank that both the stranger and Nancy Newell had disappeared. Alas! it proved too true. They had started together for the little village of Maysville, as intimated by Ellmore in the conversation with Mag, but they never went there, nor could any one give the least information in regard to them.

Poor Mrs. Newell was deeply distressed; especially as she all at once recollected that Nancy had seemed very much changed in manner for several days before her disappearance. When Ellmore was not present, she had a drooping, troubled look, and once or twice she found her alone in her room, and in tears.

"Who was he?" and "what was he?" were questions now asked on all sides, by the very ones who had envied Nancy the preference which the stranger had shown towards her. Every one blamed Mrs. Newell for ever having allowed him to come into her house, and not a few pronounced it as an opinion which they had long entertained that Nancy was no better than she should be.

However, be that as it might, week after week, and month after month passed away, and no tidings came of Nancy Newell; notwithstanding every effort in the power of those most concerned, that could be made, was made to discover the place to which she had been taken.

It was months before Harry Glenn, who had really loved Nancy, could recover from the shock her sudden disappearance caused him, notwithstanding he had, in a pet, offered himself to Mary Brown, and been accepted by her. But gradually, as time wore away, and Mary grew more and more interesting to him, he ceased to think of Nancy, except with a feeling of pity.

Mag had not been seen in the village since Ellmore's entrance, nor once during the period he remained there; and it was nearly a month from the time of Nancy's disappearance before she visited Maybank, and then she seemed greatly surprised and grieved at the painful news, and the mystery still hanging over the weak and foolish girl.

It was a year within one or two months from the time Nancy left Maybank, that Mrs. Newell, upon whose head that period had pressed with the weight of a dozen years, was sitting, an hour after dark, alone in her humble abode, her head drooping upon her hand and her thoughts sad with pondering over the uncertain fate of her unhappy child. On that very evening, Harry Glenn was to be married to Mary Brown, who had filled the place in his affections which Nancy had forfeited. This event called up, with more painful vividness, the memory of her child, and caused her tears to flow afresh. She had been seated as mentioned for nearly an hour, when a slight noise caused her to look round. Was it a reality or a wild dream? Was it indeed Nancy who stood just within the door? or was it only a spectre of her child, come to mock her with a new mystery? It was, indeed, her long-lost and long-wept daughter. But, oh! how changed! Instead of the round blooming cheek, there was a pale, sunken face, its happy expression changed to one of shame and sorrow. Her soft blue eye had receded deeply into its socket, and now glanced restlessly about with a wildness that partook of insanity.

"Nancy!" exclaimed Mrs. Newell, rising quickly to her feet, and lifting her hands in astonishment—"Can this, indeed, be my long-lost child?"

"Oh, my mother! my mother!" was all the poor creature's reply, as she threw herself into her arms, and hid her face on her bosom. But she did not weep—for the fountain of tears seemed dry.

For more than a minute did Mrs. Newell hold her daughter to her heart; then disengaging herself from Nancy's clinging embrace, she said, as she almost forced her into a chair—

"Why, why did you ever leave me, my poor child?"

Nancy looked up into her mother's face, as she asked her this question, while her own was calm but painfully sad. It was some moments before she spoke—and then she said, mournfully,

"I was basely and wickedly deceived by heartless professions, and then forcibly carried away. But"—and she clenched both teeth and hands fiercely—"I have had my revenge at last! A just revenge for the deepest wrong a woman can suffer. With this hand," and she raised her arm with quick energy, and then plunged it down as if making a desperate stroke, "I stabbed the wretch to his heart!"

Horrified, Mrs. Newell retreated from her daughter, and seemed inclined to flee from the house, but turning as she came near the door, she saw her falling to the floor with a face of ashy paleness. Lifting her up, and placing her upon a bed, she found her lost to all consciousness of external things.

For hours she lay in this state, and only showed signs of renewing vigour, towards the morning. But, when consciousness returned, her mind was in a wandering state. On the day after her arrival, news came of a horrible murder committed in the streets of the metropolis. A man named Ellmore had been stabbed by some hand unknown, and thus far the assassin had eluded all pursuit, although the entire police of the city were on the alert.—When this account met the eye of Mrs. Newell, she had no doubt, from what Nancy had said, that her hand had been the one that held the fatal knife. And now came a trembling fear lest the minions of the law should find out the spot where she had sought a shelter and a home, and tear her away, to expiate her crime upon the scaffold, or in prison. After pondering long what course to pursue, she at length determined to conceal from every one the fact that Nancy had returned. This she was able to do for about two weeks, during which time her daughter remained as helpless in body, as she was imbecile in mind. At the end of this period, a neighbour in whom had centred a number of strange rumors floating through the village, determined to gratify her own and the general curiosity, if possible, and so she went over to Mrs. Newell's, and took her knitting with her, with the intention of spending the day. Before, however, the day was half gone, she had ascertained that Nancy was in the house. This was enough, and she soon after bustled off to give the news forth to the astonished village.

"Of course it was her that committed the murder," said one—"Horrible!"

"Horrible indeed! The man killed was named Ellmore, and that was the name of the fellow with whom she went off."

"Dreadful!" exclaimed another. "What a hardened creature she must have become!"

"No doubt she served him right," added another. "But she'll have to be given up to the law."

"Of course she will," broke in Mag, with a harsh, angry voice, coming up at the moment, and catching the last words of the speaker. She had not been seen in the village before for weeks. "Blood never hides itself. It cries for ever from the ground for vengeance!"

"That is true, Mag," remarked one of the little group into which she had so suddenly introduced herself; "murder will out."

"Yes, and murder must out—and it shall out!" responded the old hag, with a fierce, malignant scowl. "To stab a man to the heart, in the very streets of a great city! Horrible!"

As she said this, Mag turned away, and strode off with rapid steps.

During the three or four days that elapsed after the discovery of Nancy's return, many neighbors called at the cottage of Mrs. Newell, some to offer her their sympathy, some to get a sight of her daughter, and others to gratify both of these feelings combined. But all were treated with coldness and reserve, and none permitted to see Nancy, or even to draw from her mother an admission that she was in the house.

It was about the end of this period, near the hour of sunset, that Mrs. Newell sat beside the bed upon which Nancy had lain for two weeks, with a body almost helpless, and a mind still wandering. She had, after looking for a long time upon her thin pale face, as she lay with closed eyes, fallen into a state of dreamy, half unconsciousness. From this, a deep sigh aroused her, and looking up, she saw the eyes of her daughter fixed upon her with an intelligent expression.

"O, mother! how came I here?" she exclaimed, as Mrs. Newell's eyes met hers, endeavouring to raise herself up as she spoke.

Gently restraining her, Mrs. Newell, after she had become composed enough to speak, briefly related how she had so suddenly presented herself one night a few weeks before, and how she had been wandering in mind ever since. It was sometime before Nancy could collect her scattered senses. Then she said, with a look of anger,

"Mother, there is only one to blame for all this!"

"Who, Nancy?"

"Mag!"

"How is she to blame, my child?"

"She, with the cruelty of a fiend, has leagued herself with some of the vilest wretches of the city, whose business is to entice away the innocent, and make them as vile and wicked as themselves. She goes about through the country, making her way into every house, and by her pretended art of fortune-telling, filling the heads of foolish girls with vain thoughts, and then giving notice to her employers of such as may be enticed away. To me she came with the tale, read from my hand, that I was to be married to a stranger, young, rich and handsome. I tried not to believe the foolish story, but it made an impression upon me in spite of my better judgment, and when the fiend Ellmore suddenly appeared in our village, and chose me from among all the rest, my faith in her prediction became confirmed. I dreamed not of danger, while in an ecstacy of bewilderment and delight, I hung upon his ardent professions of love, and believed all his false statements, so perfectly agreeing with what Mag had foretold. Having bound me to him with a tie that I dared not break, he carried me, half forcibly and half willingly—for I would have gone anywhere with him, rather than have provoked his displeasure. To the city I was immediately taken, and there, after having been introduced into the society of those from whom I shrunk with horror, I was abandoned by Ellmore, and detained by force. I will not—I dare not relate all I have suffered of cruelty and outrage, during the long period I have remained away. It maddens me now while I think of it. But during all that period, one thought bore me up—one deeply seated resolution kept me from dying. That resolution was one of revenge. I learned fully while there, who and what Ellmore was, and who and what Mag the fortune-teller was. And I determined to be revenged on them both. One I have sent to his long account, and I hope yet to live to meet the other. When we do meet, we part not while she lives. I have sworn this!"

As Nancy uttered the last sentence, in a wild voice, she raised herself up, clenched her hand impotently, and dashed it forward into the air, while her face assumed a look of fiendish hate. Her attitude still remained fixed, and her countenance still retained its expression, when heavy footsteps in the next apartment aroused both the mother and daughter from the trance of passion and horror into which the one and the other had fallen. Both turned their eyes toward the door at the same moment. There stood Mag, with a look of savage pleasure on her face, her long thin finger pointing towards Nancy. Behind her were two stout men.

"There she is! That is the murderess!" exclaimed Mag.

The words were scarcely out of her mouth before Nancy sprung with a quick bound from the bed, and clutching the throat of the hag with superhuman strength, rolled upon the floor with her, and before it was possible to break her vice-like grip, the fortune-teller was dead. When the victim and her betrayer were at last separated, the former seemed as lifeless as the latter. She was placed again upon the bed, but no effort could restore her to animation. The spirit had taken its everlasting flight.

Nothing needs to be added to this painful story, in order to give force to its moral. That is too plain. Let no innocent heart suffer itself to be a moment thrown off of its guard. Evil approaches in a thousand forms, and presses for admission at every door of the mind. New modes of betraying the young, the good, and the beautiful, are invented every day, and new snares laid for their feet in each avenue. Let every one beware.

GEN. DE HEISTER.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

Stout General De Heister took passage one day,
With his thousands of Hessians in warlike array,
For the gold of Great Britain her battles to share,
And bring down the pride of her colonies fair;
So for Spithead they sailed, there a convoy to take,
Their trip o'er the ocean in safety to make;
And in May, '76, pointed westward their prow,
And boldly put forth, the Atlantic to plough.

But Neptune his tricks on the landsmen would play,
And their patience and fortitude vanished away;
They were rock'd in the trough, and were tossed on the wave,
'Till in misery melted the might of the brave;
And they envied the sailor, who healthful and free,
As fresh at his toil as a bird of the sea,
Still prompt at each order, his tackle would ply,
And spring to the shrouds, tho' the tempest was high.

Stout General De Heister detested the main,
And 'mur'd in his cabin, was heard to complain,
"I've been cheated, deceiv'd, without mercy or shame,
'Twas a short way, they said, when on ship-board we came;
Yet these three months we've rolled on this infamous brine,
While as pale as sick girls my tough veterans pine,
With nerves all unstrung, and with faces forlorn,
And worse than all this—my tobacco is gone.

"An old man I am, covered over with scars;
My back I ne'er turned in the fiercest of wars;
And how mean 'twould be, here, between water and sky,
By the foam of these pitiful billows to die;
I am sick of the sea, with its tumult and roar,
Nor have had one good meal since I sail'd from the shore;
Yes, I'm sick unto death, in the deep shall be thrown,
And the worst of it is, my tobacco is gone."

Soon, light o'er the surge, as a feather at play,
Danced a boat from the "Rainbow," one sunshiny day;
Not that bow which the cloud in its beauty doth span,
A token of Peace from our Maker to man,
But a frigate of England, that haughtily bore,
Sir George Collier, commander, with guns forty-four,
Who cheerily came, in his uniform gay,
To the famed Hessian chieftain a visit to pay.

De Heister was moody, and scarcely represt
The cloud of ill-humor that low'rd in his breast.
"Give us land, Sir George Collier, firm hold for our feet,
And the men of Hesse-Cassel will scorn to retreat.
What are cannon to them? they will face every foe;
But here, by this fiend of the Ocean laid low,
On the deck, like dried leaves, my best soldiers are strown."
Then he sigh'd to himself, "my tobacco is gone."

Sir George tried to cheer him, with eloquence brave,
He trusted they'd soon bid farewell to the wave,
With heroic Lord Howe, at New York to proceed,
In teaching the rebels the lessons they need;
So he begged he'd dismiss every sorrowful thought,
And deign to accept a few presents he'd brought;
Then he made his adieu, with a flourish polite,
Gave his oarsmen the word, and was soon out of sight.

What joy for De Heister! How brighten'd his eye,
'Mid these presents a store of tobacco to spy;
He danc'd, every thought was so happily stirred,
Drank the health of his Landgrave, and King George the Third,
Bade the band play a march, his sick soldiers addressed,
They must pluck up their spirits, 'twas all for the best,—
While they, quite aghast, listened still for the tone
They so often had heard, "My tobacco is gone."

And then, for his courage redoubtable glowed,
He said to himself, as the deck he bestrode,
"When the rebel banditti their arms shall throw down,
And be hanged for their want of respect to a crown,
There'll be plenty of land for us all, I am told,

And Great Britain, we know, has a plenty of gold,
So perhaps as a part of my wages and pelf,
I may take a tobacco plantation myself."

What a change! Who'd have thought that this man was the same,
With his whiskers brush'd up, and his face like a flame,
Who in durance so long to the treacherous main,
Had resisted his fate, like a bear in the chain,—
And forgetting at once, both the lucre and fame
For which from the land of his fathers he came,
Had filled every ear with an ill-smothered moan,
By day and by night, "My tobacco is gone."

The Ruined Gamester;

OR,

Two Eras in the Life of a Gambler.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE TAILOR'S APPRENTICE."

If yet thou love game at so dear a rate,
Learn this that hath old gamesters dearly cost;
Dost lose? Rise up; Dost win? Rise in that state:
Who strive to sit out losing hands are lost.

HERBERT.

More than once have I taken up my pen and endeavored to compose my mind to write. But as my thoughts have gone far back in painful reminiscence, I have turned from my self-imposed task with a feeling of unconquerable reluctance. The past I would forget, but I cannot. As this is the case—as the ghosts of misspent hours continually rise up and haunt me—I can do no less than briefly sketch one or two leading incidents in my life, to serve as beacon lights to my fellow-men, warning them from a dangerous coast. Seeing that so far in life I have done little towards benefitting others, to lift this warning light is the least that I can do.

As I glance back through the dark vista of years that have passed since the hours of innocent childhood, I see, beyond, a period of time the remembrance of which makes the blood move quicker in my veins. The sound of a mother's voice, the smile on a mother's lip, the glad joy of a mother's eye, then blessed my heart. If a son ever loved tenderly a mother, I was that son. How sweet a period is that, when the buds of innocence open and put forth leaves and fragrance, under the genial sunshine of a mother's loving heart! Home and mother! Blessed words! If I am ever saved from this load of evil that presses me down and urges me to destruction, it will be by the memory of my childhood's early home—that home made pure and holy by a mother's love. Even in the worst hours of my life, when I suffered myself to be carried away by evil as by a flood, it was the memory of my mother that saved me from total destruction. Sunk to the chin as I was in the deep rushing waters, and often just ready to be swept away by evil, many and many a time have I been encouraged by the sudden memory of my mother to struggle again for life, and struggled with success. How often, oh! how often have the words of a simple prayer she taught me, come into my thoughts just in time to save me from self-destruction—or, when ready to do some desperate deed of wickedness, have I been restrained by one of her pure precepts, spoken almost audibly in my ear. But I killed my mother! Do not shudder, reader! I did not destroy her life by open violence. Oh no! I never had an unkind thought of her. I ever loved her with surpassing tenderness. But my conscience has been heavily burdened since that sad, sad moment, when she passed away to be no more seen upon the earth.

As a boy, I early imbibed a fondness for games of chance, yet never was so skilful as a player as were many of my little companions. Marbles was a game at which I could spend hours and hours, even if my gains were but small. To win was the incentive to play, although I set no great value upon what I won. Still my passion for the excitement of playing was very great—so great, that school was often neglected, and my lesson badly said. This grieved my excellent mother very much, and caused her often to chide and admonish me, though to little good purpose.

I had a companion about my own age, named George Fuller. This lad, with a fondness for marbles quite as ardent as my own, possessed superior skill, as his peculiar form of mind enabled him to become more absorbed in the game than it was possible for me ever to be. George, at the time to which I am now about to allude, did not attend school; and, as his father was a man of unsteady habits, and his mother a weak, half broken-hearted woman, the acuteness of whose own sufferings made her forgetful of her duty to her children, he was allowed to go pretty much where he pleased, to do what he pleased. The place most frequented by him was a stable-yard near by both of our homes, where hours were spent in winning their marbles from the stable boys or other lads who happened to be there. To this place I frequently stole away, though expressly forbidden to go there by my mother, to enjoy, uninterruptedly, my favorite sport.

For years my mother had been in delicate health, often compelled to lie in her bed for days at a time. When I was about eleven years old, she grew worse rapidly; so much so, that my father's usually quiet manner was so much disturbed, that even I, thoughtless child as I was, could not help remarking it.—This continued for many weeks, during which time the doctor came regularly every day. One evening about this time, I came into my mother's room just before going to bed. She was alone. Her face, I remember, struck me as unusually pale and thin. She was supported in bed by pillows. As I came up to her, she reached out her hand feebly, and said with a serious look, and in a tone whose sadness touched my young feelings—

"Come, James, dear, lay down by me for a little while."

I was almost instantly upon the bed, my cheek resting against her cheek, and my hand tightly clasped in her hand. I can never forget the words next spoken, nor my sensations, when, as they were uttered, a tear fell upon my face.

"My dear James," she said tenderly, yet mournfully, "in a little while you will have no mother upon earth to love you and care for you."

Here her voice choked, and she gave way to tears. I wept with her, and wept bitterly. The idea of losing my mother was terrible as it was unexpected. She drew her arm around my neck, and pressed my face to her bosom, where she held me many minutes, until her mind became composed. Then she resumed, and with more calmness.

"It was never intended that we should live here always, James. But one is permitted to remain a longer time, and another is taken away earlier in life. I must go early. Be a good boy, James, and we shall meet above, never again to be separated."

Her emotions again choked her utterance, and she was silent. For a good while I lay with my head against her bosom, until sleep overpowered me, and I slumbered for the last time upon my mother's breast.

It was long after sunrise the next morning when I awoke. I found myself in my own bed, in a chamber separated from that in which my mother lay. As soon as I had dressed myself, I went to her room. I found my father and several friends standing anxiously around her bed. Her eyes were closed, and she looked so pale and death-like, that I shuddered as my eyes fell upon her face. No one seemed to notice me, as I came up and leaned against the bed, gazing, as I did so, sorrowfully upon my mother's suffering countenance. While standing thus, I noticed her move slightly—then came a convulsive cough, which was followed by a strong gush of blood from her mouth and nose. All became confusion in a moment. My father called to some one present to go off instantly for the doctor, while he supported my mother in his arms.

What was done towards checking the flow of blood from the lungs I know not. I remember that before the doctor came the bleeding had ceased, and also that she was paler than before, and apparently unconscious of the presence of any one. In the course of the morning the doctor came in a second time. A few minutes after he had gone away, my father called me and told me to go to the office of the physician for some medicine which he had said he would return home immediately and prepare. I went as directed, and received a vial of medicine accompanied by directions.

On my way home I had to pass the stable yard where I so frequently met my companion George Fuller, with other lads, and played at marbles. The temptation to go into this place was so strong that I could not resist it. I found George and two other boys deeply absorbed in their games, in which I was immediately invited to join. The vial of medicine was set down, my sick mother and all forgotten for the pleasures of gaming. For a time I gained over my companions, but after awhile luck turned against me, and I was the loser at every game. This caused me to play with increased skill and care, but it was of no avail. Marble after marble passed from my well supplied pocket, until scarce half a dozen remained. How long I was thus engaged, before my last game was played and I became ruined, I know not; it might have been one hour or three—I took no note of time. Sadly, at last, was I compelled to leave the attractive ring, and become a gloomy spectator of the prolonged contest now confined to my three companions. For ten or fifteen minutes I stood watching, with depressed feelings, the different games that were played,* when suddenly I started at the sound of my name called in tones that had been familiar to my ears from childhood—they were my mother's tones! I turned quickly, and my eye rested upon the vial of medicine I had set down and forgotten. Every thing around me seemed to revolve for a moment, and then I became fully conscious of the fault I had committed. A cold chill passed over me as I lifted the medicine and glided quickly away.

In a few minutes I entered the door of my father's house. The first person I met was the doctor.

"Where have you been with that medicine?" he asked sternly.

I held down my head, and made no reply.

"Unhappy boy!" he added, in softer tones, "You have destroyed your mother. That medicine, and that alone, could have saved her. But it is now, alas! too late."

The vial fell from my hands. It was sometime before I could bring back my scattered thoughts. Then I went up slowly to my mother's chamber. I can never forget the scene that was there presented. All was as still as the grave. One glance at my mother's face told the story of her fate. Death had fixed upon it his everlasting seal. My father stood with folded arms looking down upon her with an expression of stern endurance upon his countenance, while half-a-dozen friends sat around the bed, the tears following each other in large drops over their cheeks.

"See there!" suddenly exclaimed my father, as he became conscious of my presence, catching hold of my arms and lifting me from the floor. "See there! She is dead, and you have killed her!"

Then letting me drop from his hands, he covered his face, and sobbed and shuddered like a woman. Never in my life had I seen him so moved. He was, ordinarily, a man of even temper, and, apparently, cold and phlegmatic. But the icy barrier had been broken, and the strong man had become an infant.

As for me, young as I was, I was horror-stricken. The whole truth came upon my mind with the sudden distinctness of a lightning flash. In my thoughtlessness I had killed my mother—my mother, whom I loved deeply, truly, tenderly. I looked upon her pale, expressionless face, for a moment or two;—then at my father sobbing and weeping like a child,—and then stole away from the chamber of death, and hid myself in the garret, where I wept until my excited feelings found quiet in sleep. When I awoke it was past mid-day. All was still throughout the house. I descended slowly and silently, and ventured once more into my mother's chamber. The scene had become changed. Every thing was shrouded in white. The bed upon which she had lain for many weeks, was neatly made, and tenantless. In the centre of the room lay all that remained of her who had loved me with the tenderest love. I drew aside the covering, and once more gazed upon her face. I will not recal my feelings at that moment. The dim recollection of them makes me shudder. I was standing beside her body, leaning my head upon my hand, and looking down into her face, when I became conscious that some one was by my side. It was my father. His presence rebuked me, and I turned away, and left him alone with the dead.

At the burial, I remained all unnoticed by my father. He scarcely spoke to me for many months afterwards. Gradually, however, his stern manner softened. I had become so changed, that he could not but see it and feel it. Fond as I had been of boyish games and sports, I no longer joined my old companions, or took the slightest interest in any of those things which youth resorts to for pleasure. I went to and came from school regularly and mechanically. At home, I lingered about the house, silent and thoughtful. Books had no charms for me. I had, therefore, nothing to which I might flee as a relief from my gloomy disquiet of mind. My mother's death-bed continually haunted my memory.

At the age of thirteen I left my father's house, and became apprenticed to a trade. The occupation which this gave to my mind, as well as my body, afforded me great relief, and I soon ceased to dwell gloomily upon the past. This period of my life I must pass over; and also that portion of it immediately succeeding the expiration of my minority. I was twenty-five years of age, when, my business having proved very successful, I married the daughter of a tradesman in easy circumstances. Caroline, my wife, had been raised tenderly, and had received a good education. Her mind was above the ordinary cast, and her heart full of the purest and tenderest feelings. Some would have thought her plain, but, to me, she was very beautiful—for I could perceive in every varying expression of her dear face, the speaking forth of some true thought, or some good affection.

For ten years we were happy. For ten years I prospered in my business, and gathered in wealth with a small expense of care and anxiety.

"To-day," I said to my wife one morning, the first in a new year, "I owe no man any thing, and have property worth, at the most moderate valuation, eighty thousand dollars. And more than that," I added, drawing her tenderly to my side, and kissing her still fair cheek, "I have a dear good wife, and three sweet children. Am I not, indeed, a happy man?"

Caroline did not reply, but leaned her head confidingly against me. I looked into her face, and saw that tears were stealing out beneath her closed eye-lids.

"Dear Caroline!" I said, in a voice that expressed the concern I felt, "are you not happy?"

"Happy!" she uttered in a low, eloquent voice, hiding her face in my bosom, "O, yes! I fear, sometimes, that I am too happy."

"But is not that an idle fear, Caroline?" I asked.

"It may be—it must be! But I had a frightful dream last night."

"Dreams are nothing, Caroline. Or, at best, but mere phantasies of the imagination, while reason slumbers."

"So I have tried to argue. But there came into my mind, when I thus endeavor to reason with myself, so many instances wherein dreams have proved real warnings of approaching evil, that I cannot divest myself of the idea that the dream which I have had, has been sent to me for some good purpose; that it is not a mere phantasy."

"Tell me your dream, Caroline," I now said, the seriousness with which it had impressed her, causing me to feel a desire to hear a relation of it. She paused a few moments to collect her thoughts, and then said—

"I dreamed that a man, whom I have often seen in your shop, but whose name I do not know, came here and invited me to ride with him in a beautiful carriage, which he had driven to the door. The horses, noble animals, stood arching gracefully their necks, and champing their bits, impatient to be off. The request to ride was followed by an instant desire on my part to acquiesce. You made no objection, and in a little while we were seated in the carriage, which was whirled off with a rapid motion. Our way was along shaded avenues, that ran through a most lovely region. Tall trees, here and there, arched over our way, forming perfect arbors. Amid their branches were birds, some with rich plumage, and some that made the air tremble with delicious music. The fields were studded with fruit trees, hung with tempting fruit; or, vineyards stetched away in many a graceful undulation, in which were young men and maidens, singing their vintage songs, as they plucked the juicy clusters from the overladen vines. Every sense was delighted. Sweet odors came with every gentle breeze. The eye and ear perceived a new charm at every stage of our journey. 'How beautiful,' I had just said, turning to you, when a wild shriek of agony rung upon the air. It was the voice of our own dear Ella! I bent in eager alarm over the side of the carriage, and there was our child writhing beneath the wheels! A fiendish laugh startled my ear at the same moment. I had just time to see that it came from the lips of your friend, when I awoke. It may all be an idle phantom of the imagination. Perhaps it is. But it has troubled my heart deeply."

My wife ceased, and I endeavored to laugh her out of her vain fears. But the relation of her dream had affected her mind a good deal—so much so, that her spirits did not rally for some time. It was, perhaps, an hour after, that my old boyish companion, George Fuller, with whom I had played my last game at marbles, "dropped into" my shop. He had, like myself, been apprenticed to a trade, and now was apparently well to do in the world. His place of business was not far from mine. As tradesmen whose business not unfrequently brought them into contact with each other, we were often in each other's shops, and sometimes met and drank together in a tavern. On this occasion, he said, as he came in—

"A happy New Year, James."

"The same to you, with all my heart," I replied.

"Come, then, let us go round to Hall's (a house of refreshment) and drink to a hundred happy returns of this pleasant season."

I went without the slightest hesitation. I was in the habit of going daily to Hall's, sometimes in company with Fuller. Sometimes with other men, and often alone. I had become social in my feelings, and was fond of a friendly glass.

While we were drinking at the bar, a well-dressed, gentlemanly man came up, to whom Fuller spoke in a friendly, familiar way, and then introduced to me as a Mr. Harryman. He was exceedingly affable at once; ordered a room, a bottle of wine, and cigars, and insisted upon our joining him in a health to the happy New Year. Fuller yielded without hesitation to the invitation, and I, after a little urging from both of them, consented to make one of the party.

I found Harryman a very pleasant man, indeed.—He had travelled much, both in Europe and in this country, and seemed to have been a traveller with open eyes. His relations of scenes and incidents abroad were, to me, very interesting. He was, likewise, full of anecdote, and told a story with peculiarly fine effect. And with all these fascinations, he combined great suavity of manners, and was remarkably attentive to his two guests.

After sitting for an hour, I made a movement to go. This he objected to at once—ringing the bell at the same time and remarking—

"We must see the bottom of another bottle of wine first. New Year day only comes once in a twelvemonth."

To this, however, I objected positively. I had taken as much wine as I thought prudent.

"You and Fuller must dine with me, then," he said.

"You are very kind, sir, but you must really excuse me," I replied.

"I won't take any excuse at all. You must dine with me to-day. I have been looking for our good-natured friend Fuller, all the morning, and think myself quite fortunate in finding you in his company.—He will go of course. I always have a few friends to dine with me on New Year day—clever fellows all, who like a good dinner, a good glass of wine, a good song, and a good cigar. You must make one of the party. So you might as well say 'yes' at once, for I never take 'no' for an answer on these occasions."

His frankness, and the earnestness of his manner, made me feel inclined to yield. But I thought of my wife and home, and urged my family as a reason for not wishing to accept the invitation.

"Come, now! That's a little selfish," he said, half-seriously. "You dine with your family every day in the year. Surely you might spare one social hour for your friends."

Thus he urged, and I finally consented. Caroline received the announcement of my promise to dine with a man who had been, until the last few hours, a perfect stranger to me, with some surprise in her manner. She, however, made no objection; and expressed the hope, when I went away, that I would enjoy myself. When I arrived at the residence of Mr. Harryman, which was a very handsome one, and richly furnished, situated in a fashionable part of the city, I found a company of six or seven gentlemen, amongst whom was Fuller, who seemed to be on terms of familarity, and even intimacy with all. This I could not help remarking to myself as a little singular; particularly as he was evidently their inferior in refinement, education, and intelligence.

I was received by Mr. Harryman with marked attentions, and in the most courteous manner by his friends. When dinner was announced, I was the first to be handed out, and at the table, which was spread with all the luxuries of the season, I was of most consideration. I could not help feeling flattered at all these marks of distinction. The surprise they at first occasioned gradually gave way, as I began to think that there must certainly appertain to me some superior intrinsic merit, of which I alone had been unconscious. I was, doubtless, of much more consequence in the eyes of others than I had given myself credit for. When the wine began to be passed around the table, my glass was the first that was filled, and my health the oftenest drunk. Under this system, long before the cloth was removed, and cigars introduced, my head had become a good deal obscured. With the cigars came a fresh instalment of wine, of which I was almost compelled to drink, even more freely than during the regular courses of dinner.

How long we were thus engaged in smoking and drinking I know not. The end was, that I became so much intoxicated as to go to sleep. When I awoke, I found myself lying upon a sofa, with my boon companions still surrounding the table, and apparently as much interested in their wine and cigars as before. But the day had declined—for lamps were burning. I felt wretchedly. My head ached. I was feverish—heavy, and stiff in every joint. The moment I raised up, I was urged to drink again, to which solicitation I complied, and soon felt something better. In a little while, Fuller purposed that we should retire, as it was late. On glancing at the clock, I saw that it was after seven, and immediately rose to go. Before leaving the room, however, a parting glass had to be taken, and this was something stronger than we had yet indulged in. It was brandy toddy made very sweet, and, of course, very strong. I turned off a large glass of the attractive compound, and then bade the polite, attentive and hospitable Mr. Harryman good evening, and emerged into the street in company with Fuller. As we proceeded along, my head a good deal confused, my companion alluded to business, and also to the slow process by which we were able to acquire money.—I readily acquiesced in this. We had proceeded about half way toward home, when Fuller paused upon the corner of a cross street, and said—

"There is a chance for you to make a clear thousand to-night, if you will."

"There is?" responded I, pricking up my ears.

"Yes, there is; and such a chance does not occur every month. A thousand dollars made in one night is not an ordinary transaction."

I readily assented to this, and then asked him to explain himself.

"Do you see that dim light, so dim as to be scarcely seen, away up in the third story of that old house?" Pointing as he spoke to a dark, ancient, gloomy-looking building.

"I believe there is a light up there," I said. "But what of it?"

"Let us go up there. Come!"

"What for?" I asked.

"You can win a thousand dollars there, to-night," he whispered in my ear.

"Are you sure?" I enquired, too much intoxicated to be able to make any moral discrimination.

"O yes! I am sure as that I am standing here. You know Harryman with whom we have dined? He is one of the vainest and weakest men I ever knew; and makes himself a laughing stock to all his friends. Among his other follies is this. He thinks himself a perfect prince at faro, and under this silly notion, which the loss already of some forty or fifty thousand dollars of a magnificent fortune ought to have arrested, he nightly loses large sums of money. He is in the room from which that dim light proceeds now, and you might just as well take from him a cool thousand as any one else."

"But I know nothing of faro," I objected.

"I do, though; and I'll initiate you at once. So come along." Saying this, he gave my arm a pull, and I stalked on mechanically by his side. In a little while, we entered a dark alley, and after groping about for awhile, came to a door which we entered, and ascended a narrow, unlighted staircase.—In the third story of the building, we emerged into a room, dimly lighted, in which I found Harryman, and two or three of the dinner party, all of whom I had left but a short time before in a distant part of the city. Brief greetings took place, and then faro was proposed. I again objected on account of not understanding the game. This was at once overruled by my friend Fuller, who whispered in my ear that he would guide me, and that I was certain of winning.

Thus instigated, I took from my pocket book a fifty dollar note, and exchanged it for "chips." With these I commenced betting, under the direction of my friend—at the same time that I was so intoxicated as to be, in regard to my thoughts, all in confusion. At every stage of the game, the principle was explained to me, though but dimly apprehended. Whenever I won, or lost, Fuller informed me, and I took or paid the stake, as he directed. For a time, I was mainly the winner; but, after the first half hour, I had to resort to my pocket book again, and at frequent intervals from that time. It was not long before I became so absorbed in the game, as to be less dependent upon Fuller. I could understant its general drift, and could tell for myself whether I lost or won. This being the case, he gradually ceased to prompt me, and for a time I forgot him altogether. The loss of three hundred dollars at last sobered me. I looked around the room, and became aware, for the first time, that I was alone with Harryman. My first thought was to stop at once, and retire from the place. But the hope of winning back my money, led me to continue to bet, until every dollar I had in my pocket book, amounting in all to nearly eight hundred dollars, was gone.

It was past two o'clock when I paused at my own door, perfectly sober and perfectly wretched. How could I meet my wife? How could I breathe again the same air with my innocent children? I stood for nearly a quarter of an hour before I could take courage to enter. The moment I opened the door, I heard a movement above, and in an instant afterwards Caroline came hurrying down to meet me.—To her anxious enquiries in regard to my long absence, I made some plausable excuse, which she seemed to receive as satisfactory. But I could see that her mind had been too much disturbed to permit its agitated waves to subside in a moment. Neither of us slept much that night, although each sought earnestly to find forgetfulness in sleep. Side by side we lay, through the dark watches of that night, silent, but with busy thoughts. What were her fears, anxieties, or forebodings, I knew not. My own reflections were such as were calculated to drive a weaker man to self-destruction.

On the next morning, I met my wife and children at the breakfast table. But I could not converse with them as usual. I answered all the questions of my happy little prattlers in monosyllables, and even repulsed their fond caresses, for I was annoyed by them. I soon arose from the table;—as I did so, I looked at my wife. Her eyes were upon me, and her look of anxious, troubled enquiry, smote my heart. I felt for a single moment like confessing all to her. But pride forbade, and I turned away and entered my shop. I did not remain here long. I could not. My mind was not upon my business.—The first place to which I went, was to the store of my false friend Fuller, whose base betrayal of me, however, I did not then suspect. He looked slightly confused when I entered, but became instantly self-possessed.

"A good morning! Good morning!" he said, with animation. "How did you come off last night?—Winner, I hope?"

"Winner!" I rejoined, somewhat indignantly. "Of course not. How could I win in the condition I went to that accursed place?"

"But you did not lose any thing of consequence, I hope?" he said, enquiringly.

I perceived in a moment that there was in the tone of his voice an anxiety to know how far I had lost. But the meaning of that anxiety I didn't fully understand.

"Yes I did, though," I replied; "I lost eight hundred dollars."

"Impossible!"

"It is too true. And I must blame you for it."

"Blame me!" and his countenance grew concerned "How can you possibly blame me?"

"Didn't you take me there?"

"I did. But, then, you were my friend, and I was sure you would win at least a thousand dollars."

"How could you have been sure of that, when you knew that I was deeply in liquor?"

"You in liquor! Oh, no! I saw nothing of that."

"But I was, though. And to win money from me while in that state, was little better than robbery."

"Something must have been wrong with you, certainly, to have lost as you did to such an indifferent player as Harryman. Why, any body can beat him. If you were the last person I should ever have suspected of being in liquor. Had I dreamed of such a thing, I never would have let you risked a dollar.—But it is too late now. I never cry over spilled milk. That's my motto."

"Eight hundred dollars is no trifle let go without a thought," I replied.

"Of course it is: and of course you do not intend letting it go without a thought."

"And yet, what good will thinking about it do?" I said, with some bitterness.

"Mere thinking will not, of course, but acting will."

"How shall I act? I see no way. He has won my money from me, and there the matter will have to end."

"O no,—of course not. Win it back again."

"Win it back again?" I ejaculated, in surprise.

"Yes—certainly. You don't for a moment think of letting Harryman have your eight hundred dollars, when you have only to win them back again without the slightest trouble. He can't play. Any body can beat him."

Thus reasoned with, persuaded, and tempted, I was again induced, with five hundred dollars in my pocket, to present myself at the faro table of one of the most skilful, as well as the most unprincipled and heartless gamblers in the country. The result was as before. After playing for about five hours, during which time I was permitted to win just often enough to make me think myself really skilful at the game and my adversary well matched, I went away with my pocket empty. That night I was at the table again, determined to win back my money, and then stop. But I was not suffered to leave the room until I had lost a thousand dollars more.

This half maddened me. I walked the street until near day-light, and then went home. I found my wife lying across the bed asleep, but with her clothes on. Tears were on her cheeks. Oh! how my heart bled at this sight!

"Madman!" I mentally exclaimed, striking my open hand against my forehead, as I commenced pacing the floor. Caroline soon became conscious of my presence, and roused up with an exclamation of surprise and grief.

"Oh, James! Is it you at last?" she said, the tears flowing afresh as soon as she was fairly awake.—"Where, oh! where have you been? What terrible spell is upon you? Surely, all this must be a frightful dream!"

"A dream!" I replied, half to myself—"a dream! Oh, would that it were indeed a dream!"

"That what were a dream?—dear husband! Oh, keep nothing from me, James! Am I not your wife?—the mother of your little ones?—and do I not love you?" Caroline said, with deep and heart-touching pathos.

But I could not—I dared not tell her the truth.

"It is nothing, Caroline, nothing," I replied evasively. "Only I believe I am going beside myself."

The look of deep tenderness, mingled with exquisite agony, with which she met this remark, I can never forget. I could not bear it, but turned my eyes away.

She now urged me to go to bed, and I yielded mechanically. But I did not sleep. How could I? I did not go to my shop on that morning until about ten o'clock. I found Fuller there, reading the morning newspaper. He seemed to feel deeply for my loss, and blamed himself very much for having persuaded me to play with Harryman. He could not, for his life, understand how it was that I did not win. Harryman was the poorest player he had ever known. Luck must certainly turn in my favor soon. I must not be discouraged. I would get every cent back. He knew a man who once lost sixty thousand dollars in two weeks, who won it all back in three or four days, and sixty thousand more.

In this way, my half-formed resolution never to play again, was scattered to the wind. I became once more all eagerness to meet Harryman, and win back from him my money. Filling up a check for one thousand dollars, I drew that sum from bank, and once more stood at the gaming table. While there, I lost all idea of time—and forgot every thing else, in my eager devotion to play. The struggle was long, and to me it seemed a doubtful one—but it terminated at last, and I was loser by just the amount I had drawn out of bank.

"Will you cash my check for five hundred dollars?" I asked of my opponent, perfectly infatuated.

"Certainly I will—or for five thousand if you wish," was the prompt reply.

The check was drawn and the money handed to me. Again I turned eagerly to the faro table. But I will not descend further to particulars in regard to this day's transactions. Suffice it to say, that I passed the whole day, and until midnight in contest with Harryman, neither of us taking a particle of food. When I left him, at three o'clock in the morning, he held my checks for six thousand dollars.

The cold air of a bleak night in January failed to cool my burning forehead, as I bared it to the chilly winds that swept piercingly through the deserted streets. I wandered along, I thought not, I cared not whither. I shrunk from the idea of going home. How could I meet my wife? And yet how could I prolong the agony of her mind by staying away a single moment longer? At last, after wandering about for nearly an hour, thoughts of my wife awoke in my bosom such feelings of tenderness, that I could not prolong further my absence. I determined to go home and tell her all; and get her counsel, and the strength of her pure mind, to restrain me from again yielding to temptation.

When I entered her chamber, I found her upon her knees by the bed side, with her face buried in a pillow, upon which her clasped hands were resting. I started at the sight, and stood for some moments looking at her, as if suddenly fixed to the spot. She did not stir, and seemed altogether unconscious of my presence. My blood suddenly became chilled in my veins. I started forward, and bent eagerly over her. She was asleep, and her breath came calmly. But her countanance had a distressed look, her eye-lids were wet, and there were marks of tears upon her cheeks. For some minutes I bent over her, irresolute. I had not yet been able to make up my mind how to act, when she shuddered, started, and raised up with a deep sigh, or rather moaning ejaculation Perceiving me by her side, as she stood up, she exclaimed:

"Oh, James! Is it indeed you? I have just been dreaming that I saw you fall from an immense precipice, and lie bleeding and mangled at its rocky base. But you are here, God be thanked!"

As she said this, she threw herself upon my breast, and clung with her arms around my neck, trembling, weeping, and sobbing like an infant. Gradually this exuberance of feeling subsided. And then came a state of silence, coldness and reserve, that was deeply painful and embarrassing to both of us.

This was broken by my freely and fully opening to her the whole truth in regard to my three days of mad infatuation, during which I had lost nearly ten thousand dollars. Poor Caroline! The relation seemed to stun her. She looked at me silently and strangely, while her face became paler than before. And no wonder! The husband she had tenderly loved, and so fully confided in, had been guilty of drunkenness and gaming, those two dreadful vices, from which, above all others, the heart of a woman and a wife must turn with instinctive horror. After this full confession, I made a voluntary and solemn promise, that I would never again enter a gambling house, or indulge a game of chance. This caused her to breathe more freely. She threw her arms again around my neck, buried her face in my bosom, and promised to forget, as far as possible, the last three fearful days and nights. My heart felt lighter after this, than it had felt since the accursed moment when I first breathed the polluted air of a gaming room. I retired to bed, and slept soundly for the few hours of darkness that remained. At the breakfast-table, Caroline looked serious, but not troubled. I could eat but little, for with the morning had come bitter reflections. I was angry with myself, for my blindness and folly. The loss of some nine or ten thousand dollars, and in such a way, so worried my mind that I was unfitted for every thing. I tried to enter once more upon the regular course of my business, but in vain. I took no interest in any thing, but brooded continually over my loss. I soon turned from my account books, took my hat, and went over to Hall's, where I called for a glass of brandy and water. After drinking this I turned to go out, but before I had reached the door, my friend Fuller was at my side, with—

"Ah! good morning, James! How are you to-day?"

"I'm devilish bad, I thank you," I replied somewhat peevishly.

"Nonsense, man! Why what has come over you?"

'I'm a cursed fool!" I said, in reply, with bitter emphasis.

"Why, what in the world has broken loose? You are certainly in a strange mood for a man of your even temper."

"But to be served as I have been, would mar the temper of a saint."

"You speak in riddles."

"Do I? Well, I lost seven thousand dollars yesterday to that Harryman! Isn't that enough to spoil a man's temper? Curse him! I wish he had been in the middle of an ice-berg before I saw him!"

"Seven thousand dollars! Impossible!"

"It is too true, Fuller! Too true!"

"Seven thousand dollars! It is really incredible!—And he the merest tyro at the game! Really I can not understand it. You certainly could not have had your wits about you."

"There I must beg to differ with you," I replied. "I was fully alive to what I was doing, and played with the greatest possible care. But it was no use. I could beat him three or four games in succession, sometimes, but then he would carry every thing before him after that, until he had won all back again, and doubled on me his losses."

Fuller looked thoughtful at this, and remained for some time silent. At length he said, half aloud, as if to himself—

"But it will never do in the world to let him off with that money. It can be won back, and it must."

"Not by me," I replied. "I'm done. Let what is gone, sink in the ocean. It is enough to throw away."

"No—no—no! That will never do!" quickly returned my friend, with concern both in his voice and countenance. "Harryman must not get off with that booty. It must be gotten back. Try him once more, and I can put you in the way of recovering every cent."

"How?" I eagerly asked.

"You often beat him?"

"O yes! Often. Sometimes every other game, and sometimes game after game in succession," I answered.

"Very well. Now if you will adopt the plan I suggest, you can easily enough get your own out of him."

"Name your plan," I said.

"Play once more. Let the stake be, say an hundred dollars to begin with, to be doubled at every game. You can stand it as long as he can, of course. In a little while the stake will amount to four or five thousand dollars. A fortunate play at that stage will bring you even, and you can refuse to bet a moment longer. That is your only chance; and it is certain of success."

"I will do it!" I said, all on fire in a moment—forgetful of my solemn promise to my wife. It was little beyond a half an hour afterwards, when I again stood at the faro table, with ten thousand dollars in my pocket, beside a dozen blank checks, in case they should be wanted. I proposed to play as Fuller had suggested. Harryman affected to demur, but finally yielded. The first stake was five hundred dollars. I won. The next was a thousand dollars. I won again. And also the third time. But at the fourth game he was successful, and so on to the fifth and sixth games. Before this, I had to get him to cash checks to the amount of ten thousand dollars. Thus we continued, until the stakes were thirty-two thousand dollars on each side. This was the game that was to decide my fate. But my mind was too much excited to be able to make my calculations with any thing like the required coolness. But even this would have availed nothing. My adversary had skill and adroitness so far superior to mine, that he could beat me for a hundred games in succession, if he had chosen. I had, therefore, no chance whatever. Of course I was beaten!

How I got away from the room I know not. It was night. But I knew not the hour. Whither should I go? Home? No! I dared not go there! How could I meet my injured wife, or look upon my beggared children? In this state of mind I entered a refectory, and, calling for a glass of brandy, retired into a box where it was sent to me. I had been seated there without a light for about ten minutes, when two men entered a box adjoining. They conversed for some time in a low tone, but grew more earnest, so that I overheard the following conversation—

"It is no use for you to offer me the paltry sum of two hundred dollars, Harryman. I want the fourth of all you won from him."

I recognized the voice at once. It was that of my pretended friend, Fuller.

"You are not entitled to the fourth of any amount I won from him, except that obtained on the night you brought him in."

"He never came here once that I did not prompt him. I put it into his head to propose to double the stakes to-day, by which you were enabled to fleece him entirely. He is my game, and I must and will have my share."

"If you can get it," I could hear the gambler say between his teeth.

"You are an infernal, cheating scoundrel!" was the low fierce reply of Fuller.

Instantly there ensued a scuffle, and all was alarm and confusion. I sprang from my box, while the inmates of the refectory rushed from all parts to the scene of action. But before any one could separate them a pistol shot rang through the room. All was still for a moment. Then there was a deep groan, and one of the combatants fell heavily to the floor.—It was the gambler! In the confusion that followed, I retired from the place unnoticed, and went directly home. It was nearly eleven o'clock, and I had not been home since ten o'clock in the morning. I dreaded to meet my wife. What could I say to her? Twenty-four hours had not elapsed since my solemn promise to her never again to risk a dollar at the gaming table, and within that time, I had lost all that I was worth! Since that time I had beggared my family!

As silently as possible I entered my house. All was hushed. I went softy up to my chamber, listening at every step for some sound, but nothing, except the monotonous ticking of the clock, met my ear.—The door of my chamber stood ajar. I opened it quietly, and went in. My youngest child lay asleep in its crib, and two others slept soundly upon their little bed. But my wife was not there! My heart bounded in sudden alarm as I took up the light hastily and passed into the adjoining chamber. It was tenantless.

"Caroline!" I called at the landing of the stairs. But the echo of my voice, sounding along the passages, was all the reply I obtained. Hurriedly then I descended to the parlors, where all was dark and still. Here I found my wife lying upon a sofa, with an arm hanging upon the floor, and her head thrown far over upon one shoulder, as if she had suddenly sunk down and become instantly helpless. Her face was deadly pale, and her skin cold. I lifted her in my arms and carried her up into our chamber and laid her upon the bed. But she gave no sign of life. Indeed, so far as I was able to judge, the spirit had taken its everlasting departure from its beautiful clayey tenement. I chafed her temples, and used all the restoratives I could think of, but to no purpose. She still lay pale and insensible before me.

Suddenly I shuddered, and the cold clammy sweat oozed from every relaxed pore of my body, as memory called up vividly the death-bed scene of my mother. My mother, whom I had suffered to die, while I indulged my early passion for gaming. And now, in pursuit of the same wild excitement, I had a second time been ruined in worldly goods, and a second time had murdered her whom, of all others, I loved most tenderly! Horror-stricken, I rushed from the house, and aroused the nearest physician. He came to my aid immediately. One more hour of anxious suspense passed, and lo! there were signs of returning life. I noted for a moment the convulsive twitch of the muscles, of the face—felt her slowly reviving pulse for a moment, and then, with the tears gushing from my eyes, went quickly into the adjoining chamber, and falling upon my knees, besought earnestly my Maker to spare me my wife yet a little longer, and try me, whether I would not now be true to my duty as a husband, and father, and citizen.

When I returned to the bed side the physician gave me hope. How eagerly did I cling to it, and cherish it as an answer to my pledge and my prayer! By daylight she had rallied a good deal, though she still remained unconscious, and continued so throughout the day.

A feeling of security in regard to my wife, allowed me some time to give some earnest thought in regard to my worldly condition. The conversation I had heard at the refectory, on the night before, revealed to me a startling secret. Fuller, my friend Fuller, had basely betrayed me. I could scarcely believe my own senses. He a mere "stool pigeon!" It seemed impossible. And yet it was even so. He had allured me to the gaming table, after having first aided in getting me intoxicated, that I might be robbed of my fortune, and he become a sharer in the booty. While turning this matter over in my mind, a neighbor dropped in and gave me a history of the scene of violence I had myself witnessed on the preceding evening, adding, that Harryman, "the most desperate gambler in the country," had since died. Instantly a gleam of light broke into my mind. I turned at once to my desk—examined my bank account, and found that I had just twenty thousand dollars in cash. I drew a check for this, with which I was at the counter of the bank, just as the clock struck nine. I received the whole, and went away with a lighter heart. Twenty thousand dollars I had sunk in my gaming mania. The rest of my property I still held securely, and no power but the law could wrest it from me. And the law of my State, I knew, recognized no gambling debt. Harryman was dead, and Fuller arrested for his murder. If the heirs of the former entered suit upon my checks, I would throw the proof of value received upon them. I felt that I could make a clear case.

But, happily, this issue never came. I was left in the quiet enjoyment of the remainder of my fortune. Fuller is still expiating the crime of manslaughter in the State's prison.

As for my wife, she was restored to consciousness during the ensuing night. Her recognition of me led to a most touchingly painful interview. But I ventured upon no further explanations of my conduct—and made no further promises. I felt that these would be but a mockery to her state. Time could only give her confidence in me. She must now judge from my actions and not my words.

And time has brought back the smile to her lip, the light to her sweet face, the joy and confidence to her heart. As for myself, I have twice been sorely tempted, and, falling in temptation, been most grievously punished—and saved as by fire. But I feel now that I stand upon higher ground. When I went to the faro table with Fuller, I did not think it an evil to win my neighbor's money from him. All was fair, I thought; and the winner the best man.—I see it differently now. I would as soon think of stealing a man's money, as to win it from him.—From henceforth I am secure from a gamester's temptation; or, if latent cupidities should indeed stir within me, the memory of two eras in my life will come up and save me.

A FINE BARGAIN.—"Well, Polly, I made a monstrous fine trade this morning—I sold our dog for fifty dollars." "Why man alive, how you talk! and where's the money?" "Oh, I wasn't paid in money—but I've got two pups worth $25 a piece."

The Widow of Cairnlough.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

I believe it would be difficult to find, in what is called the civilized world, a people more superstitious than the inhabitants of the northern coast of Ireland. Mingling, as they do, the traditions of Scotland with the legends of Ireland, a belief in supernatural visitations and in all sorts of spiritual agencies seems as natural to them as the air they breathe. I do not think they have as much faith in mere fairies,—little, dew-drinking, moonlight-dancing elves,—as the dwellers in the south; but between the omens of the sea, and the warnings of the hills, and caves, and valleys, concerning "Banshees," and "grey men," the peasantry, particularly along the wild coast of Antrim, dwell almost as much in the ideal as in the real world.

In proportion to their mental or bodily strength is their actual trust in the stories which, while the old relate, the younger and more educated affect to discredit and endeavor to reason away; yet with all their efforts circumstances frequently occur that compel wiser heads than theirs to exclaim,

"'Tis strange, 'tis passing strange."

But I will tell my story, and leave my readers, as it best pleases them, to believe, or disbelieve, what I relate.

It would be impossible for the most active imagination to fancy any thing more terrible or more devastating than the weather during the latter part of 1842 and the commencement of the present year.—One calamity seemed hurled upon another,—each howl of the tempest was freighted with shrieks of perishing mariners, and the mountain-torrents echoed the roar of the ghastly ocean, white with wrath, as it contended with the rocky bulwarks of Fairhead, or rendered the sunny spots in the Plaiskin a mass of foam. Sleepless and prayerful were those poor fisher-families whose dwellings cluster around the bays and glens that indent the glorious coast of Antrim: the blue lightning illuminated the Banshee's couch in the towers of Dunluce, the thunder shook the proud Castle of Glenarm. Well might the weepers pray for those away—away!—upon the waters. Each day increased the fearful list of families made desolate by the ruthless storm. The Irish peasantry are naturally cheerful and fond of society, yet now they almost avoided each other, fearing to hear ill news.

It was the evening of the 12th of January—the rain had poured in torrents all day, but had suddenly ceased; and the lull, or, as the people call it, "the cradle of the wind," was disturbed by a low moaning noise, the awakening "sough" of the "Storm King." The widow Clarke, an old inhabitant of Cairnlough, was sitting beneath the shadow of her wide chimney. A young girl, the betrothed of her absent son, had come in, "to stop with her a while, thinking she might be lonesome;" and a little shock-headed, rosy child of about ten years old, an orphan, who, without any spoken invitation, had taken up her abode at "Widdy Clarke's," and ate of her potato as if she were her own child, was occupied in reeling worsted. Suddenly the door-latch was raised, and a blind woman, whose sweet ballad-singing had gained her the name of "Peggy-the-Voice," entered.

"God save all here!" she exclaimed, as she stood for a moment on the threshold, extending her stick forward—"God save all under this roof as well as all in Cairnlough, and you, especially, poor woman! and keep all under the wing of the Almighty, I pray His holy name!" adding, while advancing, "I hope all's well with you and yours, though one's almost afraid to ask; but you have the prayers of the poor, any how, and they make a sure path to Heaven!"

"Kindly welcome, dear," said the widow, rising from the chimney-corner, and extending her hand to her humble guest, whose delicate form and sharp, intelligent features rendered her, despite her blindness, a pleasing-looking woman. "Kindly welcome, agra, and sit here out of the wind of the door; if one can be any where out of such winds as are sweeping the mountains these bad times; if, indeed," she added, in a low tone,—"if, indeed, it's real winds that's in it, and not something worse. Holy saints, protect us!"

"Thank ye, woman dear, I'm very well here, so keep your place; and I know the burr of Annie Morrison's wheel, and the sound of little Alsie's feet on the floor. Ah! girls, ye thought I wouldn't find you out, but God—His name be praised!—never takes away one sense, but He strengthens another; Peggy-the-Voice has quick ears."

Peggy Graham's infirmity would have obtained her a cordial greeting in every Irish cottage; her poverty, without her loss of sight, secured her kind treatment; and her voice—her store of songs alone—were trusty passports to each music-loving heart, so that the poor, gentle, afflicted woman might be said to be trebly welcome. During these nights of storm and days of sorrow, she was anxiously looked for by many, for all her superstitions had a comforting, religious tendency, and her mind was so hopeful, so trusting in God's goodness, that the glensmen said, "Peggy had a holy way with her that did them good."

"And now, Peggy, have you any news?" inquired the widow; "though it's ill asking, for one trouble mounts over another. I heard a man who came from Bushmills tell how the Banshee was heard in Dunluce last week."

"Ah, nonsense!" replied Peggy Graham, pettishly; "I wonder you wouldn't know better than that, and you born, bred, and reared, to say nothing of your people, in Cairnlough. Is it she cry?—sorra a tear she'd shed, or a cry she'd raise, if the whole county Antrim was just pitched bodily into the mad ocean this blessed minute,—barring the head of the family was among the people, which would be out of the course of nature! No, the Banshee of Dunluce has better knowledge than that; she'll raise no cry—till the NEXT is called. I wonder at ye, Mrs. Clarke."

The widow sought to apologize, for she ought to have remembered that the Banshee of Dunluce, belonging especially to the noble family of Antrim, took no interest in any death save that of its chief; and the poor woman felt she had lost ground in her visitor's opinion. Anxious to retrieve it, she observed, "She knew that;"—"she said so at the time;"—"the man wasn't a Bushmill man, she thought he was a MacQuillan."

"I dare say he was nothing but a MacQuillan," replied the blind woman, bitterly, who was strongly attached to the rival clan of MacDonnel,—"I dare say he was nothing else but that same; and, indeed, Mrs. Clarke, considering who is in the place, and blessing and employing the whole country, the less of the MacQuillans that's encouraged the better."

Mrs. Clarke, always peaceably disposed, answered, "that was very true," and that she "always said so."

A sudden and tremendous hurricane-shout of the sea and land winds, as though the spirit of the rival clans, of whom the blind woman spoke, were contesting over again for the broad counties where they so often fought, forced Annie to exclaim, "May the Almighty look over the seas and protect the poor craythurs this blessed night!"

A whispered "Amen!" hung upon every lip; and as the winds waxed more wrathful, the women drew closely together, raked up the smouldering ashes of the turf-fire, and whi[illegible]red to each other as if some mighty spirit was on the watch and on the wing to carry away their words.

"It's a comfort to me," said the widow,—"and I tell Annie, there, it ought to be a great comfort to her,—that him we both love above the world, and who is foremost in our thoughts day and night, my son and her true love, is in foreign parts these stormy times. I've heard many sea-faring men say that often when the surge has been high enough to wash the grey man's track as with a besom, you could float a feather on the Bay of Biscay. Don't you hear what I say, Annie, avourneen?"

The girl looked up and smiled, but soon again her head drooped over her wheel; little Alice wound her arms round her neck, and murmured words of childish consolation and tenderness to one who was the favourite of old and young.

"There's some foretold these storms, and wished that the fishermen would haul up their boats high and dry on the beach at the beginning of winter, but they would not; and, signs on it, there's many a broken heart in Cairnlough this blessed evening.—But life and death are in the Almighty's hands, and it's not what you or I say or think;—it was to be—that's all," added the widow, in a calm, resigned voice.

"Peggie," inquired Annie, "did you in all your travels ever hear tell of the ship Charles is in? I'm told she's a rael beauty,—a queen of the sea, the Albion she's called."

"She is a beauty," answered Peggy, in a cheerful tone; "and there's nothing but the heighth of truth in what the mother said about storms not going beyant a certain place, not all as one as her story of the Banshee at Dunluce——"

"It wasn't my story, Peggy agra!" interrupted Mrs. Clarke.

"Well, never mind, dear, whose story it was, the black drop was in it, so there's enough about it; but the boy, from all we've heard, is in a fine ship, and out of reach of the storms, and may the blessed Father of Heaven keep him so."

They then spoke of their neighbours' sorrows, of old prophecies, of "charms," and their "workings," of "warnings before death," dwelling on any thing rather than what was nearest to their hearts; and when the sudden hurricane, as Peggy observed, "blew itself out," the cottage candle was lit, the floor swept, a "fresh sod of turf" thrown on, and little Alsie sent to a woman, who lived "hard by," with a kindly message, "That as 'Peggy-the-Voice' was to stop the night in their place, would she come in and hear her raise a tune, for Mrs. Clarke thought it would lift her heart to hear it, and take the trouble off her for a while?" This request was thankfully acceded to; and "the neighbour" being seated, Peggy commenced her song, rocking herself in time to the tune. The song was one of the croning ballads of the old times, and was thus prefaced by the singer—

"Is it the 'Lady's Temptations' you'll have? Well, then, dears, so you shall; it's an innocent song, and one the quality's fond of—it isn't that I say it, but many a time the drawing-room door has been set open, and I have sung it to the highest and handsomest in this country." Then clearing her voice, she began,—

"'Lady, I will give you the bells of Londonderry,
When you are sad, to ring to make you merry,
If you'll be my true lover.'

"And then, you know, the 'Madam' answers all so stately, for her blood was higher than his,—

"'Sir, I'll not accept of the bells of Londonderry,
When I am sad, to ring to make me merry,
Nor will I be your true lover.'

"The gentleman was nothing daunted, you understand, at this, for he loved her beyant life or death, and so he tempted her on, thinking to turn her heart from another,—

"'Madam, I will give you a sheet of silver pins
To dress your——?"

The continuance of the half-chanted song was interrupted by the Widow of Cairnlough's suddenly starting up, and after clapping her hands wildly, she extended them, exclaiming, while her form seemed converted into stone, "There,—there!—I see the water rising, and Charles struggling in a wave of the sea—There!" She continued in a state of such painful agitation, even after she confessed "it was gone," that the terror she struck, to use her neighbours' expression, "into their hearts," was overpowered by their anxiety for the widow; despite all they could urge, she continued walking about the cottage until five o'clock in the morning, when she lay down and fell into a profound sleep. The sailor's betrothed was carried in a state of insensibility to her mother's cabin.

All traces of the storm had passed away from the heavens before the sun shone into the cottage window, but even at noon the widow still slept. Apart from her cottage, outside the door of an humbler dwelling, a group of persons were assembled; they spoke in suppressed whispers, frequently directing their glances towards the Widow Clarke's: occasionally the conference was interrupted by a sudden and sharp cry, a "keen" of bitter anguish, from within the house round which they clustered.

"Hear to poor Annie!" said Peggy, who was in the midst of the group. "Oh, her heart's breaking, and there was something over her all day yesterday!—Well, the widow's warning beats all I ever heard tell of before; to think of her seeing him last night struggling in the wave, and to-day hearing of his certain death! Who broke it to poor Annie?"

"Who but her own mother?" was the reply; "though, indeed, there was nothing to break, for she misdoubted a long time, and no wonder; the death-watch was never away from her own chimney-corner, nor the winding-sheet off her candle, nor the howl out of her little dog's throat, and she keeping it all close from us mother; and sure, the sorrow that finds voice finds ease; it's silent grief that eats up the heart; she's just like the moonlight shadow of what she was, poor girl: and when the letter came, a while ago, she was as calm and still as a sleeping lake. 'I know it, mother,' she said, 'but get one to read it me, word for word;' and the mother, resting on her strength, did, and she's been from one fit to another ever since; how the widow will bear it, the Lord, He knows; she was always a hopeful creature, but her hope is washed into the sand of the sea-shore!"

After a conclave of kind and thoughtful friends had consulted together, it was determined that a neighbour, much beloved by the widow, should go in under pretext of preparing her breakfast, and communicate the melancholy fact of the loss of the Albion off the coast of France,—

There was something, however, so refreshed in the poor widow's waking, she used such efforts to cast away the heavy shadows of the past night, she prayed so fervently, and expressed so much faith and trust in that power which had so long preserved him she loved from the deep waters, that her friend found it impossible to reveal the fact; and another neighbour, a man of the name of Macbride, undertook the task, inviting her into his house. Observing that the wheel was set aside, and no employment going on, Mrs. Clarke inquired the reason: the females of the family made no reply, but stole out of the room, and Macbride stood aside to hide his tears. This awoke her fears, and she desired him to tell her instantly what was wrong. His reply is to me, one of sweet and harmonious beauty, shewing the simple purity and oneness of that strong and enduring sympathy which is so characteristic of the Irish peasant,—

"Mary," replied Macbride, "Mary, your trouble is ours——" Then the widow knew she had no son, and her grief was loud and violent—he, her only one—her life—her hope—her joy—her glory—the fine, brave, high-spirited sailor—his mother's darling—her support—her one, sole object—was indeed gone!

"And I!" she exclaimed, while tearing her grey hair, and casting dust upon her whirling brain; "I, that had such faith, that though I saw him, under my own roof, tossed in the wave of the sea, and yet would not take sorrow to my heart—I, that disbelieved the sight of my eyes, rather than fold death to my heart—I, to be left desolate, at the last forgotten—forgotten by HIM, in whom the widow put her trust!"

It is worse than idle to repeat the maniac exclamations of such grief. Some months have since elapsed, and though bent with sorrow, though deprived of every support, the widow of Cairnlough has learned to say, "Thy will be done," from the depths of her trembling heart.

I have not made this story,—it is a fact; three grown-up persons were present when the song was interrupted by the widow's vision. She could have received no previous intimation of the sad event, nor had she any reason to pretend to "second sight"—nor any object to gain by deception; it has riveted, unfortunately, the belief in much that was nearly forgotten, and revived many "old wives' tales." The poor woman seems to derive a melancholy pleasure in talking of the circumstance; she says, she often dreamed of her "fine boy," but "that night she saw him as plain struggling with the wave that swept him into eternity—as plainly as she saw the lady to whom she told the story."

The Blacksmith's Daughter.

A TALE.

BY WILLIAM H. McCALLA.

Chapter I.

England, at the time we are writing of, which was in the reign of Richard the Second, was involved in so many dangerous and expensive wars, and the Treasury being nearly exhausted, large and constant supplies were demanded by the administration; and at each new, and what appeared exhorbitant demand, the murmurs of the people rose in proportion, and as their indignation had long been increasing from these expressions, a tax of three groats on each person fanned it into a flame.

But in no place was the indignation greater, than in the small village of ———, near London, where the incident occurred which has given rise to my tale.

In a small house situated in the lower part of the town, with a shop adjoining, in which the hammer was most always to be heard ringing upon the anvil, there resided an old man, well known, to the inhabitants of the village by the name of Wat Adair.

Wat Adair was a widower; he having lost one of the most exemplary wives shortly after their marriage. He was about the middle height, stout and well formed, though slightly bent with age; and although three-score years had passed over his brow, silvering his hair, and leaving many a deep furrow in his cheek; yet Old Time had dealt lightly with him, and he still was hale and hearty. He possessed a bright eye, which age could not dim, and a daughter—his only child, whom he loved better than his life.

Mary Adair was indeed the very realization of all that is lovely in a female. Small, yet graceful as the fawn, with eyes black as night, and hair that might have vied with the glossy plumage of the raven's wing; a complexion of dazzling clearness, in which the rich blood started at every pulsation of the heart; a small mouth, with ripe, pouting lips, just parted sufficiently to show a set of teeth of pearly hue, a clear, melodious voice, gushing forth sweetly as the song of birds, united to that loveliest charm of woman, a sweet disposition; rendered her at once the idol of all the women, and the subject of contention, between all the beaux in the village.

But Mary herself was the only one, who appeared to be unaware of the power of fascination she possessed over all who beheld her. Innocent and artless as an angel, she had long before the period at which this tale commences, bestowed the whole treasure of her affection upon Frank St. Aubrey, the son of a widowed lady, residing in the village.

Frank was in every way worthy of [illegible] good fortune in being beloved by Mary, possessing an elegant form and a set of features which, if not decidedly handsome, were yet of a noble expression, and appeared to command the respect of all who knew him; and there was but one obstacle to prevent his rising to be classed among the noblest in the land—He was poor: and employed as the foreman in Adair's shop, and thus became acquainted with Mary, and formed that friendship which so shortly after ripened into love.

And Wat had promised him, that should he ever gain enough of this world's riches to support a wife, that Mary should be his. And this bright hope supported him through many a day of weary labour.

Now there is an old adage which says "the course of true love never did run smooth," and it is not to be supposed that the love existing between Mary and St. Aubrey, should differ from all others in this respect. Far from it—for besides labouring under the disadvantage of poverty, he beheld in the person of Richard Wolfstien a rival, in whom there existed all the hatred which disappointed love or jealousy could excite.

Richard Wolfstien was the son and only child of a wealthy farmer, residing at a short distance from the village; and who had reared up his son in a manner calculated to cause him to be disliked by almost all who knew him.

Reared in the midst of every luxury, and never having the slightest wish ungratified, so indulgent was his parent, he had become haughty and overbearing in his manner; and felt more keenly the chagrin which his ill success in courtship to Mary excited.

With all these bad qualities, it is not surprising that he should find no favor in the eyes of Mary; on the contrary, she took every opportunity of convincing him how heartily he was despised by her. It was in vain; for united to a persevering disposition, he possessed consummate impudence and boldness, taking advantage of every opportunity to press his suit, thinking to gain by perseverance what he could not other wise accomplish.

The ill success of his son's suit so aggravated the hatred which old Wolfstien entertained towards St. Aubrey, that both father and son united in determining to embrace the first opportunity of gaining revenge, for what they imagined was injury received. This determination was considerably augmented by an event which took place shortly after.

One evening after the labours of the day were over, and he had partaken of his frugal meal, Frank, as was his usual custom, went to pay a visit to Mary.

On arriving at the house what was his surprise on entering, to behold Richard Wolfstien, and what was still worse, in an apparently very ill humour.

This by no means added to the pleasurable feelings of St. Aubrey, for he was well aware of the passionate disposition of his rival, and was fearful of a quarrel as it might lead to blows and perhaps bloodshed. Determining, therefore, to make a show of good nature and friendship, hoping by this means to overcome his rival's surly mood, St. Aubrey addressed him in a pleasant manner. But in vain, he remained dogged and sullen, replying to St. Aubrey's remarks in a bitter and sarcastic manner.

This ill humour, Mary's treatment was not at all calculated to dispel, for he had so disgusted her by his importunate and disagreeable conduct, that she determined to repulse him on the least advances, and on this evening she had treated him particularly cool, which chagrined him beyond expression.

But to St. Aubrey, Mary's whole demeanour was changed, and she exhibited so much delight at seeing him, and welcomed him with so much real pleasure beaming in her pretty face, that Wolfstien was absolutely maddened with rage and jealousy. He could bear it no longer, but putting on his hat he cast one fierce and malignant glance at St. Aubrey, and darted from the room without even saying "good night" to Mary.

Both were considerably startled at such strange conduct, although neither Mary nor St. Aubrey lamented his absence. Indeed it was a great relief, and they sat and chatted over the past and their prospects for the future until the clock struck ten—St. Aubrey's usual hour of departure.

At this moment, Wat, who had been at a public meeting held in the village, entered the room, and perceiving St. Aubrey was about to depart, said—

"Well, Frank, I suppose we shall not see each other for some time."

"Indeed," replied the other, "why so?"

"Why," continued Wat, "I intend starting on a journey to some distance in the morning, and as the business I have to transact, will require some time in its completion, I will be unable to return for several days.

"That is unfortunate," replied Frank, "as I wished to go away myself in the morning, but it is of no importance; I will stay and take care of Mary. Shall I, Mary?"

"Oh! yes, do stay, Frank," cried Mary, "for I am fearful of Richard Wolfstien."

"Fear not, dearest," replied Frank, "he shall not harm you—not at least while I am living; so good-by, Mary; God protect you on your journey, Wat. A hearty shake of the hand from Wat, a kiss from Mary, and he had left the house to seek his home.

Leaving Frank to seek his humble dwelling, we will once more return to Wolfstien, who, running out of Adair's house, did not halt or slacken in his rapid gait, until he arrived at the mansion of his parent. His father, who was seated in his library, started at beholding Richard burst into the room, his face inflamed with anger, and his whole appearance disordered.

"What is the matter, Richard?" inquired the old man, who secretly divined the cause.

"Father," replied the other, "this night I have been treated with scorn, and by a woman."

"Who is she?" inquired the old man.

"Mary Adair, father," said Wolfstien; "she must become my wife; if not by fair means, by Heavens she shall by force. And as for St. Aubrey, we must find some means of despatching him. I must and will have revenge."

"So you shall, my son," replied the old man; "I have been thinking over it; so listen and I will tell you of a scheme I have in view."

"What is it?" eagerly demanded the other, who was anxious to hear of any scheme which promised revenge.

"Listen, then," was the reply. "You must know, Richard, that you have been appointed one of the tax collectors under the new law, and I propose that you go down to Wat's house to-morrow evening, and as Wat, I know, will be away, demand the tax of his daughter: she of course will refuse to pay it, without seeing her father, and you under pretence of taking her to prison, secretly convey her to my country house in ———, where she can be made to conform to your desires."

"But," said the other, "suppose she should scream, that would arouse the neighbours, and all would be discovered."

"Never fear," replied his father, "I will be waiting behind the house, with a handkerchief to tie over her mouth, and together we can carry off the prize. So, to-morrow night we will try it? Mind you are ready."

"Never fear me," replied the junior Wolfstien; "I will do any thing to gain Mary and revenge."

Chapter II.

The next evening, between ten and eleven o'clock, both father and son might have been seen wending their way along the road leading from their house to that of Wat Adair's.

On arriving at Adair's, old Wolfstien, as was agreed, took up his post behind the house, while the other knocked boldly at the street door.

It was opened by Mary, who started at beholding the dreaded form of Wolfstien, for ever since the night on which he rushed from the house in so much anger, she had felt a secret horror of beholding him; but, collecting her scattered and alarmed spirits, she said—

"Father is not at home, Master Wolfstien"

"Is he not, my pretty dear?" said Wolfstien, familiarly the more so, as he was not entirely sober. "Is he not? so much the better; all I want of you, my love, is six groats, for I came to get the tax, my dear little Mary," he said, leering on her.

"You will have to call when father comes home," replied Mary, trembling with fear, and attempting to pass him and go out of the door.

"Oh! no," replied Wolfstien, preventing her, "you must pay the tax or go with me."

"I will do neither, sir," replied Mary, her indignation fully aroused; "if you are a man, sir, you will cease your impertinence and depart, if not, I shall call for help."

"No, you will not," replied Wolfstien, enraged at her words, "you will go with me," and, seizing her by the waist, he attempted to force her towards him.

"Unhand me, sir!" cried Mary, "or I will scream this instant."

"Do scream, my dear, do, you look so pretty," and he attempted to kiss her.

Mary, with a great effort, threw him from her, at the same time screaming loudly.

Meanwhile Frank, who had left the house a few minutes before Wolfstien reached it, had proceeded to the village store to purchase some articles, and on his return, when at a short distance from Adair's, heard the scream of Mary.

Rushing to the house, and beholding Mary struggling in the arms of Wolfstien, he cried—

"Unhand her, villain, or I will throttle you," at the same time seizing him by the neck and throwing him with such force as to cause him to strike against an opposite wall.

"Defend yourself," cried Wolfstien, drawing his sword, "or I will murder you."

Taking down a sword of Wat's, which hung upon the wall, St. Aubrey stood upon the defensive, determining not to strike his adversary if he could avoid it.

Wolfstien, who was perfectly beside himself with rage, rushed with great fury upon St. Aubrey, who put forth his sword to parry the blow aimed at him. The other, unsteady from the liquor he had drank, struck his foot, fell heavily forward, and the sword of St. Aubry passed through his body.

Wolfstien uttered but one groan, and making even then a slight blow with his sword, fell to the floor a corpse.

"Good Heavens, Frank!" cried Mary, horrified, "what have you done? He is dead. I will call for help;" and she ran in her bewilderment out of the back door.

Old Wolfstien, who was not aware of the death of his son, instantly seized her, and, putting the handkerchief over her mouth to prevent her screaming, bore her off in triumph to his house, without, unfortunately for Mary, meeting a single person on the road.

In vain she struggled—implore or scream she could not—he only clasped her more securely, until at last she fainted in his arms from sheer exhaustion.

Leaving Mary to the tender mercies of the elder Wolfstein, we will return to the room in Adair's house, in which we left St. Aubrey standing over the dead body of his rival, his sword clotted with blood and his mind in a state of mental abberation.

In this position he had stood until those of the villagers, who were aroused from their slumbers by the cries of Mary, had hastened to the spot where to their horror and astonishment, they beheld Frank St. Aubry standing as above described over the body of Richard Wolfstien.

Struck with amazement, they instantly arrested him for the murder.

In vain he protested he was innocent of the dreadful crime of which he was accused; and stated the facts of the case to the crowd of villagers who filled the room. In vain he begged they would not take him to prison for his mother's sake; it was useless, the evidence was too glaring to believe aught in his defence.

And for Mary.—In vain a strict and scrutinizing search was made at Frank's request. No clue could be gained of her biding place, and it was soon given up as fruitless.

Some of the oldest men and women in the village shook their heads prophetically, and whispered dark hints as to the sudden disappearance of Mary Adair.

That night Frank was taken before the village squire, who, though much inclined in his behalf, and wishing to believe him innocent, could not with such strong evidence of his guilt do otherwise than commit him to the jail, to await his trial at the next Assizes, which were shortly to be held in the village.

Frank's mother, when she heard the dreadful intelligence, fell into strong convulsions, which brought on a serious illness.

The sad intelligence soon reached the ear of Frank, and caused him to feel doubly wretched, as he paced the damp and narrow cell, in which he was confined.

And Mary.—In vain he racked his brain to think what could have happened to her; for the idea of her being carried away never entered the portal of his imagination. And then to think of his poor mother lying ill, and he confined for murder; perhaps she, too, believed him guilty, there was agony in the thought, and Frank sunk upon his prison floor in misery and despair.

When Mary Adair awoke from the death-like swoon into which she had fallen, she found herself reclining upon a sofa couch in an elegantly furnished apartment, without being aware of where she was, or how she came into such a situation.

It is easily explained.—Old Wolfstien had carried Mary to his own house, where, pouring a quantity of drugged liquor down her throat, he placed her in his carriage, and, driving with all speed, reached his country house, ere Mary awoke, placed her in the above situation, and then left her, locking the room door.

The situation she was in, her being carried off, and the dreadful recollection of the murder, all pressed upon the brain of Mary like the confused and indistinct remembrance of some terrible dream.

Rising up from her couch and going to the door, with the intention of making some enquiries as to her situation, what was her surprise to find it was locked from the outside.

Dark and dreadful thoughts now crowded upon her imagination, and already she pictured to herself the possibility of Wolfstien's intending to murder her; or perhaps offer violence, which, to a being of her pure virtue, was far worse than death. Whilst her imagination was brooding over these melancholy thoughts, the room door was suddenly opened, and an old, white-haired man entered with some refreshments, which he said his master had bade him take up with his respects, and say that anything she might wish for would be given her, but that she need not expect to leave the room for certainly not less than six weeks—probably not for six months—and possibly not for years.

Having delivered this cheering intelligence, he departed, leaving Mary once more alone. She endeavored to partake of the refreshments that were spread before her, but it was in vain; the old man's words had robbed her of her appetite, and caused her to feel sick at heart. Her head felt giddy, and she sank upon the couch. A gentle sleep stole over her, and she forgot for a period her misery in slumber.

Chapter III.

Six long weary weeks to St. Aubrey had now passed since the period of his incarceration. The dreaded yet long expected day had at length arrived, the day appointed for the Assizes which was to decide his fate.

A great excitement prevailed in the village. Most of the inhabitants were inclined to believe him innocent; for he had always borne an irreproachable character. The village lawyer, who was a warm friend to St. Aubrey, promised to make every exertion to clear him of the foul imputation.

The time appointed for the trial at length arrived, and St. Aubrey, pale and bearing the traces of intense mental agony upon his brow, was placed at the bar, and pleaded "not guilty," to the charge of murder, in a clear, firm voice. All admired the noble firmness of his look, and his extremely interesting appearance. The witnesses were then called. The evidence appeared conclusive, even to the testimony of Mary, who was compelled to admit that the prisoner and Wolfstien were never upon amicable terms with each other.

The counsel on each side now addressed the jury—St. Aubrey's making a most powerful appeal in his behalf. A fatal stillness now reigned over all who were present, for the jury had retired to deliberate upon their verdict. A few minutes sufficed. A breathless calm now prevailed. A pin could almost have been heard to drop when, on their return, the question was put to the foreman of the jury—"Guilty or not guilty?"

"Guilty of wilful murder!" was the response, and a loud groan from many present proclaimed the feelings of the spectators.

The dreadful sentence of "Death!" was then passed upon the prisoner, and St. Aubrey was condemned to be executed in the short space of six days.

He uttered not a groan as the solemn words fell from the judge's lips; but when he had concluded, a deep sob told the anguish of his heart. But, collecting all his firmness, Frank followed the officer with a steady step out of the court, turning but once, and then to cast a look of deep, ineffable scorn upon old Wolfstien, who was seated among the witnesses, unsuspected. The face of the latter was lighted with a demoniacal smile of joy as he beheld the prisoner removed.

And Frank's mother. Ever since the news of his confinemeht reached her, she had been in a lingering illness, caused by grief and anxiety; and now, when she was told he was to die an ignominious death, her pure spirit could brook no more, but sank to that sleep which knows no waking—blessing Frank with her last breath, and declaring her entire belief in his innocence.

Chapter IV.

Six long tiresome weeks to Mary had now passed since she first became a captive in Wolfstien's house. During that time, he had not visited her once, for the death of his son left him no reason for detaining her, except to prevent her being present at the trial of St. Aubrey. He now determined to keep her confined until after his execution, and then, by making her swear never to reveal the secret of her captivity, secure his own person, and obtain a dreadful revenge.

One day, Mary was seated by her chamber window, gazing out in admiration at the rich scene of nature which was spread before her. All around the house, far as the eye could reach, was one vast forest, while here and there, a long wreath of smoke, curling gently upwards, till it became, as it seemed, part of the bright blue sky above, marked the situation of some humble cottage.

A clear, bright stream ran at the bottom of a grassy hill sloping from the house. The birds sang merrily as they hopped from limb to limb upon the forest trees. They were free, and poured forth the joyousness of spirits in song. How different was Mary! Taken away from her home—she knew not whither—confined in a room alone, with no companion to cheer or console her, it is not surprising she should feel overpowered with a sadness, which even the bright scene before her could not dissipate.

A gentle tear, and then another, coursed each other down her cheek, now robbed of its bloom, from anxiety and confinement. Turning sadly from the window—for it only served to nourish her melancholy feelings—she sat down to look over the newspaper of the previous day, which Dennis, the old man, had been kind enough to give her. Glancing her eye carelessly over a long column of intelligence, her attention was riveted upon the following paragraph:—

"We learn with regret, that young St. Aubrey has been found guilty of the murder of Richard Wolfstien. He has been sentenced to death, and the execution will take place in three days."

This almost overpowered her. Her head felt giddy, and she would have fallen, had it not been for Dennis, who entered the room at the instant, and supported her to a seat. Taking a glass of water which he brought her, she said—

"Thank you, Dennis,—I feel much better; but pray be seated."

"Yes, ma'am," said Dennis, complying with the request.

"Dennis," continued Mary, "I have a few questions to ask you, to which I hope you will give true and suitable answers. Will you?"

"Certainly, ma'am," replied Dennis.

"Have you any children, Dennis," continued Mary, "any that you love?"

"One," replied the other; "a daughter whom I doat on."

"Then listen to me, Dennis," said Mary. "Suppose some man should take that daughter away, unknown to you, and confine her in some secret place, to further his malicious designs against her lover;—would you blame her for endeavoring to escape?"

"Of course not," replied Dennis.

"And would you not, Dennis, think the man who guarded her should assist her in escaping?"

"Well, as for that," said Dennis, who began to see her meaning, "I can't say; but, in such a case, I rather think he ought."

"Then, Dennis," said Mary, eagerly, "you must assist me to escape. I am confined here against my will, unknown to my poor father, who I expect is torn with anxiety at my absence, merely to further the designs of that villain Wolfstien. Will you not assist me, Dennis?"

"Why it would be a great risk," he replied, musingly. "But what should I get for it?"

"Whatever you demand," said Mary. "Five hundred pounds shall be yours if you desire it. But it must be done quickly, for in three days the young man dies, and all will be in vain."

Mary then briefly related to him the circumstances of the death of Wolfstien, and when she had concluded, he inquired—

"Where do you wish to go to?"

"To London, to the King," said Mary.

"Well, I will assist you," replied Dennis. "So be ready to-night at twelve. I will have a carriage in waiting."

"Do not fail," said Mary. "You can retire, Dennis, for I need some rest."

And overpowered with fatigue and the excitement of the day, she sank upon the couch, and soon fell into a deep sleep.

She slumbered heavily for many hours, till a loud knock at the room door awakened her. Springing up and opening the door, she ushered in Dennis, who told her that all was ready.

Putting on the hood and cloak which he had brought her, they left the room together. Descending several flight of stairs, they in a short time reached the outer door. Taking down a massive iron bar, and unlocking a huge padlock, Dennis threw open the large door, and Mary once more felt the free air of Heaven press against her brow. An open wagon was standing near the door. Dennis assisted Mary into the vehicle, and in a few minutes they were travelling from the scene of her captivity, at a rapid rate.

They travelled thus for many hours, passing in their way several villages, the inhabitants of which ran out to gaze upon them, surprised at seeing a beautiful young female, in an open wagon, travelling at the rate they were, and ere noon the far-off din, striking upon the ear, proclaimed they were fast approaching the great metropolis, and the next hour she found herself comfortably situated in an inn in London.

The first thing that Mary did, after a few hours of rest, was to write a letter to her father, and the next was to send for the landlord, and, confiding in him her secret, ask his advice as to what time she could obtain an interview with the king.

The landlord, who was interested by the appearance as well as the tale of Mary, informed her that it would be impossible to obtain an interview at all, as the king was the next day to be wedded, but on his return from the church, she could throw herself at his feet, and present her petition, which he said must be in writing, as it would be impossible for her to be heard upon such an occasion.

"I will," cried Mary, "I will do any thing to save him; I will go instantly and write it."

"No, no," replied the good landlord, "you need rest, retire now, and in the morning I will assist you."

"Thank you, thank you," replied Mary," I shall never forget your kindness; but I do feel much fatigued, and will retire."

The loud shouting of the persons in the streets, the sounds of the music, and the ringing of the various bells throughout the city, awoke Mary the next morning to a sense of her misery, and of the arduous duty she was to perform on that day. She had slept long and soundly, and on descending from her room, she discovered the landlord busily engaged in writing upon a large scroll of parchment. He said he had begun the petition, and now wished the assistance of Mary.

Mary dictated from the heart, and a petition was quickly drawn up, couched in terms sufficiently warm to move a heart of stone. By the time it was completed, the great noise in the street proclaimed that the procession had started. Mary was quickly prepared, and taking the arm of her kind friend, they succeeded in obtaining, after much trouble and fatigue, (for the crowd was immense,) a situation near where the king was to pass.

Poor Mary! her heart sank within her, as she thought of the slight possibility of the king's noticing her petition upon such an occasion, and amid the din which resounded from every quarter in her ears. The king was now passing within a short distance from Mary, and the procession, happily for her, just then paused to allow the advance to proceed.

"Now, now is the time, Mary," cried the landlord.

Mary hesitated but for an instant. The gallows, with all its attendant horrors, mingled with the form of St. Aubrey, rose before the imagination. In an instant she had decided, and rushing through the crowd that surrounded the person of the king, she threw herself upon her knees at his carriage wheels.

"Gracious monarch," cried Mary, bursting into tears, "I beseech you to read this petition. Grant it for God's sake, and the blessings of thousands shall rest upon the head of our sovereign."

The king, who was about proceeding in the royal carriage, appeared moved by the earnestness of her appeal, paused for an instant, and replied:

"Madam, this shall be attended to."

"But," cried Mary, "the young man dies to-morrow."

The words were lost upon the king, who turned to his ministers. The trumpets sounded, and the procession moved on.

Mary rose, staggered, and would have fallen, had not the strong arm of her father arrested her. She felt no more, but sunk into a deep swoon.

Wat had not received the letter from Mary, apprising him of her arrival, until that morning. He immediately hastened to inform St. Aubrey, (who lay in the jail, awaiting his execution,) of the joyful intelligence, but was denied admission. He then lost no time in departing for London. On arriving at the inn, he learned, to his chagrin and disappointment, that Mary and the landlord had already departed. He had followed, hoping to meet them, in which he fortunately succeeded, at the crisis just mentioned.

When Mary again awoke to consciousness, she found herself reclining upon her couch, in her room at the inn, where she was staying, with the form of her father bending over her.

"Father, dear father," cried Mary, and the next moment she was strained to his breast. A long explanation ensued, Wat declaring that he had from the first believed Frank to be innocent.

"But how is he? Have you seen him?" eagerly inquired Mary.

"Yes," replied Wat, "a few days since; he is well, but in very low spirits; he requested me to give you this lock of hair as a last gift."

"Here the old man paused, for a tear drop trembled in his eye, and Mary, resting her head upon his bosom, sobbed bitterly.

"Cheer up, cheer up, my child," cried Wat; "the All-seeing eye above will deliver him from danger."

The words of her father fell like sweet music upon the ear of Mary, and she felt that whoever puts their trust in God, rests upon a pillar strong as adamant.

Wretchedly did Mary pass that night, ever and anon awaking from her troubled sleep, with a scream, as some terrible vision of Frank's execution would rise before her. The morning dawned at last, the dreadful morn, and Mary watched the first approach of day with a heart overcharged with grief and bitterness, for it brought with it the death knell of St. Aubrey. Eight—nine—ten o'clock struck with fearful sounds upon her ear. It was now the hour of his execution, and no news of a pardon had yet arrived.—Each stroke of the bell shot like an arrow to the heart of Mary, and burying her head beneath the cover, she endeavored in vain to shut out the dreadful sound. A few minutes after, the door opened, and Mary expected to hear her father proclaim the death of St. Aubrey. But no, that was not his step. And yet, who else could it be? She uncovered her head and gazed out. Oh, joy! It was, it was St. Aubrey!

"My God, I thank thee!" cried Mary, springing from her couch in her night dress, and regardless, in that moment, of all conventional rules, she fell into his arms.

"Dear, dear Mary," cried St. Aubrey, "how long have we been parted!" and he strained the noble girl to his bosom.

After the first burst of joy had subsided, Mary said, "How are you free?"

"By your noble heroism," replied St. Aubrey, "I was pardoned; your father brought it to me himself."

At this happy juncture Wat entered the room, his eyes glistening with happiness, bringing with him the intelligence that Wolfstien had been arrested for high treason, and would suffer the same fate he was so anxious for St. Aubrey.

Mary and St. Aubrey were now completely happy. The king, hearing the tale of Wolfstien's villainy, and pleased with the noble conduct of St. Aubrey, appointed him to fill a station of honor. Old Wat now no longer opposed the union, but consented, and gave his blessing on it.

If my readers can imagine twelve years to have elapsed since the period of the ending of my tale, I will once more convey them to the great city of London, not to the inn mentioned in this tale, the landlord of which had long since gone to rest beneath the church yard sod, but to a handsomely furnished apartment in a house in Belgrave Square.

A merry, crackling fire blazed in the grate. A handsome round table, with a bright lamp upon it, stood at a short distance from the fire. Seated around this table were three grown persons. One was an old man, whose silvered head proclaimed his advanced yet hale and hearty age. A fine looking boy sat upon his knee, and listened with breathless interest to an old legend with which the other was entertaining him. The second, a fine looking young man, was engaged in reading, but ever and anon raised his eyes from the page he was perusing, to cast a look of deep, unutterable affection, upon a female who sat opposite to him, engaged in sewing. She was yet beautiful, although the mother of the boy, and a bright, blue-eyed girl who was playing at her feet.

Kind reader, need I say that the first was Wat Adair—the other Frank St. Aubrey—and the woman—you have guessed it ere now—THE BLACKSMITH'S DAUGHTER herself.

HAST THOU NOT LOVED?

BY C. FARRELL BUCKINGHAM.

Hast thou not loved ere in that hour,
Thy gentle smile attracted me;
When first in beauty's blooming bower
I bow'd in constancy to thee?
Say, lady, say, has not a chain,
Of fond affection or of art,
Bound by another to remain,
Been sever'd from thy youthful heart?

Oh! have not fond affection's flowers
Been doom'd to droop and to decay;
Or thrown by thee, in thoughtless hours,
Like idle, worthless weeds away?
Then, lady, if indeed thou'st loved,
Ere at thy shrine I bow'd my knee;
And if thy heart hast fickle proved,
Will it not prove the same to me?

There is a beauty and a bliss,
In woman's faithful sigh and tear;
And if there's joy in life 'tis this:
To know and prove her heart sincere.
For she whose smile is fix'd on none,
But may alike on many fall;
Can ne'er deserve the faith of one,
And never should be lov'd at all.

The heart that will its faith forsake,
And its first holy vow deny,
Will never hesitate to break
The second, and without a sigh.
Then, lady, say, hast thou not lov'd,
Ere at thy feet I fondly bow'd?
Has not thy bosom idle proved,
The language that its faith had vow'd?

Oh! think not that I ask to throw
One shadow on thy constancy;
I only sigh and seek to know,
That like my own, thy heart is free.
If happiness to man is given,
If there's a bliss beneath the sun,
'Tis found within that earthly heaven,
The heart that dearly loves but one.

THE WIDOW'S SON.

A STORY OF REAL LIFE.

BY ROBERT MORRIS, ESQ.

"Lift thy palsied head, shake off the gloom
That overhangs the borders of thy tomb;
See Nature gay as when she first began
With smiles alluring her admirer man."—[COWPER.

Chapter I.

It was a night in December. The scene was Washington city. The moon was up, her light was dimmed by clouds, but ever and anon she broke forth in all her splendor, brightening the marble buildings of the Capitol with a silvery lustre. The weather was raw and unpleasant, and the dark clouds of the west seemed to threaten an approaching snow-storm. The few persons in the streets—for the hour was late—hurried rapidly along, apparently anxious to get within doors. And yet the night was not without its beauty and its moral. The clouds rolled slowly on in detached masses—now dark and lowering, and for a moment shutting out the light of the glorious moon, which only shone forth with the more beauty when they passed from before her face. Thus it is with many of the shadows of human life. The light of truth—the glory of virtue may be darked for a moment, but they will only shine out the purer and brighter in the end. While musing in this strain, and wandering thoughtfully along the great avenue of the Capitol—now with eyes directed to the scenes above, and now meditating upon the political storms and shadows in which the destinies of the country were measurably involved, a figure came reeling from a public house. It was that of a man of thirty-five. I paused for an instant, and soon discovered that the object before me was not only unable to walk with any thing like steadiness, but that every new effort seemed to grow more desperate.

"Only a drunkard," briefly observed another passer-by, and hastened on.

"Only a drunkard!" I mentally exclaimed. "But the night is cold and bleak, a storm threatens, and the miserable man, unless cared for, may be a stiffened corse before morning. I am a stranger here, too—away from friends and home; and is it not a possible case that this poor wretch may be some disappointed office-hunter—some unfortunate applicant for justice at the hands of the nation, who, heart-sick and hopeless, has permitted himself to be overcome in a weak and reckless hour by the fiend of intemperance?—Despair may have maddened him for the time. He may have a wife, a mother, at home—friends who love and cherish him, and he must not be left to perish."

Musing thus, and rapidly, and touched more, it is possible, because Washington was a strange place for to me, I approached the reeling man with the object of ascertaining, if possible, who he was, to what extent he was intoxicated, and where he lodged. At this instant, a cloud which had hid the moon passed on, and the light of the queen of night shone directly into the face of the drunkard.

I started back in surprise. Can it be? I asked myself. The features were greatly distorted—the eyes glared with brutality—and yet I was not mistaken. Before me stood the Hon. George Wallingford, one of the most gifted members of Congress—a man to whose eloquence, wit and argument I had listened only the day before in the House of Representatives with delight and pride—delight produced by the splendor of his genius, and pride that one so young should not only be able thus to address the assembled representatives of the nation, but that he should so nobly vindicate the principles and the beauty of republicanism, and hurl back in trumpet tones upon our libellers the scorn of a justly indignant and truly patriotic spirit. On that occasion he was "the observed of all observers." The galleries were thronged with beauty and fashion—all ranks and ages drank in his strains of eloquence—many envied him his rare talents, and all accorded him praise of the warmest kind. The effort throughout was masterly. Even his best friends were astonished as well as delighted, and when he closed with a peroration that thrilled like a trumpet through the hearts of his countrymen, and brought the blood with a richer glow to the cheeks of the fair creatures who bent their eyes upon him, his colleagues hurried around him with eager looks and warm expressions of congratulation. That speech alone was calculated to win him a high character as a statesman and an orator; and although his abilities had before been appreciated by his immediate constituents, they would now be made known to the multitude of millions throughout this broad republic. I remember well the feelings of that hour. All seemed roused, excited, and carried away for the time.—The name of the member from Georgia was in every one's mouth; some of his finest expressions were on the lips of all who paid attention to such subjects; and, except when the dark spirit of envy would embitter the heart and palsy the tongue, his eulogy was universal. I returned to Gadsby's that afternoon with a subdued opinion of myself. I felt that I had been in the presence of one of the nobler spirits of the times—of one who possessed a peculiar gift of mind—who enjoyed the high faculty of moving by the magic of his influence the hearts of thousands of his fellow-creatures.

Imagine my feelings, then, when I saw this being before me on the subsequent night—unable to articulate a single sentence distinctly—paralyzed in mind and in body—God's noblest work brutalized—the soaring principle of genius darkened and degraded—the idol of another hour now a scorn and a disgrace to civilization and humanity. Never did the horrors of intemperance appear in colors so vivid—never was the dreadful power of the rum fiend made so distinctly apparent.

I took the arm of the miserable man, and asked where he lodged. Some time elapsed, and in vain I endeavored to make out his answer. He was utterly lost to propriety and a sense of shame, and, instead of exhibiting a willingness to be taken home, was eager to return to the tavern. His reason was wholly blinded. His tongue refused its office. His body seemed fastened by some awkward mechanicism to his legs, and in his efforts to move he reminded me of the wooden toys made to amuse children during the Christmas holydays. It was now near midnight, and the spectacle was most melancholy.—He could not walk; the tavern in which he had passed the evening was closed; he could not describe his place of residence, and it was impossible for me to carry him to my lodgings. Thus situated, a servant came by—one of Gadsby's—who, on being questioned, said that the Hon. Mr. Wallingford had rooms at the house of Mr. Jones, about three squares off, and that his mother also resided there!

"His mother!" Heavens, what a shock to have her son borne to her in such a condition! Exulting, too, as she no doubt had been, with all the love of a mother's heart, at the triumphant effort of that son the day before! How soon was the cup of joy to be dashed from her lips! With what an agony of grief would she note his appearance and condition! He was "her only son, and she a widow!" How readily would she yield up her life to know him freed from that one infirmity—that dark curse which hovered about him like a fiend, and touched, as with the scathing desolation of the lower world, the glory of his brightest moments! Oh! what had she not dreamed since his triumph of yesterday! How it would stimulate him to avoid the rock on which he had so often been wrecked, when he knew that the eyes of his whole country would be directed towards him—when his constituents should hear of his master effort—his indulgent constituents, who had so frequently overlooked his youthful indiscretions! Yes—she felt convinced that he would reform—that he would avoid the tempting cup—that he would remember his dead father's former name and fame—his mother's unbounded affection—his own promising career.

These, and thoughts like these, thronged through the brain of that delighted mother! Heaven seemed to open its brightest hopes before her, and she fell upon her knees and thanked God for such a son, and prayed that he might for the future avoid the fatal habit which had already weakened his frame and impaired his character. She rose from her bed-side, and looked wistfully, and not without some misgivings into the wide avenue before her window.

"Hark! what sound is that? Merciful Heaven—what forms are those? Three figures—one of them borne in the arms of others. A little longer support me, Father of mercies—God of the fatherless!"

"This way—this way!" and before the straining and almost maniac gaze of that devoted mother was laid the unconscious form of her gifted, but drunkard son! * * * * *

Chapter II.

I was detained in the city of Washington for several weeks. Claims upon government—applications for office, are not passed upon there with very great haste in most cases. Cabinet members are sometimes difficult to access, except to the favored few, and they soon learn the courtier art of postponing from day to day every thing like a definite answer, while they delight—such is the perversity of power and of human nature—in fanning the desires of the heart with just sufficient force to keep them from expiring. Alas! for the victims of hope delayed. Alas! for the children of despair who have gone to the Capitol for justice, and left with shattered constitutions, exhausted purses, and bitterness of spirit. I have seen gray-headed men lingering for hours around the doors of some of the favourites of momentary power, having gained access to the presence of the great for the time, frozen almost speechless by an iciness of manner—an assumed formality, which cut to the heart, and repelled every thing like promise or expectation. It is so, perhaps, in all countries. It may be, too, that the dispensers of public office and bounty are compelled, by the force of circumstances, to the number of claimants, and the many impostors and pretenders among them, to be brief, formal, and often harsh in their interviews. But they should remember, nevertheless, that the diffident and meritorious only are to be driven from their objects by such a course. The bold and reckless—the cunning and profligate, understanding the ways of the world and the arts of political aspirants, anticipate and are prepared for such treatment. They are not to be rebuked by a single repulse, but bide their time, seek their opportunity—discover the weak points in the great—the secret channels to their favour. Thus it is that our public stations are occasionally dishonoured by men who have little reputation with those who know them best—mere adventurers, who make politics a trade, and who are ready to fawn and play the parisite at any footstool. A stranger, therefore, to these arts, and this description of trick and management, who went to press the suit of another, found it at the time of which I speak, exceeding difficult to reach the fountain head of power, and in such a manner as to enable him to tell the whole truth, and state his case fully and with a consciousness of having discharged his duty. Thus it was that the writer of this sketch lingered week after week at the seat of government, frequently at a loss for means of proper occupation. One evening his attention was arrested by the announced visit of a band of WASHINGTONIANS, among them one or two able speakers. A meeting was to take place at 8 P. M. The promised history of one who had passed the years of his young manhood in gaiety and dissipation—who had wasted a large fortune—who had recently become a convert to the water principle, and who now battled earnestly in the good cause, excited no little interest in the minds of many; and, at the appointed hour, I found myself amidst a throng of hundreds, some animated by curiosity, others by new-born zeal in the great reform, and others, again, by the desire to mingle in and be seen in a crowd. The opening speakers made only a slight impression. What they said was well enough; but it was an old story, told in the old way, with the usual form, and their remarks indicated little fire or enthusiasm, and were without a ray of genius. The third speaker was a reformed spendthrift, rake, and inebriate. His name is now as familiar to all who have paid the least attention to the subject, as household words; but, at the time of which I write, he had but recently entered the arena, and his reputation was but rising into a just appreciation. He was now to speak for the first time in the city of Washington, in the presence, it might be, of some of the distinguished representatives of the nation—men who were familiar with all the arts of oratory, and who could detect an impostor or a pretender with the first five sentences that he uttered. This view evidently impressed and influenced the Washingtonian. His personal appearance was manly and dignified; his voice was clear, powerful, and musical; his mind, it soon became apparent, was richly stored and polished, while his whole soul seemed devoted to the good cause. He had not been fifteen minutes upon his feet before the eyes of the audience brightened under the influence of his eloquence, and the blood passed through their veins with a more rapid motion. His figures were apt and natural; his gestures graceful, easy, and forcible, while the air of earnest truth and deep conviction with which he enforced his positions, maintained his arguments, and appealed to the hearts and minds of his hearers, thrilled, agitated, and delighted. The cause under his advocacy became that of religion, virtue, and humanity. The smiles of Heaven were made to rest upon it and its friends; the rapid approach of the millenium was identified with its progress, and the world seemed to glow and brighten with good deeds and pure principles, as the white banners of temperance were borne in holy triumph among the nations. His own story was detailed. His reckless boyhood; his vicious manhood; his disregard of paternal counsels; his neglect of friends and family; his sacrifice of reputation; his loss of fortune; his degradation of body and mind, until he became hateful to himself and a disgrace to all of his name! And then the fiend of self-murder more than once whispered frightful subtleties to him. Love and friendship and kindness and charity, all abandoned him, and he hurried to the intoxicating madness of his destroyer to dim and darken the thoughts of his own mind. In his early time he had loved, deeply and tenderly, and the passion had been returned with all the fondness and truth of a virgin heart. But even this darling dream of his soul was dispelled by his brutalizing devotion of the rum fiend, and he gradually abandoned beauty and truth and virtue, for the blasting, bloating, and crime-producing monster of intemperance. In the maniac embraces of this demon, he was lost for a time—aye, for months and months, and the audience, could he give a faithful picture of what he was in his darkest hour, would not recognize the same being in the individual who addressed them. But he was never wholly forsaken. At times his better genius whispered—"all is not yet lost. Life still remains. The path of reform is still open.—Awake, arise—burst the bonds of the tyrant, and be free again." This voice grew fainter and fainter as he descended the downward path. Often, in his momentary gleams of virtue and penitence, he determined to retrace his steps. But the task was, indeed, difficult. His nerves were tremulous; his strength was as a child's, and death seemed but a short distance in futurity. Thus situated, he was seized with a frightful illness, and lay upon the bed of a benevolent friend for weeks. His constitution was an iron one, and gradually his strength came back to him. Then it was that the visions of the past thronged upon his brain. Then he saw the deep abyss over which he had trembled. Then shame, pride, and all the nobler feelings of his nature appealed to him. He knew his danger. He knew that he must become a pledged man before he left the chamber, or he was lost.—Even at that hour, the craving fiend that he had created within struggled for the mastery, and with a power that none but those who were or had been drunkards could appreciate. Once more among his dissolute companions, and his resolutions of amendment would fade like the mist in the morning sun.—He knelt by his bed-side and invoked the aid of Heaven. He acknowledged his infirmity, confessed his weakness, and sought assistance from above. His prayer was answered. A new strength seemed infused into his being. He sent for his friend, and subscribed to the pledge in the most formal manner.—"From that hour,"—and here his figure rose to its full height, his voice gathered fresh power, and his eyes brightened with rekindled fire—he continued—"I have felt myself a man—a being above the brute—the possessor of a mind and a soul—a candidate for immortality."

"Think me not a fanatic," he proceeded, "believe me no impostor. I feel that I am but yet an insignificant object in the vast scale of creation—a creature, once prostrate and degraded, but now animated with the spark of intellect and the attributes of reason imparted by the Creator for wise and benevolent purposes. These God-like gifts were perverted, misdirected, for a long portion of my life; and in the effort to win from the downward path of intemperance the hundreds who have gone astray, who are still vainly struggling to escape the meshes of the paralyzer, I do but manifest a proper appreciation of my own reform. Are there any such here to-night? Any who have mothers, wives, or sisters, to whom they still cling with affection in their hours of sanity? Any who are gifted by the Deity with minds of light, knowledge, and power, intended for the benefit of their fellow man, but weakened and palsied by the curse of the demon from whose embraces I have so recently escaped? If any such hear me, let them profit by my example—let them come forward; now is the time, this is the hour. No man need be ashamed of throwing off the black robe of the drunkard for the white garment of temperance. Let us triumph over ourselves. Let us live for those who love us. Let us rejoice that we are men, and prove ourselves worthy the attributes of intellect, of reason, and of civilization."

With these words, the speaker descended from the platform, and took his station at a table that had been prepared for the purpose. The hundreds in attendance were touched and excited, as much, perhaps, by the manner as the language of the orator. A buzz of approbation passed through the room. Several young men, whose feelings had been interested, were already at the table attaching their names to the pledge. Spell-bound, in some measure, by the scene, and anxious to notice the effect still further, I moved toward the group. Many had already signed. And now a sensation of no ordinary character ran through the assembly. All eyes were directed in one quarter. A tall, thin figure approached the stand. The astonished crowd bent forward with anxious looks and held their breath in suspense and interest. The object of so much notice was George Wallingford, the gifted representative from Georgia—the orator whose speech in the House had won such universal eulogy—the stranger, whose almost lifeless form I had assisted in bearing to the chamber of his mother.

"Will he sign—will he sign?" was the exclamation, half suppressed, but still audible, which broke from many a lip.

His step was firm—his resolution decisive.

"Room—room for Mr. Wallingford!"

With a faint smile playing upon his features, he took the pen that was so cheerfully tendered him, bowed slightly, and, in acknowledgment to the kindred spirit whose eloquent appeal had so moved him, affixed his name to the Pledge, and stood up before the world a redeemed man!

But who shall paint the feelings of his aged mother, at that glorious consummation of her dearest hopes? The tears of joy rolled down her time-worn cheeks, as she bowed herself in gratitude and thanked the God of the fatherless that he had heard and responded to her prayers—that he had saved her son!

I'LL THINK OF THEE.

I'll think of thee when morning light
In roseate beams bursts o'er the sea;
And when the stars make ev'ning bright,
Still, still, loved one, I'll think of thee.

When flowers hang down their heads in sleep,
And song is hushed in every tree,
The moon doth still her vigils keep,
So I will watch and think of thee.

And should a tear my eyelids stain,
With all hard fate hath dealt to me,
Mem'ry will breathe thy voice again,
And smiles will come with thoughts of thee.

For art thou not the star whose ray
Alone shines forth from shadow free?
The rainbow in life's weary way
To cheer me on, I find in thee.

Farewell, when free from care thou art,
And pleasure's charms forgotten be,
Give one kind thought to him whose heart
In weal or woe still doats on thee.

And should I ne'er behold thee more,
Until life's weary years are gone,
Meet me on heaven's hallowed shore,
Where brighter joys may on us dawn.

THE TWO SISTERS.

A Valuable and Instructive Story,

IN THE SHAPE OF A VERY AGREEABLE VISION.

BY MISS SEDGWICK.

I walked out on a bright morning, early in May, when Nature was unsealing her fountains of life and beauty. The rivers, brooks, all the watercourses down to the tiniest rill, were filled to the brim by the nursing rains of Spring. Their voices, from the gushing torrent to the little silver thread of a stream that softly stole through the meadow, sung their release from their winter prison. The violet was opening its blue eye, the anemone starring the fresh herbage, and all the early flowers, like chary maidens, were timidly unfolding their beauties. The willows along the river side were already in full leaf and tasselled, and the shrubs were fragrant with outbudding life. On the hillside, the young leaves of the bench and maple, mingling with the dark foliage of the firs which had braved and outlasted Winter, looked like youth gracefully sporting around old age. And in beautiful harmony with this was the bright green of the winter grain, contrasted with the sombre brown of the newly-ploughed earth, dotted with potato-crops, and just perforated by the sun-loving Indian corn. Cattle were keenly feeding on the fresh grass of the low-lands, and sheep nibbling on the hill-side. The birds had come to their summer home and pleasant tasks.—The males were singing, wooing, and roving at their own wild will, while the females, good wives and household dames, were providing for the future lords of the aerial creation. The air was filled with the sound of young life: with the familiar cries of the domestic birds, and the flutter and hum of millions of insects. The sky was bright and clear, save where a breezy cloud sailed over it, so light that it dissolved while my eye followed it.

I sat down on a fallen trunk of a tree, under a curtain of budding grape-vines. I felt satisfied with the mere pleasure of existence. I wondered at those who stayed at home, and drudged over household tasks, when Nature was proclaiming a holyday that might waken to joyous life, and call forth the dullest human snail housed in its winter's shell.

By degrees the monotonous music of the brook lulled me into forgetfulness. I fell into a drowsy revery, and from revery to sleep, but not sleep of an ordinary kind. My senses preserved their power, unshackled by gross mortal elements, and unlimited in their action by time or space. I seemed suddenly endowed with the clairvoyance of the Mesmerites, but with this remarkable advantage over them, that while they ask faith in startling novelties, I only received and impart self-evident truths. I was not conscious of any change in the vividness of my sensations. The scene was distinctly before me as while I was awake; the only difference was an indefinite extension of power. As I gazed, two lovely forms appeared before me, as if the air had become incorporate; so fresh with youth and beauty, that they seemed like an impersonation of the spring time.—The one was a Hebe in form and expression; her garments were light and flowing, in no sort constraining, impeding, or encumbering her. She gathered the sweet buds at her feet, and the anemones from the moist margin of the brook, and wove them together in a circlet for her brow, which no care had ever touched. Her companion wore an amaranth wreath as a symbol of immortality. She had not quite the plumpness and freshness of her sister—for sisters they were—but there was a spirituality in her expression that indicated a celestial destiny. Hers was the beauty of reflection—something that swelled up from a living fountain in the soul;—her sister's the result of a felicitous animal condition. I asked their names. "Our names," replied the elder, "are implied in our offices. Observe the one, and you will know the other."

I did observe them, and, as I said before, without limit of time or space, and I soon learned that their mission was to bless the human race, but that, powerful as they were, nothing could be effected without the co-operation of those to whom they were sent.

Strange to say, they were most praised when absent. Every one theoretically acknowledged their worth, and agreed in admiring their beauty, but few cherished them; some seemed stupidly unconscious of their presence, and many grossly abused them to their faces; but the moment their backs were turned, they were regretted and praised. Nothing was enjoyed without them; they were sought by sacrifice and pilgrimage; and if their favour was irrecoverable, life was one long complaint, made up of suffering days and sleepless nights.

She of the amaranth wreath did sometimes linger with those her sister had abandoned. She could not remove, but she sanctified their sufferings, and shed an attractive light over them, that drew their friends around them even more than when they were the favourites of her beautiful sister. This I marked, she only stayed at the bidding of Religion. No inferior power could detain her after her sister was gone.

There was no habitable place on the globe which the sisters did not visit; but as I naturally felt most interested in their mission in my own country, I here most narrowly observed them. One sad confession truth compels me to make. I saw fewer signs of their friendship among my own country-people than elsewhere. Their intimates could never be mistaken; there was a certain clearness in their eyes, brightness on their cheeks, elasticity in their movements, and animation in their voices, that infallibly betokened the proximity and favour of the sisters.

"Why," I asked with some impatience, "why this partiality? why do you so soon forsake my people, when I see you abroad with English men and women, in parks, gardens, and pleasure grounds, maintaining with them a hearty friendship through the seven stages of life; you follow, too, the poor Swiss mountaineers, and dwell with them under the shadow of their icy mountains, faring hard and working hard for a hundred years; and you sit down on the sunny side of a street with the lean and hungry Italian beggar, who shouts and laughs cheerily at your side, till the old pilgrim drops from your bosom into the grave."

"We are not capricious," they replied, with dignity; "we are the ordained companions of your race, and by a law superior to us, we cling to them till driven away by ignorance, neglect, or misuse. Listen, and learn some of the reasons that weaken our friendship with your people, and so often expel us from their society; for it is they, and not we, that break the compact Nature has made between us.

"We love their children, and bid them forth into the open air, where the sun can send its vital heat through their expanding frames, and where the fresh breath of Heaven may light their eyes and colour their cheeks. You will hear our voices merrily ringing wherever they are found coursing down the icy hills in winter, and loudest and blithest are we among the skaters on the moonlit lake. When the ball-playing time comes, we are on the village green with the first, and we linger with the last. We follow them to the woodlands, brush off the dew from their early footsteps, welcome them abroad on a bright frosty morning, and bravely face the winter's wind with them. Nor do we desert the children of the city if rightly welcomed there, if treated to early hours and temperate meals. But they must trundle their hoops through the parks with us. We are stifled in close nurseries. We cannot sit by the little victims while their heads are drooping over lessons in unventilated school-rooms for six consecutive hours. We cannot breathe in dormitories, with forty pairs of lungs inhaling, over and over again, an exhausted atmosphere. Our hearts would die within us if condemned to walk in the funeral processions of boarding-school girls. Our lives are in the open air. Those who would have our constant presence, our heartiest love, must follow us afield. One of your poets has said,

'God made the country, and man made the town;'

and we say, God ordained the out-door life, and man the in-door.

"We pity those who are condemned by conventional life, or the artificial condition of society, to violate some of our laws; but while they respect and cherish us, we do not utterly desert them. We have been driven away from the hard-tasked and ill-fed operatives of the Old World, but we are on very good terms with the buxom, light-hearted (because lightly-tasked) girls in your manufactories. Tell them a secret for us: if they will come oftener abroad to meet us, we will send them back to their labour with fresher spirits and prettier looks. Beauty cannot endure without us after youth. Your very young women are beautiful, but with their youth and freshness their beauty vanishes. Virtuous through all the stages of life we acknowledge them to be, but without us their very goodness is often a toil and weariness. Were they but true to us, their smiles would be spontaneous, and their well-doings an enjoyment.

"You see we never desert those who live in the open air, whether they browse on coarse edibles, or fare sumptuously every day; whether they be clothed in fine linen or in rags; and yet you expect us to house ourselves with you in rooms heated to a degree that sears your skins, inflames your eyes, and dries away the very fountains of life. Pardon our frankness," they continued, pointing to some shallow vessels for personal purification; "look at the broad reservoirs of water and deep fonts in our temples; we cannot abide these things. You reproach us, but our alienation from your people is not our fault. All classes and conditions among you reject us. We offer to give gladness to the days of your students, and refreshment to their nights, but they refuse the conditions of our friendship, and languish and stupefy over their books. Your sedentary men are deaf to our warnings and invitations, and before half the term of life is spent, they are weary and wasted, and disappear, leaving half their tasks undone. Your merchants, knowing we hate the whole brood of care, heap anxiety on anxiety, and toil on toil, till, bending under an accumulation of riches or poverty, it matters little which, they turn to seek our favour, and find an impassable gulf between us.

"We seek rural life, and trudge afield with your farmer; but, alas! we have complaints to make of him. We have again and again declared our antipathy to fresh bread and hot cakes, and yet he asks us to breakfast on them. We repair to his meridian meal, and he offers us hard salted meat and fried messes; and when we join the pleasant gathering round the tea-table, we are compelled to fly for our lives from poisonous sweetcakes and sweetmeats."

"But surely," said I, "you have devoted friends among our people. There are colleges endowed to train your ministers, and every paper we read is filled with promises to restore to your society and friendship all who, by any accident, misfortune, or fault, have lost them. Every town has innumerable arsenals. Every village has its storehouse, filled with philters and charms, which these, your ministers, profess so to compound and administer, as to restore your gladdening presence to every mortal that seeks you."

A sad smile passed over the sisters' faces, and the elder, drawing near to me, said, in a subdued voice, "Save us from our friend; wisdom, skill and virtue, some of them possess, but they work in the dark; and though they now and then make some fortunate guesses, they have made few discoveries. They have been well compared to a watchmaker, who should attempt to repair a watch of which he could not see the machinery. Besides, among these our professed friends, are a mass of ignorant pretenders, and in their hands these charms and philters are deadly poisons, and those to whom they are given stumble and blunder on after us with stiffened joints, weak and blunder on after us with stiffened joints, weak and withering limbs, sunken cheeks, loosened teeth, aching jaws, and all the pains and aches which flesh is heir to.

"But," she concluded, the light shadow that had fallen on her joyous face passing from it, "the condition of your race here and elsewhere is improving, and these evils will vanish before the progress of experience, knowledge and virtue. The time is coming when we shall have a league of friendship with you from the breezy hills of the North, to the orange groves of the South; then will we give life to life, and make it the happy and profitable service God intended it to be."

Who were these sisters? All ye of the blooming cheek and strong heart answer from your own happy consciousness, "Health and Cheerfulness."

Christmas Hymn for Children.

BY REV. G. W. BETHUNE.

From Heaven above, in pitying love,
For us in sin and danger,
Thou cams't a child, all undefiled,
To Bethlehem's lowly manger;
And yet a youth, with fervent truth
And wisdom beyond measure,
Grey doctors heard, from thy sweet word,
Thy holy Father's pleasure.

Hosanna! Hosanna!
O blessed Jesus Christ!
So may we sing, to thee our King,
Hosanna in the highest!

In thy brief hour of fame and power,
The earnest mothers sought thee,
And thou didst bless, with glad caress,
Each little child they brought thee.
And when to greet thee, Salem's street
With anthems loud was ringing,
The praise most dear, to thy meek ear,
Came from the children's singing.

Hosanna! Hosanna!
O blessed Jesus Christ!
Now hear us sing, to thee our King,
Hosanna in the highest!

Though Heaven doth bow before thee now,
Thy mercy ever sees us,
For angels own thee, on thy throne,
God's holy child, O! Jesus.
To follow thee, on earth shall be
Our constant strong endeavor,
That when we die, above the sky
We all may live forever.

Hosanna! Hosanna!
O blessed Jesus Christ!
Then shall we sing, to thee our King,
Hosanna in the highest!

A LUCKY SHOT;
Or, Love at First Sight.

THE GRADUATE'S STORY.

BY MRS. C. THERESA CLARKE.

"What luck, my boys?" demanded old Squire Tompkins as Harry and I, after leisurely strolling up the avenue, threw down our game bags on the porch.

"Capital sport—glorious! I'll assure you!" returned the young scape-grace; "but Phil here, has made the most of his time—he not only brought down a covy of wild ducks, but two or three brace of pheasants and a woodcock; whilst your dutiful son came very near taking the life of as lovely a creature as ever the sun shone on, to the manifest detriment of his neck!"

"A girl?—you don't mean to say that, Hal?"

"Yes, but I do, though. Egad! wasn't she a beauty? Cheeks like damask roses—lips that Jove might have stooped to press—twin cherries—bear witness, Phil—and then, such eyes! Whew! I can't describe them! The effect was such that I have been half blind ever since."

"Come! come! you dog! no joking now," said his father, with a serio-comic expression, which was truly ludicrous—"be explicit, and to the point at once."

"By the mass, so I have been!" cried the irreverent 'Soph,' who presumed much upon the wonted good nature of his sire.

"Sir," said I, "with your permission, I will give you a true version of the affair, for you can get nothing out of him, unless he's in the humor."

"Fact," laconically responded the Squire.

"Well, you see, sir,"—I was stopped short with "remember your promise," and no "tales out of school," that effectually shut my mouth for the present, and indeed for the whole period of my "rustication;" for, though I blush to acknowledge it, some boyish freak had drawn down on my unfortunate head the displeasure of the powers that then presided over our ancient and much-respected "Alma Mater," which caused my exile for a brief space, from its venerable walls. Hal and I were chums in the strictest sense of the word, and the hospitality of his father's house was ever extended to me, a stranger from my native soil.

"Foiled the old man, decidedly. Put him on the wrong scent after all, didn't we, hey?" exclaimed Harry, with a triumphant glance at myself, when the Squire quitted the room: for owing to a sort of original suggestion in the way of sundry pinchings, and jostlings of the elbows, which I did not take, and a pretty heavy tread on a tender corn which I did, I had trumped up a roundabout story of an old woman in search of a stray cow, which seemed to satisfy both parties.

We had been out since early in the morning shooting in the wood at a short distance, and had met with but indifferent success. At length my friend spied something moving in the the tangled brush, which he at once supposed to be a very common wild bird and levelling his piece, without a moment's reflection took aim, and fired—at the instant a faint shriek was heard, and a female figure darted from the thicket where she had been hidden by clustering vines from our sight. Ere the report had subsided, the young man rushed forward to allay her alarm and beg forgiveness for being its occasion, for frightened, the poor girl certainly was, and not without reason; she had just met with a narrow, a hair-breadth escape; yet was Harry no less so, though he knew she had received no personal injury, the bird still fluttering with its death wound at our feet, but his feelings on this occasion nearly overcame him, and he could only grasp the hand of the fair being he strove to detain, who would have fled our presence like the timorous fawn from the pursuit of the hunter. Rallying her self-possession, however, to his hurried regrets and protestations, she replied sweetly and courteously, adding that she had nothing to forgive, and that she was sorry for having put herself in the way of his rifle—having been thus exposed to a fatal accident. She had come thither to gather berries, and in this little sequestered nook had discovered some particularly fine ones, which she had just stooped to secure when her eye caught the flash, and she had scarce time to dodge before the bird fell from the bough, and she saw the peril in which she had been placed: her dress harmonizing in its dark hues with the shades around, they were easily blended together. Declining his offer to see her home, she bade us a smiling adieu, and was soon lost to our view in the depths of the forest.

"Confound it!" cried Harry, who remained standing upon the same spot, full ten minutes after she had quitted us. "Confound this sleepy head of mine, for forgetting to ask her name."

"Just what I was thinking of—but no matter," said I; "you can easily find out. In such a corner of a country place as yours, one knows everybody, and I dare say your father can tell which of his tenants she belongs to."

"His tenants! you goose!" repeated Harry scornfully. "She is no farmer's daughter, I tell you! I know every mother's child of them, and indeed I ought, as I spend my vacations at home, and so have a fair chance of flirting with all our rural maids: but she is none of them, and I'll wager that such a flower never grew beneath these uncongenial skies."

"As you like," I answered; "but I think I have seen some farmers' daughters who eclipsed her in good looks. Her manners, certainly, are much above those of country girls generally; yet I doubt not you will find that she is country born."

I wish my friend could have seen himself in a mirror as I said this, for he turned full round and gave me a glance that was meant to be withering. In the innocence of my heart, I had hazarded an assertion that had well nigh lost me his esteem forever, though he laughed heartily himself, soon, as he has done many a time since at the retrospection. I had no doubt, then, that he had fallen a victim to the code which he had long derided.

The lapse of another term found me again at —— Hall; for thus, even in this republican land, was the establishment of "the Squire" styled. The mansion was an antiquated one, which had recently been fitted up and improved by its proprietor, a man of taste, and withal, possessing some of the courtliness of the English gentleman of the olden time—for he was a lineal descendant of a peer of the realm, who could trace his pedigree as far back as "William the Conqueror."

"Deucedly hard!" soliloquised Harry to himself one day, after my arrival, "that the Fates couldn't allow me a sister, or even a pretty cousin, to talk to in this old monastery, where I am shut up for all the world like Adam in his garden. I say, Phil," said he, with sudden energy, "let's have some habits and turn hermits at once?"

"Agreed, with all my heart," I replied; "though I suspect you would make dull business of it. your thoughts would still wander earthward, and perhaps memory would bring before your mental eye one form to supplant the crucifix upon your breast. But, seriously, have you never discovered who the incognita whom we encountered in the wood really was?"

"Seriously, then, I have not, and wish you would not mention her again, for I am foolishly infatuated on that subject. I have made all the inquiries I dared, for I wished to avoid awakening suspicion in the mind of the old gentleman: he studies my interest, I know, but does not take the right method to forward it;—it would not look well for a young fellow, like myself, to think of marrying, you know, and if he supposed I had a penchant for any particular one, especially were she such a piece of perfection as you have named, he would insist upon the wedding taking place directly, and you will perceive, my dear Phil, that I am not quite prepared for an eclaircissement."

"Then you deserve to suffer," I answered, "for your intolerable pride! You believe this girl to be poor, yet were her merits a fortune in themselves, you would not raise her to the station for which she may be qualified, and perhaps designed to ornament; verily, you have altered your first opinion of her amazingly."

"Not at all—if she were a native, I should have had no difficulty in finding her. It is my belief that she is related some how to some one of our 'Dons'—came here on an excursion, and has made her transit from our midst like a star from its sphere! No mercenary motive prompted me to express myself to you as I have—overlook the words I have just uttered, or call them the unmeaning cant of one who talks for the sake of hearing himself do so."

"You have told me nothing but what I was already acquainted with. Courage! mon ami! you will have her yet, or I understand nothing of clairvoyance." I said this because he seemed unusually depressed, and his brilliant eye, betrayed by its humidity, the effort of a tameless spirit struggling to subdue itself.

I returned after the allotted time of my visit had expired. Harry, uneasy and vascillating, was like a capricious steed, who, having been coaxed and urged to no purpose, at length sets off of itself with a speed that defies restraint. His next letter reached me from the city of P——; there he was running the rounds which those of his age, whose fortunes allow, pursue. I learned that he had fallen in with most agreeable society, and congratulated him thereupon. For many weeks I received no answer, but the privilege of etiquette I had no design to waive, and was willing that he should 'take his time,' for in the knowledge of his eccentric character, I felt not the slightest alarm at the sudden stand to which our correspondence had come: I was not mistaken. A letter from —— Hall informed me of the accession and subsequent marriage of my friend, with the compliments of 'Mrs. Harry Tompkins,' and an invitation to pass the ensuing season with them at their seat.

"Come, dear Phil, without fail," added my quondam chum, in a posteript, "Thine ever, Harry."—"N. B. Come prepared—prime shooting just now, and, d'ye hear, I've got a wife in tow for you!—We don't allow any bachelors 'on these premises!' Thine, etc., H. T."

I went down, accordingly, though somewhat staggered at the prospect held out, for I will frankly own, that I am extremely sensitive and nervous as regards the ladies, and am considered by my friends quite a rara avis—a modest man, being a species now almost extinct. I received a cordial greeting from both father and son, that made ample amends for the fatigue of my journey over the rough mountain roads of the country; and to my great relief learned from Harry that I should see no ladies, his wife being from home, on a visit to one of her sisters, who resided in some ville (I forget what) a few miles distant.

"But I am going to-morrow to bring her back," said he; "we can't spare her any longer, and I know you are all impatience to see one for whom I have forgone 'my free, unhoused condition.'"

Of course, I could do no less than lament with him her absence, at which I was inwardly rejoiced; for the pit-a-pat in the region where medical men locate the heart, had grown quite audible as I approached —— Hall. It entirely ceased before a good supper, and I was engaged in an animated discussion with the "old Squire" on the respective merits of his two pointers, Echo and Atalanta.

"Oh! by the way," interrupted Harry, "I should have told you that Grace insisted upon going with Nell, and as the little baggage was pertinacious, I was obliged to submit, though I represented that you might come in her absence."

"What did she say to that?" I answered, curious to know what might be her opinion of my humble self (modest as I am). "I suppose that Grace is the name of the lady you mentioned in your letter?"

"The same—and I should not dare to tell you what she said; I am almost ashamed of her, she is such a romp—very different from my Nell, who is perfectly at home here; you have no idea how easily she became naturalized, but her sister is wild with delight; the woodland paths are daily trod by her fairy feet, and long before the dew is off the grass, she springs from her couch, and is away on her rambles. When she comes in to breakfast, it is with a healthful glow on her round cheek, and a pleasant word for all, even the servants. She always reminds me of the pictures we have of Flora, for her hat is garlanded and her hands filled with those choice productions of nature."

My friend had touched the right string, and every chord vibrated as I listened to his poetic description of this fascinating being; for I hold it to be undisputed evidence of a delicate mind, a passion for those beautiful creations of an Almighty Hand, a passion for flowers! I could see too, with an eye which observes much, that Harry himself, seemed altered, and for the better: his usual rather brusque manner was gentle, and I knew by the tone of his conversation, from his father, down to the lowest menial in his family, that he was not as I had known him in days of yore—that some benign influence had softened the asperity of his nature, and moulded anew his plastic mind. I could not disguise it from myself that there was, previously, much room for this amendment, and deep as was my friendship for him, I could not overlook some prominent defects in an otherwise noble character.

My time was spent on the following day in the extensive library of my host, where, amid the pages of several favorite authors, the hours flew by unnoted till tea was announced. One small volume of superior excellence of binding had, however, arrested my attention, which, on examining, I found to be a religious work of much excellence—many beautiful and appropriate passages marked—on a blank leaf several stanzas of exquisite finish and sentiment, over the signature of Helen G. Eveleth. I started: Eveleth was my mother's family name; this might be some relative.

"'Tis not a very common name," thought I, as I went on, to peruse the introductory paragraph. It was a gift from his lady before their union, and I was rejoiced to find that Harry had made so discreet a choice, for I now attributed the difference I had marked to his wife's salutary influence over him.

When the Squire and myself were left alone I introduced the subject, by asking some question as to the family into which his son had married. The old gentleman was running over with mirth as I broached this topic, and proceeded to inform me that on account of his son's antipathy to country people, and all that related to rustic life, he had devised a place for curing him of this unfounded prejudice, which before my second pilgrimage to —— Hall, he had carried into execution. He had taken the pretty daughter of a distant and humble relative, with whom the aristocratic and imperious boy was wholly unacquainted, and while he was absent, to live with him; designing to educate her unknown to the latter, and, if circumstances should prove favorable, to bring about an introduction. The amiable child, for such she then was, improved rapidly under the instruction of so able a teacher. The domestics were pledged to secrecy—even her existence was unknown in the neighborhood, so strict was her seclusion.

On learning from her what had passed the day we first made her acquaintance—for Helen Eveleth and our nymph of the wood were one and the same—her guardian thought proper to send her away immediately, to the house of her married sister, where she was now staying; and as her acquirements were such that it would be expedient for her to pass a few months in the city to impart to her the ease and polish of refined society, he consigned her to the care of a valued friend of his deceased wife, cautioning her how to proceed when his son should arrive and deliver the letters with which he was charged.

The good lady, faithful and kind in all her relations, acted the part of a mother toward the motherless girl, and Helen Eveleth, and Grace Ashley, the lady's daughter, became inseparable friends. The acquaintance of Henry Tompkins with his predestined bride, commenced favourably, to the mutual gratification of the plotters, who carried themselves throughout to admiration.

'No one sees me, when sister Helen is by," said Grace, with a mock air of patient resignation.

To Henry there was something in the tone of her voice, (the lineaments of her countenance were forgotten, three years having elapsed since he saw her,) that brought "the bird in the bush" to his recollection.

The tale was here interrupted by a young and silvery voice, which rung out upon the clear air, and then again was hushed—then steps were heard coming up the gravel walk, and with an exclamation of pleasure, the narrator left me. He presently re-appeared, leading his daughter-in-law by the hand, as a gentleman of the days gone by would have led out his partner to a minuet. I was not disappointed in the highly-wrought expectations I had formed of Mrs. T. She was an intellectual and high-souled woman, every way worthy of being the companion of such a man as Harry. Her foster-sister, though less reserved and quiet in her demeanor, was still a charming girl. She soon ceased to smile at the blunders of the awkward student, for such I surely was, and I was received into her confidence—a confidence as pure and holy as it was ever the lot of mortal to win.

"A very pretty toy, on my word," said I, taking an ornamental basket from my inamorata's worktable.

"Apropos of that, Hal—does mystery yet hang over the day-dream of your existence?"

His father smiled—so did Helen, but Harry looked from one to the other, and protested he did not understand me.

"I mean that this basket puts me in mind of one whose more laudable use was to hold berries, and,"

——here I paused, for Harry looked hurt by this mischievous allusion to the past.—"I meant no harm," I apologized, "but I thought you might like to hear something about your 'lost Pleiad.'"

"Never!" cried he, bitterly; "I neither wish to see or hear from her again."

"Henry—husband—do not speak so rashly," said the soft voice of my cousin Helen; "do not let me regret the day when chance—rather let me say Providence, threw me in your way, and directed your aim to its mark!"

"It is impossible that you are she!" said he, holding her at arms length, and scanning her features, now beaming with happiness—when all was explained. "Why did you not tell who you were before, you little rogue!" said the husband.

"An innocent deception of my own, Hal," broke in the 'Squire, "you thought to put your lynx-eyed old father on the wrong scent—a sly young dog as you were; but I am even with you, and Philip too, who has been all this morning trying to establish his claim to consanguinity with our Nelly."

"And has proved it to my satisfaction," said I, kissing the fair cheek of the bride.

"Grace, where are you going?"

"To write a chapter on first impressions, if you please, Mr. Philip Ponsonby!"

Springfield, Mass.

A Veritable Ghost Story,

WITH AN EXCELLENT LESSON.

BY A LADY OF PENNSYLVANIA.

It is seldom in the present age of the world, when the facilities for obtaining information are so great, that we meet with a believer in the witches, ghosts, and fairy tales of the days of yore. Formerly every castle had its banshee. Every skirt of wood or shady nook, had chronicled the legends of its good or evil spirit; and out of the circling eddies of many a lovely fountain would rise a fairy being to pronounce your destiny. But these things have passed away, and sober realities taken their place. However this belief may be denounced by reason and judgment, and proscribed as superstitious, yet I believe there are times when a judiciously written article of this kind may be read not only with profit, but without any fear of harm. I grant that it will require care and discernment to do this acceptably, without encroaching upon or offending our own sense of right and wrong: yet I think it can be done. It may be that I possess more imagination than good sense, and consequently can find entertainment in that which, to a fine, well-cultivated intellect, would be insipid and common-place. Be this as it may, I know from a child I loved to hear ghost stories. Hour after hour have I listened to these bewitching tales, and when bed-time came, my mother would wonder why I held so tight upon her dress, and would not sleep until my hand was firmly grasped in hers, and my head snugly stowed away under the bed-clothes. I could have told her the reason, but I did not wish to confess it to myself, much less to another. I fear my reader will by this time have conceived very unfavourable impressions of my courage; yet let me assure you, I am not such a coward as you would think. In every sciomachy in which I have been engaged, I have generally been the conqueror. I recollect sleeping, and alone too, for a long time, in a room that was reported to be haunted; but I could not have been a favourite of the sprite, as it slighted me so much as never to pay me one visit. I commenced this piece intending to record, and thereby save from oblivion, my adventures with a ghost.

It was during the summer of 1839, that I accompanied my friend Mary J——, on a visit to her parents, in one of the beautiful vallies that lie among the romantic hills of Chester county. I pray you be not startled at the idea of a ghost in the quiet county of Chester, in the good State of Pennsylvania. Why should not the thing happen there as well as among the baronial castles of Europe? Besides, I can vouch for the authenticity of what I am about to relate.

Among other projects for pleasure, one very warm afternoon, we determined to visit a friend about four miles distant; and as gallants are not so plenty in the country as in the city, Mary was compelled to be the charioteer. I told her I did not like the idea of trusting myself to her driving, but she assured me it would not be the first time she had driven "Old Ned" over to neighbour Philips', that he had too great a share of good manners and too little spirit to run away, and to sum up the whole, if she did not drive we should be obliged to remain at home. Having no hope of anything better, I chose the alternative of going.

After a pleasant ride, or rather walk, for out of that gait "Old Ned" was determined not to go, we arrived at our destined place, and were very courteously received by the lady of the house. Being Mary's friend, was sufficient to ensure a hearty welcome for me. As pop visits are not at all fashionable in the country, Mrs. P. would not listen to our returning before the next day, and being surrounded by every thing delightful, we were not at all loath to stay.

The day had been excessively warm, and as the sun was fast seeking his western bed, a black cloud arose, apparently from the spot were the king of day was just sinking to rest. It spread with great rapidity. In a few moments the whole heavens were wrapped in fearful gloom, and every thing around gave indications of the approaching storm. It came, and dreadful indeed it was. The wind swept all before it—laying prostrate many a tall and beautiful tree. Flash after flash of vivid lightning was immediately followed by peal upon peal of the most terrific thunder. The elements appeared to be striving with each other to gain the mastery. The whirlwind and thunder-storm never had charms for me. Horror seizes on my very soul, and I can be said scarcely to live until the storm is over. The fury of the storm was soon exhausted, and passing round, by its rumbling voice and occasional flash, told our southern neighbours what it had done for us.

At an early hour we were conducted to our room by our kind hostess. The one who has enjoyed them, knows well how to appreciate the sweets of a country bed-chamber. Suffice it to say, ours was furnished with every thing calculated to promote comfort and rest; but unfortunately my friend was attacked with that most unfashionable—unromantic of all aches—the toothache. However after a lapse of time, and sundry applications of Cologne and bandages, to say nothing of my sympathy, the pain yielded, as well it might, to such powerful remedies, and Mary's regular breathings soon told me she was asleep.

Feeling no inclination to sleep, I approached the window, and throwing open the casement, seated myself by it. It was a glorious night. The full moon was careering high in the heavens, scattering the light fleecy clouds which appeared to gambol around her—while here and there might be seen a single star twinkle for a moment, and then disappear, as if it were useless to show its feeble light in the midst of such effulgence. The air was cool and delicious, fraught with the perfume which the grateful earth and refreshed flowers sent up: while a gentle breeze, playing among the shrubbery, supplied the place of nature's absent musicians. The window at which I was seated opened upon a beautiful lawn, at the termination of which was a narrow skirt of woods, among whose trees the storm had committed much devastation. Now, all was calm and quiet; and from the spot I occupied, no trace of the recent storm was visible. Nature, with every thing around, was at rest. It was a season fitted for thought.—Can any one be censured for giving loose rein to Memory and Hope—to revel upon the true scenes of the one, and the bright visions of the other? aye, or for allowing Imagination to participate in the feast at such an hour? When the light of other days steals over us, time glides away imperceptibly. How long I should have sat indulging in my reverie I know not, had not a low kind of moan startled me. I listened attentively, but could hear nothing save the gentle breathings of my friend; and, concluding that I was mistaken, I was about relapsing into my former train of thought, when the same strange sound broke upon the silence. Surely, thought I, this is not imagination. I arose, and prepared to search the room, when a clock in the apartment below, whose strokes I had counted with pleasure for several hours, now tolled out the dismal hour of twelve. On either side of the fire-place was a closet, from one of which it was evident to me the sound proceeded. The bed, toilet, and all covered places in the room were carefully examined, but in vain; I could discover nothing that would account for the noise. As a final resort, I determined to awaken Mary, who I knew to be very courageous. I went to the bedside, but when I saw her sleeping so sweetly, and recollected how much she had suffered, my heart would not let me disturb her slumbers. I walked towards the window, and now observed for the first time that a change had come over the face of nature. The moon no longer shone in unrivalled splendour, but was darkened by intervening clouds. The wind moaned mournfully through the trees, while at longer or shorter intervals, this strange sound, increased as it was both in loudness and duration, mingling with the wind, formed the most awful chorus to which I ever listened. When I looked upon the sudden change without, or listened to the unearthly moanings within, my feelings were past all description.

Such agony I never endured before, and whatever awaits me in life, I pray to be delivered from the horrors of that night. A clammy, death-like sweat came over me—my trembling limbs would scarcely support me. There I stood, rooted to the window, with my eyes fixed on the dreaded closet, expecting every moment to see some one, or something emerge from it. At last, I made one mighty effort, and, springing to the bed, threw myself by my friend, exclaiming, "Oh, Mary! Mary! there is some one in the closet!" Mary opened her eyes and stared wildly at me—"Are you up yet? what a little fidget you are!" was all the comfort I received; and quietly turning over, composed herself for another nap. This I determined not to allow. I succeeded in rousing her, and then related as well as I could all that had transpired, which she laughed at with most unbounding incredulity. She had scarcely, however, recovered from her merriment, when the dreadful sound swept through the room more awful than at any preceding time. She fixed her eyes steadily on me, and starting to her feet, "I believe, Fanny, you are right," said she; "there is something in it." As she was well acquainted with the family, I entreated her to go directly to Mrs. Philips. This she would not listen to, as she declared she would find out the ghost herself, and have the credit of it. What made the matter still worse was, that our candle was just flickering in the socket, and we should soon be left in darkness. She concurred in my opinion that the sound proceeded from the closet, and determined to open it. I endeavoured in vain to dissuade her from doing so. To the closet she crept very cautiously, followed by me. By the time we arrived at it, the hollow moan resounded in our ears most dreadful; she hesitated, but finally, with one jerk, the door flew open, and there, upon white shelves, in nice order, lay the newly-ironed bed-clothes of the family. "I told you so," exclaimed the triumphant Mary; but the repetition of the noise left us little room for congratulation. "There is another closet!" whispered I; and to this we went with less trepidation. It proved to be a clothes-press; and, after shaking all the garments, we were obliged to give up the ghost in that quarter. One spot yet remained unexplored, the fire-place itself. The more we listened, the stronger were our convictions that it was the habitation of the ghost. We accordingly set to work to remove the fire-board, which, after some difficulty, was accomplished, when there was displayed to our view a row of large stone jars, carefully covered and tied up. We were now becoming quite courageous, and I suggested the practicability of peeping into the jars, as their contents might be similar to those in the cave of the forty thieves; but Mary was certain they contained only the good things of this life, in the shape of preserves and pickles, or something of that sort, so we agreed to let them rest.

Just as we finished the exploration of the last mentioned place, and adjusted the fire-board, our expiring candle shot up its last blaze, and went entirely out, much to our regret. Nothing now remained to be done, but to make ourselves as contented as possible under existing circumstances, and to listen to the ghost, that seemed not at all intimidated by our search. The clock soon told us we had entered upon the first hour of the morning.

Although the moon was obscured by clouds, yet being at the full, there was sufficient light in the room to distinguish objects. As we sat closely watching the fire-place, we distinctly saw the fire-board move. The discovery was startling enough, but we kept our ground—at least, Mary did, and I dared not leave her. Observing attentively, we found that the fire-board, after moving out a short distance without losing its equilibrium, fell gently back: this motion was perceptible only when we heard the noise. Mary removed the fire-board, and we listened long, but could hear nothing: replacing it, brought back the dreaded noise. Convinced that it had a great deal to do with the matter, we lugged the unwieldy thing to the window, to have a better view of it. On examination, it proved to be a painted canvass nailed over a wooden frame, which, having become loose, the wind in blowing down the chimney, acted upon in a manner to produce the strange sounds that had so terrified us. Congratulating ourselves upon our discovery, we removed the cause of alarm, and lost no time in seeking the rest we so much needed.

The next day, our ghost story afforded no small degree of merriment at the breakfast table. After spending a very delightful day, we once more trusted ourselves to the tender mercy of "Old Ned," who this time trotted off at a very respectable rate, and soon brought us to our home, where, of course, the story was recapitulated, and great praise awarded us for our courage.

AMELIA.

AN INSTRUCTIVE TALE

FROM REAL LIFE.

BY MISS LUCY E. MILNOR.

"I will not marry yet," was her reply, her face half averted from the kneeling figure beside her, whom she still suffered to retain her hand—whose arm still encircled her waist unforbidden. "I will not marry yet," and love was in the tone of the very accents that withheld the boon of love, or deferred the bestowal of it.

James Griswold was a young man of moderate fortune; accomplished, unsophisticated, and of quick sensibilities. A student, and fond of retirement, he had selected for his summer residence a small hamlet on the Long Island seacoast, about twenty miles from New York, where, between his books and the smooth sea-shore, along which he loved to ramble, his time passed anything but heavily. Here he had resided about a month, when the little community received an addition, in a young lady and her mother, who joined it for the purpose of a temporary residence; and young Griswold stepped back in surprise, when, issuing one morning from the cabin in which he lodged, he beheld two females, in the attire, and with the air, of fashion—the one leaning upon the arm of the other—approaching the humble portal whence he had just emerged. He bowed, however, and passed on.

He had scarcely more than glanced at the strangers, but, transient as was his survey of them, he saw that one of them was an invalid—the younger.

"How touching is the languor which indisposition casts over beauty:" exclaimed Griswold to himself; "health would improve the loveliness of that face, but the interest which now invests it would vanish. No visitation," he continued, "but late hours and crowded rooms have sent her hither—for I prophesy she comes to make some stay."

He was right. Griswold returned from his ramble earlier than was his custom. His thoughts that day were in the hamlet, and not upon the shore. He approached his lodgings with something like the emotions of expectation and suspense.

He looked at his landlady, on entering, as if he expected she would communicate something; and was disappointed when she merely returned the ordinary response to his salutation. He entered his apartment dispirited, and threw himself into a chair near the window, the sash of which he threw up as if he wanted air. For the first time, he felt the oppression of loneliness. "They have not come to stop," said he to himself, and absolutely with a sigh; and no wonder! In an assembly, a lovely, graceful, and delicate woman, beheld for the first time, would have exacted from him only the ordinary tribute which beauty shares with beauty—but, in a remote little fishing hamlet, inhabited by beings as rude as their neighbors, the sea and the rocks, such a vision could hardly come, and vanish, without leaving a strong impression upon the beholder. Young Griswold sat abstracted, chagrined—mortified.

The opening of a window in a cabin opposite, roused him. The sash was thrown up by a white arm, shining through a sleeve of muslin, thin as gauze. Presently a dimpled elbow reposed upon the sill, and a cheek of pensive sweetness sank upon a hand, so small, so white, that it seemed to have been modelled for no other office than to pillow such a burden. A thrill ran through his frame, quickening him into wakeful life.

How the hand talks! What passion, thought, and sentiment, are in it! What tongues are the fingers! Oh! the things that the hand which this young man sat watching, discoursed to him, as it changed its posture—now with the palm, now with the back, kissing its owner's cheek—now extending one finger upon the marbly, ample temple—now enwreathing itself with one jetty curl and another—now passed over the arched bright forehead—now lowered, and languidly drooping from the window-frame, upon which the arm to which it belonged lay motionless—then raised again, with slow and waving motion, till it closed with the cheek that half met it—then gradually crossed over the bosom that seemed to heave with a sigh, as it passed, and pressed to the heart—then clasped with its beauteous fellow, and carried to the back of the head, the full, elastic arms, swelling and whitening as they contracted!

Griswold gazed on entranced. Hitherto, the cheek alone of the fair invalid had been presented to him, but now her head turned; her eyes met his and dropped—she rose and withdrew.

Only glimpses of her did Griswold catch again that evening—but they were frequent. A hand—an elbow—the point of her shoulder—once or twice her figure, flitting backward and forward, as she paced up and down the apartment. Dusk fell; still he remained at his post. Was it a guitar that he heard? It was but awakened as the first tones of an Æolian harp, which you hold your breath to hear. Her hand was on the strings; one chord at length she struck full; another succeeded—and another. Then all was silence for a time. Griswold still remained at the window—nor in vain. The music woke again, as fairy soft as before, and a voice—soft as the music, but oh! far sweeter—awoke along with it. She was singing, but he could hear nothing except the strain; and yet he heard enough to tell him that it was the theme of tenderness, though sung by fits, that rather seemed to help than mar the passionate mood. The stars shone out; the moon, in her first quarter half completed, showed her bright crescent clear though setting; the folds of a white drapery shone dimly through the still open casement. Did the wearer approach, to look out and gaze upon the fair night? No. The sash was pulled down; the string and the voice were hushed; the interesting minstrel had retired. Griswold retired too; but though his head was upon the pillow, not a moment of that night were his vision and his ear withdrawn from the open window.

It was broad day before forgetfulness cast her spell over the excited spirits of young Griswold, nor was it broken till high noon. He arose, emerged from his chamber, and took an anxious survey of the habitation opposite. The room appeared empty.—He partook hastily of a slight repast, and, sallying out, made his way to the sea-shore. He had not proceeded far, when, turning a point, he beheld the elder female in advance of him, standing still, and looking anxiously upward toward a projecting summit, some hundred yards from the shore. He followed what appeared to be the direction of her eyes, and saw the younger, half way up, reclining upon her side.—Something appeared to be amiss. He quickened his pace, and, joining the former, learned from her that her daughter, attempting to climb to the top of the steep hill, had incautiously turned; and, unaccustomed to look from a height, was prevented by terror from proceeding or descending; that, from the same cause, she had slipped down several feet; and that she, herself, durst not attempt to go to her assistance. Griswold had heard enough; he bounded up the steep. As he approached the fair one, modesty half overcame terror, and she made a slight effort to repair the disorder into which her dress had been thrown by the accident. The young man assisted her to complete what she had effected but imperfectly; he encouraged her, raised her, and, propping her fair form by his own, led her, step by step, down to the beach again. Nor, when she was in perfect safety, did he withdraw his assistance—nor did she decline it; though, as apprehension subsided, confusion arose—coloring her pale cheek to crimson, at the recollection of the plight in which she had been found. Her ankle was slightly sprained, she said, having turned under her when she slipped. What was this, if not a warrant for the proffer of an arm? At all events, Griswold construed it as such, and escorted the fair stranger, leaning upon him, back to her lodgings. From that moment a close intimacy commenced. They were constantly together—sometimes accompanied by the mother—more frequently, and at last, wholly alone. Communing in solitude, between the sexes, and in the midst of romantic scenery, where there is no impediment, no distaste on either side, is almost sure to awaken, and to foster love. Young Griswold loved. The looks, the actions, all but the tongue of Amelia, assured him that his passion was returned. Her health had improved rapidly; the autumn was advancing, and the evenings and nights were growing chill. The mother and daughter now talked of returning to New York; a day was fixed for their departure—and, on the eve of that day, young Griswold threw himself at the feet of the lovely girl, and implored her to bless him with her hand. Yet, though she did not deny that he had interested her—though her eyes and her cheek attested it—though the hand which was locked in his, locked his as well—though she suffered him to draw her toward him, by the tenure of her graceful waist—still was her reply, "I will not marry yet."

Griswold did not require to ask if his visits would be permitted in town—he was invited to renew them there. A journey to Charleston, however, on a matter of pressing necessity, respecting the affairs of a friend, prevented his return for a month. At the expiration of that time he found himself in New York, and, with a throbbing heart, repaired to the habitation of Amelia's father, near Union Square, on the very evening of his arrival. The house was lighted up—there was a ball. He was scarcely dressed for a party; yet he could not overcame his impatience to behold again the heroine of the Long Island shore. He rang, at the same moment when a knot of other visitors came to the door and, entering along with them, was ushered into a ball-room, the footman hurriedly announcing the names of the several parties. The dance was proceeding. It was the whirling waltz—

> The dance of contact, else
> Forbid! abandoning to the free hand
> The sacred waist; waltz face to face, that breath
> Doth kiss with breath, and eye embraceth eye—
> Your transee coil relaxed, straightening—round
> And round, in wavy measure, you entwine
> Circle with circle—till the swimming brain
> And panting heart, in swoony lapse, give o'er!

It was a waltz, and the couple consisted of a man of the town, and—Amelia.

The party who had entered with Griswold immediately took seats, but he stood, transfixed to the spot where his eyes first caught the form of the young lady, in the coil of another. She saw not him. With laughing eyes, and cheeks flushed with exertion, she continued the measure of license—her spirits mounting as the music quickened—until she seemed to float round her partner, who freely availed himself of the favorable movement of the step, to draw her toward him in momentary pressure. They at length sat down, and were soon engaged in earnest conversation. Griswold writhed. He retired to a room where he thought he should escape observation, and threw himself into a chair.

"Who think you, now, is the happy man?" said one of a group of gentlemen who at that moment came into the apartment where he sat.

"Why, who, if not Singleton!" replied another; "he has waltzed himself into her heart. This is the twentieth time I have seen her dance with him."

"Oh! another will waltz him out of her heart," interposed a third; "she is an incorrigible coquette, from first to last."

Here the party separated: Griswold, scarcely knowing what he did, after sitting abstracted for a few minutes, rose and descended the staircase.

He started with the intention of quitting the house, but the supper-room had been just thrown open, and the press carried him in. Nor was he allowed to stop, until he had reached the head of the table.—Every seat but two, close to where he stood, was occupied. "By your leave, sir," said a voice behind him. He stepped back, and the waltzer led Amelia to one of them, and placed himself beside her. Young Griswold would have retreated, but could not without incommoding the company, who thickly hemmed him in. Amelia drew her gloves from the white arms they little enhanced by covering—the waltzer assisting her, and transferring them to the custody of his bosom. His eyes explored the table in quest of the most delicate of the viands, which, one after another, he recommended to her, until she made a selection. He filled a wine-glass with sparkling Burgundy and presented it to her, then crowned a goblet, till the liquid almost overhung the brim—breathed her name over it in a sigh—and quaffed it off to the bottom at a draught. He leaned his cheek to hers, till the neighbors almost touched. He whispered to her—and she replied in whispers. He passed his arm over the back of her chair, partly supplanting it in the office of supporting her shoulders. He pressed so close to her, that it would have been the same had both been sitting in one seat. She was either unconscious of the familiar vicinity, or she permitted it. The whispering continued; the word "marriage" was uttered—repeated—repeated again. Griswold heard her distinctly reply, "I will not marry yet," as she rose—and, turning, met him face to face.

"Griswold!" she involuntarily exclaimed. But he spoke not, save with his eyes, which he kept fixed steadfastly upon her.

"When did you arrive?" she inquired, hurriedly, and in extreme confusion.

"This evening," replied the young man, without removing his eyes.

"When did you join our party?"

"While you were waltzing," returned Griswold, with a smile.

"And how long have you been standing here?"

"Since supper commenced; I made way for your partner to hand you to that seat, and place himself beside you."

"You have not supped! sit down, and I will help you to something."

"No!" said Griswold, shaking his head, and smiling again.

"My mother has not seen you yet; come and speak to her."

"No: I have not a moment to spare. I leave town again immediately."

"When?"

"To-night! Farewell," said he, turning to go.

"You, surely, are not going yet," earnestly interposed Amelia.

"I must not stay," emphatically rejoined Griswold. "For one object alone I came to town. That is finally disposed of. The necessity for my departure is imperative. Remember me to your mother. Good-night!" he added, moving toward the door.

"Have you been well?" she inquired, almost tremulously. He continued his progress as far as the throng permitted him, affecting not to hear her. She followed, laid her hand upon his arm, and stopped him.

"You surely are not well now," she remarked, in a tone of solicitude.

"No," he replied, passing on till he reached the door.

"Griswold!" she exclaimed, heedless of those who surrounded her, "stay a little longer!—an hour—half an hour—the quarter of an hour."

Griswold stopped, and, turning, looked upon her with an expression so tender, yet so stern, that she half shrank as she met his gaze.

"Not a moment," he replied; "I should be only a clog upon your pastime. I do not waltz!" Then snatched her hand—raised it to his lips—kissed it—and, dropping it, hurried down the staircase and departed.

Amelia at once perceived the awkwardness of her situation—recovered her self-possession—and, with well-dissembled mirth, affected to laugh.

"A poor lunatic!" she exclaimed, "whom I pity, notwithstanding his extravagant aberrations of mind. He is innocent in his madness. But come, let us forget him."

The dance was resumed. She was the queen of the mirthful hour, that shone, surpassing all. She laughed, she rallied, she challenged, she outdid herself—her spirits towering the more, the more the revel waned. Party after party dropped off, still she kept it up, till she was utterly alone—and then she rushed up to her chamber, and cast herself upon a couch, dissolved in tears.

She loved young Griswold. Vanity had been touched before—but never sentiment, till she visited the little hamlet on Long Island. At first, she could not, or would not, persuade herself that Griswold would not return; but a month set that point perfectly at rest. She drooped. Society—amusement—nothing could rouse her into her former self. Her partner in the waltz in vain solicited her to stand up with him again. She declined the honor; his visits were discouraged. Her mother anxiously watched the depression of spirits that had taken possession of her, and seemed daily to increase. The winter passed without improvement—the spring. Summer set in; bloom and fruit returned, but cheer was a stranger to her heart. Change of scene was recommended. She was asked to make choice of the place whither she would go; she replied, with a sigh, "to the Long Island shore."

She and her mother arrived at the same little hamlet which they had visited the summer before, early on a Sunday morning, and reoccupied the identical lodgings. The landlady, a kind-hearted creature, expressed her surprise and sorrow at the altered appearance of her delicate young lodger.

"Ah!" said she, "the young gentleman would be sorry to see this—though he has had his turn of sickness too; but he is now quite recovered."

"Mr. Griswold!" breathlessly inquired Amelia.

"Yes," replied the landlady, "that same handsome, kind, young gentleman."

"Merciful Heaven! is he here?" she vehemently demanded.

"He is, my lady," returned the landlady.

"Mother!" she exclaimed, as she turned upon the latter a look, in which pleasure was painted for the first time since the momentous night of the ball.

"Where does he lodge?" asked Amelia, turning to the landlady.

"In the same place. He came back about a month after he left," added the landlady. "Poor young gentleman!" she continued, "we all thought he had come to die among us—so pale, so melancholy. He would keep company with no one—would speak to no one—and at last he took fairly to his bed."

Amelia laid her head upon her hand, covering her eyes; her tears had begun to flow.

"But the daughter of our neighbor, who had a rich brother that sent his niece to school at New Haven, and had determined to adopt her, having completed her time, came upon a visit to her father, shortly after the return of the young gentleman, and her mother made her read to him constantly, to divert him—and he grew fond of listening to her—and well he might, for a sweet young creature she is—and at last his health took a turn, and he was able to quit his bed, and to walk, as he used with you, my dear lady—rambling whole hours along the sea-shore with her."

The eyes of Amelia were now lifted to the landlady's face. Her tears were gone, all but the traces of them; they seemed as they were glazed. The landlady had paused at the sound of several voices, and a kind of bustle without, and now ran to the window.

"Come hither, ladies!" she exclaimed, "they are just coming out."

Amelia, by a convulsive effort, rose, and hastily approached the window with her mother.

"Here they come!" returned the landlady, "and this is the end of my story. The young gentleman at last fell in love with his sweet young nurse, and offered to marry her. She had already fallen in love with him; she accepted him, and this very morning they are going to church. There they are! look! did you ever see so sweet a sight? What a couple! God bless them! They were made for one another!"

The landlady started and looked round. Amelia had fallen in a swoon upon the floor. With difficulty they recovered her. In an hour her mother was on her way with her toward New York. In a month, she was dressed in a shroud.

MOUNT SINAI.

President Durbin, after he had visited this renowned and holy mountain, and had felt his mind filled with the vast associations of the spot, broke forth into the following beautiful train of thought when contemplating the scene anew, with his pen in hand to record the sentiment:

"I have stood upon the Alps in the middle of June, and looked abroad upon their snowy empire—I have stood upon the Alpines, and looked abroad upon the plains of beautiful, eventful Italy—I have stood upon the Albanian mount, and beheld the scene of the Æneiad from the Circean promontory, over the Campagno, to the eternal city, and the mountains of Tivoli—I have sat upon the pyramids of Egypt, and cast my eyes over the sacred city of Heliopolis, the land of Goshen, the fields of Jewish bondage, and the ancient Memphis where Moses and Aaron on the part of God and his people, contended with Pharoah and his servants, the death of whose "first born of man and beast in one night" filled the land with wailing; but I have never set my foot on any spot, from whence was visited so much stern, gloomy grandeur, heightened by the silence and solitude that reigns around, but infinitely more heightened by the awful and sacred associations of the first great revelation in form from God to man. I feel oppressed with the spirit that breathes around and seems to inhabit this holy place. I shall never sit down on the summit of Sinai again and look upon the silent and empty plains at its feet, but I shall go down a better man, and aim so to live as to escape the thunders at the last day, which once reverberated through these mountains, but have long since given way to the Gospel of Peace. I can scarcely tear myself away from the hallowed summit, and I wish I, too, could linger forty years in converse with the Lord."

TO THE LOVED AND LOST.

My heart is in thy grave, my Love,
Oh, let it there remain!
In life, I give it—and in death,
Thou shalt the gift retain.

And faithful to thy memory,
I'll ceaseless homage pay,
For blissful years of wedded love,
Too swiftly passed away.

Thou said'st, "that we had got to part,
That death was drawing nigh,"—
Oh, who can tell the hopeless grief,
With which I saw thee die!

Beheld thine eyes of love and light,
Dimmed with the mist of death,
Received upon my quivering lips,
Thy last expiring breath!

Oh, what a pure and generous soul,
Did death in thine set free!
Oh, what a wealth of priceless love,
I've lost, in losing thee!

Truth, genius, virtue, beauty, all
That lent a charm to life,
Lie buried in thy useless grave,
My lost, my cherished Wife!

And I will plant thy grave with flowers,
And watch their growth with care—
The same as used to win thy love,
The fragrant, bright, and fair.

The earliest violet of the spring,
With lovelier hue shall bloom,
When watered by affection's tear,
That falls on Beauty's tomb.

Look down then from the realms of light!
If such be Heaven's decree
Watch all our ways—when perils press,
Our guardian Angel be!

Yes, whisper with thy seraph voice,
Thy loved ones will obey—
'Twill guide us through earth's clouded path,
To Heaven's effulgent day.

There, severed souls, whose early faith
Was pledged in changeless love,
Shall re-unite—no more to part—
In God's bright home above!

MOTHER.

There is a voice that calls to me,
I hear it in my sleep
And when I start amid my dreams,
My waking is to weep!
So plain doth seem the echoed word,
That strange it is to me,
Because I find not by my side,
Its own reality.

'Tis a tone for ever buried
In the solitude of death;
And well I know it never more
Shall speak in mortal breath.
'Twas a soft and gentle music,
So loved in other years;
It breathed to me but kindness,
And its memory is—tears.

I cannot, in the stillness,
Give an answer to my name,
But I lay me down in quietness,
And sink to rest again;
For then I see, not her face,
As once for me it smiled,
Yet I feel that she is watching
O'er the slumbers of her child.

NO ONE BUT HUSBAND; OR, THE PLEDGE.

BY MRS H. M. DODGE.

"Sister Mary! you cannot be in earnest! you certainly do not intend to appear again at dinner in that old, faded dress; besides, it is very much soiled. I have been surprised for three days past that you wore it, even about your morning's work."

"That's just like you, Jane; you have nothing to do but to dress, and comb, and curl, and you think a woman, with an infant in her arms, and a family to manage, can do the same. How would my work come on if I should spend all my time in adorning my own person?"

"You quite mistake me, sister. I do not desire you to spend all your time thus. No: a small portion of it would suffice. But you have good help in the kitchen, and you employ a seamstress when you need one, and certainly you can afford time enough to keep yourself and your infant becoming and tidy, at least.—Now, a few minutes would be sufficient to smooth your hair, and arrange your own dress, and that of your infant very neatly; and, perhaps, dear Mary, you are not aware that you have been amusing yourself with little Helen more than an hour."

"Well, Jane, that may be; but I was quite fatigued when I sat down, and needed rest; and what's the use in making so much parade about one's own family? No one but husband will be here to dinner, and he has seen me look much worse than I do now, so what's the use in toiling all the time for nothing?"

"Toiling for nothing, sister? Can it be possible that, in less than two years after marriage, your husband's feelings and opinions have become nothing to you? Whose feelings and good opinions, then are worth toiling for?"

"Oh, Jane, you are always magnifying every little trifle into something very serious and very important. Now why should a woman make a slave of herself, just to please her husband's whims? Certainly, if he loves her as he ought, and esteems her for the superior qualities of her mind and heart, his opinion will not be swayed by every little external circumstance. What is a little dress? It matters nothing very material any way, especially when one is about her work, and expects no company?"

"Company! sister Mary; company is a cold, heart-chilling word to place between your motives, and the comfort of your dearest earthly friend. If a neat and handsome dress is desirable to make you appear lovely and respectable in the eyes of company, and to give them a good opinion of your correct taste and habits, how much more so is it necessary in the eyes of him on whom your whole happiness so mainly depends! He has forsaken all other females for you; he has chosen you from among all his acquaintances to be his constant companion for life, and if your careless habits and disorderly appearance utterly disgust him, he has no resource but to bear it; and if he is a peaceable man, it may be he will bear it in silence; but, oh, sister, I can assure you his heart will ache! and may I not venture to add a most alarming truth, that, but few men can love unreservedly a slattern wife."

"Jane, Jane! what curious notions you have got. Then a woman must be always in full dress to please her husband, and keep his love! A pretty economical wife that. I guess his purse would ache, if his heart did not."

"I said not so, dear Mary. But I do insist that she should always be in a perfectly neat and becoming attire. One great rule should sway her whole conduct; never, on any occasion, to appear before her husband in a disorderly dress. No—if even one ringlet is out of place, and she hears his footsteps approaching, she should instantly leave all, and arrange the truant tress. Indeed, I believe that wedded love is a critical thing—a delicate plant, that requires much culture to make it thrive, amidst the faults incident to poor human nature, and the trials of life which are often calculated to displease us with ourselves and every one around us."

"Well, Jane, if that be the case, you had better remain in a state of 'single blessedness'—you make marriage a scene of perpetual slavery and alarm, and mutual forbearance a thing which ought never to be needed."

"No, sister, you mistake me entirely. We are very imperfect creatures, and after we have done the best we can, still many things require overlooking; but there are some things for which we have no right to ask forbearance, because they are errors which we need not commit, and for which we have no reasonable excuse. Under this head may be classed the fault I have been deprecating. What excuse can a woman in health possibly have for being a slattern? And does it make marriage a state of slavery and alarm because a wife should try to make herself agreeable in the sight of her husband, and thus to render him happy? Dear Mary, did you deem this a servitude before marriage? Was it a painful labor to array yourself most tastefully and scrupulously in a manner which you believed would be most pleasing to Edward when you expected him? Now, if due attention to those attractions were necessary to awaken and fix love and esteem before marriage, they certainly must be necessary to keep them alive after."

"But, sister, courtship and marriage are two things. One cannot be expected, amidst the sober and weary duties of a housekeeper, to be always curled and primmed up, nor even as tidy, by the bye, as a girl waiting for her lover."

"Why not, Mary? You should not have raised expectations, then, to be afterwards mortified and crushed. You should have appeared then, as a general thing, what you intended to be through life.—During your courtship, Edward was very particular with regard to his personal appearance. This trait of character you greatly admired in him—and I see that he is not changed in this respect since marriage. Now, dear sister, how would you feel if he should come from the store with his beard long, his hair hanging over his fine fair forehead, his collar crumpled and half turned under, his clothes ragged and rusty, and finally in every way so disagreeable in his appearance that you felt almost disgusted to look at him; would you think he had much regard for your esteem and happiness? or would the good qualities of his head or heart, for which you mostly love him, atone for such unnecessary faults?"

The young wife cast her eyes thoughtfully upon the floor, but replied not. She had never thought of the subject in this light before. Edward had never appeared before her in a careless or slovenly manner: yet, with secret mortification and sorrow, she remembered that more than once he had spoken to her about her torn and soiled dress, her uncombed hair, the untidy appearance of their dear little Helen, or the disordered state of affairs, or the furniture about the house. She remembered, too,—though he had never neglected to make ample provision for her,—that through her carelessness he had often come to his meals and found them not ready, or but indifferently prepared; and sometimes, when he had unexpectedly brought a friend home with him to dinner, how confused he looked, and how cold his manners towards her were. "It is indeed wrong," she said to her own heart, as Betty came in to lay the cloth for dinner. "To-morrow I will turn over a new leaf."

Alas! for this procrastinating resolution! Had she determined that the good reformation should begin that very moment, she might have thrown off the corroding power of habit, and cast herself beyond the reach of the subtle tempter;—yes, she might have dispelled the gloomy cloud that was gathering over her devoted head! But being somewhat weary, and feeling assured that no one but her husband would be there to dinner, and that to appear once more before him in a slatternly dress would make no difference, she again, and much to her sister's grief, took up her babe, whose little face and hands were begrimed with the dirt of the carpet, and sat quietly down to wait for dinner. Betty, though always called "good help," had gradually sunk into the careless habits of the young housekeeper, and while she knew how work should be done, she cared not enough for the interest of another to exert herself to do it well. The dinner table was therefore arranged in a very uninviting manner; the cloth being quite soiled, the plates and glasses looking dingy for the want of proper washing, and the knives, forks and spoons, altogether unpolished. Mary observed the uneasy eye of her sister, and knew that things were not as they should be; but she contented herself by again thinking, "Well, to-morrow Betty must turn over a new leaf."

At length the dinner was ready. Edward came home in high spirits, and though he cast an unhappy glance at the table, and then at his wife and child, the cloud passed from his brow the next moment, and all sat down with kind feelings to partake of their ample meal. Mary looked unusually smiling, and just as she was secretly planning how she would surprise her husband by the improved state of affairs to-morrow, the attention of all was attracted by the appearance of an elegant carriage which stopped at the door. Edward walked to the window, and, turning hastily around, he exclaimed—

"By my life! it is Howard Montague and his bride! Oh! Mary, Mary!" he continued, with a smothered groan, and a look of distress that pierced her to the heart; "how am I crushed into the very earth! How can I admit this friend into such a house, and call it mine! Your careless habits are killing me—I am dying by inches!" and then his look of grief changed to anger, and from that to hatred and contempt, as he left the room to meet his friend.

Poor Mary sprang from her chair in sorrow and alarm. She possessed a clear and vivid understanding, and comprehended, at once, the exact state of her husband's heart. Montague was his dearest early friend, the companion of his school days, and the most highly valued friend and correspondent of his later years. She knew how much he had thought of his opinion—how proudly, during their courtship, he had praised her to this friend, and she had often, too, heard him say that Howard Montague was one of the most scrupulously particular, as well as the most observing persons in the world. Jane, also, knew enough of him to feel fully for Edward, and to know that he had rather see any other person at that time than him.

It was a cool day in autumn, and, as they usually kept no parlor fire, the visitors must be admitted to the sitting-room—so the trembling wife threw her babe into Betty's arms, picked up the tongs and shovel which lay sprawling on the floor, brushed up the coals and ashes from the hearth, grasped an armful of unfinished work, and bits, and ends, which lay piled upon a dusty mahogany table, stowed them into a cupboard, already crowded with all manner of things to overflowing, and then tucking back her straggling ringlets, she waited breathlessly the entrance of her husband and his friends. The last improvement was scarcely completed, when the three entered, and a formal introduction followed: but, alas! for the poor, young wife! Her husband's mortification and embarrassment only served to increase her own, and, losing all self-possession, her appearance was not only disgusting as a slattern, but childish and awkward as a woman. Neither could Edward be himself. His varying countenance and distracted manner, showed too plainly the uncomfortable state of his mind. That night, when they retired to rest, Edward Wells told his wife, plainly, that there must be a change in her habits, or he was ruined.

"You knew my feelings on these subjects before marriage, Mary," said he; "and oh, how cruelly you deceived me! Then, every possible effort was employed to make your person and the little parlor where we sat, attractive to me, by their perfect neatness; and why was this bitter wrong practised upon me? why were you not generous, plainly appearing then what you intended to be through life, that I might have known what I was doing, and not have been so miserably disappointed?"

"I see how it was then," replied the wife, pettishly; "you married me because you thought I would make you a good house-keeper. A pretty idea that—just as a Southerner would choose a slave!"

"Mary," replied the distressed husband, "why do you wrong me thus? I loved you most devotedly—but did I love blindly, madly, and like a fool? Did I love without reason, and without perceiving any qualifications worthy of being loved? Believe me, my wife, there are but few virtues, however amiable and beautiful they may be in themselves, that are capable of making a man love a slattern!"

"Then you plainly acknowledge you hate me?" replied Mrs. Wells, at the same moment removing herself farther from him, and beginning to sob pitifully. "I did not suppose that I was to be a perpetual slave in order to keep your love."

"A slave!" answered the husband quickly, his voice rising with the warmth of his feelings—"Have I not provided you with ample means for an easy and happy life? But, Mary, I see it is all in vain. You have not a sufficient regard for my feelings, or happiness, to try to render yourself agreeable in my eyes, or to make our pleasant little home inviting. The mortifications of this day have crushed me to earth! The husband of a slattern need not try to hold up his head among men. They despise him—nay, still worse, they pity him! Howard Montague will never visit my house again. I am quite certain he intended to remain with us a day or two; but did you see the look his wife gave him when I urged him to stay over night? Oh, I could hang myself!" and he pressed his hands forcibly upon his eyes, as if to shut out the sight of some painful object.

"But you hate me, Edward," sobbed the unhappy wife, who also remembered with deep mortification the significant look which Mrs. Montague gave her husband. "You hate me, Edward, and what courage have I to try to be any thing?"

"I have not said so," replied Mr. Wells, bitterly; "but I will now say, that I have sometimes trembled for the change that my heart was undergoing! Can the wife who believes any thing will do for her husband, merely because he is married to her, expect to retain that husband's affection? Believe me, my wife, more than once have I been tempted to leave our dirty and comfortless fireside, for the bright, blazing hearth of the village tavern."

Poor Mary was alarmed. She had often pitied sadly, those sorrowful, neglected women, whose husbands frequented the tavern; and could it be possible that even she, with all her proud hopes, and high prospects, was on the eve of such a miserable fate?

"I will indeed turn a new leaf," she sighed to herself; and nestling her tearful face into her husband's bosom, she promised him again and again to reform her careless habits.

Early on the following morning, Jane, who had designed to spend some months with her sister, received a letter from home, desiring her immediate return, as her father, who was a widower, had been taken suddenly ill, and needed her services. Accordingly she took passage in the next stage, but it was not without many sad and disappointed feelings that she left a young and only sister, who seemed at that time so greatly to need her counsel and assistance. Her home, too, was far distant, and as her father's health was precarious, it was extremely uncertain when she should be able to make the journey again.

* * * * *

Three years passed away, and Jane, who was piously engaged in endeavoring to fan and keep alive the wasting flame of her father's existence, but seldom heard from Edward Wells and his rising family; but her heart was ever with them, and not unfrequently did she spend an anxious and sorrowful hour in the recollection of her sister's failure in housekeeping, and the unhappy effect it was evidently producing on the mind of her affectionate, but high-souled husband. At length, the lonely daughter was called to follow to the grave the remains of her dear parent; and to see her native home made utterly desolate, by the removal of the last beloved object that bound her to it. Her feelings naturally turned to her only sister, and she at once determined to sell her little estate, and go and spend the remainder of her days with her.

"And, perhaps," thought she, with pleasing anticipations, as she stepped into the steamboat which was to convey her from her dear native village, "I may do something towards making the poor girl understand and perform her duty towards her husband and family."

It was just as a rich autumnal sunset shed its glory over the calm and beautiful world, that our traveller, fatigued, and covered with the dust of a long journey, entered the village where she hoped to find rest and a happy home.

"You will please drive to the residence of Edward Wells," she replied to the driver, as he tapped on the window, and enquired where she would be left.

"Well, I don't know as I know exactly where he lives now," added the fellow, carelessly; "for I heard a spell ago that he was goin' to move, and his house and furniture was goin' to be sold at vendue; but, may be it hain't taken place yet. I will just drive up and see."

Poor Jane felt an icy chill steal around her heart, and she sank back upon the seat almost fainting. At length, recovering herself, she inquired if Mr. Wells had become intemperate in his habits.

"I should think he had a little," was the unfeeling reply; while the speaker, as if pleased with the opportunity of conversing with a lady, slackened the rein, and permitted the carriage to roll so leisurely over the smooth road, that conversation might be easily carried on in a common voice.

"But what was the cause? he was once temperate," gasped Jane, after a moment's painful pause.

"To be sure he was!" answered the other.—"There never was a likelier and more thrifty young man started in our place, and he made a deal of money, too, while he carried on the store; but now he has nothing but that little beer shop you see on the left. I guess he's poor enough."

"But what was the cause of his intemperance?" again inquired Jane, in a tone of sad earnestness.

"The cause, ma'am?" returned the driver. "Well, some says one thing and some says another; but most people says his wife driv him to it. For my part, I should think that such a lazy, wasteful creature, would make any man a drunkard."

The poor sister's bitter fears were now fully realized, and sinking back into the seat, she gazed out of the carriage window with that stern yet vacant stare which declares the tearless sorrow of a wrung and despairing heart.

At length the carriage stopped in front of the once beautiful cottage of Edward Wells; but, now, alas! how changed! The neat white fence was in many places broken down, or rudely mended with old boards; the windows were sadly patched; the large yard, once interspersed with finely shaded walks, grass plats, and rare plants, was now overgrown with weeds; and, in short, every thing about the place bespoke the home of the slattern and the drunkard.

Two ragged little children ran into the front door, at which Mrs. Wells appeared a moment after, with slip-shod shoes, dishevelled hair, and a squalid looking infant in her arms. Jane sprang to the ground, and the next moment the sisters were locked in a long and sobbing embrace.

"Our dear father is gone, Mary," at length said Jane, while her sister led her to a rocking-chair near the grate, where a sorry brand lay smouldering; "and I have come to pass the remainder of my days with you."

At the mention of their departed parent, the tears of the daughters burst forth afresh, and it was some time before either could again speak: but, finally, Mary repeated in broken accents—

"How rejoiced I am, dear sister, that you have come to live with us; but, we are poor, and oh, Jane, my husband is a drunkard!"

At that moment, Edward, who had heard his wife's remark, entered the room with a flushed face and unsteady step. He approached Jane, and shaking her hand roughly, he said, with a bitter, gloomy laugh—

"Yes, Jane, I am a drunkard, to be sure; but I am glad to see any one who ever knew me when I was a man. You are welcome to my—— I was going to say house, but I have got no house! To-morrow, we shall all be in the street!"—and shrinking back upon a battered lounge, he covered his face, and wept with all the unmanly weakness of a wretched inebriate.

That night the sisters sat up long after Edward had retired to rest—for he returned home at a much earlier hour than usual. It appeared from a repentant and candid review and acknowledgment of the past, on the part of the unhappy wife, that Mr. Wells had steadily pursued a gradual, downward course, since the time that he was visited by Howard Montague—that he had given up, by degrees, all personal pride—that he had neglected his business, frequented the tavern, ceased to provide comfortably for his family, and finally, had begun to abuse as well as to neglect them.

"Dearest sister," at length said Jane, who had been summoning all her resolution to do what she believed to be her duty, "have you not yourself contributed to your poor husband's ruin? Nay, let me deal more plainly in this most solemn and all-important matter, were you not the sole cause of his first step in the downward path?"

Mrs. Wells, who was writhing under the bitter accusations of conscience, replied only with tears, and her sister proceeded:

"You know I love you most tenderly, Mary, and would not wound your feelings needlessly, for the world; but, during my former visit here, I saw the beginning of evil, which I have ever since feared would produce the very results which indeed they have produced, and I would now admonish and counsel you with the hope of producing an entire and happy change."

"It is too late," replied Mrs. Wells. "Dear Jane, it is forever too late! I have made a great many attempts at reformation, but always failed. Edward never seemed to appreciate any thing well done, but he always observed the bad with bitter censure. I have no faculty at housekeeping, and indeed I have long ago given up all hope—all ambition. Edward hates me—my former friends have all forsaken me, and"——

She could say no more; but hiding her red and swollen eyes in her sister's lap, she wept until the very springs of life seemed exhausted.

"You only failed, Mary," answered Jane, kissing her tenderly, "because you were deficient in principle and resolution. You took a wrong view of the subject in the very beginning; and believing that almost any thing would do for your husband, you yielded to a natural want of energy, and from this source has arisen all your misfortunes. But few men can overlook such things in a wife, and love and respect her, even if they have strength of moral principle sufficient to preserve them from vice and ruin. But I still insist that a change for the better is possible, and nothing is wanting but a firm determination and constant trust in Heaven for assistance; and who knows but Edward may yet become a temperate man?"

"Oh, he's too far gone!" groaned the miserable wife. "He does not love his family or his reputation, or any thing but his tavern friends, and the vile wretches that infest his miserable grocery. These do all they can to make him my bitter enemy, and to urge him on to ruin!"

"But, sister," replied Jane, "if his home was made more pleasant, and if you were more cheerful and tidy in your appearance, perhaps he would care less for these low associates, and might thus be won back to your love and to his duty. Come, have courage, and let us make the effort."

"But you forget, Jane," answered Mrs. Wells, "that we are to have no home to-morrow, and that our poor babes will perhaps be sheltered in an open hovel!"

And the distressed mother fixed on her sister such a haggard and maniac glare, as almost to curdle her blood.

"Be calm, Mary," she replied, in a soothing tone. "The proceeds of our father's little estate are in my possession, and when the house and furniture are put up at auction, I will bid them off, and they shall still be yours."

This happy reverse of fortune was so unexpected, that Mrs. Wells could scarcely be kept from wild shrieks of joy, and she whirled about the room with such velocity, that her sister almost believed her reason was indeed unsettled; until at length being quite exhausted, she flung her arms around her neck, and laughed and tittered, and wept alternately.

When Jane laid her head on her pillow that night, it was not to sleep, but to think and plan, and to entreat Heaven earnestly to mature and bless those plans of mercy, for she was a Christian, and firmly believed in a beneficent and all-wise Power, as presiding over the affairs of men.

* * * * *

Two months passed away, and the dwelling of Edward Wells had undergone a thorough change. The house and furniture had been purchased by his wife's sister, and through her perseverance, every thing had put on a most inviting appearance. Even his careless wife looked strangely tidy, and his ragged children, though poorly clothed, were still clean, and their old garments were neatly mended: The fire, though often scanty, always burned pleasantly when he was expected, and the kitchen hearth—for they were unable to keep another fire—always shone with peculiar lustre. His meals, though often extremely coarse, were served up in the most inviting manner possible, and his family were always ready to welcome him with a smile. Though he was often very ill-natured, fault-finding, petulant, and even abusive, still he received no short or bitter words, as formerly, nor was he ever reproached, or treated with contempt, though he came home in a state of beastly intoxication. Now how was this great change effected? Was it solely by the personal exertions of the self-denying sister? No; though she did much with her own hands, yet this was not the vital principle that imparted motion to the delicate but most effective machinery. It was the power of unremitting persuasion, and of heart-yielding conviction, in a right cause; it was the earnest pleadings of a sister's eloquent love, which brought forth truth in its own pleasing and righteous array; and the constant and tireless teachings of a sister's anxious soul. These produced a stimulus in the mind which began to overcome, in earnest, the natural deficiency in energy; and a faithful picture of the painful past, kept constantly before the mind, by the soft yet unshrinking hand of love, and contrasted with what it might have been, filled the convinced heart with sorrow, and aroused a firm resolution to make a powerful effort. But, alas! few hopes and few enjoyments seemed to lie in the path of the young wife and mother. Her husband was still a drunkard, and what were her own prospects and those of her helpless children! A sister's tender and faithful love seemed almost the sole star that beamed over her gloomy night, and, but for this, she would have fainted in the race, and all must have been lost!

It was a very cold day in the middle of winter, and a terrific storm was gathering over the world. Mr. Wells, who had been shut in for some hours, now began to look out at the windows, and prepare for an evening walk.

"Oh, Jane, Jane!" groaned the disheartened wife, as the wretched inebriate started out from his pleasant fireside into the storm, to return to his base companions, "I told you it was too late; I must give up, indeed I must!"

"Give up what?" replied the dauntless heroine; "you certainly cannot mean that you intend to give up doing what always was and still is your duty to do, because your husband is intemperate? Ah, Mary, you ought constantly to keep in mind the painful fact that you"——

"I know it, Jane—I know it!—but don't upbraid me!" answered Mrs. Wells.

"I would not upbraid you, dear sister," said Jane, "but I want you to feel that if Edward dies a drunkard's death, you ought to pity and forgive him; and to smoothe as much as possible his thorny pillow, by your kindness and the strict performance of every possible duty. But let me assure you that I have not wholly given him up yet. He is naturally too noble, too good to be resigned so easily. Such a prize would be worth a long and desperate struggle. To you, sister, it is worth every thing. He is your husband, and the father of your sweet babes. Come, cheer up. Go often to the Throne of Grace, and plead for strength and wisdom. Be more patient and tender towards Edward than you have ever yet been, and it is now time to seize a favorable moment, and place the temperance pledge before him. This has already saved thousands!"

"Oh, Jane," replied Mrs. Wells, "I dare not mention that subject to him again; you know how angry he was when I spoke to him about it some weeks ago, and he has been growing worse every day since."

"But that was an unfit time, sister," returned Jane; "he was not only intoxicated, but was very angry at one of our temperance men for reproving him. We must watch an opportunity. If I am not mistaken, he has had some bitter thoughts of late—see, and within three hours, too."

At that moment the door opened, and Edward entered. The storm was so intense, and the road so drifted, that he found it impassable, and returned to spend the evening with his family.

"For," said he to himself, as he floundered through a huge drift, which turned his face homeward, "it looked so comfortable there, I was half a mind not to come out to-night; besides, there is a bottle of good old gin in the cupboard, and Mary wont scold now, if I do drink at home."

"Here, brother, let me assist you in taking off your overcoat," said Jane, with a smile, for she was rejoiced at his return, "and take this seat near the fire, for it is very cold to-night."

And she added a dry stick to the fire, which threw out a bright and cheerful blaze.

"Yes indeed," replied he, with a coarse laugh, it is as cold as the d——l. But what makes you look so d——d sober, Mrs. Wells?" he added, turning to his wife with a tone of mock respect. "Come, bring us the bottle, and let's have a good drink."

Mary instantly obeyed, but could not suppress the tears as she gave him the dreadful bottle.

"Ha!" said he, handing it back untasted, and looking upon her with more tenderness than he had shown for many months; "I wont drink it if it makes you feel so bad; but just look pleasant now, or I'll go away and stay till morning."

Mary wiped her eyes, and put on as cheerful a countenance as she could assume, and Jane was even gay; but Mr. Wells seemed uneasy. He had taken no liquor since his dinner, and the fumes of what he had taken before, were rapidly passing off. The pleasant appearance of his home reminded him of other years, and the sweet remembrance of the delights he then enjoyed, came over his changed spirit like the painful yet sadly soothing music of a departed dream. Then he had friends—he had money—he had influence. Now all were gone! Then he had a spotless reputation, and strong hopes of a long and happy future, when his children should bless his declining years. Now he had no hope but a drunkard's death, the curses of the community, and the hatred and contempt of a ruined family. No hope for time or eternity. All was lost! The loud wind howled heavily against the windows, and seemed a fit emblem of his dreary, valueless, and wasting life! He answered every gust with a groan, and gazed into the fire with such a look of hopeless agony, that his friends became alarmed, and tenderly inquired the cause of his suffering. He replied not, for the writhings of his agonised spirit were terrible; he felt that the resistless grasp of utter ruin and death was upon him, and that he was bound with a chain which he had no power to break. At length, turning suddenly to his wife, he exclaimed, with a wild gaze:

"Mary, I told you it would be so; but you would not believe me, and now it is too late! I'm lost, soul and body—my family are ruined!"

And he sank back into his chair, exhausted with strong emotions.

"No, my dear," cried his wife, clasping both his hands in hers, "nothing is wanting even now, but strong resolution; and now by all that's dear in time and eternity, resolve"——

"Yes," added the sister, whose whole heart had been going up to God in earnest cryings, "dear Edward, now for the love of your poor family, and your immortal soul, in the strength of Heaven resolve that you will taste no more strong drink."

But he pushed them from him, and again groaned:

"It's all over—it's too late!"

Jane opened a drawer, and taking out a paper, she placed it in his clenched hands, and said:

"Here, brother, is an instrument which was dictated by an angel of mercy from the throne of God—sign it, and it will save you even yet!"

He crushed it between his fingers with a convulsive shiver, still muttering wildly:

"No, no! it is too late—too late now!—Ruin and death have grasped my heart-strings!"

And he shook his head in utter despair.

"Indeed, it is not too late," exclaimed the anxious, weeping wife, kneeling before him with her infant in her arms, and clasping his knees. "Oh! husband, husband! look at your distressed wife, your helpless boy, and for their sakes sign the pledge. I was the first in the wrong, and I thought it was too late with me; but I struggled as for my life, and I have succeeded. Oh, Edward, Edward, make one mighty effort, and you are saved!"

The despairing inebriate turned his red and burning eyes upon his pleading and still beautiful wife—his infant son stretched its little hands towards him, as if pleading too—the picture was moving—the sealed heart of the husband and father melted!

"Give me a pen!" he exclaimed, with strange energy, as he smoothed the crumpled paper over his hand. "Quick! quick!"—and grasping the pen, with maniac eagerness, which Jane gave him, he wrote his name, and gave her back the paper, exclaiming, with a smile of triumph—"It is done! Oh, my wife, my children, we are all saved! I am once more a man!"

Alas! how altered was this once proud and comely looking man!—His long beard, his bright, dark hair, falling in tangled profusion over a dirty collar—his patched garments, and his ragged stockings, and old shoes, showed too plainly the dreadful and downward course of intemperance!

FRIENDSHIP IN WAR;

OR,

The Smileys and the M'Guckins.

AN IRISH TALE OF THE TIMES OF WILLIAM AND JAMES.

BY DR. M'HENRY.

Chapter I.

In the Scottish army of General Monroe, which was so actively employed against the Roman Catholic insurgents of Ireland, in the middle of the seventeenth century, was a sergeant named Samuel Smiley. He was a native of Ayrshire, and a conscientious devotee to the Solemn League and Covenant. He had entered the army sent against the insurgent Catholics, more from desire to aid in subduing the forces of what he deemed Antichrist, than from any natural propensity to a military life. His religious feelings were ardent rather than fanatic—for except to Roman Catholics, he was ready to extend toleration to all denominations of Christians; and even to Catholics, when in a state of subjugation and tranquility, he freely practised the duties of social life and good neighborhood. But in a state of subjugation he thought it necessary that they should be kept, because he believed that otherwise there would be no safety for any possessors of the reformed religion.

Such indeed was the feeling of the more zealous Protestants of all denominations, for more than two centuries after the Reformation. It was a feeling which necessarily sprung from the position of the parties. The Catholics had uniformly, and, in some countries, successfully, resisted, by severe enactments and force of arms, the progress of the Reformation, and inflicted merciless punishment on its adherents. This naturally produced retaliation; and as the Church of Rome, in the infliction of her vengeance upon heretics, made no distinction between the various sects into which they were divided, she compelled them to unite in the common cause of resistance to her authority and power. Thus all denominations of Reformers viewed the Romish religion and its professors with special horror and antipathy, and if there was one denomination of them which did so more than the rest, it was the Covenanters of Scotland. Against them, therefore, and their fellow Calvinists, the Puritans of England, the fierce denunciations of the Romish priesthood, and the sanguinary vindictiveness of their followers, were especially directed. From these religious feuds, no portion of Christendom, probably, suffered so much as Ireland, during the fierce and tedious civil war which followed the Catholic insurrection of 1641.—To reflect on the inhuman transactions of that period, is heart-sickening and harrowing. Thank Heaven! the times adapted to such transactions have passed away, and it is hoped that none similar shall ever again be witnessed on Christian ground.

Yet it is to be remarked that however much the sectarian animosity of those times may have influenced the conduct of senates and armies, and other public bodies, it did not altogether extinguish the impulses of humanity and generosity in the minds of individuals. Tradition has handed down many accounts of persons of both parties giving way to the better feelings of their nature, and forgetting all political and sectarian differences, in their social and domestic intercourse with their opponents.

Among the Protestants, Samuel Smiley was a notable example of this class of liberal belligerents.—He disliked the creed and the conduct of the Catholic insurgents, as much as any Protestant of that day, and was as zealous in his efforts to subdue them; but from individuals among them, whom it was in his power to befriend, he never withheld either his sympathy or his assistance. In his military capacity, he would pursue the armed adherents of the papacy, with vigour and fiereeness, but in private life he was ever ready to treat those who were peaceably disposed with kindness; and, when requisite, to aid them in their difficulties and administer to their wants.

Among the Catholics, Brian M'Guckin was little, if any thing, inferior to Smiley in liberality towards individual heretics, although indignant at the irreverence with which they treated the ancient creed, and willing to make any sacrifice for the restoration of papal supremacy in the land. He had joined the insurgent force of Phelim O'Neal, from patriotic as well as religious views, and scrupled not in his enthusiasm for the cause, to obey that ferocious and impolitic chieftain, in assisting, at the commencement of the rebellion, to slaughter some Protestant prisoners at the village of Portadown, conceiving that such an example of severity was requisite to intimidate the numerous Protestants of Ulster from organizing any resistance to the designs of the Catholic party. But after that horrid affair, his conduct towards the Protestants became quite changed. He not only saw the mistaken policy of the transaction, but his heart recoiled at the contemplation of its cruelty, and he resolved never again to aid in the cold-blooded destruction of human life. He indeed soon after abandoned the insurgent ranks, and returned to the cultivation of his farm, on the banks of the Inver, near Larne.

Here, although in a district chiefly inhabited by Protestants, and continually an object of suspicion and surveillance, he remained quiet and unmolested during the remaining vicissitudes of the fiercest civil war that ever afflicted Ireland. At length the restless arms of Cromwell put an end to those sanguinary scenes, and firmly established the Protestant rule.

A cruel and desolating decree against the subjugated Catholics was now issued, and executed with true Cromwellian promptitude and rigour; which drove the Catholics from their ancient homes in the three fairest provinces of the island, to new possessions allotted to them in Connaught, to which province it was intended ever after to confine the adherents of popery. The vacated lands were immediately conferred on the soldiers of the conquering party, and it happened that Samuel Smiley received the fair farm of Brian M'Guckin.

But it was only the expulsion part of the confiscatory decree that was so promptly executed. The banishment to Connaught was not so rigidly enforced, and thousands of the dispossessed Catholics, with their families, remained impoverished and heart-broken, in the vicinities of the places endeared to them by long residence and ancestral associations, and so long as they conducted themselves peaceably, and offered no molestation to the new possessors of their estates, they were permitted to remain uninjured and undisturbed, in the prosecution of such pursuits for a livelihood, as their taste suggested or their skill enabled them to follow. The family of M'Guckin was among those who preferred remaining in the vicinity of their lost possessions, to wandering afar in unknown lands, where neither the scenes nor the people had any claim on their affections.

Brian settled himself about two miles from his former residence. His new home was on the seashore, it being his intention to follow the occupation of fishing and manufacturing kelp, with the materials for which the adjacent coast abounded. Aided by two sons, he carried on those employments with success sufficient to furnish him the necessaries and some of the comforts of life. Its elegancies he despised—or rather, like too many of the despoiled Catholics at that period, he had not the heart to enjoy them.

It will be naturally supposed that the family of M'Guckin bore to that of the new possessor of the Inver farm, no great degree of good will. But Samuel Smiley had liberality enough to make allowance for the occasional ebullitions of resentment which escaped his unfortunate neighbor, and exerted himself, by soothing conduct and friendly acts, to mollify his animosity and lighten his misfortune.—Such treatment could not fail, in due time, to produce its legitimate effect on the sensitive mind of M'Guckin, who, in the faculty of appreciating kindness as well as of resenting injuries, was a true Milesian. Brian, indeed, became at length so much conciliated by the persevering kindness of Smiley, that before his death he was often heard to say that since he was doomed to resign his property to some Cromwellian soldier, he could not have desired it to go into the hands of a better man than Samuel Smiley.

Daniel, the elder of his two sons, continued after Brian's death to reside at Port-peir, the name of their new abode. The younger, whose name was Peter, being of an adventurous and somewhat aspiring disposition, entered into the British naval service, during the Dutch war, in the reign of Charles the second. Before that event, however, Brian had gone to a world untroubled by religious strife, to which he was in a few years followed by Samuel Smiley, whose only son, John, succeeded to the farm of Inver, and continued to treat Daniel with the same liberality and kindness with which his father had so wisely treated Brian.

The position of the two families continued much in this condition until early in the reign of James II, when an incident occurred which threatened serious interruption to the tranquility and easiness of feeling which had so long existed between them.

A son of John Smiley, named Charles, was the favoured lover of a beautiful young woman, named Margaret Berkley, the daughter of a thriving Presbyterian farmer, in the neighbourhood of M'Guckin's residence. On this young woman, heretic as she was, Connolly M'Guckin, a son of Daniel, had strongly fixed his affections From the impulse of good nature and an unwillingness to give offence, Margaret did not harshly or decisively repel the first intimations of his attachment. This encouraged Connolly to a degree of boldness in his suit, which became annoying, and which she found necessary to check, in language so decisive, as to leave him nothing to hope.

The practice of celebrating Easter Monday by rural amusements, was then, as it still is, universal among the younger classes in Ireland. On that day in the year 1687, a large assemblage repaired to a field near the sea-shore, about a mile from M'Guckin's residence, for the purpose of pastime and festivity. Among them were Margaret Berkley and her accepted lover, Charles Smiley. During the day Connolly M'Guckin also appeared on the scene. It is unnesary to describe the sports of the occasion: it is enough for our purpose to say that dancing was among them, and that Margaret Berkley consented several times to become the partner of Connolly. This she did partly from motives of civility, but chiefly from a desire to soothe any irritation of feeling he might experience from her undisguised preference of the society of his rival, who, aware of her motive, felt no jealousy, and nothing occurred on the field to disturb the harmony of the occasion.

It was drawing towards the evening when the assemblage began to leave the ground; and a beautiful evening it was, as bright and balmy as if it had been made on purpose to administer to the enjoyments of the rural revellers. Induced, by the sweetness and stillness of the scene, and a desire for the unobserved enjoyment of each other's society, Charles and Margaret retired early from the field of merriment, to ramble along a solitary part of the coast. Their walk was on a rugged and narrow beach, with the sea on their right hand, and on their left a range of high and precipitous banks, overgrown with bramble and wild hazel. Here, absorbed in the delights of each other's presence, and forgetful of all the world besides, they strolled onward until their progress was stopped by a bold promontory of bare rock, projecting into the sea, but perforated by a large tunnel-like cavern, called, from the ebony colour of the rock through which it passed, the "Black Cave." It was accessible from the south, the direction in which our lovers had approached it, by a flight of rude steps formed, by very little artificial aid, from the natural shelvings of the rock. From this remark it will be seen that this southern entrance was considerably elevated above the level of the beach. At this entrance the floor was smooth and dry, made of clay, and having every appearance of having once been tenanted. About eight or ten yards from the entrance, however, this habitable appearance terminated at a place where the cave became greatly narrowed and formed little else than a steep, rugged passage, inclining downwards, in a northern direction, until it formed an opening, into which, at every swell of the tide, the ocean poured its waters, sometimes with a calm, solemn sound, and often, when lashed into fury by the northern wind, with a terrifying clamour, rushing amidst immense breakers of basaltic strength, which guarded the cavern aperture, as if it would demolish those huge ramparts, and tear the rock-ribbed fabric which they protected, into fragments. This approach of the sea, rendered egress by that outlet of the cavern impossible, except by the difficult and somewhat dangerous process of clambering over the high and craggy rocks with which it was thus bounded.

We have been intentionally minute and carefully accurate in this description of one of the first scenes of nature's formation, which impressed the young imagination of the narrator of these historic incidents with reverence for the grandeur and sublimity of the Creator's works, because its awe-inspiring features no longer exist in the majestic and fancy-filling wildness with which, throughout the course of countless generations, they had awakened emotions of veneration and holy dread in the bosoms of men.

The irresistible and—utilitarians must pardon the epithet, for I must use it—the profaning hand of modern improvement, within these three years—for, until 1840, the whole scene remained as nature had made it—has, with incredible labor, transformed this cave, "for Druid wisdom long renowned," into a passage through which is carried a very level, useful, and it must be conceded, handsome Queen's highway, on which Her Majesty's liege may crawl or canter, as suits their circumstances, with great ease and convenience. Alas! this scene, so long the favourite haunt of peace, piety, and poetry, is destined in future to be the resort of traffic, toil, profligacy, pride, and worldly contention. Frequented now by commerce and traversed by fashion, it may never again awaken emotions such as it did forty years ago, when made the subject of the following stanzas:

A SCENE ON THE COAST

OF THE COUNTY OF ANTRIM, IRELAND.

Where yonder raven croaks aloud
His dire forebodings to the sky;
Where yon stern cliffs salute the cloud,
And awe the wonder-gazing eye;

There in the early morn of life,
Along the wildly pleasing shore,
Unknown to trouble, noise or strife,
Save the hoarse ocean's breaking roar;

I passed the sweetest of my days,
In harmless mirth and joy serene,
Ere I had tried in youthful lays,
To paint the grandeur of the scene.

I had not sung yon summit's crest
Where daring eagles love to stand,
And where the evening sunbeams rest,
While gathering shadows shroud the strand;

Nor sung the cave which legends say,
From where yon sullen steep impends,
Through earth's dark windings holds its way,
Till bright in golden halls it ends!

'Midst pensile rocks o'erhung with wood,
Far from the busy haunts of men,
You briar-entangled trackless road,
Leads to the wily fox's den.

And yon dark bulwark of the shore,
In surly state and scornful pride,
Undaunted bears the ocean's roar,
And checks the boldness of the tide!

Up yon rude steps the grot is seen
For Druid wisdom long renowned,
And still where ghosts of bards convene
And spread inspiring horror round!

Seek'st thou, oh! melancholy Sage!
The converse of departed souls;
Make this thy solemn hermitage—
Here death his awful page unrolls.

Here Erin's chiefs have oft repaired,
Awe-struck to hear the will of Heaven;
Oft hence, by Druid's voice declared,
The tenor of their fate was given.

And oh! as stern misfortune's child
Sought comfort at this holy shrine,
How oft has mercy on him smiled,
And given the light of hope to shine!

How oft proud guilt has vainly tried,
With splendid offerings here for grace!
"Avaunt! repent!" the Druid cried,
"Nor dare profane this holy place!"——

As lately here my steps were led,
Depressed by lowering prospects drear,
While sacred awe my mind o'erspread,
A god-like voice assailed my ear:

"Youth of the impassioned pensive breast,
Who wanderest hither to repine,
Where Ossian's honoured ashes rest,
With those of many a bard divine—

"Grieve not, though fortune mock thy toil,
Though grandeur view thee with disdain;
But court the Muse, her blissful smile
Shall be the opiate of thy pain.

"What though thy sorrow-troubled mind
Hath felt the world's unrighteous scorn!
In glooms like these, relief thou'lt find
For all the evils thou hast borne.

"Then sing with ardour undismayed—
'Tis Ossian's self presents the lyre;
Oft from his clond thy flights he'll aid,
And lend a portion of his fire.

"But check the too aspiring thought,
Nor strive to emulate his fame;
His art thou never can'st be taught—
'Twas favouring Heaven's immediate flame.

"Yet Erin's sons shall be thy care,
Their griefs and joys may suit thy lay;—
And oh! her lovely daughters fair,
None can inspire so well as they!"

I vowed assent, the lyre I strung,
And swept the chords in raptured mood;
The throbbing impulse wild I sung,
Which warms the tide of Irish blood!

Inspiring scene! to me so dear,
Blest be thy solemn pleasing frown;
Poetic honours may'st thou wear
Long as the clouds thy summits crown!

If, doomed by fate from thee to part,
I roam beneath a foreign sky,
Thy strong remembrance in my heart
Both time and distance shall defy.

When hardship chills my bosom's core,
For warmth I'll fondly turn to thee;
And still thy holy haunted shore
Shall be Castalia's fount to me.

Chapter II.

Charles and Margaret entered the cave with the view of passing by its northern outlet into the open country, but the influx of the sea was too great, and they were obliged to return. They had scarcely reached the narrow path on the beach, when the contents of a gun fired at Charles struck his left leg, and he fell. Margaret uttered a scream of terror and fainted. When she recovered, she found Connolly M'Guckin supporting her, and Charles, with his limb fractured, lying beside her. She soon perceived the nature of Charles' misfortune.

"Oh! who has been guilty of this murderous act?" she wildly inquired.

"Be not alarmed," said Charles; "it is not a deadly wound. It is only a broken limb, which will be well in a few weeks."

"Ha!" she exclaimed, fearfully, a sudden thought striking her as she looked on M'Guckin. "Has this been intentional?—and are we yet in your power?"

Connolly's emotions for some moments deprived him of utterance. At length he said—

"I will confess it! Margaret!—Charles!—will you forgive me? No, no!—I do not deserve forgiveness. I am a villain!—a murderous villain! Yes, Charles, I aimed at your life, and shall surrender myself to justice!"

"You are truly sorry for your rashness, I perceive," said Charles, "and I therefore forgive you. I can account for it all."

So saying, he gave his hand to Connolly in token of forgiveness.

"This makes me feel that I am doubly a villain," replied Connolly. "Margaret, will you also forgive me? I swear never more to injure Charles!"

"On that condition I do willingly forgive you," she answered. "But Charles is in great pain. We must have him taken to the nearest house."

"I will carry him on my shoulders," said Connolly.

This was accordingly done, and Charles was soon placed in comfortable lodging, and in the hands of a surgeon. But Connolly that night disappeared from the neighbourhood, and no one could tell whither he had fled.

Charles Smiley recovered in due time, and shortly afterwards became the husband of Margaret Berkley.

About this time, the Protestant cause in Ireland became overcast with the most gloomy prospects.—A bigotted Catholic was on the throne, and a Viceroy of the same faith, if not quite so bigotted to his own creed, at least as determined in hostility to that of the Protestants, governed the island. All offices, civil and military, became rapidly filled by Catholics, and the Protestants were soon deprived of every species of authority in either the magistracy or the army. This naturally caused alarm, and produced a spirit of resistance in the minds of thousands of determined and energetic men, whose resistance could not be otherwise than hazardous for any government to encounter. But the impolitic conduct of Tyrconnel, the Irish Viceroy, was only in unison with that of the rash and besotted monarch himself, whose arbitrary proceedings in England, soon brought about the great revolution which drove him from the throne, and placed on it, in his stead, the Protestant champion, William of Nassau.

Before this event took place, however, every stronghold in Ireland, with the exception of one or two places in Ulster, was, by the activity of Tyrconnell, secured to the interest of James. Among the few places which resisted the introduction of Catholic garrisons, was Londonderry, which, in consequence, underwent one of the most memorable sieges on record. The management of this siege was committed to Count de Rosen the commander of the French forces sent by Louis XIV. to Ireland in support of the cause of James. The Count was a man totally destitute of humanity; and being exasperated by the obstinacy of the besieged, against whom he had in vain for many months exerted every effort which a numerous and well-appointed army enabled him to command, he at length resorted to an expedient to compel their surrender, of a character so unprecedented for barbarity as to excite the horror of all men, and draw remonstrances from General Hamilton, the commander of the Irish portion of the besieging army, who represented that the extreme dissatisfaction which the measure produced among the Irish officers and soldiers, might lead to a mutiny. The measure was indeed well calculated to horrify the mind of every one possessed of the least spark of human feeling; and it is but justice to the Irish Catholic army of James II., to state that its conduct was marked with none of the sanguinary ferocity which characterized the rebellious forces of 1641, into whom the furious Phelim O'Neal had infused his fierce hatred of heretics. It would have been well for the cause of James, if his French auxiliaries had been as little disposed to the infliction of useless cruelty on his Protestant opponents, as his Irish adherents.

The savage measure to which Count de Rosen now resorted, was that of seizing on the Protestant inhabitants of the adjacent country, even those who had received protections from the magistrates of James, and were living peaceably in a state of strict neutrality, and driving them, men, women, and children, in thousands to the walls of Derry, there to famish in sight of the garrison, unless the city should be surrendered. An immense multitude of all ages and both sexes, was accordingly collected, and driven, by unrelenting foreign soldiery, to the walls of the city, at a time when the garrison could administer nothing to their wants, being itself suffering under all the evils of extreme famine.

Among the captives thus driven from their homes, were Charles Smiley and his young and beautiful wife. On the very day of their arrival at Derry, a French officer, named Maumont, cast his licentious eyes on Margaret, and made overtures to her, accompanied by acts of personal liberties, which, arousing the indignation of her husband, he, by a strong effort, broke the cord that tied his hands together, and, snatching a musket from a soldier, with the butt end of it felled Maumont to the ground.

Smiley was, of course, immediately secured, and de Rosen condemned him to be shot the next morning. In the meantime Margaret had obtained another protector, for a young Irish officer, who had witnessed the transaction, had, in the confusion, caught her in his arms, and carried her to the tent of General Hamilton for safety. To the general he related the particulars of the transactions, and obtained from him a promise that she at least should be protected.

"As for her husband," said Hamilton, "I fear that my interference in his behalf with de Rosen will avail nothing. The Frenchman is, unfortunately, my superior in command; and the obstinacy of the people of Derry has so exasperated him, that he is furious in his denunciations against all Protestants. Besides Colonel Maumont is his particular favorite. But as the execution does not take place until to-morrow, I promise you, Colonel, and your fair protegee, that I will do my best to save her husband."

"I know you will," replied the young Colonel.—"But pardon me if I intimate that, in case your personal interference be not successful, an interference of a more irresistible nature may be made. I have a gallant regiment whose hearts are sickened at witnessing the cruelties of those savage foreigners."

"Beware of mutiny," said the General. "It might destroy our hopes of ever taking this obstinate town, and ruin the royal cause. Yet I respect the feelings of your regiment. The Ulster Greens are noble fellows. But their interference in this matter would be the signal for every Irish regiment to mutiny against this foreign commander. I fear, indeed—I fear extremely, the result of this business!" added the General, half muttering to himself as he reflected on its effect on the public cause.

Margaret, whose thoughts were only on her husband, supposing that the words were expressive of the General's sense of the hopelessness of any effort to save him, fell on her knees, and, in agonized accents, besought the two officers, as men possessing the feelings of men and the hearts of Christians, to save him in whom her life was bound up. The young Colonel looked on her a moment. Then turning to General Hamilton:

"General," said he "do your best with that monster, de Rosen. If you succeed, all shall be quiet.—But if not—I swear to this lady, that her husband shall not die unavenged!"

So saying, the Colonel withdrew.

"He has a gallant and fearless spirit," remarked Hamilton. "I know he will keep his oath. It is mutinous. But I will not betray him, for it springs from a generous impulse; besides he is too popular in the army to be safely brought into trouble for such a cause. De Rosen is an impolitic madman. I must, if possible, bring him to his senses or our affairs will be ruined." He then committed Margaret to the care of a guard, with instructions to convey her from the camp, to the house of a neighboring gentleman, where he knew she would be safe and kindly treated.

The intercession of Hamilton in favor of Charles Smiley was, as he had feared, unsuccessful; and he terminated his interview with de Rosen in a state of mind so indignant at the cavalier reception he had met with, that he felt inclined, should the Ulster Greens make any resistance to the execution of Smiley, to support them with the whole force of the Irish regiments.

General Hamilton had not proceeded far from De Rosen's head-quarters, when he perceived a great commotion among the besieging troops, who were gazing at a gallows, which, during the night, the garrison had erected on a conspicuous part of the city walls. Nearly at the same time, he was approached by a messenger who delivered him a letter signed by a number of the principal prisoners in the hands of the garrison, who had been captured at various times, in the sallies made by the besieged. In this letter the prisoners stated that the authorities of Derry had sentenced them to be hung at 6 o'clock that afternoon, in case the famishing multitude outside the walls were not set at liberty before that time. They begged earnestly, therefore, that their lives might be saved by granting permission to those starving people to depart.

Hamilton hastened back to De Rosen with this alarming intelligence, for several of the prisoners were noblemen and military leaders of high distinction, among the adherents of James. When De Rosen read this communication he became inclined to yield to the urgency of the case. But did not finally consent to the prayer of the prisoners, till he received a despatch, which arrived during the conference from Dublin from James himself, who had, some days before, received intelligence of the Count's barbarous design, in which the monarch ordered him to desist from its execution.

"Let the heretical wretches go," he cried on reading this despatch, "since the king wishes it, and our friends in the rebels' hands will otherwise be hung. Go," said he to an officer near him, "tell the guards to let them depart, and let us hear no more complaints about this matter!"

Hamilton now made another effort to save Charles Smiley; but in vain.

"I think," said De Rosen, "I have just done enough to please the goddess of mercy. She cannot expect I will flatter her so far as to relinquish the vengeance due on the knave who dared to strike Maumont; where is the knave's death-warrant."

The awful warrant was produced, and he signed it, ordering the execution to take place immediately.

General Hamilton made his bow and withdrew from the Frenchman's presence, full of chagrin and indignation, not unmingled with apprehension for the result. He had not proceeded far when he beheld the fine regiment of the Ulster Greens drawn up within view of the execution ground. Its Colonel approached him and inquired whether he had succeeded in saving Smiley.

"No, Colonel, there is no mercy in the heart of that savage."

"Then we will show him that there is mercy elsewhere," replied the Colonel.

At that moment a troop of French fusileers was seen marching to the execution ground, with the prisoner in the centre of their ranks. They halted, and the prisoner was conducted towards a stake to which he was soon bound, when twelve soldiers were drawn out from the troop as executioners, and stationed in the position whence they were to fire at him. At this moment, Margaret, who had secretly left the house, to which Hamilton had sent her for safety, arrived upon the scene, and, rushing towards her husband, caught him in her arms, and clung to him in the desperate desire to die with him. Two soldiers were ordered to separate them, and were proceeding to do so, when the attention of all on the field, was attracted by the following word of command, given by a loud and energetic voice,

"Ulster Greens! Forward! March!"

At double quick time, that stately regiment, with their young and gallant Colonel leading the way, advanced into the space between the executioners and the prisoner. There, at their Colonel's command they halted, and turned their faces to the French troop and the executioners. To set the prisoner free and conduct him and Margaret off the ground to a place of safety under an escort of one hundred resolute Ulster Greens, was an achievement accomplished before any order to oppose it could arrive from De Rosen, and that order, when it did arrive, was rendered powerless by the spontaneous cheers of approbation which hailed the act of the Ulster Greens, from the voices of an Irish army of nearly eighteen thousand men, with General Hamilton at its head. The Count De Rosen now perceived the necessity of yielding to the General's wish, by ordering that the rescued prisoner, as well as those who effected his rescue, should be pardoned, and the whole transaction be subject to no further notice. General Hamilton congratulated him on this termination of the affair; and assuring him of the entire obedience of the Irish soldiers to his command, the two became, at last, ostensibly reconciled. As for the gallant Colonel of the Ulster Greens, he had left the field at the head of the escort which conveyed Smiley and his beautiful and faithful wife, beyond the reach of danger.—He then, before leaving them, took Smiley by the hand and said—

"I hope now I may expect from you entire forgiveness for once attempting to take that life which I have this day had the happiness to save."

"I had from the first sincerely forgiven you, for I saw the sincerity of your repentance," replied Charles. "You have now not only atoned for that act of youthful rashness, but you have laid me under a debt of gratitude which I shall never be able to repay."

"And you, Mrs. Smiley," said the Colonel, "can you so readily forgive the indiscreet Connolly McGuckin, who, blinded by youthful passion, dared to commit a crime which he has long since sorely repented, but for which he hopes he has this day made some atonement?"

"Fervently—fervently," she replied with an animation that filled her beautiful eyes with moisture, "do I forgive you, Connolly, as a from my heart do I thank you for the great deliverance which God has enabled you to effect for us this day. Oh! whenever you think of Charles and me, think of us as friends who will never cease to pray for your welfare."

"I am now satisfied," said the Colonel. "I am now happy. Therefore, farewell!"

"But Colonel McGuckin!" said Charles, "Is it prudent for you to return to the camp? Are you not in danger from this day's transaction?"

"I believe," replied the Colonel, "I have but little to fear. General Hamilton himself encouraged my proceedings, and the brave Ulster Greens, a thousand strong, will not permit a hair of my head to fall.—So, farewell, and carry with you my good wishes to all our friends in our native valley, where I hope we shall yet meet in peace and friendship."

Chapter III.

About twelve months after the foregoing events, the sovereignty of James terminated in Ireland, by his flight to France, after the battle of the Boyne, when William, marching to Dublin, assumed the government of the country. The victory of the Boyne, although immediately decisive of the fate of the rival monarchs, was far from determining that of their armies. The Catholic soldiers, although deserted by their king, retired from the field in good order, and their leaders, bitterly mortified at the royal poltroonery by which they had lost the day, proposed to some of William's officers to fight the battle over again, provided the two armies exchanged kings.—From this and other indications of an unsubdued spirit, William perceived that, although the crown was his own, much hard fighting must yet take place before he could become possessed of the entire country.

But the story of Smiley and McGuckin, not of William and Mary, is the subject of this narrative.—They had both been in the engagement at the Boyne, Smiley at the head of a volunteer company of horsemen, called the Larne Rangers, raised but for temporary service, and McGuckin at the head of his Irish Greens. Their eyes caught each other early in the engagement, they exchanged salutes, and sought other enemies. The Irish Greens pushed onward to the bank of the river where Duke Schomberg's division had just effected a passage. They drove the Duke's men back into the stream and took himself prisoner. His men, perceiving his disaster, returned to the bank of the river, and firing a volley at the Greens, killed the Duke himself on the spot, and, in a moment after, the celebrated military clergyman, Walker, the brave defender of Londonderry, fell by the fire which McGuckin's regiment returned upon Schomberg's troops, whom Walker was urging to their leader's rescue. At this juncture, King William having just crossed the water at the head of a body of Enniskilleners, perceived at a glance the dangerous position of Schomberg's division, and, hastening with too much personal impetuosity to its assistance became separated from his men, and would have been captured or slain by the Irish Greens, a party of whom had wheeled towards him, when the Larne Rangers with Charles Smiley at their head, rushed between him and danger. The monarch, conscious of the importance of this intrepid movement, joined the Rangers and exclaimed, "My brave friends! I am your king; what will you do for me?"

Smiley, waving his sword in the air, replied,

"We will conquer or die for your Majesty!"

Although only about one hundred in number, they spurred their horses, and rushed recklessly on the Irish Greens, who met them with the bayonet. About one-third of them fell, and the rest for a moment recoiled, when William, whose energy and skill that day proved him worthy of the victory he gained, with incredible speed hurried to their rescue the approaching squadrons of Enniskilleners, which M'Guckin perceiving, and being unwilling uselessly to destroy more of the Larne Rangers, many of whom he personally knew, and especially unwilling to endanger the life of Charles Smiley, retired with his regiment to the adjoining hill of Donore. Here the Greens formed a rallying point for other regiments of both horse and foot, which were routed by the irresistible Enniskilleners, now supported by the whole left wing of William's army, which had just crossed the water. But on this hill the Irish forces made such a desperate stand, that William's army fell back in some confusion. This was the critical moment of the battle—General Hamilton saw it, and at the head of a strong body of Irish cavalry, charged the wavering battallions of William, and would have snatched the victory from that monarch's standard, but for an attack on the particular troop which he personally led, by the Larne Rangers, which threw it into confusion, while Charles Smiley rushed upon the General and made him prisoner. William's troops then renewed the attack, and the Irish army retreated to Duleck, where they had the mortification to learn that James had fled while William remained master of the field.

Thus was gained a victory, which, more than any other of modern times, has influenced the affairs of mankind, not so much from the disasters of the losing army, as from the flight of the monarch for whom it fought. William indeed was so conscious that the Irish army was still in a condition to fight, that when General Hamilton was brought into his presence, he inquired whether he thought it would do so. The General replied,

"Upon my honour, I think it will!"

"Honour! Your honour!" said William, with bitter irony, alluding to Hamilton having deceived him in a negociation with the Lord Lieutenant Lyrconnel, which he had entrusted to his management.

The King then turned to Charles Smiley, who had brought Hamilton into his presence.

"My brave friend," said he, "you have done good work to-day. How shall I reward you?"

The reply of Smiley proves the single-heartedness of the Presbyterians of that day, and how dearly they valued the prosperity of their Church. Forgetting, or rather disdaining personal considerations, Charles thought only of the welfare of that beloved Church, which had suffered such long and cruel persecutions from the tyrannical Stuarts, and he piously asked for her the royal protection and favour. It is true, that in asking for this, he knew that he gratified the wishes of every member of his gallant Rangers, each of whom he considered as fully entitled to participate in the royal boon, as himself. William was struck with the piety of the request, and promptly complied with it, and from that day the Presbyterian Church in Ireland has not only been free from persecution, but has received an annual endowment from the national purse.

Having performed such essential services to the cause for which they had armed themselves, the Larne Rangers, with thankful hearts, relinquished their military occupation, and returned to their quiet and now secure homes in that pleasant valley which is yet inhabited by their posterity.

Although deserted by its King, the army of the Catholic Irish had not suffered so much by its discomfiture at the Boyne, as to induce its leaders to give up the contest. Concentrating their forces under General Sarsfield, they determined to continue the war, and among other plans of offensive operation, the recovery of the strong hold of Carrickfergus, was entrusted to Connolly M'Guchin, in consequence of a secret correspondence he had established with an officer of the garrison, who in revenge of an insult he had received from the governor, had resolved to betray the castle. This officer, whose name was Brenan, was an acquaintance of M'Guckin, whom by agreement he met at the village of Templepatrick, a few miles from Carrickfergus, for the purpose of arranging the terms and mode of the surrender. To avoid suspicion, M'Guckin assumed the disguise of a peasant. They met at an inn, the landlord of which had his suspicions excited as to their business, by accidentally overhearing certain expressions about the inefficient character of the garrison, from which all the effective men, and most of the ammunition, had been drawn by William for the use of his army. The consequence of the landlord's suspicions was the arrest of both M'Guckin and Brenan. In a day or two afterwards they were tried by a court-martial, and found guilty. Brenan was sentenced to be shot, and M'Guckin, as a spy, to be hung. The sentence of Brenan was immediately executed, that of M'Guckin was fixed for the next day.

Charles Smiley felt deeply for the unfortunate M'Guckin. Gratitude for saving him from the death to which he had been doomed by De Rosen, in the camp at Derry, wrought strongly on his mind. He attended the opening of the court-martial, and from the character of its members, and the positive nature of the testimony, he soon perceived that in Carrickfergus nothing could be done for the prisoner's safety. He waited no longer. He hastened to the principal inn, hired a swift horse, which he rode at full speed to Lisburn, there he obtained a fresh one, which he rode to Newry, a third carried him rapidly to Drogheda, and a fourth to Dublin. It was evening when he galloped desperately past the sentinel into the castle yard, exclaiming that he had important business with the King. He was seized, and information of the incident immediately communicated to his Majesty, who ordered him into his presence. William at once recognized the gallant captain of the Larne Rangers, and the captor of General Hamilton.

"Ha!" said he, "my brave soldier of the Boyne! what is the matter?"

"A pardon from you Majesty, to save the life of one of the noblest-hearted men in your dominions, and one to whose fearless magnanimity I am indebted for mine."

"I owe you more, my gallant friend," said William, "than granting a pardon to one man will repay. But if his crime be great, it may be wrong—it may be impolitic. What has he done?"

Charles briefly related the nature of the offence, adding that, anticipating the decision of the court martial, and a speedy execution of the sentence, he did not wait till the termination of the trial, lest his return to Carrickfergus with the pardon might be too late for the safety of his friend.

"Right, right," cried William; "prompt action is proof of a good soldier, as well as a good friend. You say he saved your life at Derry?"

"Yes, my liege—from the savage sentence of De Rosen."

"Ha! I think I have heard of it. Your wife had been insulted by the libertine Maumont, and you struck him?"

"I did, sire."

"Brave man!" exclaimed William, "your friend shall live! But you are too much fatigued to return in time to save him. I will send an express."

"I will, sire, with your permission, be the bearer of your pardon. I can trust no one else."

"Your are right," said William.

In a few minutes the pardon had the royal seal annexed to it; one of the king's fleetest horses was at the door, and Charles Smiley, after swallowing a goblet of wine, was in full gallop to the North. The king ordered him not to spare the horse, and Charles literally obeyed him. Two hours brought him to Drogheda, where the royal steed, according to tradition, died the next day. According to previous arrangement, another horse was here in readiness, and Charles, in a few minutes, was again on his way.—This horse was exchanged at Newry, and a fourth was mounted at Lisburn.

It was about 10 o'clock, A. M., on the 16th of August, 1690, when Connolly M'Guckin was conveyed from the Castle of Carrickfergus to the place of execution, about half a mile southward of the town. The procession, attended by a large concourse of people, had halted beneath the gallows, the prisoner had performed his devotions, and was taking a last farewell of some friends, when the attention of the spectators was attracted by a man on horseback, waving a white handkerchief, and rapidly approaching towards them. A minute more brought him upon the scene, and the sound of "pardon!" which he hurriedly uttered, was instantly echoed by thousands of voices. He flung himself off his panting horse, and in a moment more was locked in the embrace of his rescued friend.

On that day, the feud between the Smileys and the M'Guckins became extinguished forever.

WANITA,
THE BEAUTY OF THE HILLS.

BY T. MAYNE REID.

In one of the wildest and most remote districts of Texas, one hundred miles northwest from San Antonio, and almost as far from any other Christian settlement, may be seen the ruined remains of an old Spanish outpost, called by the Mexicans of the present day "Casa del Sangre," (House of Blood). It is situated on a hill overlooking the San Saba river, about forty miles above its confluence with the Colorado. The old grey walls, embraced by a green trellis work of parasitical plants, and overshadowed by huge live oaks, form a picturesque feature on the landscape, rarely witnessed, however, except by the adventurous hunter and the wild savage of the hills.

The fort, originally called Sabano, was built for the protection of a silver mine, that was worked by the early Spanish settlers. The latter has been long since abandoned. Part of the valley contiguous to the fort has been under cultivation, for the ridges may still be traced, and, among the crumbling walls some fruit trees, and half a dozen plants of the aloe species still flourish, exciting the mind of the traveller to a keen and romantic interest.

There is something irresistibly pleasing in the contemplation of these old deserted settlements—they beget strange imaginings of the past—in which we can fancy interesting scenes of industry and enterprise—wild adventures with savage foemen—captivity, torture, and death—and the mysterious name of this old fortress, together with its dismantled condition, told that other agency than that of time had aided in its destruction.

It was with feelings of no common curiosity, that a small party of adventurers, consisting of three Texans, two Mexican gentlemen from San Antonio, and the writer of the present article, with our Indian guide, alighted before the deserted outpost of Casa del Sangre. Our expedition hither had been undertaken for the purpose of examining the condition of the mine already referred to. It was not without danger, as the valley of the San Saba lay in the very heart of the Comanche hunting ground, though the conditions of the late treaty between our Government and the Comanche nation would sufficiently protect us if observed—if not, there were seven of us (our guide being a half-blood, and more Mexican than Indian,) well armed—and well used to forest fighting.

It was nearly noon when we reached the ruin, and we concluded before proceeding to the mine to take our mid-day repast. Fastening our horses to the hanging branches of a huge willow, we seated ourselves in the cool shade of a clump of luxuriant live oaks. Dried deer flesh, slices of buffalo tongue, and tortilla cakes, soon appeared from out our saddle pouches, and almost as hastily disappeared, and then small flagons of aguardiente came forth, and were applied to thirsting lips, that blessed the luck we had met in the last rancho—and after frequent applications of this sort, silence gave place to a general and interesting conversation, and the toils and perils of the journey were—for a while at least—forgotten.

"Where is Basano?" cried a voice; "Senor Basano!"

"He's in the ruin," answered the guide."

"'Tis very strange," observed a Texan; "he crossed himself when we first came in sight of the fort, and twice again as we forded the river, muttering all the while his 'por amor Dios,' and his 'nuestra Senoras'—'tis very strange. I have known Basano ten years, and I always thought him a sensible man."

"Why, Lopez, is off too," whispered another Texan, pointing to the young Don, who had left our party, and was walking with undue solemnity towards the fort. "I tell you what it is, gents, the Mexicans are mad."

We had all come to the conclusion that something certainly was the matter, and to tell the truth, unworthy suspicions were beginning to intrude themselves. We were here in a country a hundred miles from any American settlement, and should these Mexicans, to favor some views of their late government———we looked towards half a dozen rifles, and as many pair of pistols, that lay within a short distance.

"Bah, gentlemen, for shame! Senores Lopez and Basano are our comrades, and as good Texans as any of us—it's only some twist in the ways of 'Mother Church.'—See! they are coming out."

As he spoke, the two Mexicans stepped out from the ruin. Basano, the elder, approached a large maguey that grew in front, and drawing his machette, he severed two or three slips from the plant, which after pruning a little, he tied behind the saddle of his mustang. This puzzled us still more. What he could want with a bunch of aloe shoots was beyond our conjecture, and we waited for the result. After having properly secured the slips and sheathed his hunting knife, he approached. Curiosity was pictured in our countenances, and the Mexican perceived it.

"Ah! Caballeros, you are wondering why I maimed the poor maguey—I hated to do it."

"Why, in truth, Senor Basano, that, and some other little matters, have puzzled us not a little."

"Well, then, Senores, I will explain the circumstance; but you will have to listen to a long legend."

"A legend?"

"Yes—the legend of the Brazos de Dios."

"With pleasure, Senor Basano," cried several voices at once; "but first take a cup of the best water in Texas, mixed with the worst brandy."

Our brandy or aguardiente, (for it was the mescal of the Mexicans) was wretched, to American palates, but a spring of water, clear and cold as ice, gurgled forth from a rock at our feet, and after bubbling through a miniature lake of crystal, fringed with lilies, sparkled away towards the San Saba.

We now seated ourselves on fragments of rock, each one having taken a fresh pull at his flagon, while the "vuelta de Abejo," in Yankee parlance, "the weed," was passed from hand to hand. Cigars too were lit, and we waited patiently for Don Basano to commence the Legend.

After making the "sacred sign" with due solemnity, the Mexican proceeded:

"Senores, it is more than forty years since I first saw the Casa del Sangre—you are surprised at what I have said, (we were surprised, as none of us supposed Don Basano to be much over forty years of age,) "but you need not—I was born within those very walls! Fifty years ago, where you now see only a pile of crumbling mason work, stood a handsome and well-built castle, and, along the hill-side, down to the spot where we are sitting, were upwards of an hundred houses—but they were of wood, and the fire has left no trace of them—no, not a single beam!"

Don Basano remained for a moment silent. He was evidently grappling with some painful recollection of the past; and the unusual solemnity of his manner, prevented us from interrupting his reverie. He at length continued:

"The valley, as far as yonder bend in the river, was cleared and cultivated, and fields of maize and cotton, and maguey, stretched away back to the hills; but this was when I was but a child, and I can barely recollect the settlement. It has been often described to me by one who survived that fearful night. I returned to see it ten years after, and I then saw the corn growing wild, but no hand to gather it; and here and there plants of the maguey, as you see them now, stunted and shrivelled, and eaten by the buffalo and the wild oxen of the hills. I returned to see the place of my nativity in ruins!—to see those walls, the only remains of a prosperous settlement, not as they are now, garlanded with vines and flowers, but bare and desolate—wasted and blackened with the fire that had consumed their roofs! I returned then, and many times since, to seek for vengeance upon the murderers of my mother, and with my comrades I found it, (though God's arm had amply avenged us,) and many a Comanche had good cause afterwards, to rue the burning of the Casa de Sangre! I am straying from my tale, Senores, but I shall now proceed."

We had now become deeply interested in the feelings of our Mexican companion. His strange behaviour was sufficiently accounted for. We had all heard that the Casa del Sangre had been destroyed by the Indians, and that, in consequence of their hostility, the settlement had been deserted, and we were curious to hear the account of this event; and the more so, as Don Basano had been himself one of the unfortunate colonists.

"The Casa del Sangre was originally called 'Sabano.' It was only after the events I am about to relate, that it assumed the name of the 'Bloody House.' Previous to this, it was one of the most flourishing colonies in Texas. The mines of which we are in search, lie in the heart of those wooded hills, and at this time amply repaid the labour of working them. There were two hundred laborers employed in these, and in the village and fields three hundred more; both men and women were engaged in the cultivation of the soil, and in the manufacture of articles for the Indian market. Besides these, there were an hundred and fifty soldiers to garrison the fort, and there was also a mission with its church, through the influence of which many of the neighbouring Indians had been induced to join the settlement, and had become converts to the Christian religion.

"Senores, it was about this time that the government of Spain—then our government—appointed Count Roxas to the command of the fort and colony. The Count was an old Castilian, and brought along with him, besides his lady and an only son, several families of distinction, and a number of gay young men from Madrid. The Count, moreover, was a man of a quiet and beneficent disposition, and Sabano continued to prosper under his administration. His son, who was called Francisco, though of a brave and generous heart, was as wild as an antelope, and instead of assisting his father in the affairs of the colony, he spent most of his time in hunting excursions and parties of pleasure, attended by his companions from Madrid, and generally by half the soldiers of the garrison, of whom he was, under his father, lieutenant-colonel.

"In one of his hunting expeditions toward the Guadaloupe mountains, he, with his party, suddenly came upon a large Indian town, in the beautiful valley of the Rio Saco. The inhabitants were of the Comanche tribe, but made a semi-annual residence in this valley, where they had built their cottages, and had cultivated the fertile soil. Francisco and his party were received by the old Cazique with every honour, and the young lieutenant-colonel was lodged in the bohio of the chief himself. It was agreed that they should remain and spend some days in hunting in company with the host and his warriors. Nearly a week was passed in this way—many buffaloes, bears and deer were slaughtered, and there was much feasting and merriment in the Indian town.

"In the mean time, the Count Roxas, and the people at Sabano, were becoming uneasy at the long absence of the expedition, and messengers were sent from the fort in quest of them. It was not his enjoyment of the chase that detained Francisco from returning to Sabano. No—there was another, and far more powerful reason. The Cazique of this Indian tribe, had an only daughter called Wanita. She was very beautiful, and almost as fair as our own people, so that many believed she was not his daughter, but some girl stolen from the settlements on the Rio Grande. How this may have been, I cannot say,—but if true, she must have been carried away while very young, for she knew nothing of our life or language; and, moreover, the old chief had always treated her as his own child.

"Wanita was about to be married to the chief of a neighbouring tribe, and preparations were already made for the approaching nuptials, when the arrival of the Spaniards changed the course of events. The Indian maiden was struck with the splendid dress, the high command, and gallant bearing of the handsome young officer—for Don Francisco was a noble-looking youth—and, in less than twenty-four hours after his arrival, she was passionately in love with him.

"Senores, the love of the Indian maiden is unlike that of our race. It is single in its object, but irresistible as the cataract. She will brook no opposition, and will sooner die than be separated from the idol of her affections. I have known many cases, in which wrong, neglect, and desertion, were repaid by the assassination of the wronger, and afterward came the self-destruction of the wronged one. Wanita had been tenderly reared, and though, according to her father's desire, she had consented to marry Wawara, the neighbouring Cacique, it was simply a yielding to what she supposed was her destiny and duty; but now, that she had seen and loved the young chief of the pale-faced warriors, the sight of Wawara became hateful to her, and in less than a week from the arrival of the Spaniards, she told her father, in a positive and resolute manner, that she would sooner die than become his wife.

"Francisco was not less enamoured of this wild beauty of the hills. He had been captivated at first sight. As she bounded forth to meet the old chief, her father, and flung herself affectionately on his neck—then perceiving, for the first time, the handsome stranger, as she crouched by her father's side gazing upon Francisco with undisguised admiration, a less sensitive heart than that of the young officer would have been touched by her beauty. Francisco had never before seen so much grace—such elasticity of motion—such a piercing, yet lovely eye—or so finely pencilled eye-brows. Her features were all perfection, such as he had never seen, even in his native Spain; and her glossy hair, of a purple blackness, that would have s... earth, was arranged upod her beautiful head and neck, forming a coiffure that art could not imitate.

"Francisco was struck at first sight by her beauty; but when, after the expiration of a week, he became conscious of her modest purity and innocence, of her attachment to himself, which, in her simplicity, she had taken no pains to conceal, his love became deep and ardent. Though wild, and unattached to business modes of life, he inherited his father's goodness and generosity of heart. He was the last man to have taken the advantage of love, or to rob of her innocence even an Indian maiden: and when his father's messengers arrived, requiring his immediate return to Sabano, and he saw the danger of a separation, he made a formal application for her hand in marriage.

"The old chief, who was kind-hearted, and well-disposed toward the whites, would willingly have complied with his request, but he dreaded the anger of Wawara, who was much more powerful than himself. After being urged, however, by the lover, and promised the protection of the whites, he consented, and upon the next day he and his whole tribe left the valley of the Saco, and accompanied the Spaniards to Sabano, where, in due time, with the consent of Count Rosas and his lady, Don Francisco was married to the Indian Princess Wanita. The consent of Francisco's father and mother was obtained by the aid of the Padre Urbano, who was much attached to Francisco, and whose influence in the settlement was very great. The worthy father expected by this means to bring over to Christianity all the Indian tribes in the neighbourhood, for Padre Urbano was a true man of God, and was beloved by all who knew him.

"From this time, everything prospered to a greater degree than before. Don Francisco, who was much attached to his young bride, remained almost constantly at the Fort, engaged in building and ornamenting the house in which they were to live.—Wanita became the favorite of every female in the colony, and her education, under the good priest Urbano, was daily progressing.

"Senores, my narration now brings me to the dreadful occurrence that desolated this beautiful valley, destroyed and annihilated a flourishing colony, and changed the name of the Casa Sabano to the fearful appellation of the 'House of Blood.' I was then only six years of age, yet I understood and can remember with a horrible distinctness many of the occurrences of that day of fire and murder.

"Wawara having learned the deception that had been practised upon him, and the flight of his betrothed and her father, had determined on a bloody vengeance. He had heard of the marriage of Wanita to the young chief of the whites, and he was filled with rage and jealousy. Knowing, however, that to attack Sabano, while the soldiers were in the Fort, would be worse than useless, he resolved to wait for a favourable opportunity.

"That opportunity, unfortunately, arrived too soon. The silence of Wawara operated as the cunning chief had calculated, and his expected enmity, not having shown itself in an immediate attack, was with himself forgotten, or supposed to have been buried through necessity.

"About the middle of Indian Summer, Don Francisco and his father-in-law started on a hunting expedition, toward the forks of the Colorado, where, at that season, many buffaloes were known to pass in their annual migrations. Nearly all the soldiers of the colony accompanied the expedition, and in consequence the fort, as well as the mine, was left completely unguarded. So great was the feeling of security, that the Indians of the surrounding district were freely admitted into the fort for the purpose of trading. These, however, were mostly friendly Indians, and well known to the settlers. On the third day of Don Francisco's absence, and the day on which the hunters were expected to return, a larger number than usual of these strange Indians, closely wrapped in their buffalo robes, but apparently unarmed as the others, were observed in the village, and admitted unsuspectingly into the fort. All at once rose the cry of, 'Wawara!—Wawara! mueran de los blancos!'—(death to the whites.)—for the tribe of Wawara had learned to speak our language on the Rio Grande!—and the savages, throwing aside their buffalo skins, discovered knives and tomahawks, with which they commenced an indiscriminate slaughter. I can remember distinctly the first wild onslaught, and the loud yells of the Indians! I was standing by my mother's cottage. I rushed for the door. I met my mother, and clung to her knees for protection. I remember her struggle with a huge savage, who brandished his hatchet over her head, and struck her repeatedly till she fell, covering me with her warm blood! I can remember how the monster seized me by the hair and flung me out of a window—that I fell into the centre of a large maguey—and how I lay concealed among its giant leaves, and saw the Indians rushing from house to house, and waving fiery torches, which they applied to the roofs, while others savagely butchered women and children, who leaped out from the burning windows—and I heard shouts from the houses, and saw some of the Indians leap high in the air, and then fall dead beside their victims—but the shots at last ceased, and I saw a man in a dark dress pass me, leading a young female. They ran down the field, concealed by the thick leaves of the aloes, and the man mounted a horse, placing the lady before him;—and I knew him to be Father Urbano—for he had often fondled me—and they galloped off toward yon dark woods—and then the houses began to smoke, and blaze, and crackle, and the smoke gathered around me, and choked me until I was insensible, and I saw no more."

Here Don Basano paused for a moment, and applied the flask to his lips. We had become so interested in the narration, that not one of our party offered a word of interruption. After tasting the aguardiente, he continued:

"When I came to my senses again, I was still couched among the leaves of the aloe, but instead of the village, there was now nothing to be seen but a smouldering heap of ashes, and burning logs. The fort too was in flames, but the wind was blowing the smoke in another direction, so that I could breathe freely, and look around me; and what was my joy, when, by the light of the fires, for it had become nearly night, I saw, instead of the gaunt forms of the savages, the uniforms of Spanish soldiers, and I could hear them speak in our own tongue. It was Don Francisco and the hunters, who had returned. I tumbled rather than leaped from my strange hiding place, and staggered up to them. I, a child of six years old, was the only living thing they had found in the settlement. All the others lay around, mangled, and ghastly, and bloody—or were still roasting and simmering in the ashes of their own dwellings! Now, Senores, you know why this ruin has been called 'Casa del Sangre.'"

Here the Mexican paused so long, that we thought he had ended his narrative.

"It is indeed an interesting tale, Senor Basano," said a voice, "but what has this legend to do with the 'Brazos de Dios?'"

"Hear me out, Senores," returned the Mexican. "I told Don Francisco—who was almost wild with rage and grief—what I had seen; how the Padre Urbano had mounted a horse with the lady Wanita—for I knew it to be the Indian lady—and that they had fled toward the woods.

"As soon as Don Francisco heard these things, he hurried off, with all the soldiers, in pursuit of the Indians, for he knew that Wawara would follow the Padre and Wanita. The Indian trail ran in the direction of the Brazos river. Don Francisco and his soldiers spent the whole night on the track, and at daybreak reached the river; but what was their surprise when, on coming up, they found the whole Indian army, with their chief Wawara, lying dead upon the bank, close to the water's edge! There were no wounds nor blood, nor any sign of violence upon any of their bodies, but they lay with their faces all looking in the same direction, toward the east, and their eyes ghastly and glazed! The vultures flew around, and lit on the tops of the tall trees, but not one of them would taste their flesh! He concluded that they had died by a judgment of God, in consequence of their having pursued his sacred minister, which was afterwards confirmed by Father Urbano himself, who, with the lady Wanita, had reached San Antonio in safety. He informed us how they were closely followed by the Indians—and that the waters of the river opened to let him pass, and that after crossing in safety with the lady Wanita, his pursuers entered the river, and while he made the sacred sign, and looked to Heaven, the waters closed upon them and swallowed them up, and after a time cast them out upon the bank, stiff and dead, as our soldiers had found them. So that from this miraculous interference of Providence, the river was ever afterwards called Rio Brazos de Dios,' which in your language, Senores, means the 'River of the Arm of God.'

"Don Francisco, with his Indian Princess and an only son, are still living in San Antonio. And perhaps, gentlemen," added Don Basano, smiling, as he observed the eager curiosity of our countenances, "if I should tell you his family name, you would recognise both him and his son."

"The name—the name! Senor Basano!" shouted four anxious voices in a breath, while twice that number of anxious ears were bent to listen.

Don Basano looked toward the handsome young Mexican, and we followed the direction of his glance. The smile of assent that returned our gaze, told us that the only son of the hero and heroine, was our silent and gentlemanly companion, Don Francisco Lopez. In a moment each of us had grasped his hand.

"Now, Senores, you have heard the legend of the 'Brazos de Dios.' It grows late!—Vamos!"

"No—stop, Senor Basano!" cried Captain Randel, jokingly, "you have not explained—the slips of maguey?"

"Ah! true, Senores, the slips of maguey—it is only a trifle—I have a daughter who made me promise, on leaving San Antonio, to bring her some shoots as souvenirs—you know of what—that is all, gentlemen!"

We mounted our mustangs, and rode off for the mine.

The Mother and her Family.

BY MISS SEDGWICK.

Philosophy is rarely found. The most perfect sample I ever met, was an old woman, who was apparently the poorest and the most forlorn of the human species—so true is the maxim which all profess to believe, and none act upon invariably, viz: "that happiness does not depend on outward circumstances." The wise woman, to whom I have alluded, walks to Boston, a distance of twenty or thirty miles, to sell a bag of brown thread and stockings, and then patiently walks back with her little gain. Her dress, though tidy, is a grotesque collection of "shreds and patches"—coarse in the extreme.

"Why don't you come down in a wagon?" said I, when I observed she was wearied with her long journey.

"We havn't got any horse," she replied; "the neighbors are very kind to me, but they can't spare their'n, and it would cost as much to hire one as my thread would come to."

"You have a husband—don't he do any thing for you?"

"He is a good man—he does all he can, but he's a cripple and invalid. He reels my yarn and mends the children's shoes. He's as kind a husband as a woman need to have."

"But his being a cripple is a heavy misfortune to you," said I.

"Why, ma'am, I don't look upon it in that light," replied the thread woman. "I consider that I've a great reason to be thankful that he never took to any bad habits."

"How many children have you?"

"Six sons and five daughters, ma'am."

"Six sons and five daughters! What a family for a poor woman to support!"

"[i]'s a family, ma'am; but there ain't one of 'em I'd be willing to lose. They are all healthy children as need to be—all willing to work, and all clever to me. Even the smallest boy, when he gets a cent, now and then, for doing an errand, will be sure to bring it to me."

"Do your daughters spin your thread?"

"No, ma'am; as soon as they are big enough, they go out to service, as I don't want to keep them always delving for me; they are always willing to give me what they can; but it's fair that they should do a little for themselves. I do all my spinning after the folks are abed."

"Don't you think you should be better off if you had no one but yourself to provide for?"

"Why no, ma'am, I don't. If I hadn't been married, I should had to work as hard as I could, and now I can't do more than that. My children are a great comfort to me, and I look forward to the time when they'll do as much for me as I've done for them."

Here was true philosophy! I learned a lesson from that poor woman which I shall not soon forget.

The Bride of Kaffraria.

A ROMANTIC AND THRILLING TALE,

ILLUSTRATING "TRUTH STRANGER THAN FICTION."

Three staid and elderly matrons were seated at the upper part of the large table occupying the centre of the spacious fore-house or hall, while before them steamed the never-failing afternoon's refreshment, "tea-water," which Vrow Muller was, ever and anon, busy in dispensing to her guests. A slave-girl, with small, regular features, and long, black hair gathered closely in a knot, stood at one end of the inner doors, ready to receive and execute the behests of her mistress: her dark eyes often sparkling meanwhile, and her white teeth appearing to betray her unrepressed merriment at some tale or remark of her gossiping superiors, whose vicinity formed no restraint on the gambols of two dusky children, just able to walk, that were playing at the damsel's feet. Without the house, to the right of the entrance, sat Mynheer Muller, on the broad stone stoop, smoking in silence, and enjoying the cool southerly breeze, if he could not his own reflections, which, to judge by the frequent contractions of his ample brow, seemed not altogether pleasant; and every time he raised his eyes, and saw, by the shadows advancing higher on the opposite hills, how near sunset was approaching, a darker shadow would overspread his own countenance, and a denser curl of smoke would circle in the air. It was evident that something had greatly discomposed Mynheer Erasmus Muller.

But, if there had, there was one who marked it not, a tall and graceful girl—one whose smile might form the sunshine of any home, who stood at the nearer end of the stoop, looking far into the distance, and watching intently a small line of lighter ground on the side of a barren hill, which indicated the road from Graham's Town. She had now been for years her father's only daughter—the elder of the two children who were spared out of many, and the chief object of his parental love; for Erasmus Muller felt little pride in the pale, sickly boy, whose lameness required the assistance of a stick as he drew near his sister.

"You watch for him, Zetza," he remarked; then added, in a very low tone—"I would go to meet him, but he would not know me, and I could not ride back as fast as he would come."

"I wish she had no cause to watch," growled the father, angrily. "I wish he was not coming; I would have prevented it, had I been able."

"But, father, he never did any thing to offend you," said Zetza, turning with the smile that had often proved her most convincing argument. "It is six years since we saw him, and then, though you liked not his father, you always treated Ignace kindly."

"I did not like his father, and do not, for his affection to the British yoke. I like not to see any servant of the English government beneath my roof, and least of all, one who is my sister's child. I had no time, or he should have learnt my thoughts; a Muller never was inhospitable, or I should have turned him from my door. But, as it is, when he comes he shall be treated as if he were welcome; though, when he goes, it shall be never to return. So receive him as a friend, children; I forbid you not. Forget, for a week, that he is an English officer."

Replacing his pipe, Mynheer Muller smoked on with renewed industry, and his children offered no reply to the most decided assertion of dislike to the British government which had ever reached their ears from his lips since they had been old enough to heed it.

Muller had known what it was to fight beneath the Dutch flag before the taking of the Cape; had never forgiven the British ensign's becoming victorious in South Africa; and after having been deeply, though unsuspectedly, concerned in the Boors' rebellion, the summer commencing in 1834 found him, in his old age, a frontier farmer, and one of the few discontented spirits who, there seems any reason to suppose, murmured then against existing powers, whether colonial or at home. He had been, for years, at enmity with his brother-in-law, a wealthy land owner in the district of George, in consequence of the latter's satisfaction with the stranger's rule; and, though his son had been allowed to pass some months of his boyhood at Muller's house, it had only been because Erasmus hoped to instil into the young mind the prejudices of his own. But this degree of softening had been soon repented of, when Ignatius Vaureenen was sent to finish his education in England; and yet more bitterly, when he learned that Mynheer Vaureenen had yielded to his son's entreaties, and allowed him to enter the British army. The youth's regiment was at Mauritious, and now on his way to join it, he had a few months leave to spend at the Cape of Good Hope; and, on reaching home, after six years' absence, had written to prepare his uncle and cousins for a speedy visit. It might have been policy that allowed no time for a reply, or it might only have been the distinct recollections of a fair girl of eleven, who, with the height and beauty of more advanced years in other climes, haunted his thoughts as a dream of loveliness, which had closed his eaves to other attractions.

It was chiefly as a variety to their peaceful but monotonous existence that Zetza had been so anxious to greet her absent relation, and now her father's remarks made her half regret his coming; but whilst she listened, he had passed the place which she had watched, and two horsemen riding rapidly up to the house, was the first intimation of their approach, and she advanced to greet him with a welcome which, one half-hour before, would have been more unembarrassed. His uncle's reception of him was precisely that of guest by host; the Vrow Muller was as affectionate and uninteresting as ever; but Wilhelm shrunk from notice, as though the fall of the tree which had lamed him, had distorted his mind as well as body, making it a thing that he should blush for; and as though his misfortune should turn from him the love of all others, as it had repelled his father's.

The sooner the rose-bud opens, the sooner the flower too often fades; and Ignace might have thought to find the charms of early girlhood already passing from his cousin; but not one had fled, and their attraction kept far longer, in Mynheer Muller's presence, the irritation to which he had made up his mind for a week's endurance.

But that week had been lengthened into two, and still, though his uncle was never particularly gracious, Ignace did not speak of going. Some suspicion of the truth did enter the old man's mind, but he was too prudent to hazard the chance of leading, by their betrayal, his daughter's thoughts in a direction they might otherwise avoid.

The third week was at length advancing, and there seemed no more hope of young Vaureenen's departure than there had been at the beginning of the first. The long walks in the deep kloofs and over the broad plots, grew longer every day; and the loitering on the stoop in the calm starlight, grew more protracted every evening, until Muller's patience was fairly exhausted—the last remnant deserting him as he noticed the striking contrast between the listlessness with which Zetza hearkened to a handsome young Boor, who had rode twenty miles to visit them, and the attention she gave to her scarcely handsomer, but more intellectual and elegant cousin.

"Pray, Ignace, how long did you tell your father you should be absent when you left him?" demanded Muller, during dinner, interrupting a dialogue he little liked to observe, which was being carried on in whispers: while Carl Breda conversed with his hostess, keeping his admiring, though not exactly satisfied gaze fixed on Zetza.

"A week, perhaps," stammered Vaureenen, coloring; "but I have written to him since."

"And for what period has he agreed to your remaining?"

"I did not mention any particular time," said Ignace, hesitatingly.

"Then I think you had best return at once; your father cannot like your remaining away from him so long, and I do not choose that he should think I was to blame. If there is any farther quarrel with your family, it shall not be my fault," added old Muller, with peculiar emphasis, and striking off a skewer the whole array of smoking carbonadoes with a single blow of such force, that his plate was severed as it fell, and even the heavy yellow-wood table shaken.

"Why, Miller, how was that?" inquired his helpmate. "Here, Alida, run, get another plate for the Baas; I must think his has been cracked. And so you will leave us, Ignace?"

"Yes, at daylight to-morrow," was the reply; and if the young officer looked sadder, Carl Breda's spirits seemed infinitely lightened by the intelligence.

A few hours after, two persons were wandering slowly amid the picturesque mimosa groups which shadowed, here and there, the smooth green turf of a small and shallow valley. Both were silent, for the thought of parting weighed heavy on the heart of each. Zetza regretted it, she wist not exactly why; but Ignace knew, far too well for his own composure of mind, the nature of the sentiments with which he had learned to regard his cousin.—Dared he to hope they were reciprocated! There were moments when he had hoped it; and surely, if it were so, Muller's affection for his daughter, and former kindness to himself, might overcome the long-existing dislike towards his father.

Twenty-one—at least, with his sex—is commonly sanguine, and Ignace looked on the brightest aspect of the future.

"Come, sit here, Zetza," said he, at length, leading her within the shade of the graceful trees. "I had much to say, but seem unable; yet I would ask if you will not feel a little sorry to see your cousin go—for how long it may be, he fears almost to think?"

Zetza looked at him for an instant, then quickly turned her face away without reply: but he saw that the large blue eyes were dimmed with tears—and what need to particularize further? The moments sped swiftly onwards, and the shadows lengthened; while the lover's voice awoke feelings which were but slumbering in the maiden's heart, casting their influence over her thoughts, yet in themselves unknown: and when the discordant scream of a toucan flying slowly by broke in, like an evil omen, on their forgetfulness of the world, and recalled them to the present reality, the affection of the girl had been owned as fully as her cousin's.

"But you are going away; you will leave the Cape altogether," said Zetza, sadly, as though the toucon's cry, jarring on her nerves, had banished the feelings of unfearing happiness.

"No, Zetza, no! that can easily be arranged.—Had I not heard, while in Europe, a false rumor that you were married, I had not, perhaps, been what I am."

"But we have parents, and they are not friends."

"Mine will, I know, receive and love you, as though you had been his own daughter," cried Ignace, eagerly.

"Hark!" interrupted Zetza; "there is a step; some one is near."

"It must be Wilhelm; he was gathering lilies at the vlay, and has followed us."

But the youth had scarcely spoken, when the towering form of Erasmus Muller stood before the lovers. He appeared, at first, displeased, yet nothing more, at seeing them; but their own disconcerted looks betrayed them instantly, and in a voice of anger the old man demanded what had happened.—Zetza covered her face with her hands, and Ignace looked down in silence.

"Leave us, child," continued Muller; "I would speak with this young man alone."

A single look was exchanged between them, ere the girl tremblingly obeyed, and within an hour, Ignace was on his way to George, with an intimation never more to enter his uncle's house, and Zetza was weeping over the first sorrow she had known; while Muller puffed away at his pipe, and frowned, and stamped, and clenched his hands, until the little slave boy, who sat crouched up in the corner of the stoop, watching him with his deep-black glittering eyes, had half fancied it must be the intoxicating daka that the Baas was so indefatigably smoking.

This was September; and early in October, Muller informed his daughter that their friend Breda wished to make her the mistress of his house, and that both her mother and himself were perfectly satisfied with the idea of having her permanently settled within a distance of twenty miles.

Zetza pulled a sprig of scarlet geranium into a hundred pieces—it was but a type of the ruin her father's communication had brought on the little of hope and happiness which yet lingered in her heart; then throwing, with an impatient gesture, the desolate branch to a distance from the stoop, she leaned on a large arm of the vine which covered an entire side with its deep-green leaves, and, still in silence, bowed her head upon her hand.

"See," continued Muller, after a pause, and pointing to a dark speck far away on the plaat, "yonder is Christian riding away with my answer, and Breda will be here to-morrow to speak as young men do to young girls on such occasions."

"I would sooner die than marry Carl Breda," exclaimed Zetza, clasping her hands, and looking up in her father's face.

"And I would sooner see you dead than marry Ignace Vaureenen," retorted Muller, in the harsh tones with which he oftentimes rebuked unruly oxen.

It was the first time that the young officer had been alluded to by either since the parting in the mimosa grove, and at his name, Zetza drooped her head again to hide her tears, and the boer paced along the stoop, with the tread of a hippopotamus and the dignity of a lion.

At length he returned to the weeping girl.—"Hear me, child," cried he; "you know I do not speak much, but what I say, I mean. I love you better than house, or lands, or slaves, or cattle; yet, I would rather fling you into the midst of Fish River, when the freshets were rushing in their greatest fury from the mountains, that Ignatius Vaureenen should call thee wife—sooner than any friend and servant of the government, I have not hated less because it would crush me if I showed any hostility, should call me father."

Zetza shuddered as he spoke, and, without daring to look up, leaned in silence against the vine branches.

Muller paused awhile for the reply, which was not attempted—then proceeded. "But I know well what you can do; if you are resolved to break your father's heart, you can. Your seventeen years have given you much wisdom—so says the law; and you can defy me. You may summon me to set forth my objections, and the court would tell you to marry and be happy. But hark you, Zetza!" added the old man, grinding his teeth and clenching his hands, "it will be your father's curse which will be his gift on on your wedding day, and make your misery through life."

"Father, father! do not speak so," cried the poor girl, imploringly; "I would never disgrace myself and you by such an act. But why ask me to wed another? Why can I not stay here to sing to you and write for you, as I have ever done? Let me be as before he came, and I will never reproach you."

"No! the daughter of Erasmus Muller must not pass her days in her father's house, as though none had asked her hand. You are the first of your race who has ever been left so long unwedded, and this must not be. One by one your elder brothers and sisters have been cut off, until, of the fifteen merry children that I have seen picking gokums and chasing kolkontjees on the plaat, only one remains to form the pride of my old age; and I could not close my eyes in peace upon my death-bed, unless I had placed you under the protection of a husband every way worthy of you."

"But there is Wilhelm," said Zetza, timidly; "and you, my father, you are not young, but you are always in health, and as strong and as powerful as I ever remember you—why talk of your death?"

"Wilhelm!" said the boer, contemptuously; "he will never be fit for any thing but to gather flowers, and feed tame antelopes. But of me, child—have you forgotten that old age requires no sickness to be the forerunner of death? I am healthy and strong, it is true, and so I may be till almost the very last; but I have lived my time, and you know that it is not here as in our fatherland; for, in this climate, extreme old age is rare, and when we attain advanced years, we die off, with illness or without, to make way for the next generation. I am an old man now. I have no friend as old; and as they will, some day soon, have to bring my coffin out of the lumber-room; it is now time I settled all my affairs, and saw my daughter married."

The old man's tone softened as he proceeded, and Zetza wept bitterly, for she knew that he had numbered more than seventy years.

"And now," he continued, pursuing his advantage, "you know why I press this marriage. And what have you to urge against it, except what I will not have mentioned in my presence? Has not Breda the best farm and the most cattle of any young man we know? Young, rich, good-looking, and good-tempered—what more can you ask?"

The girl was silent, and Muller's brow grew once more dark and angry as he said—

"Answer me, Zetza, if you would not have me believe you but awaiting your father's death to disobey him! Ay, and answer me, girl, as though you cared whether your father's dying words should convey a blessing or a curse."

Is it any wonder that, so wrought upon, so urged—accustomed, moreover, from infancy upward, never to question the propriety of any decree, any action of her parent—is it any wonder that the unhappy girl flung herself into her father's arms, and with bitter tears, replied, "Do with me as you please; I will know no will but yours!" and Muller embraced his child with as much satisfaction and apparent affection, as though he had not just been exacting from her one of the greatest sacrifices which maiden's heart could make.

After this, Zetza's cheek grew every week more pale, and her smile less frequent, but she never murmured; and her father felt confident that all would in time be well. Her mother, who, from a flirting girl, had become a careful, good-humored and well-meaning, but soulless, housewife, was too deeply intent upon preparing the wardrobe of the bride, to have much leisure for reflection on her chances of happiness; while poor Wilhelm, who knew the truth, could but regret it, and vainly wish that he had power to interfere—for to him his father seldom spoke, and never listened; thinking, because his frame was weak, his words gentle, and his tastes refined, that his heart must be faint, and his spirit degenerate.

Thus weeks passed on—Muller had settled all worldly affairs with his son-in-law, elect to their mutual satisfaction, and his view determined the number, fashion and material of the bride's garments, the component parts of the wedding-feast, and arranged the list of guests to be invited, which, with an aching heart, but obedient hand, poor Zetza had written out; in short, every preparation advanced with the utmost smoothness and regularity; and like many a family on the frontier, the Mullers rested, in deceitful tranquility, over a slumbering volcano, which the slightest convulsion, or the mere progress of time itself, would soon awaken. Already there had occurred circumstances which might have excited doubt, but the feeling of security was too strong, and they would not fear. Cattle and horses had been driven off in large numbers, and with unusual boldness; armed Kafirs of threatening demeanor had been seen in the neutral territory, and even within the colony; in the latter, the number without passes were increasing, and to ride or shoot alone on the immediate frontier, was no longer exactly safe—but it was merely, "the Kafirs are very troublesome;' and they would not believe in the actual existence and presence of danger. Muller was one of the most incredulous; he hated the English, but he despised the Kafirs, and did not believe the latter would ever again dare to provoke hostilities with his hardy brethren and their warlike conquerors.

One thing did somewhat disturb his equanimity as the end of the year approached—not a fear lest he had judged not wisely for his daughter's happiness—not an apprehension of any inroad on the part of his savage neighbors, though the latter were the agents; but the diminution of that portion of his wealth which roamed on four feet over the wide plaats and through the shady valleys. Not a week passed that one of the herds did not appear before the Baas, with a confession that some of the "ogen" were missing, until, from the wrath which only a recollection of the magistrate's court and Guardian of Slaves, withheld him from wreaking on the hired Hottentot or bondman, the boer's mind inclined to the conviction that the Kafirs were alone to blame. Scarcely a week closed without the discovery, some morning when the kraals were opened, that a horse, or a couple of his finest cows, or several of his most promising young cattle, had been abstracted during the night. The "spoor" led away across the frontier; and patrol after patrol had been demanded by Muller, (who never scrupled to claim the government's protection and assistance,) until the wearied authorities could not grant one half he asked. And when the plunder was traced, and restitution demanded from the kraal, where the spoor directed them, it was always the smallest and leanest of the miserable cattle which are on such occasions usually substituted for the stolen property, that was selected for Erasmus Muller. To such treatment he was accustomed, for his name was very dark among the natives near the boundary.

His two eldest sons had been assegated many years before, when on commando; and every time he looked on the sickly youth, who remained to be his heir and representative, he cursed in his heart the tribe which had torn from him his boldest and most powerful. His hatred was not disguised; neither friendliness nor pity did Kafir ever meet with at his hands—no child of the Amakosa ever received food or shelter beneath his roof—no aggression or trespass did he ever forgive, if the law could give him means to punish it—no wanderer of the nation did he ever accost, save in anger; or to demand if he had a pass, so as, in case of default, to have him apprehended as a vagrant. His was, in short, a character which, though perhaps but one out of a hundred, nearly approached that which some would have ascribed to the majority of his class.

The week preceding Christmas at length arrived, and the thunder-cloud gathered heavier than ever on the frontier, but the devastation that would attend its bursting, remained as yet unforeseen, save by very few, except the evil-boding spirits whose croakings had often been the prelude to the sunniest times.—The Mullers were among the most careless and insensible, for the wedding was near at hand, and from divers causes, there were none had many thoughts to spare from it.

According to Dutch colonial customs, wealthy as both parties were, the banns had been proclaimed in the nearest church for the last time, on the previous Sabbath; and, in compliance with the same, Zetza had, with a heavy heart and aching brow, yet attired with unusual care, taken her place during the week in the little-used drawing-room, to receive the congratulations of friends and neighbors on the approaching marriage, and to give in person the requisite invitations. It was a hard task, yet performed without complaint; and though a mournful smile was the poor girl's chief reply to their felicitations, there were few that troubled themselves with any doubts of her perfect contentment and satisfaction with her lot; even the young friends who were to be bride-maids, and were already her guests, had not been taken into her confidence, and if she seemed less cheerful than they thought she might, they remembered that she had ever been more quiet than themselves, more fond of books and solitude, and thinking; and they therefore imagined it must be her way of being happy.

They were all on the stoop shortly after sunset, as daylight was waxing dim, and the eye could just trace the position of the stars by their faint glimmer in the heavens: Muller, with a friend, sat there smoking, and exchanging a few words at long intervals. Zetza stood at one end, surrounded by her young companions, with some of whom Breda was flirting laughingly; while at other moments he conversed with his future mother-in-law, whose gaze was bent with the utmost placidity on the shadowy forms of the undulating hills, which, in many a graceful line, swept far away into the distance, her fingers busily engaged meanwhile in knitting, and her mind in determining the precise quantity of sweetmeats the coming festival would require.

"When is Ignace Vaureenen coming?" asked Johanna Vander Meyer, at length.

"We do not expect him, Hannie," was the quiet reply; yet as Zetza spoke, she bent her face to hide its expression, and, with unconscious fingers, plucked the unripe grapes which hung in heavy clusters beside her.

"Ah! they are getting very large," said her mother, observing the action; "I think they will be grown sufficient for tarts on Tuesday."

The other girls laughed, and Breda smiled, but Zetza let the grapes fall from her hand as though they had been scorpions.

"But what 's that Muller talks of?" continued the matron, as Erasmus's voice was heard speaking rapidly; and, gathering up her knitting, the worthy vrow sailed off to where two Hottentot herds were standing before her husband and her friend, all four being in evident discomposure. Her visitors followed, and when Zetza again looked up, only her brother stood beside her.

"I wish I was like Breda," he said, "as strong and as active; and then my father might not think me a fool, and might listen to what I said; then, this never should take place. But it is useless wishing!"

"Useless and worse!" replied his sister. "And yet, Wilhelm, I could almost think—would it were no sin to wish that one were dead!"

"But do not think so," said the boy, earnestly.—"You remember four years since, when the tree crushed me? well, afterwards, when I found that I should live but as a creature to be a burden to myself and disagreeable to others, then I was very unhappy, and wished to die, and hated life. But the minister talked to me, and reasoned with me long, until he made me ashamed of all that I had wished. He explained how we should try to be resigned to everything; how what we most disliked was often for the best; and how patience was sometimes rewarded by our sorrow being turned into gladness, when no hope of happiness remained. He told me that I might find reason to thank God that he had spared my life to be of use to others; and sometimes, Zetza, when I have fancied I made a long day seem shorter to you, I have thought that Mr. M—— was right, and have felt glad that I was left, though none besides you liked me.—I do not believe that I have said what I intended, Zetza, but I meant to comfort you, and bid you not to grieve too much, for, perhaps, God will make you happy yet; you are doing right, and He will not forsake you!"

The maiden sighed deeply, and then wiped away a few lingering tears as she answered—

"I endeavor to do my duty; I can do no more.—But come, Wilhelm, we should not be loitering here; something is evidently wrong, and we ought not to appear indifferent."

They joined the group on the centre of the stoop, but did not at first learn what had occurred, as Muller was running along a whole string of the fiercest Dutch expletives with bewildering rapidity and startling emphasis, but without any distinct allusion to the cause of his displeasure.

"What is the matter, Hans?" inquired Wilhelm, in an undertone, of one of the herds. But, low as it was, the boer overheard it in the midst of his execrations.

"What is the matter?" he repeated, indignantly, and a volley of fearful anathemas was showered on the head of the unfortunate Wilhelm. "Of course you don't know! you never care for anything! The farm may go to ruin—'Tyali may ride my horses, and Macomo drink the milk of my cows; it's not worth your attending to. We shall soon be reduced to feed on snooks' heads and rice, yet here you come with your smooth face and satisfied air, and ask, 'What is the matter?' "

"A number of cattle have been carried off," said Breda, in explanation. "There are—let me see—"

"Two span oxen, and five Namaqua beasts, and the Baas's skimmel horse," supplied Hans, telling off the misfortunes on his fingers.

"And they are gone," began Wilhelm——

"To Kafirland, of course!" thundered his father. "Any one, but a child or a fool, would have known that without a question! But you never do or know anything. And now I must send a letter off for a patrol. "Come, child!"—this was to Zetza.

"I will write it," said Wilhelm, who saw his sister would have been little fitted for the effort; "that much at least I can do."

And the youth passed into the house to prepare for a letter, dictated in Dutch, to be done into English.

"How troublesome the Kafirs are!" said Johanna Vander Meyer. "What if they break into the colony, and carry us all off, or murder us!"

"They would not dare," said Breda, laughing; "twenty of them would fly from the pointing of my roer. We have guns, and ammunition, and ready arms, and bold hearts to protect you, and willing ones, too, as Adrian Hofmeister would say, if he were here. So do not fear, mein leiber haatjee."

The girls laughed, and the giddy but pretty Hannie Vander Meyer blushed, for Adrian was her very devoted. And in such merriment died away, as in other places, every serious thought of the Kafir invasion.

It was late in the afternoon of the ensuing Monday, and Mynheer Muller had been riding round his fields, and viewing his herds and flocks—which still were large, though somewhat shrunken—as under the charge of their dusky guardians, they were returning slowly in the direction of the kraals, at an earlier hour than had been usual a few weeks previous to that time. The sight was pleasant, for it would have taken many thousand rix dollars to purchase what he looked on; yet, ever and anon, a twitching of his heavy brows, bespoke the boer's wrath as he remembered the absent: the loss of his favorite skimmel horse, too, one seldom let out to graze, especially irritated him, and in token of his dissatisfaction with the inferior animal he then was riding, he beat the poor creature unmercifully with his heavy sambok, for any fault or none, which he committed.

While thus agreeably occupied, Muller observed a horsemen riding towards him. To do this in a straight line, he had to pass beneath the boughs of several trees, and bent his head to avoid the contact. As he was nearly under the last, Muller saw the horse start and rear, striking his rider's head against the branch, which knocked him from his seat. The boer galloped instantly to the spot, when the cause of the steed's affright was soon discovered in a snake which was rising in an half-upright posture from the grass, and ready to repeat his baffled spring. Without casting a look towards the prostrate horseman, the boer dismounted, and with his sambok put a speedy termination to the reptile's life, then, after a few rough words of encouragement to the horse, he turned to look at his rider.

What was his astonishment when he beheld Ignatius Vaureenen rising from the ground, and only just recovering from the confusion of his stunning fall!

"What! you, the slave, the paltry dependent of the British, dare to intrude here!" exclaimed the enraged farmer. "Did I not forbid you to ever put foot on ground which called me master? Did I not forbid you to ever enter my presence more?"

"But, uncle, hear me!" remonstrated Ignace.

But Muller was not disposed to listen, and proceeded to pour forth a torrent of abuse in a language which is admitted to be well adapted to the purpose. Young Vaureenen was, however, resolved to have heard what he had gone thither to say, so listened in almost unbroken, if not impatient, silence, as did Wilhelm who had been reading in the shade of an acacia group at a little distance, and now arrived.

"I should not have been here, but in the hope of doing you service," said Ignace, when Muller had at length talked himself out of breath; "but I could not be easy with the idea that my relations were in danger. Have you not heard there are reports that it is likely the Kafirs will rush in upon us? that they have been preparing arms these three years, and are now ready for the outbreak? I came to tell, lest you should not know it."

"Idle tales—nonsense!" said the boer, contemptuously.

"They are, unfortunately, far more deserving of notice. 'Twas said the Kafirs only awaited an opportunity; and now the signal had been given—an English officer has been wounded in attempting to recover stolen cattle; his irritated men killed a chief—a relation of Macomo, and the report is, that Macomo vows vengeance."

"I know all—the cattle were mine!" interrupted Muller, impatiently. "If you have no more to say, you need not have come. With my own slaves, I could stand against Macomo and his nation; but the young men of this day are children!"

"But, hear me out, sir!" persisted his nephew; "this is likely to be no child's play; those older and wiser than I, consider the frontier farms at least as menaced with great danger, and as it is rumored you are personally disliked, I entreat you to heed my warning."

"And do what?" asked Muller, ironically. "Fly before the whistlings of the desert winds? No! Erasmus Muller will never run away at the shaking of an assegai."

"But provide, at least, for the safety of those who cannot fight. Do not leave my aunt and cousin exposed to danger! My father's house is ready to receive them, and down at George there will be no fear of their security."

"Ha—ha—ha!" laughed Muller, long and scornfully. "So that is it, I find—you would have Zetza within your reach. But she will have another protector soon; you might not have been so anxious about her, had you known that to-morrow Breda will be her husband."

The youth turned away for a moment, but in the next replied, though with a pale cheek and agitated voice—

"I did not know it was to be so soon—yet it is the same to me—if you will but send her to a place of safety, I will not even try to see her. But do take the proper measures, for I have heard aggressions have begun, and murders have already been committed, and reports are flying about in all directions."

"Like bees to sting only those who are afraid. But you forget," continued the boer, with a provoking smile, "we shall have a wedding to-morrow, and Zetza will go away."

"But not out of danger," urged Vaureenen; "Breda's place is as exposed as this. And this is no time for festivity, when each hour may be our last of peace, and a horde of savages may be your guests. Do not delay, or you may find it too late. Let my aunt and cousin be in safety; and then, if you remain here, and will permit me I will stay to fight and defend your house to the last moment."

"Ha—ha—ha!" laughed the boer again.

"O, do listen to him, father!" entreated Wilhelm.

"Out of my sight, you misshapen elf," vociferated his father in a rage; "never yet did your mouth open to utter aught save folly. Are you both agreed in one story? or are you but frightened at his tales?—Out of my sight you soulless idiot! As for you," addressing Ignace, "I see through you as the air at mid-day. I have heard of hunters who have followed the bird to seek the honey, and found the tiger, but I am too old to be deceived. Begone, this instant, and never let me see you on my lands again. Begone I tell you, if you would not be driven away like a Kafir thief."

Against rage of this nature, there could be no remonstrance, and Ignace had no choice but to depart, although reluctantly, and with an anxiety for the fate of both his cousins, which almost bore down the fire of his resentment at his uncle's ungenerous and insulting conduct. Muller rode back to the house; but mentioned nothing of what had happened to its inmates; nor did Wilhelm, for he knew it would but uselessly alarm many, and deeply agitate one whose emotions needed no awakening.

The morrow came: it was Tuesday, the 23d of December. The whole family were astir before sunrise; and bustle and preparation were seen in all directions. The bridesmaids flew hither and thither, assisting their hostess to deck the tables or conveying sundry of her numerous mandates to her household; the slaves wandered about, to all appearance busy, but in truth, laughing and jesting; and sadly neglectful of their tasks,—while with a heavy heart the poor bride listened to the sounds of hurry and gladness, and sighed to think of the cause.

Who can tell how painful were the suppressed emotions which swelled within her bosom, while her young attendants arrayed her in her bridal dress? how darkly the mind drew the contrast between what was and what might have been? how her heart owned that if it had known this hour had been so bitterly felt, it could hardly have dared to meet it!—But it was too late to retract—too late even, to allow the vain wish to harbor in her thoughts, though as yet she could not banish it.

Time passed on, but the guests arrived slowly and scantily—the realities of the coming storm had begun to be acknowledged, and not one third that had been bidden appeared to attend the wedding, or taste the banquet.

Muller's brow grew dark, and in detached and muttered words he set down half his friends as "fools." The busy vrow was dissatisfied that there was a chance of so few doing honor to her skill, while many a young cheek turned for a moment pale, and Breda and his few companions laughed at the fears that were abroad.

At length the moment came—the bride was led in by her father, and colorless as her own white robe, stood beside her destined lord. All marked how deadly pale she looked: but in her own feelings the struggle seemed to have passed by, and an unnatural calmness, it should perhaps, be termed insensibility, succeeded. It was no effort to maintain composure, for she felt as though incapable of agitation.

That day was bright—sunny and glorious as December usually is in South Africa; the air slept silently on hill and plain, and the note of the golden cuckoo came afar from the almost inaccessible depths of the distant and darkly wooded kloof, which he haunted like a spirit—heard, but seldom seen. Yet one heavy cloud arose, and in the stillness of the atmosphere travelled slowly upward; it was alone, the sky was clear beyond, so no one heeded it: but a little before mid-day it overcast the sun, and a sudden gloom fell upon the earth; and Hannie Vander Meyer whose mind was somewhat turned with the superstitions of her Affricander nurse, felta chill come over her heart, as she noticed the instantaneous darkening of the heavens in the very moment that Mr. M—— uttered the first words of the ceremony, which was to link her friend's lot in this life with Breda's. Slowly it passed on, and when the statue like bride had received the congratulations of her friends, the veil was withdrawn, and the sun shone forth again in all its meridian splendor.

Red constantia, and bride cake, laughter and merriment, formed the business of the hour, and all darker thoughts seemed forgotten under the intoxicating influences of mirth. Yet ten minutes had scarcely elapsed before a Hottentot was seen riding at full speed up the approach to the house. Wilhelm hastened to the stoop as rapidly as his lameness would permit, when the messenger threw himself from his horse, and without speaking, unbound a handkerchief from his waist and drew from it a letter, which the youth seized impatiently. But it was nothing, at least to the party at large—it was directed to Mr. M——; one of his flock, many miles away was dying, and requested his presence. When the clergyman made this known, Wilhelm had to endure a sneering comment from his father on his anxiety, and a less insulting but what would have been at another time less galling laugh from his new brother, but he was too thankful the tidings were no worse, to feel indignant at their sarcasms.

"I don't like Mr. M——'s being called away from a wedding party to attend a death-bed," whispered Hannie Vander Meyer to young Hofmeister. "It seems a bad omen for dear Zetza."

Adrain rallied her on her idle fancies; and the debate soon merged into flirtation; while on every side the laugh and jest were heard again, and after a few pitying phrases none seemed oppressed with much concern for the acquaintance who required their pastor's saddest offices. Again the mistress of the house bustled to and fro to hurry her loitering slaves in their preparations for the tiffin, which had been the source of so much anxiety and anticipation of renown; again the bridesmaids flew about like aides-de-camp in action, and a few of the elder guests began to look towards the door in expectation of the banquet being announced. The sound of horses' feet was heard; but no one was seen, and it was not heeded. Then issued a loud outcry of dismay from the culinary regions.

"Oh, my heart!" exclaimed the bride's mother, starting up in horror; "something is the matter in the kitchen; all things are going the wrong way with the tiffin."

'Perhaps with more than it," thought Wilhelm instantly, as he rose also while Hannie's cheek grew pale, and Zetza looked through the window on the distant orange grove, and neither thought nor feared. Another moment, and there was a rush of feet, and all around, within and without the entrance of the room, filled with dark faces, of every size, and expressive of every degree of consternation.

'Oh, Jarow! Jarow!" shrieked a girl; darting forward and falling at the feet of her mistress, "we are lost—we are dead!—the Kafirs are upon us!"

"What's this?" demanded Muller.

It was true enough at least to excuse the slave's fear and exaggeration. Several bands of Kafirs were in the colony, and men had been killed and dwellings destroyed during the preceding day and night. In truth, six boers had fallen already; though how many was then unknown to the frightened servants, who, after the plunderers' departure, had caught stray horses, and in terror galloped off to spread the tidings of devastation. There were two fugitives, and the master of each was buried beneath the smoking ruins of his home.

In a few minutes all was hurry and confusion; oxen being "inspanned" and horses "saddled up;" and on every hand was ordering and finding fault, and impatience and regret. Muller's place was not very defensible—a line of bush extending to within fifty yards of the house; yet, had all the guests remained with their attendants, it would have required a large party to destroy it. But this could not be; each had some duty that required his presence at a distance. There were homes to be protected—children or parents who might be in instant need of the strong arm and bold heart of the father or the son; and for the weaker, there were relatives whose danger, if it existed, must be shared. Muller himself was urged to fly, and seek shelter elsewhere, but he spurned the counsel in disdain. Hannie Vander Meyer, who dearly loved her friend, and whose relations were beyond the probable reach of evil, was anxious to remain with Zetza.

"You will not—you must not," asserted Adrian.

"I shall," replied the maiden.

"You must not," repeated the youth, "you have a father and a mother and sisters down at Uitenhage, who will be wretched when they hear of this outbreak, and in despair if any evil occur to you. Muller is hated by the Kafirs, and his house is sure not to escape."

"But you have heard the Kafirs spare the women. If they come I shall not be hurt."

"I would not trust to the mercy of any," exclaimed Hofmeister: "and never, never, when their passions are aroused by personal hatred. If a woman were killed anywhere, it might well be here, and you shall not stay. See, horses are saddled for all of us, your own is there. My faithful slave Hendtick will go with us, and your little Mitje must ride for once. Five minutes I give you to get on your habit and bid farewell, but after that we must be gone. I should not deserve your father's friendship if I left you longer here."

They went; and Breda tried to persuade Zetza also to flight, but she was inflexible; her insensibility was past; her energies were aroused, and the passive yielding girl had become a woman of thought and firmness as well as feeling.

"I will not leave my father's house at such a time," she said; "no persuasion shall induce me; no commands impel. My heart is not changed within this hour, and what would have been my duty before is now the same; so where my parents choose to stay, there I remain, and share the chances of life and death with them."

The last guests had gone, though with reluctance, and after sad and brief adieus, when Hans came rushing in to tell that his cattle had been carried off by armed Kafirs, and his fellow herdsman killed.—He had narrowly escaped, and on looking back from a neighboring hill, he had seen some of the savages entering the bush not ten minutes' journey behind him.

This demanded instant attention; all the slaves were summoned into the forehouse, when it was discovered that, of the eight men that had been counted on, two Mozambique prize slaves had taken themselves off to provide for their own safety otherwise. No time was lost in arming the rest, and then the value of Wilhelm's prudence and foresight was discovered; for he had taken care that every gun and all the ammunition in the house should be at hand and serviceable.

The shutters were all closed, the doors fastened, and the family and servants repaired to the upper rooms to watch for the arrival of their savage enemies. All had been done with great rapidity, and the ten minutes had not elapsed when, turning from the half darkened window, Wilhelm looked back at his sister, and his voice did tremble as he said, "They are coming."

The boer detected his emotion, but misunderstood it. "That a son of mine should prove a coward!" exclaimed he, bitterly. "Your brothers died like men."

"And so can I," replied Wilhelm; and for once he spoke proudly. "And you, perhaps, may see me fall, but do not let us die with angry words upon our lips."

Something in his tone pleased Muller, and, for the first time for years, he cast a look of satisfaction on his son. The next instant they both and Breda fired simultaneously, and the fall of two of the foremost Kafirs, and a third being evidently wounded, proved the accuracy of their aim.

This gave a momentary check, but they came on like a cloud of locusts, and rushing towards the house the hurried fire of the servants did little harm, and left its traces merely in one or two wounded men.—The crash of glass was heard instantly as they endeavored to force in the windows; but the heavy and strongly fastened shutters within withstood their efforts; while from the casements above, which were all provided with similar defences, only withdrawn a little to permit an aim, the beseiged kept up a fire on the assailants, which, if not always deadly, was sufficient greatly to interfere with their proceedings: and again and again the savages retreated, and many a shower of assegais was directed against the defenders, but the shutters were so quickly closed that most of the missiles fell harmlessly back to their owners. The scene without was fearful; dark beings rushing to and fro, like demons, with looks and gestures as of fiends obeying Satan's mandates. Within 'twas very painful and fearful also; all the children were collected round their mistress, with tears and suppressed lamentations—some cowering to the ground, others clinging to her dress; while she, who, though a kind and worthy woman, was little suited to such exigencies, had on the Kafirs' first appearance, caught her daughter to her bosom with the exclamation, "O mein kindt! mein kindt!" but spoke no more, and now sat weeping and disconsolate, the very image of despair.

Zetza had quickly withdrawn from her mother's embrace, for she had other duties to perform, and though as convinced as any that their resistance could not avail, she proved that something of the courage of her father and her brothers animated her own spirit, and without shedding a tear or uttering an expression of alarm, she exerted her utmost to control the terrors of the female attendants, and give aid to their defenders. From window to window darted Muller and his assistants, wherever their presence was for the moment most needed, to beat or frighten off the enemy, as they gathered in different parts around the walls; and there being fortunately a few spare guns, Zetza and the slave-girls received and loaded the pieces as they were discharged, and every man was always ready with a useful weapon in his hand.

It was but for a little time this lasted—seconds seemed hours, and bore with them the events of days on such occasions. Ten minutes might have crept on, and many a savage form lay lifeless beneath its karosse, on the stoop and on the ground, while within the house there was only a man wounded and one of the children killed; but their scanty stock of ammunition was fast diminishing, and they felt that this kind of warfare could not long endure.

"It must soon come to an end," said Wilhelm, as his sister, while handing him a loaded gun, made some comment on the fact. "And it strikes me also that the Kafirs are busy at something there, behind the lean-to, and we have no window that commands it. I will try and see what they are at."

He leaned from the window for a moment, but a Kafir poising his weapon, instantly sent it whistling through the air. As the youth drew back it missed his head, but striking his arm, passed through, almost ere it was felt, as though six inches of iron and six feet of wood had met no opposition—leaving an aperture in size like the passage of a grape shot. With a firm hand but ashy cheek, Zetza bound up the wound, while her brother said in a low voice, "I saw smoke rising—they will fire the house. If you, my sister, where not here, I should not care so much."

"God's will be done," said the bride, calmly; "I do not now feel life so hard to part with, as I should once have felt it."

The news was told to Muller: and the dense smoke which quickly filled the atmosphere, confirmed its truth. The enemy had lighted a fire, and were heaping on it weeds and branches of every sort, whose smoke would prove most suffocating and offensive. With the fences of the heat of months they extended the fire, and while the flames rose quickly to the roof, every particle of wood catching and blazing like a torch, they fed it also with furze and bushes. Meanwhile the rooms above were filled with smoke and vapor almost to suffocation.

"We must not stay here," said Muller, "to be smoked like bees in their nests. Let us make a rush and at least die in the open air."

It was done on the instant—the children were seized by the elder slaves, Zetza caught her mother's arm, and in a body they hastened down the wide staircase. The boer was first, and himself, opened the heavy entrance door, when all rushed forward, as though it had been to shun, not meet their foe.—The Kafirs were taken for the moment unawares, but immediately surrounded their prey, and though most sprung from it to the ground, many of the unhappy fugitives were assegaied upon the stoop.

As Breda's foot touched the earth the weapon of a stalwart savage, used as a lance, went through his body, and he sank down without a groan; and in the same hour Zetza was a bride and a widow. All now was horrible confusion,—the dead, the dying and their slayers—assegais and knobkerries upraised in every direction, and the red glare of the flames cast over all. A few fierce words in broken Dutch had proved at once their recognition of Muller, and partial knowledge of the language, and standing before his mother and sister, Wilhelm resolved to make one effort for their lives. "Spare them," he exclaimed, "the Kafirs do not kill women!"

"Spare none! spare none!" cried a Kafir in a leopard skin karosse, whom Zetza knew to be Macomo, as she had seen him formerly. "Kill them all, women and children, spare not one!" a stern looking warrior replied, meanwhile, with a thrust of his assegai, and Wilhelm sunk at his sister's feet. Muller who, aged and wounded as he was, stood defending himself, with the obstinate courage of a lion, beheld his son's fall, and his last act, as a mortal wound subdued his energies, was to whirl his gun as a knobkerrie, and level the youth's assailant to the ground. "Mein kindt! mein kindt!" groaned the mother, as she folded Zetza in her arms once more. She never spoke again; a spear entered her side, and she lay down to die. Her embrace was relaxed, yet the unhappy girl fell with her, then herself, unwounded, rose half kneeling, and looked vacantly around upon the scene of horror.

"Spare none! spare none!" was again the cry of many voices, and one or two slaves that had still been left alive, were struck to the earth in the agonies of death. Zetza saw the dark glance of more than one approaching savage bent upon her, and though she had never shrunk before throughout that dreadful conflict, she instinctively clasped her hands with an imploring air. A young Kafir stood near; he had, perchance, never seen blood shed until that day, and pity for the desolate girl touched his heart, and, without injuring, pushed her aside with his assegai, and she fell. Others believed her killed, and she lay there with the mingled heat of the sun and flames which consumed the dwelling of her childhood pouring on her face; while in mind half insensible to her fate, half conscious that the dead were her companions.

The work of blood being finished, the work of plunder was essayed; but there was little possible in that respect. All the cattle and horses that could be found had already been driven off; and the rapidity with which the whole dwelling became a blazing pile was such that scarcely any thing was attainable which could excite or satisfy cupidity; the tiffin which had engrossed so many of Vrow Muller's thoughts not being destined to be tasted even by the destroyers of her house. The little temptation to remain was so evident, and the certainty of the building being reduced to utter ruin so undoubted, that after collecting from the scene of death the weapons both of vanquished and of conqueror, the Kafirs prepared to leave the spot. As one stooped, however, to take the gun from Wilhelm's side, he perceived that Zetza shuddered and shrunk from his touch. He was a fierce old warrior, and he raised his spear to kill her. But Wilhelm was not dead, and had, within the last few minutes, returned to consciousness, though prudence had kept him still; and in the moment that through his half-shut eyelids he perceived the old man's uplifted arm, the youth made the greatest effort of which nature was capable, threw himself over his sister, between her and her merciless foe. An expression of surprise escaped the Kafir's lips, and he struck at them with his assegai, which, piercing the slight form of Wilhelm, passed between Zetza's arm and side, merely grazing her, and sunk deep into the earth.—But the warrior doubted not he had transfixed them both, and, drawing out his weapon, walked contentedly away.

Zetza closed her eyes; she knew she was unhurt, yet thought she must be dying; the lifeless body of the last most devoted protector weighed heavy on her chest; others lay around, and it surely was no longer a place fit for the living. She heard the tramp of horses; nearer came the sound, and louder; they were galloping as though for life or death. They came close, but not until a cry of horror in a well-known voice struck on her ear, did she raise her eyelids or show any signs of life.

It was Ignace, whose voice proclaimed the fact of her existence as he drew her from her horrible position; it was his joy at her escape that first inspired the wish of surviving that dreadful hour. Hearing worse tales after parting from her father, he had not been able to endure the idea of her danger, and as the leader of the six armed horsemen, he had hastened to render what aid he might, arriving but in time to preserve the life of her he loved, and snatch her from a situation whose terror might well have conquered reason.

An examination of her unfortunate companions proved that all were already dead; but any attempt to inter them at that moment was prevented by the intelligence that the Kafirs were returning on their path. Vaurenen hastened to the tree beneath whose shade he had placed his cousin, and told her they must go instantly.

"And leave them to the wolves?" said she, pointing to the lifeless group; "it must not be! it must not be!"

"I cannot hazard your life for those who can feel nothing," he replied, "but I shall return hereafter."

Ere he had finished he was mounted with the passive girl before him, his followers closed around, and they dashed on towards Graham's-town. The Kafirs threw themselves in their way, but the determined little band cut through them with some loss to the assailants: Ignace unconsciously avenging his young cousin by closing the career of the unfeeling savage who had slain him.

During the following week, the deferred rites of sepulture were performed under the direction of Ignace. He remained on the frontier throughout the Kafir war; and, at its termination, before he again quitted South Africa for another shore, brightness had returned to Zetza's cheek, and gladness to her eye, and Hannie Vander Meyer became again her bridemaid; but this time no heart was nearly broken by the bridal; the wedding festivities passed in peace: and the union has been, as it deserved to be, one of happiness.

THE SWORD OF WASHINGTON.

The Sixty-Seventh Anniversary of our National Independence was celebrated on Tuesday last, with all the spirit and patriotism worthy of the occasion. The following song was communicated to the New York Mirror, by our friend Hewitt, of Baltimore. The "Sword of Washington" is a noble subject, and here it is, thrilling from the lyre of the patriotic bard:

Come forth to the light, old blade of steel!
Come forth and let the freeman's eye
In reverence see, and proudly feel
The holy glow of liberty.
"In times that tried men's souls," when man
Stood boldly forth and plead his right:
Thou wert seen blazing in the van—
To Freedom's friends a beacon light.

The sword of Washington!—the sage
Whose wisdom ruled the council hall;
Whose form amidst the battle's rage
Was foremost at his country's call.
The sword of Washington!—the blade—
The Gideon blade, whose lightning hurl'd
Destruction on the foe—and made
The cry of Freedom shake the world.

Unstained as when it first was drawn,
Behold, it glads the patriot's eyes;
It woke to light at Freedom's dawn,
'Twill only sleep when Freedom dies.
Then let it drink the sun's pure light,
A holy gift to gaze upon—
The sign of Freedom's right and might—
The battle-sword of Washington!

THE GERANIUM PLANT.

BY MRS. LYDIA H. SIGOURNEY.

Flowers have a magic power to retouch the associations of other days. Though our path may have led over the steep and thorny places of the world, for many years, yet the unexpected sight of the pale grass flowers, and yellow kingcups, we gathered in childhood, brings back the cool fragrance of life's early morning. If the wearied traveller chance to find in foreign climes such plants as he culled by the singing brook of his native glen, the broad-leaved iris, or the bright crimson lobelia, straightway he is a boy again, and shreds them fondly into his mother's lap. The hoary woman, unto whom there remaineth little, save the arm-chair in the chimney corner, and the oft repeated counsel to her shouting grandchildren—if she see, among its lustrous green leaves, the pure white Carmella, remembers the thrill with which its cool petals drooped over her forehead at her bridal, and is lost amid the wanderings of fairy land.

The smile, or the breath of our familiar home-flowers, restore to us, in after life, the careless innocence of those days, when half in ignorance, and half in faith, we planted the rootless stem of some rich blossom, that had been given us,—and heaped the fresh soil tenderly around it, and watered it every moment,—and visited it with hope, until it was as brown and dead as the mould by which it was encompassed. They recall the reckless curiosity with which we dug up the bulb of our tulip, or tube-rose, and found them busy at their work of germination, which our impatience interrupted,—perhaps destroyed.

Distant places and absent friends are brought near, by the touch of the same talisman. The odor of a pressed flower, between the leaves of a long closed book, restores the voice, the form, of the loved one, who placed it there, whose home may now be in the tomb. I had sought the sweet trailing arbutus among the wilds of my native place, when life was new, and a box of it recently performed a journey of many miles to visit me. The moment it was opened, while its fragrance almost overpowered every sense, every breathing blossom spoke of the rocks which we use to climb in pursuit of it,—and of the rough, falling waters that filled every pause in our merry voices, and then suddenly my playmates stood beside me, their baskets overflowing with the gifts of early spring, themselves still young and spring-like, though on the heads of some, I knew that the frosts had settled, and that over others, rested the green sod.

Still more eloquent was a slender plant of the rose-geranium, which accompanied me, somewhat more than two years since, on my way to an Older World. It was taken from her quiet bed, in her garden, by my little daughter, as the parting time drew near, with the remark, that "something green might look pleasant to me on the sea." And so it did. But I imagined not then the depth of communion it would call forth. For the home-spirit was in its heart, and it became to me as a friend. Sometimes when evening closed in over the deep, with those heavy sighs of the wind which often betoken a coming storm, and the ship leaped and plunged amid the billows, as if seeking for a place to escape, or a depth to hide in, I have drawn closer to that weak plant, as if its love might comfort me. Or at waking in the morning, and raising my head from the coffin-like berth where the dark hours had passed in such broken slumbers, as the hoarse lullaby of the surge induces, I have fixed my eyes first upon that solitary plant, and spoken softly to it as to a child. Yet it was evidently in an uncongenial atmosphere, and the delicate branches grew sad, and faded. I numbered its leaves, but almost every day some of them grew sickly and fell, until, at last, only a few were left clustering round a single, graceful stalk.

We had been thirteen days and nights upon the great deep,—and accomplished nearly two thousand miles of our watery journey, when I awoke at the grey hour of dawn. I remembered that, the first anniversary of the death of my beloved father, and beckoned the solemn imagery to meet me amid the waves. At once every circumstance of that scene gleamed forth as in a picture. His venerable head, resting upon its white pillow, the brightness of his beautiful hair, on which fourscore and seven winters had scattered no snows, his heavy breathing mingling with the slow dropping of the summer shower upon the vine-leaves at its casement, and the steady ticking of the clock through that lonely night, while bending over him, I hoped against hope, that the sudden illness might not be mortal, and that the form, which but the day before, had moved with so vigorous a step, would yet rise up, and lean upon its staff, and come forth to bless me. The rain ceased, a circle of faint brightness foretold the rising of the sun, —those precious lips uttered again the sound of kind words,—the opening eyes told their message of saintly love,—the lids fluttered and closed. There was no more breath.

A wail!—Another,—piercing and protracted—deeper even than that with which an only child mourns the last parent. It must be the wail of a mother. No other sorrow hath such a voice. Yet, so abruptly it burst forth, amid surrounding silence, that, for a moment, memory was bewildered, and the things that had been, mingled their confused tissue with things that are.

Among our passengers was a dignified and accomplished lady, returning with her husband, an officer, from a residence of several years in Canada, to England, their native land. They had with them three little daughters, and in the course of those conversations, which beguile the tedium of sea-life, she had sometimes spoken of the anxiety with which her aged mother waited to welcome these descendants, born in a foreign clime, whom, of course, she had never seen, and so exquisite was their beauty, that it would not have been surprising, had a thrill of pride, heightened the pleasure, with which she painted the joy of such a meeting. The youngest was a babe of less than a year, and we, who often shared its playful wile, fancied that it had grown languid, as if from some inherent disease. Yet, its large black eyes still beamed with strange lustre, so that neither parents nor nurse would allow that aught affected it, save what arose from the change of habits, incidental to the confinement of the ship. Yet, that night, the mother more uneasy than she was willing to confess in words, decided not to leave its cradle. In the saloon, adjoining our state-room, she took her place, and when we retired, the fair infant lay in troubled sleep. Yet, even then, the spoiler was nearer to it than that watchful mother; and ere the morning, he smote it in her arms. We found her clasping it closely to her bosom, as if fain to revivify it with her breath. Masses of glossy black hair, escaping from their confinement, fell over her shoulders, and drooped as a curtain over the marble features of the dead. Mingled with gasps of grief that shook her like a reed, were exclamations of hope, that hope, which clings and cleaves to the wounded heart,—striking its fibre, wherever the blood-drop oozes, and striving like a pitying angel, to staunch, where it may not heal.—"Constance! Constance! look at me. Oh, my dear husband, she will live again. She has been sicker than this, once, when you were away. Yes, yes—she will breathe again." Long she continued thus assuaging her bitter sorrow, with this vanity of trust, and then we tenderly strove to loosen her convulsive grasp from the lifeless idol. After we had prevailed, and it was borne from her sight, we still heard in the pauses of the soothing voice with which her husband sought to console her, the wild cry, "She will breathe again! John! John! I saw her sweet lips move when they took her from me. My baby will live again!"

It was laid out on our sofa, in the lady's cabin, in a pure white robe, its brow surpassingly beautiful, and the deeply fringed lids but imperfectly closed over the large, lustrous eyes. The black lace veil of the mother shaded its form and features, and through it was clearly visible, the last green slip of my rose-geranium. It was my gift to the dead, and pressed into that little pale hand not without a tear. This was the last office of that cherished plant, which had left its own home, in the quiet gardens of New England, to do this service to faded innocence, and itself to die. Happy shall we be, if, in the closing of our own frail life, we, like this trembling voyager, leave behind a gleam of light and consolation, as the olive-leaf above the flood, or the dove, whose last act was peace, ere it entered rejoicing into the Ark, to be a wanderer no more.

OH! WEAR FOR ME NO SABLE HUE.

BY ANNA CORA MOWATT.

Oh! wear for me no sable hue,
No garb of blazon'd grief—when I
Shall bid this gladsome earth adieu,
And fling my spirit's garments by!

Nor mark the spot with urn or stone,
Where worthless dust unconscious lies;
Within your loving hearts alone,
The monument I ask, should rise!

And shed for me no bitter tear,
Nor breathe my name in mournful tone;
Your smiles 'twas mine to waken here,
And I would think them still my own!

Nor link my image with regret:—
A pleasant memory I would be;
To consecrate and brighten yet
The scenes that once were dear to me!

Ah! why should tears bedew the sod
Where some beloved one's ashes rest?
The soul rejoiceth near its God,
And can ye mourn that spirit blest?

Then weep not for the loved one fled
To realms more pure—a home more fair;
And call not the departed dead!
She lives—she loves—she waits you there.

TWICE FOILED;

OR,

THE FORTUNE-HUNTER.

BY LUCY HAMILTON.

Two young girls were the only occupants of the principal drawing-room of a fine mansion in Chesnut street. Both were beautiful, but so unlike, that a stranger would have been surprised to learn they were near relatives.

The fair complexioned Lucy, whose waving ringlets of light auburn, and blue eyes, corresponded with the softness of her character, was the only daughter of the master of the mansion, indulged, but not spoiled, for her father, whose ancestors were Quakers, had not neglected the useful and the practical in her education. But Cora, her dark-eyed companion, also an only child, had, under more fashionable tutelage, acquired a disdain for the homely occupations of domestic life, as tending to mar the softness of her charms, or divert her from the attainment of the many accomplishments, designed to aid the effects of her rare beauty. But scarce had she been presented to the world as the wealthy and all-accomplished daughter of the successful speculator Melmond, ere the failure of a house in Boston, in which was invested the principal of her father's funds, overthrew the vast fabric of splendid opulence he had been rearing for years, and, by destroying the only ambition which had sustained him through life, reduced his mind to so despondent a state, that his days were hastened to a premature close. His wife and child, stripped of the wealth they had deemed exhaustless, were left to contend with greedy creditors, whose haste made such sacrifice of their remaining fortune, that nothing was left, even for the comforts of life, to those so delicately nurtured. To a small cottage, two miles from New York, the property of an old maiden aunt, the mother and daughter were compelled to retire, and live with the greatest economy. Here they had remained, a year, when Lucy Milford wrote an urgent request, that Cora, her beloved cousin, should make her a visit, and should even feel entitled to share with her the advantages of wealth, which could not afford her any heart satisfaction unless she could succeed in ministering to the comfort of one she loved as herself. Overcome by such sincere affection and generosity, so artlessly expressed, Cora yielded to the desire of her mother, that she should seek a change of scene; and four days after the receipt of the welcome epistle, we presented her as the companion of Lucy in the luxuriously furnished drawing-room, mentioned in the opening of our tale.

"Look, look, Cora!" suddenly exclaimed Lucy, who was sitting by the window engaged in netting a purse; "there is Henry Waterford, the young gentleman who was so attentive to you, at the Springs, two summers ago. He has been to see me twice since his arrival in town, which was only last Monday: not quite a week. He is undoubtedly a fine looking man, and his manners are so graceful, his conversation so agreeable, that any woman might feel proud of his attendance in public. I mean to attach him exclusively to my party for the winter. By-the-by, I recollect that father has invited him to take tea with us this evening. How surprised he will be to see you! Ah! but you are not well, dear coz," she said, as she turned and beheld the pale countenance of Cora, who was, at the time, reclining upon a sofa; "I will go and see that your chamber is comfortable, and, then, will conduct you to it, that you may seek rest after your fatiguing journey. My selfish desire to enjoy your society has made me unmindful of the delicate state of your health."

The kind-hearted girl departed, and soon returned to conduct Cora to her chamber, where every luxury that taste could desire invited her enjoyment.

Left alone by her friend, whose ready tact soon discovered that her presence was undesired, the unhappy girl buried her face in her hands and gave way to the long-smothered anguish of her heart.

"And I must meet the cold, calculating deceiver," she exclaimed, "and that, too, when my fading beauty and sinking health must give evidence of the deep-rooted sorrow which pride so thinly veils. But, he shall not triumph in winning the heart of my sweet Lucy, for base purposes. She will soon learn to love him as I have, if I do not, at once, dispel the charm of this dangerous intimacy, and then, to destroy even the illusion, would be fatal to her peace. To think how, with all the fervour of an impassioned soul, in the pride of beauty, talent and wealth, I worshipped him as one superior to me, in spite of every vain advantage;—with what heart-inspired eloquence did I labour day after day until the scruples of my parents were overcome, and they consented to bestow their darling and the pride of their house upon one they deemed of little worth! But why these tears? Should I not be thankful for any chance that has rescued me from a fate with one so unworthy? In a short time I shall have schooled myself to bear, without excess of agony, the knowledge of the deceit and falsehood, which so oft repays the young and guileless heart's devotion. My strength of purpose must be proved, this evening, or I shall lose my self-respect. My fair cousin's pleasure shall not be marred, this first night of my arrival, for I will exert myself to repay her kind solicitude on my account."

So saying, she, with the desperate energy of a yet unsubdued mind, arose from the couch upon which, more than hour before, she had thrown herself in hopeless despondency, and walking to the glass, scanned the expression of her fair, pale face—then deliberately unbound the thick masses of her rich raven hair, and set herself to the task of arranging them with care and skill. Her toilet was soon completed. A black mode dress, relieved at the neck and hands by crimped ruffles of the finest lawn—a few white roses wreathed in the node of her hair—and her simple attire needed not a single addition to heighten the charm which the absence of all pretension gives to grace and beauty. Hanging a basket on her arm, which contained some little fanciful works, that she purposed to occupy herself with, she descended to the drawing-room, anxious to avoid the awkwardness of entrance after the party had assembled. She was fortunate in accomplishing her wish. Lucy soon joined, and was delighted at seeing her look so well.

They had not sat long, before Mr. Waterford was announced. He entered with the assured air of one certain of a welcome reception, and was received with pleased courtesy by the youthful mistress of the mansion, who, sportively pointing to Cora, half hidden in the recess of a distant window, enquired if old friends did not, by instinct, recognize each other when they met in distant parts.

"Cora—Miss Melmond—pardon me—this is, indeed, an unexpected pleasure."

All his self-possession had vanished, and he stood bowing confusedly before Cora, who had not risen, and was regarding him with calm contempt. At last, she said, as he continued to draw near to her—

"Be seated, I pray you, and let not an apparition as unwelcome as unexpected, betray you into such theatrical manifestations of feeling. Forget, as I have done, all that embarrasses you in your present position, and meet me with the worldly wisdom which will enable you to laugh at the idle follies of the past."

This was said in a low tone, considerately, as if intended to re-assure him; but it had the contrary effect. He felt stung by the calm superiority of the woman he had wronged, and a jealous pang shot through his heart when he discovered not a vestige of the old love remaining, and reflected how deep must have been the scorn that could so soon have destroyed a passion fervent and absorbing as hers.—Completely unmanned by the thoughts which passed in rapid succession through his mind, Lucy's merry prattle failed to arouse him to a manifestation of interest, such, even as politeness required.

The summons to tea was a welcome one, and when Mr. Milford entered, and gallantly tendered his arm to conduct Cora to the supper-room, Waterford rejoiced that he was spared the necessity of again approaching her, and meeting the calm glance which spoke no recognition of former ties.

Henry Waterford was not naturally heartless, mean, or unprincipled, but circumstances had done their best to destroy the manlier portion of his character. He was the youngest, and spoiled son of his family. Accustomed to luxury, and incapable of dispensing with it, he never thought of entering into the married state, until he could introduce into his home the luxury he considered indispensable to his condition in life. He thought it utterly impossible for a lady to descend to household cares, and would have been disgusted with the plain details of housekeeping himself. It was, therefore, that loving Cora, as well as the effeminacy and selfishness of his nature would allow, he still looked to her wealth as the principal means of their mutual enjoyment. Had he been the possessor of wealth, he would have singled her out, from all others, to share it with him; but the idea of living simply and frugally, and exercising his energy and talent for the support of the being who relied upon him for happiness, never once occurred to him. Wealth was an indispensable possession, even to the gratification of love, to one who delighted only in its soft voluptuousness.

Possessed of an ardent ambition, he lacked the manly energy to persevere through danger and difficulty to the attainment of his purpose, but determined to proceed directly to the accomplishment of his wishes by means more congenial to his tastes.—It was no inconsiderable part of his ambition to gratify to the utmost the luxurious propensity which prompted him to surround himself with all that was graceful and beautiful. It was, therefore, around the young and lovely that he fluttered, when he frequented places of fashionable resort; and, knowing all the specious arts which win upon unsophisticated female hearts, he was generally received with favour. His family were wealthy, and well-known—therefore, all admitted him freely to their intercourse, and no one suspected the selfish designs he harboured, for, with exquisite tact, he hid his foibles from observation.

When Lucy and Cora appeared at Saratoga, he felt that the long wished-for opportunity had arrived.—He soon contrived an introduction to them, and, always declaring that he was not a marrying man, approached them in the character of a disinterested friend—often playfully, as their acquaintance progressed, assuming the part of Mentor, to counsel and to warn them of the danger they incurred in stemming the tide of worldliness and folly, without one of the deeply initiated to steer their bark upon its waves of difficulty. His powers, for the first time exerted to their uttermost, were soon successful, for, in a shorter time than he expected, the high-minded Cora yielded him her heart. The parents disapproved of the intimacy when it was too late.—They saw that Cora's happiness was at stake, and yielded a reluctant consent, merely stipulating that the marriage was not to take place for a twelve-month, until she had completed her eighteenth year, the engagement to be kept secret during the time. In the course of this period, the loss of fortune, followed by the death of her father, and the subsequent desertion of her lover, familiarized our poor orphan with the deepest misfortunes that the human heart can know.

It was not until she had bowed in anguish of spirit over the last remains of her doting father, and soothed the first grief of her heart-broken mother, that she thought of the changed manner of her lover, and that he had long ceased to urge their marriage with his old impetuous haste. True, he paid her every delicate attention, and had even wept her bereavement; but no soul-felt sympathy seemed to unite them as formerly. Was this a time to show her coldness, if he really loved her!

"He does not love you, my child," the mother exclaimed, as weeks after their bereavement, in their desolate dwelling, Cora regretted the infrequency of her lover's visits. "The heiress of the wealthy Melmond was a greater attraction than my daughter, in all her youthful charms, obscured as they are by misfortune, could ever prove."

"Tell me not so," Cora replied, with a vehemence which startled her mother. "Take not from me the last and only strength that enables me to live even for you. The loss of my father—the loss of wealth—makes me cling with closer tenacity to those affections which remains to solace me, and to preserve me from despair. Never did I feel proud of the title of heiress until I thought of the happiness it would enable me to bestow upon those I loved."

"I would not distress you needlessly, my sweet child," the mother, with evident pain, responded: "but would open your eyes to the deceit practised upon your noble nature by one who has not courage to pronounce himself a mercenary. I would not have my lovely Cora, my darling and my pride wait, with anxious fears, the tardy coming of the dissembler, who only hesitates as to the means of throwing her off, now that she has no longer a purse to excite his greedy avarice."

"Enough, enough, mother," Cora said, with anguish depicted in her countenance. "You accumulate ill upon me too fast, by seeking to deprive me of my remaining blessings."

The pale and feeble mother had arisen and thrown her arms around her daughter, to implore her forgiveness, when an only servant entered and said that Mr. Waterford was below. The color instantly returned to the pale cheeks of Cora, and a smile bright and warm from the heart, illumined her countenance, as she kissed her heart-stricken parent, and went, in haste, to welcome her lover.

"Thanks, thanks, many thanks," she exclaimed, entering the small drawing-room where he sat. "You have come to dispel the dark shadows of boding ill which cluster around me in your absence. Tell me, again, that you love me—as of old. You cannot imagine the strength of my affection for you, for I was as proud of being your choice in the sunny day of my prosperity, as if you could have decked my brow with an immortal wreath of fadeless glory."

"Love you, dearest!" he said, giving way to the affection he naturally felt for so lovely a being devoted to him; "I would be less than man, could I feel ought else for you; but, at the same time, I must warn you that you are bestowing the gift of your matchless charms, and priceless heart, upon one, wild, improvident, and incapable of the necessary exertion to maintain you, as a woman of your delicacy and elegance is entitled to expect from the man who pretends to your alliance. I, sometimes, think that ours will not be a happy union, and that you are worthy of a better fate than the one you would generously share with me."

Cora, with a glance which penetrated his soul, interrupted him by replying—"If you think that you lack the manly energy, which as a proof of high-mindedness you should be proud to display, under existing circumstances, you are certainly right in not burthening yourself with a portionless wife."

Her suspicion, now aroused for the first time, gained strength every moment. After a pause, which enabled her to suppress the emotion which would have impeded utterance, she continued:—"It is but just that I should offer you a release from your present enthralment, now that no worldly advantages enhance the value of such poor possession as myself."

"Nay, nay," he replied, interrupting her, "I am not the mercenary being you suppose. But, believe me, beloved Cora, some prudential consideration is necessary before entering upon a state which involves so many cares. My perplexities are greater than you can imagine. My own affairs have become much involved. I could not offer you, at present, the bare necessaries of life. My imprudence has ruined my father, so that we cannot calculate upon him. A little delay will be necessary, in order to extricate myself from pressing embarrassments;—for a brief season, we will part to unite under happier circumstances."

"And is this you, Henry Waterford, who thus humbles my pride, and thinks still to cajole me with new falsehood? Yes, we will part, and part for ever! I thank Heaven, that I am released from one who has all along sought my hand from unworthy motives."

Cora, sustained by the indignant feeling, which the consciousness of her lover's meanness called forth, manifested much less emotion than could have been expected. The contempt she felt lowered the object of it so much in her eyes that regret made no part of her emotion.

"Go!" she said; "Henry Waterford, you are free to mend your fortunes by a more fortunate matrimonial speculation! My mother has judged you rightly. She sought, even this morning, to prepare me for this—but I spurned, with indignation, the charge of heartlessness in you."

He strove to convince her that she had misunderstood him, but she was no longer to be blinded. Bitterly did he now regret his precipitancy in giving her an insight into the real state of his feelings; for he writhed beneath the scornful reproach of one whose superiority he felt, and was deeply humiliated at the abject and mean appearance of his conduct in the eyes of her with whom respect for his character had once been as boundless as her love.

A silence of some moments ensued, until Cora rose to terminate the interview.

"Farewell, Mr. Waterford, when we meet again, we meet as strangers."

He sought to detain her, but she left the room instantly. From that time they had not met till the present. It was no wonder, therefore, that our faithless lover felt embarrassed. He felt, too, that his plans, so carefully laid, were to be frustrated, for he could not but suppose that Cora would apprize Lucy of his conduct. Several visiters appeared, in the course of the evening; among the rest, an agreeable young lawyer, by the name of Sanford, who paid particular attention to Lucy, which evidently excited great uneasiness in Waterford. Conversation, as usual, when young gentlemen and ladies are together, turned upon love. Lucy's father asked Cora, who sat next to him, if she had ever been in love.

"Yes," she replied, instantly; "in days gone by, I loved, as girls in their first youth are apt to think, most truly; but the fancy only lasted until the illusions which excited it were dispelled by the object himself. Since that time, I have dwelt

'In Maiden meditation, fancy free.'"

"Come, give us the history of your brief episode of passion," said Sandford to her. "I will wager my life, that yours was the inconstancy, and that your lover died the death of despair, or has been pining in hopeless dejection ever since."

"Then you have lost your wager," she replied, with a merry laugh; "I was the love-lorn deserted one. My lover was one who devoted his affections only while Mammon smiled propitious."

She then carelessly ran her fingers over the piano which stood near, and sung—

"For the lack of gold he left me, O!"

When Cora had finished her song, Mr. Milford, who was an old-fashioned man, insisted that all should be equally candid, and "give in their experience." Lucy recounted some of her girlish flirtations; and Mr. Sanford very humorously described some little events of his life, and ended by expressing it as his serious opinion that first attachments are the least durable of any that are ever formed.

Mr. Waterford, who had sat uneasy and restless, as this conversation continued, was next called upon, and excused himself upon the plea of being too general an admirer of ladies, to have been deeply entangled in the toils of any; but said, that he believed the affections of the ladies were more easily transferred than those of the gentlemen, for that it was the business of their lives to extract only the honey dews from the flowers of life; that affection, like every thing else, was sweeter from its novelty and freshness to those who desired excitement from change of emotion only; and that, for his part, he never counted on a lady's constancy until stern necessity had compelled her to abide her choice. The gentlemen, he said, who loved, when reason and judgment had determined where to fix their regard, more slowly resigned themselves to the dominion of a passion, which, when once firmly rooted and enters their souls, was not to be dismissed by the fiat of necessity, even when it compelled a separation from its object. He secretly determined, if possible, to regain some of the old influence over the mind of Cora by flattering her pride with the belief that his affection for her survived all the efforts he had made to subdue it.—He determined, also, when he could gain her ear, to throw himself entirely upon her generosity, excite her sympathy for the situation in which he was placed, and induce her to forward his suit with Lucy.

With such wrong notions had the mind of this weak young man been impressed, at first starting in life, that he thought there was no earthly enjoyment without splendour and show; and, in order to supply the deficiency of his own fortune, he had set his heart on a wealthy marriage as the only possible means of gratifying his ambition. With great reliance upon his power of influencing the minds of others, he nothing doubted that he should be able to acquit himself with satisfaction in the management of Cora and Lucy, and carry off the latter in triumph, while the tender friendship of the former would console him for the sacrifice he was necessitated to make.

The next day he sought an interview with Cora, renewed his vows of old devotion, but stated his ambition, his generous reliance upon her superior nobleness, and hinted his gratitude if she would promise to be his friend.

"There can be no abatement in the sentiments of esteem your recent conduct has inspired me with," replied his attentive and patient listener, with a sarcasm he did not perceive; "but you must rely upon your own skill for the success of a course which is to ensure future happiness. My aid would be awkwardly tendered, and, perhaps, mar your plans."

She then left him, with a feeling of thorough contempt, to the pleasant reflection that he had secured her silence, even if he did not find in her an active ally to promote his plans.

Lucy was soon informed of all that had passed, at which she was so indignant that she vowed he should never enter the house again. But, upon Cora's solemn assurance that not a vestige of the old feeling she had so recently striven against now remained, she consented to aid in retaliating upon him for the sins he had perpetrated in intention, against them both. It was, therefore, agreed that he should be treated with unusual courtesy, and encouraged to pay lover-like attentions to Lucy, until a formal proposal placed it in her power to mortify him as he deserved. Mr. Sanford, who had found a reciprocal interest in the heart of Lucy, was let by her into the secret, watched the progress of the affair, and waited for the denouement with interest.

In the mean time, Waterford, elated with a success which appeared certain, had determined on drawing matters to a close. He embraced the first opportunity of making a declaration of his love to Lucy, and commenced in the most modest manner, by assuring her that her long toleration of his visits, and the encouragement she had given to his attentions, the nature of which she could not mistake, had alone emboldened him to make known the ardour of a passion which had absorbed his whole soul. So great was his anxiety for a favorable answer, that he actually turned pale with anxious fears as he proceeded. Lucy's face was averted, as she enquired if another had never occupied the place in his affections now tendered to her acceptance.

"Never!" he replied. "Such feelings as the matchless Lucy inspires, could be wrung from the depths of man's heart but once."

"Pardon me," she answered; "I once heard you express your doubts of woman's faith. I would prove the faith of the man I love, before voluntarily surrendering him my heart. Does fortune lend no charm to irradiate with false lustre the object of your preference? We who are reputed heiresses, have to be doubly careful in the selection of our partners for life. Could I be convinced that you love me for myself alone, I would not hesitate to decide my fate at once."

The warmest vows of unchanging and disinterested love were uttered, when Lucy exclaimed—

"Then will I no longer withhold a communication I regret not having sooner made. You, of course, like the rest of my admirers, believe in the report of my wealth; but my grandfather altered his will, and with the exception of some trifling legacy, left the whole of his property to my aunt's son, which, in case of his death, was to devolve to my Cousin Cora."

She glanced at Waterford, who was regarding her with blank dismay.

"And why was not the report of your wealth contradicted?" he said.

"Because, as it did not originate from my own family, we felt that no blame could attach to us in allowing people to deceive themselves. Of course, I would not allow the person I married to be deluded by such idle reports."

"You, at least, acted unwisely in reserving this disclosure for the last—for it proves how unworthily you must have thought of one who aspired to your hand. The lady who would seek to shine in borrowed splendour, must submit to lose the regard she has won, when the fraud is discovered. I cannot resign my affections to one who would think it necessary to practice upon me as you have done."

"Can you make no allowance," she replied, with well-dissembled regret, "for my anxiety to prove the entire disinterestedness of the love you proffered?"

"No," he answered, "I could not excuse the arts you have practised, in a wife. She might feel that I had been her dupe."

"And for this reason we part?" she said, with sorrowful accent.

"For this—and for your entire misappreciation of my character, I think a separation will tend to our mutual advantage. I will not obtrude myself into your presence again to be sported with as a mere toy."

"Then stay a moment! I have one more communication to make: There was a codicil to my grandfather's will, which secures me an income of ten thousand a year, free from all contingencies, the money safely invested until I am of age, which will be next month. Cora has, also, by the death of the aunt's son who died a few weeks ago, become entitled to an immense fortune! Now, which of us will you enter into a matrimonial speculation with?" she said mockingly. "What a pity it is that you have behaved so badly to us both, that we were forced to revenge ourselves by making you appear ridiculous! In justice to us, you cannot be angry with us, for the part we have played. I will soon be married to one who can appreciate me above my fortune. Cora, also, I think, begins to appreciate the tried devotion of one, who was faithful to her in her adversity. A double marriage may in all possibility be solemnized in this house, to which you shall have the earliest invitation. But, for the thorough knowledge of your character, obtained since her sojourn with me, Cora would have been a sufferer through life from your perfidy. Now, I can assure you, she rejoices in her entire freedom from past impressions."

Rage and mortification so completely overpowered Waterford, that he left the house without making an attempt at justification. He soon left the city, and when next heard of, had married a widow much older than himself, who was reputed wealthy, but whose possessions he found settled on her children. He became intemperate, separated from his wife and is now living in profligacy and wretchedness—his natural endowments rendered worse than useless.—He lives a warning to those who cultivate selfishness to the exclusion of the more manly instincts of their natures—trusting to their address and management to procure for them advancement in place of that true dignity which borrows nought from adventitious circumstances, and prefers the indulgence of generous and noble feelings to any prosperity gained by mean concession to the vulgar taste and prejudice of others.

Cora, who has been a sufferer through indiscreet generosity and youthful inexperience, which made her confide too easily in the fair exterior and the eloquent and ardent professions, with which man knows how to conceal selfishness and lack of true feeling, has, at length, chosen wisely one, whose character she can respect enough to base firm love upon, and whose laudable ambition she can sympathise with and promote. She has not disdained to learn from Lucy many of the useful arts of life, and finds in them the activity promotive of health and cheerfulness,—the best preservatives of her charms. Determined on the active performance of her duties, she has none of that dread of the increasing cares of a family, such as overcame her mother in her adversity.

She and Lucy live near each other, in an elegant, but unostentatious manner; their parents reside with them and are made happy by the dutiful attention they receive from their children. Both of our married cousins bid fair to realize the promise of earthly bliss, bestowed upon well-assorted married couples who live virtuous and exemplary lives, ever remembering the end of their creation, and who are determined upon a conscientious performance of duty and a chastened submission to the will of God.

THE FORSAKEN;

OR,

FREDERIC AND CLAUDINE.

There is a nameless change come o'er that face,
A fading off of beauty and of grace;
Like a sad spirit on some haunted ground,
She glides with melancholy step around.
Fain would she with her usual tasks employ
The hours devoted to a dreamy joy;
Fain would she see, while apart and sad she stands,
Ply the quick needle with those listless hands;
But with that needle's point she only traces
A name, which soon the falling tear effaces!
Silent she sits—a little space apart,
Brooding o'er thoughts deep treasured in her heart!

I was proceeding leisurely along the vine and flower-banked road leading to Lausanne, and within a trifling distance of it, when my attention was attracted by the pale and care-worn figure of a young girl, who, apparently overcome and exhausted by exertion, had fallen to the ground, wherefrom a boy of about ten years of age was attempting to raise her; but the strength of the little fellow was not equal to the task, and, as I approached, he turned his eyes towards me imploringly, and without saying a word, made a most powerful appeal to my compassion. The little fellow was too timid to ask for assistance, and I needed not the asking, for, observing the condition of the poor girl, I ran toward her, and in another moment she was again upon her feet, and leaning upon the shoulder of the boy, too feeble a prop to support her.

The girl thanked me as well as she was able, and the boy also added, that Heaven had sent me to save his sister from perishing in the highway.

"Oh," said he, and his eyes sparkled with gratitude, "poor Claudine would have died but for you!"

"Will Claudine accept of my assistance, in conducting her into the town?" said I; adding, "Lean upon me, my poor girl, I am better able to support your fragile form."

Claudine murmured her thanks, and accepting of my proffered service, we entered Lausanne together.

The boy conducted us to a small but neat cottage where he stopped, and observed, "this is our home, sir," and then calling for his parents, two happy and generous-looking creatures came out, and with tears and outcries embraced their dying child, and led her into the cottage. They were all too much occupied with themselves to heed me, and as I did not wish to be overwhelmed with their gratitude, I silently glided away.

"Alas!" I exclaimed mentally, "here is life in all its mingled brilliancy and gloom. Happy parents, miserable child!"

There was something in the demeanor of the girl that led me to believe she was the victim of unrequitted affection. I don't know what it was, but I could not dispossess myself of the notion; and it gave rise to a train of reflections which continued to occupy my mind until I arrived at my inn.

As I passed the house with Claudine upon my arm, I had noticed my good hostess looking out upon us; so, when I entered, I made inquiry for the good woman of the inn, and, when she came, asked of her whether she could give me any information concerning the girl she had seen me with.

"No," said the hostess, "but I believe her name's Claudine, and that her parents are poor, but creditable people enough."

"And what is the occasion of Claudine's illness?"

"Oh, some love stuff, I believe," replied mine hostess, in such a tone and with such an air, that had I been more curious about Claudine's history than I was, I would not for all the world have heard it from such lips. They scandalized humanity.

"Go thy ways, my good woman," said I, and the good woman, who seemed only to require a hint to turn her back, departed with alacrity.

So! Claudine is Love's victim! The spoiler, perhaps, hath desolated her heart and soul! 'Tis melancholy to see blighted love in halls of state, but deeper, much deeper, is the grief when the object is of the lowly, who, having not the means to mingle in the world's gayeties, and seek consolation in the thousand pleasures that are to be purchased by those who can afford to buy, look for gratification only in the fields and groves, among birds and flowers and tinkling rills, wherein Nature stands revealed in her pure glory, and whose voice makes the sad heart sadder because of her own perfect purity, against which the grossness of the best of mortal clay shows vilely.

I was desirous of knowing more of Claudine, but I would not hear it from my hostess. I could not endure to hear human misery turned into a jest, and the finest feelings of humanity ridiculed by one who evidently never possessed them, and was not able to appreciate them.

In the course of the following day, I rambled again about the spot where I had seen Claudine, but Claudine came not. My hopes were all in vain, and I returned toward my inn. Within a short distance of the town, however, I perceived the girl's brother turn from a narrow pathway into the road. I hailed him, and the little fellow run toward me, and with tears in his eyes, exclaimed—

"Oh! sir, why did you go away last night? We all wanted to thank you for what you had done for poor Claudine."

"Indeed, my little friend," said I, "my heart is already rewarded for any service I may have rendered. But how is Claudine?"

"Oh, very bad, sir—very bad. We do not think she will ever rise from her bed again. She can take no nourishment, and is very restless unless our parents are at her side, blessing and forgiving her, and supplicating Heaven's mercy!"

"She is unhappy, then?"

"Oh, yes, sir; all her illness was through M. Frederic."

"And who is M. Frederic?"

"Oh, he is now the owner of the estate our cottage stands upon; but he was not so once; when his uncle lived he was plain Frederic, and everybody says that a better lad never lived. He courted Claudine, sir."

"And, having betrayed her, scorns her! God of Heaven! what beings there are wearing Thy likeness!"

"When his uncle died," continued the boy, "everybody thought he would have married Claudine, but he became acquainted with rich people, and they drew him from our humble cottage, and then he left the place, without even a farewell to poor sister; and now she is dying."

There was a history in the boy's few words—a history of honest, unsuspecting love, and cruel treachery. Oh, that man can be so infamous as to blight the fairest of life's flowers, and turn the warm and innocent heart into a gloomy sepulchre! Can there be thought—can there be feeling—can there be soul in him who thus makes the heart desolate and despairing? The victim, once innocent, once happy, o'erpowered by misery, yields her breath and dies; and he, the betrayer—her destroyer, flourishes! But whither does his career lead him? Life is only a span; and though the wicked triumph therein, their triumph is but for the moment—the reward of the sufferer is eternal!

I felt an inclination to see Claudine once more. I was anxious about her fate, and that she should have proper attendance. As the boy repeated his expression of sorrow that I had gone away so suddenly on the previous evening, I promised him that I would call again on the following day.

"Oh! will you?" said the little fellow. "We shall be so pleased to see you. And I know it will give Claudine pleasure too."

True to my promise, on the following morning I entered the humble cottage of the parents of Claudine. The boy and the mother were there, the father was out, pursuing his occupation. The poor woman overwhelmed me with thanks, and said that Claudine had asked for me many times.

"She would have died upon the cold road, but for you," said the good woman.

Presently I was conducted to Claudine's chamber. The hapless girl lay upon her small pallet; the scene was silent and solemn. Across the latticed window the vine tree threw its foliage, screening the chamber from the intrusion of the sunbeams. Everything was remarkable for its neatness and order in the place. Claudine fixed her eyes upon me as I entered; presently they were suffused with tears. I sat down by her bedside.

"And how is Claudine to-day?" said I.

She closed her eyes for a moment, and motioned with her head to signify that her case was hopeless; and then she put her hand forth, and taking mine within hers, endeavored to raise it to her lips, but her strength was not sufficient, and her hand fell to her side. She sighed at this indication of her debility, but I spoke to her in words of consolation and hope, and endeavored to encourage her to thoughts of life and happiness. But all hope seemed to have fled from her, save that which she had in Heaven.

In the course of the morning, she was able to speak to me, and I found that her greatest fear was that her prayers were not heard on High.

"How can a sinner like myself," murmured she, "hope to be heard, or have a prayer received?"

I endeavored to assure her of the great mercy of the Creator, and succeeded at length in calming her mind, and removing her apprehension. It was then that she mentioned Frederic. I had abstained from naming her betrayer, fearful of the consequences; but now she spoke of him with composure.

"I forgive him," she said, "for the misery he has brought upon me. I forgive him, deeply though he has wronged me, and if I dared I would breathe a prayer to Heaven for him, for surely he must need our prayers!" And then she clasped her hands, and her lips moved as if supplicating a pardon for her betrayer.

At this moment a loud outcry was heard below. The brother of Claudine, who had remained there, called for his parent to come down, and his cries were mingled with an exclamation oft repeated in a tone of great agony and exhaustion—

"Am I too late?"

"Gracious Heaven! that voice!" exclaimed the mother of the dying girl, and before I had time to make inquiry as to the matter, the poor woman had left the room, and presently I heard her endeavoring to prevent some one from ascending the stairs. The intruder uttered but one sentence, and that was in a tone as if his whole heart and soul were absorbed in the question, "Am I too late?"

The effort of the stranger to enter was too strong to be resisted, and in a moment a pale man, exhausted and covered with dust, rushed into the room, and as he entered, he repeated his cry—

"Am I too late?"

Alas! the heart-stricken Claudine had recognized the well-known voice and features of her betrayer, and had fallen back upon her bed, and there she lay, seemingly lifeless; her lips were white, and quivered not, and her hand was cold and powerless. The frenzied youth fell on his knees at the bed-side, and in a frantic tone, supplicated Heaven to restore her to him, whom he still loved, and to whom he was desirous of making reparation. He had been led away from virtue and truth by the pleasures which his fortune commanded; but having proved their hollowness, he had returned, like the wearied dove from its wanderings over the dreary waste of the world, to the ark of his happiness, the heart and home of Claudine.

Frederic believed the maiden to be really dead, and he gave himself up to despair. But I perceived that she was only overcome by the sudden shock of his appearance, and requested him to restrain his emotions, while I and the good mother endeavored to restore Claudine. Our efforts soon produced the desired effect. Claudine awakened in the world. She looked around the room, inquiringly, as if in a dream, and when her eyes rested upon the drooping penitent at her feet, she gazed at him for a moment with fixed expression, and then her emotion vented itself in tears.

"Claudine, Claudine, forgive me! Oh, forgive me!" cried the youth, in a tone of passionate emotion.

"I have nothing to forgive," murmured the girl; "my heart has already made peace with all on earth. My thoughts are now for my own peace with Heaven!"

"Bless thee! Bless thee, Claudine! Live, oh! live, for happiness and me!"

"Hush, Hush!" whispered Claudine, "breathe, not a sound of earthly passion now. It is too late!"

"Oh, no! Heaven will surely spare thee, to bless my love."

"It is too late," repeated Claudine. "Leave me, leave me, I pray. I have but a few moments longer to tarry in the world, and I would fix my thoughts on my soul's peace hereafter!

Depart—depart I pray thee, for the drear
Last hour of life is passing o'er me;
I cannot yield my breath, if thou art near
To bid me live for thee!
But come when I am dead,
No terror shall be pictured on my face,
I shall be calm, on my last mortal bed,
Without one passion's trace!"

"No! oh, no!" shrieked the lover. "You must not—shall not die;" and, springing up with wild emotion, he left the room.

He was not long absent, and returned, bringing a medical attendant of repute, who, on discovering the circumstances of the case, ordered Frederic to leave the house. The lover was astonished, but the doctor was imperative.

"She may recover," he said, "but every moment that you remain here serves to increase her disorder."

The lover then departed, and for three weeks he came not near Claudine. Still he hovered about her cottage, and felt happy if he could catch the tones of her voice, while standing at the stair's-foot. The skill of the physician had so far succeeded, that, at end of the period we have named, Frederic and Claudine met. And oh, what a meeting was that!—Claudine had been rescued from the embraces of death, to enjoy the love of him who had been rescued from the snares of the world!

And happiness was in store for them: full, true and enviable happiness. I continued at Lausanne till after their wedding. I saw the beautiful Claudine: she whom I had rescued from perishing by the road-side, and whom I had seen almost in the very arms of death, give her hand to the penitent Frederic. I heard her murmur the words that united them forever, and my heart involuntarily ejaculated a prayer to Heaven for their prosperity.

My best wishes were realized. I paid a visit to Frederic and Claudine a twelvemonth afterward, and I found them still the same happy beings as they were upon their wedding-day. Frederic the tender husband, and Claudine the devoted wife. Their every wish was gratified. The earth to them was a Paradise—they dwelt in a Heaven of Love!

THE LAST WISH.

The wish of Mr. Wilson, the celebrated Ornithologist, in regard to his burial-place, is beautifully expressed in the following lines:

In some wild forest shade,
Under some spreading oak or waiving pine,
Or old elm festooned with the budding vine,
Let me be laid.

In this dim lonely grot,
No foot intrusive will disturb my dust;
But o'er me songs of the wild birds shall burst,
Cheering the spot.

Not amid charnal stones,
Or coffins dark and thick with ancient mould,
With tattered pall, and fringe of cankered gold,
May rest my bones.

But let the dewy rose,
The snow-drop and the violet, lend perfume
Above the spot where, in my grassy tomb,
I take repose.

Year after year,
Within the silver birch tree o'er me hung,
The chirping wren shall rear her callow young,
Shall build her dwelling near.

And at the purple dawn of day,
The lark shall chant a pealing song above,
And the shrill quail shall pipe her song of love,
When eve grows dim and gray.

The black bird and the thrush,
The golden oriole shall flit around,
And waken with a mellow gust of sound
The forest solemn hush.

Birds from the distant sea
Shall sometimes hither flock on snowy wings,
And soar above my dust in airy rings,
Singing a dirge to me.

HOW TO CORRECT
A HUSBAND'S FAULTS.
A DOMESTIC SKETCH.

BY FANNY GRAY.

"Now, just look at you, Mr. Jones! I declare! it gives me a chill to see you go to a drawer. What do you want? Tell me! and I will get it for you."

Mrs. Jones springs to the side of her husband, who has gone to the bureau for something, and pushes him away.

"There now! Just look at the burra's nest you have made. What do you want, Mr. Jones?"

The husband throws an angry look upon his wife; mutters something that she cannot understand, and then turns away and leaves the room.

"It is too bad!" scolds Mrs. Jones to herself, commencing the work of restoring to order the drawer that her husband has thrown all topsy turvy. "I never saw such a man! He has no kind of order about him; and then, if I speak a word, he goes off into a huff. But I won't have my things for ever in confusion."

In the mean time, Mr. Jones, in a pet, leaves the house, and goes to his store without the clean pocket-handkerchief, for which he had been in search. Half of the afternoon passes before he gets over his ill-humor, and then he does not feel happy. Mrs. Jones is by no means comfortable in mind. She is really sorry that she spoke so roughly, although she does not acknowledge, even to herself, that she has done wrong, for, every now then, she utters, half aloud, some censure against the careless habits of her husband, habits that were really annoying and inexcusable. They had been married five years, and all that time Mrs. Jones had complained, but to no good purpose. Sometimes the husband would get angry, and, sometimes he would laugh at his wife, but he made no effort to reform himself.

"Mr. Jones, why will you do so?" said Mrs. Jones, on the evening of the same day. "You are the most trying man alive."

"Pity you hadn't a chance to try another," retorted Mr. Jones, sarcastically.

The offence given was a careless overturning of Mrs. Jones' work-basket, and the scattering of needles, cottons, scissors, wax, and a dozen little et ceteras about the floor.

The reply of Mr. Jones hurt his wife. It seemed unkind. He had brought home a new book, which he intended reading, but the face of Mrs. Jones looked so grave after the overturning of the work-basket, that he felt no disposition to read to her, but contented himself with enjoying the book himself.

It must be said, that Mr. Jones was a very trying man indeed, as his wife had alleged. He could open closets and drawers as handily as any one, but the thought of shutting either never entered his mind. The frequent reproofs of his wife, such as—"Had you any doors in the house where you were raised?" or, "Please to shut that drawer, will you, Mr. Jones?" or, "You are the most disorderly man in existence:" or, "You are enough to try the patience of a saint, Mr. Jones," produced no effect. In fact, Mr. Jones seemed to grow worse and worse every day, instead of better. The natural habits of order and regularity which his wife possessed, were not respected in the least degree. He drew his boots in the parlor, and left them in the middle of the floor—put his hat upon the piano, instead of hanging it on the rack in the passage—tumbled her drawers whenever he went to them—left his shaving apparatus on the dressing-table or bureau—splashed the water about, and soiled the wall paper in washing, and spite of all that could be said to him, would neglect to take the soap out of the basin—spattered every thing around him with blacking when he brushed his boots—and did a hundred other careless things, that gave his wife a world of trouble, annoyed her sorely, and kept her scolding at him nearly all the time. This scolding worried him a good deal, but it never for a single moment made him think seriously about reforming his bad habits.

One day he came in to dinner. It was a hot day. He went up into the chamber where his wife was sitting, and threw himself into a large rocking chair, took off his hat and tossed it over upon the bed right in the midst of half a dozen lace collars newly done up, and kicked off his boots with such energy that one of them landed upon the bureau, and the other in the clothes basket, soiling a white dress just from the ironing table. Poor Mrs. Jones was grievously tried. The husband expected a storm, but no storm broke. He looked at his wife, as she lifted his hat from the bed and put it upon the mantle-piece, and took his boots and put them in a closet from which she brought out his slippers and placed them beside him, but did not understand the expression of her face, exactly, nor feel comfortable about it. Mrs. Jones did not seem angry, but hurt. After she had handed him his slippers, she took the soiled dress from the clothes basket, over which she had spent nearly an hour at the ironing table, and attempted to remove the dirt that the boot had left upon it. But she tried in vain. The pure white muslin was hopelessly soiled, and would have to go into the washing tub before it would be again fit to wear.

"If you knew, Henry," she said, in a voice that touched her husband's feelings, as she laid aside the dress, "how much trouble you give me, sometimes, I am sure you would be more particular."

"Do I really give you much trouble, Jane?" Mr. Jones asked, as if a new idea had broken in upon his mind. "I am sure I am sorry for it."

"Indeed you do. If you would only be more thoughtful, you would save me a great deal. I shall have to wash out this dress myself, now, for the washerwoman is gone, and I can't trust Sally with it. I spent nearly half an hour in ironing it to-day, but as it is."

"I am very sorry, indeed, Jane. It was a careless trick in me, I must confess, and if you will forgive me, I will promise not to offend again."

All this was new. Both Mr. and Mrs. Jones felt surprised at themselves and each other. He had offended, and she did not get angry; she had been annoyed, and he was really sorry for what he had done. Light broke into both their minds, and both made an instant resolution to be more careful in future of their words and actions towards each other; and they were more careful. When Mr. Jones offended, as he still too often did, his wife checked the instant impulse she felt to upbraid him. He perceived this, and appreciating her self-denial, compelled himself, in consequence, to be more orderly in his habits. A few years wrought so great a change in Mr. Jones, that, to use hyperbole, he hardly knew himself. He could shut a closet door as well as open it,—could get a handkerchief, or any thing else from a drawer, without turning it upside down,—could hang his hat upon the rack, and put his boots away when he took them off. In fact, could be as orderly as any one, and without feeling that it involved any great self-denial to do so.

TO HER I LOVE.

I need not tell thee, fairest maid, how beautiful thou art;
Or how thy image, unawares, hath twined around my heart;
I need not tell thee that thine eyes, so tremulously bright,
Are far more beautiful to me than all the stars of night.

Nor need I tell thee that thy voice, so musical and rare,
Falls with a cadence soft and sweet upon the ravished air,
Full rich and deep as music's tone, breathed by an angel choir,
'Tis melody, sweet maid, methinks! a poet to inspire.

And I could sing, methinks, to thee, though I had ne'er before
Attempted in poetic flight on eagle wings to soar;
For inspiration holds her throne within thine eyes so bright,
Else whence the fountain of their pure and more than earthly light?

And were I of that envied few, to whom those gifts belong,
Of pouring out their inmost soul in music's thrilling song,—
And could I weave a lay like those, and place on Fancy's throne
Her whom my heart acknowledged queen, that station were thine own!

Thine own!—my bright—my beautiful!—though many a one before
Hath waked the tribute of a song, none else shall wake them more—
For I have wandered through the world of Woman, fancy free,
And kept my heart all disenthralled, until I gazed on thee!

But now I feel its every pulse is thrilling for that hour,
Which gives thee to my heart and home, with blushing girlhood's dower;
In all thy maiden innocence, in all thy queenly pride—
My own! my bright! my beautiful! my soul-entrancing bride!

THE PEASANT BOY.

BY MISS CHARLOTTE CUSHMAN.

Written on seeing the Picture, by Daniel Ricciarelli, of a Peasant Boy, with Spade on Shoulder, going to his Daily Labor.

There's poetry, Boy, in that step of thine,
Firmly and free on the green sward prest,
And the locks that over thy temples shine,
Flow wild in the wind of the soft sou'west.

Care lurks not, Boy, in that laughing eye,
No frowns o'ercast thy forehead's snow,
And the mellow tints of the morning sky
Lend to thy cheek an eloquent glow.

Thy heir-loom is pure, unbroken health,
A cheerful heart to endure thy toil;
And all thou needest of this world's wealth,
Thou canst sturdily win from the grateful soil.

With the lark's first song thou art up and away,
Brushing the dew from the glistening sod;
And chaunting the simple roundelay,
Which innocence hymns to the ear of God.

From the ardent sun of cloudless noon,
Thou seekest the shade of a sheltered nook,
Where the ring-dove murmurs its amorous tune,
To the answering sound of the gushing brook.

There, resting thy limbs on the mossy brink,
Thou takest in peace thy poor repast;
Bending thy feverless lips to drink,
From the wave that glideth so cool and fast.

Then to labor again till the warning sun
Fadeth away in the western sky;
And the shades of twilight are creeping on,
While the bird nestles low in the covert nigh.

They are coming to meet thee—the peasant band!
The fair-haired girl and tawny boy—
While the baby prattler clasps thy hand,
And breathes thy name with lisping joy.

To the cottage away! to the mother's knee—
To thy father's side—thou art welcome there.
That mother's smile is ever for thee,
And that father gives thee his warmest prayer.

And thou shalt rest in slumber sweet,
Pillowed beneath the rafter'd eaves;
While the summer rain-drops gently beat,
And the night wind stirs the woodbine leaves.

There's poetry, Boy, in that form of thine,
And the gazer covets thy fameless life;
Would that thy stormless lot were mine,
Passionless, careless, and free from strife.

THE CONSPIRACY;

OR,

THE OATH OF CATALINE.

A Sketch of the Republic.

BY H. W. HERBERT,

AUTHOR OF "THE BROTHERS," "CROMWELL," "JOAN OF ARC," ETC., ETC.

For what then do they pause?
An hour to strike.
MARINO FALIERO, Act I, sc. 3.

Darkness was over Rome, although the hours of night had already well nigh passed; and but for the thick storm clouds and the drizzling rain, some streaks of early dawn might have been seen on the horizon, when at the door of Marcus Læca, in the low grovelling street of the Scythemakers—strange quarter for the residence of a patrician—one of the princely Porcii—the arch conspirator stood still and glared around with keen, suspicious eyes, after a hurried walk.

It was, however, yet as black as midnight; nor in that wretched and base suburb, tenanted only by poor, laborious artisans, was there a single artificial light to relieve the gloom of nature.

The house of Læca!—How little would the passer-by, who looked in those days on its walls, decayed and moss-grown even then and mouldering—how little would he have imagined that its fame would go down to the latest ages, imperishable through its owners' infamy. The house of Læca!—The days had been, while Rome was yet but young, when it stood far aloof in the gay green fields, the suburban villa of the proud Porcian house. Time passed, and fashions changed;—low streets of squalid tenements supplanted the rich fields and fruitful orchards, which had rendered it so pleasant an abode. Its haughty lords abandoned it for a more stately palace nigh the forum, and for long years it had remained tenantless, voiceless, desolate. But dice, and wine, and women—mad luxury and boundless riot—had brought its owner down to indigence, and infamy, and sin.

The palace passed away from its inheritor—the ruin welcomed its last lord! And here, meet scene for orgies such as it beheld, Rome's parricides were wont to hold their murderous assemblies.

With a slow, stealthy tread, that woke no echo, Cataline advanced to the door. There was no lamp in the cell of the porter—no sign of wakefulness in any of its casements—yet at the first slight tap upon the stout oaken pannel, although it was scarce louder than the plash of the big rain drops from the eaves, another tap responded to it from within; so faint that it appeared an echo of the other;—the rebel counted, as fast as possible, fifteen; and then tapped thrice, as he had done before, meeting the same reply, a repetition of his own signal. After a moment's interval, a little wicket opened in the door, and a low voice asked, "Who?" In the same guarded tones the answer was given—"A Cornelius!" Again the voice asked, "Which?" And instantly—as Cataline replied, "The third"—the door flew open, and he entered.

The Atrium, or wide hall, in which he stood, was all in utter darkness; there was no light on the altar of the Penates, which was placed by the impluvium—a large, shallow tank of water occupying the centre of the hall in all Roman houses—nor any gleam of light from the tablinum, or closed gallery, parted by heavy curtains from the audience chamber.

There were no stars to glimmer through the opening in the roof above the central tank, yet the quick eye of the conspirator perceived, upon the instant, that two strong men with naked swords, their points within a hand's-breadth of his bosom, stood on each side of the doorway.

The gate was closed as silently as it had given him entrance—was barred and bolted—and till then no word was interchanged. When all, however, was secure, a deep rich voice, suppressed into a whisper, exclaimed—

"Sergius?"

"Ay!" answered Cataline.

"Come on!"

And, without further parley, they stole into the most secret chambers of the house, fearful, as it appeared, of the sound of their own footsteps, much more of their own voices.

Thus, with extreme precaution, when they had traversed several chambers, among which were an in-door triclinium or dining parlor, and a vast picture gallery, groping their way along in utter darkness, they reached a small square court, surrounded by a peristyle or colonnade, containing a dilapidated fountain. Passing through this, they reached a second dining room, where on the centre table they found a small lamp burning; and by the aid of this, though still observing the most scrupulous silence, quickly attained their destination—a low and vaulted chamber, entirely below the surface of the ground, accessible only by a stair, defended by two doors of unusual thickness.

That was a fitting place for deeds of darkness, councils of desperation, such as they held who met within its gloomy precincts. The moisture, which dripped constantly from its groined roof of stone, had formed long stalactites of dingy spar, whence the large gouts plashed heavily on the dank pavement. The walls were covered with green slimy mould; the atmosphere was close and fœtid, and so heavy that the huge waxen torches, four of which stood in rusty iron candelabra, on a large slab of granite, burned dim and blue, casting a faint and ghastly light on lineaments so grim and truculent, or so unnaturally excited by the dominion of all hellish passions, that they had little need of anything extraneous to render them most hideous and appalling.

There were some twenty-five men present, variously clad indeed, and of all ages, but evidently—though many had endeavored to disguise the fact by poor and sordid garments—all of the higher ranks.

Six or eight were among them, who feared not, nor were ashamed to appear there in the full splendor of their distinctive garb as senators—pre-eminent among whom was the most rash and furious of them all, Cethegus.

He, at the moment when the arch conspirator, accompanied by Læca and the rest of those who had admitted him, entered the vault, was speaking with much energy and fierceness of manner to three or four, who stood apart a little from the rest with their backs to the door, listening with knitted brows, clenched hands, and lips compressed and bloodless, to his tremendous imprecations, launched at the heads of all who were for any—even the least—delay in the accomplishment of their dread scheme of slaughter.

One among them was a large, stately-looking personage, somewhat inclined to corpulence, but showing many a sign of giant strength and vigor, unimpaired by years or habit. His head was large, but well-shaped with a broad and massive forehead, and an eye keen as the eagle's when soaring in his pride of place. His nose was prominent, but rather aquiline than Roman; his mouth, wide and thick-lipped, with square and fleshy jaws, was the worst feature in his face, and indicative of indulged sensuality and fierceness if not cruelty, combined with the excess of pride.

This man wore the plain toga and white tunic of a private citizen; but never did plebeian eye and lip flash with such concentrated haughtiness—curl with so full a sneer, as those of that fallen consular—or that degraded senator—the haughtiest and most ambitious of a race never deficient in those qualities—he, who drunk with despairing pride, and deceived to his ruin by the double-tongued Sibylline prophecies, aspired to be that third Cornelius, who should be master of the world's mistress, Rome.

The others were much younger men, for Lentulus was at that period already past his prime, and these—two more especially, who looked mere boys—had scarcely reached youth's threshold; though their pale, withered faces, and brows seared deeply by the scorching brand of evil passions, showed that in vice at least, if not in years, they had lived long already.

Those two were senators, in their full garniture, the sons of Servius Sylla, both beautiful almost as women, with soft and feminine features, long curled hair, and lips of coral, from which, in flippant and affected accents, fell words, and breathed desires, that would have made the blood stop, and turn stagnant at the heart of any one not utterly polluted and devoid of any human feeling.

This little knot shewed fierce for action, fiery, and panting with that wolfish thirst, to quench which blood must flow—but all the rest seemed dumb, tongue-tied and crest-fallen; the sullenness of fear brooded on every other face—the torpor of despairing crime, already in its own fancy baffled and detected, had fallen on every other heart—for, at the farther end of the room, whispering to his trembling hearers dubious and dark suspicions, with terror on his tongue, stood Cassius, exaggerating all the risks and perils of the enterprise.

Such was the scene when Cataline stalked into that bad conclave. The fires of hell itself could send forth no more blighting glare than shot from his dark eyes, as he beheld and read at half a glance their consternation. Bitter and blighting was the sneer upon his lip, as he stood motionless, gazing upon them for a little space. Then flinging his right arm on high, and striding to the table, he dashed his hand upon it that it rang and quivered to the blow.

"What are ye?" he said slowly, in tones that thrilled to every heart, so piercing was their emphasis; "men? no! by the Gods! men rush on death for glory!—women? they risk it for their own, their children's, or their lover's safety!—slaves? nay! even these things welcome it for freedom, or meet it with revenge! Less, then, than men! than women! slaves or beasts!—perish like cattle, if ye will, unbound, but unresisting—all-armed, but unavenged!—And ye, great gods! I laugh to see your terror-blanched, blank visages—I laugh, but loathe in laughing! Ye are the heroes that feared naught—naught but a victory too easy!—the destined, dauntless sacrificers, who would imbrue your knives in senatorial, consular gore!—kindle your altars on the downfallen capitol!—and build your temples on the wreck of empire! Ha! do ye start?—and does some touch of shame redden the sallow cheeks that courage had left hueless?—and do ye grasp your daggers, and rear your drooping heads? Are ye men once again? Why should ye not. What do ye see—what hear—whereat to falter? What oracle, what portent? Now, by the gods! methought they spoke of victory and glory! Once more, what do ye fear or wish?—what in the name of Hecate or Hades?—what do ye wait for?"

"A leader!" answered the rash Cethagus, excited now even beyond the bounds of ordinary rashness—"a day! a place! a signal!"

"Have them, then, all!" replied the other, still half scornfully: "lo! I am here to lead—the field of Mars will give a place—the consular elections an occasion—the blood of Cicero a signal!"

"Be it so!" said Cethagus, instantly, "be it so! Thou hast spoken as the times warrant, boldly!—and upon my head be it, that our deeds shall respond to thy daring words with equal daring!"

A loud hum of general assent succeeded to his stirring accents, and a quick fluttering sound ran through the whole assembly, as every man, released from the constraint of deep and silent expectation, altered his posture somewhat, and drew a deep breath at the close. But the conspirator paused not. He saw immediately the effect which had been made upon the minds of all by what had passed—he perceived the absolute necessity of following that impulse up to action, before, by a revulsion no less sudden than their late change from despondency to fierceness, their minds should again subside into the lethargy of doubt and dismay.

"But, say thou, Sergius," he continued, "how shall it be—and who shall strike the blow that is to seal Rome's liberty—our vengeance?"

"First, swear we!" answered Cataline. "Læca, the eagle, and the bowl!"

"Lo! they are here, my Sergius," answered the master of the house, drawing aside a piece of crimson drapery, which covered a small niche or recess in the wall, and displaying a silver eagle, its pinions wide extended, and its talons grasping a thunder-bolt, placed on a pedestal under a small but exquisitely sculptured shrine of Parian marble. Before the image there stood a votive lamp, fed by the richest oils, a mighty bowl of silver, half filled with the red Massic wine, and many paterœ, or sacrificial vessels of a yet richer metal.

"Hear, bird of Mars and of Quirinus!" cried Cataline, without a pause, stretching his hands towards the glittering effigy—"Hear thou, and be propitious! Thou who did'st all triumphant guide a yet greater than Quirinus to deeds of might and glory!—thou who wast worshipped by the charging shout of Marius, and consecrated by the gore of Cimbric myriads!—thou who wast once inshrined on the Capitoline, what time the proud patricians veiled their haughty crests before the conquering plebeians!—thou who shalt sit again upon those ramparts, meet day for thine unconquered pinion—shalt drink again libations—boundless libations, of rich Roman life-blood—hot from patrician hearts, smoking from every kennel! Hear, and receive our oaths! Listen, and be propitious!"

He spoke, and seizing from the pedestal a sacrificial knife, which lay beside the bowl, opened a small vein in his arm, and suffered the warm stream to gush into the wine. While the red current yet was flowing, he gave the weapon to Cethegus, and he did likewise, passing it in his turn to the conspirator who stood beside him, and he in a like manner to the next—till each one, in his turn, had shed his blood into the bowl, which now mantled up to the very brim with a foul and sacrilegious mixture—the richest vintage of the Massic hills, curdled with human gore.

Then filling out a golden goblet for himself—"Hear, god of war!" cried Cataline, "unto whose minister and omen we daily offer sacrifice—hear, mighty Mars, the homicide and the avenger! And thou, most ancient goddess, Nemesis, hear!—and Hecate, and Hades, and all ye powers of darkness! Furies and Fates, hear ye! For unto ye we swear, never to quench the torch, never to sheathe the brand, till all our foes be prostrate—till not one drop shall run in living veins of Roman patricians—till not one hearth shall warm—one roof shall shelter—till Rome shall be like Carthage, and we, like mighty Marius, lords and spectators of her desolation! We swear—we taste the consecrated cup!—and thus may his blood flow, who shall, for pity or for fear, forgive, or fail, or falter!—his own blood, and his wife's, and that of all his race, for ever! May vultures tear their eyes, yet fluttering with quick vision!—may wolves tug at their heart-strings, yet strong with vigorous life!—may infamy be their inheritance, and Tartarus receive their spirits!"

And while he spoke he sipped the cup of horror with unreluctant lips, and dashed the goblet with the residue over the pedestal and shrine. And there was not one there who shrank from that foul draught. With ashy lips indeed, but knitted brows, and their lips reeking red with the abomination, but fearless and unfaltering, they pledged in clear and solemn tones, each after each, that awful imprecation, and cast their goblets down, that the floor swam in blood, and grasped each other's hands, sworn comrades from that hour even to the gates of hell!

A long and impressive silence followed—for every heart there, even of the boldest, recoiled, as it were, for a moment on itself—not altogether in regret or fear, much less in anything approaching to compunction or remorse—but in a sort of secret horror that they were now involved beyond all hope of extrication, beyond all possibility of turning back or halting! And Cataline, endowed with almost superhuman shrewdness, and himself quite immovable of purpose, perceived the feelings which actuated all the others, which he felt not, nor cared for—and called on Læca to bring wine.

"Wine, comrades," he exclaimed, "pure, noble, generous wine, to wash away the rank drops from our lips that are more suited to our blades—to make our veins leap cheerily to the blythe inspiration of the God—and last not least, to guard us from the danger of this sweet chamber, which alone, of his boundless hospitality, our Porcius has vouchsafed to us!"

And on the instant the master—for they dared trust no slaves—bore in two earthen vases, one of strong Chian, from the Greek isle of the Ægean, the other of Falerian, the fruitiest and richest of Italian wines, not much unlike the modern Sherry, but having yet more body, and many Cyathi, or drinking cups. But he brought no water, wherewith the more temperate ancients were wont to drink their heady wines, even in so great a ratio as seven to one of the more generous liquor.

"Fill all—fill now," cried Cataline, and with the word he drained a brimming cup. "Rare liquor this," my Marcus," he continued, "whence hadst thou this Falenan?—'tis of thine inmost brand, I doubt not. In whose Consulship did it imbibe the smoke?"

"The first of Caius Marius."

"Forty years!—a ripe age?"—said Cethegus—"but 'twill be better forty hence. Strange, by the gods! that of the two best things on earth, women and wine, the nature should so differ. The wine is crude still when the girl is mellow, but it is ripe long after she is"—

"Faded, by Venus!" interposed Cethegus, swearing the ribald oath; "Faded, if not dead, and in the lap of Lamia!"

"But heard ye not," asked Cataline, or hearing, did ye not accept the omen! in whose first Consulship this same Falenan jar was sealed?"

"Marius! by Hercules! an omen! oh, may it turn out well," exclaimed the superstitious Lentulus.

"Sayest thou, my Sura—well! drink we to the omen—and may we to the valor and the principles of Marius, unite the fortunes of his rival—the all-triumphant Sylla!"

A burst of acclamations responded to this happy hit, and seeing now his aim entirely accomplished, Cataline checked the revel—their blood was up—no fear now of cold counsels.

"Now then," he said, "before we drink like boon companions, let us consult like prudent men—there is need now of council—that once finished"—

"Fulvia await me," interrupted Carius, "Fulvia with fifty revels!"

"And me Sempronia," lisped the younger and more beautiful of the twin Syllæ.

"Meanwhile," exclaimed Antonius, "let us all comprehend, so shall we need no further meetings—each of which risks the wakening of suspicion, and it may well be of discovery. Let us now comprehend, that when the time come, we may all perform our duty. Speak to us, therefore, Sergius."

No further exhortation was needed, for coolly the conspirator arose, to set before his desperate associates the plans which he had laid so deeply, that it seemed scarcely possible that they could fail; and not a breath or whisper interrupted him as he proceeded:

"Were I not certain of the men," he said, "to whom I speak, I could say many things that should arouse you, so that you should catch, with fiery eagerness at aught that promised a more tolerable position. I could recount the luxuries of wealth which you once knew—the agonies of poverty, beneath which, to no purpose, you lie groaning. I could point out your actual inability to live, however basely, deprived of character and credit, devoid of any relics of your fortunes, weighed to the very earth by debts, the interest alone of which has swallowed up your patrimonies, and gapes even yet for more!—fettered by bail bonds, to fly which is infamy, and to abide them ruin!—shunned, scorned, despised, and hated, if not feared by all men. I could paint to your very eyes, ourselves in rags or fetters, our enemies in robes of office, seated on curule chairs, swaying the fate of nations, dispensing by a word the wealth of plundered provinces! I could reverse the picture—but, as it is, your present miseries and your past deeds dissuade me. Your hopelessness and daring, your wrongs and valor, your injuries and thirst of vengeance, warn me alike that words are weak, and exhortation needless. Now understand with me how matters stand. The stake for which we play is fair before your eyes. Learn how our throw for it is certain. The consular elections, as you all well know, will be held, as proclaimed already, on the eleventh day before the calender of November. My rivals are Sulpicius, Muræna, and Silanus. Antonius and Cicero will preside—the first, my friend! a bold and noble Roman, who waits but an occasion to declare for us.

"Now, mark me, Caius Manlius—you all do know the man—an old and practised soldier, a scar-seamed veteran of Sylla, will, on that day, display yon eagle to twenty thousand men, well armed, and brave, and desperate as ourselve, at Fiesole. Septimius of Camerinum writes from the Picene district that thirty thousand slaves will rise at his bidding; while Caius Julius, sent to that end into Apulia, has given out arms and nominated leaders to twice five thousand men. Ere this, they have received my letter to collect their forces, and to march on that same day toward Rome. Three several armies, to meet which there is not one legion on this side of Cisalpine Gaul! What then, even if all were peace in Rome, what then could stand against us? But there shall be that done here, here in the very seat and heart, as I may say, of Empire, that shall dismay and paralize all that would else oppose us. Cethegus, when the centuries are all assembled in the field of Mars, sets on the guard in the Janiculum and beats their standard down. Then, while all is confusion, Gabinius and Ceparius with their households—whom, his work done, Cethegus will join straightway—will fire the city in twelve several places, break open the prison doors, and crying "Liberty to slaves!" and "Abolition of all debts!" rush diverse through the city, still gathering numbers as they go! Meantime, with Lentulus and Cassius, the clients of our houses being armed beneath their togas with swords, and breast-plates, and casques ready to be donned, I will make sure of Cicero and the rest! Havoc and slaughter, and flames everywhere shall make the city ours! Then ye who have no duty set, hear and mark this: always to kill is to do something, the more and nobler, so much the better deed! Remembering this, that sons have easy access to their sires, who, for the most part, are their bitterest foes, and to spare none, we are sworn—how much and how deeply it needs not to remind you,—more words are bootless; since to all here it must be evident that these things, planned thus far with deep and prudent counsel, once executed with that dauntless daring which alone stands for armor and for weapons, and, by the Gods, for bulwarks of defence, must win liberty and glory, moreover, wealth and luxury and power—in which names is embraced the sum of all felicity. Therefore, now, I exhort you not—for if the woes which you would shun, the prizes which you shall obtain, exhort you not, all words of man, all portents of the Gods, are dumb, and voiceless, and in vain! Mark the day only, and remember that if not ye, at least your sires, were Romans and were men!"

"Bravely, my Sergius, hast thou spoken, and well done!" cried at once several voices of his more prominent partizans.

"By the Gods! what a leader!" cried Sergius Cassius to his neighbor.

"Fabius in council," cried Sergius, "and Marcellus in the field!"

"Moreover, friends and fellow-soldiers," exclaimed Lentulus, "hear this; although he joins not with us now, through policy, Antonius, the Consul, is in heart ours, and waits but for the first success to declare himself for the cause in arms. Crassus the rich, Cæsar the people's idol, have heard our councils and approve them. The first blow struck, their influence, their names, their riches, and their popularity strike with us, trustier friends, by Castor! and more potent than fifty thousand swordsmen!" A louder and more general burst of acclamation and applause than that which had succeeded Cataline's oration, burst from the lips of all, as those great names dropped from the tongue of Lentulus; and one voice cried aloud—it was the voice of Curius—intoxicated, as it were, with present triumph—

"By all the Gods! Rome is our own—our own! even now, to portion out among our friends, our mistresses, our slaves!"

"Not Rome, but Rome's inheritance, the world!" exclaimed another. "If we win, all the universe is ours—and see how small the stake, when, if we fail"—

"By Hades! we'll not fail," Cataline interrupted him, in his deep penetrating tones, "we cannot, and we will not. And now, for I am somewhat weary, we will break up this conclave. We meet at the comitia."

This said, they left the house, and ere the skies had yet begun to glimmer with the first morning twilight—so darkly did the clouds still muster over the mighty city—went on their different ways toward their several houses, unseen, and as they fondly fancied unsuspected.

O Cæca mens mortalium! Oh! blindness of the mortal soul. But a few days had passed, before the oath of Cataline, so awfully attested, recoiled on his own head; before the vultures and the wolves of the wild Appenines, tore his own quivering eyes, lapped his own heart's blood!

The guardian gods of Rome had not as yet waxed weary of protecting her—and Cicero their minister wrought worthily of their old inspiration.

Cethegus, Lentulus, Statilius, Gabemus and Ceparius died slavelike by the hangman's noose in the dark subterranean prison of the Tullianum—while Cataline himself, after that deadly battle in which no one of the conspirators was taken living, was found, afar from his own men, surrounded only by the carcases of slaughtered foes, breathing a little yet, and still retaining in his countenance the marks of that ferocity which had distinguished him, while yet alive.

So dreadfully was that oath sworn—so dreadfully avenged upon the swearers!

MARY, I LOVE THEE.

Mary! I love thee—and thou ask'st me why
I love th' unloving? 'Tis the unceasing smile
That spreads its dimples o'er thy face—the eye
That beams upon me, as thy words beguile
My soul of all its sadder thoughts, and while
The unnoted hours, till I am e'en as one
Who on the shore of some forsaken isle,
Amid the ocean billows stands alone,
Where all the world's wild tumults are unheard, unknown.

Mary! I love thee, and must love thee still,
Forbidden, unrequited. Shouldst thou blame
My too true love, or e'en with cold words chill
My warm heart's fondness, I must be the same—
Still must I startle when I hear thy name.
Thou say'st what once thou promised ne'er must be—
Thine is the fickleness, be thine the shame;
For though I have no other part in thee,
Mary, I will not share in thine inconstancy!

"THERE WAS SILENCE IN HEAVEN."

Can angel spirits need repose,
In the full sunlight of the sky?
And can the veil of slumber close
A cherub's bright and blazing eye?
Have seraphims a weary brow,
A fainting heart, and aching breast?
No, far too high their pulses flow,
To languish with inglorious rest.

How could they sleep amid the bliss,
The banquet of delight above?
Or bear for one short hour to miss
The vision of the Lord they love?
Oh! not the death-like calm of sleep
Could hush the everlasting song:
No fairy dream nor slumber deep,
Entranced the rapt and holy throng.

Yet not the lightest tone was heard,
From angel voice or angel hand,
And not one plumed pinion stirred
Among the bowed and blissful band.

For there was silence in the sky,
A joy no angel tongues could tell,
As from its mystic point on high
The peace of God in stillness fell.

Oh! what is silence here below?
The quiet of concealed despair,
The pause of pain, the dream of wo,—
It is the rest of rapture there.

And, to the way-worn pilgrim here,
More kindred seems that perfect peace
Than the full chaunts of joy to hear
Roll on, and never, never cease.

From earthly agonies set free,
Tired with the path too slowly trod,
May such a silence welcome me
Into the palace of my God!

PENCILLINGS BY THE WAY.

BY N. P. WILLIS.

There was a gay party on Saratoga lake some six or eight years since, fishing and airing their wit, under the auspices of a belle of some fame and authority. The boat had been pulled into water of five or six feet depth, on the eastern side, and the ladies sat at the ends of their rods, about forty yards from the shore, watching their floats, which lay on the surface of the glassy water like sleeping flies, but, as the old fisherman in the bow could have told them, laughing loud enough to fright even the eels from their appetites. After several hours' bobbing, without bite or nibble, the belle above mentioned discovered that her hook was caught at the bottom. She rose in the stern, to draw it up more easily, and, all the party leaning over at the same time, she lost her balance, and, in falling overboard, upset the boat. For the first minute it was a scene of some terror. The gentlemen were very near drowning the ladies, and the ladies the gentlemen; but the old fisherman, a tall fellow who knew the ground, and was just within his depth, quietly walked about, picking them up one by one, and giving them a hold of the inverted gunwale, and so pushed them safely to the shore, suspended round the boat, like herrings on a hoop. Nobody caught cold; other people had caught fish; they dined merrily, and the principal actor in the scene has since been known by the sobriquet of the diving belle.

There is an Indian superstition attached to this lake, which probably had its source in its remarkable loneliness and tranquility. The Mohawks believed that its stillness was sacred to the Great Spirit, and that, if a human voice uttered a sound upon its waters, the canoe of the offender would instantly sink. A story is told of an English woman, in the early days of the first settlers, who had occasion to cross this lake with a party of Indians, who, before embarking, warned her most impressively of the spell. It was a silent, breathless day, and the canoe shot over the smooth surface of the lake like a shadow. About a mile from the shore, near the centre of the lake, the woman, willing to convince the savages of the weakness of their superstition, uttered a loud cry. The countenances of the Indians fell instantly to the deepest gloom. After a moment's pause, however, they redoubled their exertions, and, in frowning silence, drove the light bark like an arrow over the waters. They reached the shore in safety, and drew up the canoe, and the woman rallied the chief on his credulity. "The Great Spirit is merciful," answered the scornful Mohawk; "He knows that a white woman cannot hold her tongue."

THE INDIAN WARRIOR'S GRAVE.

BY MISS SOPHIA WEBSTER.

They sleep in quiet!—thick around
On yonder hill their graves abound,
Save where the share hath broke the clay,
And swept the last faint trace away.
That told where, resting from his toil,
The red man lay beneath the soil,—
That soil which once his footstep trod,
As proud and free as we who claim
The right of empire o'er the sod,
'Neath which the buried dead remain.—

Perchance it may be right, that we Should take these forests and their waves;
But, oh! it cannot surely be
Ours—to invade their simple graves,—
'Tis all they claim, a little spot
Where they may moulder peacefully,
And turn to dust—and shall we not
Extend it to their slumbering clay?

* * * * *

In childish rambles, oft and oft,
My feet have wandered o'er the ground,
And pressed the verdure rich and soft,
That early spring-time spread around.
The hill where sleep the Indian dead,
Was a familiar place to me;
Across its brow the school-path led,
And there the sun-light falling free,
Called Flora's treasures from the ground,
Before a blossom decked the dell;
And nowhere could a spot be found,
That childhood loved to haunt so well.
But sacred was each tiny flower
That oped its petals where they lay;
Oh, death! a strange, mysterious power
Hast thou, in childhood's early day.
For many a legend wild and dread,
And fearful, each young memory knew,
Which clustering thick around the dead,
A superstitious reverence threw
O'er the old hill; and if by chance
The precincts we were lingering near,
When twilight fell, the hurried glance,
And trembling footsteps, told our fear.

* * * * * *

There was one little sheltered nook,
Where the wild grape and thorn tree grew,
So thickly shaded, that it took
Till noon to dry the pearly dew;
It bore a simple little tale,
Of Indian love, and white man's wrong;
The maid had drooped in yonder vale,
The lover for revenge had gone,
And came not back except to plant
The thorn tree where the young girl lay,
Then seek what his own home could grant
No longer—quiet, far away.
'Twas years, long years before, they said
That half a century had flown
Since the lone Indian's silent tread
From his long cherished home had gone.
But still tradition told that he
Whose hand that lonely grave had made,
And planted there the old thorn tree,
Would breathe his life out 'neath its shade,
And we believed it, we who deemed
Each tale of Indian goblin true,
Who thought that even the fire-fly gleamed
With a mysterious spectral hue,
If o'er the haunted ground it shed
Its fickle light at eventide;
While (though familiar) every tread
Ghost-like and silent seemed to glide.

'Twas summer, and a noisy troop
Had sought for berries on the hill;
But yet the busy little group
Had failed their baskets quite to fill,
When one suggested that he deemed
Around that grave they clustered thick;
We paused a moment, for it seemed
A sacrilege for us to pick
The berries there—then slowly drew
All huddling close around the spot,
Until a hasty glance we threw;
Shuddering, we scarcely knew at what.
But 'twas no idle phantom now,
For stiff and cold in death, there lay
An Indian, whose swarthy brow
Was resting lifeless on the clay.
Our fathers laid him there to rest;
The maid he loved so well, beside;
The same turf on his bosom pressed,
That pressed before upon his bride.

Years have sped by, and I have lost
The groundless fears that childhood gave;
But still an awe will steal across
Me, as I stand beside that grave,
And think how that old chief had come
Back where his dream of glory woke;
Back to his early birth-right home,
To die where his proud heart had broke.

CAN'ST THOU FORGET ME?

Can'st thou forget me? Will thy mem'ry never
Turn to the records of the blissful past?
And I who fain would claim remembrance ever,
Be from thine heart a passing pleasure cast

When amid scenes that dazzle with their brightness,
Thou art the queen to whom all homage pay,
O, may I hope that 'neath thy seeming lightness,
There is a thought for one that's far away?

Then will forget me! but my love endoring,
Shall live through all the varied scenes of life,
And cling to hope, though false be the alluring,
That makes my breast with blissful dreamings rife.

I cannot bring thee wealth and lofty station,
Such as thy gentle beauty well may claim,
Nought but my spirit's warmest adoration,
A loving heart, and an unsullied name.

Though thy bright smile another bosom gladden,
With the enchantment of its sunny ray,
Still, though the while my throbbing brain shall madden,
My tongue for blessings on thy head shall pray.

Lines to a Friend.

WITH A FLOWER PLUCKED FROM NIAGARA'S BANKS, NEAR THE FALLS.

Accept this little flower,
Though humble it may seem,
It grew upon a lofty height,
Beside Ni'gara's stream.

It caught its color from the flush
The rainbows o'er it shed;
Eternal splendor circled round
Its timid, modest head.

And there it stood, on that proud place,
And grew all meekly fair,
As if the rush, the leap, the din,
The tumult were not there.

It smiled as though it fain would soothe
The ravings of the deep,
After the mighty torrent takes
Her wild, stupendous leap.

But all in vain upon the storm
Its gentle arts were tried,
For wheeling, flashing, dashing down,
On goes the roaring tide.

And I have plucked it from its stem,
An offering for thee,
To keep among thy cherished things,
In memory of me.

Let us be like this little flower,
Amid the din of life;
Striving to keep our bosoms pure,
Through tumult and through strife.

Then on the rainbow wings of faith
We'll reach that upper world,
Where 'round our shrinking trembling forms,
No cataract shall be hurled.

On Viewing a Picture of Childhood.

Play on in childhood's sunny hour,
Ere darkening clouds arise;
Ere yet the beauty of the flower
Is lost 'neath threatening skies.

For when those darker hours shall come,—
How oft the thought will stray
Far from the scenes ye listless roam,
To youth's unclouded day,

When wild with glee and winsome mirth,
The fields ye gambolled o'er;
Plucking the buds still in their birth,
To deck some youthful bow'r.

Laugh on! while all is bright around,—
Ere some declining ray
Shall throw its shade on new made mound,
The sunset of thy day.

CANZON.—BY CAMOENS.

Oh, weep not thus—we both shall know,
Ere long, a happier doom;
There is a place of rest below,
Where thou and I shall surely go,
And sweetly sleep, releas'd from woe,
Within the tomb.

My cradle was the couch of care,
And sorrow rock'd me in it;
Fate seem'd her saddest robe to wear
On the first day that saw me there,
And darkly shadow'd with despair
My earliest minute.

E'en then the griefs I now possess,
As natal boons were given;
And the fair form of Happiness,
Which hover'd round, intent to bless,
Scar'd by the phantoms of distress,
Flew back to Heaven!

For I was made in Joy's despite,
And meant for Misery's slave;
And all my hours of brief delight
Fled, like the speedy winds of night,
Which soon shall wheel their sullen flight
Across my grave!

ANECDOTES OF NAPOLEON.

From Evenings with Cambaceres.

Count d'Orsenne one day accompanied the Emperor on a reconnoitering excursion. The Emperor had been complaining of thirst, and some one seeing a vivandiere, or sutler woman at a little distance, called to her. The woman did not know Napoleon, or any of his escort. She gave the Emperor a glass of spring water mixed with a little brandy, and then curtsied for payment.

"There, my dear woman," pointing to Count d'Orsenne, "there is the Emperor, ask him for the money. He pays for us all."

The vivandiere blushed, and looked embarrassed; then, turning to the Count, she scanned his splendid uniform with the eye of a connoisseur, and said:

"He! pooh, nonsense! Do you think I am fool enough to believe that? The Emperor is not such a coxcomb. You sir, look much more like him yourself.

The Emperor was much amused at this remark, and he gave the woman a double louis.

Count Daru, who was one of the party on the evening when Prince Cambaceres related the above anecdote, said:

"Your amusing story, Monseigneur, reminds me of another also relating to one of those camp-following nymphs, called vivandieres. You know how carefully the Emperor preserved his incognito when he was with the army. It was well he did so; for he frequently ventured into places where, had he been known, he would have incurred the greatest risks. During one of the campaigns in Germany, the Emperor, wrapped in his celebrated gray great coat, was riding about in the environs of Munich, attended only by two orderly officers. He met on the road a very pretty looking female, who, by her dress, was evidently a vivandiere. She was weeping, and was leading by the hand a little boy, about five years of age. Struck by the beauty of the woman and her distress, the Emperor pulled up his horse by the road side, and said:

"What is the matter with you, my dear."

The woman, not knowing the individual by whom she was addressed, and being much discomposed by grief, made no reply. The little boy, however was more communicative, and he frankly answered:

"'My mother is crying, sir, because my father has beat her.'

"'Where is your father?'

"'Close by here. He is one of the sentinels on duty with the baggage.'

The Emperor again addressed himself to the woman, and inquired the name of her husband; but she refused to tell, being fearful lest the Captain, as she supposed the Emperor to be, would cause her husband to be punished. Napoleon, I am sorry to say, had but little confidence in the fair sex. On this occasion, his habitual suspicion occurred to his mind, and he said:

"'Malpeste, your husband has been beating you; you are weeping, and yet you are so afraid of getting him into trouble that you will, not even tell me his name. This is very inconsistent! May it not be that you are a little in fault yourself?'

"'Alas, Captain! he has a thousand good qualities, though he has one very bad one—he is jealous—terribly jealous; and when he gets into a passion, he cannot restrain his violence.'

"'But that is rather serious; in one of his fits of jealousy he might inflict on you some severe injury—perhaps kill you.'

"'And even if he did, I should not wish any harm to come to him; for I am sure he would not do it wilfully. He loves me too well for that.'

"'And if I guess rightly, you love him.'

"'That is very natural, Captain; he is my lawful husband, and the father of my dear boy.'

So saying, she fondly kissed her child, who, by the way in which he returned her caresses, proved his affection for his mother. Napoleon was moved by this touching picture, in spite of the heart of iron, or marble, or of adamant, which has so often been allotted to him.

"'Well,' said he, again turning to the woman, 'whether you and your husband love each other or not, I do not choose that he should beat you—I am—I am one of the Emperor's aides-de-camp, and I will mention the affair to his Majesty—tell me your husband's name.

"'If you were the Emperor himself, I would not tell it you, for I know he would be punished.'

"'Silly woman! All I want is to teach him to behave well to you, and to treat you with the respect you deserve.'

"'That would make me very happy, captain; but though he ill treats me, I will not get him punished.

"The Emperor shrugged his shoulders, made some remarks on female obstinacy, and galloped off.

"When he was out of the woman's hearing, he said to the officers who accompanied him:

"'Well, gentlemen! what do you think of that affectionate creature! There are not many such women at the Tuileries. A wife like that is a treasure to her husband.'

"In the course of a few minutes, the baggage, of which the boy had spoken, came up. It was escorted by a company of the 52d. Napoleon despatched one of the officers who was riding with him, to desire the commander of the escort to come to him.

"'Have you a vivandiere in your company?'

"'Yes, Sire,' replied the captain.

"'Has she a child?'

"'Yes, little Gentil, whom we are all so fond of.'

"'Has not the woman been beaten by her husband?'

"'I was not aware of the circumstance till some time after the occurrence. I have reprimanded the man.'

"'Is he generally well conducted?'

"'He is the best behaved man in the company. He is very jealous of his wife, but without reason. The woman's conduct is irreproachable.'

"'Does he know me by sight?'

"'I cannot say, Sire; but as he has just arrived from Spain, I think it is probable he does not.'

"'Try and ascertain whether he has ever seen me, and if he has not, bring him hither. Say you wish to conduct him before the General of the division.'

"On inquiry, it appeared that Napoleon had never been seen by the grenadier, who was a very fine looking man, about five and twenty. When he was conducted to Napoleon, the latter said, in a familiar tone:

"'What is the reason, my lad, that you beat your wife? She is a young and pretty woman, and is a better wife than you are a husband. Such conduct is disgraceful in a French Grenadier.'

"'Bah, General! if women are to be believed, they are never in the wrong. I have forbidden my wife to talk to any man whatever; and yet, in spite of my commands, I find her constantly gossiping with one or other of my comrades.'

"'Now, there is your mistake. You want to prevent a woman from talking—you might as well try to turn the course of the Danube. Take my advice; be not jealous. Let your wife gossip and be merry. If she were doing wrong, it is likely she would be sad instead of gay. Your comrades are not absolutely capuchins; but I am much mistaken if they will not respect another man's wife. I desire that you do not strike your wife again; and if my order be not obeyed, the Emperor shall hear of it. Suppose his Majesty were to give you a reprimand, what would you say then?'

"'Ma foi! General, my wife is mine, and I may beat her if I choose. I should say to the Emperor: Sire, look you to the enemy, and leave me to manage my wife.'

"Napoleon laughed, and said: 'My good fellow, you are now speaking to the Emperor.'

"The word produced its usual magical effect. The grenadier looked confused, held down his head, lowered his voice, and said:

"Oh, Sire! that quite alters the case. Since your Majesty commands, I of course obey.'

"'That's right. I hear an excellent character of your wife. Every body speaks well of her. She braved my displeasure rather than expose you to punishment. Reward her by kind treatment. I promote you to the rank of sergeant, and when you arrive at Munich, apply to the Grand Marechal du Palais, and he will present you with four hundred francs. With that you may buy a sutler's caravan, which will enable your wife to carry on a profitable business. Your son is a fine boy, and, at some future time, he shall be provided for. But, mind, never let me hear of you beating your wife again. If you do, you shall find that I can deal hard blows as well as you.'

"'Ah, Sire! I can never be sufficiently grateful for your kindness.'

"Two or three years after this circumstance, the Emperor was with the army in another campaign. Napoleon, you know, had a wonderful power of recollecting the countenance of persons whom he had once seen. On one of his marches, he met and recognized the vivandiere and her son. He immediately rode up to her, saying:

"'Well, my good woman, how do you do? Has your husband kept the promise he made to me?'

"The poor woman burst into tears, and threw herself at the Emperor's feet.

"'Oh, Sire! Oh, Sire! Since my good star led me into the gracious presence of your Majesty, I have been the happiest of women.'

"'Then reward me by being the most virtuous of wives.'

"A few pieces of gold were presented with these words; and, as Napoleon rode off, the cries of 'Vive l' Empereur,' uttered amidst tears and sobs by the mother and her son, were enthusiastically repeated by the whole battalion."

THE BLUE KNIGHT.

A Concentrated Romance.—By Alfred Crowquill.

Chap. I.—An Arrival.

On the summit of the loftiest tower of the castle of Altenberg gaily flaunted in the evening breeze the flag of the redoubtable and right valiant Baron Ulric. His only daughter, the incomparably beautiful Elvina, was the sole object of his love and fear; her filial tenderness was the cause of the first, her wit and beauty of the latter; for, as the fairest flowers attract the bees and the dazzling flame the moth, so did he dread lest some adventurous and unworthy knight might be attracted by the charms, and win the affections of his child. The baroness of his early love had long since yielded to the arms of death, and the barrenness of his domains was left for his enjoyment. Secluded from the world, the Baron trusted that his daughter would remain unscathed by the random arrows of love, until he could select some stalwart knight of wealth and valor on whom he should be proud to bestow her hand.

Compelled to take the field to repel the invasion of an enemy of one of the distant allies, he left the castle of Altenberg in the care and custody of his warder, and two or three vassals.

The moon had just risen, and the inmates of the castle retired for the night, when a knight, attended by his faithful esquire, approached the borders of the castle moat.

"Seest thou that moat?" inquired the knight.

"Ay, truly your worship," replied the esquire, "for does not the wise one say that we sooner see the mote in our neighbor's eye than the beam in our own?"

"We must crave a lodging there, Grummel," continued the knight; "blow me yonder horn."

"With what breath I have," said Grummel; "for I am blown myself, as well as the steeds, with our long journey."

The horn was sounded, and the warder appeared at the wicket.

"In the name of St. Grimbald, cried Grummel, "give shelter to the valiant knight, Sir Wilhelm of Dusseldorf and his trusty esquire."

"The Baron Altenberg is abroad," said the warder, in an excusatory tone.

"And so are we," replied Grummel; "for we have lost our way."

"Tarry awhile," answered the warder, after a moment's consideration, and closing the wicket, departed.

"A discourteous knave," grumbled Grummel, "keeping us here like a couple of dogs."

"How, sirrah?"

"Why, did he not bid us tarry here; and therefore are we in better condition than a couple of tarriers?"

"We cannot bite, therefore bark not," answered the knight.

The warder again made his appearance; the drawbridge was lowered, and the knight and his esquire crossed the moat.

"The Lady Elvina welcomes the stranger knight to her father's castle," said the warder, obligingly.

"I kiss her hands," replied the knight, "and thank her for her courtesy."

Anon they were ushered into a spacious hall; and while they unarmed, the board was spread with substantial fare for their refection.

"I am anxious to pay my respects to the lady," said the knight.

"And I to the fare," said Grummel, vigorously attacking a boar's head.

"She is not visible, Sir Knight," said the warder.

"Then it's impossible we can see her," said Grummel, falling to. "She is doubtless a morning star, your Worship."

"What then?"

"Why, then, your Worship, the Knight cannot expect her presence."

Chap. II.—An Engagement both in Love and War.

At an early hour the following morning, Grummel having dressed his master in a superb blue velvet doublet and suit, proceeded to the kitchen to dress his breakfast. Sir Wilhelm, meanwhile descended to the castle garden, where he encountered the blushing Elvina.

At the due acknowledgement of her hospitality, the Knight, who was, of course, deeply enamoured at the first glance by her transcendent charms, began to make a little love on his own account. The innocent Elvina listened with pleasure to the silver music of his sweet discourse and courtly compliments, for he had been to court, and now had come to court again. And in a few minutes, after the fashion of those romantic times, she surrendered the fortress of her affections.—She did not indeed "tell her love," but referred him to her father with such an expressive blush, as gave him confidence. At this pleasant juncture, the older warder rushed breathless into the garden, and interrupted their placid felicity, by hurriedly informing them that a petty Baron, with whom his lord was at feud, had just appeared before the castle with a force one hundred and fifty strong, and demanded their immediate surrender, threatening to put the whole garrison to the sword if they resisted.

"Oh! Sir Knight," exclaimed he, "repay our hospitality by thy succor and counsel in this extremity. What's to be done?"

"Arm instantly, and let us defend the castle to the death," replied the brave Sir Wilhelm. "Lady, retire to thy chamber; put up thy prayer for our success, and Heaven and St. Grimbald help us."

Hastily quiting Elvina, he retired to arm.—Grummel was still in the kitchen, preparing his morning repast.

"Away with these rashers!" exclaimed the esquire, on hearing the news, "there is a less savory broil preparing for us by the enemy. We are in a pickle, 'tis true; but small as we are, as the capsicums said to the cauliflower, they shall find us hot withal, and not at all to their palate."

"If they ford the moat, and scale the walls, we are lost," exclaimed one of the three vassals.

"Tut, man," exclaimed Grummel, who was an old soldier, and knew all the resources of war, "fill the kettles presently with pitch, and hand me the ladles, and long ere they reach the parapet, I'll pitch 'em over."

"There's the horn again," cried the warder, "summoning us to surrender."

"What o' that!" said Grummel, encouragingly; "we're not veal to be spoiled by their blowing. Pluck up thy courage, my boys, and lend me a bow,—and if I do not put a cloth-yard shaft in the varlet, and pin him like a cockchafer to the gate, I'm a ninny!"

While he kept talking in this strain, he armed himself and his master.

The 'garrison' was soon in battle array.—Grummel now proceeded to his post with two of the vassals, and proved his skill and strength by executing his vaunt, for at the identical moment the herald was about to blow another blast, he shot an arrow through his heart, and transfixed him to the spot.

"If all the rest run," replied he, coolly, "there is no chance of that fellow quitting his post!—Nailed, by St. Grimbald! There is no succor for him poor fellow! May all the rest of the wounded find leeches in the moat."

This exploit was the signal of assault, and a shower of arrows fell upon the castle.

"Let the porcupine shoot his quills at the boar!" said Grummel; he is only throwing away his means of defence. Hand me that pebble," continued he, pointing to a stone of half a hundred weight. It was soon raised, and hurled by one of their warlike machines into the thickest of their foes. "That has made an impression," cried he; "it is quite a smasher; there's half a dozen at least stone dead; another little one," said he, "we shan't miss that, though it should miss them. Besides, it will be as well, as they have challenged us, to show them we have a second."

While Grummel was thus ably executing his part, the Blue Knight (for so was Sir Wilhelm called, from the favorite color of his armor and appurtenances,) directed his little force with equal skill, dexterity and advantage. The engagement now began to assume a more serious appearance; the enemy began to fill the moat, in order to proceed to the escalade. The little garrison was now concentrated. The boiling pitch and water were supplied by two of the vassals, and the beseiging party had no sooner succeeded in raising a scaling ladder, and began to mount, than they were saluted by a cataract like a discharge of scalding water.

"'Tis but a fair return," said Grummel, "as they keep us in suspense, that we should keep them in hot water! Down with it, my comrades, till they're done in their armor like lobsters in their shells! Another pebble! What, no more —then up with the flags from the court-yard, break their ladder—they're the only flags we'll lower to them."

These missiles were speedily provided, and did great execution; the ladder was dashed to fragments, and numbers of the assailants were precipitated headlong into the moat. The Blue Knight was unwearied in his exertions, and encouraged his little force by his daring example.

"Bravo!" exclaimed Grummel, "we have wetted the enemy's courage, and sharpened our own."

The discomfited leader now retreated, and rallied together his 'remnant.'

'By George!' exclaimed the Squire, 'they are forming for a fresh assault.' We have so far lost nothing; and yet in the language of the lawyers, they may be said to have gained the 'action,' for they have already got considerable 'damages.'

'And see yonder,' cried the warder, extending his right arm, 'there comes my liege lord. I recognize his banner. What a happy diversion!'

'Very diverting, indeed!' replied Grummel; 'mark how the scamps are making ready to scamper. The bowmen are all like cross-bows, prepard for a bolt.'

The Baron Ulric von Altenberg now galloped to the scene of action with all his band. The besiegers were in an instant scattered over the plain, like a flight of affrighted sparrows in a corn-field, when some adventurous Cockney boldly takes the field to—waste his powder.

'Wheugh!' whistled the Squire, 'that fellow hath truly brought his pigs to a fine market. While the Baron is pickling the lot, let us de-cend and clear away the fitter he has left.'

The warder lowered the drawbridge, and the Blue Knight sallied forth with the 'garrison' to pick up the wounded which they had so dexterously picked off. The moat was so full that Grummel declared it was more like a folk-moat than anything else. When they had got in the 'living,' which the 'Squire declared was no 'sinecure,' the gentle Elvina, as was the wont of those days, humanely busied herself in dressing their wounds.

They then proceeded to draw the moat, and fished up many a pike!

The trumpets of the victorious Baron now sounded merrily, and they all rushed out to greet him. Ulric and the Blue Knight embraced with true chivalric ardor, and when the Baron learned from the blushing Elvina the extent of his obligation to Sir Wilhelm, the expressions of his gratitude were unbounded.

CHAP. III.—A REMARK.

'Fool that I was to leave my castle alone,' said the Baron.

'And wise would the enemy have been if they had done so, said Grummel.'

CHAP. IV.—A CLOUDY PROSPECT.

"I'm bound to serve you," said the Missal to the Monk as he clasped it—and so said the Baron Altenberg when he encountered the Blue Knight on the morning following the affray. Grummel, like an independent man, was serving himself; for chine, chickens, flowing flaggons graced the Baronial board in the most tempting profusion.

"Left wing forward!" exclaimed the 'Squire, dismembering a pullet; "right wing advance! chine support right wing! Fall in!" and at the word of command he commenced a vigorous assault. He then proceeded to demolish the "breast work," as he termed it, and finally completed his gastronomico-military evolutions, by ordering the "left leg first," when the "right" followed as matter of course!

Meanwhile the Blue Knight was doing the agreeable to the old Baron, and insidiously insinuating that he was a single man; and plainly demonstrated that he was an eligible match for any young lady who (in the advertising phrase) "Wanted a partner who could command," &c. &c. The Baron was confused, and not knowing exactly what to reply, he endeavored to divert the attack by simply looking under the table, and ingeniously calling "Puss, puss!"

"What does he mean!" said the Blue Knight, looking bluer.

"He smells a rat, to be sure," whispered the acute Grummel.

CHAP. V.—COUNSEL.

When they retired, Grummel addressed his master in these words:

"I can tell which way the wind blows, your worship, as well as a weathercock. "It's my mind the Baron wishes to deprive us of Lady Elvina."

"Us!" repeated Wilhelm.

"To be sure, when she's your wife will she not be my mistress?" replied Grummel. "Now I'm resolved on the match, for thereby you'll get a better half, and I better quarters. Two things no less agreeable than essential to our happiness."

"What's to be done?"

"Why, the whole garrison are in favor of the alliance; therefore, pop the question—demand her hand—and if the old boy holds out ——"

"What then?"

"Why, then, fillarly kick him out! and take possession of the castle we have fairly won by force of arms."

"You forget he is Elvina's sire."

"Will she not get a more agreeable sigher—in the shape of a lover? But, lo! here comes the comely dame herself—I'll vanish."

And the sagacious Squire walked off, leaving the lovers to their own sweet discourse.

CHAP. VI.—A SUDDEN DECISION.

Although the Blue Knight and Elvina were elegantly slender in their personal proportions, the Baron declared in abrupt and vulgar phrase that they were too thick.

"Honored father," said Elvina, "it is impossible to conceal from your parental eyes that I entertain an affection for Sir Wilhelm—and I know that he returns it."

"So much the better!" replied the Baron, "for it would be dishonorable in him to keep your affections, when he knows he cannot keep you."

"You mistake me, father," continued Elvina. "He has declared himself my suitor, and I have sworn ——"

"Sworn!" exclaimed the Baron. "A young lady of your rank has no right to swear. It is indelicate."

"But he swore first."

"Then, i' faith, you two sworn shall be foresworn," said the Baron. "Remember you are my daughter, and I am positive ——"

"And I'm positive I'm your daughter," replied Elvina, "from the same feeling; for I have formed an unalterable resolution to become his!"

The Baron looked at the gentle damsel for a moment, as in surprise, and then burst into an immoderate fit of laughter."

"Give me a buss," cried he affectionately; "you are my child—a chip of the old block!"

The affair was of course decided—the old Baron admired his daughter's firmness—the Blue Knight loved her for her tenderness, and the gordian knot of matrimony was soon after tied in the chapel of the castle of Altenberg. Beauty presented her hand to Valor as the palm of victory; and Grummel had the felicity of being at the marriage feast celebrated in honor of the nuptials of Elvina and the Blue Knight.

THE GRAND DAUGHTER AND THE GRANDMOTHER.

A Contrast.—We made a morning call on a lady of old acquaintance, at ——— Place, a few days since. She was laboring under an attack of the fidgets, a new and fashionable disease, which presses hard on the constitution. "I am vexed and worried and fretted at my servants," said she, "the universal complaint I know, but what am I to do; where am I to go, and how am I to better myself?" "Is it any particular grievance of which you complain?" "No, the old thing: idleness and extravagance of which you complain?" "No, the old thing: idleness and extravagance—I have a cook, a waiter, a coachman, footman, two chambermaids, a nurse, and a girl to run of errands." "Bless me, what an army for a small family, and in these hard times; why their pay and rations alone would almost support two families genteely." "O, I dare say, but we must live like the rest of the world." "And the rest of the world, my dear madam, live very foolishly, and sacrifice to appearances the solid comfort which would result from a better disciplined life. What is in that long-necked, cut glass, green bottle, in a net worked frame!" "O, nothing but Bay Rum, I have such nervous headaches—would you believe it, I have been compelled to swallow two of Abernethey's pills every day before dinner this week, and a spoonful of magnesia every night. I have such a sinking—am without appetite, and so worried with the servants." "Will you let me prescribe for you." "O certainly, though I don't think that in a multitude of doctors, like counsellors, there is wisdom." "Do you ever rub furniture!" "What," said the lady, opening two fine eyes as wide nearly as comets, "rub furniture—what put that in your head! no, certainly. Do I not pay servants enough to do that work!" "Well, then, I can tell you, your grandmother used to do it—a fine, hale, hearty old woman, who lived to nearly 90 years of age. She resided in Broad street, in a two story old fashioned house with a peaked roof, built of Amsterdam brick, for which she paid £25 a year York currency. Many a time I have seen her rocking the cradle with your mother in it, while she was peeling turnips for the soup, and a little girl, the only servant she kept, was fixing the boys to go to the Garden street school—you could have passed a cambric handkerchief over her mahogany, chest upon chest, and her walnut table without soiling it; and then her nicely sanded floor was worked into flowers and running vines; bless me, how frightened she would have been to have walked over your splendid Persian carpets." The lady rose and touched the bell; the waiter entered: "go up to the nursery and tell Mary to get the children ready for a walk—go back to the stable and tell Richard I will ride this morning—ask Sarah if there are any canvas backs or trouts come from market." The girl retired. "You have a convenient memory, my dear sir, but you do not seem to recollect that we live in a different age—in more prosperous times—when wealth and fashion must have sway. My grandma was a very good sort of a woman, I dare say, but she knew nothing of life." "Didn't she! She knew so much about it practically, that she enjoyed it until she had nearly reached a century, and I do not believe she ever swallowed a pill to procure an appetite. How late do you rise in the morning!" "Why my husband will get up a little after seven; the cook prepares his breakfast, as he must, you know, be down to his store by eight o'clock; and I am seldom in bed after nine." "Do you keep a rooster!"—"Why do you suppose I keep a farm yard!—no!"—"well get one—a shrill chanticleer, and when you hear his clarion at day-break, ring up the servants—first reducing their number to the peace establishment—jump out of bed, and instead of allowing your husband to breakfast alone, pour out his coffee for him—bustle about briskly—if the weather is fine throw on your cloak and bonnet, and run round two or three blocks to taste the fresh air—live in a smaller compact house than one at $1,800 per annum—have less servants and better ones—it does not follow because you are rich you should be wasteful—enjoy life rationally—taste of every pleasure discreetly—take exercise—brace your limbs by moderate labor—acquire a rosy, florid hue, instead of pallid cheeks—get an appetite by industrious habits—do some charity now and then for pleasant feelings, and take my word you will have no fidgets, require no Bay Rum, nor wish to swallow doses of magnesia."—New York Evening Star.

THE CUNNING FISHERMAN.

The following eastern tale, written by L. G. Wilkins, Esq., is from Lady Blessington's Book of Beauty, a superb English Annual for 1837.

* * * * This fisherman had long followed his occupation and supported a large family by the sale of what he caught; he was clever and well versed in all cunning which is so common in the East, and to which necessity obliged him to have recourse. He had had the good fortune to catch a khreet, of a size rarely met with in that species; and thinking it a pity that so fine a fish should be cut into small portions for the market, to suit the conveniences of ordinary customers, he resolved on presenting it to his sovereign; and repaired with this proud specimen of his sport, to the royal palace. No sooner had he entered the door beneath the sitting room of the sultan, than he was summoned to appear before him and explain the object of his visit.

"Fortune," said the fisherman, "has given me this fine khreet, which appeared to me of such uncommon size and beauty, that I scrupled to send it to the market, and knowing that no one's table was so well suited to receive it as your majesty's, I have brought it here to lay it at your feet, and to beg you to accept it."

"Makbool, Makbool—the gift is welcome," said the sultan. "Here are an hundred gold mahboobs; take them and prosper."

The grateful and delighted fisherman kissed the ground before him, and retired; but scarcely had he left the room, when the sultana upbraided her husband for his extravagant generosity.

"How," said she, "could you think of giving the man a hundred mahboobs for a paltry fish! A hundred mahboobs! Would not one be much more than it is worth! Had you given him five, the present would have been a noble one, and he would have had cause to bless you, and to pray that your life may be long: but to throw away one hundred mahboobs in such a manner is absurb. I have no patience with you; men have no discretion. Do call him back, and take them from him. I desire that you do."

"How," said the sultan, "can I take away a gift! it would be unworthy of a monarch."

"Not at all: has not he who gives a right to reclaim his gift?"

"A right! yes, but how mean would it be!—Would it not be said that Sultan Mustapha was capricious, and did not know his own mind?"

"Well, then," said the sultana, "make some excuse, but take back the money you must"

"Yet what excuse can I make! what can I say!"

"Say! oh, ask him if the fish is a male or female; and if he answers a male, say I wanted a female; and if he tells you it is a female, say you wanted a male."

The fisherman was sent for and brought back.

"Tell me," said the sultan, "is that fish a male or a female."

"I beg your majesty's pardon, it would be a disgrace to my beard if I spoke an untruth; this kind of fish is both male and female."

The sultan could say no more; the fisherman saved his hundred mahboobs; and the plans of the angry sultana were defeated.—But seeing that the fisherman was aware of the snare that had been laid for him, and admiring the ingenious manner in which he had extricated himself, the sultan doubled the present and once more dismissed him with good wishes for his prosperity. The indignation of the sultana was excessive; all complaint, however, was vain, and she was silent. The fisherman walked slowly across the court, carrying the sack which contained the money on his shoulders; but hearing one of the gold coins fall upon the hard ground, he stopped to look for it; and after searching for it for some time, found it, and then proceeded on his way.

"Look," said the sultana, "observe the avarice of that wretch; one mahboob fell from his bag, and, not content with the hundred and ninety-nine that remained, he has had the meanness to stop to pick it up, and even to toil in searching for it. Could he not have left it for some of our servants, who might chance to pass that way, and find it? What a vile monster!—Do call him back, and take it all away from him. I would have him bastinadoed; he really deserves any punishment; the stick would be too lenient for such a sordid creature.—By your head! I—"

"Well, well, you shall be satisfied. I really do think this meanness deserves a severe punishment, and the money shall be taken from him."

The fisherman was sent for, and brought again into the royal presence.

"Why," said the sultan, "could you not leave that one mahboob which fell to the ground, and rest contented with the hundred and ninety-nine that remained? Could you not spare it for some one, who, accidently passing that way, might have found it, and blessed me for his good luck! Are you so covetous, and that too after all my liberality to you?"

"It was originally my intention," replied the fisherman, "to have done as you suggest. I was actually pursuing my way, resolved to leave the coin where it fell, when it occurred to me that your majesty's sacred head and revered name were inscribed upon it; and I thought if any one happened inadvertently to put his foot upon it, and trampled upon that blessed head and name, the fault would have been mine; and I should never have forgiven myself for my neglect in leaving it on the ground."

With this reply the sultan was delighted—and, inwardly commending his quickness, he presented him with another two hundred mahboobs. Then, convinced of his folly in permitting the imprudent interference of the queen, he issued a proclamation, that no man for the future should, on any account, listen to the advice of his wife: a proclamation which, if rumor be true, is said to have decreased his popularity with the wives rather more than it increased it with the husbands throughout his empire, and to have led to insurrection in public, and insubordination in private.

YIELD NOT TO DARK DESPAIR.

Hast thou one heart that loves thee,
In this dark world of care,
Whose gentle smile approves thee—
Yield not to deep despair.

One rose whose fragrance blossom,
Blooms but for thee alone;
One fond confiding bosom
Whose love is all thine own—

One gentle star to guide thee,
And bless thee on thy way,
That e'en when storms betide thee,
Still lends its gentle ray—

One crystal fountain, springing
Within life's dearest waste,
Whose waters still are bringing
Refreshment to thy taste—

One tuneful voice to cheer thee,
When sorrow hath distrest;
One breast when thou art weary,
Whereon thy head to rest—

Till that sweet rose is faded,
And cold that heart, so warm,
Till clouds thy star have shaded,
Heed not the passing storm:

Till the kind voice that blest thee,
All mute in death doth lie,
And the fount that oft refreshed thee,
To thee is ever dry:

Thou hast one tie to bind thee,
To this dark world of care,
Then let no sorrow blind thee—
Yield not to dark despair.

THE ASSAULT OF IVREE.

A PASSAGE IN THE CAMPAIGN OF ITALY.

During the campaign of 1800, the French army, destined to meet the power of Austria on the plains of Italy before it could render itself master of Turin and of Milan, penetrate even to the walls of Genoa, and declare the terms of peace on the battle-field of Marengo, had yet to surmount the vast Alpine barrier which extends from the St. Bernard to Nice and Montenotte, and to overcome a series of tremendous obstacles, presenting themselves one after another in seemingly endless succession, and tasking to the utmost, if not defying, the courage of the troops and the military genius and perseverance of the leaders. These obstacles were not merely the result of natural position; there were instances in which the resistance of the invaded was more obstinate and more terrible than that of mountains, precipices, or rivers. Protected by fortifications of little strength or difficulty, and but very inefficiently aided by a locality which yielded but few means or opportunities of vigorous defiance, but sustained by an indomitable courage, great resource of invention, and an enthusiastic love of country, infinitely more formidable even than their courage and their skill, the inhabitants of the small town and citadel of Ivree, with a garrison of four thousand Austrian soldiers and twenty-five pieces of cannon, maintained their post for three days against an army of forty thousand Frenchmen, commanded by the three youngest, but already most illustrious generals in Europe, Massena, Lannes, and Bernadotte.

Furious at seeing his march thus arrested before this insignificant little place, he who had taken Alexandria in a day, and Cairo in an hour, and impatient moreover to assume his positions for the investment of Milan, the commander-in-chief, on the twenty-fifth of May, 1800, ordered the division of General Lannes to march upon the village in all its force, and take it by assault. After three hours of sanguinary combat, of fierce attack, and the most heroic defence, a handful of defenders, driven from the citadel, retreating step by step, and hotly pursued by the victorious Frenchmen, threw themselves as a last resort, into the quarters of Adjutant General H., with the resolution there to maintain themselves to the last, and sell their lives as dearly as they might. In a moment the house occupied by this brave veteran was converted into a fortress—barricades were thrown up, loop holes for musketry cut in the walls, and every disposition made that time and means afforded for a last desperate resistance.

Lannes, who was the first to enter the assaulted village, detached an officer in command of two battalions, to drive the insurgents from their position. The officer equally distinguished among his fellow soldiers for his impetuous courage and his ferocity, soon forced his way, at the head of one of his battalions, into the disputed mansion, trampling as he went upon the bodies of the forty brave fellows by whom it had been defended. General H., the only survivor, after beholding the slaughter of his garrison, had armed himself with a hatchet, and with almost superhuman strength and desperation, opposed the entrance of the republicans, and when their leader presented himself, sword in hand, at the door of the room to which he had retreated, as his last stand of defence, the old general aimed at his head a furious blow, which would have closed his career at once, and for ever, had it not been skilfully parried by the sabre of the Frenchman. It was the last effort of the wounded and wearied veteran; he fell; and in another moment, the apartment was filled with republicans.

The Frenchman, who was never known to yield quarter to a vanquished enemy in the fifteen years of his military life, stepped forward to despatch the fallen general, when a young and lovely woman rushed from an adjoining room, threw herself at his feet, and kneeling there, pale, distracted, the tears streaming from her eyes, shrieking forth in a voice of terror and despair—"Spare him—oh, spare him—do not take his life—he is my husband—the father of my child."

The Frenchman glanced for a moment at the suppliant, with an eye in which there was no trace either of anger or of pity—and then, deliberately pushing her aside, he made a step in advance, took a cool and steady aim with his pistol at the wounded officer, and shot him through the heart.

The wife of the murdered man uttered a fearful scream, and starting to her feet and flying to the room whence she had come, returned in a moment with her boy, who, at the sight of his father's massacre, had hidden himself, pale and trembling, under the bed; she held him to the ferocious republican and exclaimed, "Monster! you have slain the father—complete your work, and destroy the son."

At this moment loud shouts were heard, and a French general, surrounded by a crowd of officers, appeared at the door of the apartment. The scene was dramatic—a perfect coup de theatre. The heart of the ferocious soldier failed him; paleness overspread his features, and his limbs shook; while Madam H., as if by a sudden impulse, flung herself at the feet of the general, with a single cry for "vengeance!"

The general raised her kindly and respectfully, demanding at the same moment an explanation of the scene before him. There was little need for words, the object upon which he gazed, bore to his mind the accusation of his subordinate; that disfigured corpse—that female upon whose lineaments were stamped horror and despair—that feeble child, with his pallid cheeks, and his eyes streaming tears, calling upon his father, who answered not. The general perceived at once that there was no fact to be ascertained, no excuse to be admitted. His eyes flashed fire, and striking his glove forcibly upon the palm of his left hand, he turned abruptly, and with a lowering brow, to the assassin who stood before him speechless and trembling, and exclaimed,

'Sir, you are a coward and a savage! what! murder in cold blood, an unarmed man—defenceless—a veteran—before the eyes of his wife, imploring mercy! It is the act of a fiend!'

'But general,' muttered the criminal, with a hesitating voice—the voice of one who feels that he is lost—

'Be silent, sir,' interrupted the general, 'I listen to no excuse; I admit no defence. You are unworthy to serve the republic. Give me up your sword, your epaulets. From this moment you are dismissed from the brigade you have disgraced, from the army upon which you are a stain!'

The major raised his head with a proud, fierce look.

'General,' he said, but with a voice that betrayed his emotion, 'I surrender my sword; but I demand a trial by my comrades."

'You shall have it, sir, and within an hour.'

Then turning to the officers who had accompanied him to the spot, and reverentially bearing his body to the victim, he said to them,

'Unite with me, gentleman, in rendering the tribute of respect to unfortunate courage—to a brave and fallen enemy.'

The remainder of that dreadful day was passed by Madame H. in the bitterness of grief. After witnessing the interment of her husband with military honors, this unhappy woman, who had lost in a single moment, and under circumstances of such peculiar horror, all that made life dear to her, except her boy, sunk into a lethargy of sorrow—an abandonment to wretchedness. While she had a murdered husband to avenge, a helpless child to protect and save, she had preserved her energies of mind and body; but, now, when the assassin had undergone the shame of a public degradation, and the prompt and terrible justice of a military commission impended over his head, the hapless widow could think of nothing but her loss. For her there seemed to be no longer cause of hope or fear. She was therefore more astonished than alarmed, when, early the next morning, a French aid-de-camp waited upon her with a request from the commander-in-chief, that she would repair immediately to his quarters at the Hotel de Ville. Without a word of inquiry or remonstrance she rose, took her child into her arms, and followed the messenger of the general.

Led to the council chamber at the moment of her arrival, Madame H. found herself surrounded by all the glories of the republican army; by those celebrated men for whom such wondrous destinies were reserved; by whom crowns were to be won and lost, and of whom in after years, so many were to lose on battle-fields, amid the intrigues of cabinets, or the corruptions of a court, the honor for which they now were panting, or the lives they were now so ready to peril in its winning. They were Murat, Duroc, Lannes, Dessaix, Massena, Hoche, and Bernadotte; and in the midst of them the general, who, with his arms folded on his breast, and his eyes fixed upon the floor, walked slowly to and fro, as if in deep and painful meditation.

On the entrance of Madame H. he stopped abruptly—motioned her to be seated, and then, after gazing for a moment upon the face of her child with a gentle smile of interest and affection, resumed his walk. Madame H. began to feel alarm. This unexpected summons, this strange reception, the silence that prevailed around her, all combined, first to surprise and then to terrify her. A vague sensation of anxiety and fear oppressed her heart, and she could not command her nerves for the utterance of a single word that might call forth a solution of her doubts. All at once the roll of a druin, at a little distance, startled her from her painful reveries. It was quickly followed by a volley of musketry, and the general pausing in his walk, placed his hand upon her arm, and led her to a window, from which she beheld in the square below, the fearful spectacle of a military execution just accomplished.

'Look, madam,' he said in a calm, yet impressive tone, 'the man whom you see lying dead upon the ground, a French officer, whom his comrades in arms have condemned to death, for the assassination of an Austrian, in a city taken by assault.'

He paused for a moment; then glancing round upon the officer who stood near them, he continued:

'You are at liberty to quit Ivree this morning. General Desaix, whom I have requested to be your escort, will answer to the republic for your safety. Farewell, madame; report to the Prince Charles what you have seen of the justice maintained in the armies of the French.'

This General, at that time First Consul, was afterwards the Emperor Napoleon.

Blackbird, the Omaha Chief.

From Mr. Irving's new work, "Astoria."

The forms of Indian lodges are worthy of attention, each tribe having a different mode of shaping and arranging them, so that it is easy to tell on seeing them, a lodge or an encampment at a distance, to what tribe the inhabitants belong. The exterior of the Omaha have often a gay and fanciful appearance, being painted with undulating bands of red and yellow, or decorated with rude figures of horses, deer and buffaloes, and with human faces, painted like full moons four or five feet broad.

The Omahas were once one of the numerous and powerful tribes of the prairies, vying in warlike might and prowess with the Sioux, the Pawnees, the Sauks, the Konzas, and the Iatons. Their wars with the Sioux, however, had thinned their ranks, and the small pox in 1802, had swept off two-thirds of their number. At the time of Mr. Hunt's visit, they still boasted about two hundred warriors and hunters, but they are now fast melting away, and before long, will be numbered among these extinguished nations of the west that exist in tradition.

In their more prosperous days, the Omahas looked upon themselves as the most powerful and perfect of human beings, and considered all created things as made for their peculiar use and benefit. It is this tribe, of whose chief, the famous Wash-ing-gun-sha-ba, or Blackbird, such savage and romantic stories are told. He died about ten years previous to the arrival of Mr. Hunt's party, but his name was still mentioned with awe by his people. He was one of the first among the Indian chiefs on the Missouri, to deal with the white traders, and showed great sagacity in levying his royal dues. When a trader arrived in his village, he caused all his goods to be brought into his lodge and opened. From these he selected whatever suited his sovereign pleasure, blankets, tobacco, whiskey, powder, ball, beads and red paint, and laid the articles on one side, without deigning to give any compensation. Then calling to him his herald or crier, he would order him to mount on the top of the lodge and summon all the tribe to bring in their peltries, and trade with the white man. The lodge would soon be crowded with Indians bringing bear, beaver, otter and other skins. No one was allowed to dispute the prices fixed by the white trader upon his articles, who took care to indemnify himself five times over for the goods set apart by the chief. In this way the Blackbird enriched himself, and enriched the white men, and became exceedingly popular among the traders of the Missouri.

His people, however, were not equally satisfied by a regulation of trade which worked so manifestly against them, and began to show signs of discontent. Upon this a crafty and unprincipled trader revealed a secret to the Blackbird, by which he might acquire unbounded sway over his ignorant and superstitious subjects. He instructed him in the poisonous qualities of arsenic, and furnished him with an ample supply of that baneful drug. From this time the Blackbird seemed endowed with supernatural powers, to possess the gift of prophecy, and to hold the disposal of life and death within his hands. Wo to any one who questioned his authority, or dared to dispute his commands. The Blackbird prophesied his death within a certain time, and he had the secret means of verifying his prophesy. Within the fated period the offender was smitten with a strange and sudden disease, and perished from the face of the earth. Every one stood aghast at these multiplied examples of superhuman might, and dreaded to displease so omnipotent and vindictive being, and the Blackbird enjoyed a wide and undisputed sway.

It was not, however, by terror alone that he ruled his people; he was a warrior of the first order, and his exploits in arms were the theme of young and old. His career had begun by hardships, having been taken by the Sioux in early youth. Under his command, the Omahas obtained great character for military prowess, nor did he permit an insult or injury to one of his tribe to pass unrevenged. The Pawnee republicans had inflicted the gross indignity on a favorite and distinguished Omaha brave. The Blackbird assembled his warriors, led them against the Pawnee town, attacked it with irresistible fury, slaughtered a great number of its inhabitants, and burnt it to the ground. He waged fierce and bloody war against the Ottoes for many years, until peace was effected between them by the meditation of the whites. Fearless in battle, and fond of signalizing himself, he dazzled his followers by his daring acts. In attacking a Kanza village he rode singly around it, loading and discharging his rifle at the inhabitants as he galloped past them. He kept up in war the same idea of mysterious and supernatural power. At one time, when pursuing a war-party their tracks across the prairies, he repeatedly discharged his rifle into the prints made by the feet and by the hoofs of their horses, assuring his followers that he would thereby cripple the fugitives, so they would easily be overtaken. He in fact did overtake them, and destroyed them almost to a man; and his victory was considered as wonderful and miraculous, both by friend and foe. By these and similar exploits, he made himself the pride and boast of his people, and became popular among them, notwithstanding his death denouncing fiat.

With all his savage and terrific qualities, he was sensible of the power of female beauty, and capable of love. A war party of the Poncas had made a foray into the lands of the Omahas, and carried off a number of women and horses. The Blackbird was roused to fury and took the field with all his braves, swearing to 'eat up the Ponca nation'—the indian threat of exterminating war. The Poncas, sorely pressed, took refuge behind a rude bulwark of earth; but the Blackbird kept up so galling a fire that he seemed likely to execute his menace. In their extremity they send forth a herald bearing the calumet or pipe of peace, but he was shot down by order of the Blackbird. Another was sent forth in similar guise, but he shared a like fate. The Ponca chief then as a last hope, arrayed his beautiful daughter in her finest ornaments, and sent her forth with a calumet, to sue for peace. The charm of the Indian maid touched the stern heart of the Blackbird; he accepted the pipe at her hand, smoked it, and from that time a peace took place between the Poncas and the Omahas.

This beautiful damsel, in all probability, was the favorite wife whose fate makes so tragic an incident in the story of the Blackbird. Her youth and beauty had gained an absolute sway over his rugged heart, so that he distinguished her above all his other wives. The habitual gratification of his vindictive impulses, however, had taken away from him all mastery of his passions, and rendered him liable to the most furious transports of rage. In one of these his beautiful wife had the misfortune to offend him, when suddenly drawing his knife he laid her dead at his feet with one single blow.

In an instant his frenzy was at an end. He gazed for a time in mute bewilderment upon his victim; then drawing his buffalo robe over his head, he sat down beside the corpse, and remained brooding over his crime and his loss.—Three days elapsed, yet the chief continued silent and motionless; tasting no food, and apparently sleepless. It was apprehended that he intended to starve himself to death; his people approached him in trembling awe, and entreated him once more to uncover his face and be comforted; but he remained unmoved. At length one of his warriors brought in a small child, and laying it on the ground, placed the foot of the Blackbird upon its neck. The heart of the gloomy savage was touched by this appeal—he threw aside his robe—made an harangue upon what he had done, and from that time forward seemed to have thrown the load of grief and remorse from his mind.

He still retained his fatal and mysterious secret, and with it his terrific power—but though, able to deal death to his enemies, he could not avert it from himself or his friends. In 1802 the small pox, that dreadful pestilence, which swept over the land like a fire over the prairies, made its appearance in the village of the Omahas. The poor savages saw with dismay the ravages of a malady loathsome and agonizing in its details, and which set the skill and experience of their conjurers and medicine men at defiance. In a little while two-thirds of the population were swept from the face of the earth, and the doom of the rest seemed sealed. The stoicism of the warriors was at an end—they became wild and desperate—some set fire to the village as a last means of checking the pestilence—others, in a frenzy of despair, put their wives and children to death that they might be spared the agonies of an inevitable disease, and that they might all go to some better country.

When the general horror and dismay was at its height, the Blackbird himself was struck down with the malady. The poor savages, when they saw their chief in danger, forgot their own miseries, and surrounded his dying bed. His dominant spirit, and his love for the white men, were evinced in his latest breath, with which he designated his place of sepulchre. It was to be on a hill or promontory, upwards of four hundred feet in height, overlooking a great extent of the Missouri, from whence he had been accustomed to watch for the barks of the white men. The Missouri washed the base of the promontory, and after winding and doubling in many links and mazes in the plain below, returns to within nine hundred yards of its starting place, so that for thirty miles navigating with sail and oar, the voyager finds himself continually near to this singular promontory as if spell bound.

It was the dying command of the Blackbird that his tomb should be upon the summit of this hill, in which he should be interred, seated on his favorite horse, that he might overlook his ancient domain, and behold the barks of the white men as they came up the river to trade with his people.

His dying orders were faithfully observed.—His corpse was placed astride of his war steed and a mound raised over them on the summit of the hill. On the top of the mound was erected a staff, from which fluttered the banner of the chieftain, and the scalps that he had taken in battle. When the expedition under Mr. Hunter visited that part of the country, the staff still remained with the fragments of the banner: and the superstitious rite of placing food from time to time on the mound, for the use of the deceased, was still observed by the Omahas. That rite has since fallen into disuse, for the tribe itself is almost extinct. Yet the hill of the Blackbird continues an object of veneration to the wandering savage, and a landmark to the voyager of the Missouri —and as the civilized traveller comes within sight of its spell bound crest, the mound is pointed out to him from afar, which still encloses the grim skeletons of the Indian warrior and his horse.

The Spectre's Voyage.

There is a part of the River Wye, between the city of Hereford and the town of Ross, which was known for more than two centuries by the appellation of 'The Spectre's voyage,' and across which, as long as it retained that appellation, neither entreaty nor remuneration would induce any boatman to convey passengers after a certain hour of the night. The superstitious notions among the lower orders were, that about the hour of eight, on every evening, a female was seen in a small vessel, sailing from Hereford to Northbrigg, a little village then about three miles from the city, of which not even a vestige is now visible—that, the vessel sailed with the utmost rapidity, in a dead calm, and even against the wind—that to encounter it was fatal—that the voyager landed from it on the Eastern bank of the river, a little beyond the village—that she remained some time on shore, making the most fearful lamentations—that she then re-entered the vessel, and sailed back in the same manner, and that both boat and passenger vanished in a sudden manner, as they arrived at a certain part of the river where the current is remarkably strong, within about half a mile of the city of Hereford.

This singular tradition, like most other stories of a similar character, was not without a foundation in truth, as the reader will perceive, who is willing to peruse this narrative.

In the turbulent reign of Edward II., when the whole of England was one theatre of lawless violence—when might was constantly triumphant over right, and princes and soldiers only respected the very intelligible, if not very equitable principle—

'That they should have the power,
And they should keep it who can,'

the city of Hereford was distinguished by the zeal and patriotism of its citizens, and by the unshaken firmness with which they adhered to the cause of Queen Isabella, and the young prince her son, afterwards the renowned King Edward III., in opposition to the weak and ill-fated monarch who then wore the crown, and his detested favorites the Spensers, father and son. Sir Hugh Spenser the younger, was a man of unquestionable talents, and possessed of virtues which, during a time of less violence and personal animosity, might have proved honorable to himself, and useful to his country. The nobles, however, hated him for his obscure birth and his devotion to the service of his prince, however unworthy and imbecile of his high station, was nevertheless unstained by any crime. He was possessed of a kind and generous heart, and was especially endeared to Spenser. The discontent of the queen and the barons were not vented in fruitless complaints or idle menaces; they flew to arms. The king of France, the queen's brother, assisted them with men and money. The Count of Hainault, to whose daughter Phillippa the young prince had been contracted, did the same. The king was driven from London, and forced, with the elder Spenser, whom he had created Earl of Winchester, to take refuge in Bristol. Being hotly pursued to this city by the Earl of Kent and the Count of Hainault, at the head of a formidable army, he was obliged to flee into Wales, leaving the elder Spenser governor of the castle at Bristol. This fortress was immediately besieged, and speedily taken, as the garrison mutinied against their governor, and delivered him into the hands of his enemies. This venerable nobleman, who had nearly reached his ninetieth year, was instantly without trial, accusation, or defence, condemned to death by the rebellious barons. He was hanged on a gibbet, and his body, being cut in pieces, was given to the dogs. His head was sent to Winchester, the place whence he derived his title, and was there set on a pole, and exposed to the insults of the populace.

When the news of this catastrophe reached the young Spenser, he was at the head of a fine army, which had sat down before the city of Hereford, for the purpose of reducing it to obedience to King Edward. The formidable force which he commanded had struck terror into the hearts of his enemies, so that, notwithstanding their attachment to queen Isabella, and their detestation of Spenser, they had shown symptoms of their willingness to yield to the latter; and he, desirous of obtaining possession of the city without any unnecessary effusion of blood, had granted a truce of a week's duration, to give them time to decide upon what conditions they should open their gates to him. The disastrous intelligence which he received from Bristol, however, made him doubtful whether he should hold inviolate the truce which he had granted to the besieged. He did not doubt but that the Earl of Kent and his troops, flushed with conquest, would haste to his destruction, and the relief of Hereford, and that, unless he could possess himself of the city and castle, and by shutting himself up in the latter, be enabled to bid defiance to his enemies, the fate of his father must inevitably be his own.

The favorite recreation of the inhabitants of Hereford was then, as it is now, to make excursions, either alone or in parties, upon this beautiful river. This amusement had become so much a custom, that the most timid females were not afraid to venture alone in a small skiff, with which almost every family of respectability was provided. And on a bright moonlight night the bosom of the river was beautifully diversified by the white sails, glittering in the moonbeams, while sweet female voices would be heard warbling some popular melodies, the subjects of which were usually the praises of Prince Edward or the execrations of Spenser, and those who had corrupted the king. The river seemed like one sheet of silver, and numerous little vessels, passing and repassing, gave it a delightful appearance. In one, which seemed to be venturing nearer to the camp of the enemy than the others, might be seen a light and delicate female form; and on the shore which she was approaching, a little above the village of Northbrigg, stood a soldier, whose accoutrements bespoke him to belong to the army of Sir Hugh Spenser.

The lady landed, and the soldier hastened to meet her. 'Dearest Isabel,' said he, 'blessing upon thy generous, trusting head, for this sweet meeting. I have much to tell thee, but that my tongue dares not tell thee all with which my mind is stored; and, if it dared, it is not on such a night as this—so bright, so beautiful—that tidings dark as mine should be communicated.'

Isabel, who had lain her head upon his breast when they met, started from him, and gazed with the utmost terror at the unwonted gloom which darkened his countenance. 'Walter, what means this? Come you to break the trusting heart which beats for you alone? Come you to say that we must part for ever? O! better had you left me to the mercy of the waves, when its work of death was achieved, if you reserved me only for the misery which waits upon a broken heart, and blighted and betrayed affections!'

'Sweet, dry those tears,' replied the soldier; 'while I have life, I am thine. I come to warn thee of sure but unseen danger. The walls of Hereford are strong, and the arms and hearts of her citizens firm and trusty; but her hour is come. The path of the destroyer is secret, and like the stream which hides itself for a time beneath the earth, only to spring forth more strongly than ever.'

'Thy words are dark and dreadful,' said the maiden, 'but I do not know of any cause for fear, or any means of avoiding it if it exists.'

'Fly with me—fly with thy heart and hand. Reward my love, and think no more of those grim walls and sullen citizens, with souls as iron as their beavers, and hearts as cold as the waters of their river.'

'My father's head is gray,' continued she, 'and but for me alone, all his affections and all his hopes are buried in my mother's grave. He hates thee and thy cause. When I told him a stranger had rescued his daughter from the waves he raised his hands to heaven, and blessed him; but when I informed him that the stranger was a follower of the Spensers, he checked his unfinished benediction, and cursed him. But if he knew thee, Walter—thy noble heart, thy constant love—methinks that time and entreaty would make him listen to his daughter's prayer.'

'Alas! my Isabel,' said he, 'entreaty would be vain; and Time is already flapping his wings, loaded with inevitable ruin, over your devoted city and its inhabitants. Thy father shall be safe; trust that to me; and trust me, too, what I promise I can perform. But thou, my loved one, must not see the horrid face of war; and, though my power extends to save thy father from injury, it would be easier to save the wall flowers on the ramparts of the city from the foot of the invader, than one so fair and so feeble from violence and lust.'

'Whoe'er thou art,' she said, 'there is a spell upon my heart, which love and gratitude have twined, which makes it thine forever; but sooner would I lock my hand with the savage Spenser himself, when reeking with the best blood of Hereford's citizens, than leave my father's side when his gray hairs are in danger, and my native city when treachery is in her streets, and outrage is approaching her walls.'

These words were uttered with animation and vehemence so unusual to her, that Walter stood for a moment transfixed with wonder; and, before he recovered his self-possession, Isabel, with the velocity of lightning, had regained her skiff, and was sailing before the wind to Hereford. 'Curse on my amorous folly,' he exclaimed, 'that for a pair of pale cheeks and sparkling eyes, has perhaps ruined a better concerted plan than ever entered the brain of the Grecian Sinon. I must away, or the foolish girl will wake the slumbering citizens to their defence before the deed is done.' As he uttered these words, he rapidly ascended the rocks, and was soon lost among the wild woods which crowned their summit.

We shall not enter into any detailed account of that night. The citizens had, by some unknown means obtained intelligence of the designs of the enemy, and were prepared to repel the attack. The invaders were beaten back at every part. Their best troops were left dead upon the field, and above two hundred taken prisoners, among whom was Sir Hugh Spenser himself.

Sir Hugh both on account of his rank, and the peculiar degree of hatred with which each bosom beat against him, was reserved to be the last victim. On the day of his execution, the streets were lined with spectators. He wore the uniform of the royal army, and a star on his breast indicated his rank. His deportment was firm and contemptuous; and as he looked on the formal, and frequently grotesque features of his guards, his countenance even assumed an air of risibility. The sight of the gibbet, however, which was raised fifty feet high, seemed for a moment to appal him. 'Is this,' said he, as he scornfully dashed away a tear, 'ye rebellious dogs, is this the death to which you doom the heir of Winchester?' His emotion seemed increasing, but with a violent effort he suppressed every outward appearance of it.

By the time he reached the place of execution, his countenance had resumed its calm and scornful air, and he sprang upon the scaffold with apparently unconcerned alacrity. At the same moment a dreadful shriek issued from amongst the crowd, and in another instant a female, deadly pale, and with hair and dress disordered, had darted on to the scaffold, and clasped the prisoner in her arms.

'Walter,' she cried, 'Walter, can it be thou? O, thou bravest, thou the best of men! Stand off, ye blood-thirsty hounds! Ye cannot tear me from him. No! till my arms grow cold in death, I'll clasp him thus, and defy the world to sever us!'

'O, Isabel,' he said, 'it is too much: my soul can bear no more. I hoped thy eyes had been spared this sight; but the cold-hearted tyrants have decreed it thus. O, leave me—leave me! it is in vain! Unmannered ruffians, spare her!' While he spoke, the soldiers tore her forcibly from him, and were dragging her through the crowd. 'My father,' cried she, 'save him! He saved thy child. Walter, supplicate him; he is kind.' She turned her eyes to the scaffold as she uttered these words, and beheld the form of Spenser writhing in the air, and convulsed with the last mortal agony. A fearful shriek burst from her heart and she sank senseless into the arms of those who bore her.

Isabel survived this event more than a twelvemonth; she took scarcely any food, refused all intercourse with her friends, and even with her father. One thing only soothed her mind, or afforded her any gratification—and this, as she was an experienced navigator of the river, her friends indulged her in—to sail from the city of Hereford to that spot on which she used to meet her lover. This she did constantly, every evening; but, when she had waited a short time, her shrieks and cries were pitiable. This practice one evening proved fatal. Instead of steering to the usual landing-place, a little above the city, she entered a part of the river where the current is unusually strong; the rapidity of its waves mastered and overturned the frail bark in which she sailed, and the unfortunate Isabel sank to rise no more.

The tragic nature of these events made an impression on the popular mind, which two centuries did not efface. The spirit of Isabel was still said to sail every night from Hereford to Northbrigg, to meet her lover, and the track across the river, which this unearthly traveller pursued, was long distinguished by the name of the 'Spectre's Voyage.'

THE WIDOW'S ORDEAL.

Or a Judicial Trail by Combat.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

The world is daily growing older and wiser. Its institutions vary with its years, and mark its growing wisdom; and none more so, than its modes of investigating truth, and ascertaining guilt and innocence. In its nonage, when man was yet a fallible being and doubted the accuracy of his own intellect, appeals were made to heaven in dark and doubtful cases of serious accusation.

The accused was required to plunge his hand in boiling oil, or to walk across red hot ploughshares, or to maintain his innocence in armed fight and listed field, in person or by champion. If he passed these ordeals unscathed, he stood acquitted, and the result was regarded as a verdict from on high.

It is somewhat remarkable that in the gallant age of chivalry, the gentler sex should have been most frequently the subjects of these rude trials and perilous ordeals, and that too, when assailed in their most delicate and vulnerable part—their honor.

In the present very old and enlightened age of the world, when the human intellect is perfectly competent to the management of its own concerns, and needs no special interposition of heaven in its affairs, the trial by jury has superceded these superhuman ordeals, and the unanimity of twelve discordant minds is necessary to constitute a verdict. Such a unanimity would at first sight appear also to require a miracle from heaven, but it is produced by a simple device of human ingenuity. The twelve jurors are locked up in their box, there to fast until abstinence shall have so clarified their intellect, that the whole jarring pannel can discern the truth, and concur in giving in a unanimous decision. One point is certain, that truth is one, and is immutable—until the jurors all agree, they cannot all be right.

It is not our intention, however, to discuss this great judicial point, or to question the avowed superiority of the mode of investigating truth, adopted in this antiquated and very sagacious era. It is our object merely to exhibit to the curious reader, one of the most memorable cases of judicial combat we find in the annals of Spain.—It occurred in the bright commencement of the reign, and in the youthful and yet glorious days of Roderick the Goth, who subsequently tarnished his fame at home by his misdeeds, and finally lost his kingdom and his life on the banks of the Guadalete, in that disastrous battle, which gave up Spain a conquest to the Moors. The following is the story:—

There was, once upon a time a certain duke of Lorraine, who was acknowledged throughout his domain to be one of the wisest princes that ever lived. In fact, there was not any one measure that he adopted, that did not astonish all his privy counsellors and gentlemen in attendance; and he said so many witty things, and made such sensible speeches, that his high chamberlain had his jaws dislocated from laughing with delight at the one, and gasping with wonder at the other.

This very witty and exceedingly wise potentate lived for half a century in single blessedness when his courtiers began to think it a great pity so wise and wealthy a prince should not have a child after his own likeness, to inherit his talents and domains; so they urged him most respectfully to marry, for the good of his estate, and the welfare of his subjects.

He turned their advice over in his mind some four or five years, and then sending emissaries to all parts, he summoned to his court all the beautiful maidens in the land, who were ambitious of sharing a ducal crown. The court was soon crowded with beauties of all styles and complexions, from among whom he chose one in the earliest budding of her charms, and acknowledged by all the gentlemen to be unparalleled for grace and loveliness. The courtiers extolled the duke to the skies for making such a choice, and considered it another proof of his great wisdom.—'The Duke,' said they, 'is waxing a little too old; the damsel, on the other hand, is a little too young; if one is lacking in years, the other has a superabundance; thus a want on one side is balanced by an excess on the other, and the result is a well-assorted marriage.'

The duke, as is often the case with wise men who marry rather late, and take damsels rather youthful to their bosoms, became doatingly fond of his wife, and indulged her in all things. He was consequently, cried up by his subjects in general, and by the ladies in particular, as a pattern for husbands; and, in the end, from the wonderful docility with which he submitted to be reined and checked, acquired the amiable appellation of Duke Phillibert, the wife-ridden.

There was only one thing that disturbed the conjugal felicity of this paragon of husbands: though a considerable time elapsed after his marriage, he remained without any prospect of an heir. The good duke left no means untried to propitiate Heaven; he made vows and pilgrimages, he fasted and he prayed, but all to no purpose. The courtiers were all astonished at the circumstance. They could not account for it.—While the meanest peasant in the country had brats by dozens, without putting up a prayer, the duke wore himself to skin and bone with penances and fastings, yet seemed farther off from his object than ever.

At length, the worthy prince fell dangerously ill, and felt his end approaching. He looked with sorrowful eyes upon his young and tender spouse, who hung over him with tears and sobbings. 'Alas!' said he, 'tears are soon dried from youthful eyes, and sorrow lies lightly on youthful hearts. In a little while I shall be no more, and in the arms of another husband, thou wilt forget him who hast loved thee so tenderly.'

'Never! never!' cried the duchess. 'Never will I cleave to another! Alas! that my lord should think me capable of such inconsistency!'

The worthy and wife-ridden duke was soothed by her assurances; for he could not endure the thoughts of giving her up even after he should be dead. Still he wished to have some pledge of her enduring consistency.

'Far be it from me, my dearest wife,' said he, 'to control thee through a long life. A year and a day of strict fidelity will appease my troubled spirit. Promise to remain faithful to my memory a year and a day, and I will die in peace.'

The duchess made a solemn vow to that effect. The uxorious feelings of the duke were not yet satisfied. 'Safe bind, safe find,' thought he: so he made a will, in which he bequeathed to her all his domains, on condition of her remaining true to him one year and a day after his decease; but, should it appear that, within that time, she had in any wise lapsed her fidelity, the inheritance should go to his nephew, the lord of a neighboring territory.

Having made his will, the good duke died and was buried. Scarcely was he in his tomb, when his nephew came to take possession, thinking, as his uncle had died without issue, that the domains would be devised to him of course. He was in a furious passion, however, when the will was produced, and the young widow was declared inheritor of the dukedom. As he was a violent high minded man, and one of the sturdiest knights in the land, fears were entertained that he might attempt to seize on the territories by force. He had, however, two bachelor uncles for bosom counsellors. These were two swaggering rakehelly old cavaliers; who, having led loose and riotous lives, prided themselves upon knowing the world, and being deeply experienced in human nature. They took their nephew aside.—'Prithee, man,' said they, 'be of good cheer. The duchess is a young and buxom widow. She has just buried our brother, who, God rest his soul! was somewhat given to praying and fasting, kept his pretty wife tied to his girdle. She is now like a bird from a cage. Think you she will keep her vow? Impossible! Take our words for it—we know mankind, and above all womankind. She cannot hold out for such a length of time; it is not in womanhood—it is not in widowhood—we know it, that's enough. Keep a sharp look out upon the widow, therefore, and within the twelvemonth you will catch her tripping—and the dukedom is your own.'

The nephew was pleased with this counsel, and immediately placed spies about the duchess, and bribed several servants to keep a watch upon her, so that she could not take a single step, even from one apartment of her palace to another, without being observed. Never was a young and beautiful widow exposed to so terrible an ordeal.

The duchess was aware of the watch that kept upon her. Though confident of her own rectitude, she knew that it was not enough for a woman to be virtuous—she must be above the reach of slander. For the whole term of her probation, therefore, she proclaimed a strict nonintercourse with the other sex. She had females for cabinet ministers and chamberlains, through whom she transacted all her public and private concerns; and it is said, that never were the affairs of the dukedom so adroitly administered.

All males were rigorously excluded from the palace; she never went out of its precincts, and whenever she moved about its courts and gardens, she surrounded herself with a body guard of young maids of honor, commanded by dames renowned for discretion. She slept in a bed without curtains, placed in the centre of a room illuminated by innumerable wax tapers. Four ancient spinsters, virtuous as Virginia, perfect dragons of watchfulness, who only slept during the day time, kept vigils throughout the night seated in the four corners of the room on stools without backs or arms, and with seats cut in chequers of the hardest wood, to keep them from dozing.

Thus wisely and warily did the young duchess conduct herself for twelve long months, and Slander almost bit her tongue off in despair at finding no room even for a surmise. Never was ordeal more burdensome, or more enduringly sustained.

The year passed away. The last odd day arrived, and a long, long day it was. It was the twenty-first of June, the longest day in the year. It seemed as if it would never come to an end. A thousand times did the duchess and her ladies watch the sun from the windows of the palace, as he slowly climbed the vault of heaven, and seemed still more slowly to roll down. They could not help expressing their wonder, now and then, why the duke should have lagged this supernumerary day to the end of the year, as if three hundred and sixty-five days were not sufficient to try and task the fidelity of any woman. It is the last grain that turns the scale—the last drop that overflows the goblet—and the last moment of delay that exhausts the patience. By the time the sun sank below the horizon, the duchess was in a fidget that passed all bounds; and though several hours were yet to pass before the day regularly expired, she could not have remained those hours in durance to gain a royal crown, much less a ducal coronet. So she gave her orders, and her palfrey, magnificently caparisoned, was brought into the court yard of the castle, with palfreys for all her ladies in attendance. In this way she sallied forth just as the sun had gone down. It was a mission of piety—a pilgrim cavalcade to a convent at the foot of a neighboring mountain—to return thanks to the blessed Virgin for having sustained her through this fearful ordeal.

The orisons performed, the duchess and her ladies returned, ambling gently along the borders of a forest. It was about that mellow hour of twilight when night and day were mingled, and all objects indistinct. Suddenly some monstrous animal sprang from out a thicket with fearful howlings. The whole female body guard was thrown into confusion and fled different ways. It was some time before they recovered from their panic, and gathered together. The greatest anxiety was felt for her safety. The hazy twilight had prevented their distinguishing perfectly the animal which had affrighted them. Some thought it was a wolf, others a bear, others a wild man of the woods. For upwards of an hour did they beleaguer the forest, without daring to venture in, and were on the point of giving up the duchess as torn to pieces and devoured, when to their great joy, they beheld her advancing in the gloom, supported by a stately cavalier.

He was a stranger knight whom nobody knew. It was impossible to distinguish his countenance in the dark, but all the ladies agreed that he was of a noble presence and captivating address. He had rescued the duchess from the very fangs of the monster, which he assured the ladies was neither a wolf nor a bear, nor yet a wild man of the woods, but a veritable dragon, a species of monster peculiarly hostile to beautiful females in the days of chivalry, and which all the efforts of night errantry had not been able to extirpate.

The ladies crossed themselves when they heard of the danger from which they had escaped, and could not enough admire the gallantry of the cavalier. The duchess would fain have prevailed on her deliverer to accompany her to her court, but he had no time to spare, being a knight errant who had no time to spare, and many distressed damsels and afflicted widows to rescue and relieve in various parts of the country. Taking a respectful leave, therefore, he pursued his wayfaring, and the duchess and her train returned to the palace. Throughout the whole way, the ladies were unwearied in chanting the praises of the stranger knight; nay, many of them would willingly have incurred the danger of the dragon, to have incurred the happy deliverance of the duchess. As to the duchess, she rode pensively along, and said nothing.

No sooner was the adventure of the wood made public, than a whirlwind was raised about the ears of the beautiful duchess. The blustering nephew of the deceased duke went about armed to the teeth, with a swaggering uncle at each shoulder, ready to back him, and swore the duchess had forfeited her domain. It was in vain that she called all the saints, and angels, and her ladies in attendance into the bargain, to witness that she had passed a year and a day of immaculate fidelity. One fatal hour remained to be accounted for; and in the space of one little hour sins enough may be conjured up by evil tongues to blast the fame of a whole life of virtue.

The two graceless uncles, who had seen the world, were ever ready to bolster the matter through; and as they were brawney, broad shouldered warriors, and veterans in brawls as well as debauch, they had great sway with the multitude. If any one pretended to assert the innocence of the duchess, they interrupted him with a loud ha! ha! of derision. 'A pretty story truly,' would they cry, 'about a wolf and a dragon, and a young widow rescued in the dark by a sturdy varlet, who dares not show his face in the daylight. You may tell that to those who do not know human nature; for our parts, we know the sex, and that's enough.'

If however, the other repeated his assertion, they would suddenly knit their brows, swell, look big, and put their hands upon their swords. As few people like to fight in a cause that does not touch their own interests, the nephew and the uncles were suffered to have their way, and swagger uncontradicted.

The matter was at length referred to a tribunal composed of all the dignitaries of the dukedom, and many and repeated consultations were held. The character of the duchess, throughout the year, was as bright and spotless as the moon in a cloudless night; one fatal hour of darkness alone intervened to eclipse its brightness. Finding human sagacity incapable of dispelling the mystery, it was determined to leave the question to heaven; or in other words to decide it by the ordeal of the sword—a sage tribunal in the age of chivalry. The nephew and two bully uncles were to maintain their accusation in listed combat, and six months were allowed to the duchess to provide herself with three champions, to meet them in the field. Should she fail in this, or should her champions get vanquished, her honor would be considered as attainted, her fidelity as forfeit, and her dukedom would go to the nephew, as a matter of right

With this determination the duchess was fain to comply. Proclamations were accordingly made, and heralds sent to various parts; but day after day, week after week, and month after month elapsed, without any champion appearing to assert her loyalty throughout that darksome hour. The fair widow was reduced to despair, when tidings reached her of grand tournaments to be held at Toledo, in celebration of the nuptials of Don Roderick, the last of the Gothic kings, with the Morisco princess Exilona. As a last resort, the duchess repaired to the Spanish court, to implore the gallantry of its assembled chivalry.

The ancient city of Toledo was a scene of gorgeous revelry on the event of the royal nuptials. The youthful king, brave, ardent and magnificent, and his lovely bride, beaming with all the radiant beauty of the East, were hailed with shouts and acclamations whenever they appeared. Their nobles vied with each other in the luxury of their attire, their splendid retinues, and prancing steeds, and the haughty dames of the court appeared in a blaze of jewels.

In the midst of all this pageantry, the beautiful but afflicted Duchess of Loraine made her appearance to the throne. She was dressed in black and closely veiled; four duennas of the most staid and severe aspect, and six beautiful demoiselles, formed her female attendants. She was guarded by several very ancient, withered and gray-headed cavaliers; and her train was borne by one of the most deformed and diminutive dwarfs in existence.

Advancing to the foot of the throne, she knelt down, and throwing up her veil, revealed her countenance so beautiful that half of the courtiers present were ready to renounce their wives and mistresses, and devote themselves to her service; but when she made known that she came in quest of champions to defend her fame, every cavalier pressed forward to offer his arm and sword, without inquiring into the merits of the case; for it seemed clear that so beauteous a lady could have done nothing but what was right; and, at any rate, she ought to be championed in following the vent of her humours whether right or wrong.

Encouraged by such gallant zeal, the duchess suffered herself to be raised from the ground, and related the whole history of her distress. When she concluded, the king remained for some time silent, charmed by the music of her voice. At length, "As I hope for salvation, most beautiful duchess," said he, "were I not a sovereign king, and bound in duty to my kingdom, I myself would put lance in rest to vindicate your cause; as it is here, I give full permission to my knights, and promise lists and a fair field, and that the contest shall take place before the walls of Toledo, in presence of my assembled court."

As soon as the pleasure of the king was known, there was a strife among the cavaliers present, for the honor of the contest. It was decided by lot, and the successful candidates were objects of great envy, for every one was ambitious of finding favor in the eyes of the beautiful young widow.

Missives were sent, summoning the nephew and his two uncles to Toledo, to maintain their accusation, and a day was appointed for the combat.—When the day arrived, all Toledo was in commotion at an early hour. The lists had been prepared in the usual place, just without the walls, at the foot of the rugged rocks on which the city is built, and on that beautiful meadow along the Tagus, known by the name of the king's garden. The populace had already assembled, each one eager to secure a favorable place; the balconies were soon filled with the ladies of the court, clad in their richest attire, and bands of youthful knights, splendidly armed and decorated with their ladies' devices, were managing their superbly caparisoned steeds about the field. The king at length stood forth in state, accompanied by the Queen Exilona. They took their seats in a raised balcony, under a canopy of rich damask; and, at sight of them, the people rent the air with acclamations.

The nephew and his uncles now rode into the field, armed cap-a-pee, and followed by a train of cavaliers of their own roystering cast, great swearers and carousers, arrant swashbucklers, that went about with clanking armour and jingling spurs.—When the people of Toledo beheld the haunting and discourteous appearance of these knights, they were more anxious than ever for the success of the gentle duchess, but at the same time, the sturdy and stalwart frames of these warriors, shewed that whoever won the victory from them, must do it at the cost of many a bitter blow.

As the nephew and his riotous crew rode in at one side of the field, the fair widow appeared at the other, with her suite of gray-headed courtiers, her duennas and dainty demoiselles and the little dwarf toiling along under the weight of her train. Every one made way for her as she passed, and blessed her beautiful face, and prayed for success to her cause. She took her seat in a lower balcony, not far from the sovereign's, and her pale face, set off by her mourning weeds, was as the moon, shining forth from among the clouds of night.

The trumpets sounded for the combat. The warriors were just entering the lists, when a stranger knight, armed in panoply, and followed by two pages and an esquire, came galloping into the field, and riding up to the royal balcony, claimed the combat as a matter of right.

"In me," cried he, "behold the cavalier who had the happiness to rescue the beautiful duchess from the peril of the forest, and the misfortune to bring on her this calumny. It was but recently, in the course of my errantry, that tidings of her wrongs have reached my ears, and I have urged hither at all speed, to stand forth in her vindication.

No sooner did the duchess hear the accents of the knight, than she recognized his voice, and joined her prayers with his, that he might enter the lists. The difficulty was, to determine which of the three champions already appointed should yield his place, each insisting on the honour of the combat. The stranger knight would have settled the point, by taking the whole contest upon himself; but this the other knights would not permit. It was at length determined, as before, by lot, and the cavalier who lost the chance retired murmuring and disconsolate.

The trumpet again sounded—the lists were opened. The arrogant nephew and his drawcansir uncles appeared so completely cased in steel, that they and their steeds were like moving masses of iron. When they understood the stranger knight to be the same that had rescued the duchess from her peril, they greeted him with the most boisterous derision.

"O ho! sir Knight of the Dragon," said they; "you who pretend to champion fair widows in the dark, come on, and vindicate your deeds of darkness in the open day."

The only reply of the cavalier was, to put lance in rest, and brace himself for the encounter. Needless it is to relate the particulars of a battle, which was like so many hundred combats that have been said and sung in prose and verse. Who is there but must have foreseen the event of a contest where heaven had to decide on the guilt or innocence of the most beautiful and immaculate of widows?

The sagacious reader, deeply read in this kind of judicial combats, can imagine the encounter of the graceless nephew and the stranger knight. He sees their concussion, man to man, and horse to horse, in mad career, and in that Sir Graceless hurled to the ground and slain. He will not wonder that the assailants of the brawny uncles were less successful in their rude encounter; but he will picture to himself the stout stranger, spurring to their rescue, in the very critical moment; he will see him transfixing with his lance, and cleaving the other to the chine with a back stroke of his sword, thus leaving the trio of accusers dead upon the field, and establishing the immaculate fidelity to the duchess and her title to the dukedom, beyond the shadow of a doubt.

The air rang with acclamations; nothing was heard but praises of the beauty and virtue of the duchess, and of the prowess of the stranger knight; but the public joy was still more increased when the champion raised his visor, and revealed the countenance of one of the bravest cavaliers in Spain, renowned for his gallantry in the service of the sex, who had long been absent, in quest of similar adventures.

That worthy knight however was severely wounded in the battle, and remained for a long time ill of his wounds. The lovely duchess, grateful for having twice owed her protection to his arm, attended him daily during his illness. A tender passion grew up between them, and she finally rewarded his gallantry by giving him her hand.

The king would fain have had the knight establish his title to such high advancement by farther deeds of arms; but his courtiers declared that he had already merited the lady, by thus vindicating her fame and fortune in a deadly combat to entrance; and the lady herself hinted that she was perfectly satisfied of his prowess in arms, from the proofs she received in his achievements in the forest.

Their nuptials were celebrated with great magnificence. The present husband of the duchess did not pray and fast like his predecessor, Philibert the wife-ridden; yet he found greater favor in the eyes of Heaven, for their union was blessed with a numerous progeny—the daughters chaste and beauteous as their mother; the sons all stout and valiant as their sire, and all renowned, like him, for relieving disconsolate damsels and desolate widows.

HELEN CLEVELAND.

A Tale of the Revolution.

BY MISS GEORGE ANNA H. SHERBURNE,
Authoress of "The Pirate's Treasure," "The Heiress" &c etc.

Chapter I.

That which Alexander sigh'd for;
That which Cæsar's soul possessed;
That which heroes, kings, have died for,
Glory—animates my breast.—Montgomery.

"Mother seek not to dissuade me; my bleeding country calls on me to exert myself in its cause. I am young—vigorous—strong. Why should I remain woman-like at home, with the glow of health upon my cheek, while so many hoary headed veterans are exerting their feeble might in the cause of freedom. Nay, mother, I will go."

"But, my dear Horace, remember the defenceless condition of Helen and myself; you are our only protector;—what if those British marauders were to take possession of our village? What then would become of us?"

"Mother, fear not: they are now far from here and should they make this their route, I will be with you, or send a suitable protection. Mother, I blush to think I am the only young man left in the village. Shall it be said that I, Horace Cleveland, the sole representative of his brave father, lingered here in ignoble ease, while his gallant countrymen were striving for freedom?"

His mother gazed with pride on his dark flashing eye and crimsoning cheek, as she replied—

"You are right, my boy; go, and take with you my blessing. The same holy spirit now watching over us, will guard us when defenceless and alone."

Mrs. Cleveland was the widow of a brave officer, descendant of one of the most ancient families in Virginia. They had resided in Winchester at the time of the French invasion, assisted by the Indians. Col. Cleveland fought bravely for the cause in which he was engaged, and on the day that General Braddock was defeated and slain, the brave Cleveland also received his death wound. Mrs. Cleveland was yet a blooming widow when the trumpet's clarion echoed through the country, announcing that America had thrown off the galling yoke of the mother country, and determined to assert her rights by the sword.—Horace Cleveland, though young, inherited the brave and daring spirit of his lamented father, and deeming their situation in Winchester might be insecure, resolved to remove to Roxbury, Massachusetts—the birth-place of his mother.

Horace had now attained his nineteenth year, and made known to his mother his intention of avenging his country's wrongs. This naturally opened afresh the scarcely healed wounds of her widowed heart, as she again saw in perspective, the many long nights passed in sleepless, mental agony, and the weary days of suspense, with a heart yearning for tidings of her son, which she knew the incertitude of times would preclude.

Helen Cleveland was left an orphan at an early age, and had learned to look on her aunt as a mother; a singularly strong likeness existed between herself and Horace: from the glossy raven locks, large dreamy eyes, regular features, and brilliant complexion, to the slight, symmetrical forms, and slender hands and feet. She was dearly loved and cherished by her ill-fated uncle—being the only surviving child of his twin brother.

Chapter II.

And then at length her tears in freedom gush'd,
Big, bright, and fast; unknown to her they fell;
But still her lips refused to say—"Farewell!"
For in that word, that fatal word—how e'er
We promise, hope, believe—there breathes despair.
[Byron.

Man's love is of man's life a thing apart,
'Tis woman's whole existence.—[Byron.

"Dearest Amie, will you remain true to me? will you think of me sometimes when I am far away in the din of battle? Your sweet image shall be my guiding star—step by step I will fight my way until I obtain the glory for which I pant."

"Ah! Horace, I fear your ambition is stronger than your love: why will you leave me—your mother—Helen; but dearest fear not for my constancy, you know not the depth, the power of woman's first love; Horace, can you doubt me?"

And here the lovely speaker raised her large blue eyes, and as Horace gazed in their pure clear depths, he felt himself beloved.

"Amie, I believe, nay, I know you love me, and proud am I to have won the affection of one so good and beautiful; mine, dearest, is a selfish, soul-absorbing passion: one that will admit of no other in my breast; not even as you suspect—Ambition. Amie, you surely would not respect me were I to remain inactive, while America is struggling to assert her rights? Nay, I see by the beaming smile upon your beautiful lip, you approve my determination, even though I should return minus a limb. Amie, you would not love me then less."

"Love you less, Horace," repeated his beautiful companion, reproachfully—"were you to lose these beaming eyes I so love to gaze on—were those curling locks to lose their hue—that cheek become of ashen paleness, and yourself a cripple, Horace, then would I cling more fondly to you, love you, and cherish you through life."

"Heaven bless you, my own sweet love, your voice falls as soothingly on my spirit as oil on the troubled waters;—how often during the long weary watches of midnight, will this sweet garden where I first breathed to you my love, Amie, be pictured in my thoughts, and you bright moon, love, you must gaze on it at this hour, and spiritually I will be with you."

"Dearest Horace, deem not you will be absent from my memory one instant. My every thought, my every prayer, shall be yours, and for your safety."

"My own dear Amie, how can I ever thank you for this kind interest in my welfare; but my own love I must bid you farewell, the night grows chill, and I fear the effects of the dew on your delicate frame; ere to-morrow's sun has gilded our village spire, I shall be far away on my road to the camp of Washington. Farewell, dearest and best, farewell," and printing one kiss on the snowy brow of the sobbing girl, he was soon out of sight.

Amie Danvers was the only child of Philip Danvers, one of the most wealthy and respectable men in Massachusetts. Amie was as beautiful as the dream of a poet, and as gentle and delicate as the birds and flowers she so loved to cherish; her form was slight, seemingly too fragile for this rough world, and a host of tender-loving thoughts beamed through her dark blue eyes, the very hue of her violets, while her golden ringlets, snowy skin and rose-bud mouth claimed the love she met in all—and young Cleveland felt a world of inexplicable emotions rising within his warm heart when he first gazed on her young beauty and drank in the soft rich tones of her flute-like voice, as she would gaily warble the favorite old melodies of her father's.

A few months had elapsed since Mrs. Cleveland's residence in Roxbury, when one calm summer evening, while the "day god," like an eastern monarch, was slowly sinking behind his cushions of purple and gold, a faint breath of the evening zephyr stole whisperingly among the flowers and shrubs, and gently waved the golden curls from the marble brow of Amie Danvers as she listened with beating heart and glowing cheek to the words of ardent love from the lips of Horace, and when his last words had died away, the faint sigh and the timid glance from those heavenly eyes assured him he was beloved; earth contained not a being more happy. That same night he had received the kind father's sanction and blessing, and they were solemnly betrothed in the sight of Heaven: from their young hearts gushed forth a holy stream of happiness, and the gentle moon and glittering stars gleamed upon them as their vows were registered in Heaven.

Chapter III.

Heavens! there are such chords within the breast,
Which, roughly struck, ring with sharpest agony!
[S. F. Glenn.

Some weeks had passed away since Horace Cleveland had left his peaceful home to join the army in Cambridge, and though the two families so deeply interested in his fate, at first heard from him often, yet nothing was known of his rank in the army of Washington. Sober autumn had rifled the trees of their foliage, the starry flowers had withered beneath the chill blast, and disappeared from the green lap of mother earth, and the bright rays of the evening sun kissed the shining curls of Amie Danvers, as, accompanied by Helen Cleveland, she slowly returned from a walk. Amie, slightly blushing, broke the silence by saying—

"Do not, Helen, laugh at me for again broaching the subject ever uppermost in my mind, but, indeed, I must speak of Horace; what can be the motive, the reason for his long mysterious silence, when he must know the agony of mind we all endure—when he knows so well how fondly, how dearly I love him."

The rich color deserted the cheek of Helen, and her soft dark eyes filled with tears, as she replied—

"I know not, Amie, the cause of his silence, and I dare not think of it; he must be either taken prisoner or wounded."

"God forbid," hastily ejaculated Amie, turning pale; "but oh, Helen, if it should be so, if it should be that he is taken prisoner, his own feelings can scarcely be inferior to mine: for did you but know, dear Helen, how devotedly he loves me—how wholly his every thought and feeling are mine, and none can tell how fully I reciprocate his love." Here a keen observer would have noticed the blanched cheek, white lip, and strained eye in Helen, denoted some secret anguish, perchance 'twas a mere bodily pain, for the crimson hue soon revisited the cheek and lip, and the soft eyes were to Amie the same eyes she loved to compare with those of Horace, and in happier days, during a temporary absence of the latter, she would playfully insist upon Helen's acting the part of son and lover.

"Helen, love, you look pale and sad," said the kind voice of Mrs. Cleveland: "tell me your sorrows, dear, for next my Horace, you well know how dearly I prize my gentle girl."

"I am sad, my dear friend, my more than mother," replied Helen, mournfully, "and were it not for you, I could wish to die."

"Tell me, Helen, your sorrows—unbosom yourself freely to me, my child,—is it, as I suspect it:—is Horace the cause?"

"Dearest Aunt, I will no longer dissemble; Horace is unintentionally the cause,—I love him as I feel woman never loved before,—for him is garnered in this poor heart, a mine of the most devoted love man ever inspired; oh! the pangs, the agony attending unrequited affection; to feel that all the best and holiest emotions of the soul are wasted; to feel the heart withering and burning hopelessly away; but I must crush my feelings, and appear unmoved while his praises are sounded by his chosen one. Dear aunt, do not pity me—I could not bear sympathy now."

"Dear Helen, 'twas once my dearest wish to see you united to Horace, but he is my only one. I cannot seek to blast his hopes, Helen—you must forget him."

"Forget him?" repeated Helen; "never can I cease to remember;—a woman's love, like the gum-cistus, can know but one sun-rise of happiness and beauty; I have placed him in my heart of hearts, there shall he reign until its throbbings cease; to see Horace happy in my first wish, and never shall his noble nature be pained by a knowledge of my unhappy love."

It was a beautiful autumnal morning, as Horace Cleveland, mounted on his spirited Virginia charger, viewed with surprise, mingled with heroic ardor, from an eminence near Cambridge, the patriot army under Washington. The distant rolling drum and shrill fife, with the polished muskets of the soldiers, as they were drilling in the morning sun beams, the white canvass tents arranged in such military systematic order, and the sacred banner of liberty swelling proudly in the breeze from the marquee of the Commanding General, all conspired to make his young blood crimson his manly brow, and thrill with feelings unspeakable his inmost soul. giving rein to his impatient steed, who seemed to be imbued with his master's military ardor, he was, in a few moments, within the lines, and ordered to 'stand' by a sentinel, who, calling the corporal of the guard, young Cleveland made known his wish for an immediate interview with the Commander-in-Chief, and dismounting, followed the corporal to the tent of the officer of the day, and in a few minutes Cleveland, with a beating heart, stood in the presence of Washington and his staff.

"Your name, young gentleman, from this card, I perceive to be Cleveland," said the Chief, with his usual smile.

Horace having replied, Washington continued—

"Any relation to the late brave Col. Cleveland, of Virginia?"

"His son, General," replied Horace.

"Then, sir," replied Washington, rising and tendering his hand, "you are from as true and chivalrous a race as ever wore a spur, or wielded sword in defence of liberty. Your father fell soon after General Braddock received his death wound, and with his face to the enemy. Now, sir, to business, and say how I can serve you."

"By allowing me, General, to fight under the banner of freedom. Be the rank what it may, myself with my gallant steed from this moment I devote to my country."

"Then, sir, I make you at once first Lieutenant of the Virginia Cavalry, now filling up."

He then called an aid, to accompany Cleveland, for the purpose of receiving his commission and introduction to the gallant corps to which he had been so unexpectedly attached. As he was meditating on the sudden and happy change in his fortune, he was interrupted by—

"Lieutenant Cleveland, your commission, sir, and at twelve o'clock the General will review the troops. You have but a few hours to prepare, to be at the post assigned you."

Horace, returning the salute of the Aid, who had so agreeably broken his thoughts, immediately hurried to his quarters to make the required preparations.

The review took place; and as the General-in-Chief, with his staff, passed the Virginia Cavalry, receiving its salute, his quick eye caught the manly figure of Cleveland, as he sat with erect grace in his saddle, curbing his beautiful and spirited charger; and as the General rode on, he observed to one of his staff, that if he was not much deceived, young Cleveland's brow would yet be crowned with laurels.

The British army, under General Howe, in Boston, were in want of forage and fresh provisions, and were compelled to make frequent excursions around the country for supplies. Many times, warm and bloody skirmishes would take place between the English and American foraging parties, in chancing to meet. Generally, the Americans would be victorious, and carry off the pillage of the enemy, which, causing much anxiety in the mind of General Howe, he doubled the force sent out for the immediate supplies of his blockaded army.

Lieutenant Cleveland had been but a few weeks attached to his corps, when he was ordered to take the command of fifty picked cavalry, to harrass the British foraging parties, and on no account to permit the supplies to be carried off when fallen in with. To capture or destroy, were his orders. At day-break the party were mounted, and at a hard gallop towards Roxbury. For three hours, nothing was seen or heard of an enemy—when, coming to a cross-road, a man on horseback was observed coming towards them. On his drawing near, enquiries were made for the British foraging party. The man informed them, that an hour since he passed a party of the "English robbers," on an excursion, who numbered about sixty, well-mounted, and that they must, on their return, come by the cross-road where they then stood. After requesting their informant to be silent as regarded his observations, Lieutenant Cleveland consulted with his junior officer the proper course to pursue, when it was determined to lie in ambush in a near wood of underbrush, which would conceal them from view until the enemy should retreat with their booty; and while one half should attack and capture the fruits of the foraging party, the other, with Cleveland, should attack the vanguard. With this arrangement, they returned to the wood, and, dismounting, refreshed themselves and their horses, and prepared their arms for the expected desperate conflict with the enemies of their country. Two hours had not elapsed, ere the sentinel stationed at the outskirt of the wood, nearest the road, gave the required signal. All were immediately mounted, and their stations taken for the attack. The enemy were now heard coming down the road at an easy, careless, scattering pace, and far in their rear, the forage, &c., taken from the farmers, guarded by a part of the troops, who, not suspecting an enemy, were leisurely lagging along, cracking their jokes, &c., when suddenly the bugle of the Americans sounded a charge, and before the surprised enemy could prepare for a defence, the Americans had discharged their pistols with unerring aim, drawn their glittering blades, and many of the foe lay weltering in their blood; yet, not dismayed, the commander of the attacked party, headed by a chosen few, wheeled in line, and giving the word "charge," on they came, with the swiftness of the wind, to overwhelm with one dash, if possible, the Yankee yeomen; but they had forgotten "Lexington," "Bunker Hill," etc., and their mad impetuosity was the means of their total defeat; for Cleveland and his gallant band received them as they bore down with a calm, determined front, and a well-directed discharge of their pistols, which, putting the enemy in confusion, was taken advantage of, and in a few minutes ten of the enemy lay dead on the field; fifteen were made prisoners, with their horses and booty; the rest made good their retreat: and with only a loss of three of the Ameri cans.

Cleveland arrived in triumph at head-quarters, about sunset, and was received by his commanding General with warm salutations, and was promoted on the spot a Captain of Cavalry for his daring courage in attacking and defeating a superior force.

The capture of the large quantity of forage, beef, &c.,—the defeat of the whole British foraging party by Cleveland,—caused much distress in the British camp in Boston, and depressed the feelings of General Howe to such a degree, that he came to the resolution of changing his course to obtain the necessary supplies for his army, by scouring the adjacent coast with his small vessels, to obtain that which he had now no other way to procure, so strict was the blockade kept up by the American Commander-in-Chief.

Cleveland, finding that arrangements were making for the Americans to take possession of, and fortify the heights of Dorchester, for the purpose of compelling the British troops to evacuate Boston, determined to ask for a leave of absence, in order to acquaint those whom he held most dear with his sudden change of fortune, before the army should leave that part of the country on a Southern campaign. Although warned by his General, on taking leave, of the great rik he ran of being captured, and looked upon as a spy, in crossing the British lines, which he would be compelled to do in making his contemplated visit, his proud spirit disdained the name of fear, and he firmly resolved to risk all, to once more gaze in the azure eyes of his betrothed, and learn from her lips that he still was loved. And he felt his proud heart would be more humble under the soothing influence of a mother's blessing, given with all the devotion of a mother's love.

Chapter IV.

"I am pursued—all the ports are stopp'd too;
Not any hope to escape: behind, before me,
On either side, I am beset."

[Beaumont and Fletcher.

The dim, pale light which pervaded the scene, denoted the approach of day. Aurora had unbarred the eastern gates for the bright orb of day to take his course through the blue vault above. Cleveland stood in deep, silent meditation at the door of his tent. No sound disturbed the stillness save the lazy flapping of the sacred symbol of liberty, which swelled in the morning breeze over the marquee of him who had freely offered his life in its defence, and the solitary, measured step of the sentinel, who guarded that treasure which the world combined was unable to purchase.

Horace was aroused from his reverie by the neighing of his impatient steed. Flinging "dull care" to the wind, he gaily vaulted into his saddle, soon wended his way through the tented field, and receiving the last challenge for "the word" from the wakeful sentry, he passed into a small wood, halted a moment to examine once more the priming of his pistols, then giving one parting look to the distant tents, took a circuitous route to avoid, if possible, observation from friend or foe.

The sun had ascended high in the heavens as Cleveland left a small copse where he had halted for the purpose of refreshing himself with soldier's fare, and to recruit his noble steed; as he ascended an eminence he descried the far distant smoke curling gracefully above the ancient elms which surrounded all he felt dear on earth; his heart bounded joyfully at the delightful anticipation of soon clasping to his heart his fondly loved Amie, and putting his steed to a hard gallop, he was soon at the foot of the hill, where the road wound round a small wood; as he came to the turn, three men, apparently British soldiers, by their dress, rushed up and ordered him to stand; in an instant, he levelled a pistol and fired;—the man in front fell. Cleveland, then putting spurs to his horse, soon distanced the remaining two; when a bugle sounding, warned him he had yet to run the gauntlet; he soon espied three other soldiers, well mounted, crossing a common to cut him off, but knowing the mettle of his good steed, he gave him the rein, and drawing forth his pistols, kept on his lightning-like speed, to pass his pursuers ere they could reach the road, but he failed—for they came within pistol shot and fired without effect,—Cleveland reserving his till the proper time; for with him it was a matter of life and death. On, on they sped, like the wind, the pursuers and the pursued—Cleveland feeling that two short miles only separated him from his home, spoke from time to time to his gallant steed, who seemed to be conscious of his master's perilous situation. Horace did not glance behind, but hearing the clattering hoofs becoming at each moment more alarmingly near, he curbed in his foaming horse, and stood at bay, awaiting, with pistols in hand, his fast advancing foe, who were some rods from each other. As the first came up, Horace, with well directed aim, brought him to the ground, badly wounded: the second furiously discharged his pistol, without effect, when Cleveland, drawing his sword, dashed against horse and rider, cut through the right shoulder of the discomfited man, who, on falling to the ground, discharged his second pistol. The third, who had now come up, fired, and his ball passed through the fleshy part of Cleveland's left arm, who, pained by the wound, shot his adversary through the heart. Cleveland, finding the road clear, again spurred quickly for his home, with his arm bleeding profusely, and overcome with fatigue.

As Mrs. Cleveland, Helen, and Amie, were absent taking their usual walk, the sound of a horse galloping down the road, deterred them from venturing beyond the little garden gate, until the horseman should have passed, when suddenly Helen shrieked, and rushed to the gate;—her alarmed companions followed, and beheld, stretched in the road, the senseless and bleeding body of Horace Cleveland! They immediately sprang to his assistance, and with their joint efforts conveyed him to the house. Mrs. Cleveland, who understood a little of Surgery, examined his wound, and finding it not serious, carefully dressed it, and soon had the satisfaction of seeing him in a calm, deep sleep, with his gentle Amie watching over him.

The second morning Horace had entirely recovered from his fatigue, and the pain in his arm having subsided, he related to his eager listeners all that had befallen him since his departure from home, and while relating his hair-breadth escape from capture, and the result had he been convicted as a spy, Helen was forced to seek refuge in her own chamber to conceal the anguish which swept her bosom; and calmly reviewing her cousin's situation, she foresaw his enemies would be laying in wait for him, and then with all the resolution of woman's love, she resolved to save him—take advantage of the likeness existing between them and sacrifice herself on the sacred altar of Love. She believed a chosen few would be stationed along the road in ambush to take him, dead or alive, to the British camp.

The next morning she questioned Horace as to the circuitous route he had taken to reach Roxbury, and the probability of his retracing the same road without danger of being either captured or killed.—Having ascertained all she wished, in the course of the day, Helen in her room transformed her riding cap into a military one, her blue riding habit into a cloak, a la militaire, and taking from an upper room a blue suit of clothes which her cousin had no longer any use for, with a small sword belonging to her late father, she concealed her treasures in a trunk ready for use.

At an early hour the next morning, Helen, with a pale cheek and quivering lip, arrayed herself in man's apparel; but though her woman's heart sunk within her at the thought of the perils and dangers she was preparing to meet, yet her resolution wavered not. With stealthy step she descended to the stable yard: her favorite saddle horse stood next her cousin's steed. In a few moments she was mounted: then, with a tearful eye and throbbing heart, she gave one lingering look toward the casement of the chamber where Horace still slept in peace, and at an easy pace wended her perilous way in the direction of the American camp.

Helen continued her slow pace for two hours, without meeting an individual. A holy calmness now pervaded her breast, her conflicting emotions were all stilled. While allowing her horse to quench his thirst at a small stream crossing the road in a deep secluded valley, she started and a rich crimson flush crossed her cheek as she heard the distant winding of a bugle. She listened intently, when from another quarter, it was answered though farther off—presuming it to be the echo of the first, she was about drawing rein to proceed, when a third prolonged note still farther on the road she was pursuing, surprised her. She then murmured as she put her horse in a gentle canter—

"Thank Heaven! I have saved him. To escape will be impossible. Oh! how joyfully—how gladly will I die for him! Dearest Horace, I have saved you!"

A pistol shot interrupted her soliloquy—but finding herself unharmed, with a blanched cheek but firm heart, she gave her horse the spur. Another shot followed, but the distance was too great, and it fell harmless. She at length found herself ascending a hill, and on nearing the top, her bridle was suddenly seized, and she was immediately surrounded by a band of twenty dragoons of the enemy; her sword was taken from her. They then proceeded for an hour on a hard gallop—then stopping for a few minutes to obtain refreshment, pursued their course for Roxbury Neck; and now, being safe from pursuit, they rode slowly until they arrived at the quarters of General Howe, before whom Helen stood with a proud mein and undismayed look, refusing to answer any questions. The General said "his pranks were well known to him in cutting off his foraging parties, and as he had been taken within the English lines, he should be tried as a spy," and calling for the officer of the day, ordered him to take charge of Captain Cleveland, and to allow no one to have admittance to him on pain of his displeasure.

Chapter V.

Thou know'st that when we fight to save our country, we fight the cause of Heaven: the man who falls, falls hallowed—falls a victim to the gods: for them and in their altars.
[Mason.

"Dear Horace, do not be alarmed; Helen has only prolonged her usual ride. I admit it is imprudent for her to ride out unattended during these fearful times."

"Imprudent! mother," replied Horace, impatiently, pacing the room; "rashness in the extreme—the roads are filled with soldiers, and I am Helen's only protector. I have but twenty-four hours to be with you, and if she returns not within that time—what shall I—what can I do?—what madness!"

Here Mrs. Cleveland, bursting into tears, left the room. The gentle Amie timidly approached her lover, saying—

"Do not grieve, Horace: doubtless our dear Helen has visited some friends to jest with our imaginary fears. Dearest Horace, must you leave us so very soon?"

"My own sweet love, yes: and should we never meet again on earth, will you sometimes think of me—pray for my soul; but no! I will hope. No gloomy thought shall mar our parting now, my love. Amie, when I return again, should life be spared, sweet one, then will you not become mine own?"

"Horace, can you ask?" sighed the gentle girl, her eyes suffused with bright tears."

"Amie, forgive me: but 'tis so sweet to hear your lips confess your love, and now good night, dearest. I trust to-morrow will restore Helen to us; good night;—but stay! I shall not see you again; to-morrow at dawn of day, I must start: I shall endeavor on the road to hear tidings of Helen, and despatch the truant home. Farewell, my only love!" and pressing the half fainting girl to his manly heart, he rushed to his chamber to make the necessary arrangements.

Ere the sun was up, Horace, fully armed and well mounted on his gallant steed, was some miles on his circuitous route for Cambridge, without meeting with any one, until some few miles from where the path led towards Roxbury, a man on horseback came up, from whom Horace learned that a prisoner had been taken the day before by a British party, whom they had been some days in search of, by the name of Captain Cleveland. They had taken him to Boston to be hung—as they said—for a rebel spy. The mystery of Helen's disappearance was thus solved; the maddening thought rushed like lightning through his mind: and knowing her fearless heroic disposition and the resemblance between them, he was satisfied of her noble intention to save him at the sacrifice of her own life. With these agonizing thoughts, and sparing not his steed, he soon arrived unmolested at Head Quarters, where he found great preparations making for fortifying immediately the heights of Dorchester. After reporting himself to the Commanding General, he repaired to his tent and wrote to his mother and Amie all that he had heard regarding Helen, and his determination of saving her at every hazard.

After despatching his servant the next morning with the letters, he asked permission of his General to take a chosen number of his mounted men to scour the country near the lines of the enemy, while the fortifications were being thrown up to storm the British in Boston, and drive them from their last footing in New England. On the second day he was fortunate in capturing four prisoners and their horses, which he took to Head Quarters; and from one of them, for a small bribe, Horace learned all the particulars relative to his cousin, who had assumed the name and title of Captain Cleveland, and found she was strictly guarded: yet treated with the respect due her supposed rank and courage, which caused Horace to hope all would yet be well until he had time to mature his plan for her deliverance, which he hoped to effect in a few days, with the assistance of twenty bold, resolute men, belonging to his company, who knew fear only by name, and would lose the last drop of their heart's blood to serve their spirited young commander.

With his plan matured, he was soon made acquainted with the place in which Helen was confined, and the number of the guard in its immediate neighborhood; and being perfectly acquainted with every street and lane in Boston, he was doubly sure of carrying her off in triumph, but not without some skirmishing and loss of life in their retreat. Cleveland confided all to his warm-hearted General, and asked permission to make the attempt. Washington, at first, was surprised at the bold, daring design of his young protege, yet granted his request, after they should have completed the fortifications on Dorchester heights, which he presumed would astonish not a little the British army in Boston.

"But why, Captain Cleveland," asked Washington, "do you not go to the English head quarters under a flag of truce, and claim the prisoner as a lady in disguise?"

"For the fear, General," replied Cleveland, "that she may be charged as a spy, detained, and probably meet with insult; and, as we are on the eve of storming them in their strong hold, time would not suffice; and should General Howe determine not to stand our fire from the heights of Dorchester, and embark with his army, my cousin would, in the hurry and confusion, be carried from the country. Therefore, General, I would ask permission to make the attempt for her liberation at once. She has nobly, generously perilled her life for me, and mine should be freely offered up a sacrifice to save her."

"Enough, sir," replied Washington, warmly pressing our hero's hand. "Go—and may the Almighty, who smiles on our cause, protect you to render further service to our bleeding country."

The army blockading Boston under Washington, amounted to twenty thousand regulars, and with this army he was now determined to bring matters to a final issue. To effect this, he ordered Gen. Thomas, with a detachment from Roxbury, to march on to Dorchester heights, and fortify this position. Preparatory to this movement, however, a general bombardment of Boston commenced on the nights of the second, third and fourth of March, successively, which alarmed the enemy with the apprehension of a general attack. On the night of the fourth of March, General Thomas marched on to the heights, and such was the activity and zeal of the troops, that they had penetrated through the deep frost, and thrown up a sufficient breastwork to cover them from the fire of the enemy in the morning.

This movement gave a general alarm in Boston, and General Howe saw at once he must either dislodge the Americans or evacuate Boston: for Dorchester heights commanded the harbour, and endangered the fleet. The first was resolved upon, and Lord Piercy was ordered to the service, and actually embarked, with three thousand men upon the expedition; but it seems an All-wise Providence frowned on this movement of the enemy, for a storm came up, and raged for several days so severely that the enterprise was defeated. General Howe, now pressed on all sides, soon made his intentions known to leave Boston, which was immediately communicated, under a flag of truce, to General Washington; and on the 17th March, 1776, General Howe embarked with all his army, and sailed for Halifax, which caused great rejoicing, not only in Boston and its vicinity, but throughout the whole country.

Chapter VI.

Come—I have learned that fearful commenting
Is leaden servitor to dull delay;
Delay leads impotent and snail-paced beggary:
Then fiery expedition be my wing,
Jove's Mercury, and herald for a king!—[Shakspeare.

Horace Cleveland had learned from one of the prisoners he had captured during his last excursion along the enemy's lines, that his cousin was detained in a building at the corner of Ann and Union streets, (which ancient building is yet standing,) and guarded by a corporal's guard, half of whom were generally away of evenings, carousing among their messmates, stationed in and about the lower end of Ann street, having no fear of their prisoner's escaping, on account of his resigned, contented disposition. General Howe's head quarters were at the Province House, Cornhill, which stood some distance from the street, in front of which, and in its immediate vicinity, including the Old South Church, were quartered the best troops in the British army. And as no assault was feared from the Americans at Cambridge, all the officers and soldiers off duty made the few squares around the quarters of the commander-in-chief their lounging-place, to talk, drink, and hear the news from day to day, &c. Cleveland knowing the lofty heights of Dorchester would be occupied by General Thomas, and be seen by the besieged army in Boston, causing great surprise and commotion in the town, had so arranged his plan, two days previous to the taking possession of Dorchester heights, to have half the number of his well-trained band enter Boston in the dress of farmers, at different hours of the day, having their horses put at the usual stopping places of the farmers, in the vicinity of the market, not far from Ann street, each to have a brace of pistols secreted about his person, and to enlist as dragoons, as a vast number of the tories had done after the battle of Bunker Hill. After enlisting, they were as raw Yankee recruits, to have permission to look about the town, to see the sights, and make friends in the usual treating way with those guarding the prisoner, and if possible, to see her out of curiosity; should this prove successful, a note which Cleveland had written to his cousin, informing her of his plan, that she had friends near at hand, and to be ready for flight at a moment's notice, was entrusted to the hands of one of his men, in some way to be placed where she could safely reach it. The plan thus far succeeded admirably—assisted by copious draughts of brandy, and other requisites for such a daring experiment. Cleveland had also provided a one horse wagon, at the bottom of which were concealed a number of swords, together with a stone jug filled with brandy; these were covered with straw, on which he had placed some raw meat of various kinds, to have all the appearance of a farmer's wagon, which was to be driven by one of his men, and followed the day after by himself and the rest of his brave band, at different hours, also on the day preceding the taking possession of Dorchester heights; for the night of the day which discovered the Americans on the heights was the period fixed for the attempt to release his cousin.

The second of March the bombardment of Boston commenced—the British army were in great dismay; the night set in with a dense fog; the town appeared in commotion, and the tories were hurrying to and fro, for fear the town would be given up. Amid all this, a wagon stood at the corner of Union and Ann streets; some of Cleveland's men, dressed in British uniform, stood near, bantering the driver, asking him to their quarters to drink, &c. The corporal of the guard, finding the driver had a jug of good brandy, invited him into their mess-room, which adjoined the prisoner's apartment, the corporal having the key. The wagoner reluctantly assented, and in the course of an hour the corporal, with four of his guard, were in a deep sleep from the effects of the brandy; one only remained awake. By this time, five of Cleveland's men sauntered in, dressed as British soldiers, while Cleveland and the rest of his band were within pistol-shot distance, awaiting anxiously the result. One of the men in the guard-room, prompted in short, the wagoner the handsome prisoner, who was soon to be hanged, if he would give them the remainder of the brandy. It was agreed to, and the key was taken from the pocket of the corporal by the single guard, who was himself half intoxicated. The door cautiously opened, and all entered. The guard was immediately gagged without noise, and tied to the bedstead—and Helen was free. She left her prison-house between two of the men, followed by the remainder. The swords in the wagon had previously been secured. Helen was placed on the horse, which had been taken out and saddled, and they proceeded along at a slow pace, in company with those in British uniform toward Milk street, where they were joined by Cleveland; but as he was on the point of speaking to the heroic girl, to their amazement the bell of the Old South Church suddenly sounded an alarm, the drums beat to arms, and the clattering of horses in full gallop were heard in the distance. Helen's escape had been discovered a few minutes after she left, by the orderly, on going his rounds, who immediately gave the alarm. Not a moment was to be lost. The remainder of the band now coming up at a gallop, all drew their swords for a desperate resistance, and putting their horses at half speed, reached Roxbury Neck. A strong guard of twenty-five mounted men were here stationed to prevent egress to the Neck, but seeing the coming party were partly in the British uniform, they challenged, and opened for them to pass; but ere they could avail themselves of the opportunity, a dragoon rode up to the guard and announced a prisoner had escaped and treason was in the camp. Suspicion crossed the minds of all, and drawing their swords, they went in pursuit.

Cleveland, who had taken advantage of the momentary bustle, had proceeded but little on his way, but finding escape impossible without a battle, ordered his men to halt, and whispering a few words of encouragement to the noble Helen, he gave her a pair of pistols to defend herself if necessary, and then ordered his men to give one discharge with their pistols, and then close in, sword in hand. The discharge had the desired effect; confusion followed; some fell wounded; but the battle became desperate, as hand to hand each thrust and blow were given, with a determination "to do or die." "Cleveland and Bunker Hill!" was the war cry at every blow. Many of the enemy fell. Horace, (with Helen at his side,) fought desperately with the officer in command of the British band, and while in close contest for life and death, a British dragoon rode up in the midst of the combat raging between the commanders, and raised his sabre to strike Horace from behind; but quick as thought the heroic Helen fired, and the man rolled in the dust, but not before Cleveland's sword had passed through the body of his opponent. At this moment, a chance blow from a passing soldier inflicted a severe wound near his left shoulder; seeing which, a dragoon made a desperate charge at him, in hopes of wholly disabling him, which Cleveland not observing, Helen threw herself in a position to receive the thrust, and the quick movement of her horse against that of Cleveland, left him untouched, while the glittering blade passed under her left arm, inflicting a gaping wound; she reeled, and would have fallen from her horse, had she not been supported by one of the men, who at that moment rode up, crying out, "friends are at hand." The galloping of horses were heard, to corroborate his statement; upon which the enemy made a hasty retreat, leaving seven killed, with their commander, and four badly wounded, who were made prisoners. By daylight the next morning, the whole party, save two who were killed, arrived at head quarters—Helen having been borne all the way on the horse with Cleveland, who supported her light form in his arms, and gazed with almost horror at the change which had been wrought in that once bright face—those starry eyes, now dim and sunken, while the long black silky lashes cast a shadow over that pale cheek,—and the quivering lip and contracted brow, all showed how much and how silently she suffered for him she loved.

The warm congratulations of General Washington and the whole army, afforded him but little pleasure; his eye continually sought the faded form of the devoted Helen, who was placed in his tent, and the Surgeon, with the Commander-in-Chief, attended to examine her wound, which, after consultation, was pronounced fatal.

Chapter VII.

"In a few weeks the passion which had so long disturbed the peace of Laura was hushed by lasting repose; but it was the repose of the land where the whirlwind has passed—dreary and desolate."

Pale Cynthia rose, and cast her mellow beams on all nature; all was hushed. Horace Cleveland reclined at the door of his tent, while the cooling night breeze swept his fevered brow; when he was aroused from his meditations by a summons to the side of the dying Helen Cleveland. The feeble rays of the lamp fell faintly on that brow of Parian whiteness, and that pale, lovely cheek; lifting those dark eyes which gazed so tenderly yet so pleadingly in his own, she faintly said:

"Dearest Horace, through life I have lived but for you—now I die for you. Horace, no more can these dim eyes gaze in yours, and drink in new life from every glance; no more can this withered heart bound at your footsteps; no more can these feeble hands ward from that form the fatal blow. Horace, wildly have I loved you—worshipped you. I made an earthly idol, and bowed in adoration before it—crushed, and well nigh broken was my heart, when it learned your love for another—and bitter, bitter was the anguish of my poor contrite spirit. Horace, by the love you bear for Amie, grant me one request. I am calm now—the storm spirit of my love has passed away. You saw how calmly I spoke her name."

"Your request, dear Helen—name it, and it shall be granted," said Horace, huskily.

"Thanks, Horace—'tis this. Have my body sent to the old homestead—there, Horace, where I first felt my cheek glow at your approach. Do you remember the old willow tree in our garden, where the little silver stream murmurs so musically, and where the violets and lilies grow? Bury me there, under the shade of the good old willow. I know that drooping willow will shed tears for me, for I've no gentle mother to weep; no lover to grieve for me, and at night the angels will visit me."

Here Horace, fearing her mind would wander, gave her an opiate which the surgeon had left, and with his hand clasped firmly in hers, the suffering girl fell asleep. For some time no sound, save the sobbing and sighing of the wind, broke the dead silence; the pale moon waned—the glittering stars disappeared—still Helen slept, and Horace watched. Suddenly, faint sounds of a distant bugle were wafted on the gale—it died away; again it sounded, playing that song which speaks to the hearts of all, "Sweet Home." Sweetly and solemnly the melody echoed on the still air, and as the last note ceased, Helen opened those dreamy eyes, and clasping her arms around the neck of Horace, murmured, "I come—I come!"

Cleveland laid her back on her pillow, and felt the pure spirit had fled. Gently he closed those dark, soft eyes—tenderly he smoothed the heavy masses of raven hair around that pale, sweet face—and with almost a mother's care he crossed the small white hands, over that heart which through life had beat but for him.

Chapter VIII.

Oh! snatched away in beauty's bloom,
O'er thee shall press no ponderous tomb!
But on thy turf shall roses rear
Their leaves, the earliest of the year;
And the wild cypress rise in tender gloom.—[Byron.

It was in the summer of 18—, a large white mansion stood some distance from the road, near Winchester, Virginia. Col. Horace Cleveland, after having fought with distinguished bravery in the service of his country, retired with his lovely wife, at the conclusion of the war, to reside in the home of his father, his heart yearning to again behold the scenes of his boyish days.

Time had passed his hand lightly over the fair brow of Amie; her golden ringlets were now put gravely away under the matronly cap. Time had not quenched the fire of Horace Cleveland's dark eyes—though it had silvered his raven hair, and partially stolen the glow from his manly cheek. They stood together watching the setting of the sun, the sweet evening air wafted to their senses the perfume of many flowers. Passing his arm carelessly around his wife, Col. Cleveland said:

"Come, my love, this is our hour for visiting poor Helen."

"True, dear Horace," replied Amie; "forgive my abstraction. But I was thinking of our happiness. This is the anniversary of that evening on which you first told your love, and can a woman, when loving as I did, forget the hour when she first hears and feels her affection reciprocated? It was an evening like this. Do you remember it, love?"

"Remember it," replied her husband, affectionately, "yes, Amie; well do I remember the rapture of my heart on feeling you were all mine own. But come, dearest, we must not neglect poor Helen."

It was a lonely spot—a mournful willow hung its drooping branches over the pure marble slab which bore the name of "Helen." It was a sacred place, so hushed and still, it seemed as if the spirit of the departed one lingered o'er the spot; the modest violets and sweet lilies-of-the-valley mingled their perfumed breaths with the silvery sound of the falling waters from that little stream along whose flower enamelled banks her fairy footsteps were wont to glide, at the stilly twilight hour;—the crescent moon, like a pearly bark, moved through the dark blue heavens, casting a mellow, subdued, trembling light over the holy spot which contained the remains of the broken-hearted Helen Cleveland.

METHOD IN HIS MADNESS.

A lunatic in Raleigh, N. C., recently penned the following magnificent—ay! sublime—lines, and sent them to the Register of that place for publication:

"Tell them I AM, Jehovah said
To Moses, while Earth heard in dread,
And, smitten to the heart,
At once, above, beneath, around,
All nature, without voice or sound,
Replied, Oh Lord! THOU ART!"

THE EXACTING LOVER,
OR, BACHELOR NOTIONS.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

"First catch your fish."—Mrs. Glasse.

"Upon my word, Harry, I don't know whether to consider you a rascal, or only a simpleton," exclaimed a young man to his companion, as, at a late hour in the evening, they descended the steps of a handsome house in Broadway.

"You do me much honor in allowing me the alternative," was the laughing reply; "indeed, if your polite remark had been uttered by any body but my own cousin, it would probably have been met by a knock-down argument."

"You deserve a more severe reprehension, Harry, than I am either able or willing to inflict upon you; it seems to me that you are wantonly trifling with the affections of a young and artless girl, who loves you, and is too guileless to conceal her attachment."

"If such is your opinion, Tom, I shall certainly make no attempt to change it."

"Why do you act a part so inconsistent with your usual mode of thinking."

"My dear fellow, my conduct is perfectly consistent. I have a certain theory about women—a certain system in my manners towards them, and to that system I mean to adhere rigidly, even in despite of my own impulses."

"For Heaven's sake, Harry, do not attempt to weave your fragile, fine spun theories into the web of actual life; you have been a dreamer of dreams, and a projector of schemes all your life, yet what have you gained by them all."

"I have gained, as Byron says, 'a deal of judgment.' I am no longer a passionate boy, looking upon woman as a being of a higher sphere, whose image is to be 'ensky'd, ensainted, worshipped.' I have been in too many love-affairs—have knelt too often before an idol like the image seen in the prophet's vision, whose head was of fine gold, but whose feet were of clay. I look upon woman now as only a gentle and loving minister to man's happiness;—inferior to us in mind and in vigor of character, she is our superior in passion, fortitude and devoted tenderness; the very creature, in short, of whom a slave, not a queen is made. We spoil women by our blind homage, and unfit them for the station they were sent to occupy, while all our efforts to elevate them to the position which our youthful fancy allots them, must be vain and useless."

"This is quite a new idea, is it not, Harry? Less than a twelvemonth ago you were au desespoir for the brilliant and witty Azuretta Folatre, and then you maintained a l'outrance the superiority, mental, moral and personal, of the feminine creation."

"You are right, Tom, but Azuretta cured me of all such foolish fancies; she had been so spoiled by flattery, that she was fit for nothing but to occupy the throne of that tyrannical old Indian, Begum, we were reading about yesterday. Her whims and caprices led me to reflect upon the causes which could thus transform a being whom nature had made timid and gentle, into such a proud, exacting, haughty, domineering creature; and I became convinced that the evil might be traced to man's mistaken homage. Henceforth, I mean to treat women as we do children; to regard them as beings capable of reason, but utterly unfit to be left to their own guidance, and who, in place of being deified, require to be influenced."

"And pray, how are you to obtain the opportunity of influencing them, except by interesting the affections."

"It is by the affections only that they are to be ruled, Tom."

"Then there must yet be a reason of homage, Harry, for women are not to be won unsought."

"That is true, but neither are they to be wooed by such blind and humble devotion as we usually pay. Byron knew the female heart well, and I am convinced his rule is the true one—'Pique them and soothe by turns.'"

"Aye, Byron knew the heart of woman as it exists in the tainted atmosphere of fashionable life, where the weeds of passion grow the more rankly because nurtured by luxurious self indulgence; but you would not surely, follow Byron's rule in your choice of a wife."

"Indeed I should; what would a man gain by humbling himself before a woman during courtship, when he knew that his future happiness depended upon her slavish submission to him after marriage? I mean to marry a delicate, refined and gentle woman, who will love me earnestly and devotedly—to whom my slightest wish will be law—who shall have no wish but to please me—no enjoyments save such as are directly derived from my will; a woman, in short, who shall be all that a wife was first designed; 'a helpmate—subject to her husband, and patient under his will.'"

"You are as despotic as a Turk, Harry; where do you expect to find this modern Griselda?"

"I have found her already, Tom."

"You do not, certainly, expect to train Isabel ter to such submission?"

"ed I do, and what is more, I have no doubt shall succeed. I love her better than I ever did my other woman, but I mean to try her to the utmost, before I place my happiness in her keeping."

"And I suppose this new system of yours will account for your violent flirtation with the new belle this evening, while Isabel stood neglected in a corner."

"You have guessed right; I met Isabel in the street this morning, and I managed to insinuate a wish that she would refrain from dancing at Mrs. Agson's party, to-night. It was a first experiment in testing my power, but it succeeded perfectly; she is passionately fond of dancing, but she steadily refused all solicitations on the subject."

"And you rewarded her attention to your wishes by almost total neglect."

"That was part of my policy; she doubtless expected to be rewarded for her self-denial by a double portion of my attention; and had I been weak enough to bestow it, her forbearance would have been no sacrifice. As matters now stand, she has learned that I have power to afflict her, and that is a great point gained."

"So you expect to win her by wounding her—this might do in buffalo hunting, but will scarcely succeed in love making."

"Don't you see that I excite a new interest by awakening her apprehensions? She probably felt sure of my preference for her until this evening, and the doubts which my conduct has excited, will make her think of me until we meet again. A woman is easily managed by one who is allowed to engross her thoughts."

"Will you allow me to give my candid opinion of your scheme, Harry."

"Certainly, my dear fellow."

"I think it is a most selfish, cold-hearted, rascally method of trifling with a woman's feelings."

"You are complimentary; but n'importe; you are in the toils of a pretty girl, who tyrannizes over you without mercy, Tom, and I cannot hope to bring you to my way of thinking at present."

"Nor in future, I trust, Harry; it seems to me unprincipled."

"You are wrong, Tom; I mean to marry Isabel as soon as she is perfectly broken-in."

"And suppose she proves intractable."

"That will be sufficient proof of want of affection on her part, and of course I shall be the only sufferer."

"Well, you certainly have a cool and comfortable way of discussing affairs of the heart; but I do not envy you the power. When the feelings are seared as yours seem to be, they must have suffered frequent scathing; and I would not go through such an ordeal of fire, even to obtain the prize of insensibility."

With these words the young men parted—one to dream of his beautiful but coquettish lady-love, the other to speculate upon the effect which his unkindness had produced upon a gentle and loving heart.

Harry Walsingham was one of those 'men about town,' who are always to be met in gay society. He began his career by falling in love at twelve years of age, with his cousin of twenty, and from that time, until he had counted his thirtieth summer, he had been continually under the influence of some feverish dream. A bright smile, a soft eye, a sweet voice, a delicate form, a pretty foot, were each in turn sufficient to bewitch him for the time, and the case with which he became enchanted and disenchanted, seemed to him less the effect of his own fickleness than the result of his over estimation of the power of woman's spells. His handsome person and elegant manners made him always welcome in the circles of fashion, while his lucrative profession and rising reputation gave him interest in the eyes of prudent parents. He had met with so much success in society, that he had learned to think too highly of himself, as well as too humbly of his neighbors, and his opinion of woman had become more degrading and unjust, in proportion as he had received new proofs of their refined susceptibility of feeling.

He had been loved, fondly and truly, by more than one noble-hearted woman, but these things occurred at a period when he could not summon courage enough to resign his brilliant position for the comparatively uninteresting character of the married man, and he had coolly extricated himself from such dilemmas without difficulty. He had no faith in the stability of woman's feelings and could not be made to believe that agreeable flirtations, which were so pleasant while they lasted, and occasioned so little pain to him in their termination, were productive of more grief to the belle than to the beau. But he had now become wearied of his aimless and roving life. He wanted some one to minister to his whims, to study his comforts, to wait upon him more faithfully than a hireling, and he therefore decided to marry.

Isabel Forester was no heroine of romance—no creature of improbable perfection. She was a meek, quiet, tender girl, with faculties yet to be developed by circumstances, and warm affections, which, from childhood, had been lavished upon every thing, and every body round her. She was perfectly unsophisticated in feeling, and the idea of saying or doing any thing merely for effect, never entered her mind. Walsingham's experience in the world had made him master of the art of pleasing, and it is not surprising that he should soon have excited an interest in the bosom of an artless girl. She did not begin to speculate upon his motives for distinguishing her by his attentions—no true hearted woman ever thinks of such things, till they are suggested by some officious friend; nor did she once calculate her chances of matrimony—she was influenced too much by the impulses of feeling to be so fully awake to selfish interest.

She liked Walsingham, and was charmed with his adroit adaptation of himself to suit her tastes. She loved poetry, and he was an admirable reciter; she was a fine musician, and he had a decided taste if not a talent, for 'sweet sounds;' she was fond of reading, and his choice of books was excellent; in short, he left no means untried to convince her of the congeniality which existed between their minds. As soon as he was assured of her preference for him, (and a man of the world soon discovers this) he commenced his system of training. He did not at once presume to censure her, for this might have aroused her pride; but he insinuated his wishes, and Isabel, with the devotedness of a true woman, endeavored to mould herself to his will. He at first undertook to correct her taste in books; and to this Isabel submitted with the meek humility of one who was conscious of her mental inferiority. He then scrutinized with a critical eye her style of dress, and lauded a severe simplicity of attire, until Isabel banished gay colors, ribbons, and jewels, and assumed a garb of almost Quaker neatness. Her rich curls were braided back from her brow, her dresses were all selected from those grave sombre tints always so unbecoming in fresh youth, and an embroidered handkerchief, which she ventured to exhibit, after having heard a tirade against such follies from the lips of the sage Mr. Walsingham, cost her a night of sleeplessness and tears.

So far, Walsingham's scheme succeeded perfectly, but he determined to try still more severe experiments. His conduct on the evening before alluded to, was his first attempt, and what it cost Isabel may be best imagined by those who can remember the first awakening of distrust in the youthful and confiding heart. That Walsingham loved her, she could not doubt, for his looks, his manners, all disclosed his attachment, but the words which bind heart to heart in that contract, which the world holds to be only less irrefragable than the church's bond, had never yet been uttered. They were not affianced lovers, and therefore Isabel, though feeling herself wronged and outraged, knew she had no right to complain.—That night, Isabel's head pressed a sleepless pillow, but with the morning came a feeling of pride, and a sense of shame such as she had never before experienced.

For the first time in her life she had something to conceal, (alas! it is too often the first grief which teaches the first deception) and with a pale cheek, but calm brow, she took her accustomed seat in the drawing-room. At an earlier hour than usual, Walsingham made his appearance. He was prepared for sadness and reproaches, but Isabel's cold, proud demeanor, made him fear he had gone too far. He had no wish to lose his influence over the lady, for Isabel was an heiress, and in his anxiety to regain his power, he uttered those expressions of tenderness and love, which, once spoken, are never to be recalled. They had met with coldness and distrust, but they parted as betrothed lovers, and thus, in despite of his theories and his systems, Walsingham found himself, after all, the toy of natural impulses.

Notwithstanding his pleasure at having secured the lady and her fortune, Walsingham was seriously alarmed when he reflected upon the consequences of his precipitation. He fancied that Isabel would now assert her sovereignty, and he knew that the opinion of society would uphold her in claiming her right to his attentions. The situation of an engaged lover, compelled to dangle for ever at the side of his lady-love, about as useful to her as her reticule, yet as much in demand as if really essential to her hourly existence, had always struck him as supremely ridiculous, and even while secretly rejoicing in his success he determined to guard against any advantage which Isabel might hope from his weakness. His first step, therefore, was to enjoin the strictest secresy concerning their engagement, and when Isabel cheerfully acceded to a wish, which still seemed to her very unaccountable, he resumed his former habits of dictation and direction.

A woman will bear much from one she loves, so long as no doubt exists of his affection—so long as she is rewarded by a proper appreciation of her tenderness. Isabel felt a sort of meek wonder at Walsingham's exactions; she sometimes caught herself wishing that he was less difficult to please, and less fastidious in his ideas of womanly duties and womanly impulses, but the thought of paying no heed to his suggestions and counsels, never occurred to her as possible. She considered it her duty to begin at once the task of assimilation—to adapt herself immediately to the tastes of him who was to be her future companion through life, but she was scarcely prepared for so much self-denial as she was now called to practice. In the course of a very short time she found herself completely shut out from society, restricted to the coldest and most ceremonious intercourse with former friends, debarred the privilege of walking or talking with whom she pleased, forbidden to mingle in the dance—her modes of thinking and acting marked out for her, and her very impulses restrained or directed by the will of her lover.

Yet Isabel bore with all his caprices, for she truly loved him, and considered his whims rather as proofs of the jealous tenderness of his nature, or at the worst, but as slight infirmities of temper. There was no sacrifice, however great, which she would not willingly have made for him, but it can scarcely be wondered at if the thousand petty exactions which were constantly marring the quiet of her life should in the course of time, weary her, and perhaps suggest a doubt of the high-mindedness of one whose thoughts dwelt so much on trifling details.

Isabel had borne for months with Walsingham's freaks of coldness, his capricious devotion to others, his occasional outbreaks of anger, and his unreasonable control over her actions. But at length, circumstances, too trivial to be recorded, yet taken in connection, forming a chain of continued evidence not to be disputed, led her to suspect that his apparent caprice was the result of a systematic plan. At first the thought was too painful to be indulged for a moment, but distrust once admitted, was not to be repelled, and in sadness of spirit Isabel was compelled to admit the belief of her lover's selfishness. A conversation which she accidentally overheard, between Walsingham and his cousin, removed all doubts on the subject. She heard Walsingham congratulate himself on his success in training her; she heard herself spoken of as the tame, subdued, devoted creature who had nearly attained the requisite point of perfection, and from that moment resentment took the place of her relying love. She felt herself outraged and insulted; her affections had been used as fetters to bind her to a victor's car of triumph; she had been made the sport of man's selfishness; her heart had been as a sweet instrument in the hands of a cunning player, and every stop had been sounded, not in response to the voice of love, but in obedience to the will of a cold experimentalist. Isabel was a proud as well as true-hearted woman. She would not reproach Walsingham—she would not even ask an explanation, but with that quickness of feeling which is a woman's gravest error, as well as her sweetest charm, she concluded that he had never loved her. Once convinced of his object in guarding her with such jealous care,—once assured that it was less the tender reserve of affection than the selfish wish to rule, and Isabel became again her own mistress. The submission which love would exact through a long life of cheerful self-denial, was refused to cold, calculating tyranny.

Without one word of explanation or deprecation, Isabel returned to society, and resumed her former habits. Her voice was again heard in the cheerful song, her step was once more lightest in the dance, her beauty once more dazzled and delighted a circle of admiring worshippers. To Walsingham's fierce and angry remonstrances, she turned a deaf ear,—to his earnest professions she replied with a smile of incredulity—to his real anxiety of mind she gave not the slightest credence. Whatever regrets she felt, were hidden beneath a calm demeanor, or dissipated in the gay scenes of busy life, and Isabel proved, in progress of time as every proud woman must do when convinced that her heart has been given to one unworthy of its treasures, that she grieved less for the lover than for the love, which had passed away from her as the dew from the early rose. The youth of her heart was gone—she had learned her first lesson in disappointment, and for her the romance of her life was past forever.

Walsingham knew not how much he really loved Isabel until she was lost to him. In vain he endeavored to regain his influence over her—in vain he sought to convince her how entirely his happiness depended on her.

"You deceive yourself, Mr. Walsingham," was her cold reply; "I am not the person calculated to make you happy. Some Circassian beauty, who would feel honored in being permitted to be your slave would better suit one who uses affection but as a tool to ensnare the free will. Had you given me one honest feeling,—had you yielded to one true impulse while I was pouring out the fullness of my heart at your feet—had you been any other than the cold, calculating man of the world, which your conduct has since shown you, I might have forgiven you; but now, I would rather wed with the meanest clod that ever wore human form, than give my hand to one who could offer the spurious coin of false affection in exchange for woman's true and loving heart."

Walsingham thought long on Isabel's last words, and he remembered them with deeper bitterness when he afterwards beheld her the honored and apparently happy wife of one who had long loved her with a more unselfish and confiding tenderness. Years have passed since then but he has never yet found the creature worthy or willing to become his wife. He is now falling into the sear and yellow leaf, the weight of half a century lies heavy upon him, and all the skill of the perruquier, the dentist, sent his servant, John Knox, to the market-town, to put this letter in the post. On John Knox's arrival in town, he was hailed by the landlord of "The Crown and Anchor," who told him that there was a gentleman just arrived at his Inn, who had been making many inquiries after his master. Being informed that the gentleman was in the parlour, Knox went in to see him. On entering the room, he distinguished an elderly man, with a sharp, yellow cast of countenance, and a thin, spare body, dressed in a half mourning dark grey costume.

"I understand that you have been inquiring after my master, sir," said John Knox; "I am the servant of Mr. Aston."

"Oh! you are, are you?" said the old man, his eyes sparkling with joy. "Then I'll not detain you long," he continued, taking up his hat and cloak; "I want you to show me the way to his house."

"Very good, sir."

"And where is the house? Within twenty miles?"

"Oh, dear, yes, sir; scarcely half a mile distant."

"Then we can walk thither."

"Easily, sir."

"And you will show me the way?"

"Willingly, sir."

They started and walked on till they reached a glen with a parcel of green trees and a large black house in the centre.

"Can this be the house?" inquired the elderly gentleman.

"That is it, sir."

"What, in this lonely place? Among dwarf-osiers, in a stubble-field! Gadzooks! I love fatter pastures. The place has not charms enough for a priest."

"But for a poet, many, sir," replied John Knox, rolling his eyes about in his head like a duck in a thunder-storm, and like a man generally does when he thinks he has said a clever thing, and looks about at every person in the company for admiration. "And my missus is poetically given, sir," he rejoined.

They passed under a peach-tree and knocked at the door. A bay-myrtle on the window-sill gave odours richer, and a perfume sweeter, than any conservatory.

"This place is filled with objects enchanting both to the eye and smell," observed the elderly gentleman.

"The garden door is open, sir," cried out John Knox. "There are my master and missus sitting together on a bench in the arbour."

The elderly gentleman seemed struck by the spectacle, and stood still, for a few seconds, gazing hard at Walter Aston and his wife, and their lovely young daughter, who was leaning over the lap of her mother. Edith seemed vying with her daughter for preference in charms and allurements, like a blooming rose contending for beauty and fragrance with a delicate little jasmine.

"Go on, sir," said John Knox, looking hard at the musing old gentleman. "My master will be very glad to see you."

And so his master really was very glad to see the old gentleman, for, immediately as he perceived him, Walter flew towards him. They both threw themselves into each other's arms, embraced, and even shed tears. John Knox was stupified.

"Lord! Lord!" exclaimed the old gentleman, "who would have thought of this?"

"My father! my father!" exclaimed Aston, "how rejoiced I am to see you so unexpectedly! How surprised! And how long have you been in England, my father?"

It was then his father! Oh! how happy he was! He introduced him to his wife. They all three shed tears of joy. And they continued walking up and down the gravelled garden for hours and hours together, till the evening stars came out. The elder Aston had failed in all his speculations in New South Wales. But he was happy; his son was established in life, in comfort—in luxury, and in peace and joy.

"But, my son," said he, "I do not like this house of yours. Why not dispose of it, and purchase one like a fine country seat I saw, as I was travelling over the country hither from London? It was for sale. I stopped to see it."

"And what was the name of it?" inquired Walter Aston.

"Esdaile Court."

"Esdaile Court!" he exclaimed, with surprise. "What, then, has become of Mr. Richard Esdaile, the proprietor?"

"No one could tell me what had become of him. But I heard that he was so distressed in mind on account of his only daughter's unfortunate marriage, that he neglected his affairs till he became ruined. His house and lands are mortgaged beyond their value—now set up for sale, and he is reduced to beggary."

A loud scream here fell upon the ears of the father and the son. It had proceeded from the lips of Edith. She then fell into a hysterical fit, and afterwards fainted. The elder Mr. Aston knew not that she was the daughter of Mr. Richard Esdaile; he had only heard her spoken of as the daughter of a respectable country gentleman. His son now explained all to him, and added:

"I will do as you advise me. I will purchase Esdaile Court. It will be well worth whatever sum I give for it; for," he continued, with a smile on his lip, and a tear in his eye, "for the sake of a frolic, I will buy it for the purpose of restoring it to its rightful owner—the father of my wife."

He found no difficulty in purchasing the property of Mr. Richard Esdaile. He bought his house and grounds, and all his elegant household furniture, and all his elegant gallery of paintings—Del Pimbo, Da Vinci, Perugino, Claude Lorraine, the Caracci—and his beautiful carriage, and his splendid horses, and his extensive vinery, and his capacious wine-cellar. All were sold off under prime cost by Snob, Nob and Buggins. The property bought, the next difficulty was to find out the original proprietor, when this expedient was hit upon—to put an advertisement into the Times, at the top of the second column, thus:

"Richard E——, late of E—— Court. If this should meet your eye, pray communicate immediately with your distressed daughter at E—— Court. All that you have lost will be restored to you."

We do not know whether similar advertisements are always successful—but this was eminently so; for, at the close of the second day after its appearance in the newspaper, the gate which led into the garden at the back of the arbour, at Esdaile Court, was seen to open, and up the parterre which led to the house, came walking Mr. Richard Esdaile. As he was stepping upon the threshold, the first object of which he caught a glimpse was a pink silk dress. It was his daughter's. The next moment her fine figure was being clasped by his arms. A young man of noble appearance, and dressed in the garb of a gentleman, then made his appearance.

"I think you know my husband," said Edith to her father, and blushing slightly as she spoke.

Mr. Richard Esdaile inclined his head courteously to Walter Aston, who returned the obeisance.

"Let us retire into the drawing-room," said Walter.

They all three did so; and as Mr. Esdaile entered the apartment, he was much excited and considerably confused.

"Allow me to offer you a chair, sir," said Walter Aston.

The old gentleman sat down.

"I will recur to the past," said Walter Aston, after a pause, unpleasant as it may be, to make only one observation."

"Go on, sir," said Mr. Esdaile, in a faint tone of voice.

"If you forgive me for having married your daughter," then said Walter Aston, "I will restore to you this house, which I have recently purchased. I can easily afford to do so, for I have property elsewhere?"

Edith's father rose from his chair. He took Walter Aston's hand in his own and kissed it. He did not say a word, but he wept. At length, he broke a painful silence by observing—

"Unkind as my conduct has been to you and to my daughter, have you the generosity of soul not only to forgive me, but to make me your heir during your lifetime?"

"He has generosity of soul enough to do anything, my father," said Edith. "I have been happy with him—very happy."

"I believe you, my daughter; and so am I now. Ruin has moved me scarcely less than it has changed me. I think otherwise to what I once thought.—But you have always thought rightly, my daughter. Regardless of wealth and station, you have sought in the affections of the heart the purest of pleasures—those emotions which sway the soul. You have been blessed with happiness. I looked for enjoyment in the loftiest regions of society. To them alone I confined my view. I have been cursed with misery. Come to my arms, my children, and let me clasp you both to my heart at one and the same time."

It was all right—and they were all happy—and remained so for the remainder of their lives; or, if they did not, History, at least, does not say anything to the contrary.

THOSE EYES OF BLUE.

BY JOSEPH B. BUSSIER.

Those eyes of blue, those eyes of blue,
Dear Mary, dost thou ken the day,
When first their gentle power I knew?
'Twas in the merry month of May,
Where the sweet wild flowers grew,
That I, a willing captive bowed,
Submissive to those eyes of blue.

Those eyes of blue, those eyes of blue,
Where love and beauty ever dwell,
The diamond's light, the rainbow's hue,
Those orbs of beauty far excel;
Yet soft as fair Italia's skies,
The light that beams in Mary's eyes.

Those eyes of blue, those eyes of blue
How sweetly now, dear love, they shine!
The brightest jewels of Peru
Are dull beside those eyes of thine:
And they are dearer far to see,
For oh, they beam with love on me.

Those eyes of blue, those eyes of blue—
Oh! ever blessed be the hour,
When thou, my Mary, fondly true,
And blooming as a summer flower,
Confessed the love thy bosom knew,
And won me with those eyes of blue.

THE LAST TEAR I SHED.

BY ROBERT JOSSELYN.

The last tear I shed was the warm one that fell,
As I kissed thee, dear mother, and bade thee farewell;
When I saw the deep anguish impressed on thy face,
And felt, for the last time, a mother's embrace;
And heard thy choked accents, impassioned and wild,
"God bless thee, for ever! God bless thee my child!"

I thought of my boyhood—thy kindness to me,
When youngest and dearest, I sat on thy knee;
Of thy love to me ever so fondly expressed,
As I grew up to manhood, unconscious how blest;
Of thy praises when right, and thy chidings when wrong,
While wayward with passions unyielding and strong.

I thought of thy counsels, unheeded or spurned,
As mirth had enlivened or anger had burned;
And how, when by sickness all helpless I lay,
Thou didst nurse me and sooth me by night and by day;
How much I had been both thy sorrow and joy,
And my feelings o'erflowed, and I wept like a boy.

Years, years of endurance have vanished, and now
There is pain in my heart, there is care on my brow;
The visions of hope and of fancy are gone,
And cheerless I travel life's pathway alone;
Alone! aye, alone,—though some kind ones there be,
There are none here to love me—to love me like thee.

My mother, dear mother, cold-hearted they deem Thy offspring, but O, I am not what I seem;
Though calmly and tearless all changes I bear,
Could they look in my bosom, the feeling is there!
And now, sad and lonely, as memory recalls
Thy blessing at parting, again the tear falls.

I REMEMBER, I REMEMBER.

I remember, I remember,
The house where I was born,
The little window where the sun
Came peeping in at morn:
He never came a wink too soon,
Nor brought too long a day;
But now, I often wish the night
Had borne my breath away!

I remember, I remember,
The roses—red and white,
The violets and the lily-cups,
Those flowers made of light!
The lilacs where the robin built,
And where my brother set
The laburnum on his birth-day—
The tree is living yet!

I remember, I remember,
Where I was used to swing;
And thought the air must rush as fresh
To swallows on the wing:
My spirit flew in feathers then,
That is so heavy now,
And summer pools could hardly cool
The fever on my brow!

I remember, I remember,
The fir-trees dark and high;
I used to think their slender tops
Were close against the sky:
It was a childish ignorance,
But now 'tis little joy
To know I'm farther off from Heaven
Than when I was a boy.

VIOLA.

BY MRS. AMELIA B. WELBY.

She hath passed like a bird from the minstrel throng,
She has gone to the land where the lovely belong!
Her place is hushed by her lover's side,
Yet his heart is full of his fair young bride;
The hopes of his spirit are crushed and bowed,
As he thinks of his love in her long white shroud;
For the fragrant sighs of her perfumed breath,
Were kiss'd from her lips by his rival—Death.

Cold is her bosom, her thin white arms
All mutely crossed o'er its icy charms;
As she lies like a statue of Grecian art,
With a marbled brow and a cold hushed heart.
Her locks were bright, but their gloss is hid,
Her eye is sunk 'neath its waxen lid;
And thus she lies in her narrow hall—
Our fair young minstrel—the loved of all.

Light as a bird's were her springing feet,
Her heart as joyous—her song as sweet;
Yet never again shall the heart be stirr'd
With its glad wild songs like a singing bird.
Never again shall the strains be sung
That in sweetness dropped from her silver tongue;
The music is over, and Death's cold dart
Hath broke the spell of that free glad heart.

Often at eve when the breeze is still,
And the moon floats up by the distant hill,
As I wander alone 'mid the summer bowers,
And wreath my locks with the sweet wild flowers,
I will think of the time when she lingered there
With her mild blue eyes, and her long, fair hair;
I will treasure her name in my bosom-core—
But my heart is sad—I can sing no more.

HELEN SPENCER;

OR,

THE WIFE'S STRATAGEM.

BY "A LADY OF MARYLAND."

It was near the close of an autumnal day that a gentleman alighted from a travelling carriage, at the door of a large, gloomy-looking mansion, in one of the western counties of Maryland.

"Is your master better?" he inquired of the servant, whom the sound of his carriage wheels had attracted, and who now stood respectfully holding the door open for his entrance.

"Ah no, sir," the man answered, shaking his head sorrowfully, "he is going very fast. The Doctor thinks he can't live more than a few days. You are Mr. Spencer, sir?"

The stranger nodded, and the negro went on.

"I'm so glad you're come, sir, for master asks for you constantly; and it was only this morning that he said he could not die in peace without seeing you. Come, sir, shall I show you up to his room?"

"You had better let him know that I am here."

"I will, sir; and if you will walk into the parlour, I will send you something to eat."

"Do so," said Spencer, and entering the room indicated, he partook of the food which was presently brought him, and of which he was greatly in need, having travelled all day without either rest or refreshment.

In a few minutes the servant he had before seen returned, and conducted him to the chamber of the invalid. It was a large and gloomy apartment, and the single lamp which burned dimly in a remote corner scarcely enabled Spencer to discern the features of the sick man, shaded as they were by the heavy drapery of the bed on which he lay. The other occupants of the chamber consisted of a nurse, one or two colored domestics, and a female, whom Spencer supposed to be the daughter of his friend, as she was kneeling by the bedside, though in a position which entirely concealed her features. As his visitor advanced, the sick man extended his hand, and the heart of the youth thrilled as the feeble accents of that well-remembered voice fell on his ear, bidding him welcome, and speaking his name in tones of tenderness which sounded strangely from the lips of one so cold and stern as he had always seemed.—A whispered word to his daughter, and she rose from her knees, and making a signal to the attendants, they all withdrew, leaving the young stranger alone with the invalid. Then feebly pressing the hand he still held, the sufferer said—

"Sit near me, Edward. Thank Heaven, you are come; now I can die in peace. I have sent them all away, for I would speak with you alone, and I must be brief, for my hours are numbered." He paused a moment, and then resumed. "My death will deprive my daughter of her only efficient friend. Will you be her protector? There is in the world no one but yourself to whom I can confide her."

Edward bowed his head. "I will be to her all that the firmest friend, the most devoted brother, could be."

But the old man interrupted him, saying, in an impatient tone—

"You do not understand me. Years ago, your father and myself planned the union of our children. Are you willing, now, to ratify the engagement he formed for you? Will you make Helen your wife, and render my last hours happy?"

He had hitherto spoken rapidly, though with evident effort, and he now sunk back completely exhausted, with his glazed eyes still fixed upon the youth, in eager expection of his answer. The situation of the young man was extremely embarrassing. It was painful to refuse the request of a dying man; of one, too, who had saved his father from ruin and disgrace, and had been the friend and patron of his own boyhood. On the other hand, it was repugnant to every feeling of a mind so refined and delicate as his to receive as his wife one who was thus forced, as it were, upon his acceptance, whom he had never seen since the days of childhood, and of whom he retained no recollection corresponding at all with the exquisite ideal which his fervent imagination delighted to pourtray as the companion of his future life. As these conflicting thoughts passed through his mind, they almost deprived him of the power of replying; and the invalid, perceiving that he hesitated, exclaimed, with a vehemence which threatened to loose the feeble hold he still held on existence—

"Speak, boy! This is no time for trifling. Will you comply with your father's wishes, or will you give me another proof that neither truth nor gratitude is to be found among men?"

"But your daughter?" said Edward, a faint hope rising in his heart that the young lady would object to this hurried marriage. "Can she consent to unite herself to one of whom she can retain no memory?"

"She can—she has consented. She has long been aware of my wishes on this subject, and is prepared to obey them. The arrangements for your immediate marriage are all made. Have they your concurrence?"

Edward replied only by a gesture of assent. He could not speak; but the old man seemed well satisfied, for he pressed his hand, and in a feeble but earnest voice called him his son, and bade God bless him. Then requesting him to ring for his attendants, he dismissed him for the night.

Notwithstanding the agitating scene through which he had lately passed, Edward Spencer slept soundly, and it was with some difficulty that he was roused about day-break the next morning, with the intelligence that Mr. Stanley was dying, and desired to see him immediately. Hastily dressing himself, he proceeded to the apartment of the invalid, whose appearance had changed fearfully since the preceding night. His daughter knelt by the bed, her face buried in the covering, endeavoring to stifle the convulsive sobs which seemed to agitate her whole frame. On the other side stood a clergyman in his robes, and near him a medical man sat watching with grave and anxious looks the labored breathings of his patient. Edward bent over the bed and bowed his head in reply to the scarcely articulated words which reached his ear. The physician assisted Helen to rise, and her father placing her hand in that of the young man, signed to the minister, who advanced and read in low and solemn tones the marriage ceremony. It was soon concluded, and the wedded pair knelt to receive the blessing of their dying parent. It seemed as though the spirit of the father lingered only to see its last wishes fulfilled, for after the few words of benediction which he pronounced as his feeble hands rested on the heads of his children, Mr. Stanley spoke no more, and ere the morning sun had penetrated the gloomy chamber, his soul had left its earthly tenement.

A few days after these events, Edward Spencer addressed the following letter to his friend, Francis Clifton, Esq.

"My dear Clifton:—I have been married now almost a week. I see your stare of surprise and incredulity. Nevertheless, what I tell you is true.—But do not, I pray you, congratulate, or as the phrase is, wish me joy on the occasion, for joy and I were never such utter strangers to each other as now. From my very soul I loathe the chains which bind me, and envy the poorest peasant who is compelled to earn his daily bread by the sweat of his brow, but who is unfettered and free to follow the dictates of his feelings. But that you may understand my position, I must make you acquainted with a part of my family history to which, as yet, you are a stranger. You know that my father was a lawyer, and that he enjoyed a lucrative practice and considerable eminence in his profession. Unfortunately, he was addicted to gaming, and having indulged this propensity for several years, he was not only stripped of his own fortune, but was induced by the hope of retrieving his losses, to stake considerable sums of money belonging to his clients. Ill fortune still pursued him, and these too were lost, and my unhappy parent, unable to face the ruin and disgrace which seemed inevitable, yielded to despair, and was actually meditating the means of self-destruction, when Mr. Stanley, one of the persons whose trust he had betrayed, and who had by some means become aware of the transaction, interposed to save him.—He was wealthy, and he not only forgave the injury he had himself sustained, but advanced money to replace the large sums which had been abstracted from others, who might have proved less lenient than himself. In return, he required only from my father to refrain in future from the fatal vice by which he had been so nearly ruined—a promise which was readily given and strictly adhered to. I was, at this time, about fourteen, and in his frequent visits to our house Mr. Stanley had formed an attachment for me, such as men, who have no boys themselves, sometimes conceive for the sons of their friends.

"He was himself a widower, with one child, a girl, at that time about eight years old. Her mother, the daughter of a family of some distinction in Philadelphia, had incurred the displeasure of her friends by forming what they considered a degrading alliance, for Mr. Stanley was of very humble origin. He was a self-made man, and was, as such men usually are, of a lofty, independent character, rather eccentric habits and somewhat unpolished manners, though full of generous and kindly feelings. He loved and cherished his young wife with the most devoted tenderness, but the displeasure of her parents weighed heavily on her spirits, and she died in little more than a year after her marriage, leaving an infant only a few months old. Her death was deeply mourned by her husband, and attributing it solely to the conduct of her relatives, he rejected all their overtures of reconciliation, refused to permit them to see his child; and, soon after his bereavement, removed to Maryland. Here his acquaintance with my family commenced, and after the signal service he rendered my father, an intimacy was formed between them which had a most beneficial effect on the character of my parent, and was only interrupted by his death, which occurred while he was still in the prime of life, and soon after his marriage with a young and very lovely woman.

"Mr. Stanley had been named by my father as his executor, and my sole guardian. He immediately assumed the management of our affairs, and, by his exertions, a comfortable independence was secured to the widow and her infant daughter. I was devotedly attached to my beautiful step-mother, and I well remember the bitter grief with which I parted from her and my young sister, and accompanied Mr. Stanley to the school he had selected for me. As Mrs. Spencer removed soon after to her former residence near Philadelphia, my vacations were all passed in the family of my guardian, and to me they appeared inconceivably dull and tedious. I had no companions, for the only young person in the house, beside myself, was Helen Stanley, and she was a mere child, and in my view a very unattractive one. She was shy and si ent, and I made no attempt to overcome her reserve, but used to sit and contrast in my own mind her great black eyes and sallow cheeks, and her demure and sullen manner with the sparkling orbs, glowing complexion and untiring playfulness of my little sister, and conclude that the latter, though but an infant, was far the more desirable companion. I was heartily rejoiced when my school days were over, and I was entered at one of our northern colleges. Thenceforth all the time I could spare from my studies were spent in the society of my step-mother, and from the constant contemplation of her delicate beauty, her graceful and polished manners, and the varied accomplishments of her mind, my ideas in regard to women became in the highest degree refined and fastidious. How often has my glowing imagination delighted to picture the being who was to be the partner of my future life! A being all grace, and beauty, and delicacy, and tenderness: yet endued with a mind of masculine strength and energy. Heigh ho! from henceforth I forswear all day dreams, for, young as I am, I have lived to see their vanity.

"But to my story. I had an ardent desire to make the tour of Europe, and when my collegiate course was completed, I wrote to my guardian, acquainting him with my wishes. I was anxiously awaiting his reply, when I received a letter informing me that he was at the point of death, and desired to see me on business of the utmost importance. Of course I set off immediately, and rested neither night nor day till I reached his residence.

"I found Mr. Stanley extremely ill, but judge of my horror and consternation, when he told me that years ago he and my father had planned the union of Helen and myself, and that he could not die in peace till he saw the ceremony performed, which would secure a protector to his daughter. I did not at first comprehend him, and I assured him that I would be a brother to Miss Stanley. But he interrupted me impatiently, and demanded to know whether or not I would redeem my father's plighted word. I know not what I answered, but something which he construed into an assent, for as he bade me good night, he blessed me and called me his son.

"In future I shall believe all the stories they tell of men who sleep soundly on the eve of execution, for with a forced marriage (a fate scarcely less dreadful than a felon's death, impending over me, I was so overcome by the fatigue of my journey, that as soon as I retired I fell into a deep sleep, from which I was roused about day-break, with the information that Mr. Stanley was dying. I hastened to his apartment, where I found Miss Stanley and a clergyman, waiting to perform the marriage ceremony. I had no alternative but to submit, for I could not remonstrate with a man in the agonies of death, and a few minutes before Mr. Stanley breathed his last, I became the husband of his daughter.

"You are aware now, my dear Frank, of the causes by which I have been placed in my present most painful position, but my feelings I cannot describe. I cannot paint the dreadful heart sickness which seizes me when I look forward to long years passed in a dull and cheerless home, unsoothed by sympathy, unblessed with affection;—I, who never had a dream of happiness unconnected with the dear ties of domestic life. Of a truth the sins of parents are visited upon their children. Had my father never yielded to the seductions of vice, he had not incurred obligations, to discharge which his son has been compelled to sacrifice all that gives value to existence. But it is idle to complain—the past cannot be recalled.

"Of Helen I can tell you nothing. I had not seen her since she was twelve years old, till we met at her father's bed-side in the dim twilight of early morning. Since then our intercourse has been limited to a few brief interviews, but so far as I can judge, she still retains the same ungracious manner, with the dull black eyes and sallow complexion, which used to disgust me so in the days of my boyhood.—She is very young, scarcely more than fifteen, and time may improve her appearance; but I can never love her, for independently of her want of personal grace and beauty, she must lack delicacy, refinement and correct principle, or she could not, even to please her father, consent to wed a man of whom she knew nothing, and who had never even pretended to regard her with affection. I am, I believe, incapable of treating any female with harshness. Helen may therefore expect in me a kind protector, and a faithful steward of her immense wealth. This is all I can promise her. But I have written till my head aches, and I must try if the fresh air will relieve it. Would that the wounds of the heart were as easily medicined. Adieu, I shall be compelled to go to ——— to-morrow on business, and shall be detained some days. On my return, I hope to find a letter from you. Direct to "The Elms," ——— county.

"Yours &c., EDWARD SPENCER."

As he concluded this long epistle, Spencer folded it carelessly, and without either sealing or directing it, threw it among some other papers on the table, and left the apartment. An hour after, as he passed the windows, he thought he heard a sound as of some one weeping violently. In great alarm he re-entered the house, and proceeded directly to the library. It was vacant as he had left it, and concluding that he had been mistaken, he sealed and directed his letter, and having despatched it by a servant to the nearest post office, he retired to his chamber to prepare for his intended journey.

The business on which Edward Spencer had been obliged to visit ——— was not arranged so speedily as he expected, and it was nearly two weeks before the affair was put in such a train as would permit him to return to "The Elms." On his arrival he was surprised to learn that Helen was absent. She had been gone, the housekeeper said, more than a week: having received a letter on important business, which she was obliged to answer in person.

"And where has she gone?" asked Edward, in utter amazement, at this singular proceeding.

"She did not tell me, sir. But she left a letter for you, which she said would explain every thing to your satisfaction."

"Then pray get it for me immediately."

"I will, sir," and bustling out of the room, the good woman presently returned with a letter which Spencer hastily tore open, and read as follows:

"The bonds which have been imposed upon us are irksome and painful to us both. You will not therefore blame me for having adopted the only method I could devise to render them less galling to your feelings as well as to my own. I know that there is another mode by which our enforced marriage can be more effectually annulled, and should you see proper to resort to that, I shall not oppose you. If, however, you do not think fit to employ legal measures to free you from the tie which binds you, (and I confess I shrink from the public exposure which such a procedure must involve,) you need be under no apprehension that you will ever be troubled by one, who, though she has been forced by circumstances into a position which degrades her in her own eyes, has yet sufficient delicacy and self respect to prevent her intruding her society on him who cannot regard her with other feelings than those of dislike and contempt. I beg that you will feel no uneasiness on my account. I am not without friends, and till I reach them I shall be safe under the protection of an humble but respectable friend. I am amply provided with means, and have made arrangements by which the income of my mother's fortune (settled on me some years before my father's death,) will be transmitted to me. Of the remainder of the estate I wish you to dispose as you think best. I have no use for it, nor ever shall have, and it will gratify me if you will consider it absolutely your own. I do not suppose you will make any effort to trace me; but if you should, it will be in vain. Of one thing be assured: I will never assume the title of your wife or intrude myself on your presence except it be at your own desire, and from a conviction that the feelings with which you now regard me are exchanged for those of kindness and affection; and as that may never be, I bid you farewell forever.

HELEN."

It would be difficult to describe the feelings of the young husband as he read this singular letter. At first he experienced a sensation of relief, but this was momentary, and was quickly succeeded by other feelings of a more painful nature. It was evident that he had mistaken the character of his wife.

"She is not after all," he mentally ejaculated, "the mere child I supposed her to be. She is not destitute of feeling and delicacy. Had she remained, I might perhaps have learned to love her."

His conscience smote him as he thought of the manner in which he had spoken of her in his letter to Clifton, and as he recalled the sounds of distress, which he fancied he had heard issue from the room where he had left that letter exposed and open, it occurred to him that she had perhaps read it, and that the perusal of it had driven her forth a wanderer from her father's house. But this idea was too painful to be endured for an instant, and hastily dismissing it, he turned his thoughts to the consideration of what his own conduct should be under the trying circumstances in which he found himself placed.—The next day he sought the lawyer who had formerly transacted business for Mr. Stanley, and having empowered him to act as his agent in the management of the estate, he departed from the place which had been so fatal to his happiness. Leaving the servants to suppose he had gone to rejoin their young lady, he proceeded at once to the residence of his step-mother, hoping to receive from her consolation and sympathy, if not advice and assistance.

"Really, my dear Edward," said Mrs. Spencer at the close of a long conversation with her step-son, "I know not how to advise you. I see all the difficulties of your position, and I can discern only one mode by which you can be extricated from them, and that is one which your regard for the memory of Mr. Stanley and delicacy towards his daughter will, I know, render you averse to adopt."

"It is one, mother, which I have no right to resort to. I deeply feel that much of my misery I owe to my own weakness. In a matter of this kind I ought not to have yielded to the entreaties even of a dying man. Had I continued firm in my refusal to consent to this absurd marriage, Helen and I might both have been happy: but as I weakly consented to form the tie, I cannot now take any measures to be released from it. Should Helen wish for a divorce, I will most gladly aid her efforts to obtain one: but any proposition of the kind must come from her."

"Then why not resume your former intention of visiting Europe? It will at least serve to divert your mind, and during your absence something may occur to relieve your perplexities. If Helen has friends, as she says, they will doubtless advise her to free herself from an union which promises nothing but misery. Any steps which may be taken to effect this object must of necessity be made public, and I will take care to keep you advised on the subject."

Ten days from the time this conversation took place, Edward Spencer sailed for England.

Four years had rolled by. Four years! how much of joy and grief, of hope and despair, of agony too intense for endurance, of bliss too exquisite for expression, may be comprised in the life of one individual in the brief space of four years! And even when the changeful tide of human affairs brings with it no crushing griefs, no withering disappointments, time leaves its footprints in our hearts. Four years had passed, and Edward Spencer returned to his native land an altered man. The bright visions of his boyhood, the glowing hopes of his youth, had faded forever. But in their stead he had acquired a capability of endurance, a firmness of character which enabled him to meet the stern realities of life, and to perform without shrinking the duties they enjoined. He was no longer the imaginative, dreamy boy, but the reflecting, resolute man.

His first visit of course was to his mother, and his first inquiry was of Helen. Mrs. Spencer could tell him nothing of her. His situation was then unchanged, but the passionate despair with which he once regarded it, had yielded to the influence of reason.

"I have determined," he said, in answer to Mrs. Spencer's inquiries, "on the course proper for me to pursue. I will if possible find Helen. Perhaps her views, like mine, have changed, and she will be content to seek for happiness in the discharge of duty, and in the friendship and esteem which I shall cultivate for her. If not, I will urge her to join me in an immediate application for a divorce. And now, my dear mother, let us dismiss this painful subject. Where is Emily? I suppose she is so much grown that I shall hardly recognise her."

"She is in the music room. I will send for her."

"No, do not: I will find her myself."

Mrs. Spencer seemed about to speak, but without observing it, Edward left the apartment in search of his sister. As he approached the music room, he heard the tones of a harp, accompanied by a voice so exquisite, that he involuntarily paused to listen. Again and again the melodious strains thrilled upon his ear, and it was not till the song was finished, and its last echo died away, that he moved from his position. As he entered the room, the first object which met his view was the fair musician. She was leaning upon her harp, and one beautiful hand still lingered amid its strings. A single glance at the graceful figure before him, with its bent head wreathed with bands of glossy, dark hair, convinced Edward it was not his sister; and in some confusion he checked the fond words which were issuing from his lips. The lady raised her eyes, and though a deep blush suffused her countenance, she received with perfect ease the embarrassed apology of our hero.

"Miss Spencer," she said, "has just left the room. I will let her know you are here;" and with a slight but graceful curtsey, she withdrew.

"How long has Miss Ashton been your governess, Emily?" said Spencer, as a few weeks after his arrival he sat with his young sister on a sofa in the music room.

"Almost a year. She was very young when she first came to us. Isn't she beautiful? And so good, and gentle, and affectionate! I don't think we shall ever part with her, for mamma is as fond of her almost as she is of me, and if I did not love her so very dearly, I should be quite jealous of her."

"Where did your mother meet with her?"

"Somewhere in Philadelphia. She is, I believe, an orphan, and of good family. When she first came here, she was very melancholy, but now she seems quite happy. Here she comes, by the bye, and I must leave her to entertain you, while I practise this long and difficult lesson;" and as Miss Ashton entered the room, Emily seated herself at the piano, and her noisy practising soon drove her companions forth to wander amid the lovely scenes which surrounded them in the glorious light of an autumnal sunset. Ah, those lonely rambles! How sweet they are, and yet how full of peril to young hearts! But Edward Spencer had outlived his youthful feelings. So at least he deemed, and therefore without a thought of danger he lingered by the side of that fair girl, and listened day by day to the tones of her sweet voice, and met the eloquent glance of the soft dark eyes, which at his approach beamed with a brighter lustre, till he forgot his purpose of seeking his lost bride, and though he did not cease to remember the tie which bound him, what was there in that to prevent the indulgence of a friendship which rendered him so happy, and which was so far removed from every warmer sentiment?

It was midnight—and Edward Spencer sat alone in his apartment. His face was bowed upon his hands, and his features bore traces of the fierce conflict of feelings which struggled in his breast. Tenderness, and remorse, and despair were there, for the veil had fallen from his eyes, and he knew that it was not friendship he felt for Rose Ashton; but love, the deep, concentrated love of manhood. Alas! he had confided too much in his own strength, and even when convinced of the nature of his feelings, though daily purposing to fly, he still lingered, till now not only his own peace, but the happiness of that innocent girl, must be the sacrifice of his weakness. She loved him. That very day she had betrayed her attachment, and he, yielding to the wild impulse of his heart, had whispered in her pure ear words of passionate tenderness, which he would give worlds to recall. And now, even at this moment, there lay on the table before him, (he knew not how it came there,) a letter from his long forgotten wife, praying to be received to his heart, and that he would fulfil the vow he made at her father's death-bed, to love and cherish her as his wife. Alas, how vain was such a prayer! But he would at least meet her as she desired—he would tell her all—and then, if she required it, he would immolate every hope of happiness upon the altar of duty. These reflections occupied him the whole of that miserable night, and the next day, shrinking from an encounter with the innocent victim of his folly, he remained in his chamber till the hour appointed for his interview with Helen. It was twilight as he bent his steps toward the little summer house which she had named in her note as the place of meeting. It was strange that she should have selected such a spot; but without pausing to reflect on this, Spencer entered the little building. Helen was already there—her figure enveloped in a cloak, the hood of which was drawn over her face. She did not rise as he entered, but extending her hand, motioned him to a seat near her. A momentary silence ensued—but the interview was too painful to be protracted, and Edward forced himself to speak. He told her all—his repugnance to their union—his feelings when she left him—the determination he had made to seek her—and the love for another which had rendered him forgetful of that purpose. Helen was violently agitated while he was speaking, and her voice was broken by sobs, as she answered:

"I thought that you had learned to love me. Did you not tell me so?"

There was something strangely familiar in that voice, faint and low as its accents were, and Spencer started forward. Concealment was no longer possible. Helen threw off her cloak—the light fell upon her features—and as her husband clasped to his heart the object of his passionate love, she whispered in his ear:

"Did I not tell you that I would not claim to be your wife, till you had learned to love me? Have I kept my promise?"

"Is it possible! Rose! Helen! My own sweet wife!"

And bewildered with the transition from despair to perfect happiness, Spencer could only reply by kissing off the tears which fell like summer rain over the beautiful face that rested on his bosom.

"And now tell me how you have so long contrived to cheat me out of my happiness."

"Must I begin at the very beginning, and tell you all?"

"Yes, all—every thing."

"Well then—I have loved you all my life, even when in our childish days you looked with such disgust upon my sallow face and black eyes, and the sullen manner of which you complained was but the bashful shyness of a heart conscious of feelings beyond its years, and which it had not the power to express. From my earliest recollection I knew that we were designed for each other, and I never dreamed that you could regard me with other feelings than those of affection. Hence when my father, in his illness, urged our immediate marriage, I did not object to it, and when you came, and the ceremony took place, my mind was too painfully occupied by my parent's situation, to observe your manner. Several days after, in seeking for a paper I wanted, I opened by accident your letter to Mr. Clifton. I was about to re-fold it, when my own name caught my eye. The temptation was irresistible. I read it through, and the misery it inflicted was an ample punishment for my curiosity. I heard you pause at the window of the library, and fearful of being discovered, I hurried to my own apartments. That night was spent in devising plans for my future conduct; and as soon as you left home in the morning, I prepared to execute them. Through the agency of old Elsie Gray, (who had been the faithful attendant of my mother, from the days of her childhood, and who, since her death, had lived in our family as a friend, rather than a domestic,) my arrangements were quickly made, and while the servants supposed my absence to be caused by important business, requiring my personal attention, I was journeying with my humble friend to Philadelphia, in search of my maternal relatives. I found my mother's sister, the only remaining member of the family, a widow in easy circumstances, and without children. She gladly received the orphan child of a sister whose early death she had bitterly mourned, and at her request I became a member of her family, and relinquished my own name to adopt that of her only daughter, who had died a few months before. Means of instruction in all the elegant branches of education were procured for me, and in each my progress was rapid, for mine was a labour of love, and was cheered by the hope, which had never quite forsaken me, that I might yet win the heart of him whom I had never ceased to love, though he had scornfully rejected me. In the mean time, my health, which had hitherto been delicate, improved. The sallow tint left my cheek, and was succeeded by the rich glow of youth and health. My face filled up, and my eyes no longer appeared unnaturally large. My person altered, and in two years my whole appearance was so much changed, that I should scarcely have been recognized by the most intimate associate of my early days. I had been nearly three years in Philadelphia, when accident introduced me to your step-mother. I was delighted at meeting one whom I knew you regarded with esteem and affection, and I left no means untried to win her regard. I was not unsuccessful; and when at the death of my aunt, and poor old Elsie, I was left without a protector, Mrs. Spencer received me into her house as the governess of her daughter. I could not bear to take advantage of her kindness, by suffering her to continue in ignorance of my real name, and connection with her family. I told her all, and in return for my confidence, she entered warmly into my feelings, and promised to aid me in my designs upon the heart of my husband. Most impatiently we waited your return from Europe—and, and—you know all the rest."

THE LAMENT

OF THE WIDOWED INEBRIATE.

BY DUBANNE.

I'm thinking on thy smile, Mary—
Thy bright and trusting smile—
In the morning of our youth and love,
Ere sorrow came—or guile;
When thine arms were twined about my neck,
And mine eyes looked into thine,
And the heart that throbbed for me alone,
Was nestling close to mine!

I see full many a smile, Mary,
On young lips beaming bright;
And many an eye of light and love
Is flashing in my sight:
But the smile is not for my poor heart,
And the eye is strange to me,
And a loneliness comes over my soul
When its memory turns to thee!

I'm thinking on the night, Mary,
The night of grief and shame,
When with drunken ravings on my lips,
To thee I homeward came;
O, the tear was in thine earnest eye,
And thy bosom wildly heaved,
Yet a smile of love was on thy cheek,
Though the heart was sorely grieved.

But the smile soon left thy lips, Mary,
And thine eye grew dim and sad;
For the tempter lured my steps from thee,
And the tempter drove me mad;
From thy cheek the roses quickly fled,
And thy ringing laugh was gone,
Yet thy heart still fondly clung to me,
And still kept trusting on.

O, my words were harsh to thee, Mary,
For the wine cup made me wild,
And I chid thee when thine eyes were sad,
And I cursed thee when they smiled.
God knows I loved thee then,
But the fire was in my brain,
And the curse of drink was in my heart,
To make my love a bane.

'Twas a pleasant home of ours, Mary,
In the spring-time of our life,
When I looked upon thy sunny face,
And proudly called thee, wife—
And 'twas pleasant when our children played
Before our cottage door;
But the children sleep with thee, Mary—
I ne'er shall see them more!

Thou'rt resting in the church-yard, now,
And no stone is at thy head;
But the sexton knows a drunkard's wife
Sleeps in that lowly bed;
And he says the hand of God, Mary,
Will fall with crushing weight
On the wretch who brought thy gentle life
To its untimely fate.

But he knows not of the broken heart
I bear within my breast,
Nor the heavy load of vain remorse,
That will not let me rest;
He knows not of the sleepless nights,
When, dreaming of thy love,
I seem to see thine angel eyes
Look coldly from above.

I have raised the wine cup in my hand,
And the wildest strains I've sung,
Till with the laugh of drunken mirth
The echoing air has rung;
But a pale and sorrowing face looked out
From the glittering cup on me,
And a trembling whisper I have heard
That I fancied breathed by thee.

Thou art slumbering in the peaceful grave,
And thy sleep is dreamless now,
But the seal of an undying grief
Is on thy mourner's brow;
And my heart is chill as thine, Mary,
For the joys of life have fled,
And I long to lay my aching breast
With the cold and silent dead.

THE PERFECT WIFE

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"When a man makes choice of a wife——"

"He takes to himself a blessing or a curse."

"Yes; I suppose that is the real truth. A woman has it in her power to make a man comparatively happy or miserable."

"Not only comparatively, but really so."

"Of that there may be some doubt, except in very extraordinary instances. A man himself does much toward determining the quality of his wife's influence upon him."

"No doubt he does something. But a right-minded woman, who truly loves her husband, can make all at home bright with sunshine; while a selfish, discontented woman, will bring clouds over the clearest sky. Somehow or other I can hardly define the reason that there are so few wives who at all appreciate the trials which their husbands have to undergo in their struggles with the world, or who seem to think that, after coming home chafed, perhaps, and fretted from irritating contact with selfish men around them, they need soothing quiet and tender ministrations, such as only a wife can give. Yet, so far as my observation goes, but few husbands are strengthened at home for the renewed struggles of the next day. The wife has her own troubles and domestic distractions to worry her mind, and instead of reflecting that these are trifles compared to what her husband has to encounter, and from which he has retired dispirited, it may be, and worn down, dins them in his ears, and frets upon her little stage, until the poor man feels that life has not a single quiet spot of repose in all its dreary desert. A certain writer, speaking on this subject, says, most truly:—'No spirit can long resist bad domestic influences. Man is strong, but his heart is not adamant. He delights in chterprise and action—but to sustain him, he needs a tranquil mind and a whole heart. He expends his moral force in the conflicts of the world: His feelings are daily lacerated to the utmost point of endurance by perpetual collision, irritation and disappointment. To recover his equanimity and composure, HOME must be to him a place of repose, of peace, of cheerfulness, of comfort, and his soul renews its strength, and again goes forth with fresh vigor, to encounter the labor and troubles of the world. But if at home he finds no rest, and there is met by a bad temper, sullenness or gloom—or is assailed by discontentment, by complaint or reproach, the heart breaks, the spirits are crushed, hope vanishes, and the man sinks into total despair.' Alas, alas! how many a spirit is thus broken! I could point to a dozen cases within the narrow circle of my own observation. For one, when I marry, it will be after I have scanned the habits, feelings and character of the woman I choose with microscopic closeness."

"All right, of course. But do you expect to find a wife any more perfect as a woman than you are as a man?"

"I expect to find a wife who will love me. That ought to cover the whole ground."

"It ought to do so, certainly, and it would, if women were as perfect now as when created. But they, as well as we, are not in the order of their creation. If we had no moral perversions, we should not be irritated and disappointed in our intercourse with the world, and should not, therefore, come home with exhausted strength, to recruit ourselves for a fresh struggle. Nor would women, were they not also morally perverted, fret as you say, 'upon their little stage,' and meet their husbands at times in a mood as little conducive to domestic felicity as that brought home to them by their very patient and loving lords."

This conversation took place between two young men who were much together, and between whom a warm friendship existed. They usually talked to each other with freedom and familiarity. The name of one was Belding. He it was who looked for perfection in a wife. The other, named Carson, had clearer views on all subjects than his friend. His regard for and consideration of others was higher.—He looked more to his duty of striving to bless, than to himself as a recipient of everything. Each had, unacknowledged to the other, made choice of a wife, provided the maiden so chosen did not object to the selection. In making this choice, each had been governed by his ruling affections. Belding sought a perfect character, and turned from one and another successively, until he had found a woman who seemed almost faultless. Her features were regular and beautiful, her face calm, her voice even. She never exhibited strong emotions or betrayed any weaknesses. Clara Lyon was, in the eyes of her lover, a perfect woman.

Carson, on the other hand, did not expect a faultless wife. He did not ask how far the woman he chose would be able to lay aside all thought of herself and consider only him; but rather looked right to her heart, and sought to determine its quality—to see if he could love her, and if she were capable of loving him. This determined, natural perversions of character were next observed. But the true heart, the upright will, the loving, confiding disposition of Anna Williams, over-balanced all these.

"She shall be mine. We will love each other, bear with each other, and help each other along the rough paths of life's weary pilgrimage," he said, with a warm glow about his heart.

The maiden gave consent. Marriage soon followed. The friends began a new life. They had taken to themselves, in the language of Belding, a blessing or a curse! Let us see.

Conscious defect of character, when accompanied by pride and a love of approbation, leads to the assumption of an artificial exterior, which is opposite to the real internal. Clara Lyon was naturally impatient; this led her to assume a uniform calmness of manner. She modulated her tone of voice, and controlled the muscles of her face, without really reflecting that she was, by so doing, only accumulating her natural defect and perverseness within, instead of correcting them and letting them pass off. Little things fretted her; but pride, not principle, made her conceal all this. She hid her defects, instead of fighting against and expelling them.

A man of truer discernment than Belding would have soon detected all this. But his false views had taken from him the faculty of close discrimination.

For a few months everything went on pleasantly enough. Home was a sweet spot to the young husband. His wife was ever ready to greet him with smiles. All was sunshine. But, in the nature of things, this could not last. Little and by little Belding's eyes were opened, and, to his surprise and chagrin, he saw that Clara was not the faultless creature he had supposed. An impatient temper had more than once showed itself; also fretfulness. Things did not always go on right at home. Domestics were careless, wasteful, irregular, indifferent; or possessed of other annoying faults. Having no orderly habits herself, and possessing no firmness and decision of character, Clara permitted these things to fret her sorely.

One day, about six months after their marriage, Belding suffered a good deal of anxiety on account of business matters that did not go on right. An operation that promised fairly had turned out disastrously. A creditor who owed him two thousand dollars had failed; and two or three other things occurred to disturb his mind. At dinner-time he was silent and thoughtful; nor did his wife seem inclined for conversation. During the afternoon he was closely engaged in adjusting several accounts. As the day began to close in, he shut the books, over which he had been toiling, and leaned his head, with a feeling of sadness, upon his hand. He felt oppressed and dispirited. The profits of a whole year had been swept away; and, in the mood he then was, he suffered doubt as to the ultimate success of business to steal over his mind.

In this unhappy frame he turned his steps homeward, with a feeling such as the worn-out mariner may be supposed to have on approaching a pleasant port. The thoughts of its quiet repose, and of the smiling angel who made all bright there with her presence, warmed his bosom.

"Away these gloomy thoughts, and this sad countenance," he said, as he approached his door. "Let not my presence bring with it a shadow."

The dinner, it so happened, had been badly cooked that day. Mrs. Belding had complained of this to the cook before it was served, and the cook replied with ill-concealed anger. After her husband, whose manner at the table she attributed to the badly served meal, had gone out, Clara went into the kitchen and scolded the cook roundly for her carelessness, and in so doing evinced a good share of ill-regulated temper. The lady of the culinary department had as much spirit as her mistress, and retorted coarsely. She was told that she might quit on the instant. A demand for her wages followed promptly; they were paid, and Mrs. Belding was without a cook.

"Was ever a woman so tried?" she exclaimed, on retiring to her chamber and shutting herself in. A good crying spell followed. After this came thoughts of the troubles that were to follow. She knew enough of the character of the chambermaid to know that she would at once object to going into the kitchen, even as a temporary measure, until a new cook could be found. She could not do the cooking herself, and the meals must be got ready. To add to the uncomfortableness of her situation, the excitement of mind under which she was laboring brought on a nervous headache, the effect of which compelled her to go to bed and lie a greater part of the afternoon. Toward evening, the violence of the pain having subsided, she arose and called Margaret, the chambermaid; Margaret came into her presence with a grave face. She knew what was coming.

"Margaret, Hetty has gone away, and you will have to cook until I get some one in her place. I will attend to the chambers. To-morrow, I will try to supply her place."

Margaret looked displeased. She made no reply, but retired slowly.

"Wretched creatures, all!" said Mrs. Belding, in an impatient voice; "no principle—no feeling."

Chafing herself by such thoughts, the wife sat in her chamber until night-fall. No lamp was brought to her, as was usual. This fretted her still more.

"I don't believe there is a light in the passage or parlor," she murmured, as she heard the street door open and her husband's step below. Slowly rising, she groped her way out of the room, for it was now quite dark, and along the passage, until she reached the stairway. A dim light shone from the kitchen; that was all.

"Margaret! why in the world havn't you lighted the passage lamp?" she called down in a fretful voice. That voice fell harshly upon the ear of her husband, and sent a cold feeling to his heart.

The chambermaid came from the kitchen, muttering to herself, and lit the hall lamp.

"There is no light either in the parlor or dining-room," Mrs. Belding said, still more impatiently, as Margaret turned to go back to the kitchen.

These omissions were supplied, but with such a bad grace, that it was only by an effort that Clara kept her feelings from boiling over.

Poor Belding! all his sweet hopes of sunshine, quiet, and the soothing influence of home, fled in an instant. He did not take into consideration, for a moment, that his wife might have her trials as severe to her as were his trials to him. He only saw an exhibition of ill-temper because the lamps were not lit. Moodily he set down upon a sofa, Clara sinking into a chair near him.

"I am tried beyond all patience!" the wife said.

No "why or wherefore" was asked. Mr. Belding did not even look into her face. There was a brief silence. Then, in a fretful tone, all the disagreeable occurrences of the day were related by Clara. These were contrasted in his own mind, by the husband, with what he had undergone, and were pronounced trifles light as air in comparison. Clara was mentally blamed and with much severity, for making the home, where he had looked for sweet peace, a spot in which discord reigned. What was the loss of a cook or a neglect to light the lamps, compared with the anxieties, losses disappointments and labors which he had borne? "Nothing!"

To all her complaints he made no reply, although tempted to do so in no very pleasant way. His silence, and the frown that rested on his brow, threw a dark shadow upon the heart of his wife. To her, the troubles she had felt and complained of were real. But her complaints had evidently been an offence to her husband. He did not sympathize with nor feel for her. Wounded and dissatisfied by this, tears came to her eyes, and she wept with involuntary bitterness. For this weakness she was chided by her husband, and the cause of her trouble called a mere trifle that no sensible woman ought to feel disturbed about for a moment; intimating, at the same time, that if she had a few of his anxieties to bear, she might complain with some reason. Of course, this did not help matters any. The husband seemed harsh and unfeeling. Both were rendered ten times more unhappy.

It was a full week before the sunlight broke in upon their dwelling, and then it came reflected through a humid atmosphere. Clara could not help feeling that her husband had been unkind and indifferent; and he permitted himself to think that she was fretful and thoughtless of the duty that devolved upon her of making his home a pleasant spot, where he could retire from the weary cares and anxieties of the world.

"She never seems to think," he would sometimes say to himself, "how hard are my trials in the world. How much I have to bear or how exhausted I sometimes feel, when I turn homeward my steps, and long for peace, sweet peace, and a face of love. Ah! if Clara would only think of this!"

Clara would have thought of this, for she truly loved her husband; if he had helped her to do so. If he had only borne with her for a little while and led her mind to reflect; if he had sympathized with her as he should have done, and thus strengthened her hands to uphold his. But his selfishness—his want of consideration for his wife, reacted upon him and made him unhappy. Instead of helping each other to correct their faults, the painful fact has to be stated, that as months and years passed on, and each acted out more frequently his or her real states, a partial estrangement instead of conjunction of mind took place. They bore with each other it is true.—The husband patiently endured his wife's fretful temper when it became excited, as it often did, and she met him with complainings frequently at a time when a placid face and a quiet tone of voice would have been balm to a tried heart that had buffeted hard with a selfish world during the day, and the wife bore the gloomy silence and often morose temper of her husband without an external murmur, while in her heart she perhaps at the same time yearned to throw herself upon his bosom and chase with a smile of love the clouds from his heart. Thus they are passing along their way through life. A little forbearance and a little mutual sympathy at first; a little more of love and less of selfish feeling; would have enabled them to start fair. But the twig was bent wrong at first and the tree has now become so hardened that no training can possibly restore it to perfect order and beauty.

Carson, as has been seen, in chosing Anna Williams for his wife, had not looked so much for perfection, as to positive qualities of mind that he could love. He loved Anna, and desired to make her happy and to be happy with her. He thought more of how he should make life a pleasant journey for her, than for him. She would make it pleasant for him. He delighted to think, as much as did his friend Belding, of the quiet fire-side, shut in from the busy, jostling world; but he did not think of it as a place delightful only to himself, nor of his wife, the sweet angel of his paradise, as one whose highest sphere of action was to make all sunshine for him.

Like the first few months of his friend's wedded life, a half year rolled by without a jar of discord. With both Mr. and Mrs. Carson there had been what may be called an artificial exterior, closing over and perfectly concealing their two interior states. The time had come when this must be laid aside. But voluntarily, not as the result of a determination of mind, but naturally and unanimously.

Domestic trouble, such as afflicted Mrs. Belding, had to be borne by Mrs. Carson; and, sometimes, they were not borne more patiently. Business cares and perplexities; losses, and crosses, and irritations, assailed Mr. Carson as well as Mr. Belding; and, it not unfrequently happened, that on coming home, worn out in body and mind, and longing for peace, he found no true peace where he had been most certain of finding it. His wife had suffered her trials also, and her mind was as much disturbed as his. On such occasions he usually forgot, or studiously concealed his own disquietude, in his desire and effort to chase the cloud from the spirits of his wife.

An occurrence, not very dissimilar to that described in the history of Mr. and Mrs. Belding, tried the quality of their love for each other. The husband met with a heavy loss, which, coming as it did accompanied with several unpleasant circumstances, afflicted his mind deeply. All day long he had been anxious, disturbed and depressed. When night came, he turned his face homeward, and felt something like a cheerful light breaking in upon his mind as he thought of his wife and her ever ready smile and sweet ministrations. But there was an unexpected cloud upon her brow. Instead of pleasant words, he was met with complaints, of the troubles of a domestic nature she had been compelled to endure through the day. At first he felt chilled. But he saw that Anna was really afflicted, and, so far from selfish anger, he felt instantly grieved for her and anxious to do something that would dispel the gloom that had settled upon her spirits. This desire almost made him forget his own anxieties. He listened with manifest interest to the story of her grievances; and, instead of calling them mere trifles, he sympathized with her, and suggested many things that her own mind took hold upon. After tea, he selected an interesting book, and read for an hour while she sat sewing. The effect was good both upon his mind and her's. Their thoughts ranged away from themselves, and became clear and more cheerful.

After the book was closed, Carson's mind went back to the occurrences of the day; and, quite unconsciously to himself, a shadow came over his face.—He had been sitting silent for some time, when his wife lifted her eyes from her work and noted with concern the change.

"You are serious, dear. What is the matter?" she said, as she let her work fall in her lap and looked steadily in his face.

"Am I? I had forgotten myself. But I will be as cheerful as ever in a moment."

"Why should you not be so all the time? What is the matter, William? You look really troubled."

"I was only thinking of some little matters that worried my mind to-day. But I will dismiss them. They have no business here."

"Any thing that disturbs your mind has business here. I have told you my troubles, too freely perhaps, and now you must tell me yours."

Anna continued to urge her husband, and he at length told her of all that had happened during the day and how much it had dispirited him.

"And when you tried to leave all this behind, and came home for strength and peace, I met you with a gloomy face and a sad story of my own petty annoyances. How kind and forbearing you are!—Would it have been any wonder if you had lost patience with me?"

"Do not chide yourself, Anna," returned her husband. "Your troubles were as real as mine; and I by no means despise them. Hereafter let us endeavor each to bear the trials of our peculiar spheres of action with patience, and when we meet we shall strengthen each other's spirits to bear up and press onward with hope."

Thus they began their married life aright; and, as months and years passed on with them, they drew closer and closer together, and all jarring strings became more and more attuned in harmony. Unlike Belding, Carson had not sought a perfect wife to make all life's paths pleasant for him to walk in, but one whom he could truly love, and for whose happiness he was willing to make many sacrifices. Many, however, he was not called upon to make; for his wife soon became as full of thoughtful regard for him as he had shown himself for her. Their lives soon ran along as one quiet current in which were few conflicting eddies.

Thus it is with all things in life. If we look to ourselves alone—if we think of ourselves alone, we shall meet with disappointments. But if we regard the good of others as well, we shall rarely miss attaining the end we seek, and with it will come a blessing for our own hearts.

Strength of Woman's Love.

A TOUCHING SKETCH.

The Rev. Mr. C———, at the South, recently closed a sermon with the following touching narration:

A young gentleman of high respectability, talents, fortune and family, married the beautiful, the lovely, and accomplished daughter of ———. She was the daughter of a wealthy merchant in one of our Northern cities; with their united fortunes they commenced a career of life, with the brightest hopes and the fairest prospects of undisturbed happiness and prosperity, that the most sanguine or ambitious could wish or desire. She was a lady of fashionable distinction in society, the pride and ambition of all who enjoyed the entree of her gay and hospitable mansion, and the idol of a young and affectionate husband's heart. Her wants, her wishes and desires were all anticipated by that peculiar discernment which always affords so much delight, and brings with it those unspeakable evidences of a husband's love, that a wife alone can understand, and appreciate.

Thus they lived on, for a few bright years of happy existence. But alas! such is the versatility of fortune, such the uncertainty of human happiness, that even those who seem to be surrounded with all the splendid glitter of prosperity, are, by some casual occurrence, some unexpected event, plunged from this splendid pinnacle of prosperity to the abyss of adversity. They saw not, averted not the dark cloud, emerged above the bright horizon that had hitherto encircled their dreamy existence, but soon it obscured the brilliancy of their prospects, and discharged its baneful contents upon their devoted heads; and threw them upon a cold and heartless world, without a farthing to support them.

The husband, unable to counteract this inconsistency of fortune, by becoming fortitude, gave himself up to the grossest intemperance, and subsequent neglect, and abuse of his lovely wife and family.—But she, like a woman, yea, like an angel as she is, soared above it all.

After an absence of some days, his wife not knowing where he was, he returned home, in the wretched and disgusting condition to which drunkenness had reduced him, his locks matted with filth, and sticking closely to his forehead, his face bloated, and his breath stinking with the fetid exhalations of brandy. In this frightful condition of human degradation, saturated with liquor, he entered the now obscure little residence of his wife, who met him with all those feelings of abiding affection, which in a woman's heart knows no change, but the once fond husband, now transformed to a beast, returned her cordial reception with the coarsest abuse, and at last struck her to the floor.

She, after recovering herself from the blow, arose, her husband standing near her; she rushed into his arms, exclaiming:

"Charles! Charles! what are you doing?" and turning from his brow the matted locks which once clustered in beautiful curls upon his manly forehead, she imprinted upon it an affectionate and endearing kiss, and with that soft and tender look of love, from eyes streaming with tears, upon his haggard features, again exclaimed, "Oh, Charles, how can you strike your once dear Mary?"

He instantly, as if struck himself by some superhuman force, echoed back the beloved name—"Mary! Mary! what have I done?"

He fell upon his knees, implored her forgiveness, and from that moment became a reformed man, a devoted husband, and is now an ornament to society.

GRAVE OF A PUPIL.

BY MISS M. F. WENTWORTH.

And thou art here—here in this quiet spot,
The sighing winds above thee, and the moan
Of melancholy waters, journeying
On to the unfathomable flood, fast
By thy side. Art here, thou who so lately
Gathered in the flush of childhood, and the Mantling glow of health, among my buoyant
Group;—whose laugh rang gladdest in their joyous
Ring, whose cheek grew ruddiest with the cold
Wind's breath;—who conned so wonderingly the
Well-worn book, smiled at my smile, or saddened
At rebuke.

Art here,
Child of the thoughtful brow, so teachable!
Nor mother's tireless love, nor father's care,
Nor brother's tears, or sister's tenderness
Could win thee. A rapturous voice broke from
The swelling surge,—"sweet sister spirit come Away." So wearily the blue eye drooped
Beneath its silken lid, and lustreless
And dull the gleaming black lay hidden.* Tired
Pulses beat timidly under the Light tinged veins, and answered not the pale cold
Lips, the mother's fervent kiss.

There was a lagging of the crimson tide,—
A fluttering of the weary heart,—the Angel set his signet-ring;—heaven touched the Marble brow, and "thou wert all its own."

They named the burial day—that day death
Held a banquet in the house of God—see
From the sounding aisles, (the mellow sun light
Chastened to the hues of grief,) a slow-paced
Train go out.

Up lift the pall;—
The coffin lid. Here rests the weight of years.
She lingered with you till the loved ones of
Her youth had passed away, like Autumn leaves,
And enters Paradise a welcome guest,
With husband, daughter, friend.

But one sweet tie drew thee to heaven;—the spirit
Whispers of the angel band, and thou didst
Hear in that glad melody, thy baby
Sister's voice, touched with the inspiration
Of the throne. So to the grave. Death is the End of life; eternity begun.
To-day the sable hearse bears on the frosts of Withered age—to-morrow buds of childhood's spring.

So to the grave—hear from the priestly lips
Thanksgiving for thee both. Thou aged friend,
Since thou hast past "life's toil and cumbrance, and Gone home;" for thee, sweet child, that thou art
Spared them.

Rest, then!
Thou hast surpassed me now; received thine honors First. I see the beacon light but dimly,
And the swelling surge sends up its
Waves between us. Now I will learn of thee.
Here at thy early tomb, I will renew
My broken vows to God, and following
On where thou dost point the way, I'll travel
With a surer faith to heaven.

WINNING OR LOSING A HUSBAND;
OR,
The Dangers of Subterfuge.

BY MRS. H. MUZZEY.

One evening, about twilight, two young ladies were seated in an upper room of a handsome house engaged in looking over some beautiful engravings, done from designs by our celebrated artist C. A little girl about nine years old was practising her dancing steps, and every now and then left off to peep over her sister's shoulder at the prints, and express her childish delight at their beauty. It would have been difficult to say which of the two young ladies possessed the greater share of personal beauty, but though the countenance of Clara Weston, the elder of the two by at least a year, wore that sparkling expression, if we may so call it, which attracts instant admiration, that of her companion, whom she addressed as Catherine Grant, was as remarkable for its look of extreme candor and placid sweetness.

"Come, Kate," said Miss Weston, "I am almost tired of looking at these prints, though they are so fine. Is it not time to go down stairs? Let me first take a look at my hair?" she added, running to the mirror.

There was a ringing at the street door.

"Look out of the window, Fanny, and see who it is," she said to the little girl.

"Oh! sister," replied Fanny, after taking the desired peep, "it is Mr. Manley."

"Run down then, quickly, before Jane opens the door, and tell her to say we are out—out for the evening, remember!"

Miss Grant looked surprised.

"Why, Clara," she said, "reprovingly, "why have you done this?"

"Because we don't want Mr. Manley this evening. Did not I promise Howard that we would spend this evening, practising duets with him; you and I by turns? Manley would be in the way, you know."

"I know at least," replied her friend, "that it is very wrong to teach your sister and your servant to tell a deliberate falsehood! Fanny has learned a lesson which she will remember, and probably practice, and as for Jane——"

"Nonsense! Catherine," interrupted Clara; "what a fuss about a little white lie, or fib: it is only for the sake of convenience. I would be as unwilling to tell an untruth which could injure any one as yourself."

"Mr. Manley's feelings would be injured, I fancy, if he knew of this," replied Catherine; "but it is of the injury to your own morals, and those of your little sister, and—but I see you are offended, so I will say no more."

"Oh! you have said enough, dear Catherine, to make me quite ashamed for this time; but I fancy you are a little—a very little—vexed at not seeing Mr. Manley, which makes you now so unusually severe."

The young lady was interrupted by the entrance of Fanny, who had staid much longer than was necessary to deliver her message to the servant.

"Oh, sister!" she exclaimed, "I made such a mistake, I hardly dared come up stairs! It was Mr. Howard who rang; but just as Jane spoke, Mr. Manley too came up the steps—I'm sure he looked—Mr. Howard—looked more like Mr. Manley than he ever did before: or I should not have made such a blunder."

"This is too bad!" exclaimed Miss Weston; "too bad! when Howard knew that I expected him, to say that I was not at home! What shall I do?" and she looked at her companion, as if for comfort or assistance.

"I too expected Mr. Manley," said Catherine, in answer to her look; "but I had not time to tell you, before you sent the message—and Mr. Manley's engagement at this hour was not positive; he said he would call at seven, and if I was engaged at that time, he would come at eight o'clock, as he returned from calling on a friend; he is to take letters for me to my friends at B——: he sets out to-morrow, and he will doubtless call again for the letters—so, Clara, although your hasty message was a little selfish, it will not disappoint my wish of seeing Mr. Manley this evening. But as Fanny's mistake has led you into an involuntary rudeness to Mr. Howard, I am sorry that it occurred. Now do, dear Clara, leave off the habit you have of saying anything, or causing others to do so, just for the sake of 'convenience,' as you call it. This little affair may have no serious consequence; but the habit, if indulged in, may cause you much trouble, and the practice of telling falsehoods certainly debases the mind."

"Stop! stop! Catherine Grant," interrupted her friend, "you are becoming too serious, and too much like a lecturer. I respect truth as much as you do. I have never been suspected or accused of falsehood. I do not consider such a thing as this indulging in the practice of falsehood; but I ought to have remembered that you are my guest, and that I was deviating from the rules of politeness, by causing any visiter of yours to be denied admission. But what," she added, after a minute's silence, "what shall I do with myself this evening, while you are engaged with Mr. Manley? He heard that I had gone out for the evening—how unlucky! I cannot go down stairs without betraying myself to him."

"Oh, yes, come down, if you please, and practice duets with Mr. Manley and myself," replied Catherine, laughing; "he will excuse the mistake for the sake of your society." But checking her merriment, she added—"But tell me, Clara, does not the vexation you now feel, convince you of the truth of my maxim? You already suffer inconvenience from this trifling deviation from strict veracity? Be warned in time!"

Clara was too much vexed to reply—they sat for a few moments in silence. The clock struck eight, and soon after the house bell rang, and Catherine hastened to descend the stairs lest Mr. Manley should again be denied entrance.

"I am glad you've come down, Miss," exclaimed Jane, when Miss Grant desired her to admit Mr. Manley, or any one who enquired for her. "I'm tired of telling stories for young ladies. I think working for them and waiting on them is enough, without that."

And how did Mr. Walter Howard bear the disappointment when told that Miss Weston, with whom he was engaged to spend the evening, by her own invitation, was not at home? He felt as young people generally feel such disappointments: perhaps rather more deeply—for Miss Weston's beauty and vivacity had made an impression on his heart and fancy; her musical talents, too, had aided not a little in enslaving him, for he was passionately fond of music, in which he himself excelled. He turned away from Mr. Weston's door vexed and mortified, but happening to recollect that an invalid friend of his was just at that time confined to his room in the house directly opposite that where resided his beautiful Clara, he determined to make him a visit, for in the present state of his feelings, the society of those who were gay and happy would have been irksome. So he went up stairs to his friend's room, and as it was a front room, seated himself at a window where he could, at least, see the house which ought he thought at that moment to have contained both his enchantress and himself. How is this!—lights in the parlor down stairs!—lights in the room above!—and every body gone out! Old Mr. Weston he knew was in the country, and Clara had no mother—no grown up sisters. Miss Grant was from home with Clara, no doubt, for the servant had said 'the ladies were gone out for the evening.' "This is odd!" thought Howard. The shutters are not closed in the room above stairs! A female figure appears at one of the windows. There can be no mistake! It is Clara Weston! The servant had then told an untruth. She was at home.

Howard talked, he knew not what, to his sick friend, and kept his eyes on the window opposite.—Presently a gentleman ran up the steps of Mr. Weston's house and rang the bell: he was admitted—the light of a lamp before the house had shown him that the gentleman was Mr. Manley. Still Howard kept his seat, and his senses, too: which, as he was a lover, is saying much for his self-command. Again the female figure appears before the window, and now it is enveloped in a shawl, and wears the bonnet which so well becomes the charming face of Clara Weston.

"What can all this mean?" muttered Howard, while his eyes remain fixed on the house, which now appears to him almost enchanted. It was a corner house; from the side door issues the figure enveloped in the shawl. She turns hastily round the corner, runs up the steps, and rings the bell—that tell-tale lamp has shown him the beautiful face of her he loves! Bewildered, for a moment, Howard sat like one struck by sudden paralysis. The next instant jealousy whispered, "the 'not at home' was then meant for me only! Manley is there, and she has chosen to return. Yes, yes—I see it all! He heard the message also, and she wishes to appear consistent to his eyes, of course. So, to blind him, and not lose the pleasure of his society, she has pretended to have been out, and now returns, to play off her airs of enchantment upon my unsuspicious rival! But this shall not be! I will undeceive him—I will call again also, I will disturb this agreeable 'tete-a-tete,' I will find means to let her know that I have witnessed manœuvring, which ought to make a lady blush to practice!

In the meantime, while Howard was "revolving in his altered mind" what course he should pursue, Clara Weston, to the great amazement of the girl who opened the door, and to the still greater astonishment of Miss Grant, entered the house, and the parlor where the latter sat with Mr. Manley, as if just returned from making a visit. Trusting that her generous, high-minded friend would scorn to betray her, she suppressed her feelings of embarrassment while cordially addressing Mr. Manley, and every thing was in train for a quiet evening, when Howard, who generally acted from impulse, rang at the door, was admitted, and entered the room, prepared to act in any way that circumstances might seem to warrant. Clara, on seeing him, was really glad. Howard's wrathful feelings subsided when he saw Miss Grant in the parlor, and he paid his compliments in his usual easy and elegant manner. The relief which Clara's feelings experienced on seeing him, led to her returning his salutations in a manner more flattering than she had ever before shown towards him. She accosted him in the most friendly manner, and said, in a low tone, as an opportunity offered—

"My little sister made a great mistake in the early part of the evening; she looked out of the window and mistook you for Mr. Manley."

The look which accompanied these words conveyed their full meaning. Howard's vanity was gratified, though his reason was unconvinced—his self-love accepted the sacrifice of truth, which his judgment disapproved.

"This time," he said, "I am more fortunate. I saw you return home, and hastened to avail myself of the opportunity of paying my respects where my heart always leads me."

Clara felt humbled in spite of the admiration which the look and tone of Howard expressed; she saw that her manœuvring was known to him, and she half stammered a reply that "feeling disappointed and out of spirits, she did not like to spend the evening alone." And now she felt that she had confessed more than she ought to have done, and had betrayed a preference which placed her in rather an embarrassing situation. But she rallied her spirits and consoled herself with the thought that Howard could only view the whole matter in the light of a ludicrous mistake, and as for the part she had played, it was only a little artifice to blind that quiet, serious Mr. Manley. Howard glanced from the glowing face of the beautiful Clara to the placid countenance of her less brilliant friend, who was conversing in a manner so perfectly natural and unaffected, that he could not help inquiring if "Miss Grant was also from home in the early part of the evening?"

"Oh!" answered Clara, "she was with me. Do not, Mr. Howard, say any more about this very foolish affair!"

Howard bowed, smiled, and promised obedience. There was now a secret between them, and if the knowledge that there was, did not raise Clara Weston in the opinion of her lover, it certainly led her to adopt towards him a more deferential manner than he had ever hoped from the proud belle, who claimed homage from all who approached her.

When their visitors had left them, Clara really dreaded the reproof she expected from her friend, but Catherine only said—

"I see how matters stand between you and Mr. Howard, my dear Clara; let me entreat you to be careful that he never again has reason to believe that you have, in the slightest instance, deviated from truth. I believe your happiness may, in a great degree, depend on the opinions which he may now form; that Mr. Howard admires you extremely, is beyond a doubt; my dear friend, teach him also to respect you; forgive me, Clara, if I seem intrusive in my remarks. I leave you soon, and we may not meet again for many years. Our mothers were friends, in heart, as well as in name. I cannot bear to think your many fine qualities should be obscured, or the purity of your mind sullied by the frequent subterfuges which you allow yourself to practice, the motives for which are of so little consequence in themselves, that it appears to me the simple truth would be both more easy and more pleasant."

Clara felt less happy on this night than she usually did when retiring to rest. She had been in the constant practice of resorting to little "subterfuges," as her friend called them, but as no unpleasant consequence to herself had ever followed these deviations from strict veracity, and as she did not know, that even in one instance, till now, she had ever been suspected of resorting to falsehood, "for the sake of convenience," she had remained perfectly easy in her mind in reference to her own conduct, and believed, what was often told her, that "she was the most charming girl in the world"—and so she was, if face, and form, voice, manner, and accomplishments were alone taken into consideration. She had a kind heart, too; she could feel for the misfortunes of others, though herself the child of prosperity. But there "was a spot upon the sun." "A canker was at the heart of the rose!" Clara would have felt grieved, for a time at least, if she had known that her habit of causing herself to be denied on any frivolous pretence had, more than once, been the cause of disappointment and embarrassment to deserving persons, who had claims on her time and attention; she would have been hurt if she had known that her failing to fulfil an engagement, on some false excuse, had often conveyed a pang to some hearts that loved her, and that, rather than subject herself to a slight annoyance, she had inflicted real pain on others.

Time wore away. Catherine Grant returned to her native place; she was united in marriage to Mr. Manley, who could appreciate the beauty of her character, and love her for the truth and goodness which gave to her face its beautiful expression. Catherine was happy herself, and the cause of happiness to others.

Walter Howard, in the meantime, continued his devotions to Clara Weston; he idolized her beauty, and admired her talents and accomplishments; but he distrusted her sincerity. There were moments when he resolved to withdraw himself forever from the sphere of her enchantments; but a smile, a glance, drew him again to her side. He was ever on the watch to detect some insincerity towards himself, and ever in dread lest he should discover it. He knew she could dissemble, and he feared to trust to her apparent regard. Howard's constant visits and marked attentions had the usual effect of banishing those young men who had serious thoughts of seeking to possess the hand of the beautiful Miss Weston, and as Clara's manner towards him was always sufficiently flattering, their union was looked upon as fixed. But Clara herself was by no means certain that such was Howard's intention, for although his admiration was undisguised, and his attentions unremitting, he had never resolved to offer himself to Clara; yet the fear that some rival would step in, and secure the prize he hesitated to make his own, tormented him unceasingly. At length the officious kindness of a friend pointed out to the father of Clara the probable consequences of such marked attentions to his daughter, should their result not prove such as was anticipated. Mr. Weston, immersed in business, and at the same time of an indolent disposition, and indulgent to a fault, had been almost entirely negligent of his daughter, as to her manner of passing her time, and of those who visited and escorted her. He took it for granted that none other than gentlemen could find admission into his house; and satisfied with furnishing his household with all the means of comfort and enjoyment, he interfered but little with their arrangements or pursuits. We do not intend to say that Mr. Weston did his duty in trusting thus implicitly to the prudence of young people. Clara appeared to him always perfectly happy. He heard her praises from all tongues. Why should he be troubled about her? If she needed his advice, she would doubtless ask it. And when convinced by the arguments of his friend that her future peace and prospects might be endangered should Mr. Howard's attentions be merely those of gallantry, and not prompted by any serious views of marriage, he resolved not to trouble his daughter on the subject, but to apply at once to the gentleman, "who must, of course, know his own intentions," he said. He did so, in plain terms, for he was remarkable for the bluntness and sincerity of his character. Howard was embarrassed, but presently rallied, and assured the old gentleman that "a union with the charming Clara was the fondest wish of his heart."

"Well, then," said Mr. Weston, "why don't you tell her so, and ask her if she will have you? That is the way I did when I courted her mother. What are you waiting for? Two years, they tell me, you have been coming every day to my house, and waiting on Clara everywhere. For my part, I did not know it was half as long, or anything about it; but people, it seems, will trouble themselves about such things. So if you like Clara, and she likes you, why don't you settle the matter at once? I dare say she will give you a direct answer, if you ask her. I am told you are in good business. I can give Clara something handsome, and leave enough for little Fan, too; she'll be a trouble to me by-and-by, I suppose. Well, I've done my duty, at all events; so good morning, Mr. Howard. I wish you success, and all that sort of thing."

Mr. Weston had made a great effort, and, for him, a long speech, and his mind was easy. But Howard was in a state of mind which was far from enviable. The thought of giving up Clara was too painful to be borne; but he could not feel perfectly assured that her love for him was of that devoted character which alone could satisfy his feelings. Many instances had come under his observation of her departure from truth—instances which, though they could involve no serious consequences, and were trifling in themselves, nevertheless left a blot upon the otherwise stainless page upon which the name of Clara was engraven. But now deliberation was out of the question. Howard felt that he must act. Unable to break the chain which bound him, he resolved, at least, to wear it gracefully. He offered himself to Clara Weston, and was accepted, for Clara really loved him, and a weight seemed lifted from her heart while she listened to his proposal.—For once, "the course of true love," did seem to "run smooth." Howard felt his "bosom's lord sit lightly on its throne;" and Clara appeared more lovely, more captivating than ever. At her request the marriage was delayed for six months. She was expected, about that time, to make a visit to her friend Catherine, now Mrs. Manley, and she resolved that her journey to Boston should be the wedding jaunt. Howard agreed, though reluctantly; but Clara's wish was paramount to every thing else.

But a blow was in store for poor Howard, which he little expected. He had a partner in his business, and four months after his engagement with Clara Weston, that partner absconded, embezzling all the property on which he could lay his hands. Howard had left the concerns of his business too much in the hands of this faithless friend, and on examination, he found himself deeply in debt, and his affairs in a state of complicated confusion. Bankruptcy was the consequence, and his prospects, before so flattering, were now dark in the extreme.

And how did Clara Weston receive her lover when his misfortunes were made known to her? She received him with more kindness than she had ever before shown him, for she truly loved him, and the change in his prospects but rendered him an object of greater interest to her heart. She trusted that her father would assist Howard in retrieving his affairs, and her sanguine temper led her to hope all would be well. She seemed scarcely less gay and happy than usual. But the mind of Howard was a prey to despondency; the gaiety of Clara seemed to him almost a proof of indifference. He watched with jealous eyes for some sign of altered feeling in her he loved—and as a suspicious temper was Howard's greatest fault, so it proved a fruitful source of uneasiness to him in his present circumstances. Clara rallied him on his low spirits.

"Cheer up, Howard," she would say; "knight of the rueful countenance, resume your smiles! What hero ever gave way to despondency? Your prospects will again brighten. My father will, doubtless, come forward to assist you. I will not burthen you with the charge of a giddy wife until your affairs are somewhat retrieved. We can wait a little longer before we take upon ourselves the responsibilities of the married state. Go on and disentangle the 'snarl' of difficulties which you say you have got into. In the mean time, I must make my promised visit to Catherine without you; but you can come and bring me back, you know."

All this, though well meant by Clara, and said in kindness, was wormwood to the taste of the fastidious lover; but, too proud to acknowledge the bitterness of his feelings, he acquiesced in gloomy silence, suspecting that Clara wished for a pretext to delay their marriage, and perhaps break her engagement entirely.

While in this frame of mind, Howard called one evening at Mr. Weston's. There were lights in the front parlor, and the sound of music. Clara was playing; he recognized her manner of touching the piano. He rang the bell, and after waiting longer than usual, Jane opened the door, and in rather a hesitating tone, informed him that "Miss Weston was particularly engaged."

"This is strange, indeed," muttered Howard, as he rushed down the steps. "She has never been 'particularly engaged' before, when I have called. This, then, is what I have now to expect. But I will see: perhaps she will offer an explanation. I will be prudent, cautious. I will restrain my hasty impulses. I will wait for the 'signs of the times.'"

He called again the next evening. Clara was at home, and glad to see him. There was company present, and no favourable opportunity offered for enquiring how she was so "particularly engaged" the evening before. Clara did not allude to any engagement, or to his unwonted absence, so he made up his mind to be "silent but wary." Howard was much to blame in thus acting. There was a degree of treachery in thus laying a snare for Clara;—an honest and direct enquiry would have been more just, and more becoming the character of a gentleman and a lover. But he was under the influence of suspicion, and consequently was neither just nor generous. The truth of the matter in question was this: Fanny had profited by the lessons she had received, and Jane had become less scrupulous about "telling stories for young ladies." On the evening that Howard was so unceremoniously dismissed, Fanny had some little visitors, and being extravagantly fond of dancing, had teased her sister to play waltzes, and other dancing tunes for them. Clara had promised to play till they were all tired of dancing, provided Mr. Howard did not call. Clara felt certain that he would call, and her pride was hurt when she thought he had omitted to do so—hence her silence on the subject. Fanny invited Jane to see the dancing, and partake of the "bon bons," provided Jane would just tell Mr. Howard, if he came, that her sister was "particularly engaged;" "for you know, Jane," added the little girl, "she is engaged to play for us—so it is no fib, you know." And when Clara "wondered who it was at the door," Fanny ran to ask Jane, and on returning told her sister "it was only a man who wanted to see papa."

Such is the force of example—such the facility acquired by practice in evil. And yet Clara Weston, though she had taught falsehood to her sister, and to the servant, to whom she ought to have set a far different example, never imagined that the deceit to which she had accustomed them would ever be practised against herself; the falsehoods she had caused them to utter, appeared to her only deviating a little from the exact truth, just to serve some particular purpose. They injured no one—it was of no consequence—thus she argued, if she argued at all;—and the fruits of the seed she had sown, were now about to appear. Once again, when Fanny wanted the free use of the parlor where stood the piano, she prevailed on Jane, without much trouble, it is true, to tell Mr. Howard that her sister was not at home, though she knew that she was at that moment expecting him—and Jane, who really began to like "the fun," as she called it, of seeing people go away disappointed, threw so much impertinence into her look as she uttered the untruth, that Howard could not help feeling sure that she had been instructed not to admit him. Half frantic at such treatment, he absented himself nearly a week. Clara was very anxiously expecting him, and grieved that he did not come; but she heard from her father that there had been a meeting of Howard's creditors, with a view to the final adjustment of his affairs; she thought it was business kept him from her.

"And yet," she said to herself, he has never till now allowed either business or pleasure to detain him from me, and I have given up all others for his sake."

She called Jane, and interrogated her as to whether Mr. Howard had not called in the course of the week, some time when she happened to be out?—Jane answered boldly in the negative, and again Clara tried to think that he was just now too busy to call. Just at this juncture, a near relation of her mother's arrived from Europe, where he had been during several years. He brought many curious articles—many beautiful specimens of shells, dried plants, stuffed birds, and a variety of other articles, to amuse his young cousins—and was exhibiting some beautiful engravings, when the door-bell was rung. Clara's heart fluttered—she would have flown herself to open the door, hoping that the visitor was Howard, but the presence of the gentleman restrained her—besides she was busy in arranging some shells, and did not wish to appear anxious about the arrival of any visitor. Fanny said—

"Jane does not hear—shall I open the door?"

Clara nodded assent, and the little girl left the room; but the thought struck her, "if it should be Mr. Howard, we shall lose the pleasure of the evening, for my sister will be so taken up with him, that she will not care about seeing those beautiful things, and our cousin will talk to him, instead of me—and I'll just say, for once, that my sister is not at home. Jane will do as I ask her."

Jane did say so—just as Clara, wondering at the delay—had risen, and opened the parlor door to ascertain the cause. She heard the words,—not at home. She heard Howard exclaim, "It is false!"—And she heard no more. A sudden giddiness seized her—she sunk upon a chair, and fainted.

It was not that Howard was for once denied admittance—it was not the disappointment of her hope of seeing him—it was not his angry tone alarmed her. It was the power of conscience that struck that sudden blow upon her heart—the very lesson she had taught, was now made use of to defeat her fondest wish! Clara felt that it had been resorted to before.

The alarm which Clara's sudden illness caused, was great. Her father entered just as she began to recover.

"What is all this?" he asked. "What is the matter with Clara? Why do you cry, Fanny? Cousin, can you tell me what all this means?"

"It means," said Clara, who heard the questions of her father—"It means that I am miserable—and that I deserve to be so! They have lied," she added, pointing to Fanny and Jane, "but I taught them—they have, for what reason I know not, denied Howard admittance. Oh, father!—they have done it more than once!—he is gone!—he will never come again! I shall see him no more—he despises me!"

"Pooh, pooh, child!" answered Mr. Weston, "don't take on so. Howard will come again—I'll go for him myself. He'll come again—never fear! But what did they lie for? What was it about—and why do you say you taught them? You never could have done that—you know not what you say, my poor girl! But come," he added, "I must know what this means. I hate trouble—but I must know all about this!"

An explanation followed. Fanny and Jane, who were both in tears, being closely interrogated, confessed that they had several times told Mr. Howard that Miss Weston was "not at home;"—but as Clara had often told them to say so whenever a visitor came whom they did not wish at that time to see—and in many instances had said things not quite true, "just for convenience," they thought—at least Fanny said she thought—"it was no harm to tell him so, just for her own convenience!"

A severe reprimand from her father, and a serious lecture from her cousin, was all the punishment that Fanny received at that time. But Clara, whose feelings were stung to the quick by the cold look of her relative, and by the reproachful yet pitying glance of her father, could have borne all this with patience, could she have heard the voice of Howard, assuring her that he believed her innocent of any slight towards him—that he believed, "though false to others, she was true to him." But no such consolation was in store for her.

"Oh, father!" she exclaimed, "if this had happened in the days of his prosperity, it would have been trifling—but now!—oh, father, will you see him?—Will you tell him that I am innocent of this?—that I was anxiously expecting him, and that I have never slighted him in word or thought?"

"I will, Clara," replied the old gentleman. "I will tell him all this; but, child, if he knows you are in the habit of telling untruths, how can I make him believe you now?"

This was too much for poor Clara. The words of her friend Catharine seemed sounding in her ears, and she wept yet more bitterly.

Mr. Weston sought Howard the next morning; he had departed in the early cars for New York. A letter was sent after him, but he never received it. Before it arrived, he had left in a packet for England. A letter arrived for Clara, dated on the day on which the vessel sailed. It ran thus:

"Farewell, Clara! I shall trouble you no more!—Thrice have I been denied entrance, when I knew you were at home. The last time I knew you had a visitor, for I had seen him enter. Clara! If I had taken warning by the first deception I knew you to practice, I should not have been subjected to this insult myself. I smiled then, because my own vanity was flattered—but now! a bankrupt, and a rejected visitor, I will not be an abject lover. I go, in the hope of forgetting you. Too long have I suffered the anguish of a heart 'that doats, yet doubts; suspects, yet fondly loves.' Once more, farewell! May you be happier than I am! HOWARD."

This letter put an end to all Clara's hopes, and plunged her in affliction. Her mortification was severe—but her contrition still more so. Clara never saw her lover again—for he never returned to America. She was roused from her state of hopeless dejection, by a visit from her friend Catharine, who poured balm into her wounded heart, while she endeavored to strengthen her resolution of making truth the standard of all her words and actions for the future. Clara has now regained her tranquility, but she has never forgotten the severe lesson she learned in her youth. Fanny has profited by the good example which is now before her—and Jane finds that though telling fibs may be a good joke sometimes, there is nothing so safe, or so satisfactory, in the end, as Truth.

THE LOST AND FOUND.

BY ELEANOR DARBY.

[The following lines were suggested by the perusal of a touching incident which lately occurred at Munich, in what is poetically called there the "Hall of Death," where a little girl, who had apparently died, was observed, (about the time the relatives and friends were assembling for the funeral,) sitting up, playing with the flowers which had been strewn over her coffin.]

Woe, woe, Bavarian mothers! the prettiest little maid,
The sweetest child in Munich, in the Hall of Death is laid;
Her small hands on her bosom are folded as in prayer,
And her lips' angelic smile Death's kiss has sealed there.

He seems to rock her kindly in his cold arms to rest,
Like a fond mother clasping her baby to her breast;
She looks so calm, so happy, wrapt in trance so deep,
A lovely little statue of innocence asleep!

How softly she reposes, safe from life's stormy sea!
Strewed o'er with fresh white roses, less pure and fair than she!
Robed in a vestal raiment, white as the mountain snows,
She doth herself resemble a sweet pale virgin rose!

'Mid many a sobbing weeper, with fixed and stony stare,
Stands one whose grief is deeper, the image of despair!
One who, her farewell taking, feels, gazing on that bier,
As if her heart were breaking, yet cannot shed a tear.

Oh! by her speechless anguish, sure that must be her child;
And she is doomed to languish, lost in a desert wild,
Woe for the childless widow! lonely she lives and dies:
No voice to charm her sorrow, no hand to close her eyes!

* * * * * * *

The day is past—another with sunshine gay comes on;
But what can cheer the mother, whose light of life is gone?
Her sunless home forsaking, she hastes away—one glance
At the lost only treasure may soothe her soul perchance.

With tottering steps, distracted, the Hall of Death she seeks;
Once more she'll clasp her cherub, and kiss those pallid cheeks!
What mean the gladsome voices that meet her wondering ear?
Ha! every one rejoices around that loved one's bier!

Joy, joy! e'en Death repented, and spared so fair a prey;
Embracing her, relented, and turned his scythe away.
O, moment full of rapture! O, miracle! the dead
Is sitting up, and playing with the roses o'er her spread!

A sympathetic pleasure brightens each mourner's eye,
As moved, o'erjoyed, the keeper of the dead hall draws nigh,
Takes in his arms the blossom saved from an early blight,
And bears her to her mother, now weeping with delight!

THE YOUNG REBEL.

A Tale of the Carolinas.

BY J MILTON SANDERS

In a small farm-house, towards the close of the year 1780, sat an old man, his wife and only son.—The face of the father appeared troubled; at times he looked thoughtfully on the floor, and then he would gaze long and wistfully at his son, a fine, manly youth of twenty. At length he said,

"David, this is disastrous news from Camden.—God knows what will become of the country now! Congress needs every arm that is capable—ah! me, I wish this old wound I got in the French war had not lamed me—but for it, I should be now shouldering my musket and marching to defend my country."

Both the son and wife looked up at these words. The old lady ceased knitting and gazed enquiringly at her boy, and it was evident, from the expression of her face, that patriotism and motherly affection were at variance in her bosom. The son, however, after encountering his father's eyes for a moment, turned confusedly away. The old man's brow darkened, and he said warmly,

"David, David, why do you linger about the village when your country needs your services so much?—why, son, I am ashamed of you! Twice before this have I spoken to you upon this subject, but you appear to have no spirit! What! will you see us trampled upon by the brutal mercenaries of Britain, and still lie here supinely? For shame, David, for shame! I will not call you my son. Long since you ought to have been in the army!"

"Joshua, Joshua," interposed the old mother, "David is but a youth; then do not speak to him so harshly. He cannot yet feel what you feel, who have fought so often against our country's enemies—Joshua, he is but a boy."

"A boy, indeed, Deborah! such boys as David have already gained imperishable laurels since the war commenced. I could name a host of them!—why, were it not for the boys of this land where would be our army, which, I dare say, is one quarter composed of boys of David's age." The old man was excited, and it was the first unkind word that he had ever used to his boy.

David arose and left the house. He walked some distance apparently in deep thought.

"What will not woman do?" he at last muttered—"here I have been lingering about the village when I should have been off long ago. And for what?—why to meet a pretty girl, and to listen to her musical voice; but now I will be myself again!—what did he call me? was it not coward? Now, by heavens, I will learn him that he has a son who possesses the spirit of his father. Away then with love, for I feel that I am called upon to act, and no longer dream! Ere a fortnight my father shall hear of me, or else I lose my life in striving for it." And with this resolution he turned about and retraced his steps.

When he reached home he sought the stables, saddled his horse, and mounting him, struck into a gallop, which continued for several miles. At length he stopped and looked up at the windows of a farm-house, half hid between clustering trees. This was the residence of Mary Bunker, the mistress of his heart: the lights showed that the family had not retired, and he resolved to pay her a visit before his departure.

She was alone when he entered, and a few words acquainted her with his determination. She burst into tears.

"Nay! Mary," he said, "you must not unman me. At first I resolved to leave you without a farewell, for I knew how much you dreaded my taking an active part in this struggle. But I could not be so cruel, as to desert you without a word."

"I will compose myself," said the fair girl, with an effort to smile. "I know I have been wrong to persuade you to stay; but you cannot imagine the anxieties I suffer on account of my brothers, and I could not bear to have you too encounter their danger. But since this dreadful defeat at Camden I feel that every man is wanted by our country. Go, then, dearest, and God be with you. My prayers shall attend you, night and day."

David pressed the now weeping girl to his bosom, snatched a hasty kiss at the sound of approaching footsteps, wrung her hand, and was gone.

The next day he left the neighborhood of his father's house, armed with a musket and mounted on a sturdy horse. His destination was the American camp, then far to the northward; but as the intervening country was filled with the enemy, he knew there would be considerable address required to effect his purpose. Before his departure he saw a few of his old playmates, who promised to follow him as soon as possible.

Night found him near a lonely farm-house, to which he proceeded boldly in pursuit of a lodging.—At first the occupant received him coldly, but a chance expression convincing David that his host was a tory, he affected the same political creed, and was immediately warmly welcomed. The royalist produced his cider after supper, and insisted that David should join him in his potations; this the young man did, taking care, however, not to indulge too freely, while the farmer, overjoyed to find what he supposed a new recruit for his party, drank without stint and became more and more communicative. To his horror, David soon learned that a party of loyalists, led by a Major Wilson, celebrated for his toryism and ruthlessness, were to start early the ensuing day on an expedition to seize and hang the two Bunkers, who had made themselves particularly obnoxious to the royalist leaders. David knew enough of this partizan warfare to be assured that no mercy would be shown his friends; he also knew enough of the character of the major to suspect that some strong personal motive had led to the planning of so distant an expedition, when there were others as inviting nearer home. He accordingly set himself to discover from his half inebriated companion the truth.—Nor was it long before success crowned his adroit cross-examination.

"Why, you see," said the host, "I believe there's a little revenge for a slight received from these fellows' sister, mixed up with the major's desire to catch the Bunkers. The girl is very pretty, they say, and the major, when she was down here on a visit last year—before the war—wanted to marry her, but she would have nothing to say to him.—Ever since, he has vowed to make her rue the day. You may depend on it he will have her on his own terms now—thank Heaven! there's no law any longer to prevent an honest loyalist from doing as he pleases to those rascally rebels. But yonder is the major now," suddenly said his host, starting up, "I will introduce you to him at once—a merry fellow you'll find him.—Lord love you he's as brave as a lion."

David, though horrified at the diabolical plot he had heard, saw the necessity of dissembling in order to learn further of the tories' plans, and find means, if possible, to circumvent them. He arose, therefore, and shook the Major's hand warmly: pledged him immediately in a brimmer; and soon contrived to make the royalist believe that he was anxious to join a troop and take part against the rebels. This induced the major to be unusually civil, for he wished to secure so athletic a recruit himself. It was not long before a bargain had been concluded between the two. David refused, however, to sign the agreement that night: he pretended that several others of his friends were disaffected and desirous of joining the loyalists; and his object, he said, was to secure a commission for himself by inducing them to join. This tempting bait took: the major promised him a command in his troop, in case of success, and David signified his intention of setting forth, after he had taken a few hours rest, in order to lose no time in gathering together his recruits.

The dread of discovery had been constantly before our hero during the management of this negotiation, for his reason was well known to many of the major's troop, and if any of them had come up, his feigned name would not have protected him from detection. He wished to get off that night, as he had proposed; but to this neither his host nor the major would hear, and he was forced to remain till morning. What was his anguish to hear, on rising, that the major had been gone some hours, and was already on his way to the Bunkers, with his troops.—Dissembling his anxiety, David partook of a hasty breakfast, and, mounting his horse, rode slowly away. But when out of sight of the house he struck into a fierce gallop, which he continued till he came in sight of a cross-road, where was a tavern. Here he stopped, and learning that the royalists had taken the high road, he turned aside into a narrow and more circuitous one.

"It is my only chance to avoid them," he said, again dashing into a gallop. "Pray God, I may reach the settlement in time to collect a few of our lads and march to the Bunkers. There is no other hope now left."

Night had fallen, as they expected, before the tories were able to reach the vicinity of the house they were in search of. At length, however, after a silent march through the woods, it broke upon their view. A light was burning in one of the windows, and when they arrived close to the premises, the lively notes of a violin reached their ears, proving that the brothers were not aware of their presence, but enjoying themselves in imagined security.

"Now, men," whispered the leader of the tories, "when I give the word, fire a volley at the house by way of introducing ourselves; we will then surround the place and enter it."

At that instant the deep bay of a dog rang in their ears, and a large mastiff sprang from under the house and rushed at the major.

"Fire!" he cried.

Twenty guns broke upon the stillness of the night—the dog fell dead—every pane of glass in the front of the house was shivered, and the tories yelled like savages. In an instant the light in the house was extinguished—the violin as quickly ceased, and a noise was heard at the door. The tories immediately made a rush at it. But it was already barred, and being made of stout oak plank, resisted all their efforts. A rifle cracked from one of the upper windows, and one of the tories fell desperately wounded. Another report succeeded, and another tory fell, and Major Wilson was now fully aware that both Bunkers were at home and wide awake. A shed turned the rain from the front of the house, and underneath this, the tories, shielding themselves from the fire of the Bunkers, went to work at the door.—Suspecting such resistance—perhaps from his knowledge of their character—one of the men had brought an axe, with which he commenced hewing at the door, and soon cut it to pieces. Here a desperate battle ensued. The two brothers were powerful men, and as courageous as they were strong; and now with clubbed rifles they disputed the entrance of the whole tory force. The door being small they stood their ground for half an hour, felling during that time some of those who had the temerity to enter first, but finally numbers overcame them, and they were flung upon the floor and bound. The tories, inflamed to madness at the great resistance which had been made, and at their own losses, now seized the mother and sister, and made preparations to hang the two brothers before their eyes. The ropes were already tied around the necks of the victims, when the major addressed his men:

"Now, friends, as soon as these villains are dead, we will set fire to this house—the old woman there," he said, with a brutal laugh, "may be left inside—but the young one I reserve for myself."

"Hist!" cried one of the men, in a loud voice. The major ceased, and they heard a voice outside the house. Although the words were spoken low, the listeners distinctly heard, "when I say fire, give it to them!"

A man with blanched cheek now rushed among them, exclaiming—

"The yard is full of men!"

"Fire!" cried a deep voice from the yard—a general volley succeeded, and so well had the aim been directed in the door, that several of the tories fell, either dead or desperately wounded. In turn the tories retreated up the stairs, when David, our hero rushed into the room which they had just left, and cut the ropes which bound the Bunkers and their mother and sister.

"May God Almighty bless you for this!" cried one of the Bunkers.

The two men sprang up, seized their rifles, which had been left in the room, and prepared to retaliate the treatment which they had just received.

Long and desperate was the battle. The tories fought for life: the whigs for revenge. But at length the latter triumphed, though not until their enemies had been almost exterminated. The major fell by the arm of our hero, who sought him out in the hottest of the fight, and engaged him single handed.

No language of ours can express the emotions of David as he pressed his betrothed bride to his bosom; and his heart went up in thankfulness to Heaven for his timely arrival, when he thought that a delay of half an hour longer would have consigned her to a fate worse than death. The gratitude of her brothers was expressed in many words, but her's was silent and tearful, yet oh! how much more gratifying.

"I almost called you a coward, son David," said his father to him, when they met, "but you are a chip of the old block, and I did you wrong. Deborah, he is a boy to be proud of—is he not? You may founder one of my horses every day that you do such a deed—it beats anything I ever saw in the old French war."

David's gallantry in this act drew around him, in a few weeks, more than a score of hardy young followers, who fought with him to the close of the war, when he returned and was happily married to the heroine of our story.

THE SEASON OF YOUTH.

"Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth: and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but know thou that for all these things God will bring thee into judgment."—Eccl. 11th chap. 9th verse.

Rejoice not, young man, in the season of youth,
Its pleasures are fleeting, and soon pass away;
Howe'er they allure us, they leave this sad truth,
Whatever is earthly, must surely decay.

The snares of the world may be spread to deceive thee,
They charm but to dazzle, and lure to destroy;
Its friendship will perish, and worldly friends leave thee,
When trouble and sorrow thy sad thoughts employ.

There's nought but Religion true happiness brings;
Then seek it, young man, in the spring-time of life;
'Twill ease thee of guilt, take from conscience its stings,
And yield thee a solace 'mid doubting and strife.

Then when thy days on this earth shall be closing,
And dear friends are whispering the last sad farewell,
How sweet to reflect that the path thou hast chosen,
Will load thee to Heaven, with angels to dwell!

THE YOUNG MERCHANT

AND

THE INDIAN CAPTIVE.

BY HENRY DIFFENDERFFER.

Chapter I.

It was on a clear, bright, beautiful morning, in the summer of '28, when a youth was seen entering the family coach with his father to drive to the bustling, commercial city of New York. It was such a morning as is calculated to call forth all those fine sensibilities of our nature, which lie hidden in dormant repose for a season, but when awakened create wil' in the bosom the poetry of life. The feathered tribes, too, felt the genial influence of the sun's bright rays, causing them to shout forth their happiest carols. The lofty mountain's brow was clad in nature's verdant livery—the streamlet, as it touched and refreshed its rugged banks, laughed in joyous glee until its tribute gushed into the mighty river; then rushing with mad impetuosity, mingled with the eternal waves of the billowing deep;—the farmers' fields presented a vast ocean of golden grain, and as the balmy breeze floated over it, it created thousands of beautiful waves, sweeping with graceful, undulatory movement. In fact, it was a morning on which every feeling was refreshed, and every thing seemed to teem with life.

Richard Mordant was the cherished and much-loved son of affectionate parents, residing on the banks of the beautiful Hudson. Being an only son, he was reared tenderly, and they failed not to instil into his youthful mind those valuable principles which, when embraced and maintained, tend to elevate man, giving him dignity and nobility of soul. They were determined, as far as in them lay, to build a foundation of the most substantial nature for the erection of their son's future character—a foundation which the shocks, the changes, and circumstances of life cannot touch nor destroy. They resolved to carry out those plans which a wise power committed to their charge, by cultivating the moral and intellectual faculties—by giving their child a proper estimate of this life, and of that in the far future. By contrasting a good with that of an evil course of life pursued; the good results of the former, and the evils, miseries, temporal and eternal, of the latter.

Richard Mordant, to describe him, must be termed one of the finest specimens of nature's noblemen. A lofty forehead, beautifully formed, attracted the gaze of every one, with jet black hair, of a glossy nature, hanging in large massy curls over his handsome brow—fine and well-formed neck. His eye was of the darkest possible hue, full and prominent, possessing the fire of genius, in which gleamed the loftiness of his nature.

When the father and son arrived and traversed the busy streets of New York, Richard seemed pleased with the bustle and confusion; and it appeared to suit the tenor of his mind. He was placed in the counting-house of a very intimate friend of his parent, and soon gained the confidence and esteem of his preceptor. He was now in his his eighteenth year, with a rich, comprehensive mind; and, when leisure from business afforded, his principle delight was to read works of an instructive character, from which he soon acquired an extensive store of knowledge.

He had residing in the city a young and beautiful cousin, and when they met there seemed to exist a congeniality of disposition in their pursuits in the moral and intellectual world, which soon attached them very closely to each other. Emma was just in the flower of maidenhood, with a brow and soft languishing eyes, indicating a heart capable of the emotions and susceptibilities which add true dignity to a beautiful woman. Her lustrous raven hair fell in ringlets down her snowy neck, as though they were actually sensitive, and chased each other in conflict to kiss away the delicately tinted blushes which suffused it in rapid succession upon the slightest impulse. She was in stature rather above than below the middle size, with a contour of body which corresponded faultlessly with her height; and her exquisitely rounded limbs would have bid defiance to the warm imagery of an artist's chisel, and rendered his divine exertions nugatory. But, waiving these physical accomplishments, there lay hidden beneath an artless simplicity of manner—beauties of the mind of a far more attractive character. Few could indeed venture within the limits of her melodious voice and interesting conversation, without experiencing those thrilling sensations within the bosom, which generally affect the romantic. Her elastic and happy flow of spirits, giving evidence of a happy heart, would enliven the most sedate, and bring out the remnant of pleasurable feeling yet in the bosom; and thus she was the acknowledged star of the social circle.

In the course of time, Mr. Mordant had acquired a capacity sufficiently good for the transactions of a mercantile man. He had, during five years' incessant labor in all the intricate and perplexing systems which are brought into requisition in the enactment of business, so informed himself upon all matters relating to commerce, that he felt confident his professional studies had fitted him for the active duties of life. It was the desire of his father, and also that of his preceptor, who took a lively interest in the young man, that he should travel for one year in the United States and another year in Europe, for the purpose of giving him an opportunity to form just views of life, by affording him a knowledge of the pursuits of the people on this and the other side of the Atlantic.

After having made his tour through our States, he embarked for England, and, at the end of a twelvemonth, returned to his native country. Whilst at New York, he was introduced to many of the most prominent families resident there. His pleasing manner and fascinating address seemed to gain him the good feelings of every one with whom he associated.

Chapter II.

On a fine afternoon in June, the thoroughfares of the city presented an imposing spectacle to the general observer. Broadway was crowded with persons, some of whom owed their darkly bright eyes, and ruddy complexions, to some fair foreign climes. The gay, brilliant belle promenading with her devoted gallant—the gorgeous equipages, filled with the fairest of the beautiful in creation—the silvery spray twisting itself into a thousand different wreaths in the Park; all these contributed to heighten the grandeur of the scene. At five o'clock P. M., Mr. Mordant stepped into his hotel, where a letter was handed him, addressed to R. Mordant, Astor House, in a lady's delicate hand-writing. Hastily breaking the seal, and opening the sheet, he discovered a watch-guard, curiously plaited, of lady's hair, of a dark color and lustrous nature, accompanied by these few words—"wear this for thy friend."

Musing for some time in the parlor, with his eyes fixed on the guard, he broke forth into audible language—"Who could have sent me this valued treasure?"

His mind was engaged for several days in reflecting upon this mysterious epistle. He was not able to conjecture from whom it came, and he resolved to mark closely the countenance of every fair damsel of his acquaintance. At successive intervals he received from the same source a number of tokens, of a similar nature. Still more surprised, as letters at different times were handed him of this description, while he could not imagine to whom they owed their origin, or to whom he was indebted for such distinguished marks of favor. "The mysterious author must be discovered," thought he, one day; "I will not rest satisfied until I shall have endeavored to my utmost to find out the fair unknown."

As he was occupied by these reflections, another from the same source was received, and on opening it, he found, to his eager curiosity, it contained a valuable diamond ring. Quick as thought he placed it upon his finger, and, to his astonishment, found it to fit precisely. He was in ecstacies. Upon carefully examining the ring, he found the initials of his name and the word "love" engraven on its inner surface. Matters now assumed a serious aspect, and he felt convinced no one would conduct an affair like this unless the most tender feelings were enlisted toward him. The author must be an intimate acquaintance, too, for how could she know the exact size of his finger? He was determined, if possible, to trace it to its origin.

One day, whilst walking in Broadway, he met his intimate friend James Norvell, a jeweller, whom he had known in England, and with whom he had contracted the most lively friendship, who asked him to accompany him to his jewelry establishment, for the purpose of having a conversation in relation to their travels in the East. Mr. Norvell stated that he had been extraordinarily successful in the collection of his kind of merchandizes; that he had brought with him two beautiful diamond rings of the most exquisite workmanship, which he recommended to his friend as something superb.

"Let me see them," remarked Mr. Mordant.

"I can show you but one of them, as I disposed of the other immediately upon the opening of my jewellery," returned Mr. Norvell.

The instant Mr. Mordant saw the remaining one, he found it to match the one on his finger; he held them both to his friend, who ejaculated—

"Happy fellow!—is it possible you can have an acquaintance with the beautiful creature I sold it to?"

"You sold it to?" echoed Mr. Mordant.

"Yes," replied Mr. Norvell, "I have been dreaming nightly of her since I saw her; why, sir, she is the most loveable being my vision ever beheld. May I ask you for an introduction?"

"An introduction!" responded Mr. Mordant, apparently in a reverie.

Mr. Norvell noticed a singularity in the manner of his friend; he felt still a deeper interest in the fair one, and urged him for an explanation; upon which Mordant gave him an account of the mysterious reception of the more mysterious epistles and their contents.

"And is it possible you have no knowledge from whom you received these tokens?"

"No, sir. Can you give me any information upon that point?"

"That is not in my power," answered Mr. Norvell; "but she is so bewitchingly beautiful, that I would travel a thousand miles to discover her, and again feast my eyes upon her transcendant beauty. Her voice has the richest melody my ears ever drank; she must be discovered."

"Describe her to me," said Mordant.

"That were impossible; she is beautiful as a dream—fair as an enthusiast's vision."

"What was the colour of her hair?"

"Dusky as a midnight shadow."

"And her eyes?"

"Ah! they were bright as the guzelle's."

"And her person?"

"Was finely developed; and there was a sylph-like ease and grace in her movements, which I never before saw in any lady."

"She must be discovered!" echoed Mordant; and before the friends separated, they drank to the disclosure of the "fair unknown."

In going to his hotel, Mordant was racking his brain to catch even a supposition of the unknown author of their sweet troubles. He at last could arrive at no other or more satisfactory conclusion, than that it may have been his cousin

"Surely," thought he, "my jeweller friend's description corresponds well with my cousin. She. I must confess, is beautiful; and she, too, knows the size of my finger, for she has a ring of mine at this present moment. So, it is possible it may be my dark-eyed cousin."

Chapter III.

Mr. Ashley, the good old preceptor of Mr. Mordant, was a man of wealth and enterprise; and having in view the future welfare of his young friend, he made a very fair proposition to him—sufficiently so to induce him to embark in trade with a very solid and substantial capital. The mercantile house was to have been established in one of the Southern States, and finally Charleston was selected for its seat. After matters were all arranged, Mordant set out upon his journey southward, for his future residence. On his way thither, he proposed travelling leisurely through the middle States, where a number of his friends resided.

Some ten days after he left New York, he touched a small village in Pennsylvania where an uncle resided, who urged him to remain for a time, partly for the reason that he would be pleased to have him in his family, for they were attached to him, and partly to become one of the guests of a village festival which was to take place in a few days. On the urgent solicitation of his friends, he consented to remain and enjoy himself in the society of people whose whole object of life seemed to be the promotion of each other's happiness. I have myself travelled in this part of the country, and was so fascinated with every thing which presented itself to my view, that I was induced to linger for weeks in this glorious region. As you approach the village, you ascend a high platform of land, which enables you to enjoy a superb sweep of the eye for a distance of twenty miles, presenting a vast vale, shut out by mountains on either side, whose lofty crowns seemed to converse with the clouds, and between whose sides lay, in splendid repose, all that delights the vision of the enthusiast. The village, as it lay in the evening sun, with its white houses and green blinds—the happy abodes of the inhabitants—the silver stream, as it glided musically along, and upon whose small islands the ardent lover repaired to relate the touching story of his love by moonlight alone—the chrystal spring, which ebbed its waters on, meandering through the green fields and meadows—the cool and refreshing glen, which echoed and re-echoed to the sound of your voice, until the reverberations melted into distance and silence;—all, all gave such a charm to the scene, as to envelope the sense of the spectator in an ecstacy of rapture.

At length the day arrived for a village festival. Sylph Island was selected for this occasion. This was a little island rising romantically out of the waters of the silver stream which glided near the village. As you enter upon it, you cross a curiously woven bridge of reeds, which presents to the observer one of the most novel and rustic of contrivances. Sylph Island is about half a mile in length, and one quarter in breadth. One part, the westward, is a flat-topped hill, that projects some twenty or thirty feet above the level of the stream, from which you are presented with one of the liveliest landscapes in this country. The scenery is wildly and variously beautiful and rich, and seemed to be secluded from the bustle and confusion of the harrassing scenes of the business world. To the south, rises to view, in bold and majestic relief, the high summit of a craggy mountain; a glorious vale was extended, smiling cheerfully in the morning sun. Nature luxuriated in all her beauty in this romantic valley. Near the foot of the island there is a narrow glen, some fifteen or twenty feet below the level of the water, covered with shady trees, and in its centre are massy rocks, out of which spouts a natural fountain to the height of sixteen feet. Multitudes of shrubs and trees of various kinds were growing on the island in wild abundance.

Invitations had been accepted by numerous friends at a distance to participate in the enjoyments of the happy villagers, which swelled the participants to above three hundred—all of which formed in procession to move toward Sylph Island. The morning was balmy and beautiful. Art had been united with nature to render the island as fascinating as possible. A rich archway of flowers was suspended over the reed bridge—winding walks, lined with oderiferous flowers, were woven around in tendrilled drapery, forming shadowy bowers—dark groves of pine clustered in thick profusion, through which the eye could scarcely penetrate, and under which rustic sofas were placed. In short, all was so arranged that you could not help but believe that you were in a fairy land, or a dream too fair for reality. And "Rich voices emne telling that there were met,

Beauty, and youth, and mirth, whose buoyant wings,
Soaring aloft, o'er thoughts that gloom and fret,
Gave man release from care, or lured him to forget.
Light maidens dancing with elastic bound,
Like fairy revellers, in one place were seen;
And gentle friends were slowly pacing, where
The dark thick laurels formed a bowery screen;
And merry children, like the moonlight fair,
With their wild pealing laughter filled the perfumed air."

Among the revellers was a maiden surpassingly beautiful, who seemed so happy-hearted—so full of bounding spirits—so full of innocence and love—so abounding of the finer feelings of our nature, that she twined herself around your very heart-strings, and impressed her image upon the innermost tablet of your soul. Her rich, clear, silvery voice, rang so joyously upon your ear—those soul-speaking eyes told a thousand tales of love and romance, such as only hover in the visions of an angelic spirit—her wavy, golden hair, floated down her well-formed shoulders—her elastic step and movement, accompanied with a flow of sprightliness the most exhilarating and buoyant—and her frank, confiding manner, constrained every one to love her. Mordant was struck with the beauty and gentleness of Mary Morris, and whilst mixing in the happy throng in search of a friend for the purpose of soliciting an introduction, the whole assembly broke forth with the song—

The woodland bird is on the wing,
A bloom upon the blushing flower;
Sweet odours on the breath of spring,
Are stealing from the rosy bower.

The timbrel sounds upon the mead,
Then join, oh! join the mirth and song;
And every youth shall gaily lead
A maid to trip the dance along.

While laughing sylph and sporting fairy
Watch us with a smile of love,
And in their haunt so high and airy,
Dance—as we below—above.

Mary Morris' full clear voice was heard above the rest, and Mordant's heart was touched with the thrilling sensations of love. He delayed not in obtaining an introduction and an hour afterwards you might have noticed them strolling along the flowery walks—ascending the high elevations—lingering beneath the cool, refreshing foliage—listening to the birds' sweet songs—straying in happy solitude near the romantic fountain: and finally walking arm in arm towards a lofty elm, under whose wide-spread branches was a rustic sofa, upon which they seated themselves.

"Your choice, Miss Morris," remarked Mr. Mordant, "is indeed a beautiful one. All nature may not produce a lovelier spot than this, and it is here you are accustomed to pass your summer twilights. I am not at all surprised that you are so attached to this place."

"Yes, Mr. Mordant, and besides the beautiful scenery and quietness which prevail here, in connexion therewith, are associated many delightful impressions which must ever be remembered with affection."

"And I too, Miss Morris, have realized here an impression which must ever live to render this spot immortal in my mind: for I have seen a lady this day who has kindled in my breast emotions such as I never before experienced—those of love.

"Is it possible any one could have awakened the spirit of love in so brief a period?"

"Love lingers so heavily in the bosom, that when called forth, it springs to maturity in a moment."

"May it not then be tender, and very easily broken?"

"Nay, believe me, when sown upon true soil, it is fixed unalterably and immovably—the root strikes downward, and in an instant you behold the flower in full bloom."

"Do, Mr. Mordant, make me your confidant—you will find that I will keep your secrets quite close, indeed, I'll make an excellent confessor."

"With all my heart. She is seated by my side—my sweet listener—will she hold forth to me the bow of hope? Oh! bid me hope—give me some assurance that my feelings are not disregarded—give me some"——

At this juncture, a young girl came bounding up to them, and interrupted him in his all-absorbing conversation and declaration, breathing out the feelings from an over-charged soul. At the instant the girl saw Mordant, she shrunk back timidly, and was on the eve of leaving them to their tete-a-tete, when Miss Morris requested her to remain—but there was a shyness in her manner which Mordant remarked. A slight embarrassment followed, when Miss Morris presented Mr. Mordant to Miss Me-Me of New York.

Chapter IV.

The young girl Me-Me, who interrupted Mordant when in the very act of pouring out the intense passion of his soul to one who had that day taken his heart captive, was the subject of a singular history. When at the age of five years, she was with her parents on a tour through our far western country, and whilst in one of the Territories, they lost their way into a dense forest, where they met a band of savages, who attacked them with all the fury which their hatred towards the whites prompted. Struggling to the utmost, the travellers saved their lives, but the darling of their hearts was captured and carried to the Indian camp. When they again found their way to the settlements, every assistance was rendered them to regain the fond object, but all exertions proved futile. The mother was almost frantic, and nothing could comfort her; even the soothing influence of time itself was not capable to reconcile her to the unfortunate bereavement.

The captors exulted in having been successful in robbing the distressed parents, and as they conveyed the little innocent into the gloomy wilderness amid all its cries and struggles, they broke forth into hideous laughter; feeling confidant that the loss caused sorrow to the pale faces, which pleased them, and they knew their old chief would be highly gratified in gaining so valuable a prize. When the child was presented to the chief he was rejoiced to see the fair-skin beauty, and its innocent and touching appeals softened the bosom of the stern old warrior, so that it became his first favorite, and was adopted into his family. He would embrace and fondle his Me-Me's until at last she was won by the kindness and caresses of the warrior and his squaw. They instructed her in all the amusements which the Indian indulges in; and as year after year passed on, she budded into beauty and loveliness, and warrior and chieftain came from a far distance to look upon her fair beauty—dark thrilling eyes and long jetty hair—and she seemed to them as some bright spirit come to delight their vision. Among the nation was a United States Agent, who transacted the business affairs between our government and the tribe, who watched with glowing admiration her expanding loveliness. He loved her with all the energy of an ardent bosom, but was constrained to nurse the flame in secret, nor would he disclose his passion to his most intimate friends, fearing the sweet one would be snatched from him by the old chief, who intended her for his eldest son. Notwithstanding she was much attached to her Indian family and those around her, yet the Agent succeeded in persuading her to leave, and accordingly arrangements were made to prosecute their design in escaping to New York and from her future intended fate. They arrived at the end of their journey safely.

Me-Me was placed with Mrs. Jameston, an intimate acquaintance of the Agent's, who was requested to use every means to fit her for refined society. Every thing seemed strange and novel to the young creature, and there stole occasionally over her spirit the recollection of her fond companions in her wild home—but the unceasing attentions of that lady were at length appreciated, and she learned to look upon her guardian as upon a fond parent. No pains were spared in the cultivation of her mind, and it seemed to delight her when she experienced the development of her intellectual faculties.

After having resided in New York some four years, Mr. Jameston gave a very brilliant entertainment expressly for Me-Me's sake, and a great number of the elite of the city were present. Mordant and his cousin were amongst the gay and bright. When Me-Me saw Mordant, the sweet feeling of love crept within her heart, and she would by stealth drink in the rich language which fell from his lips. She would linger by the side of Emma in all her movements, until the most free and unreserved intercourse followed. She was a great admirer of trinkets, and noticing a ring on Emma's finger which pleased her taste, she would not be satisfied until she had ascertained the size of it—from whom it came, and where the giver resided: who happened to be Mordant himself. She was furnished with all the information respecting it, and no one suspected there was a tender regard felt for him, but that it was a mere curiosity which is characteristic to the Indian, and which she contracted in her wild western home.

After the party, Mordant was ever in her imagination, and she cherished those sweet emotions which love engenders, singling out a life at once bright and joyous. In one of her romantic moods she had a guard-chain plaited of her own hair, which she enclosed in a letter addressed to the idol of her heart. At different times she presented him with favours of a similar kind, and she one day purchased and presented him with the diamond ring with which the reader is already acquainted. And the surprise and fear of having been discovered, caused her to shrink back on Sylph Island, when she recognised Mordant in company with Miss Morris. Me-Me was the guest of Mary Morris on this occasion, and had passed some time in that part of the country during the fore-part of the summer, but arrangements had now been made to start for Philadelphia and the Northern Springs, the morning following the festival.

On the evening preceding her departure, the two maidens strolled down the valley, entered Sylph Island, for the purpose of witnessing by moonlight the magnificence of the surrounding scenery; and as they ascended the hill-top to glance down the deep vale and bright prospect, the silvery moon was just rising above the eastern hills, shining with resplendant lustre—spreading the horizon in one transcendant glow of beauty. The vapoury clouds were fringed with gold and purple, forming themselves into a thousand different winged cars—the tree tops waived gracefully in the mellow light, and the music of the stream ushered forth its harmonious lullaby as it glided along. On they went, still ascending till they touched the roots of the old elm, where some hours before the spot was made one of moment. When they seated themselves they thought they heard a slight rustling in the bower beyond them, but all was again hushed in deep silence. A strange awkwardness came over Me-Me, and she placed her hand first upon her heart, and then upon her head, which Mary noticed with some anxiety.

"And what," inquired she, "dear Me-Me, is the cause of the distress? I noticed this afternoon a shadow upon your brow; yes, ever since Mr Mordant was introduced to you."

"Ah, Mary, there is something which burns here," pointing to her head; "and something which aches here," pointing to her heart.

"What can have occasioned it, dearest Me-Me?" She reclined her head gently upon Mary's bosom, and replied:

"He was the fault—he was the fault. Whenever I think of him my heart grows big with feeling. I like to think of him, and often dream bright dreams of him."

"Did you ever see him before this day?"

"Yes, often, at New York; once at a party; he looked so kind. I will tell you the secret of my soul. I beg you will never divulge it. It was I who presented him with that ring which I noticed him wear to-day, but he did not know me—no, he did not know me. I am forgotten by him, and he is to me the dearest being in the world."

Mary noticed the large tears course down the cheek of Me-Me, when she consoled her by saying fate would arrange all things aright. It was fast verging toward the noon of night, when the two maidens reached their dwelling.

"Did you hear all, Mordant?" exclaimed Frank Hilson, to his friend, as they sat listening to the confidential conversation of Mary and Me-me, behind some intervening shrubbery. They had called upon the ladies in the early part of the evening, but found they were absent; so they wandered to Sylph Island, and in the position in which they were placed, could not avoid overhearing what was spoken.

"Yes," said Mordant; "and is it not strange that I did not recognize to-day one who was the object of so much anxiety? Well, she is truly beautiful, but Miss Morris has gained my heart."

The night was passed rather uneasily by Mordant, and he could not avoid the important matter of the day crowding heavily upon his mind. Love will have a powerful effect upon all, whether upon dispositions romantic or philosophic. The imagination is wrought upon with a mysterious influence, disturbing the regular balance of thought, and bringing the whole force of the mind to centre upon one all-important, all-absorbing object.

Long before daybreak, Mordant was heard pacing up and down his chamber, and some of the members of his uncle's family felt uneasy respecting his health. Just as the sun rose beautifully in the East, the stage coach rattled past the door towards Philadelphia. After a while breakfast was announced, but he could partake of none. The hours seemed to move upon leaden wings. He was burning for the hour to approach when he could unburthen the whole weight which lay upon his heart. His bosom was filled with generous and noble sentiments, and he resolved to offer the wealth of his first love to Mary Morris. He ascended the steps of her dwelling with some agitation, and touched the spring of the bell; and the summons was answered that Miss Morris was not in. He strolled to Sylph Island in search of her, for he thought she had probably sallied forth to enjoy the cool and refreshing morning air. In an hour he returned with a palpitating heart, when he was informed that she had that morning left for Philadelphia.

Chapter V.

The Southern and Western newspaper journals noticed the establishment of a new mercantile house over the signature of R. Mordant & Co. At their establishment were observed indications of a large and well arranged business. Weeks sped slowly to Mordant, and the time passed heavily; restlessness was seen in all his manner. Strange how the first impressions of love affect the young—what bright dreams are indulged in at one time, and what heart-breaking agony is felt at another; what a glorious future is woven out by the imagination at one moment, and again what a desert flits across the mind, when the lover asks himself the question, will she or not bless me with her love? O, suspense created within the human breast—those gnawings, those soul-sickening disturbances of the mind, which, when encouraged, strike a well-directed dagger to the heart. Mordant was in suspense, in horrible suspense. He had left unfinished a portion of the declaration of his heart, to one whom he loved with a generous and noble affection—had received no indication of favour on her part, by which he might even hope for a reciprocity of feeling; had been disappointed in looking again upon her matchless beauty; had been deprived of listening to a voice whose music had touched the silken chords of love, and was compelled to live for a season away from those tones. But he delayed not in starting toward the north in search of her whose image wandered by his side in all his movements: whether he trod the busy mart of trade, or reclined beneath the leafy orange tree, Mary's image was ever hovering above, around him. Whether in the starry night or early morn—the dewy eve or noon of day—she would be his companion; and he sped swiftly as the iron steed could fly, through the balmy air from the Southern to the Northern clime.

Saratoga was crowded with strangers from all parts of our country, and it was said never was a finer display witnessed at this fashionable resort of youthful female beauty, than on this occasion.

On a pleasant day, Mary Morris, with Me-Me by her side, and a stately gentleman, were seen together in a walk at this favourite watering place, when Mordant arrived. Mary looked upon him with pleasure and with pain—with pleasure, because he had lit the lamp of love within her heart, which now burned brightly—with pain, because she could not, would not, accept the hand of one for whom her dear Me-Me nursed and cherished a love of the purest character.

On one occasion Mordant and Mary stole quietly from the bustling throng, when the subject was renewed.

"And must I again return without hope! Why is it," observed he, "that you cannot disclose the secret which prevents you from accepting my hand? You have acknowledged your heart is mine."

"Yes; you, I must admit, have the full bestowal of my affections—but I would be false to woman's honor did I accept your hand. Let the past be forgotten, since there is so great an obstacle in our way."

"And why, dearest Mary, wilt thou let me live in agonising suspense? And why not disclose this secret to one whose very existence would be embittered, should you not disclose it?"

"Never, believe me, can I be prevailed upon, under present circumstances, to acquaint you with it. Never—no, never!"

In an hour afterwards, Mordant had left for New York, sick at heart, and ill at ease. At one of the hotels he accidentally met his parents on their way to Saratoga, and they insisted upon it that he should accompany them thither. He did so with reluctance. Some time after their arrival they were ushered into a room where two ladies and gentlemen were seated in conversation. Mordant at once recognised Mary Morris and Me-Me, with Mary's father and brother, to whom he introduced his parents. The moment his mother saw Me-Me, she looked in the most intense manner upon her. It was a long, piercing, steadfast look, as though she was hesitating between doubt and certainty, and then she shrieked "it is Clara," and fell senseless upon the floor.

At the mention of the name Clara, Me-Me stood motionless, gazing with an abstracted air, as though she were awakening out of a long deep sleep; or as if a long vanished, faded vision, flitted across her brain, and opened the flood-gates of memory, bringing to view the early days of childhood, when she breathed the endearing name of mother. Every attention was paid to the restoration of Mrs. Mordant. When she recovered, she called the Indian girl to her, having observed a locket, attached to a gold chain, which she examined with trembling anxiety. She took the locket in her hand, and touching a secret spring, a lid opened, on the inner side of which was engraven "Clara Mordant."

"Yes!" exclaimed the agitated parent, "it is our long lost Clara."

The truth burst upon Me-Me's mind; she gazed wildly around and sprung upon her mother's bosom with a fond embrace, and wept. After their feelings were somewhat subdued, her father approached her with a feeling of paternal love and gratitude, such as a parent under similar circumstances can alone experience. Richard now came nigh, and taking her hand in his, exclaimed, "My dear sister Clara!" She looked into his face with a fond, inexpressible gaze, and a heart too full for utterance. She stood motionless and speechless for a moment, then syllabled the affectionate name of "brother."

Every heart was filled with joy—the bereaved had found their long lost child. The brother had found a sister, and the lonely child of the forest, who thought she was without relations, found both parents and brother.

Mordant suspected that the obstacle which prevented Mary from accepting him, was now removed. Again the tender tale of love was breathed into her ear, and her eloquent eye answered the sweet language which flowed to her soul, as her hand nestled unconsciously in the clasp of her lover. There was no refusal now, and upon her finely chiselled features gleamed a beautiful smile of acceptance.

Two years elapsed since the festival on Sylph Island transpired, and once more the same romantic spot was a scene of festivity. Richard Mordant and his happy wife were there in the full remembrance of the past; and Me-Me, now Clara Mordant, was also there; and James Norvell led the jewel he had treasured in his heart since the first time he saw her, before a priest, and Clara became "his bride."

BALTIMORE, 1845.

THE KENNEBEC SLOOP
And the English Cruisers.
A TALE OF THE LAST WAR.

BY PROF. J. H. INGRAHAM.

The river Kennebec, in Maine, is without a rival in New England, either for its historic associations or the beauty of its natural scenery. It rises among the passes of the Highlands that form the north-east boundary line, between the United States and Canada, and after flowing through a romantic region for many leagues, enters a valley of surpassing beauty, through which it meanders between level intervales of the richest verdure. The waters of this river are remarkable for their limpid transparency, while in a body their appearance is nearly black. The hills that rise on either shore are bold and nobly wooded; and here and there frown above the silently gliding wave, dark granite precipices, clad with moss and the graceful wreaths of the mountain vine whose beauty is ever-verdant. Falls and rapids, characterised by wildness and even sublimity, at intervals, break the dark rolling tide of this beautiful river, and with their roar awaken the echoes of the forest-clad hills.

Numerous picturesque villages adorn its banks, and substantial farm-houses, with uplands and lowlands shining with golden grain, met the eye at every league. The capital of the State, Augusta, stands upon a fine table or plateau, seventy feet above the river, in the bosom of embracing hills, and commanding some of the loveliest scenery in the north. Its waters are enlivened by the canvass of thriving commerce, and its umbrageous streets of villas indicate a population of wealth and refined taste.

Below the capital, the river laves the shores of other fair towns, rivals in prosperity of the capital, and reflects upon its glassy bosom from either shore the mansions of luxury. Before reaching the sea, it leaps all at once from a deep gorge, in whose rocky arms it has been for some minutes confined, and spreads out into a noble bay a league in breadth. At the southern side of this broad expanse, it enters another narrow pass between rocky islets, and sweeping along a few more miles further, with stately motion, passing the handsome town of Bath, it rolls between wild precipices with olden time fortresses, to discharge its shining waters frowning into the blue ocean.

It is in the vicinity of Bath, and of one of these fortresses at the mouth of the river, that we lay the scene of our story. If we have lingered to discourse of the fair Kennebec,* it is because our heart is with this beautiful river. Upon its banks we spent our boyhood, and in maturer age we have chosen it as our summer home. We love its dark waters, its green-wooded hills, its valleys and its rocky cliffs. In no land have we found a river of such beauty! The Hudson is majestic and grandly beautiful in its features; the Kennebec is the Hudson in miniature; and if the tasteful traveller will come and visit it in the spring and summer time, when the sun is bright and the winds are still, he will gaze upon its pleasant shores and beauteous windings with scarce less pleasure, without the awe, than he has felt in passing up the Hudson.

There is a fortress near the mouth of this river, just on the skirts of the sea, called Fort Hunnewell. It is now dismantled, and is a celebrated resort in July weather for the Kennebeckers. It was erected during the last war to defend the entrance to the river. It is situated upon a low beach, which, half a mile northward, is commanded by a bold headland a hundred feet in height, on which also frown the ruins of a battery. The scenery around is made up of rocky islands, bold headlands, the river penetrating far inland, the ocean spreading its bosom away south and eastwardly, ever and forever heaving as if it were earth's great heart! A few fishermen's huts dot the sides of the shores, and the tower of Seguin light glitters white upon the head of its porpoise-shaped island. The fisher's skiff rocks lightly on the sea, and upon the hazy horizon rests a sail or two, so distant that they seem fixed like shining pinnacles of white marble lifting their tops above the ocean.

At the period of our story, which was near the close of the last war, two British armed vessels had been cruising off the mouth of the river for some days, occasionally running close in with the fort so as to draw its fire, and then tacking and standing seaward again. One of these vessels was a sloop of war and the other a brig of sixteen guns. They were effectually blockading the river, and for some time no vessel had either come out or gone in. Every thing was brought to, even to the small fishing boat, and the strictest vigilance was maintained from the very first day of their arrival on the coast.

One morning in June, just as the sun was rising from the sea, flinging his fiery spears far across the sparkling waves, kindling up every object upon which they lit, the two English vessels were seen standing in towards the mouth of the river, under top-gallant sails, with the wind free on the starboard quarter. They were about half a mile apart, their courses converging to a point. This point was a small Kennebec sloop hugging the land, and endeavoring to make the entrance of the Kennebec. Her broad main sail was flung to the wind like a great white wing, and she was sweeping along across the water like a gull flying before a storm. She had been discovered by the cruisers only a few minutes before, when they tacked together and pressed after her to intercept her, making sail as they went. Fifteen minutes more of the obscurity of morning, and the adventurous sloop would have got into the river and under the guns of the fort unseen, or seen too late to be cut off.

It was a beautiful sight to behold the three vessels in motion; one small, unarmed and with but three sails to help her flight, bounding along close under the land; the others tall, frowning with batteries and covered with canvass from deck to truck.

The sloop was two miles in shore of the cruisers, and about the same distance westward of the mouth of the harbor, being, when discovered, just stealing round Cape Small Point. She had, therefore, the same distance to run to gain shelter, that her pursuers had to come up with her present position.

The cruisers stood on for about five minutes after tacking in the same converging lines, when the corvette signalized the brig, which immediately luffed and bore up four points eastward, while the former kept her first course. The object had in view by this manœuvre of the brig, it was plainly evident to the fishermen who, from the rocks on which their huts were perched, were watching with interest the pursuing and the pursued, was to intercept her; for they had quickly discovered that a direct chase would be ineffectual, as the sloop showed herself to be a very fast sailer. So the brig stood straight towards the mouth, hoping to reach it in advance of the sloop, while the sloop of war kept on to capture her if she should turn back and attempt to run into Harpswell or Portland.

"We shall be tuk, darned if we an't, Deacon," coolly remarked a tall, ungainly youth of nineteen, who, with a dipper fastened to a ten foot handle, was bailing up water from the sea and throwing it over the mainsail of the sloop, to swell the threads of the canvass and make it better hold the wind.

As he spoke, he paused in his work, leaned upon his long dipper-handle, and shutting one eye, took a deliberate survey of the two cruisers.

"Not so long as two timbers of the Polly Ann hold together, 'Siah," responded the Deacon, who grasped the helm, and who, with one eye ahead and the other watching the enemy, directed the course of his little vessel towards the shelter he sought.—"If we'd ony had another ten minits afore sun-up, we'd a got in. But the day an't goin' to stop for any man, and I don't 'spect it to. All we must do, is to keep the Polly out o' the hands o' the Britishers now they've got their eyes on us. Wet the sails, 'Siah! Keep wettin' 'em!"

"I guess they kind o' guess what we've got aboard, Deacon," said 'Siah, as he cast a shower of spray over the mainsail. "They seem to take allfired trouble to catch us. See how Polly jumps!—The way she tosses water with her bows, I won't have to wet her jib; she does that herself!"

"If we don't get into the river, and them chaps overhaul us, what in natur's to be done, Deacon?"

"It won't do to let 'em capture the six big guns, and two barrels o' powder, and ton o' shot that we've got for the fort, that's a fact, 'Siah," said, very decidedly, Captain, or rather "Deacon" Paul Butterfield, who both owned and commanded the Polly, which had been, a few days before, engaged by the government agent in Boston to convey armament and ammunition to Fort Hunnewell. This enterprize the Deacon, for he was a lawful Deacon in his own town, which was Hallowell, forty miles up the river, had cheerfully undertaken, assuring the agent he could get the Polly Ann into the river safely, in spite of the cruisers. Shrewd, bold and cool, the Deacon saw that by running only in the night, and hugging the shore, he should probably be able to get into the Kennebec undiscovered, especially as the cruisers used to stand off shore at night a league or two for an offing, and run in again at sun-rise. The agent felt that a small coasting vessel, with so skilful a captain as Deacon Butterfield, would be quite as likely to get into the river as a large one, if not more so, and gave him the commission. For the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, the Deacon had bargained to take the [illegible] and the munitions to the Kennebec, and also he bound himself, if there was danger of his being captured, to scuttle the sloop and sink her. We now see him thus far in the progress of his enterprise.

The cannon were long battery thirty-two's, six in number, and were laid athwart ships, side by side, upon deck. The shot were piled forward, and in the forecastle was stowed the powder, in casks, and securely protected under canvass; tarpaulins also covered the guns.

"If we can ony stand on ten minutes more, 'Siah," said the Deacon to his mate, "I don't fear them are two cruisers a stick! One on 'em you see has luffed to try and cut us off. If 'twant for this plaguy heavy iron we've got in her, I'd show the enemy how to make a keel cut blue water through! But we must get in, Lot," he added, turning to a rugged old man, who looked like a weather-beaten fisherman, who comprised all his crew, and who was now engaged in tending the main-sheet, the slack of which he held in his iron fist.

"It's get in safely, Deacon," answered Lot Bissel gruffly, "and get two hundred and fifty dollars, or it's sink the sloop, and no insurance!"

"That's a fac, Mr. Bissel," responded the Yankee skipper, with emphasis; and shifting his tobacco from his larboard to his starboard cheek, he glanced under the main boom to see how the fort and shore lay, and then hove his eye to windward and took with it deliberate inspection of the enemy.

"Give a small pull aft on the main-sheet, Mr. Bissel. 'Siah, haul aft the jib a bit! The Britisher s smoking his pipe!" added the skipper, quietly, as he saw a jet of smoke belched from the bow of the sloop of war. He had hardly got the words out of his mouth, when the boom of a gun reached their ears, and simultaneously a shot passed whizzing over their ears.

"I don't stan' that 'are!" said 'Siah, in a very determined tone, which singularly contrasted with his awkward, rustic exterior. "Give me leave, Deacon, and I'll give them a shot back, darn me if I don't!"

"Your gun won't scare 'em, 'Siah. Ease off the main-sheet, Lot. Be ready to dodge, for I guess there'll be another one o' them junks o' iron this way. They an't no pilot, or they would'nt keep so near porpoise rock ledge!"

Cool and steady, the skipper stood at his post, and directed the course of his little craft. All at once he gave a loud hurrah! The sloop of war had struck, under full sail, upon a rock, bare at low water, known as porpoise ledge, and everything was taken aback, while her main-royal mast and yard went over the side.

"That is for not taking a pilot on a strange coast," said the skipper, dryly, while his keen little eyes fairly glittered with pleasure, but he made no further demonstrations of joy; but after taking a second glance at the sloop of war, and seeing that matters on board of her were in too much confusion for them to trouble themselves further about him, he now gave his whole attention to the brig, which was about a mile and a half from him in a straight line, and about equally distant from the entrance to the river.

Upon seeing the accident that had occurred to her consort, she bore down a little, and hoisted a signal. It was responded to on board the sloop, when the brig resumed her course.

"The sloop-of-war, I suppose, says she don't want any aid; so the brig is left at liberty to intercept us;" said the skipper. "It looks, too, as if she would be likely to get to the entrance as soon as the Polly; and then I guess it's all up with us! But I don't give up, so long as a timber hangs to her, or I can have a limb to hold on to the tiller by! But what in natur' are you doin' there, 'Siah?"

Well might the Deacon ask this question. The ambitious young Kennebecker had brought from the forecastle a keg of powder, and knocked in the head with a handspike, and was now tying some half peck of it up in a bandanna handkerchief, which he had taken from his neck.

"Doin'? I am goin' to give 'em a gun, darn'd if I an't! If these here guns is got to go to Davy's locker, I'll git one fire out on 'em first, I guess!"

As 'Siah spoke he threw down a moveable section of the bulwark amidships, leaving an open space to the sea, before the muzzles of three of the enormous cannon that lay across the deck. He then took up his huge cartridge, and thrusting it into the muzzle of one of them, began to ram it down with a handspike.

"What on airth is the critter at?" cried the Deacon.

'Siah made no reply; but having rammed the cartridge home, he rolled a thirty-two pound shot towards it, and giving it a lift, shoved it into the muzzle after the powder.

"Now for priming her; and then I guess if I dont give 'em a Fourth o' July salute, they never heerd one!"

As he spoke, he poured a handful of powder upon the vent, and then jumping to the caboose, caught up a lighted pine knot, and waving it to keep it bright, approached the gun.

"Stop, 'Siah, stop!" shouted the skipper, at the top of his voice; "you'll blow the Polly Ann to Jericho, if you fire that are gun aboard on her!"

"I don't calculate I'll be took pris'ner by the Britishers, Deacon, and be put in Dartmoor, I guess! I don't mean to fire jist yet, but take a chance for a good aim, and then give 'em saltpetre!"

"It'll shake every bone out o' the Polly!" said the captain, in alarm.

As he spoke, the brig, now within a mile distance, fired a shot across her bows.

"That means heave to, Lot," said the skipper. "'Siah, put out that pine knot."

"I mean to, by 'm by, Deacon! Wait till I get a shot at 'em! I an't afeerd o' hartin' the sloop a bit! You just yaw her a leetle bit, and bring the muzzle o' my artillery piece right agin the brig, and if I don't show 'em how a Yankee gun can speak, I don't never want to see the inside o' Kennebec river agin!"

A second gun came from the brig, and the shot passed within ten feet of the Deacon's head, made a rent a fathom long in his mainsail, and the shock caused his peak halyards to part, and let the peak of his mainsail down. This caused the sloop to fall off a point or two; and while the skipper, unflinching and with a quiet look, was trying to bring her to the wind again, 'Siah, taking advantage of a moment as she swung, in which his loaded gun bore upon the brig, instantly applied the torch to the vent! The roar, the flame, and the concussion were terrific.

The little vessel reeled under the recoil of the vast gun, till the waves poured in over her bows and stern. The skipper and Lot were laid flat upon deck, while 'Siah found himself hanging by the heels in the lee shrouds.

For a few moments the Deacon thought his vessel would go down, she wallowed and plunged so—but she soon steadied herself, though with her deck flooded, her jib blown away, and her windlass unshipped.

"I guess if they got the shot, it 'll settle 'em," said 'Siah, as he dropped feet first out of the rigging, into which he had been blown, upon deck, and tried to see through the smoke.

"You ought to be settled, you 'tarnal critter!" cried the Deacon, enraged; "you like to have sunk her, darn ye!"

"Don't swear, Deacon! I want to see if the brig got it!"

"Got it, you fool! I guess you'll get it if I ever see shore again!"

As the smoke slowly rolled away, the brig was discovered, no longer standing down, but knocking about at the mercy of the waves and winds, her foremast gone by the board, and dragging over the side with all its yards and sails. The shot had cut off her mast within ten feet of the deck!

'Siah was perfectly confounded; but he manifested no surprise, while the Deacon and Lot set up a loud hurrah of triumph.

"Why, what is the matter? Why don't you hallo?" said the Deacon, taking breath.

"Coz it an't nothin' more'n I meant to do!" responded 'Siah, with inimitable sang froid; "I an't surprised, if you be, Deacon."

In twenty minutes more, the sloop, with her valuable cargo, was safely sheltered under the guns of Fort Hunnewell. The sloop-of-war lay upon the rock till the next tide, and the brig lay by her, rigging a jury-mast. Before sunset, both vessels made sail, and steered eastward, on the way towards Halifax, to repair damages. Thus the blockade was raised, greatly to the relief of the commerce of the river.

"'Siah" is now one of the most popular of our Eastern steamboat captains.

THE GOOD LITTLE GIRL.

A gentleman went to visit a woman who was sick. As he was going into the room, he saw a little girl kneeling by the side of the poor woman's bed. The little girl rose from her knees as soon as she saw the gentleman, and went out of the room.

"Who is that child?" the gentleman asked.

"O, sir," said the sick woman, "that is a little angel, who often comes to read her Bible to me, to my great comfort; and she has just now given me sixpence."

The gentleman was so pleased with the little girl's conduct, that he wished to know how she had learned to love the word of God, and to be so kind to poor people. Finding she was one of the scholars of a neighboring Sunday School, he went to the school and asked for the child. She felt rather afraid when she was called to the gentleman; but he was very kind to her, and asked her if she was the little girl that had been to read the Bible to the sick woman.

She said she was.

The gentleman said, "My dear, what made you think of doing so?"

She answered, "Because, sir, I find it said in the Bible, that pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is this—to visit the fatherless and the widow in their affliction."

"Well," said he, "and did you give her any money?"

"Yes, sir."

"And where did you get it?"

"Sir, it was given me as a reward."

The gentleman was affected by the goodness of God, in making this little girl so obedient to His holy word, and prayed that the latter part of the text which she had quoted might also be fulfilled in her: that God would keep her unspotted from the world.

HELEN,
THE ADOPTED DAUGHTER.
A Tale of the Black Forest.

BY J. T. S. SULLIVAN.

"Miss Helen, I am glad to find you alone," said the faithful old Max, looking cautiously about him, to see that no one was present.

"Come in, Max! there is no one here!"

"I wanted to say a word or two in confidence, Miss Helen, and I am sure you will not think old Max impertinent, for he loves you as if you were his own child."

"No, Max, I never could doubt your love for me, nor so misinterpret any thing you might say. But what is this portentous secret? Take a seat, for your old limbs are better rested."

Max took his seat, and after again looking about him, to assure himself anew of there being no one present, began in a low voice:

"Miss Helen, you have often heard me say that your father was my dearest friend. Many a pleasant evening did I pass with him in the lodge, while he was game-keeper to the Baron. Then your dear mother had been dead three years, and you were the only comfort left to the old man. That is now more than nineteen years ago since your dear mother died, and you were but three years old when I closed your old father's eyes. You were then left alone in the world. The old man said to me on his death bed: "Max, I entrust Helen to your care!" I asked the Baron's permission to bring you to the castle, and these hands brought you from the lodge. Ah! Miss Helen, you were too young to notice the tears of gladness that stole down these aged cheeks, when I heard the kind Baroness, taking you in her arms, exclaim: "What a sweet child she is! I will adopt her as my daughter, and she shall comfort my old age!"

"I have often heard the Baroness speak of your attachment to me for my father's sake, Max; and I feel grateful for your love!"

"No, no! Miss Helen—not for your father's sake, but for your own!"——

"Well, Max, what means all this kindness, and interest?"

"Miss Helen, you have seen and noticed Rodolpho, the man the Baron has taken to fill your father's place?"

"Yes, I have noticed him, Max. But what of him?"

"Miss Helen, I like him not. He has now been here four years. He lives much alone, has no companions, and always shuns the honest people of the house."

"That he is gloomy and reserved, I have seen: but that he shuns all honest people? He never shuns me, and you would not say I am not honest?"

"No, no! But it is of his fondness for you I would speak."

"Of his fondness for me, Max?"

"Yes, Miss Helen. I have watched him closely of late. Whenever you go forth, he is always on the look out, and his eye follows you, as if the world were shut out from his vision. Mark me, Miss Helen, he loves you, but I beseech you do not listen to his words. He is false, he is not what he seems!"

"Ah, Max, I fear you do Rodolpho wrong. That he is false I cannot believe, for the Baron puts every confidence in him, and I know he thinks very highly of Rodolpho."

"Very true, Miss Helen; it is this confidence that worries me. He will deceive the Baron yet. I feel he will."

"These are mere fancies, Max.—But as there is no danger of Rodolpho's ever addressing me, I think it but folly to make a promise that I may never be called upon to perform. Hark, here comes the Baron!"

Max sprang from his seat; "Say nothing of this conversation, Miss Helen, nor be offended at my presumption in speaking to you!"

"Certainly not, Max" responded Helen, holding out her hand, which the faithful old servant respectfully kissed, just as the Baron entered the room.

"Oh, ho, Max! still watching over your little ward? We shall be jealous of you," said the Baron, putting his hand familiarly on his servant's shoulder. "I give you here some pleasant news. Julius returns to us to-morrow!"

Helen blushed at the mention of Julius, the son of the old Baron; and his only child, who had been absent nearly five years in the service of the King, as a soldier.

"Come, Helen, my girl," addressing his adopted child, "let us hasten to bring this cheering letter to his mother. Julius has proved himself a gallant boy; and shall be thrice welcome to his father's arms." Taking Helen's hand, they proceeded to the chamber of the Baroness.

Old Max remained gazing after them, lost in pleasant meditations; and rejoicing in his heart, that his Helen, as he called her when alone, was so dearly cherished by the Baron and his wife. He was soon aroused from his reverie by the sound of approaching footsteps. He turned his head, and with some expression of displeasure, beheld the gloomy countenance of Rodolpho, his eye fixed upon him with a searching gaze, his hands behind him, and every evidence of mental trouble upon his features.

"Max, where is Miss Helen?"

"Gone with the Baron, to my lady's chamber."

"What news is this that seems to fill them all with joy?"

"Count Julius returns to morrow!"

"What kind of man is this young lord?"

"As gallant a youth as ever wielded sword, and every way worthy of his father."

"He must be a gallant youth, then!"

"I loved him from his cradle!—Gentle, kind, and noble—he will not only fill his father's place on his estates, but inherit, too, the love of his tenants."

Rodolpho turned away, and left the room, in the same gloomy mood he evinced on entering. Max watched him out of sight, and with an expression of "All is not right with him!" made his exit, to attend to his duties.

The morning came. All was expectation in the old castle. Julius was looked for every hour. At last the cry came—"He is coming! he is coming!"

All rushed to the gateway, and in a few moments a young officer leaped from his saddle into the arms of his father and mother. Helen was not there.

"Where is Helen? She surely is with you?"

"Oh, yes, my son," replied the Baroness, "she is within, and will be rejoiced to see you once more."

They entered the old halls, but Julius outstripped them all, seeking for Helen. He rushed into the room where she was, and, without hesitation, embraced the poor girl, whose face, suffused with blushes, told more than words could express.

"I thought you would have come to greet me, not wait to be sought by me, Helen?"

"My lord——"

"My lord? Helen, what means this——"

But the approach of the household put a stop to any further remarks, and Helen took the first opportunity to escape to her chamber.

After the first rejoicings and mutual gratulations had passed, and the thousand questions one would suppose anxious parents to ask, and an affectionate son to answer, a pause ensued, during which the Baron remarked the presence of Rodolpho.

"Ah! Julius, I had forgotten.—Let me present to you our game-keeper, Rodolpho; a man worthy of your esteem and confidence. I hope you may live to derive the same benefit from his fidelity to your interests, which it has been mine to enjoy."

Rodolpho made his bow, without, however, that gloomy expression of countenance which it was his wont to wear, when not in the presence of some member of the family, and calmly, but coldly, took the hand which Julius had extended him.

"Dear father, I trust your claims upon his services may be of many years to come. In faith, a soldier's life is so precarious, I almost doubt whether I shall live long enough to claim them for myself."

"Tut! nonsense, boy! No thoughts of death this day!"

"Ah!" cried Julius, "here comes Helen. I was almost afraid she had resolved to shun our circle to-day."

Julius took her hand with an enquiring look, to see if he could read in her face any traces of her girlish tone, which, he feared, from the style of her first salutation, had been lost to him forever. Rodolpho watched every motion; he saw the downcast eye endeavoring to avoid his glance; he observed her timorous manner, and the anxious expression of her face. A light seemed to dawn upon him. He stood a moment, lost in abstraction, then, clenching the hilt of his hunting knife, left the apartment abruptly. No eye was on him at the moment, nor did any one remark his absence.

After the first burst of joy and curiosity had subsided, the household dispersed, leaving the old Baron with his wife, son, and Helen, to talk over the past in greater tranquility. Every word that fell from the lips of the young soldier was greedily listened to by Helen; more so, perhaps, than by the parents. Who knows how weighty to the maiden's heart is every tone of his, on whom her love is deeply fixed?—Let maidens answer—I cannot.

During the day, Julius had at last been left alone with Helen. The longed-for moment had arrived, and Julius did not hesitate to take advantage of it.

He had unexpectedly entered the room, one of those old-fashioned apartments, with deep recesses for the windows, usually found in the castles of ancient days, and beheld Helen at one of the windows, apparently gazing upon the deep forest, which spread its dense branches for miles in the valley, basing the castle hill. The sound of a footstep awoke her from her dreams. The sight of Julius once again called the blush to her cheek, and she was about to escape, when Julius caught her gently by the hand.

"Nay, Helen, you were not wont in times of old to shun your Julius?"

"The times have changed——"

"But not your love?"

"In those bright days, I knew nothing of the forms and etiquette of the world. Then, love knew no barriers, nor did I dream of what, since that time, has told me not to love——"

"Not to love? What barriers?"

"My lord——"

"My lord—again? Once it was ever 'Julius;' why not so now?"

"Ah, spare me, spare me! Remember your are the only son of this old house—the last of your race. It is necessary, by the customs of the world in which you live, that your family name descend by noble alliances. I am an adopted child—I claim no noble line of ancestors,—and it were worse than ingratitude towards your parents, who have cherished me so kindly from my youth, were I to lead you on in a passion, or even to countenance your affection for me, when my duty forbids me to listen to you protestations."

With these words she tore herself from his arms, and fled to her own chamber.

Julius endeavored in vain during the day to get another interview. His friends flocked in to see him, and before they departed in the evening the ladies of the household had retired for the night. Helen was but too glad to leave the gay circle of friends, who had come to welcome the young Baron's return. Once in the solitude of her own apartment, she did not attempt to court repose, but sat at her lattice, looking forth on the night, meditating upon the past, the present, and the future. That she loved Julius, she did not even pretend to deny, nor even to conceal her love. But she considered well her duty. The more she reflected, the stronger seemed the arguments she had used for the course of conduct she had resolved to pursue. Although she could have bestowed upon Julius as pure a heart, and as sincere an affection as any noble dame could boast, and notwithstanding such an union would have been the very realization of all her earthly wishes, yet she resolved to forego all, and continue in that path which her conscience approved. With a prayer to Heaven, beseeching aid to strengthen her in the coming struggle, she closed her eyes that night with a heavy sigh—a farewell to earthly bliss—yet with a sense of having triumphed in the great contest with herself.

The next morning, soon after their meal, and without having had a word of conversation with Helen, the Baron desired Julius to accompany him in a ride to some old friends, promising to return with him by noon. The father and son started with a few attendants, and after their departure the Baroness sought her own chamber, leaving Helen alone in the same room where she had revealed to Julius the determination of her mind, which had cost her such an effort. She sat musing upon the scenes of early childhood, when she dared to love the young scion of the house. She recalled their happy meetings, the many rambles, the thousand little acts a youthful lover performed to prove his love, and then with a sigh reflected upon the impossibility of her ever realising the heaven of bliss she then promised herself. At this moment the door opened, and Rodolpho appeared. His manner was changed. There was an unusual restraint in his movements, and something in his look, indicating a deep emotion.

"Miss Helen," so began the gloomy man, "you will pardon this intrusion. I have a word to say to you, and until this moment have sought an opportunity in vain."

"Be seated, Mr. Gamekeeper."

"Nay, Miss Helen, I am not jesting."

"If, then, you are serious, Rodolpho, I confess my mind is more inclined to such a strain."

"Four years ago, Helen, I was wandering through this part of the country with a heavy heart, undetermined whither I should go. I was sorely troubled. A settled grief had fixed upon me;—a gloom which every thing failed to dissipate. I chanced in my wanderings to become a guest of Baron Eckstein. I saw you, and you seemed to me the guardian angel sent to dispel my sorrows, and remove this burden from my heart. The Baron mentioned in conversation that he needed a gamekeeper. I offered my services—they were accepted—I assumed my office; but in these veins there flows as noble blood as that which Baron Eckstein can boast. I forgot my station to be near you. I have now seen you for four years, and each day has added fuel to the flame. I come now to confess my passion, and to ask that hand. Will you wed Rodolpho?"

Helen was amazed. The depth of emotion, the fervor of his manner, which she had ever seen unmoved, astonished and surprised her. She gazed at him for a moment uncertain what to say, or how to answer this unexpected proposal. At length the thought struck her, that, by accepting this offer, she might avoid any further temptation to yield to the suit of Julius. Ready to sacrifice herself to her sense of duty, she still started at the thought of for ever resigning the acme of her wishes; and, on the other hand, not willing to exclude the means of rescuing herself from what her heart still dosted on, she finally replied:

"This confession, Rodolpho, is indeed unexpected. Whatever my own feelings may be, I should never think of plighting my faith, unless with the full sanction of my guardian and benefactor, Baron Eckstein. Seek him, and if he consent—then will I give my answer."

"Remember, Helen, your reply may sell me to perdition, or save me from the most fearful fate!"

He left the poor girl, bewildered and racked, now conquering herself—now sinking in the struggle. If she accepted Rodolpho, she would bar the door against Julius. To use any and all means to this end, she felt to be her duty, and yet, when it came to the point, her strength failed her, and she proved unequal to the task.

At noon the Baron returned, and with him came a troop of friends, to make merry on his son's return. All hope of seeing Helen was at once abandoned by Julius, and he saw the evening draw near, and heard the evening hour proclaimed from the castle, when the ladies retired for the night. Sleepless was that night to him. Helen had confessed her love, but would not yield to his suit. He determined to see her once more, to ask her if she would be his, in case his parents consented—and hoping this would remove every objection, he fell asleep.

The morning came. A lucky chance threw Helen in the way of Julius on the terrace. She strove to avoid him, but in vain.

"Helen, Helen—for love of mercy, hear me!—If you but knew how deeply I am moved, how fearfully your last words have worked upon my mind, you would not, could not, if that heart is still unchanged, refuse me what I ask."

"Oh, Julius!—I have endeavoured by all the means I could devise, to shun another interview. you know my love. I here confess it freely, without a blush, for I confessed it in that hour when you left your home five years ago. During your absence I have cherished every recollection of the past. Go to the spot where so oft we have met in secret, and you will find the lilies growing, and the rose-bud opening to commemorate our love. I planted those sweet flowers, for they spoke to me of you. Here, next my heart, I wear the little cross you carved me ere we parted. But, Julius, this is past—over—gone for ever. I cannot forget it—no! I will not even try to do so; they were hours of bliss, the only ones I may ever enjoy in this world."

She burst into tears, and fell, weeping, into his arms.

"Nor have I, Helen, been less constant in my love. Nigh my heart still sleeps that lock of hair which I stole from that sweet neck, and upon the very spot where now your roses bloom. Why, then why, Helen, obstinately refuse my suit, when you confess your love?"

"Julius," exclaimed Helen, looking up through her tears, "because it is my duty!"

"But if my parents consent?"

"It is my duty, Julius, not to put them to such a test."

"Rodolpho!" exclaimed Julius, suddenly starting at the approach of the gamekeeper.

"And to prove, Julius," continued Helen, "to prove that I am able to sacrifice all to duty—you shall see the proof!" Suddenly turning to Rodolpho with extended hand, she exclaimed—"Rodolpho, here's my hand: I'm yours! This my answer!" and fell lifeless into Rodolpho's arms.

At this moment the sound of the Baron's voice calling for his son, aroused the stupified Julius, and he rushed into the castle. Arrangements had been made for a wild-boar hunt. Rodolpho had been sent in search of the young Baron, and met him unexpectedly as above narrated. After bearing Helen to some female attendants, the gamekeeper joined the party just as they were mounting into the saddle.

Julius kept close to his father's side, but could not succeed in broaching the all-absorbing subject of his contemplations. The party was a gay one, and the unhappy lover had to assume the gaiety of his friends. He was at last rejoiced to hear the dogs give bay. A boar had been roused, and the servants rode along the outskirts of the wood to drive the beast towards the den, into which it was resolved to force the animal, if not killed before.

In hunting the wild-boar, it is considered the choicest sport, after baiting him, and exciting his fury, to drive him into a den, so called, or a pen, having two long ranges of fence extending from it, between which the boar, running from side to side, gradually approaches the mouth of the trap. Near this mouth, or opening of the pen, the skilled huntsman stands with his long knife, awaiting the attack of the infuriated animal. As he rushes upon his foe, the huntsman places his knife upon one knee, bracing himself firmly with the other leg, and guiding his weapon skilfully, allows the boar to plunge upon it, meeting his immediate death. If the knife misses, a serious wound is the certain consequence. This danger enhances the sport.

At the mouth of the pen stood the old Baron on one side, with Rodolpho at his elbow. The boar advanced suddenly upon the Baron, before he had time to prepare himself for the attack. It was a moment of intense excitement. The Baron's life was in danger—when Rodolpho, springing between the old gentleman and the beast, struck the boar such a blow with his weapon on his head, that he fell from the force of his impetus against the Baron, but too late to injure him. All saw it, and ran to learn the extent of the injury. Julius was first at his side.

"'Twas nobly done!" exclaimed the Baron; "as fair a blow as was ever struck. Rodolpho, you have saved my life! Ask any favor at my hand, and, if it be within my power, I will grant it."

"I have a favor to ask," responded his preserver, who thought it better to press his suit while the sense of gratitude was warm, "and one on which my happiness depends."

"Name, it, Rodolpho."

"Some other time, my lord."

"No, now's the hour—on this very spot."

"Well, then, my lord," approaching closely to the Baron, "I ask the hand of your daughter Helen!"

"Helen!" ejaculated the Baron, and the sound caught the ear of Julius, who cried out—

"Hold! father, hold!—it may not be in your power!"

Somewhat surprised at the request, as well as the fervour of his son, the old man hesitated a moment, then turning to Rodolpho, replied—

"If it be in my power, I will give my consent."

Rodolpho cast a dark but stealthy look at Julius, and mounted his horse, which had been brought with the others to the spot. The party gallopped off, all grateful that their sport had ended without any serious accident.

On reaching home, Julius hastened to the Baroness and related to her the events we have above recorded. Not a little astonished at such disclosures, and freely confessing she had formed other plans for her son, she very soon perceived that the happiness of her child, and of one whom she had learned to look upon as such, were too deeply interested not to claim her utmost consideration. She tested the love of Julius at all points, and found it sincere.—Woman-like, she at once yielded to the entreaties of the pressing lover, whose welfare was nearest her her heart, and promised her consent if the father should join his.

Never doubting the fulfilment of the condition, Julius flew to Helen. He told her all that had passed, and inspired her heart with new hopes. Yet, when she spoke of her pledge to Rodolpho, a sadness chilled these bright beams: but Julius at once dispelled them by promising other gifts of money and of land, to compensate him for the loss, which Helen, like a drowning man catching at straws, too readily believed he would accept, and thus free her from the obligations she had voluntarily assumed, though her heart was not in them.

Julius sought his father. He was told that the old Baron was on the terrace in the garden. Thither he flew, but instead of his father, he found Rodolpho there in gloomy mood.

"Well timed, my lord!" exclaimed Rodolpho as the young Baron approached.

"Where's my father, sir?" demanded Julius.

"Answer me, first! What had taken place between you and Helen when I found you here this morning? I demand an answer. Helen is now my affianced bride, and I will not take her to this heart while still a shade of doubt hangs over her love for me! What had taken place, Baron?"

"You forget yourself, Mr. Gamekeeper! You forget to whom you speak!"

"My lord, there are occasions and circumstances which level rank! This is one!"

"Before you call Miss Helen your affianced, you had better learn whether her heart is her own to give!"—

"Who doubts it?"

"I doubt it! And if you desire conviction, go seek her—I fly to my father, to prevent his giving his consent."

"You are too late, my lord! Your father promised his consent within this hour, and on this spot."

"Cursed fate! And unconditionally?"

"The condition named depends on the word of Helen. I go to learn from her, what I must needs believe without ever a question of the result!"

"And I will seek my father!" said Julius, abruptly leaving Rodolpho, whose manner had ruffled his temper, and excited fears, he now hastened to allay. He found the old Baron alone, still walking in the garden. He explained to him the state of his feelings, relating sufficient of the past to convince the father, that Helen and Julius loved.

"But, Julius, I have given my consent to Rodolpho's union with Helen!"

"Not without some condition, father?"

"Provided Helen would accept his hand!"

"Then I am safe! She never will do that!"

"You have somewhat surprised me, Julius, and I scarcely know what to say to this sudden proposition. Let me see your mother first;—and come you along. We must have this matter decided at once."

The two directed their steps to the chamber of the Baroness, to consult upon the fate of their son and adopted daughter.

On being left alone, Rodolpho sought Helen. She was still in the same room where Julius had left her. The sudden change her future prospects assumed, had gladdened her heart, and she seized the harp to pour forth in strains of touching harmony the joyous feelings which filled her soul. Skilfully calling the chords to her aid, her silver voice was heard, singing the following strain:

STANZAS.

Delicious hour! How swells my soul,
My ev'ry pulse, with pure delight;
The clouds are past! the radiant beam
Of budding hope dispels the night!

Be hush'd my spirit! Let thy strain
Be calm and mild in all its mirth;
Let not thy joy too mildly range,
But seek its heaven here on earth!

He's mine! What rapture in the thought!
The world is once more bright to me!
The shades of care at last disperse,
And sorrow fades from memory.

She ceased. During the song Rodolpho had entered, and stood sullenly listening to her words. He now advanced. His footsteps startled the poor girl. She sprang to her feet—

"Rodolpho! You here?"

"For whom was that song intended? Nay, no falsehood! Speak! Was it for me? You are silent? I knew it! Think you I want a heart half broken half another's, sunk in despair? Tell me, and tell me truly,—Helen: when you gave me your hand upon the terrace, had you not been in tears? Why had you been weeping? I must know all—I will know all, before I take the hand you offered."

"Rodolpho, do not speak thus wildly."

"Would you have me calm, when all my hopes of future happiness are set upon this hour?"

"You frighten me, Rodolpho! I have never seen you thus before!"

"No! because I have curbed my spirit, and was lulled to sleep in the sweet conviction I should win your love. From that repose I have been roused, and now suspicions, undefined and dark, seem hovering round me. You know not, Helen, what I have been, what I may become, should I lose you!"

At this moment the Baron with the Baroness and Julius entered. Julius rushed to Helen, seized her in his arms:

"Mine, Helen, mine!"

Rodolpho stood amazed. A paleness passed over his features; his lips quivered, while he leaned upon a chair for support.

"Rodolpho!" said the Baron, "this morning I gave my consent to your union with Helen. You have saved my life, and have served me faithfully. You are far above your station in manner and in education, and I believed you would make our adopted child a good and faithful husband. But I tempered my consent by adding, that you must obtain the free will of Helen."

"That I had obtained, Baron, before I asked the favor at your hand."

"Helen, is this so?"

"It is father! I gave him my hand of my own accord, but I gave it to save me from temptation."

"From temptation?" ejaculated Rodolpho.

"Yes, Rodolpho," continued Helen, addressing the despairing gamekeeper; "I feared my love for Julius might tempt me to listen to his suit. I felt it my duty to avoid this union, for I deemed the Baron would wish to unite his son to some noble house. In this spirit, Rodolpho, I gave you my hand—but my heart was not mine to give!"

"Curses on my folly!" exclaimed Rodolpho.—"Fate, do thy work! Adieu to all, this life—and thee!"

With these words he left the apartment.

"Fear him not, children! He will soon be calm again. Then will I make him full reparation for this bitter disappointment. Helen, your noble conduct has endeared you to your parents, and we are happy and proud to claim you doubly our daughter! Come, wife, let us leave the lovers to themselves."

Let us now follow Rodolpho. He fled the castle, wandering listlessly on into the densest part of the forest. Near the very spot he was approaching, stood two men in conversation. Their dress, their manner, and their watchful looks, at once proclaimed them members of some of the lawless bands of robbers, who, at the time to which our story refers, infested the highways and forests of that part of the country.

"I tell you I know him," said one of these two outlaws to his companion. "I saw the scar on his cheek. I was with him when he killed the old Marquis, and that scar he received in the struggle with the old man."

"What Marquis, Fritz?"

"Why, his old guardian who robbed him of his estate."

"I recollect! That was some five or six years ago. I heard of it."

"Yes, he killed the old man, and then joined our band. He staid with us a year, and then left us, but no one knew whither he had gone. They tell me here that Karl has been four years gamekeeper to the Baron."

"Hark! Some one approaches!"

"Nothing but a boar! No—see! Karl, as I live!"

They both retired from the open space where they had been standing, and concealed themselves in the thicket. A moment afterwards, Rodolpho entered the spot. He stood still, evidently moved by some great excitement.

"Why live?" thought he. "Where shall I seek for peace? She might have rescued my bloodstained soul from perdition—but she is lost for ever!"

He drew a pistol from his belt, examined the priming, and was about placing it to his temples, when a long shrill whistle aroused and startled him.

"That sound again?—and here?"

"Hollos! old comrade!" said Fritz, coming from his hiding place. "Welcome once more, Karl!"—for such had been his name.

"Fritz—you here, alone?"

"Not alone, old comrade;—we are all in the neighborhood. What made you put that iron to your head?"

"Is the captain here with you?"

"Yes, and will be on this spot in less than five minutes. My whistle gave him notice. I'll give him another call."

So saying, he put his dagger hilt to his mouth, and the shrill, piercing sound rang through the woods.

In a few moments the captain appeared.

"A stranger?" exclaimed the leader of the lawless band. "No! Karl! You here—and pistol in hand? What, waging war against your old companions?"

"No, captain! I was but waging war against myself."

"Give us that hand again! And has the fearless Karl grown so weary of this life?"

"Captain, I am an altered man. I was sick of blood when I left you, and sought to hide myself from the world. I met an angel in this old castle. She made me wish for honesty once more. I loved her, but she has rejected me; and as I sat here, I had resolved to die—when, in the very act of sending this pill through my head, I was aroused by the familiar call, and Fritz stepped up in time to save me."

"Love, then, Karl, would have robbed us of such a friend? Do you love the girl?"

"Love her? Could you but read my heart—Stuff! I fear I have lost my courage!"

"Has she refused your offer?"

"Yes—and told me she did not love me!"

"Listen, Karl! This very night it was intended to rob the castle here. Come, join our band again, carry off this girl, and wed her in these woods.—We'll have a gay wedding of it, Karl!"

Rodolpho's lips were suddenly compressed—he grasped his pistol convulsively—and after a pause, looking the captain in the face, he exclaimed—

"Thanks, old comrade! Revenge!—revenge on these dastardly lords! I'll join you! yes, I'll lead you in this very night! This afternoon the Baron proposes to visit Uderf castle, two leagues from here, and will not return till late. When they are gone, and night sets in, bring twelve chosen men to the garden gate, and, on the signal given, rush into the castle. I'll be there to meet you!"

"Bravo, Karl! You seem yourself once more!"

"I will now return. I'll make them think that I was but offended—soothe them down, and tell them I was rash. At eight to-night we meet at the garden gate. The portal of the garden shall be open!"

"Be it so! Farewell! At eight to-night!"

"Farewell!" responded Rodolpho, as he turned his steps once more towards the home of those who had cherished and sheltered him for four long years. But not with friendly feelings did he now approach.—His brain, his heart were both on fire. His passions and his dire thirst for blood returned.

He found it no difficult matter to allay all doubts as to his being calm and pacified. He assumed a friendly tone, and was rejoiced to find suspicion lulled to rest. Old Max alone shook his head, and seemed to read more deeply than the rest.

After their noon repast, the Baron ordered his servant to get the horses ready, and told them all to accompany him. Max begged his master would allow him to remain at home. The Baron laughed at his fears for his wife and daughter, but granted his request.—Old Max remained. The party took their leave, and left the castle quite deserted. Helen watched the cavalcade, as it rode down the hill, and waved her hand as Julius took his last look at the castle from the turn of the road.

Night came. The Baroness and Helen sat waiting the return of their friends. The old tower proclaimed the hour of eight. Rodolpho stood at the garden gate and opened it to the captain.

"All's safe," said Rodolpho. "When I discharge my pistol from the window with the light, there, on the right, rush in through that door, up the broad stair-case to that apartment."

"All right!" responded the captain.

Rodolpho now entered the main body of the castle through the door he had pointed out to the captain, and at once proceeded to the room where the Baroness and Helen were quietly awaiting the return of the Baron and his companions. He entered without ceremony. Helen looked up, and started at the wild expression of his eye.

"You seem surprised to see me?"

"What mean you, Mr. Gamekeeper (Herr Jager), by this intrusion?" enquired the Baroness.

"I come to claim my bride!" responded Rodolpho, fiercely. "Hark ye, maiden! Four years ago I wandered hither—I had stained my hands with crime, ay! had steeped my soul in blood! I was tired of it. I sought refuge from the world. My luckless star led me to these halls. I saw you! I deemed you were an angel sent from Heaven to rescue my lost soul from eternal misery. You refused my love—my old fever returned. I thirst for revenge, and have come to feast. Yes! Helen, you gave me your hand, and I now claim you for my bride. Here will I wed you!"

Helen, almost inanimate with fright, ran to the Baroness, who put her arms around her, as if to shield her from the ruffian.

"What would you do, murderer?" exclaimed the Baroness.

"Do?" reiterated Rodolpho—"why set the castle in flames, leave you here to perish in them, and wed my bride by the blazing light!"

"Merciful Heaven!" exclaimed Helen—"Rodolpho, stay your fearful purpose! Spare my mother—spare these ancient halls, and I will wed you still!"

"Too late! My soul is sold! We'll have witnesses at our bridal;—and merry ones, too, Helen!"

He drew a pistol from his belt, and discharged it through the window.—A moment after, Old Max came rushing in.

"Help! Help! the robbers are entering through the garden gate! We are lost! I'll sound the alarm bell!"

"Not in this world!" exclaimed Rodolpho, as he planted his dagger in the old man's breast. Max staggered and fell with a groan.

Now came the robbers. Startled at first on seeing the Baroness and Helen pale with alarm, they soon recovered their courage on hearing Rodolpho's voice, inviting them in.

"Here, comrades, is my bride. Thus do I take her for my wife."

Walking up to the speechless girl, he tore her from her mother's arms, who sank apparently lifeless to the floor.

"Shall we leave her, Karl?" enquired Fritz, pointing to the Baroness.

"Yes, leave her! The flames will have less smothering to do. Now to the treasury chamber! Come, Helen, my own bride!" and dragging Helen after him, he led the way to the vaults beneath the castle.

In the hall they lighted their torches, and Rodolpho entrusted the poor girl to the care of the captain, while he went in search of the keys. He was detained a long time, every moment of which seemed an age to the robbers, but enabled Helen to regain her senses, and decide upon some means to save the lives of those most dear to her. Soon Rodolpho's step was heard descending the stairs, and, with a hasty leap, he sprang among his confederates.

"Here are the keys at last. Here, Fritz, take this bag of gold,—we shall soon have more to carry. This way, captain! Give me the girl! Lead the way, Helen! One moment's hesitation, and I'll plunge my dagger in your heart. Lead on!"

Helen did as she was bid, and they descended into the vaults. Along the dark, damp passages they felt their way, until, coming to a door locked and bolted, they stopped, while Rodolpho hunted for the key.—It was found, the door opened, and the party now awaited further orders.

"Stay!" cried Rodolpho, "I have forgotten to bolt the castle gate. We have lost much time, and they may return on us. Do you go in, captain, seek the treasure with these men, while I make fast the gate. Here, girl, hold this torch! Stand at this door to let them see their way out. More than one step, and, as I live, 'you die! Dost thou hear?"

Helen took the torch, and the captain passed in with his band. Rodolpho hurried to the gate. As soon as he had gone, Helen closed the door upon the robbers, locked it, took out the keys, and flew to the court-yard, where stood a stack of hay, used to bait the horses in case the stables were full. There stood a light shed over it, to protect it from the rain.—Helen at once set fire to the hay, which communicated to the shed, giving forth a bright and glowing flame.

"This will call the tenants to our help, and give the alarm!"

Seeing Rodolpho coming with hasty step and angry brow, his dagger drawn, she immediately fled into the castle, and concealed herself in the dark recess behind the door leading to the vaults. Rodolpho soon hurried after her, stood a moment on the threshold, and with a curse upon his rashness and the girl, descended to the treasury-chamber, which, in those days, each Baron of a castle always had, more or less, filled with gold and silver, plate, and other valuable articles.

As soon as Rodolpho had descended a few steps, Helen pushed the heavy door, and it closed, but there was no lock. She heard her foe again ascending, and flew at once to the alarm bell. Fortunately the trap-door was open. She reached the belfry, sounded the bell but once, when, with horror, she perceived the form of Rodolpho ascending the stairs. Inspired with giant's might, she seized the trap-door, and with one effort it fell, just as Rodolpho had reached the last step, striking him on the head, and sending his heavy form headlong down the stairs.—Still uncertain whether succeur had arrived, and unable to lift the massive door, which excluded her from all below, she continued to sound the alarm. She could hear, whenever she ceased striking the bell, the buzzing of many voices, and hurried steps in the court-yard; but yet she knew not whether they were friends or foes. Almost exhausted with the fearful excitement she had survived, and the intense suspense in which she was kept, she finally sank upon a stone seat, and listened with maddening impatience for some token of delivery. Almost despairing, she struck the bell once more. Soon footsteps were heard, and she recognized the voice of Julius calling her name.

"Thank God!" she exclaimed, and fell insensible to the ground.

Julius raised the heavy door with the aid of some of the servants, and found to his horror the seemingly lifeless form of Helen. He raised her gently, and had her carefully borne to the room below, where she had first been surprised by Rodolpho.—Here, after using every means to resuscitate her, she gradually exhibited signs of returning animation. She opened her eyes, stared wildly about her, and then lifting her hands to Heaven, as if in grateful prayer, fell back again in a swoon. She was, however, soon brought to her senses, and was enabled to sit up.

The Baron now joined them, bringing joyful tidings of the Baroness. She had been restored, but was still too ill to speak. Every thing remained as yet a mystery to the whole party. A pause ensued, in which every eye was turned to Helen, and every ear was alive to catch the first word of explanation from her lips. One of the servants broke the silence by informing Julius that they had found Rodolpho apparently dead, and severely wounded, and enquired whether he should be brought into that room. Helen shuddered at the sound of his name.

"No! no!" she cried, "not here! not here! He is a murderer!"

All stood panic-struck, gazing wildly upon the girl.

"He has murdered Max, and would have murdered me. The treasury chamber is full of robbers—Rodolpho led them on!"

And, exhausted by this sudden emotion, and the fearful recollections of the past hours, she fell back again in her chair.

At the suggestion of Julius, Helen was borne to her chamber, while the Baron went to secure Rodolpho, and attend to his wounds. He found his head severely bruised, but not beyond hope. Taking his arms from him, he ordered him carried to a room in the tower, and gave directions to have his head dressed. As to the robbers in the treasury-chamber, the Baron deemed them safely lodged for the night, and requested the tenants who had now gathered in crowds, led by the flames and the alarm bell, to defend the castle, to keep a strict watch in and about the yards, to prevent an attempt at rescue.

By the morning they had learned the detailed history of the night. The robbers were secured, and were conducted to a prison, from which they went forth to meet their death. Rodolpho recovered soon, sufficiently to show signs of life, and in a few days was able to walk about his cell. Notwithstanding the entreaties of the Baron, he maintained a sullen silence. It was determined to remove him, but the murderer was not willing to suffer a felon's death, and in the night succeeded in putting an end to his existence.

As soon as the sorrowful effect of the tragic scenes had worn partially away, and the smile and laugh again cheered the old Baron, the happy Julius led his blushing Helen to the altar, amid the prayers and good wishes of a contented tenantry, and a throng of gay and sincere friends.

On the day of her wedding, Helen made a secret visit to the grave of old Max, and placed upon his narrow, earthy bed, a simple wreath of flowers, bedewed with tears of gratitude and affection, and with a deep feeling of regret, that the good and trusty old man would not behold her happiness.

CAMILLA CAFARELLI.

A Story of The Florentine Republic.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

Full many mischiefs follow cruel wrath,
Abhorred bloodshed, and tumultuous strife;
Unmanly murder and unthrifty scath,
Bitter despight, with rancor's rusty knife,
And fretting grief the enemy of life.
[Spencer's Fairy Queen

It was a summer morn, and the waters of the Arno, reposing in the unclouded sunlight, vividly reflected the stately domes and glittering spires of Florence that lined its banks. It was the hour when the noble and his household sought repose, and when not even a note of the light guitar or silver-toned lute stole from palace or bower to gather sweetness from the waves, or mingle with the low murmurs of their voice. In one of the palaces, stern and gloomy without, but bright and gorgeous within, was a boudoir, fitted up with an elegance worthy its fair occupant. A drapery of rich purple velvet concealed the walls, which on one side being partially drawn, revealed the entrance to an oratory, where, on a richly carved desk, was a golden crucifix and a prayer-book, over which the light, admitted through the stained glass of a high and narrow window, threw a dim and dreamy radiance. A soft, religious gloom pervaded the little oratory, which suited well with the sanctity of the place, and formed a happy contrast with the brighter splendor of the boudoir, where, on a pile of cushions, covered with the same rich velvet that draped the walls, reclined Camilla Cafarelli. The waters of a miniature fountain, that gushed up in a recess within the massive wall, fell with a cool and lulling sound into a basin of snowy marble, throwing a brilliant mist over vases filled with choice and beautiful flowers that encircled it, preserving their freshness while it diffused their fragrance. But the soothing voice of the fountain had no power to bring to Camilla the luxury of the noonday slumber.

"You do not sleep, Signora," at length said Sylvia, her waiting maid. "The heat, I fear me, is too oppressive;" and, while she spoke, she agitated the air with a fan of brilliant feathers.

"It is not the heat," replied Camilla, "my mind is too full of fancies to permit me to sleep."

Sylvia smiled archly, as she replied—

"Ah! when two such handsome signors as Francis Pazzi and Julian de Medici have no eyes for any lady in Florence except you, your mind may well be full of fancies."

"Nay, Sylvia, you cannot think that Francis Pazzi is handsome?"

"In good sooth, lady, I do. He has an eye like a hawk's, and there is a pride and haughtiness on his brow and lip, that well become so brave a gentleman."

"Haughty enough and proud enough he is, I well know, but his bravery—if I can read his dark, malignant countenance aright—would prompt him to use the assassin's knife with as little remorse as to wield the soldier's sword. I like him not."

"Ah, you more affect Julian de Medici; and truly, if the one have the eye of a hawk, the other has the eye of an eagle, and if the Pazzi have a proud lip and a haughty brow, then Medici has a countenance full of nobleness and majesty."

"And if he have, it is nothing to me. He has forgotten me of late, Sylvia."

"Not so, lady. Every time I meet him, he says, 'an' how does the Signor Cafarelli to-day and his daughter, the Lady Camilla?'—But little, I ween, does he care for an answer to his first question, if he obtains one to his second."

"Did I not hear you say that you saw him one day looking at the picture of the Madonna in the church of Santa Reparta?"

"That I did, and if you had sat for the picture yourself, it could not look more like you. The large, liquid eyes, the sweet, pensive mouth, and the smooth, white forehead, from which is parted the hair, soft, and lustrous as some dark bird's plumage when bathed in the evening sunlight, all are yours."

"I fear, Sylvia, that the resemblance is a creation of your own fancy—Julian saw none."

"Nay, lady, it was the resemblance that drew his eye. Had it not been so, fifty Madonnas might have smiled on him, without attracting a second look."

"Is it not to-night that the Countess Faustina gives her splendid fete?"

"It is."

"Bring me the robe that was sent home this morning."

Sylvia obeyed, and assisted her mistress to put it on. It was of black velvet, and nothing could have been better adapted to her style of beauty. Diamonds flashed among the pearls ornamenting the girdle which gathered the folds round her waist, and gleamed like stars amid the rich drapery of the wide open sleeves. Beneath the sleeves of the robe were others of snowy muslin, finished with broad lace of such exceeding fineness, that, with every motion of her exquisitely shaped arm, it floated back and revealed the dimpled elbow.

"Does the robe become me, Sylvia?" said she, when the girl had finished adjusting its folds.

"Yes, lady—a cheek like yours, of a hue even more delicate than the beautiful rose in yonder vase, would look pale contrasted with such showy colors as the Countess Faustina wears."

"Yes, I am pale—too pale, and I should not do well to suffer myself to be compared with one whose beauty is so rich and dazzling as hers."

"Why not? I saw Julian de Medici throw away some gaudy flower the other day, and replace it with a pale rose."

"It may be that he will not attend the fete to-night."

"There is no doubt but that he will. Filippo told me that all the brave Signors and all the handsome ladies of Florence were to be there, and if all the handsome ladies in Rome were added to the number, there is not one that would outshine you."

"You would flatter me, Sylvia, but if I am but fair in his eyes, let others think of me as they will."

"Who is that sweet young lady?" said a young cavalier to his companion, as Camilla Cafarelli, leaning on her brother's arm, passed along the crowded saloon to greet the Countess Faustina.

"She is the rich Cafarelli's daughter, and is, to my eye, the sweetest rose of all Florence."

"That she is. Did I not hear that one of the Pazzi would win her for his bride?"

"Ay, truly he would, but he may as well yield his claim to his more powerful rival."

"Do you refer to Julian de Medici?"

"Yes, and lo! he approaches her."

As he spoke, a young man of graceful deportment, with a fine, intellectual forehead, round which clustered a profusion of short, thick curls, intensely black, and which, unmarred by the traces of care or passion, was already crossed with the calmer lines of thought, took his place by the side of Camilla, and entered into conversation with her. Thus engaged, neither of them noticed the dark form that hovered near with a menacing and angry scowl upon his features, while his hand, ever and anon, unconsciously wandered to the richly chased haft of a poignard that gleamed by his side.

Gladly would the lovers have remained together the whole of the evening, but a few words of playful raillery addressed to Julian, by his kinsman, broke the spell which bound them both, and Camilla, with face suffused with blushes, turned away and joined a group of ladies. Julian, at the same time, drew near an open window, where several gentlemen and ladies were listening to the song of an Improvisatrice, who stood beneath it. It was a merry lay of a successful and happy lover, but as her eye caught the grave and handsome features of Julian, her upturned countenance, upon which streamed the light of a full, unclouded moon, assumed a mournful expression, and she changed her song to a slow and plaintive recitative. Gradually her voice became fuller, and the words flowed more rapidly, forming themselves, towards the close, into the following rhymes:

"Beware! Beware!
Though the cloudlet wears a golden crest,
The lightning sleeps within its breast.
Shun, while you may, your threatening fate:
Ere another moon, 'twill be too late.
Beware! Beware!
For the lightning may burst from the cloudlet's breast,
Though the sunbeam glows on its golden crest."

While the last word was still ringing in the ears of her auditors, she turned away, and the flutter of her white garments was the next moment seen amid the gloom of an olive grove that grew near. A feeling of apprehension settled upon the little party, for although, at the commencement, her eyes had rested on Julian, they had, as she proceeded, wandered to others. Julian, though in common with his family he possessed a mind more highly cultivated than was usual at that period, was not above the superstition of his age, and with that feeling which makes us fear for the success of what most deeply interests us, could not help imagining that the warning of the Improvisatrice had reference to the resolution he had adopted to seek an interview with Camilla. His mind wavered for a short time, but before the evening closed, doubt and fear, and the warning chant of the Improvisatrice, were all lost in the sweet hopes of an ardent and trusting heart. He had met Camilla alone, and they had interchanged their first vows of love. She had wandered from the crowded apartments to an adjoining garden, and as she stood by a fountain, listening it might be to its dreamy murmurs, or employed in weaving the web of her own sweet fancies more dreamy even than the fountain's music, Julian, without knowing that she was there, had turned his footsteps towards the same spot. Camilla's countenance was of a kind to look lovely in such a place. The more latent and divine emotions of her soul, the expression of which seemed to be lost amid the flood of light which illuminated the apartments and redoubled the glitter and brilliancy of the gorgeous assembly she had just left, revealed themselves in every lineament, as the beams of the full-orbed moon fell with a quiet lustre on her brow.

"Why," said Julian, as they began to feel that it was time for them to part—"why should we not meet at the altar before the close of the present month?"

"Do you remember," said she, "that twelve days only remain?"

At this moment were heard the voices of a merry group, that appeared to be advancing in a direction towards the fountain, and Julian in a few hurried sentences exacted from her a promise to unite her fate to his before the expiration of the twelve remaining days of April. He then turned into the shaded avenue, by which he had reached the fountain, leaving Camilla still there.

The company, however, instead of advancing, turned into another path, and finding herself undisturbed, she bent forward towards the fountain, suffering the diamond spray to fall upon the cloud of dark curls, that formed around her brow a richer ornament than the jewelled tiara of a princess.

While thus engaged, she heard her name softly pronounced behind her; and, turning round, she beheld Francis Pazzi.

"Sweet lady," said he, "was it to bathe those locks, more lovely than the plume of the bird of Paradise, that you withdrew from the gay assembly where thy presence was to me the only sunbeam."

"I withdrew," she replied, gravely, "that I might for a few minutes enjoy in solitude my own thoughts."

"In which you have had the misfortune to be twice interrupted," said he, sarcastically, "for if I mistake not, I saw the glitter of a rich mantle through the foliage of yonder orange trees as I approached."

Camilla deigned no reply.

"Nay," said he, "do not suffer thyself to be chagrined. I like thee not the less, because I have to contend with a rival for thy love. Courage and perseverance are the qualities that win, and if I have not the skill of a Medici to judge of a dumb statue, I have the heart to meet a living foe, and if I have little love for the soft notes of the lute, my heart leaps at the clear voice of the trumpet."

"As well," replied Camilla, "as to the hoarse cries of the midnight brawl."

"Thy words are meant as a taunt, sweet one," said he, "but in brawl or battle, a cavalier of true courage will not hesitate to draw his sword if opportunity invite. But these moments are too precious to be spent in bandying angry words, though I find my reward in the improved lustre of your eyes and the deepening roses on your cheeks. Believe me, fair lady, the sternest heart in warrior's tent is ever gentlest in lady's bower, and the lovelier the object the deeper the homage."

As he spoke, he seized her reluctant hand and dropped on one knee.

"Were delicacy one of your virtues," said she, striving vainly to disengage her hand from his grasp, "you would not force your homage upon one to whom it gives pain, and cannot even confer the pleasure of gratified vanity."

"Now the sweet saints shield me from thy anger, but scorn sits so gracefully on these ruby lips, that I would scarcely exchange it for one of thy sunniest smiles, such as I saw thee bestow on the carpet knight, who would dream away hours before a picture or statue."

"You may deem yourself fortunate that the carpet knight hears you not, thus saving yourself from proving to the world, that though you have a bold tongue, you have a craven heart. Now, sir, unhand me, or my cries shall bring me succor."

"You will live to repent this," said he, dropping her hand, while a cloud of demon passions settled on his brow, and drove the color from lip and cheek. "Farewell, and, if you dare, favor the suit of Julian de Medici."

While these words were still ringing in her ears, he had plunged into a thick copse and was veiled from her sight.

A few evenings subsequent to this interview with Camilla, Francis Pazzi, arm in arm with Bernard Bandini, his confidential friend, crossed one of the bridges spanning the Arno. They passed on at a quick pace till they reached the open country. Till then, they had preserved an unbroken silence.

As they paused by mutual consent by a vine-clad hedge—"Well, Francis," said Bandini, "what subject have you to discuss, which requires so much caution that you are afraid to mention it beneath the roof of palace or church, as if their walls had ears."

"As if—there is no if in the case. I never told a secret within four walls, but that it was the common talk in the market place within four hours—Nor should I wonder if this hedge have ears. It will be safer for us to hold our conversation in the midst of yonder common, where there is not a leaf big enough to shelter a fairy."

"Nay, Francis, thy secret must indeed be important, that changes thy ordinary rashness into such over-wrought discretion. I am fatigued with our long and rapid walk, and this is a good resting place. I should not fear to plot the murder of the hated Medici in so retired a spot."

"Bernard," said Pazzi, warmly grasping Bandini's hand, "there must be a secret sympathy between us, or that never would have occurred to you, which for the last three days has haunted me like my own shadow."

"Ah! the humiliations they have heaped upon your house, make you grow restive at last. I know not by what right they should lord it over those scarcely inferior to themselves in power."

"They would not dare to do it, were they not countenanced by the rabble, that were besotted by Piero's moderation, and his recent death has obliterated his faults and sanctified acts which are magnified into virtues. His sons are the people's idols. They must fall, or the Pazzi must ever grovel in the dust. Not content with elevating our inferiors over our heads, they presume to thwart me in an affair of the heart. Camilla Cafarelli, whose hand her father promised me, at the time when Piero de Medici was a prisoner in his own house, has been won by the soft words of Julian, and preparation is making to celebrate their betrothment with as great pomp as that of Lorenzo with Clarice Orsini."

"And which so enraged the people, as to come near effecting the father's downfall."

"Yes; but this is a match that will find favor with the people."

"True—we must avenge our own wrongs. Is not that your thought?"

"It is. Let the dagger be planted in his heart, at the moment he pronounces the bridal vow."

"By whose hand?"

"My own—I will trust no other."

"You are right—but the elder brother must fall with the younger, if we would not ensure our own destruction. There are others, too, whom it will be dangerous to let live. If there are any we can trust, we must persuade them to join us."

"I have those in my mind whom it will not be hard to win, but we shall have many opportunities to confer on the subject before the day appointed them to meet at the altar."

They now rose, and slowly departed. When their receding figures began to grow dim in the distance, a female rose from the opposite side of the hedge where they had been sitting, and looked earnestly towards a cottage about a quarter of a mile distant.

"The light is extinguished," said she: "they do not expect me to-night," and passing a ribbon over her shoulder that suspended a lute, she selected a path that led to the city, but which widely diverged from the road taken by Pazzi and Bandini. She paused not till she stood before the palace of Julian de Medici.

"Has the Signor Julian returned yet?" she enquired of a serving-man, who was loitering near the steps.

The reply being in the negative, she walked on a few paces, and, seating herself at the base of a pillar, the deep shadow of which screened her from observation, she patiently awaited his coming. Half an hour had elapsed, and several has passed the spot, when a tall, graceful figure, with a plumed cap and richly wrought mantle, was discerned in the distance. The girl rose and planted herself in the path, so as to intercept his progress.

"Signor," said she, "abandon your intention of celebrating your marriage with Camilla Cafarelli with the pomp and splendor you intend. Let none but a few friends of well-tried fidelity attend you and your bride to the altar, if you would escape the assassin's dagger."

She then attempted to pass him, but he prevented her.

"There must be something more than a stranger's warning," said he, "to induce me to alter my purpose."

"Persons to whom I am not a stranger would deem my simple assertion as enough. You are at liberty to follow or reject my advice. Were I to prove what I say, by giving you the names of your enemies, those who befriended me when I had no friend would suffer anguish for the fate of the guilty."

She looked upwards as she spoke, as if deprecating such agony to those dearest to her, which causing the mantle, which she had drawn over her head in such a manner as to conceal her features, to fall back, Julian perceived the pale but beautiful countenance of the Improvisatrice, to whom he had listened a few evenings preceding.

"Oh," said he, "I have seen you before, I think. Was it not you who addressed to me that kind of prophetic chant beneath the palace window of the Countess Faustina?"

"It was."

"And some say that you can read the future. I have sometimes a presentiment that I shall die early. Will it not be so?"

"If you measure your life by years, it will be short; if by enjoyment, long."

"Explain."

"When we look back upon the past," said she, "which are the moments that occupy the most space? Are they not those of intense enjoyment or intense pain? The unimportant incidents of life fade from the pages of memory, leaving them a blank—or, at best, present themselves in shadowy and indistinct characters. The arrows of anguish, feathered, as it were, with the living lightning, such as search the brain and drink up the life-blood, have never found your heart; but moments of rapture, written as with a sunbeam, have already been yours. Nothing can quench their light. There is an electric chain that ever connects them with the present. In the stillness of the moonlight evening, the deep silence of starry midnight, or the calm brightness of early morning, they flash back upon the heart with a vivid and thrilling power, which makes us forget they are only a dream of the past. It is, therefore, Signor, that your life will be a long one. And now, once more, and for the last time, I warn you to suffer none, save a few well-tried friends, to be present at your bridal."

"The lady's wishes, and those of her friends, must first be consulted," replied Julian. "Before then I can give you no promise. Good night—and if you would have pleasant dreams, you must let your mind run on pleasanter fancies."

Saying this, Julian turned from her with an air of assumed gayety, by which he strove to veil the unpleasant sensations her words had awakened.

"He has too little faith in what I have told him," thought she, "to let it guide his conduct. He, even, as far as superstition will permit, scorns my prediction. I must seek Camilla Cafarelli."

Immediately acting upon this sudden impulse, in fifteen minutes she had gained access to Camilla's presence, and, in a few rapid and impressive words, disclosed all she had already told Julian, and demanded of her the same promise. Camilla, to whom the threat of Francis Pazzi, during their interview at the fountain, immediately occurred, promised, without hesitation, to use all her influence to have the marriage privately celebrated.

"Well, Bandini," said Francis Pazzi, accosting his friend, who had just returned to the city after an absence of several days, "my rival has prevailed."

"What mean you?"

"That Camilla Cafarelli is the wife of Julian de Medici."

"You must be mistaken. At the the time I left the city, the match was said to be broken off."

"That was only a feint. By some means they received intimation of our plot, though not of the persons concerned, and to escape the threatened danger, their marriage was kept secret. It was only last evening that I ascertained the truth, though I had before suspected it."

"And, now, you intend to let him enjoy his happiness undisturbed?"

"Not so. This," and he lightly touched the haft of a poignard, "shall drink his heart's blood before eight and forty hours."

"You will thus rid yourself of your rival in love, but your rival in power—is he still to lord it over you and the rest of us?"

"Lorenzo must fall at the same moment by another hand."

"How can it be effected?"

"They will both, without doubt, attend mass tomorrow, at the church of San Reparta. I shall place myself at Julian's side, and at the third stroke of the bell, when the priest raises the host, I shall strike. Nori, his confidential friend, who is ever near him, and who would revenge his death by slaying me, I shall expect you to deal with."

"And who is to take Lorenzo in hand—Montesecho?"

"No—drivelling fool that he is, he refuses to pollute the church with the blood of his enemy; my uncle will see to him."

While the two conspirators were thus coolly planning his and his brother's murder, Julian, with Camilla at his side, stood at a window of their palace, that looked upon a garden full of fruit trees flushed with blooms, which yielded to the light kisses of the night wind the perfume treasured in their hearts. And their own hearts were as fresh as the expanding blossoms beneath them. The poetry and refinement of their own emotions gave a coloring and a voice to all around them. The vault of heaven appeared more beautiful and serene—the stars shone with a sweeter and a holier light—and the tones of their own voices were to each other's ears like a low and thrilling melody. They cast no thought towards the future, but lived only in the present moment. Suddenly a small, dark cloud, which they had heeded not, blotted out the crescent moon that hovered in the west. A circumstance common and unimportant in itself, to Camilla seemed an inauspicious omen, instantly dissolving the charm which was woven of all that is brightest and dearest in human life. The dark spectre of the assassin, with his glittering knife, which imagination had pictured as hovering in the path of Julian, whenever he was absent, ever since she had listened to the warning of the Improvisatrice, suddenly started up before her. She suppressed the cry of terror that rose to her lips, and with an assumed calmness inquired of Julian if he had of late seen Francis Pazzi.

"I met him this morning," he replied, "and he greeted me with the frankness and cordiality of a true friend. He slightly alluded to our late coldness, which he sincerely regretted, half hinted that he was knowing to our marriage, and then broke out into so warm an eulogium upon the charms of the Countess Faustina, as to convince me that she has made a serious impression upon his heart."

"O, Julian, trust him not. He is cruel and vindictive, and, above all, treacherous. This sudden change in his conduct towards you bodes no good. Be assured that it masks some deadly design."

"Nay, Camilla, did I not know that you are not prone to suspicion, I should be tempted to chide you for your distrust. When I look on this sweet face of thine, I can well forgive him for cherishing feelings somewhat bitter against his successful rival, and now, let me not chill his reviving kindness by a cold return."

Camilla, who could feel no confidence in these appearances of amity on the part of Pazzi, though she smiled faintly, made no reply.

The following day was bright and balmy, and the streets of Florence were filled with a multitude of people, of every rank, wending their way towards the church of Santa Reparata, where religious service was to be celebrated. The conspirators, who, unsuspected, mingled with the throng, entered the church, where they found that Lorenzo de Medici had already arrived. Anthony of Volterra and a priest, to whom his assassination was committed, succeeded in stationing themselves near him. The hour approached for the service to commence, but Julian was still absent.

"His guardian saint will again foil me, I believe," said Francis Pazzi, whispering in the ear of Bandini. "Let us go and find him, and persuade him to accompany us back to church."

Bandini assented, and they left the church together. They had proceeded only a short distance, when they descried Julian with his friend Nori. They hastened to overtake him.

"My dear friend," said Pazzi, embracing him, "it appears to me that of late you have grown somewhat remiss in your religious duties—why do you not attend mass to-day?"

"In good sooth," replied Julian, "I have no reason to give you, except that I was just now warned not to attend, by one who pretends she has good reason for her warning."

"Ah, the Improvisatrice has crossed your path.—Only last evening she undertook to warn me. The girl may be a good poetess, but has, to my certain knowledge, proved herself a false prophetess."

"It may be as you say, but to confess the truth, Pazzi, it was with reluctance that I approached the church before I received her warning. Thrice, ere I met her, a voice seemed to whisper in my ear, 'beware! enter not the church of Santa Reparata to-day.'"

He had just ceased speaking, when a boy, almost breathless from the haste he had made, overtook them, and placing a billet in Julian's hand, told him that it was from the Lady Camilla.

"I should have remembered the message she charged me with had she not sent the billet," said he, smiling, and placing it unopened in his bosom.

"Will you not read it?" said the boy. "The Signora said it contains matter of great moment, which came to her knowledge since you parted with her."

"You should, ere this," said Pazzi, "have learnt that many things are of moment to a lady, that may seem trifling to us. I have already commenced accustoming myself to the fact, preparatory to the time when I too may have the felicity of being entrusted with similar messages."

This strain of badinage was purposely adopted by Pazzi to prevent Julian from reading the billet; for the glance he caught of the superscription, showed him that it had been written with a hurried and agitated hand, and his guilt made him fear that she had by some means obtained information concerning the intended murder of her husband. His words had the effect he desired, for although Julian answered in the same style of raillery, he refrained from reading the billet, which, at the boy's suggestion, he had taken from his bosom. The boy, who, when he saw the billet in Julian's hand, doubted not but that he would read it, retraced his steps, and the two conspirators, who knew that the service must soon commence, linking their arms with those of their victims, made all possible speed towards the church. After entering, Pazzi, who had, when he embraced Julian, assured himself that he wore no armor beneath his dress, stationed himself on one side of him and Bandini on the other, Nori being near at hand. It was then, while waiting in silence for the appointed signal, that a deadly paleness crept over the dark features of Pazzi, while the beatings of his heart stirred the folds of the mantle that crossed his breast. His eye sought the face of Bandini. He, too, was pale; while Volterra and the priest, who still retained their places near Lorenzo de Medici, often, with trembling hands, wiped the cold perspiration from their brows. Their evident agitation, by exciting his fears that they would fail in their purpose, restored the courage of Pazzi, and inflamed anew his malignant passions. He succeeded in catching the eye of the priest, and by a stern glance made him feel that, should he fail in his undertaking, his life might pay the forfeiture. From that moment, with his left hand resting in a caressing manner on the shoulder of Julian, the other so firmly closed upon the haft of his dagger, that the somewhat rough settings of the jewels with which it was ornamented, pierced the skin, he calmly and resolutely awaited the sound of the bell. The moment at length arrived when the priest was ready to raise the host, and the first sound of the bell smote the ears of the conspirators. At the second sound, Pazzi drove his weapon with such force into the heart of Julian, as to severely wound himself in the hand. Nori, Julian's friend, at the same moment fell by the hand of Bandini. The weapons of Volterra and the priest were less skilfully aimed. They succeeded only in slightly wounding Lorenzo, who escaped into the sacristy. Pazzi attempted to follow him, but was prevented by the people. Soon becoming faint from the loss of blood, he was obliged to return home, where, shortly afterwards, he was seized by the enraged populace, who dragged him through the streets, and hung him, with many others who had joined in the conspiracy, at the windows of the palace. Bandini, who fled, was recognized, carried back to Florence, and shared the same fate.

The beautiful Italian night, with its starry wings, was again brooding over the city of Florence, and Julian and Camilla were once more in the same chamber where, the evening previous, they had, side by side, looked out upon the shadowy landscape, and where, to him, had been inscribed the last page of life's elysium, worth whole years of inanity—Camilla was now, as then, by his side, but the heart so lately stirred by the warm pulses of a young and vigorous life, was resting cold and still beneath the folds of the snowy shroud, and the dark eyes that had mingled their sunny beams with the mild glances of her's, opened not to her sad and earnest gaze. Not a tear trembled on the long lashes that veiled her own dark eyes, but her heart was bleeding. Suddenly, a fresh gust of air that swept in through the open windows of the apartment, stirred the shroud on his bosom, and lifted the raven curls that shaded his cold, white brow. The cheeks of Camilla became suddenly flushed with crimson, and a wild cry of ecstacy broke from her lips as she threw herself on his bosom—for to her bewildered and excited imagination life had returned. Sylvia, her waiting maid, who had missed her, went in quest of her to the chamber of death. She shrunk back with terror as she beheld her, sleeping, as she imagined, on the breast of her murdered husband. She endeavored to rouse her by calling her by name. Finding her attempts fruitless, she ventured to approach nearer, and at length to take hold of one of her hands, which, half buried beneath the dark, glossy hair, rested on Julian's brow. The touch sent an icy thrill to her heart, but fear of the dead was at once overwhelmed by an anxiety for her beloved mistress. She raised her in her arms, and looked upon her face. Her eyes were closed, but the light of the rapturous smile that lingered round her beautiful mouth, showed that her spirit had departed at the moment when she was deluded into the sweet belief that life had reanimated the form of him she loved.

BEAUTIFUL THOUGHTS.

There is something touchingly beautiful in words when rightly put together. They leave an impression that can never be effaced. We have read again and again, till it is familiar to us as the face of a friend, the following splendid thought, and every time we see it, 'tis fresh and beautiful as ever. The author we know not, but he deserves to be immortalized for this morceau alone:

"How beautifully falls
From human lips that blessed word, forgive,
Forgiveness—'tis the attribute of God—
The sound which openeth Heaven—renews again
On Earth lost Eden's faded bloom, and flings
Hope's halcyon halo o'er the waste of life.
Thrice happy he whose heart has been so schooled
In the meek lessons of humanity,
That he can give it utterance; it imparts
Celestial grandeur to the human soul,
And maketh man an angel."

THE UNJUST JUDGE.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

It was an old lady who related to me the following incident. As it supplies evidence how strong a moral may be inculcated by a picture, I will endeavor to record it in her own simple words. When I knew her she was very aged; her sitting-room was adorned by paintings, generally of the higher class: but sometimes the sentiment, the conception of a subject, was so superior to its execution, that I imagined she had more feeling than knowledge with regard to works of art. She moved about her apartment, leaning on the arm of her grand-niece, and pointing out her favorite pictures by a motion of the large old-fashioned fan that dangled from her arm: she was in truth a chronicle of the past—had sat to Sir Joshua when quite a child—and been the companion of West, and Opie, and Northcote, and all the great men of ancient times; seen David Garrick; and been patted on the head by Dr. Johnson; laughed at and with Oliver Goldsmith; and spoke of Queen Charlotte and George III. as a handsome young couple. She was both rich and benevolent, and, despite her age and the infirmity of deafness, she was the best physician that ever entered the close atmosphere of the pale student's chamber: the ease, and grace, and gentleness with which she developed truth, added to its beauty, but did not lessen its power. She was a sound critic—yet a kindly judge. Sir Thomas Lawrence used to say of her, that her very look at ninety was inspiration!

Her general sitting-room was in admirable keeping with its mistress; old chairs, old carvings, old China, old bits of tapestry—with here and there a drapery of golden yellow—a cushion or chair covered by rich deep-toned crimson velvet—and when the sun shone through a little painted window, illuminating an angle of the apartment with its fine tints, it threw a sort of halo over these silent but sure indications of pure taste, and made the artist feel at once at home. Then the delight with which, when she found an attentive listener, she would draw forth from an old cabinet some cherished and exquisite miniature—the gem of her treasure-house—and have a little tale to tell of every thing she possessed. Latterly she had, as I said, become deaf, but this did not diminish the cheerfulness of her well-toned mind: set her talking, and it was like a happy voice from the graves of those mighty ones who now live but in their works.

"You said, my dear madam, you would tell me the story of that picture yonder," I observed, one evening.

"Ah, yes!" she replied; "that, my dear, was painted by a young man! Poor fellow, I shall never forget what old Northcote said to me about him; but that does not matter now. It was April—a few days before the pictures went in for exhibition to Somerset House, and I was sitting in this very chair, as I have done for the last five-and-forty years! About noon—when Nancy—(Ah, we have no such servants now-a-days!)—Nancy told me that an artist, she was sure from the country, wanted to show me a picture. I admitted him immediately. He placed his production in the best light, and apologizing briefly for his intrusion, stood opposite to that very picture whose story, as you call it, you wish to hear. Young men, my dear, in those days were more ambitious of painting than dressing, like Raffaelle; they did not wear their hair over their shirt-collars—cultivate a mustache, and scent of cigars; and yet I never saw any human being look more like a creature of glorious inventions than the poor pale boy—for he was little more—who painted 'The Unjust Judge.' His orb-like brow would have well become a crown of laurel; and though he was so singularly handsome, that for a few moments he was the picture upon which I looked, I felt sorry at heart for what was stamped upon his features.

"What?" I inquired.

"Death!" was the solemn reply. The old lady rose from her seat, and taking the arm of her beautiful relative, who resided with her, tottered opposite to the picture. "Observe," she continued, "the hard, stern countenance of the magisterial-looking man, who, seated at the head of the table, has decided that the widow—the young widow of an old and faithful tenant—has no further claim on the land, which she imagined secured to her by virtue of a letter, the fragments of which are upon the ground. Observe the look of purse-proud satisfaction the new tenant casts upon the friendless woman, whose faded mourning evinces that she has no means to apply to a higher court. Note how full is the leathern purse he has ostentatiously placed upon the table; do you not see the convulsed clutching of the widow's fingers, as she stretches forth her hands to implore mercy where she might demand justice? the veins of her small white throat are distended by suppressed emotion; her eyes are heavy with unshed tears; and observe also how indignant the boy looks; he has just ceased to grasp the crape shawl that has nearly fallen from his mother's shoulders; his little fists are clenched, as much as to say, 'See how I will be revenged when I become a man!'—The accessaries also are well, yet not too strongly developed. The fat and insolent cat has driven the widow's timid little dog into a corner; his eyes in utter helplessness are raised to his mistress' face, whose agony is too great to heed the distress of her puny favorite! I do not often look upon it," she added, returning to her seat, "though it conveys a fine moral; yet whenever I do, I turn my eyes into my own breast, lest I also may have been an unjust judge!"

The old lady paused, and her last observation found an echo in my heart. Great God! how true this is: how apt are we to sit in judgment on each other—how apt to pronounce sentence on a sister's frailty, on a brother's crime—without a knowledge of the temptations which led either to the one or the other; without even inquiring whether what we have heard be true or false! How outrageous we become if we are judged—how careless in judging!

"But the story!" I said at last. "It is not ended?"

"Hardly commenced," she replied, and then continued,

"I expressed my approbation in a few words, for the subject touched me. There were faults in the colouring; but the moral was so true that I saw at once the youth had the elements of high art within him. It is an admirable thing to do justice to nature, to copy faithfully the immoralities amid which we live; but it is still more glorious to embody the workings of the mind, to create, to lead as it were the inventive faculties of our fellow-creatures into a higher world. The avarice of the unjust judge is stamped upon that face forever, and the supplication of the widow seems bursting from her lips. After looking at it for some little time, I inquired what value he put upon his production. He said, 'he had never thought of that; he only wished it to be exhibited.'

"'And why, then, did you bring it here?' His pale cheek flushed, while he replied, 'that he resided in Northumberland; was not acquainted with any one in London; and feared that if he sent in his picture it would not be exhibited, unless some one were good enough to speak for it, so that it might obtain a place—a place where it could be seen, particularly by one person.'

"I told him I would purchase it. He thanked me; but that, he said, was not what he wanted. He wished it to be seen at the Royal Academy. He had heard that I knew a great many of its members. Would I, if I liked the picture, say a kind word for it to those who had power? His only wish was to see it hung where one person would be sure to see it. The request was so strange, the picture and the youth both so interesting, that I desired much to unravel the mystery. I soon gained the young man's confidence, and his story was quickly told.

"His father had been one of those upright God-fearing tillers of the soil from whom our greatest men have sprung. His life was the last in the lease he held of his land, but he had received a letter from his landlord promising, in case of his death, a renewal of it on the old terms. His father died, and in less than a week after his father's death, the landlord died also. His mother had so firm a dependence upon the letter, that she never thought of the lease; indeed, as the young man said, she was too much absorbed in her own grief to think of worldly matters, until a notice to leave what had been so long her home was served upon her. It was in vain she endeavored to see the landlord; he would not admit her; she wrote—no notice was taken of her application. 'Beaten down,' he said, 'by circumstances, she would sit day after day looking at a small defaced water-color drawing of my father, which had been done by some itinerant artist, and seemed her only consolation! I was too young to share her griefs, but not to observe them; and I remember the desire I felt to make a picture like the one she loved, that it might be caressed by her. One morning she had been weeping bitterly, and urged as it were by some sudden resolution, she took my hand, and we walked together in silence to the hall, regardless of the rebuffs of the servants. My usually gentle mother forced her way into the squire's library, and discovered, what I afterwards knew she expected from the information she had received, her landlord in the very act of signing the lease that was to deprive us forever of the cherished dwelling of our ancestors. Roused by a sense of his injustice, she placed before him the letter from his father to mine; in an instant he tore it into atoms, and flung it on the floor. Stunned still more deeply, she clasped her hands and uttered a prayer of few words, but deep import, that he might never die until he acknowledged his injustice. Had I known how to curse, I would—boy though I was—have cursed him from my soul, but my mother had taught me nought but blessings. We returned home; she knelt opposite to where my father's picture hung, as if it had been a shrine, and poured out her soul to God in prayer for patience. I stood by her side. 'Kneel with me,' she desired. I obeyed—but she observed the stubborn spirit that roused within me, and while tears streamed down her cheeks, she made me repeat words which for the first time found no echo in my heart. The softness of the child had altogether departed from me. I felt as if my spirit had sprung at once into manhood. We arose from our knees, I put my hand in hers, kissed her cheek, and said, 'Mother do not weep, I will protect you.' I shall never forget the music of the sweet blessings she poured upon me then, while hot, hot tears coursed each other down her cheeks. From that time I saw her weep no more, though I knew she wept. For me, I grew hard and stern. I shunned my playmates, during the few days we remained in our old dwelling; I could neither eat nor sleep; my soul swelled with indignation and revenge. We left our pleasant dwelling; the shadow of the trees fell no more upon our paths; the hum of my mother's bees, which had been as music of the sunbeams, sounded no more in my ears; the willow, planted by my father on my birthday, which had grown to be a tree, while I was yet a child, no longer waved above my head. We lodged in a small room of a small house in a neighboring village; a small clean room, furnished out of what seemed our abundance, the window sill crowded with plants such as my father loved—those perishable yet sweet records of affection.—Our dog, our household friend, shared our exile, but even that I had little sympathy with; my mind was bent upon things above my reach, but not beyond my desires. My mother worked at her needle, and taught me all she knew, and every halfpenny I could procure, could earn—for I was no beggar—by little acts of usefulness, I laid out in purchasing paper and pencils. I did not know then what being an artist meant; but I knew that I should like to copy my father's picture, to draw the scenes of my early childhood, to depict the one particular scene that was burnt into my heart, to grow by some means to be rich and powerful, that so I might be revenged on the unjust judge. This last resolve I dared not impart to my mother, from a consciousness that it was one she would disapprove the most. And yet that man bought pictures and hung them on his walls; and people eulogized his liberality, and praised his taste, and that he had taste I cannot doubt, but he had no heart. 'Is it not strange,' inquired the young painter, 'that a man can tell what is excellent on canvas, and have no appreciation for what is excellent in life; can understand what is natural when delineated by the painter's art; be touched by painted tears, and yet be utterly incapable of feeling and combining the sensations which spring from nature? Is not this strange and contradictory?'

"I told him he would not think so when he had seen more of the world, and understood how many contending currents meet and struggle within the heart of man. Perhaps you are already tired of the young artist's tale? I like, old as I am, to hear of struggles, of difficulties overcome, of mountains scaled by hardy enterprize, of seats upon their pinnacles; and I spoke words of hope to him, which fell like rain upon a fertile soil—for his mind was one large treasure-house of poetry. And then he related much of the past; of his own privations he evidently did not think; but his mother's sorrows, lessened as they must have been by cheerful industry, and lightened by the knowledge of his innate talent, dwelt upon his memory.

"Yet he confessed to moments of most keen enjoyment; the calmness of the Sabbath evening, when the music of the bell had ceased, and the voice of the preacher, or the melody of the choral hymn, chanted by infant voices, mingled with the perfumed air; when the worship was over, and playing with a pencil, which his mother kissed him 'not to use on Sunday,' she read within her little room the scenes from Holy Writ, which, praised be God, have taught many painters the road to immortality! And, when obliged to labor in the fields, his eye drank in the hues of cloud and rainbow, sunshine and shadow; in truth, he said, the more he saw of nature the weaker grew his purpose of revenge towards 'the unjust judge.' The beauties of the beautiful world softened his spirit; but when he looked upon his mother's hands, hardened by labor, or saw her feeble frame bending with more than woman's weakness, his purpose revived, the agonizing scene stamped upon that canvas rose before him, and as he grew older, he determined, 'an that he lived to be a man,' to do what you see he did accomplish. Several years before, (for an artist's talent is long budding before it blossoms), while his was yet in its infancy, the man who had acted so cruelly left his neighborhood, and came to reside near London. He paid a visit to his property but once, and then offered his patronage to the boy artist he had so injured; by whom, I am proud to say, it was indignantly refused. The gentleman was bitterly hurt at this, for he would have greatly enjoyed the notoriety of 'bringing out' such extraordinary talent. How different from the warm and noble zeal which makes and bears the torch to light the path of genius! But I grow prosy," said my old friend, "and will hasten onward: the desire of the young artist was, that his picture might be placed where it could be seen to advantage; he had grown out of the memory of his mother's persecutor, and had resolved to stand where he might watch by it, to see the effect it would produce—not upon the world, but upon him whose injustice he had depicted with so powerful a pencil. 'If,' he said, 'I could but see him change color; if I could perceive the least indication that he felt the reproof; that the circumstance was recalled; that the power he had crushed into the dust had risen, and stood before him to reprove his injustice; if I could only make him feel, I should be satisfied; it is now all the revenge I covet.' "

"But his mother?" I inquired.

"She still lives," was the reply; and then my old friend informed me, that his (the artist's) resolution on this subject almost amounted to insanity; he fancied his picture would work a miracle—soften a hard heart—change the current of a man's blood—alter his nature. Like all those who live alone, and who judge of mankind from themselves, his information, his conception of human character, seemed as contracted as his imagination was vast and vivid; and, in addition to this, he was suffering from a constitutional sensitiveness, which made him far more susceptible than rational men are supposed to be.

"His picture went at the appointed time to the appointed place. I studiously kept the secret that the persecutor—the unjust judge—was intimately known to me; and feeling as I did the utmost anxiety for the young painter, I made him consider my house his home. But his spirit had all the restlessness of genius. As a boy at school counts the days, the hours, that must elapse ere he returns to his home, so did this creature—compounded as he was from the finest essences in our nature—count the moments until the academy would open. It was almost frightful to witness his fits of anxiety as to where the picture would hang—if it would have a good place—if it (perchance) might be killed by some glaring sunset or saffron sunrise—when the artist, 'mad with glory,' deepens the hues wherein Almighty God thinks best to steep his landscapes. It was positively fearful, after such ague fits of care, to see the avidity with which he drank in the inspirations poured by the old divinities upon their canvas. It was wonderful to observe how his mind, taught by nature, distinguished at a single glance the gold from the tinsel; and how he spurned whatever was counterfeit or poor. He would, after such excitements, return to his calculations touching his own picture. Sometimes depressed at its inferiority when compared with what he had just seen; at other times full of hope, calculating on the probable result—repeating the difficulties he had encountered—recalling the tears which stood trembling in his mother's eyes when some simple villager would express such natural wonder as to 'how he learned it all!' Then he would picture the rich tyrant acknowledging his injustice, and confessing shame; calculate as to the probability of his picture, the first-born of his brain, being extolled by the critics; portray his mother, her thin fingers trembling, and her emaciated form bent over the column where her son's name was marked with praise; hear her read his commendation, and then fall upon her knees in gratitude to God, remembering, in the hour of triumph, as well as in the hour of sorrow, that it is He who gives or takes away, as seemeth best.—Then, poor fellow, in the fulness of his heart he would describe such pictures as he was to paint; he did not care for poverty—not he! he knew it well! he never could be as poor as he had been. He felt his power, like the infant Hercules strangling his foes without an effort—his fortune in his hand—his patent to immortality made out! He and his mother could live in a garret—ay, and die there! But he would make a name that would defy eternity—he would! Poor—poor fellow!" repeated my old friend mournfully; "and yet there was nothing boastful in this; it was pure enthusiasm.

"Those who had seen the picture here were delighted and astonished; and more than one assured me the placing would be cared for. I felt so convinced that the composition would stand upon its own merits, that I did not desire to lessen the dignity of my new favorite, by requesting as a favor what I felt he had reason to demand as a right. A foolish thought!" said the old lady, taking a fierce pinch of snuff—"a foolish thought for those who want to get on in the world, but a wise one for those who prefer the jewel of existence—self-respect—to aught else.

"The first Sunday in May arrived, to be followed, of course, by the first Monday. He sat with me till late, not here, but at Richmond, where I reside occasionally. He was looking out over the river, floating in the glory of the setting sun, speculating as usual about his picture, and the chance that by that time next night it would have been seen, and its merits acknowledged by its unconscious author, to whom he wished to show the moral of a picture. He was literally wild with hope and excitement, speaking of his mother, wishing for her, and then saying what glory it would be to see some of those mighty masters of his art who had lived and moved among us. Like a young eagle, he panted for the rising sun, towards which he longed to soar. Poor, poor fellow!"

There was a pause, and I longed to hear what was to follow, yet feared to inquire.

"The next morning," she continued, "I ordered the carriage so early as to drive under the gateway at Somerset House about a minute before the hour at which the doors were to open. There was the usual crowd—the earnest, intense-looking students, some more pale than usual, others flushed by anxiety, mixed up with critics, and poets, and persons wishful to be the first to see the national exhibition, whose quantity, quality, and arrangement indicate the nature, and progress, and power of British art. But few of the academicians were there, though one or two were recognized; and, notwithstanding the density of the crowd, room was made for them, and a murmur ran, 'Do you see Stothard?' or, 'There is Westall;' or, 'That's the young artist, Wilkie;' intimating the current of people's thoughts. My young friend recognized me, bowed, and then the doors were opened. I saw him rush forward with the rest; and, just as he was about to enter, he turned his face towards me: it was lit with a light which disappointment would quench in death. He waved his hat, and disappeared. I waited until the crush had entered, and proceeded to obtain a catalogue. It is marvellous how quickly a crowd disperses; all had passed up stairs. Suddenly my arm was pressed; I turned round; there stood the young painter, his face shorn of its beams, his whole aspect changed from that of a living man to an almost breathless corse. He seemed rooted to the spot, while in a tone, the character of which I cannot describe, he muttered, 'My name is not in the catalogue.' There were doubtless many others that day doomed to the same disappointment—many who, perhaps, deserved the annual oblivion which overwhelmed the industry and hopes of the past year; but, unhappily, there were also many others who were condemned to the same suffering, merely because there was not space in wealthy England to display the treasures of that genius which confers honor upon the land that calls forth its existence. Many worn and anxious faces—many whose hearts were crushed—passed beneath that portal; yet I heeded but the one. I knew the boy could not survive it long. He had never anticipated its rejection, nor indeed had I. I insinuated there might be some mistake; but, easily depressed as excited, he only clenched between his hands the doom-book of so many, and shook his head. I ordered the carriage to be re-called, and taking his arm, led him towards it. As we descended the steps, I felt him start and shudder. I looked up—the unjust judge stood before me! The coincidence was strange. On the instant I invited him to dine with me the next day in town; the invitation was accepted. My footman assisted the lad into the carriage as if he had been a child; he shrunk into the corner, his noble spirit totally prostrated by his disappointment, while he turned his face away to conceal the agony he had not deserved. I think," said the good old lady, "I suffered almost as much.

"After many efforts, I succeeded in turning the current of his thoughts; I assured him the picture should be seen the next day, and that he should witness the effect it produced. I insisted on his remaining entirely at my house; but he had been lessened in his own esteem, and suddenly his manners had become lofty and severe. I let them remain so for a little; but, assured that nothing would so much relieve his overcharged heart as tears, when we were quite alone on the morning of the next day, I spoke to him of his mother, of the scenes of his youth, of her piety, her tenderness, her love; the boy conquered the Stoic—I left him weeping. I had undertaken a most painful task, but it was my duty to complete it.

"As the dinner hour advanced, I placed the picture, which I had reclaimed, in the best possible light, but drew a curtain, so as to shade it from observation till the time of trial arrived; the artist was in the room, and at last my guest came. After a few minutes had elapsed I arose, as I do now, and stood here, the painter remaining in the embrazured window. Suddenly I displayed the picture, and asked him what he thought of the story? 'Do you read the story clearly, sir?' I said; 'perhaps, as it is mine, you will help me to a name for it? A widow, sir, a poor widow believed in her landlord's honor, and intrusted to him a promissory letter for the renewal of the lease, which expired with the breath of her dead husband. You see her there; beauty and sorrow are mingled in her features. He has taken the letter; and behold you how men, ay, and rich men, too, value their honor; its fragments are on the carpet—the weighty purse of the rich farmer has outweighed the woman's righteous cause. Can you name my picture, sir? Her child, her boy feels, though he does not understand the scene; he has dropped his mother's shawl; his hands are clenched; if God spares him to be a man, he will devise some great revenge for that injustice.' I thought the gentleman turned pale, and I knew that my young friend was crouching in his lair. 'Look you, sir,' I continued, 'out of the pictured window; is not the landscape pleasant? the tree is remarkable, a famous tree in Northumberland; the—the—something elm. And within, as you observed, the accessaries are well made out: the fierce cat pouncing on the little dog; the elk's horns stand out from the panelling; and the emblazoning of the shield and arms upon the wall—the arms are distinct——'

"'Madam!' he exclaimed, in a voice hardly audible from agitation, and then paused.

"'The scene took place,' I continued, without heeding the interruption, 'some ten or twelve years past. Is it not so, Edward Gresham?' I added, appealing to the youth.

"He came forward, pale, but erect in the consciousness of his own rectitude, and satisfied that the great object of his existence was attained.

"Although I was much agitated, I saw the eagle eye of the artist look down upon the hurried glance which the unjust judge cast towards him, and I almost pitied him, humbled as he was by the conscious shame that overwhelmed him. He was stricken suddenly by a poisoned arrow; the transcript of the unhappy story was so faithful, the presence of the youth so completely fastened the whole upon him, that there was no mode of escape; and his nature was too stolid, whatever his disposition might be, to have any of the subtle movement of the serpent about him.

"'And you,' he said, turning away while he spoke; 'you, whom I have known for twenty years, have subjected me to this!"

"'Do you acknowledge its truth, its justice?' demanded the young painter; 'do you acknowledge the fidelity of my pencil? I have toiled, labored, suffered, to show you your injustice in its true colors; but I see you, the proud landlord, turn from the orphan-boy whom, in open defiance of every religious feeling, you sent houseless, homeless, fatherless, friendless upon the world. I see you cannot meet my eye for shame. Ay, ay, proud gentleman, that will live when you, ay, and I too, are in our narrow graves!'

"'I offered you reparation,' said the landlord, overpowered by the energy of the painter and the truth of his picture; 'I offered you reparation.'

"'You offered me patronage!' retorted the indignant boy; 'insult with injury.'

"The landlord turned to me; he was greatly agitated. 'Has the patronage I have extended to many, madam, even within your knowledge, been injury?' he inquired.

"I could not but acknowledge that he had purchased many pictures; and replied, his collection would prove that he highly appreciated art.

"'I will,' he added, 'even now give him any sum he chooses to name for that picture.'

"'It is sold,' replied the artist.

"The old gentleman's countenance changed; he walked up and down the room; once or twice he paused and looked at the sad history, which he would then have given much to obliterate.

"'I confess,' he said, 'the faithfulness of the portraiture; but there were palliating circumstances. Still, I confess I acted wrong—I confess it! I will make retribution; we cannot tell what our acts may produce.'

"'Injustice,' said the youth, calmly, 'is the parent of misery to the injured and the injurer; it was a cruel act, setting aside its treachery; it was a cruel act. God can judge between thee and me! My mother, a delicate fragile woman, myself almost an infant; and your father's promise, sir, your own father's promise, that you scorned: oh, sir, how could you sleep with the consciousness of such injustice haunting your pillow?'

"'You have your revenge, young man, your revenge,' murmured the gentleman; 'I acknowledge my injustice; I will make reparation.'

"'You cannot cancel the past, my mother's years of suffering, my own of labor; but enough, I see you feel I have conquered; my feeble hand has sent conviction to your heart; and I'——He staggered to a chair, and became more pale than usual. I thought he was dying, but it was not so; the heart does not often give way in the moment of triumph—for it was a triumph. I must do the landlord justice: he repeated his regret, he even entered into the young man's feelings, and commended his art; he did all this, and the next morning remitted me a large sum, 'as a debt due by him to those he had injured.'

"How apt are the rich to think that money can heal all wounds. My poor young friend only survived sufficiently long to see his mother, though but for half an hour. It was almost in vain that, kneeling by his bedside, she implored him to think of the world to come. He believed he was too young to die.

"'I triumphed, mother, I triumphed,' he repeated, his eyes glittering with unusual brightness; 'I triumphed; I made his heart quail, and his cheek blanch, and he begged my forgiveness; but it was altogether too much for me; first the disappointment, and then the triumph; it fermented my brain, though I found another mother who taught me that the just and the unjust are mingled together; but now that turmoil is past, you are with me—really, really with me. I will sleep on your bosom, my own mother, as I used when a little child, and to-morrow I will tell you all I mean to do.'

"'Then all is peace,' she murmured.

"'Ay, mother, all is triumph, and peace, and love,' he replied. 'I wonder how I could have hated him so long.' He laid his head down with the tranquility of a sleepy infant, and it was in vain she tried to repress the tears that fell upon the rich luxuriance of his hair—he felt them not.

"'He has slept more than an hour,' she whispered me. I saw he would never waken. I could not tell her so, but she read it in my face. It was indeed a corpse she strained in her arms, and long, long was it ere she was comforted. I never saw my old acquaintance afterwards; but he requested, as I would not yield him up the picture, that I would never suffer it to pass from my possession, or mention his name in connection with it. He died many years ago, and proved his repentance by providing, in a worldly point of view, for her who had been so long the victim of his injustice."

THE YOUNG BRIDE.

How gentle and mild the young bride looked
When first she met my transient view,
I thought that an angel of light had come,
My purest pleasures to renew.

She approached me with a smile divine,
That few but angels can possess,
With gentle looks and soothing words,
Did she my wakening grief repress.

Oh! little thought I then how soon
Her gentle soul would soar above,
To those bright realms of endless day,
Where all is peace, and joy, and love.

And yet I knew by her pale brow,
And by that soft cheek's hectic flush,
She could not long on earth remain,
But she my fears would calmly hush.

And when I asked if she loved life,
Or grieved to think her race was run,
She said, in tones both sweet and clear,
"His will alone, not mine be done."

'Twas thus her bridal months passed on,
In slow, but sure and sad decay.
Too soon, old tyrant Death did call,
"Come, fair one, to me! come away!"

'Twas midnight; all was calm and still,
No sound the waning night beguiled,
Save the dropping of the old man's tears,
As he gazed upon his dying child.

Mildly she oped her sweet blue eye,
Whispering, "He's come!—'Tis he!—He's come!"
Then sweet, as seraphs sing on high,
She sung aloud, "Sweet home, sweet home."

Her father raised her in his arms;
Her head dropped heavy on his breast;
The old man groaned aloud, "She's gone!
Sweet Lizzie is at length at rest!"

They sent for one, her bosom friend;
And bade him to them quickly come,
For she was in her childhood's home,
Where he her true heart's love had won.

Could ye have seen him when they said,
"Your sweet bride lives on earth no more,"
It would have made the hardest heart
In sympathy his grief deplore.

"Oh! God!" he cried, "is this my lot?"
And sank beside her on the floor,
As pale and cold as his dead love,
But life's dark grief was not yet o'er.

He rose, and gazed upon his bride,
And wildly kissed her marble brow,
And sighing, murmured, "She's not mine—
She's with her HEAVENLY FATHER now."

Wild grief returned; tears drowned his eyes.—
"She is not dead!" he loudly said.
A still small voice then echoed, "Peace!
She sleeps—she sleeps!—she is not dead."

THE BLACK CLOUD;

OR,

THE YOUNG ADVENTURER.

A SEQUEL TO THE VILLAGE FUNERAL AND MOTHER'S LEGACY.*

BY MRS. L. F. MORGAN.

There is no ill I would not brave,
To claim him, even in the grave.
'Twas strange, this mingling of their destinies.—[MISS LANDON.
Turn not thine eyes upon the backward view,
Let us look forward into sunny days.—[COLERIDGE.

The bell of the steamboat had rung its last signal, and already had the captain issued his orders for immediate departure from the wharf of Cincinnati, when Major Croxdale and his family came on board. After the confusion and bustle attendant on such a scene had subsided, and the lessening spires of the city indicated that the boat was indeed ploughing the waters of the beautiful Ohio, Mrs. Croxdale exclaimed, in a vexed and disappointed tone:

"Farewell then all hope of my childrens' education! We have actually left Cincinnati, and without a governess. Had you but waited five minutes longer, Major Croxdale, I doubt not Mr. Woodward would have brought her."

"And we should have lost our passage, my dear wife, which would have subjected me to much greater inconvenience than the loss of a governess. Besides, the lady we expected might not have suited us. We must trust to chance to procure us one in Louisville."

"Chance indeed! I do not consider chance a very judicious provider," retorted his wife, rather pettishly.

"Yet chance introduced us to each other," said the Major, good humoredly; "and you will not deny that was a friendly, if not a wise act. It has contributed to my happiness, at least."

"And you know it has contributed to mine," replied Mrs. Croxdale, touched by her husband's kind manner, in spite of her vexation; "but you should have said Providence introduced us to each other, and not chance."

"And why may not the same Providence furnish us a governess, Mary? At least let us hope for it," he said, with his customary readiness to extract good from evil; for Major Croxdale possessed that enviable sunniness of temper which takes from the petty annoyances of life half their gloom. "And if we can procure no other teacher," added he, "you and I must instruct them. I am sure they could not have better preceptors. And Charles, too, perhaps, may assist us."

"Charles has not sufficient patience to teach children. He is too hasty and impetuous. I thought all men were until I knew you."

"I am glad to have improved your opinion of my sex," said the Major, smiling.

We will take the author's privilege, and passing over the unimportant incidents of the journey to Louisville, present our readers again the same party in the principal hotel of that city, with an additional personage, who has just been announced by a servant as "Mrs. Harper."

"Major Croxdale has probably forgotten the features of his aunt Preston's old friend; for time has added many a wrinkle to them since he last saw her," remarked the lady," after the pause which followed her acceptance of a proffered seat.

"I perfectly remember you now, madam, although I indeed failed to recognise you," said the Major, cordially shaking the hand of his guest, and then introducing her to his wife and children, as one with whom many of his boyhood's brightest associations were interwoven, though he had not met her for years. After they had mutually given and received the information naturally sought relative to the past and present, Mrs. Harper said:

"Although my desire to see in his manhood the boy of whom I was so fond, would have inclined me to visit you, I was urged to this call by another motive. I understand you are seeking a governess for those sweet children."

"We are indeed, and should be rejoiced to obtain one recommended by you," said Mrs. Croxdale, eagerly. "My husband is just appointed to the command of a remote fort, and I should like to meet a lady who would prove a companion for myself, as well as a fit instructress for them."

"Such a one I come to speak of, "said Mrs. Harper; "her youth is the only objection. She is almost a child in years, but her mind and heart have both been well disciplined, and I have no hesitancy in regard to the propriety of my proposal, either for you or my young friend. She is an orphan, without relatives, and desirous of such a situation as your offer affords. Indeed she is deeply interested in your answer."

"If you consider her suitable, and she is willing to go so far and submit to the confinement and privations we may have to subject her to, in our distant location, we will be glad to engage her. Can she go immediately?" said the Major.

"Immediately. I have endeavored to persuade her to live with me, for although I have known her but a few months, she has won a daughter's place in my affections; but she seems to possess the Yankee spirit of adventure, and has been earnestly desiring an opportunity of going West. Then she has recently experienced a heavy affliction in the loss of her mother and only brother, and I presume the restlessness attendant on grief, impels her to change. My son was on board the boat in which you came hither, and accidentally overheard you express your disappointment at not having procured a governess for your children in Cincinnati. Having heard me speak of you frequently, he mentioned having seen you, and happening to allude also to the circumstance which caused your regret, Miss Rainsworth eagerly caught at the announcement, and persuaded me to call and proffer her services. You will find she is no common person."

After some further discussion of the subject, the arrangement was concluded to their mutual satisfaction, and Major Croxdale and his family engaged to spend the evening at Mrs. Harper's, and be introduced to her young protegee. The appearance of the latter was sufficiently attractive to interest less warm and kindly hearts than theirs, and Mrs. Croxdale declared to her husband that she fully concurred in the wisdom of his theory, "that all things happened for the best."

The ensuing day Miss Rainsworth was installed into her new office, and left Louisville with a family of whose existence she had been ignorant a few short days before. Her pupils consisted of two girls of eight and four years old, and a boy of six. As their father remarked, "they were good physiognomists," and immediately attached themselves to their youthful preceptor. Mrs. Croxdale observed to her in their first conversation, that she feared she would soon tire of the monotony of her employment and their secluded situation. She replied with mingled earnestness and sadness:

"That is not probable. I have but one aim in life, and that impels me with singular pertinacity towards the Indian territories. I have prayed for such an opportunity as your offer brings, and it seems to me that God has sent you hither to strengthen and forward my purpose."

She wished to begin the duties of her situation before they reached their destination, and the children, wearied of travel and the confinement of the boat, readily turned to her instructions for amusement. They stopped but a short time in St. Louis, although a cold taken by Mrs. Croxdale, by remaining too long on deck after nightfall, threatened her with serious indisposition, and her husband wished her to see a physician ere they started for Fort Crawford. She resisted his advice, both on account of her anxiety to reach their future residence, and her unwillingness to submit to the medical treatment a stranger might prescribe, when she would so soon meet her brother, who had been appointed surgeon of the fort which her husband was to command. The delay was most unfortunate. She continued to grow worse, and by the time they reached the fort, she was alarmingly ill. Her brother had gone on an exploring expedition into the adjacent country, and was not expected to return for several weeks. A physician was procured from a neighboring town, who considered her situation very critical, pronouncing her disease inflammation of the lungs. Lucy Rainsworth devoted herself with untiring assiduity to her afflicted friend, and proved indeed an invaluable nurse. Night and day she kept vigil by the invalid's couch, administering all her medicines, and endeavoring to soothe her anxiety relative to her husband and children, which aggravated her danger. After the lapse of a week, the rapid progress of the disorder, and its effect upon her frame, left little doubt of its fatal character. The apprehension and grief of her husband were too visible in his manner, to escape her observation, and she insisted on being told the doctor's opinion. Major Croxdale was too much agitated himself to answer her affecting interrogations, and the task devolved on the young governess. Strengthening and fortifying her mind for its fulfilment, by sincere and fervent petitions to the God who had sustained her during the dark days of her own brief pilgrimage, she took the seat vacated by the unhappy husband, by the bedside of his wife, and he hastened from the chamber to give vent to his emotion.

"Do you all think me very ill, Lucy? dangerously so?" inquired Mrs. Croxdale, with deep solicitude.

"We hope that there is no immediate danger, my dear madam: but you know where fever exists, there must needs be ground for apprehension," Lucy replied in a calm, affectionate tone. "The physician will exert his utmost skill—your nurse will do her part; but the result, after all, rests with God. Endeavor to look to Him with the hope that he will order all things for your good. His grace is particularly manifest in the hour of affliction. Allow me to ask if you do not feel happiness in trusting in Him now?"

"No, my friend, no. I regard the idea of death with terror. I fear God: but I am afraid, aye, I know, I do not love Him." Mrs. Croxdale spoke with much emotion.

"Why do you fear him?" inquired her youthful counsellor, in a gentle, earnest voice.

"Because I have a vague, oppressive idea that I am a sinner and accountable to Him for my past conduct. There is nothing in my whole life to recommend me to mercy. I have always believed in the truths of Christianity. I have not been entirely negligent of its forms. I have often wished to be religious, and intended or hoped to be some future day; but I have never reflected enough on the subject or been sufficiently earnest in my desires. I have led a tolerably happy life, especially since my marriage, and in the enjoyment of His gifts have forgotten the giver."

This hasty detail of the experience of Mrs. Croxdale might have struck her auditor as a correct epitome of the experience of thousands. But she was too intent at that moment on the individual case before her for generalization. With solemn earnestness she said:

"Your present affliction, however, has awakened a keener sense of the need of something that you have never yet possessed; has it not? You feel sorrow for having lived so forgetful of the God who has lavished such blessings upon you, I am sure?"

"Indeed, I do. At this awful moment I would give worlds to enjoy the religion I have heard persons talk of."

"What would you give?" questioned Lucy.—"Worlds are not yours to bestow. Be faithful with your own heart, and enquire whether you would seriously forego any blessing you possess to be assured of the forgiveness and love of God towards you."

There was a calm but solemn earnestness in the speaker's manner, as she gazed with affectionate solicitude on the face of her friend. The invalid shaded her eyes for a few minutes with her hand. She then removed it wet with her tears, and laid it on the arm of Lucy.

"I would give up life," she said, in a faltering but serious tone, "and the society of my husband and children. I see to what your question leads, and unless my own heart deceives me, I am in earnest now."

"Then, without any sacrifice on your part, you may trustingly supplicate of God to give you this instant an assurance of His pardoning love. As you have just proved to me that you are sincere in your desire of a reconciliation with Him, by your willingness to surrender your dearest treasures to procure it, so He has clearly demonstrated His readiness to forgive and restore guilty man to His favor, by the gift of His well-beloved Son, as a propitiation for the sins of the whole world. I implicitly credit the sincerity of your avowal. Cannot you believe in the brighter testimony God has given of His love to you?"

There was a pause, and then Mrs. Croxdale said—

"I can believe in the love of God to the world, but hardly to me as an individual."

"Do not individuals make up the world? If every human being made the same excuse for unbelief, who would constitute the world?"

"But I have been such an offender, I dare not believe that God gave His son for me, lest my presumption be chastised. I could encourage others to hope, but fear to hope myself."

"Your objections would be valid if your personal merit were the plea for pardon, but on the contrary our utter helplessness is that plea. When the world was actually in its utmost need, even without hope, Christ died for it. Your case cannot be more desperate than those words describe."

"But do you really think I have repented sufficiently, Lucy?"

"Repentance implies an acute consciousness of extreme necessity, and a consequent application to God, through Christ, for succor. When we feel this consciousness, our only resource is to trust in Him. We can do nothing for ourselves, but humbly intreat mercy as condemned, undone, and guilty rebels.—Try to pray thus, Mrs. Croxdale, and hang all your hopes upon the Cross."

"Pray for me, Lucy."

Miss Rainsworth knelt beside the bed, and with the simplicity and fervor of genuine devotion, endeavored to express the feelings of her friend. The sufferer's heart breathed itself into every petition. A long silence ensued, during which she seemed engaged in silent supplication to Heaven.

When she again saw her husband, the terror and anxiety he had so dreaded to behold in her countenance, had given place to an expression of hope and peace. She desired to be left alone with him for an hour, and he went from that conference blessing the Christianity which had shed such ineffable tranquility over the spirit of his dying wife, although by him it had ever been an unregarded and an uncared-for thing.

The following night, at her earnest solicitation, he consented to leave her for a while to the entire charge of Lucy, and endeavor to seek repose. Hitherto he had been too uneasy to allow any watch unshared by himself. Lucy remained perfectly quiet after he left the apartment, hoping that her patient slept, and dismissed the attendant to rest also. Mrs. Croxdale at length stirred, and placing her hand on Lucy's said—

"I have been thinking a great deal to-night, my dear Lucy. Although my heart is full of happiness and gratitude to God, the shadow of the past still flits before me. I feel that I have been deplorably culpable as a wife and mother. My duties rise to my view, definite and clear, just as I am about to lose the opportunity of discharging them. If I could be restored to health, I hope that I should be a better woman; but I cannot tell. God knows what is best for me and them: I mean my dear husband and children. I fear to trust myself, and am resigned to His will: and feel very grateful for the comfort He has given me."

She paused for want of breath, and then again resumed.—

"Lucy, you have been to me the best friend I ever had. I rejoice that we ever met. May God reward and bless you;—but, I feel sure that He will. Yet, I have another boon to crave, and you must not deny me. You told me you had an object in life—a purpose to fulfil; and I have prayed for its success and that its performance may not interfere with your fulfilment of my request. Something whispers me that it will not. I want you, dear Lucy, to remain with my dear children, and teach them to be like you—teach them as you must have been taught: for oh! you must have had a blessed mother."

"I had indeed!" exclaimed Lucy, with an emotion she could not repress.

"Then grant my petition," resumed Mrs. Croxdale, with greater energy, "and when I meet her in the paradise of angels, I will bear witness to the effect of her precepts, and perhaps the knowledge of her daughter's piety and usefulness may increase her felicity and brighten the jewels in her crown. Deny me not, dear, dear Lucy. I anticipate all your objections—your youth—my husband—the responsibility. I will speak to my husband, and he will heed the wishes of his wife and entrust the children to you when their mother is no more. He will be to you as a brother. And there is Charles, my poor dear brother. How he will grieve for his sister's death!"

Emotion choked her utterance for a while. As soon as she could command her voice, she continued—

"Charles is very dear to me!—my only brother! I have had some fancies relative to you and him ever since we met, Lucy. You must let me speak of them—let me speak freely to you. He is impetuous and resentful, but generous, warm-hearted, and noble. A misfortune which befel our family in our childhood seemed to embitter his spirit. I have imagined you the very being to curb, tame and influence him. When you do meet now, however, I shall not be here. Treat him not as a stranger, and if you at times disapprove, yet look on him indulgently, for my sake. That is all of course I can ask or expect you to promise relative to him. But my children—dear Lucy—sister, friend—you will not forsake them?"

Lucy knelt beside her, and promised, if Major Croxdale concurred in the request, that she would endeavor to be an elder sister to them. Mrs. Croxdale thanked her again and again with the most earnest gratitude. Ere the close of another day, Major Croxdale was a widower.

A few days after the celebration of the funeral, Major Croxdale held a conversation with Lucy, concerning the promise his wife had exacted from her. "Relative to the reasonableness of her request," he observed, "neither she nor I at the time were competent judges. I acceded to all her wishes with scarcely a thought of any one but herself. I hope, however, that you will feel no hesitancy, Miss Rainsworth, in withdrawing from any agreement the melancholy circumstances of the case induced you to make. I release you from all obligation; and, believe me," he added, with increasing emotion, "I shall always entertain a most grateful sense of your unwearied attention to her whose early death has brought such desolation to my family. I wish you to regard me according to her request, as a friend and brother. Speak freely and frankly to me of your wishes and plans for the future, and I shall take pleasure in forwarding them;—feeling that in doing so, I am only making a slight acknowledgment for what we owe you. I understood you had no relatives, and if the proposal meets your approbation, I would like you to remain in this house with my children, until you can determine on a course more consonant to your inclinations. They never more needed a female friend, and to part with you at present, would increase their grief. When Charles returns, I shall consult with him relative to my arrangements for them."

He paused for Lucy's reply. After a little hesitation, she said—

"I feel and am grateful for your kind consideration, Mr. Croxdale. I certainly prefer remaining with the children, for awhile, at least. Relative to the promise to which you have alluded, I will speak freely, and hope you will deal frankly with me—I wish to perform it, unless you think me incompetent for your children's preceptress. Now, they only need a comforter. Hereafter, when you reflect on my youth and inexperience, you may naturally consider them objections for a governess. I hope you will tell me so, without hesitation."

"I ask no better instructress, Miss Rainsworth,—no kinder friend for my children. I commit them to you with perfect confidence in the wisdom of my dear Mary's judgment, and shall henceforth regard your abode here as a settled thing, until you tire of your arduous occupation. Mrs. Winterton, our hostess, is a worthy woman, and wishes you to stay with her. She will, I doubt not, endeavor to make her house agreeable to you and the children. If at any time she should appear less pleasant, inform me, and I will look out another home for you. I shall board with my brother-in-law, at his lodgings, but shall see the children every day."

Mrs. Winterton was the widow of the former surgeon of the Fort. She had one daughter, a few years years older than Lucy, amiable and intelligent. Affliction destroys or dispenses with ceremony, and often links in bonds of intimacy those who might else have remained strangers to each other. Mrs. Winterton and her daughter attached themselves to Major Croxdale's children, and Lucy found them kind and judicious counsellors, and interesting companions. Major Croxdale bade his children love and obey Miss Rainsworth, as they valued his approbation. The former command was superseded by fulfilment, and the latter was an easy consequent.—Laura, the youngest, was the cause of great anxiety to her father. She was devotedly fond of her mother, and the violence of her grief alarmed the bereaved parent for its effect on her health. But Lucy's own acute sensibility suggested to her the best means of comforting the little girl, and her skilful management had its reward. The child soon felt that she was understood and sympathized with, and her affections clung more tenaciously to her young monitress as the intensity of her sorrow subsided. Lucy taught the children to associate the image of their departed parent with their best and brightest thoughts, and the joyousness of childhood soon returned; bringing, however, no forgetfulness of her who had so early been called away. They frequently visited her grave, and planted flowers around it. One evening, Lucy had accompanied them hither, and remained longer than usual. The situation was secluded and picturesque, and she had yielded in an unwonted degree to the influence of melancholy.—Her thoughts were busied with the past, and while Augusta and Herbert were scattering flowers upon the white marble tomb, Major Croxdale's affections had already placed there, she knelt beside it with her head on her clasped hands. Absorbed by her own emotions, she was unconscious of the approach of a stranger, until an exclamation from Augustus startled her. The child bounded forward, exclaiming—

"Uncle, dear uncle Charles!"

When our heroine rose, he was bending over the little girl, whom he had folded in his arms. He advanced hastily to the grave, with his face still turned from Lucy's view, and she, unwilling to intrude upon his feelings at such a moment, walked a few paces off, signing to the children to remain. Augusta and Herbert understood her, and continued near their uncle, the latter whispering words of comfort to his ear, giving Lucy as his voucher for the assertion that "dear mamma was very happy now."

Laura, who was an infant when her uncle last saw her, kept her place beside her young preceptress.—After the lapse of a few minutes, the gentleman turned slowly and sadly from the repository that contained the ashes of the being he most loved. As he stooped to caress his nephew, the boy again directed his attention to "Miss Lucy." Scarcely had his eyes met hers, than he started back as if stung by a scorpion, and she, with a wild gaze of intense anguish, sunk upon the ground insensible. Laura uttered a scream of terror, and her brother and sister were scarcely less alarmed. It needed all the arguments that their greatly agitated relative could adduce, to convince them that their beloved governess was not dead. At his request, Augusta removed her bonnet, and untied the scarf from her throat.—The fresh air thus admitted revived her. Perhaps the cries of Laura aided to restore her consciousness.

"Have I seen a spectre?" she faintly murmured, as her eyes unclosed with a wild, apprehensive expression.

"No one is here but uncle Charles," whispered Augusta, without fully comprehending her words.

The young man had stept aside as her returning color told of awakening sense. He saw that she slightly shuddered as his niece glanced towards him in replying to her interrogation. Although he neither heard that interrogation or the answer, he felt sure that abhorrence of himself caused the convulsive motion; yet, as if reckless of the result of the act, he advanced and stood immediately before her. Lucy had half risen, and being still very weak, had leaned her head against an adjacent tree. She did not raise her eyes as he approached, but she knew that he was near, and gazing on her, and the variations of her countenance were even manifest to the children. Herbert, with a vague perception of some antipathy between his uncle and the friend he so tenderly regarded, said, with a look almost partaking of dislike, as he turned to the former—

"Although you are my uncle, I wish you had not come."

Lucy's cheeks took a deeper dye. With an almost desperate hope that she might be yet mistaken in the identity of Mrs. Croxdale's brother, she once more raised her eyes to his face. The expression touched even her heart, with all its reasons for deprecating his presence—it spoke such utter wretchedness.

"We will go home," she said, addressing Hebert; "I feel better now. Augusta, show your uncle the nearest path to our house, where, perhaps, he may find your father."

She spoke with a bewilderment of thought, forgetting that he was probably better acquainted with the localities of the place than herself. He started at the sound of her voice, and perceiving that she tottered with excessive weakness as she rose, he almost unconsciously proffered her the support of his arm. She rejected it, alleging that she was able to walk alone; but whatever was the character of her feelings, her tone and manner were courteous and gentle, and she evinced no further sign of disgust at his presence. It was not in the nature of Lucy Rainsworth to add another drop to a cup of sorrow which she felt was already full. They pursued their way in silence. Major Croxdale was absent, and so soon as they entered the house, Lucy, after bidding the children remain with their uncle, retired to her own room. Scarcely had she closed the door, when Herbert pressed against it, with a request from his relative that she would see him for a few moments in the parlor. Without pausing to consider her most expedient course—indeed, conscious that delay would only increase the difficulty of their meeting, she accompanied the child. The young surgeon was pacing the apartment with hurried steps and agitated countenance. As Lucy entered, he eagerly approached and closed the door after her.

"Miss Rainsworth," he cried, at the same moment, "if that name indeed be yours, relieve my torturing suspense. Oh, do not say you are"——

His eye concluded the inquiry his lips refused to utter.

"I am his sister," Lucy replied, in a scarcely audible tone.

"I feared it—I felt it!" he passionately exclaimed; "and I am indeed the most miserable of men. You may well desert, abhor me, for I loathe myself. Yet your generosity has been so measureless, that you saved his murderer, and have proved to that murderer's sister an invaluable friend. Major Croxdale informed me, in the brief note which he wrote me on my homeward way, to acquaint me with the death of my precious sister, that they had a ministering angel in the wilderness; but as I did not reveal her name, I had yet to learn that she was the angel of my dark history too. Oh, why was I not taught in infancy to forgive, like you, and pour the oil of a gentle and forbearing spirit upon the tempestuous ocean of human passion! Ye guardians of my youth, ye have much to answer for!"

There was a wild impetuosity in his manner that startled his auditor. She replied, in a mild and subdued voice—

"You ascribe more merit to my actions than they deserve. Your release was but an act of justice, from the hand of one whose delegate I was. I only obeyed her dying injunction; nor, did I know, until this evening, that Mrs. Croxdale was your sister. I always heard you spoken of as their 'brother,' and 'Charles,' and knew you by no other name. Most gratefully do I thank God that He enabled me to afford comfort to Augusta Derrington's daughter. On her death-bed, all unconscious as she was of the bliss her words were destined to impart, she invoked blessings on my mother. That sweet remembrance will be treasured in my heart through every future hour."

Lucy's voice faltered with emotion, but she checked her tears and endeavored to appear composed.

"You have been nobly avenged, Miss Rainsworth,—you are nobly avenged. Every act of yours but adds to my self-reproach. I stand before you a very wretch in my own estimation. Remorse covers the past, despair rests upon the future. Bear with me awhile longer, Miss Rainsworth: you will, you must, hear my confession, and then I will rid you of my detested presence. When your unparalleled generosity set me free, I learned from the papers which you put into my hand, that my succession to my grandfather's estate was secured to me without the slightest apprehension of dispute—that she whom I had imagined the supplanter of my mother, had, years ago, made every provision possible for the advantage of the latter and her offspring, which the most refined sense of justice could dictate—that her children, far from rioting in the property I had considered mine, were even ignorant that such property existed, and the son, who was the pride and idol of a high-principled mother and an angelic sister, was as honorable and generous as I was base and despicable. Yet that son my murderous hand had doomed to an early grave;—his mother slept beside him;—his sister lived to suffer and to loathe me. Can you believe, Miss Rainsworth, that such knowledge could afford me one pleasurable emotion?—Oh! how valueless did the inheritance I had once so coveted become! Freely and gladly would I have laid down in the grave of my victim, if my death could have restored him to life, and the enjoyment of what I now loathed as much as I had once desired. As soon as the circumstances of my case permitted, I returned to your native town, to offer the only restitution in my power. I eagerly sought information relative to your family, and every account but aggravated my wretchedness, and made my turpitude more glaring, for your praises were on every tongue. I endeavored to trace your journey and present abode, for to the sister of Rainsworth I attributed my release, but my inquiries were unavailable; or if those I questioned could have informed me, they would not. I felt that my anguish could not know the slightest mitigation, until I found you, forced some explanation on you, and restored the wealth, whose very idea maddened me. To attempt to excuse my course of action to you, Miss Rainsworth, would, alas! I too well know, be a vain and insane procedure. Yet could you look into my heart, with all your reasons for detesting me, you would still pity me. Your pure mind can scarcely conceive of the perverting, corrupting, poisoning influence an unjust prejudice, habitually indulged and cherished from the earliest dawn of infancy until it grew into a passion, would produce on a proud and sensitive temper like mine. I have not naturally a sordid disposition. I never loved money, but I was taught to believe myself the rightful heir of wealth, of which I was also taught to believe that I was meanly and unjustly defrauded. I imbibed, with almost my first impressions, the idea that my mother had been ungenerously supplanted in the affections of her only parent, by one whom she had loved and treated as a sister. I was told that she died of a broken heart, in consequence of the inflexible, cruel, and unforgiving anger of her father, urged on in his unnatural course by his adopted heiress. In proportion to the tenderness and commiseration I felt for my good and gentle mother, whose early death consecrated her memory in my breast, was my hatred and scorn of her imagined foes; and, like the Carthagenian general, I swore vengeance against them. Thus was a rancorous and bitter spirit fostered within me, which only needed opportunity for its deadly work. That opportunity came. Would that I could recall the black hour! It has sent its baleful dye to darken the current of every future hour of my miserable existence. I can make no expiation. The blood-spot is stamped—the deed is done! Oh! surely, great as was my crime, my punishment cannot be regarded as a light one. I feel that you will deem it sufficient, and not increase the torture of my lacerated heart by refusing it the only balm it can receive, the assurance of your forgiveness and the acceptance of the sole restitution left me. And beside my sister's grave I met you!—you could kneel there with the sweet consciousness that the spirit of its tenant bore witness in Heaven to your kindness—while I, beside your brother's tomb, had bowed in bitterness and remorse! —what a contrast!"

He paused. Lucy sat with her face concealed by her clasped hands. She could not, she did not, doubt his sincerity, nor could she fail to commiserate his sufferings. Fearful had been the punishment of mother's early fault—not less fearfully visited upon his son, had been the consequent malignity the husband of Augusta Derrington had indulged in his own bosom and fostered in his children towards Mrs. Rainsworth! Covetousness of the possessions to which report said she was heiress, had chiefly influenced him in his choice of a wife, although he probably loved her as much as a selfish, worldly man is capable of loving. His very affection, however, increased his resentment at the unrelenting obduracy of her father, but he possessed neither the delicacy nor the consideration which would have concealed it from her, and the effect of his disappointment on his temper aggravated her unhappiness. She was not formed to struggle with misfortune, and soon found rest within the grave. Her husband took his children to England, where he died in a few years. A widowed aunt educated young Montresor and his sister, and, with the legacy she bequeathed them, they returned to the United States, the former intending to institute a law-suit against his grandfather's heirs, as soon as his pecuniary resources would enable him. He was at that time a mere youth, without friends or influence, and possessed of little money. The marriage of his sister with Major Croxdale, a short period after their arrival in America, lessened his difficulties by relieving him of all anxiety for her, and giving him also a kind and judicious counsellor. By his advice he studied medicine, and through his influence obtained the situation of surgeon in the army. As Major Croxdale rather dissuaded than encouraged him in his intentions of legal litigation, years elapsed without the execution of his purpose. He cherished his animosity, however, not the less, though the various stations he was appointed to, kept him at a distance from the scenes of his mother's childhood. During an interval of leisure, he was visiting the Eastern States, when his unfortunate and fatal encounter with young Rainsworth, attracted by the name of Edward Derrington (which he knew to have been his grandfather's) on a printed list, he inquired who bore it, and his mother's maiden name. He learnt that the latter was Brentwood, her Christian name Ellen:—that she was a wealthy widow, and resident of the village. Satisfied of her identity with the person he so detested, although he had never before heard her husband's name, he waited with a kind of frenzied impatience for the arrival of Edward, yet without any specific object.

The hapless young man came. Montresor's first salutation was an insult. The spirits of both rose, and the melancholy result ensued. The oozing of his victim's life-blood seemed to cool the fever of his murderer. The subsequent revelations the papers he received from Lucy gave him, completed his cure, and overwhelmed him with remorse and anguish. He spoke but the truth when he said that he was wretched; and Lucy was too anxious to atone for her beloved mother's errors, to cherish hostile feelings against him, although his rash and wicked act had rifled her heart of all its earthly treasures. She therefore assured him of her pity and forgiveness, and even offered him her hand as a pledge of her good-will. He took one hasty step forward, but instantly recoiled; and his arm, which he had half extended, abruptly fell. A flush passed over his pale and haggard features, coloring his very forehead, then faded, leaving them more livid than before.—He looked at Lucy earnestly, and sadly said—

"Yes, I know that you do forgive me, and I bless you for your sweet gentleness. Perhaps, if I had earlier met you, I might have been a better and a happier man; for I realized a strange spell in your influence from the memorable hour when you bade me go forth free from the village prison. The dark passions within me seemed rebuked by your presence. Oh, that I had earlier known you! Now, nothing is left for me but to wander over earth with the malison of Cain upon me, cursing, like Job, the day which gave me the unwelcome boon of life."

"You speak too hopelessly, Dr. Montresor," said Lucy, touched by his wretchedness. "The past cannot indeed be recalled—what is done is done," she added, in a voice tremulous with emotion; "but you have repented, and the malison of Heaven reacheth not the contrite heart. The future is before you, to write upon it what you please."

He listened eagerly while she spoke, and when she paused, asked, with the air of a man whose existence hung upon her reply—

"And will you, sometimes, in your prayers for the miserable, permit my name to dwell upon your tongue?"

"I will," she replied, in a faltering tone; "and now, let this interview terminate; nor, at any future hour, let us refer to this harrowing subject.—You endeavor to find peace; I will try to be resigned to what is inevitable."

A flash of pleasure, like lightning on a thunder-cloud, lit up his gloomy visage. Lucy observed it not, and if she had, would not have divined its cause, for she had never imagined that he expected to be forbidden her presence.

Major Croxdale was deeply affected by the recital of the sad events that had marked Montresor's course since their last meeting. His mild and equable temper had no sympathy with the stormy character of his brother-in-law's, and he viewed his conduct with horror and detestation, although he forbore to express his feelings. Towards Lucy, his manner assumed a yet more brotherly character.—His pity and interest increased, and the respect he already regarded her with, grew into reverence. He ceased to address her by the formal title of Miss Rainsworth, and taught his children to call her cousin, a relationship they were eager to acknowledge. He united with Montresor in urging her to take back the property her mother's scrupulous justice had deprived her of, but on this point she was inflexibly determined.

Time passed on, and day after day found Montresor lingering by the side of Lucy, sometimes aiding her in the instruction of the children, sometimes reading aloud while she sewed or drew, but more frequently silent, gloomy and abstracted, manifesting no interest in any person or thing. Gradually, almost imperceptibly to herself, the disgust and horror his presence had at first occasioned her subsided, and his evident unhappiness made her almost wish that he could forget its cause. Even the children observed his variable moods, and one morning Herbert said that "uncle Charles sometimes looked cross at everybody except cousin Lucy."

"Do I?" said his uncle, trying to smile; "I am sure I do not wish to look cross: but I believe I am unfit for the society of civilized people, and am often half inclined to seek a home among the Indians."

"They would probably bestow some such sobriquet on you as they designate the mysterious hunter by, if Herbert's penetration be not at fault," said Major Croxdale, who was present; "for you should certainly not take Lucy with you, so you would always look cross, then. Have you seen this hunter, Charles?"

"Yes, did I not tell you he accompanied us in our exploring journey? Indeed, without his aid we could scarcely have accomplished it; but he exercises considerable influence over the Indians. They seem to reverence him. You would not like him, Miss Rainsworth," continued he, observing her attention arrested by his words, "for he frustrates the labors of the missionaries, and asserts that the savages are happier as they are. Perhaps he is half right," he said, more gloomily; "but, however that may be, he has strangely interested me. His wild mode of life, his repulsive air, his striking physiognomy, and above all, his melancholy and studied avoidance of society, attract me. I have fancied that some early disappointment, or perhaps some crime, to which a wayward destiny rather than natural malignity impelled him, may have destroyed his happiness. I frequently have serious thoughts of seeking an abode with him, but he evinces a dislike for all companionship but his dogs and the Indian tribes. I am told he has lived among them nearly twenty years."

"What is his name?" inquired Lucy, with deep interest.

"It is not known. The Indians call him Black Cloud, he is so stern and gloomy, and so rarely seen to smile. The Canadian French call him merely 'Monsier,' and claim him as a countryman, for he speaks their language fluently. But I should not think he was a Frenchman. I have somtimes fancied, Miss Rainsworth, though having never seen him you will not consider my remark a compliment, that he resembles you. I perceived the likeness while journeying with him; and once noticing the initials E. R. upon his rifle, I fell into a reverie on the possibility of any relationship existing between you. You are ill, Lucy," he exclaimed with sudden alarm, as he marked the death-like hue of her countenance. She took the glass of water he hastily provided, and said, with returning composure,

"I am better now: but tell me more of this strange hunter. I partake your interest in him."

"I have but little more to say. He has built himself a rude habitation, and hunting is his favorite pursuit. I used, while travelling with him, endeavor to draw him into conversation, but never succeeded in eliciting any particular observation which I could connect with his personal history except once, when some incident of Indian life called from me a comment on the self-sacrificing nature of woman. He replied with more vehemence than I had ever before seen him exhibit, and in a tone of biting sarcasm, alleging that such an idea was the veriest illusion that ever mocked the hopes of man,—that from the hour when Eve's unhallowed ambition plucked the forbidden fruit, and made Adam a participator of her crime, woman had been the tempter, torment, and corrupter of the human race."

"He was severe, indeed," said Lucy, with emotion, "and with such false views must be a most unhappy man. I would give worlds to see him."

"Worlds! You shall see him, then. To purchase you gratification is the aim of my joyless existence," said Montresor, in a lower tone. "He comes occasionally to the Fort to buy ammunition. I wil introduce him to you, and his theory will soon evaporate?"

"Do you think so?" cried Lucy, with more animation than he had ever before seen in her manner.—"But you must not introduce me—at least, not yet. I only wish to see him at a distance."

The next day, while Lucy and her pupils were taking their accustomed ramble, they were joined by Montresor, who said to our heroine—

"The Black Cloud is at the Fort. Come with me and I will point him out to you."

She turned away her face to conceal her agitation, and followed him in silence along the shore. There was a boat moored below the cliff on which they stood. It was occupied by two Indians. They had brought the hunter to the Island. A buffalo robe was thrown across the seat. Lucy gazed intently on it, as if she hoped to read its owner's character in its folds.

"He is going on a hunting excursion, and I have almost concluded to accompany him, if I can get permission," said Montresor. "Yonder he is," added he, pointing with his finger to a party of three or four men. "Observe that tall, dark-looking man, with a rifle in his hand. He is speaking earnestly to that short, thick person, who is a fur-trader."

Lucy looked as directed. Her heart beat tumultuously—for many mingled emotions were struggling there. Her gaze was so fixed and intense, that Montresor remarked—

"I perceive his appearance has not lessened your interest in him."

She continued looking at the hunter until he walked away; then turning her eyes, in which tears had gathered, on Montresor, she said—

"He is even more an object of interest to me than you can imagine."

She paused, perhaps wishing at that moment he would question farther, and longing for sympathy and counsel. He replied rather coldly, and in a tone that grated harshly on her ears—

"My imagination is indeed at fault; but I believe the sympathies of ladies are generally awakened by the conception of imaginary woes."

She did not pursue the subject, and they returned to Mrs. Winterton's in silence. The next day Montresor spoke of his intention of accompanying the hunter in his proposed excursion, and with a dash of bitterness asked Lucy if she did not envy him the privilege.

"I should but speak the truth in saying yes," she replied, without noticing his manner, for her thoughts were not of him. She then inquired how long they would be absent.

"I cannot tell. He accepted the offer of my society with such reluctance that I did not question him farther. Indeed, I know not why I wished to go, but I seem urged by some fatality, perhaps to my own ruin. Well, life cannot be more valueless to him than it is to me, certainly."

"Will the expedition be attended with danger?" asked Lucy.

"Not more than is usual. There will be excitement, and that is what I want, for I believe I grow more unhappy every day."

"Then you will not prove the most healthful companion for the Black Cloud," said Lucy, endeavoring to cheer him, "and I was hoping you would lure him back to civilized society."

"I leave that task for you," he replied, "as you so much desire its accomplishment."

"If you could put me in the way of fulfilling it, you would indeed be a friend," she said, with energy.

At this moment a servant entered, and handed a note to Montresor. After glancing over its contents, he offered it to Lucy, saying,

"The object of your sympathy is too ill to prosecute his purposed excursion, and has written to inform me."

Again he was struck with her excessive paleness, but she took the missive from his hand, and perused it. Could he have known the interest with which she pondered every syllable, he would have been still more surprised.

"He was not well yesterday," added Montresor, "and I advised him to defer the expedition, but he smiled almost scornfully, and said life was not so precious that a slight indisposition should excite his fears."

"You will go to him, will you not?" she asked, almost wildly. "Oh, if he should die!"

She shuddered and burst into tears. The children were at play in the room, and did not observe her. Montresor hastily approached nearer, and taking a seat beside her, said, with considerable agitation:

"You are not wont to be thus affected. You must have cause. If you have met this strange man before you came hither—if he be to you the object of interest I imagine him—that is—in short, if I can do any thing to relieve your anxiety, command me. I do not ask your confidence farther than you may desire to give it me. I will serve you blindfold—in any way, so I can promote your happiness."

"Thank you," murmured Lucy, with a deep-drawn breath, followed by a pause. Checking her emotion, she added—"You can do much to relieve my present anxiety; you may perhaps do more in the future—but my plan is not fully formed. Visit him, and report to me the character and danger of his disease. That he does interest me I own. When I see you again, I will tell you more. Now I would have you go to him."

Montresor departed, and wearily did the hours pass to our heroine, until his return; but she sought strength where alone it is to be found, and faith and hope sustained her. Happy are they who in the hour of trial and perplexity, can go to God for succor and encouragement. The hunter was even worse than Montresor had apprehended, and with all his desire to give pleasure to Lucy, he was compelled to acknowledge that he considered him very ill.

"Still," continued he, as he marked the grief his words caused her, "I regard him as most enviable, since he is such an object of interest to you."

"Oh! my life is bound up in his, and to win his affection, and procure him happiness, is the leading desire of my heart. Can you not then guess what he is to me, Charles?"

She turned her tearful eyes on Montresor. His countenance betrayed varied and violent emotion. She had never before called him Charles, although he had often entreated her to do so. Now she pronounced the name unsolicited, and it fell with peculiar sweetness upon his ear. She then entirely forgave him! But she had spoken it in connection with the mysterious Black Cloud, and probably thinking only of him, knew not what she said. As he did not reply, she drew a miniature from her bosom, and presented it to him. The features, though youthful, strikingly resembled the hunter.

"This enabled me to recognise him," she said, "for I never saw him until you pointed him out to me; nor does he know of my existence—yet is his image engraven on my heart."

"Is it possible he can be your brother," exclaimed Montresor, with eagerness.

"He is my father," she faintly articulated.

A few more hurried words told him the sad history of her parents. She could not have had a more absorbed and interested listener. He assured her he would be both his nurse and physician, and if his skill and attention could avail, he should soon be restored to health. Lucy's firm resolve was to go to him herself, and watch beside his couch until his recovery, but how to accomplish her object, was the difficulty. His hatred of woman-kind seemed to preclude the possibility of his permitting her attendance as a stranger, and the bitter remembrances which apparently yet rankled in his bosom, created a painful doubt whether she would be welcomed as his daughter. Nor had it been the plan of Lucy thus to be presented to him. A sweet vision of winning his love, and awakening his interest, ere he knew the tie that bound them, flitted before her—but the features of the picture were yet but dimly shadowed forth. Montresor would not believe it possible that the hunter could feel other than rapturous joy in the recognition of Lucy as his daughter, after once beholding her; yet even he admitted the introduction in his present condition, might prove fatal. Lucy's intense anxiety at length suggested a scheme, but she felt some embarrassment in communicating it to Montresor. This was, however, merged in the interests she had at stake, and it was arranged that she should adopt the attire of a boy, paint her face a darker hue, to render the disguise more complete, and be introduced at the residence of the hunter, as a youth who had acquired considerable skill as a nurse, at the Fort. The only deception, indeed, was in the dress. Mrs. Winterton was merely informed that a patient of Doctor Montresor, requiring particular attention, Miss Rainsworth had been induced to undertake the office of nurse. She readily agreed to supply her place to the children, until her return. To Major Croxdale Lucy imparted the truth, and he himself accompanied her and Montresor to the Indian settlement in which the hunter lived. It were vain to attempt a delineation of her emotion, as day after day, and night after night, she watched beside her father, who in the delirium of a violent fever, frequently uttered expressions of reproach against his wife, and of lamentations at his own wretchedness, which wrung her heart. Yet were there at intervals words of regret for the rash desertion of his home, which served to soothe and encourage her wounded spirit. Nor was he always insensible to the untiring devotion of his patient and admirable nurse. He would often gratefully thank her for her care, and the comfort afforded him; and manifest anxiety lest such continued vigil should affect her health. As his illness had been violent, his recovery was proportionably slow, but the prayers of his child were not in vain, and he did recover. Perhaps something was due to the skill of Montresor, who, had Lucy permitted his attendance, would never have quitted the house; but though surrounded by Indians, she felt perfectly secure, and while she gratefully acknowledged his kindness, he appreciated the motives that forbade his stay.

"There is a charm in your voice, Louis," remarked the hunter, one day as Lucy was reading for his amusement. (By that name he had been taught to call his nurse.) "I hardly know how I can part with you when I recover."

"Let me stay with you always, then," replied the supposed boy, quickly.

"But what would your parents say?"

"I would rather remain with you than any one else," said the youth, with a touch of emotion.

"But you would soon weary of solitude. I have no society, and need none. You are young, and ought to have it."

"I do not desire any but yours," was the reply. "Let me watch you, read to you, walk with and wait on you, and I shall be happy, for I love you."

There was a depth of earnestness in the speaker's manner, that made itself felt by the listener, and the hunter was silent for some moments. At length he said:

"I believe you are sincere, Louis, but you are an enthusiast. I do not deserve such love."

"Why?" was the questioning answer. "Could not you love me in return?"

There was a degree of eager interest in the youth's air, which made the hunter involuntarily pause again ere he replied. What was there about him to call forth the devotion of that young heart, sick, helpless, and unattractive as he then appeared to himself. Yet he felt a surprised consciousness that the boy's happiness was involved in his answer.

"You cannot," faltered his companion, despondingly.

"I did not say that, Louis: but where are your relatives?"

"I have neither sister nor brother, and my mother is in Heaven."

"And your father?"

"My father does not love me," was the agitated reply.

"Not love you, boy! that is impossible. Were you my child, I feel that I should almost idolize you."

"Then let me be your child. I ask no other parent," and Lucy knelt beside him, and pressed her trembling lips upon his hand, on which her tears fell fast.

"I believe you are actually weeping," said the hunter, half seriously, half sportively.

"No," she said, looking up with a brilliant smile, "I am very happy now." Then rising, she added—"And if you will allow me, I will sing for you; and you shall fall asleep beneath the spell of my song, for you have talked enough for the present."

He signed assent. She lowered the curtain she had suspended from the window of his rude chamber, and in the sweetest voice he had ever heard, sang the following stanzas:

Give me an humble cot,
In some sequestered grove,
With God to smile upon my lot,
And loving ones to love.

Give me the power to bind
The broken spirit up;
Some drops of tempering balm to find,
For the most bitter cup.

Oh! let me live to bless—
This is the noblest quest—
The secret of true happiness—
"To bless is to be blest."

Then, when my task is done,
And life's last link is riv'n,
Sav'd through the merits of the Son,
May I go home to Heav'n.

The Black Cloud had shaded his eyes with his hand. He continued quiet when the song was concluded, but he sighed frequently. Was there indeed a spell in the melody, or did the sentiment attract him? Lucy approached the bed on tiptoe, and, taking a seat beside him, passed her hand gently across his forehead and through his hair, to soothe him to slumber.

"You are the very best of nurses," he said kindly. "You have physic both for mind and body. Where learnt you that song, Louis?"

"My mother taught it me, a long time ago."

"She was not an ambitious woman, then?"

"The song expresses the aim of her ambition, and her life exhibited it. I wish you could have known her, sir, as I did. She was little less than an angel."

"Then she must have been a very happy woman."

"She was happy in one sense, sir, for she trusted in God, and left her destiny in His keeping, but she had deep cause for sorrow, although she never obtruded it upon others."

"Was your father the cause?" questioned the hunter.

"She always told me he was the noblest of men," answered Lucy, evasively; "being too perfect himself to tolerate faults in others."

"The most erring are generally the most intolerant," observed the hunter.

"Then my father must have been an exception," said Lucy. "But I think your remark is just, for who is so indulgent, so forbearing, and so ready to forgive as God? and we are always trampling upon His goodness. I often wonder that all men do not love Him."

The Black Cloud made no reply, and his nurse quietly kept her station until he fell asleep.

"I feel so well to-day, doctor," observed the hunter one morning to Montresor, "that I purpose a little excursion up the river, to show Louis a place connected with an Indian story I have been telling him. He needs recreation, for he has been an indefatigable nurse, and I am sure the change will do him good."

Montresor readily consented. The Black Cloud, contrary to his advice, insisted on walking to the shore. Montresor went thither first to have the canoe in readiness. A good deal exhausted by his exertions, as the hunter attempted to enter the boat, he was seized with a giddiness in his head, tottered and fell in the water. There was in reality no danger, except from its tendency to produce cold—but Lucy was exceedingly alarmed, and, losing all self-command, screamed frantically,

"Save him—oh! save my father!"

"Fear nothing, Miss Rainsworth," exclaimed Montresor, as he grasped the almost fainting form of the Black Cloud, and startled by her visible anguish into a forgetfulness of her disguise. He bore him to the shore, and supported his head on his arm, while Lucy knelt beside him. He looked indeed excessively pale, and his eyes were still closed.

"He will soon recover," said Montresor; "it is only a sudden faintness from exhaustion."

Lucy was gazing on him with the most intense anxiety, when he opened his eyes with a wild, inquiring glance, and met her agitated look.

"Who are you, boy?" he said, with startling abruptness; "who called the name of Rainsworth?"

Terrified at the sternness of his expression, Lucy clasped her hands convulsively with an appealing glance at Montresor. But ere he could command a reply that would relieve her perplexity, she turned again to the hunter, and exclaimed—

"Oh look not thus upon me. I am your nurse—I am your child. Oh, my father, by all the love you once felt for Ellen Brentwood—by all the sorrow your desertion cost her—by all the trials I have endured—I conjure you not to cast me from you!"

"Cast you from me! What mean you? Would that I could prove your words were not the effect of phrenzy!"

"The dress she wears is a disguise. She is the daughter of Edward and Ellen Rainsworth," said Montresor; while Lucy, overcome by her emotion, fainted away.

"They had no daughter," was the hunter's reply, though he received Lucy in his arms.

"She entered into existence after his desertion of his wife," said Montresor, "just seventeen years ago. I am prepared to prove what I assert. I am the son of Mrs. Rainsworth's cousin, Augusta Derrington."

As the hunter's trembling hands loosened the collar from the neck of Lucy, a miniature attached to a ribbon dropped from her bosom. It was his own, presented to his wife on his marriage. Could he longer doubt?

"And you really have decided to reside at the Fort for the sake of my children, Lucy?" said Major Croxdale, some weeks subsequent to the above incident. "I feel much indebted to you and your father."

"He will be as happy here as at any other place, I believe," replied Lucy; "and the training of your sweet children forms, with his happiness, the object of my life. I could not think of leaving them. My father must become accustomed to the change in his mode of life gradually. I hope in time the abstraction to which he is subject will wear off."

"I do not doubt it will, with the companionship of such a daughter."

"And the children to amuse him," added Lucy.

"But what is to be done with Charles?" said the Major, looking rather earnestly at Lucy. "Now that your father has ceased to require his attention, he seems indifferent to his profession, and evinces no interest in anything. If he could become a child again, and be placed under your guidance, I believe he would be very happy. But as that is impossible, I know not what is to become of him."

There was sadness and seriousness in the countenance of Lucy, as he thus addressed her, but Major Croxdale's scrutiny detected no embarrassment.

"We must leave time to work its will with him, too," she replied. "There are acts which, however deeply repented of, bring retribution, even in this life, as an inevitable consequence. It is the law of nature, that those who sow the wind must reap the whirlwind! Neither my father nor Charles can ever be truly happy in this world."

* * * * * * *

"You are too young to resign yourself to melancholy, Montresor," said Mr. Rainsworth, one day, in the presence of his daughter. "There is probably a long tract of time before you. It is not fitting that it should be void of hope and light. I know, by sweet experience, that nothing tends so much to restore the mind its vigor and the heart its bloom as the reciprocation of affection. To recover your interest in existence you must marry."

"I, sir?" said Montresor, starting and coloring. Then adding, after a moment's pause, "I can never offer my hand without my heart, and I have no heart to offer. It has been long ago surrendered."

"Without return?" questioned Mr. Rainsworth.

"I have never asked return," replied the young man, with emotion, "for I knew it would be madness."

Mr. Rainsworth's glance rested an instant on his daughter, and her varying color was an explanatory comment on Montresor's words. He paced the room with an agitated step, and murmured—

"Oh! that others would profit by our experience! We, my young friend, are each the victim of a single fault. Yet, you have expiated yours, so far as wrong done the dead, can be expiated to the living. Lucy," he said, pausing before his daughter, "if he robbed you of a brother, his skill probably restored a father to you. What say you, my child?—you have my consent to be the wife of Montresor."

There was a moment's breathless silence, and Lucy replied—

"I do him justice, father. I have long since entirely forgiven him, but," and her voice, in spite of her efforts to control it, trembled with emotion; "Mr. Montresor is right,—we can never be married. It is mere sacrilege to the dead,—it could bring no happiness to the living. Even if I were other than I am, I could not be his wife, for I feel that in that relation I should sympathize so wholly in his regret, that it would entail more misery on me than happiness on him. I have given him a brother's place in my heart, and he is too generous to ask more. I shall never marry any one. We must all find our felicity, my dear father, in doing good to others. You remember my song?"

She had spoken rapidly, and tried to infuse cheerfulness into her manner as she concluded. She rose instantly afterwards to quit the room, but, glancing at Montresor, whose face was bowed upon his hands, she hesitated a moment, and then approached him.

"I hope I have not pained you, Charles," she said, "I did not mean to do so."

He started up, and, taking her half-extended hand, pressed his lips upon it.

"Forgive my rash avowal," he murmured;—"henceforth, I am your brother."

In a forest of the far west, the sighing of whose leaves mingles with the bubble of a neighboring stream, the curious traveller may seek a moss-grown stone, bearing the name of Lucy Rainsworth. Two other graves, of more recent construction, are near it. They have no inscription, but the missionaries may perhaps tell him their tenants were the father and brother of her whose bright and purifying influence is still felt in many an Indian cabin. Nor is she without a witness of her virtues in the more civilized world. The three children of Major Croxdale have each taken the benefit of her precepts to bless and guide a happy household.

TO A MINIATURE.

BY L. J. CIST.

It is her image!—Even as
She stands before me yet—
Mirrored in Memory's faithful glass,
When last mine eye she met:
The sweet expression of that face—
The sadness of that brow,
So like—so true—that as I gaze,
I seem to see her now!

'Tis like—how like!—and yet unlike!
I gaze upon it, till
I almost fancy speech it hath,
That image, calm and still;
I breathe to it in softest tone,
That gentle name so dear,
And half expect to hear my own,
Responsive, meet mine ear.

A thousand kisses on that cheek,
And on those lips I've press'd;
But, ah! not mine the sweet response,
With which I once was bless'd.
And yet, though kisses back, the while,
I'd seek to win in vain—
They seem to wear her well-known smile,
Which bade me kiss again!

Oh! wondrous power of mighty art!
Whose magic can restore
Their forms—when those we love depart—
To sight and sense once more!
And thou—fair type of her, whose charms
Thou dost so well recall—
We part not till in these arms
Thy loved original!

THE FRIGATE'S TENDER;

OR,

THE NAUTICAL RUSE.

A TALE OF THE LAST WAR.—(FOUNDED ON FACT.)

BY J. H. INGRAHAM.

Chapter I.

It was early on a sunny morning during the progress of the last war with Great Britain, that a young naval officer, walking on the Battery at New York, had his attention drawn to a group of persons earnestly engaged in watching two vessels just visible far down the harbor.

"What is it, my friends?" he asked, in a frank, hearty tone, as he joined them.

"The tender, again, chasing in a schooner, sir," answered an old tar, touching the point of his hat as he noticed the anchor button on the officer's coat.

"Here is a spy-glass, sir," said a master's mate, who stood near, and at the same time respectfully handing it to him.

"Thank you, my man," answered the lieutenant, with a smile, as he took the instrument and placed it to his eye.

By its aid he could clearly distinguish an armed schooner, of about ninety tons, crowding sail in chase of a trading "fore-and-after" that was making every exertion to escape, both by towing and throwing water upon the sails.

"The chase is about half a mile ahead, sir," said the master's mate; but the tender sails like a shark in chase of a dolphin. The fore-and-after don't stand a chance of getting in past the fort."

"The tender can sail, and I am the one that ought to know it," said a stout, weather-beaten looking man. "She was a pilot boat, and the fastest craft that ever danced over the waves. Three weeks ago I and my crew were out in her, when yon English frigate suddenly made her appearance out of a fog-bank and brought us to. But I took to my yawl, and pulled for the land a league away, and escaped; for the fog was so thick the Englishman could not get a glimpse of me. It is my schooner they have turned into a tender, sir, and that's made so many captures the last three weeks of our small coasters."

"She carries forty men, and a long thirty-two, so I hear," observed a seaman in the group.

"And is commanded by a luff and a reefer," added the master's mate.

"It would be a blessing," observed a man-of-war's-man, who had not yet spoken, "if that craft could be caught napping. It an't safe for a sloop to put her nose out of the harbor, beyond the cape; but while the frigate was there alone, they could slip along the coast in light water, and show her their heels. But now, every thing that ventures out is brought to by that long gun of the tender's."

"That's a fact, Ben," responded another seaman. "She has taken or driven back into port no less than twenty-six craft in the last three weeks. I shall be glad, for one, when our frigate lying off there gets her armament aboard; for then I think we'll swallow the English frigate outside, and pick our teeth with the tender."

All these remarks were heard by the young officer, who all the while continued to look through the spy-glass at the tender and her chase.

"There goes a gun!" cried several of the spectators, as a flash and a jet of azure smoke came from the tender's bows.

"That is bold enough," observed the young officer, as if speaking his thoughts aloud; "the impudent tender is almost up with the fort, and dares to fire at the chase in the very face of the batteries."

"It is only to try and do her mischief, sir," said the master's mate; "for she finds the fore-and-after will escape her—so she fires a gun to cut away something."

"You are right, my man," responded the officer; "for she has put about and stands seaward again."

He continued to watch the retiring tender for some moments in silence.

"It's a pity we had'nt an armed cutter in port that would sail faster than she can, so that we might give her a chase out," said a lad, approaching the group. His dress was that of a midshipman, and his air singularly free and fearless.

"Ah, Frank, are you there?" said the lieutenant. When did you get back from your father's?"

"Last night. I was in hopes to find the ship ready for sea, Mr. Percival; but I am told it will be three weeks before we can get away. I want to have a brush with John Bull's frigate, who hovers off and on the harbour with such bravadoing. When did you get in town, sir?"

"Yesterday morning. Have you been witnessing the pretty chase down the bay, Frank?

"Yes. I would give a year's pay if I could have a hand in capturing that rogue."

"Come aside with me," said the officer, putting his arm in that of the midshipman. "Your words but express my own wishes. I have conceived a plan for capturing that tender."

"In what way, sir?" demanded the youth, with animation.

"I will show you. The tender's game appears to be the coasting vessels, from which she takes men to impress in the British navy, and also plunders the craft of such things as they contain which are of any value. My plan is to charter an old sloop, the worst looking one that it is possible to find in port, yet a tolerable sailer, for she must work well and readily obey her helm. I will load her deck with hen-coops, filled with poultry, pens crammed with pigs, and a few sheep, and a calf or two, by way of variety. You laugh, Frank; but the commander of the tender will find it no laughing matter, if I succeed as I anticipate. I shall ship about thirty-five men, and conceal them in the hold, and taking command of my craft with one hand only visible on deck, I shall set sail out of the harbour. When I get outside, I think I shall be able to show John Bull a Yankee trick he will not be likely to forget very soon. But all will depend on our good management of the affair. Now you see what I would be at, Frank! Will you join me?"

"Heart and hand, sir," responded Frank Talbot, with enthusiasm. "Will you allow me to be the hand on deck to help work the sloop?"

"Yes, if you can talk Weathersfield Yankee."

"Wall, I rayther guess I ken, tho' I ant been to Connecticut among 'em sins last grass!"

This reply was pronounced in such an inimitable Yankee dialect that the lieutenant burst into a hearty laugh.

"You will do, Frank! Now we want to proceed at once to action. I want you to go to the Anchor rendezvous in Pearl street and drum up about five and thirty men. Take only those that are daring and ready for any thing. Let none of them know your object, lest we should be betrayed by information being conveyed to the tender. You will find men enough in these times that will ask no questions. Meet me at twelve o'clock at the Exchange Reading Rooms and report to me."

The midshipman then took his leave and hastened up the battery. The lieutenant returned to the group and taking aside the master's mate, whom he knew, laid briefly before him his project. The old tar entered into it with all zeal. Together they went to the docks, where, on account of the blockade, lay idle a large number of vessels of every description. They were not long in discovering such a craft as suited them: a Hudson sloop of seventy tons. She was immediately put in trim for sailing by the master's mate, and three or four men whom he employed; while the officer proceeded to buy up and send on board his live stock.

Chapter II.

The morning following these events, the Tender of the British frigate was standing off and on under easy sail, and close in with Sandy Hook. The wind was from the south-west and blowing about a five knot breeze. The sky was without a cloud, and only a gentle undulation lifted the surface of the ocean. The tender was a clipper built vessel, very long and narrow in the beam, and constructed wholly with an eye to her fast-sailing qualities; and she gave proof of them by overhauling every thing. She carried amid-ships a long thirty-two pounder. Her crew consisted of about forty men in the uniform of the British Navy. They were now principally assembled in the bows and on the windlass, talking together or watching the shore. Aft, the officer of the deck, a bluff, full-faced young English "middy," was lounging over the quarter railing, smoking a segar. The man at the helm had a sinecure of his post, for the vessel skipped along so easily that she seemed almost to steer herself.

"Sail ho!" cried the look-out, from the heel of the bowsprit.

"Where away?" quickly demanded the officer. "In shore, two points forward the beam?"

"Aye, aye! I see!" answered the middy, levelling his glass at a sloop just stealing out of the harbour, closely hugging the shore. "It is another of the Yankee coasters. A sail in shore, Mr. Stanley!" said he, speaking through the sky-light.

The lieutenant, a stout, fleshy, port-wine visaged John Bull, came on deck and took sight at the stranger, which was about a league distant.

"It is a lumber sloop; but we will bring her to, if she dares to venture out; for we may get some fresh provisions and vegetables from her, if nothing more."

"Shall I put her on the other tack, sir?"

"Not yet. Keep on as we are, till the sloop gets an offing. If we run for her now, she will take refuge in the harbour!"

The sloop stood out for half a mile, and then hauling her wind, beat down along the land. The tender delayed the chase until she had got too far from the entrance of the harbour to get back again, and then putting about run for her so as to cut her off.—The sloop seemed to take alarm, and putting about, began to make the best of her way towards the harbour she had left. Confident in the speed of his own vessel, the English lieutenant felt satisfied that the chase was already his, and laughed at the efforts of the sloop to get away.

At length they came near enough to see that her decks were covered with pigs and poultry.

"A rare haul we shall make this morning!" said the middy. "Enough chicken pie for the whole of the frigate's crew, to say nothing of turkies and roast pig for the cabin!"

"What a regular slab-sided Yankee skipper she has at her helm! Man and boy, she has a stout crew!" said the lieutenant, laughing. "They look frightened out of their senses, as they begin to think they are gone for it! Sloop ahoy!"

"What ye want?" came across the water, in the strongest nasal of Yankeedom.

"I want you to heave to, brother Jonathan!"

"I'd rayther not, if it's all the same to you! I'm in a mity hurry! Frank!" added the disguised American officer, in an under tone, "when I order you to let go the jib, you must draw it aft as hard as your strength will let you. I at the same time will put the helm hard up, so the sloop will pay rapidly off, and fall aboard of the tender; for I am determined to fall aboard of her. I shall curse your blunders, and order you to let go; but don't mind me; keep pulling the jib-sheet hard to windward. Leave the rest to me. Now, my men," he said, speaking through the companion-way, "take a good grasp of your pistols and cutlasses. When I stamp my foot on the deck over your heads, throw off the hatches, leap on deck, and follow me."

"Heave to, or I will sink you! What are you palavering about?" shouted the Englishman.

The two vessels were now side by side, steering on the same course, abeam of each other, the tender to leeward and about a hundred fathoms off.

"Wall, don't be too free with your powder, and I will. Aminidab, let go that 'ar jib sheet!"

"Yes, I will," answered the young reefer; and with a hearty will he began to draw it to windward. At the same moment the American officer put his helm hard up, and the sloop rapidly payed off right towards the tender.

"Let go that jib sheet!" shouted the English officer.

"Yes, Aminidab, you 'tarnal fool you, let it go, I say! Let it go! Don't you see we are coming right aboard the Capting's vessel?"

But "Aminidab" pulled the harder, and fairly took a turn with the sheet about a belaying pin.

The English officer was about to pour out upon him a volley of oaths, when, seeing that the sloop would certainly fall foul of him, he turned to give orders for the protection of his own vessel; but, ere he could utter them, the sloop's bows struck her near the fore rigging, and swung round stern with stern. At the same instant, the American officer stamped upon the deck, and forty armed men made their appearance from the hatches, forecastle and cabin, and leaped after Percival upon the tender's deck.

The Englishman, taken by surprise, surrendered without scarcely striking a blow; and getting both vessels under sail, in the very sight of the frigate, the gallant young captor sailed with his prize back into the harbor, and safely anchored her off the battery, after an absence of six hours and twenty-seven minutes.

This exploit is doubtless one of the boldest and most spirited affairs that came off during the war. The account given above is a faithful narrative of the transaction, and the chief circumstances will be recognized both by the brave officer in question, as well as by his friends.

POOR ISABELLE.

The dews of night were falling round him,
Coldly on his corpse they fell,
Stiff and still the maiden found him,
And her anguish who could tell?

When a weeping comrade told her,
One who loved her hero well,
That he lived and died a soldier,
Not a tear wept Isabelle.

To a moonlit bank they bore him,
One by one they bade farewell;
Still a gentle form hung o'er him—
Still remained poor Isabelle.

With the morning's dawn they sought her,
And they found her where he fell,
But upon the field of slaughter,
Lifeless lay poor Isabelle.

LADY BARBARA'S WHITE ROSE.

Whitehall was blazing with light and beauty.—Cavaliers, the noblest and handsomest that England could boast, wandered through the gorgeous apartments; and ladies, the fairest the world could show, swept along in the graceful Coranto, or listlessly reclined on velvet couches, playing with the jewelled feather fan. It was the most splendid revel of the season. Masque and pageant alike over, the high and mighty James, surrounded by a chosen circle, stood speechifying, in his own inimitable manner, jesuitism, witchcraft, puritanism, and that subject dearer than all, "the right divine of kings to govern wrong;" and his son, with that melancholy brow, which to the Italian astrologer foreshadowed his fate, sat in moody silence, while the royal favorite, Buckingham, passed along—the admired and worshipped of all beholders—nodding to one, laughing with another, or leading some belle of the court a few turns through the mazes of the dance.

Many an eager eye was fixed upon Buckingham, many an ear anxiously listened to catch his words, although they might be mere passing remarks, or mere passing compliments; and when he stepped beside the recess, where an aged man, and a delicately fair girl, his daughter, were sitting, every eye was fixed upon the group. The conversation between the favorite and the old man was long; and at length taking the fair girl's passive hand, he led her forth among the circling dancers, and gracefully stepped a measure.

The maiden was very beautiful; but her beauty was of that delicate kind which half escapes cursory observation; and as she glided with downcast eyes and mournful brow, as though her thoughts were far away, through the mazes of the dance, many wondered that from among so many more brilliant beauties, the favorite should have chosen that pale maiden. But while many wondered, and anxiously inquired who that maiden—for she was unknown at court—could be, there was one who followed her, with eyes flashing with rage, and with cheeks as pale with suppressed emotion as her own—the Lady Barbara, who had for the whole winter kept the capricious and wayward favorite at her fort, and who, secure in her matchless beauty and talents, had feared not, despite the intrigues of his politic mother, to believe him her own.

The Lady Barbara, with violent effort, assumed a calm air; she began conversing again with the cavaliers, who stood duteously around her, and carelessly inquired the name of the maiden who had alike attracted their attention. She was, it appeared, the daughter of an old and wealthy Leicestershire knight, one Sir Wilfred Beaumanoir, who had lately come to town respecting a lawsuit; and it was conjectured that as he came from the same county from whence the family favorite came, he might probably have been known to the favorite's late father, Sir George Villiers.

"A worthy old knight is Sir Wilfred," said one, "but given, 'tis said, to astrology, and such like studies. Why, his very appearance at court, they say, hath been put off until now, through waiting for a fortunate day."

The Lady Barbara fixed her dark eyes intently on the speaker. "A fortunate day for him!" said she.

"No, for his darling daughter, who he verily believes is to attain high fortune in London," was the reply.

"What, is he then the country knight who hath purchased the jewel of Battista Croce, for which he asked three-score pounds—the onyx sigil I mean?" said the second speaker.

"I know not," replied the first; "but 'tis likely enough, seeing that he is wholly bent on such wild fancies."

The dance at length ended, Buckingham replaced the timid girl by the side of her father, and joined the circle where his "dear dad and gossip" was still edifying his admiring auditors with the outpourings of his right-royal wisdom. Still and statue-like stood Lady Barbara, heedless—indeed, not even hearing the compliments addressed to her, until the conversation of the group beside her again returned to the old Leicestershire knight and his fair daughter.

"She is truly lovely!" said one, "and methinks the name 'Venezia la Bella,' becomes her well."

"What said you of Venezia?" cried Lady Barbara, fixing her eyes on the speaker with a wildness that startled the whole company.

"That yonder fair maiden's name is Venetia—Venetia Beaumanoir, Lady Barbara."

The lady clasped her hands, and looked wildly upwards.

"Take care of Venezia," said Battista Croce to me. O fool that I was to think of Venice. It was of a rival, of this Venetia, I was to beware."

Her scarcely articulate words were understood by no one, but her deadly paleness and violent agitation were plainly marked by all; and when Lady Barbara was led away, many conjectures were made as to the cause of her sudden illness, but all were far from the truth.

* * * * * *

It was in vain that James I. fulminated his anathemas in his delectable "Demonologie" against those detestable slaves of the evil one, witches and enchanters, for during his reign, beyond every other period, the thirst for forbidden knowledge pervaded every rank of society, and the fearful profligacy of a court, which, though presided over by one who chose to call himself Heaven's vicegerent upon earth, far more nearly resembled a Pandemonium, encouraged the efforts of the vilest wretches, who, although they might possess little skill in reading the secrets of futurity, were assuredly adepts in the black art of poisoning. Numerous were the adventurers who at this period took up their residence in the outskirts of the metropolis, prepared to wring a precarious livelihood for themselves from the hopes and fears and superstition of others; and perhaps the place where beyond every other the greatest number had congregated was Golden Lane.

In a court leading into this disreputable locality, where the usurer plied his trade, which led his dupes to eat of the prison basket, or perhaps to end their career at Tyburn, and his fitting associate, the scrivener, sat ready to alter deeds, or forge wills, at the behest of the penniless heir or the desperate gamester,—in this court, fitting abode, and amid fitting companionship—dwelt a woman who had long been celebrated as a dealer in charms. The mystery that hung around her—for even her name was still unknown—had probably increased her fame; for numerous were her customers, and often, when day began to close, the cavalier, wrapt in his wide riding cloak, his rank indicated alone by the white leather boot, soiled and grim from the miry pavement, might be seen cautiously tapping at the closely shut door, or the court lady, shrouded from view by the velvet mask and ample muffler, and followed by one muffled attendant, would steal along the unaccustomed way, fearful of notice, yet sure to obtain it, from the stateliness of bearing which neither disguise nor apprehension could wholly conceal.

Such was the lady, who, in the twilight, stopped at the door, at which she tapped thrice, and was instantly admitted. The mask was hastily laid aside, and the beautiful but pale and care-worn features of Lady Barbara met the view of the dealer in charms.

"You are ill, my lady," said she; "and I wonder not. Last night was enough to drive the roses from your cheek. But fear not; all will be well."

Lady Barbara looked anxiously, almost wonderingly, at the speaker; for though she believed her possessed of supernatural knowledge, she scarcely expected to find her information extending to the particulars of the last night's events.

"How can all be well?" she said.

"Easily, Lady Barbara. This girl is but just come from the country. We must frighten her, and send her back again."

"Ah, but is she not the dreaded rival against whom I was warned? 'Beware,' said Battista Croce, 'beware of Venetia!' Alas! in his Italian phrase I believed he meant Venice; but it was at her he pointed."

"He did so, doubtless; for few have his knowledge. But still, fear not, Lady Barbara; we must counterwork; and to that end I have caused her nurse to be sent to, and ere long she will be here."

"Her nurse!—and coming here?"

"Yes,—and to know what the good fortune of last night portended. Sir Wilfred is half wild with joy, they say; and so is my lady nurse: but the poor girl is quite woe-begone; so she thinks, perchance, she is bewitched."

"Woe-begone!—and so highly honored by him; bewitched indeed! Would that that bewitchment might continue! But how knew you this?"

"Lady Barbara, what is there I knew not? So I caused a letter to be sent, bidding my lady nurse, who hath greater power over Sir Wilfred, to come here, for that by the stars I have discovered great good fortune in store for her. The nurse was inquiring, as I thought she would, after a cunning woman, even when the letter met her, so she will be here ere long."

Meanwhile an elderly personage, in a sober-colored gown of broad cloth, with stiff ruff of lawn, edged with bone lace, and a silk scarf which she wrapped about her, and looked at with no little pride, entered the court, and cautiously made her way towards the very house where the dealer in charms and the Lady Barbara were engaged in close colloquy. Her knock was the signal for the lady to conceal herself while the "cunning woman" advanced, welcomed her new customer, and by skilful questions and suggestions soon obtained all the information Lady Barbara required, at the same time impressing the old woman so forcibly with a belief of her supernatural powers as to send her away absolutely awe-struck.

"A marvellous woman!—she knows every thing!" said the nurse, as she rejoined her companion, a fellow-servant, who, not without many misgivings, had waited at the end of the court; "she knows all about why Sir Wilfred came to London, and my young lady's good fortune last night, too; and she said great things are in store for her if we do but follow her bidding, but one thing she saith that I doubt if my worthy master will agree to, and that is, to bring her the charm that is tied around my young lady's neck, and for which he gave so many pounds."

"Good nurse, surely you did not tell her of that, when the outlandish man said it was to be kept quite secret?"

"Nay, she told me;—for she 's a marvellous woman, and said it was a charm of great power, but that if it were brought to her she could make it ten times more powerful."

"It is very strange," replied her companion; "but I fear she dealeth with evil spirits. Truly I would counsel ye to have nought to do with her."

"Nay, 'twere folly to throw away good luck. And if she makes this great match for my young lady, what is it to us how she doth it?"

* * * * * *

"Look, Lady Barbara," said the dealer in charms, as, a few evenings after, the fair court lady sat in the mean room of the unprincipled adventurer, "the talisman is yours: tie it round your neck, go boldly to the masque to-morrow, and see if your wayward tassel will not again seek his broken chain."

Lady Barbara clutched the precious jewel eagerly,—precious intrinsically, but far, far more precious from the value with which superstition had invested it. That fair and perfect agate, so beautifully engraved, set so richly in purest gold—it was not its beauty, its perfection, its cost, but its power of drawing favor toward the wearer, of attracting those whom she willed to attract, that rendered it so precious in the eyes of Lady Barbara.

"Oh, how greatly am I bound to you," said she to the woman. "Take my purse: but, though filled with gold, it is an inadequate guerdon."

* * * * *

Again proud Whitehall was blazing with light and beauty—again the fairest and the noblest assembled, and, resplendent in jewels and in beauty, Lady Barbara took her place among them. But although the favor-bringing talisman hung round her neck, her tassel returned not at her call. Buckingham, changeful and wayward, had grown weary of a devotion which had lasted the whole winter, and was not unwilling to seek a newer lady-love. Again he danced with the fair Venetia, and again—the prey of the fiercest jealousy—Lady Barbara returned home.

Had the dealer in charms deceived her? No,—for the jewel was shown to Battista Croce, and he acknowledged it was his workmanship. Wherefore this change then? The stars were not sinister.—And Lady Barbara pored over her horoscope, and sought again and again the dealer in charms, to endeavor to account for the caprice of the wayward favorite.

Spring passed, summer came on, the court were about to remove to Theobald's, when, one afternoon, out by the fields, then lone and unfrequented, although long since thickly covered with houses, a masked and muffled figure, attended by a servant, almost as closely muffled as her mistress, stood beneath some trees at some distance from the path—scarcely traceable, for so few passed that way—apparently anxiously waiting. Ere long a third female figure, equally shrouded from view, joined them; and the servant, retiring some distance, left the two to their colloquy. The reader need scarcely be told that these were the dealer in charms and Lady Barbara, who, now that the lengthened days no longer suffered her to visit the woman at her own house, had chosen this unfrequented spot to meet her.

"And does she really return forthwith to Leicestershire?" was the hurried inquiry.

"No. Sir Wilfred hath taken lodgings at Enfield, both for the air, and that he may be near the court. We are baffled!"

"Baffled, indeed! There's some hidden charm still—some cursed talisman—at Enfield! at Enfield! Would she were in her grave!"

"And little would send her thither. Poor girl, she's far from health; and so her nurse will come to me to-morrow for a cordial drink, forsooth. Shall I make her one?" and the woman fixed her eyes emphatically on Lady Barbara.

"Ay, well can you make it. She looks pale, too; she cannot live through the summer."

"I am ever ready to do my lady's bidding," replied the woman; "but mine is a dangerous calling. The risk is great; and surely Lady Barbara will bear me harmless?"

"Rely on it. Have I not promised?"

"But should I fall into trouble, some token, however small, by which I might let my lady know without risking a message?"

Lady Barbara paused. At length she took an artificial white rose, which was fastened to her boddice by silver lace.

"I once valued that rose greatly," said she, giving it; "and well shall I know it again.—Be secret—be certain. Farewell!"

The woman returned to her home, Lady Barbara to her noble mansion; and with smiles on her brow she glided through the dance that night.

Three days passed away, and Lady Barbara, in her velvet carroch, was returning to London, from a visit to her godfather, anxiously, yet almost fearful, to learn that intelligence which she dared not openly seek after, when a violent storm came on; and whiled the dappled horses and the velvet carroch were placed for shelter beneath an outbuilding, the fair court lady and her waiting women were compelled to accept the accommodation which the best room of a way-side inn could afford them.

Through the thin partition and threadbare hangings, the loud and earnest conversation of the men in the kitchen might be plainly heard; and soon did Lady Barbara discover that the subject of conversation, which was the news just brought from London, was that in which she, beyond all others, was most interested.

"Ay," said a rough voice, "more poisonings—and another Mistress Turner's business;—but I'll warrant me, some of your fine court ladies are in it."

"No doubt on't. But is the poor young creature really dead?"

"Why, 'twas the strangest chance. An old nurse goes to a vile witch in Golden Lane, thinking her a wise woman, and asketh for a cordial drink for her young lady. So this servant of the devil giveth her a bottle. The old woman takes it home, and pours it into a tall Venice glass, when, ere the poor young lady could drink it, her little dog leaps on the table, overthrows it and begins to lap it, when, behold you, in three minutes he lies dead! There was bustle enough, I promise you; but the best part of the news is, that the witch is now safe in Newgate, for I saw her carried there."

"Nay, good man, better news an' ye had seen her at Tyburn," replied another; "for depend on't the court lady, at whose bidding she did it, will get her off after all."

"Nay, I heard naught of court ladies, though I'll warrant me there is one, as I said."

"And I'll warrant, then, that the witch holdeth some token whereby she will be saved from the gallows. Would that I knew who that court lady was. But, depend on't, she'll be found out, after all."

Lady Barbara heard no more; she had fainted.

"No wonder," said her chief waiting woman, "no wonder, poor lady, frightened with the storm, and then put into this close, low, shabby room, and a set of noisy clowns swilling their beer just beside us;—faugh: I should not be surprised if I fainted myself."

"Only hear yonder madam, with her silk gown, forsooth," muttered the angry hostess. "Fainted! Marry come up. I've heard that these fine waiting women ape their ladies in every thing, so I trow they take up with cast-off fainting fits, as well as with cast-off gowns."

Lady Barbara returned sick in body, but far more sick at heart; her deadly plan had failed: and, oh, on the brink of what awful danger she stood! Mere country clowns had talked of some court lady having instigated the wretched woman to her deadly work. Would not wiser men say the same? Many, many were the anxious hours she passed in forming the wildest schemes. At length, when the dreaded message came that a person wished to see her,—her alone,—she took her stern determination.

"Bid the woman meet me when I ride out in the Park to-morrow," said she to her favorite waiting-woman; "I can then speak to her without suspicion."

Morning came, and in richest attire, beaming with beauty, radiant with smiles, Lady Barbara, on her milk-white jennet, followed by her serving men, rode to the Park, while one highly-honored cavalier kept close beside her bridle-rein. Ere long a woman, carefully muffled, was seen approaching them; but even when she came near, Lady Barbara's smile forsook not her brow. Waving her hand to her companion, she urged her palfrey a short distance onward, and commenced, as it seemed, an earnest conversation with this woman, who carried somewhat in her hand. There was nothing to awaken suspicion in this, for women with trinkets or perfumes for sale were often to be found in the park at this period; nor did her companion apprehend danger, until a loud shriek startled him, and he hastened to the lady just in time to save her from falling.

"Cause her to be seized," said Lady Barbara, in a faint whisper; "she hath sought to poison me with a white rose."

Too occupied with his fainting charge was the cavalier to give the order, nor, when Lady Barbara heard that the woman had escaped—for she felt that her fatal secret was safe—was she displeased. The belief—perhaps a correct one—that artificial flowers could be poisoned so as to produce instant death to the person smelling them, was general at this period, and this had suggested to Lady Barbara the scheme of pretending that the woman who was charged with the token flower had been sent to take away her life. That the fairest of the court ladies should be in danger of such murderous attempts, seemed likely enough; and so the high and mighty James edified a select circle that very evening with a dissertation on the fearful abounding of poisoners, as well as of witches, and on the singular chance that the lives of two court ladies should have been attempted, but, happily, attempted in vain; adding, that the vile witch who was then in Newgate should be put on her trial on the morrow, and hanged forthwith.

And so it was. The confession that she made was disbelieved: for, had not all London heard of the story of Lady Barbara and the poisoned white rose? And while the preparer of the deadly draught swung at Tyburn, she who had directed its making, surrounded by sympathizing friends, received their congratulations on her wondrous escape, and heard with scarcely suppressed joy the intelligence that Sir Wilfred Beaumanoir and his darling daughter had quitted London, fearful of a longer stay, and had returned, determined never again to seek court favour, to Leicestershire. There she espoused a gallant knight, who had long loved her, and whom she had not slighted in return; and happiness shone upon this union.

Many years passed away. The wayward favorite Buckingham was married; and Lady Barbara, who had also married, now resided in Northamptonshire. A splendid entertainment was about to be given by Lord Sondes, and invitations were sent to all the neighboring nobility and gentry, and among them to the Lady Barbara and her husband.

The bright summer's day passed pleasantly; and, as evening drew on, the company in separate groups paced along the terraced walks of the garden, or wandered in the Park, where a succession of masques and pageants had already amused the guests, and where the performers in their quaint apparel still lingered. It was now clear twilight. The Lady Barbara was sitting at a short distance from her companions; and it was observed that as a masked figure drew near to her she started. The figure approached quite close,—it was thought she whispered some words,—when a faint cry was heard, and a convulsive shudder was observed to pass over her: but ere a moment passed, the mask had vanished, and Lady Barbara lay lifeless on the green sward, a white rose fastened with a silver lace close beside her.

Swift pursuit was made after the mask, but nought could be discovered, either who she was, or from whence; but when the white rose was seen by the Lady Barbara's favorite attendant, too well did she recognize it; and then she confessed how her lady had given that very rose to the witch of Golden Lane, and how she had refused to acknowledge that pledge when it was brought to her by the woman's sister, and who now had doubtless poisoned her.

The Lady Barbara was buried privately, for the story had flown far and wide: but for many generations the neighboring peasantry firmly believed that in the summer twilight, just under the clump of elms beneath which her last breath was drawn, Lady Barbara, fair and stately, but with horror-struck features, might be dimly seen gazing intently on the fatal white rose which she held in her hand.

THE ART OF PASSING THROUGH LIFE

HONORABLY AND COMFORTABLY.

Trust, in God, suspect yourself, act right, and pray;
Seek peace, not grandeur; hear much, little say;
Reveal no secrets; learn the weak to spare;
Own a superior, and an equal bear.

THE CHILD AND THE ANGEL.

A VISION.

BY MRS. E. H. EVANS.

I saw a child—a frolic-boy,
Beside a river margin straying;
His jetty eyes were wild with joy,
Methought his very curls seemed playing—
So lightly o'er his shoulders bare,
Each ringlet fluttered in the air.

All heedless down the verdant dell,
His feet, as lilies white, came bounding;
And now he grasped a tinted shell,
And bent his ear to list its sounding,
Then looked, with eyes a moment grave,
Within its smooth and fairy cave.

At last, upon the crystal stream,
A pale and lovely flower came gliding;
With glance uplifted, it did seem,
Like Christian love that fears no chiding!
Yet little joy it brought to me,
Its pure and glistening leaves to see.

For when the boy its beauty spied—
To fear, or thought of harm, a stranger,
He leaned far o'er the rushing tide,
And reck'd not of his mortal danger.
My brain grew dizzy with affright,—
And feeling dim'd my aching sight.

No sudden plash!—no thrilling shriek!
I turned again, with wonder gazing;—
Ah, Memory, is thy record weak,
Or will the vision bear the tracing?
Still leaned he there in all his charms,
But circled by an Angel's arms!

All airily, 'mid locks of gold,
His raven hair unconscious floated,—
His cheek of rosiest mortal mould,
And lips on which my senses doated,
Pressed softly on the seraph's face,
Nor dreamed how fair their resting place.

The flower was gained—the Guardian fay
Replaced the boy, then smiling, vanished;
The child went singing on his way;
But thoughts were mine, Time hath not banished;
A joyous sense of Heavenly care,
Of Angel Presence every where.

FIRST IMPRESSIONS

BY MRS. H. MUZZY.

"Well, Wyndham, how do you like the two young ladies to whom you were introduced last evening?" enquired Henry Freeman of his friend, when they were seated at the breakfast table.

"Like them!" replied Wyndham; "like is too poor a word—they are lovely girls; I admire them both very much, but"——

"But what?" interrupted Freeman; "you seem perplexed in some way."

"Well, then," answered Wyndham, "I think the one you called Isabella, the most charming of the two."

"Indeed!" exclaimed an elderly lady, the aunt of Freeman, who was presiding at the breakfast table.

"Indeed!" was echoed by a younger lady, who was his sister. But this latter checked her look of surprise, and added—"many people admire Isabella more than her sister; she is certainly handsomer."

"Well, for my part," resumed the aunt, "I have always admired Mary most."

"Mary!" repeated Wyndham, "What a sweet name!—I have always loved the name of Mary."

"We not only love the name, but the person who bears it, in this instance," said Miss Freeman.

"I admit," said Mrs. Freeman, the aunt before mentioned, "that Isabella Harwood is generally thought to be handsomer than her sister, that is, on a first acquaintance—but I have known people change their opinion after being accustomed to her beauty."

"It is not her beauty only," interposed Wyndham. "I do not think her personal appearance much more prepossessing than that of her sister: but her manners are so sprightly—she is courteous and conversible—she has a smile for every one; besides, she is witty, and if I mistake not, sensible also; she sings so well too, and how gracefully she dances!"

"You are far gone, Frank," exclaimed Henry Freeman, laughing; "but," he added, "you will have many opportunities of seeing the fair sisters while you remain with us; so you can afford to suspend your opinion for a time; I believe they are to go with us to Mrs. Green's party this evening."

"I do not think," said Miss Freeman, "that they will both be there. I fancy Mary will not go, as she does not like to leave her mother two evenings in succession. Mrs. Harwood is in feeble health, and Mary often denies herself the pleasure of visiting her friends, that she may not be alone; at those times Mary reads to her mother, and receives, no doubt, as much pleasure as she bestows."

"Doubtless she does," remarked Wyndham; "for independent of the pleasure which those who are fond of books are certain to derive from them, the consciousness of performing a duty always brings its own reward. But does not Miss Isabella share this pleasing duty with her sister?"

"Not when she has an invitation to a party, or to any place of amusement," answered Mrs. Freeman.

"Oh, aunt," exclaimed Henry, "do not be too severe—let our friend judge for himself—it is unfair, is it not, dear aunt, to endeavor to bias the opinions of others in such cases?"

"Yes, Harry, I admit it is unfair," replied the lady, with a smile; "so I will not let my partiality for Mary Harwood blind me too far. Your friend must have a fair chance of judging for himself, where two of our loveliest girls are concerned."

Frank Wyndham could not help thinking that all the family present were partial to the younger sister, but as he knew them to be too amiable to be causelessly severe, he determined to suspend his opinion, as Henry advised, until a further acquaintance should prove which of the two beautiful sisters he ought to admire most. It is easy to determine to defer judging, but not so easy to control the willfulness of fancy; and that evening, when in company with the lovely Miss Harwood, Wyndham thought her the most charming girl he had ever seen. As Miss Freeman had predicted, the younger sister was not present—but he felt certain that if she had been there, Mary could not have gained any thing by comparison with Isabella, who was all animation, and who appeared even more beautiful than on the preceding evening; and not till he had retired to his room for the night, did it occur to him that Miss Freeman had said, "Mary denied herself the pleasure of visiting her friends," that she might amuse her invalid parent—and when the thought did occur to him, Frank Wyndham felt a pang of self-reproach for his unqualified preference for the elder sister.

"But then," he argued, "the younger Miss Harwood may not be of so social a temper as the elder; she may be more studious, and more fond of home, without being, in reality, more amiable."

In short, it was easy to imagine many things, rather than admit that the admiration he felt for the beautiful Isabella, would not bear the test of judgment.

Many other parties followed, at the houses of Freeman's friends, who were all eager to show hospitality to the handsome and talented young Southerner, the friend and guest of Henry Freeman, who was deservedly a favorite among his towns-people. There were parties made to ride into the country, and parties on the water; the Misses Harwood were always invited, and Isabella always made one of the company. Mary sometimes accompanied her sister, but more frequently there was some excuse for her absence—and when Wyndham inquired of Isabella why her sister did not join them, her answer confirmed his former supposition.

"Oh!" she replied, "Mary does not love society as well as I do—she has quite a dislike to parties; besides, she is always reading, so I cannot persuade her to come."

But the pleasure which every one manifested when Mary did join their social parties, convinced Wyndham that if she did not love society, she was much beloved by her friends; and he felt, in spite of his predilection for her sister, a growing interest for the gentle girl, which made him prize those opportunities of seeing her, which were "like angel's visits, few and far between;"—her presence seemed to inspire happiness rather than joy; and her own sweet serenity communicated itself to all around her. On one occasion, Isabella and her sister went with Freeman's family on a visit for the day, to one of their relatives, who resided a short distance from town; it was a charming country residence—the weather was fine, and the party were all very happy. The host and hostess warmly urged the party to stay all night, and be present at a little fete which would be held in the evening, and enlivened by the presence of some of the neighbors. No one objected—Isabella was in raptures, and eagerly seconded the proposal.

"Oh, it will be so charming!" she exclaimed; "we must—positively we must stay. Henry, Francis Freeman, Mr. Wyndham, all, every one of you say yes!"

Wyndham glanced at Mary Harwood—she looked uneasy, and her eyes were filling with tears—she turned away to conceal them, and no one saw her emotion beside himself.

"Well, Mary," said Mrs. Freeman, "what do you say? Shall we stay? You see your sister is willing."

"I too should like to stay," she answered; "but,"—and she whispered a few words to the questioner.

"You are right, my dear," said that lady aloud; "we cannot stay this time—some other night we will be happy to accept the hospitality of our friends."

"Nonsense!" exclaimed Isabella; "this is so like Mary."

And she ran to her sister, and drew her apart from the company.

Wyndham stole a glance at them, and saw that she was speaking earnestly, and apparently trying to persuade. Mary only shook her head. Isabella turned pettishly away—her color was heightened, and she looked displeased; but when she caught Wyndham's eye, her smiles returned, and approaching him, she said:

"I cannot persuade Mary to be obliging; she persists in going home, though every one wishes to stay. But come," she resumed, playfully, "let us put it to the vote!—every one who is for staying, hold up the right hand, and whoever is so stupid as to wish to leave this fete in prospect, let him, or her, keep the hand down, like Mary, holding fast to their dress, lest the hand should fly up of its own accord. Come now, who stays?" Not a hand was raised. "Well," she said, on seeing the result of her trial, "I see which party the majority favours—so if no other person stays, I cannot, I suppose."

"Oh, yes, Miss Isabella, stay, if it will be agreeable to you," said their hostess, "and we will convey you home in a day or two."

Mary cast an imploring look at her sister, who had nodded assent.

"Come, Isabella," said Mrs. Freeman, "you had better go home with us this evening? Mary thinks your mother will be disappointed if you do not return. I advise you to defer making a longer visit till another time."

Thus urged, Isabella prepared to return to town with her party, but it was with evident reluctance. Wyndham was less surprised at Isabella's wish to remain, than at the determined opposition of her sister.

"She is so young," he thought, "to be so resolute and unyielding. Isabella's fine spirits lead her to expect pleasure in every thing new; they are natural to her youth, and constitute her greatest attraction. I am sorry she is disappointed. She is a charming girl."

Wyndham gave expression to these thoughts when alone with his friend Henry. The latter merely answered—

"You are mistaken, Frank; Mary is not unyielding, except in cases where her duty is concerned.—Firmness, I admit, she possesses, in no small degree. She finds a pleasure in her duty, and she is always as cheerful as you see her in company."

"Is not such quiet serenity the proof of a cold heart?" enquired Wyndham. "I mean a heart that is not easily moved to joy, or sorrow, or love?"

"No, no!" answered Freeman; "in this instance, Frank, it is a proof of a heart at peace with itself, and of a well-regulated mind."

"Well, perhaps so," said Frank, "I hope it is so. Indeed, I believe it is so. But," he added, after a few minutes' silence, "I love a warm heart, a sanguine temper. A person whose feelings are always under control may be more estimable, but cannot be so attractive. Don't you think with me, Harry?"

"I will tell you what I do think, dear Frank," replied Freeman, smiling, "I think that a person who forms hasty opinions, and expresses them hastily, may be under the necessity of retracting them."

Wyndham looked a little hurt—but he only shook his head, and said—

"Harry, you are incorrigibly partial."

"Forgive me, dear friend," said Freeman, in a kind tone and he added—"Your behaviour has been just what it ought to be. You do not express to Miss Harwood the admiration you feel for her, and hitherto you have paid her no more attention than any fine girl has a right to expect;—persevere in so proper a line of conduct, till your judgment, matured by time, sanctions your admiration; will you promise to do this?"

"I will promise," was the answer that came from Wyndham's heart, and burst spontaneously from his lips.

"Well, then," resumed Freeman, "we shall do very well! Come, shall we take a walk? We will, if you please, call at Mrs. Harwood's, to enquire how the young ladies are, after their excursion."

"I know they are very well," he added, "for my aunt saw them this morning; but it will serve as an excuse for calling."

This was the first time Wyndham had called at Mrs. Harwood's, and he was surprised at the smallness of the house to which his friend directed him. Surprise was the only feeling, for his sentiments were too noble, his mind of too elevated a character, to be affected by external circumstances. Neatness and taste characterized the furniture, though economy seemed to have been kept in view in the purchase of every article, and Wyndham could not avoid remarking that the dress of Isabella, who was ready to receive them, did not well accord with the almost severe simplicity of their dwelling. Mrs. Harwood came into the room, her appearance and manners were extremely prepossessing, though the paleness and languor of her countenance told of ill health. Freeman enquired for Mary.

"She will be with you presently," answered her mother; "as soon as she can dismiss her pupils."

"Her pupils," thought Wyndham, "then there is a reason for her confining herself so much at home, and this charming family must be in straightened circumstances! But where are Isabella's pupils? She is the elder sister, and she is always at liberty!"

When Mary joined them, Wyndham thought he had never seen her look so beautiful. The young men were easily persuaded to take their tea with the ladies, and the cheerful ease and grace of Mary's manners on this occasion, charmed Wyndham. Every person's wishes were anticipated by her, with that quiet, unobtrusive care, which is so delightful in one who has the superintendance of home enjoyments. Isabella chatted, said a hundred witty things, smiled, and looked beautiful, but she appeared entirely occupied with being delightful; without endeavoring, in the least degree, to be useful. In the course of this visit, a neighbor entered—Isabella was performing a difficult piece of music on the piano.

"I am glad, Miss Isabella," said the lady, "to see you so much recovered from your fatigue. My little Emma was very much disappointed to-day, and sorry that you were not well enough to attend to her music lesson. You, my dear, had a double task to perform," she added, turning to Mary. How is it that you bear fatigue so much better than your sister?—you don't appear to be more robust."

"I did not suffer any fatigue yesterday, Madam," replied Mary; "the ride was delightful, and I feel much better for our excursion."

"Yes," said Mrs. Harwood, "Mary is always better for going out a little. I often urge her to avail herself more frequently of the kind invitations of our friends, but——"

"Indeed, my dear mother," said Mary, hastily, "I am too much of a rambler already,—do not encourage me to be more so."

"It is a fine thing," returned the neighbor, "when young people really choose to attend to business before amusement, as is, I am sure, the case with Miss Mary," and she cast rather a significant glance at Isabella, which was not lost upon any of the company. Wyndham felt hurt for Isabella, who, however, appeared quite unmoved.

"Can it be possible?" thought he, "that she is selfish and inconsiderate?"

Wyndham had never heard any person make use of those epithets when speaking of Isabella, and yet they occurred to his mind. It is difficult to get rid of first impressions. Wyndham found it so. Isabella Harwood had charmed his fancy. If not actually in love, he was very near being so. He had at first looked upon Mary rather as a foil to her more brilliant sister. But during the summer he spent at P——, a beautiful town in one of our New England States, this enthusiasm gradually wore away, for Wyndham could not long continue to admire where he could not fully esteem. By degrees, he became convinced that Isabella's conduct towards her sister was in reality "selfish and inconsiderate." She accepted invitations, and made engagements, without reference to her; and Mary was often obliged to attend to her sister's neglected duties, in addition to her own. He saw that in company Isabella assumed towards her sister an air of superiority, and she often jeered her for her scrupulous discharge of those duties from which she shrank herself. Conscious of being beautiful, Isabella seemed to exist only for admiration, and a constant round of pleasure. She shrank almost with loathing from the "slavish details" of domestic avocations, to which Mary gave dignity by the cheerfulness and grace with which she performed them.

It was not possible to regard this little family without mingled emotions of pleasure and regret. The order of nature seemed to be reversed, with respect to Mrs. Harwood and her younger daughter. It was Mary who watched over her mother with anxious solicitude—it was to Mary that the mother clung, with all that confiding trust which a child naturally feels towards a parent. "I must ask Mary to do this," or, "I must tell Mary of that," "Mary will do it," were phrases continually on her lips.—For Isabella, Mrs. Harwood felt a mother's pride as well affection; but Mary was the staff on which she leaned—and that staff never failed her.

As the time drew near which had been fixed by Wyndham for his return to his home at the South, his feelings assumed a tone of sadness hitherto unknown to him. He said one day to Freeman—

"I am indebted to you for a great deal of happiness; this has been the most delightful summer I ever spent. Your town is beautiful, its environs enchanting—the society here is hospitable and refined. The beauty of the ladies can no where be surpassed. I shall carry away with me impressions never to be effaced. Next summer, I hope to visit you again. And, perhaps," he added, after a pause, "perhaps, Henry, through your kind offices, I may be enabled to form ties that will fix my home permanently among you. I have no ties of consanguinity to bind me to the South—nothing but wealth—which I can better enjoy in your lovely island than any where else."

"I am truly happy to hear this, my dear friend," answered Freeman; "come and reside among us, then, and add to the attractions which our home possesses. But what are the kind offices you expect from me, Frank? How stand your first impressions?"

"They are reversed," replied Wyndham, with a sigh; "but I scarcely dare hope, Henry, that I shall be the gainer by my change of opinion. I fear Mary regards me with indifference."

"Not with indifference, Frank," replied his friend; "you surely do not expect my favorite would unsought be won?"

"Tell me, Henry," resumed Wyndham, "if you have no objection, what are the circumstances which have obliged Mrs. Harwood and her daughters—I should rather say, her daughter—to be under the necessity of depending so entirely upon their own exertions? In all our intercourse, I have never inquired more than you voluntarily told me; the deep interest I feel for them will, perhaps, excuse this request."

"Well, Frank," replied his friend, "I will tell you what you wish to know; but there is nothing strange or uncommon in the circumstances of the family, only that they are, perhaps, more refined and attractive than many others in similar circumstances. Mr. Harwood, the father of Isabella and Mary, was a merchant; he speculated too largely, and failed; his affairs were terribly involved, when he died, leaving a wife and four daughters totally unprovided for. Our parents were friends—we were playmates from infancy; my father befriended them as far as was in his power; he, you know, was not affluent, but at his death we were possessed of a respectable independence. Mrs. Harwood lost a most efficient friend in him. While her children were young, she had many difficulties to contend with, which, to a female nurtured in ease and refinement, as she had been, were trying indeed. She was enabled, however, through the influence of her friends, to educate the two elder girls, Isabella and Mary, with the view of their being teachers. They were both girls of good capacity, and their talent for music determined their mother to have them instructed in that accomplishment, that they might be enabled to instruct others when arrived at a suitable age.—Her plan succeeded extremely well—pupils were easily procured—for every one was desirous of aiding the widow in her laudable exertions; and the girls, scarcely emerged from childhood themselves, commenced their labors. Mary Harwood seconded her mother's views most earnestly. From childhood, she was always fondly devoted to her wishes—always hovering near her, and anticipating them before they were expressed; scrupulously obedient, the slightest hint from her mother was a law to Mary, and she has seemed to live for her alone. About four years since, the two younger girls caught a malignant fever, which was then prevalent. Mary shared with her mother in her watchings, in her solitude, and in the most painful duties. Isabella dreaded the infection; she took refuge with us. 'She could be of no use,' she said; 'her nerves were too weak to bear the fatigue of nursing; she should certainly take the fever if she remained at home.'—Mary begged my aunt to keep her sister with us, as her terror and lamentations added to the trouble of her mother. The poor children died, and Mrs. Harwood has never entirely recovered the shock which their death occasioned her, or from the effects of her subsequent illness—for she, too, caught the fever, and it was long ere her health was in any degree restored. Mary was spared, to nurse, and to console her mother in her bereavement. I scarcely know how to speak of Isabella," he continued; "she has some fine qualities, but she is strangely inconsiderate. She cannot bear application. She wastes the time which ought to be employed for their common benefit in frivolous and useless occupations, in dressing and visiting. All their friends are happy to see them. Not one would omit including them in every social party—and, as you see, we have many; but it is known to us, who are so intimately acquainted with them, that Isabella's eagerness to accept every invitation, frequently obliges her sister to decline them; as otherwise their occupations would be too much neglected. The opinion generally prevails that Mary is averse to society; but that is far from being the case. She enjoys society even more than her sister; for she goes with the expectation of being pleased, and is not, like Isabella, wholly occupied with the desire of being admired. Isabella is sometimes disappointed. Mary always returns home delighted with her friends, and grateful for every attention. Isabella is listless and languid when at home, averse to home enjoyments, pining for gaiety, tired of application, 'bored to death' by work of any kind—she 'is fatigued'—she 'has the head-ache'—she 'hates to give lessons'—she thinks 'fate has been cruelly unjust to her.' In the mean time, she sees her mother apply herself to needle-work, by which she contrives to eke out their slender income, and knows that her sister is unremitting and untiring in her exertions for their benefit. She does not scruple to purchase expensive articles of dress for herself, without inquiring whether she may not inconvenience her mother and sister by so doing. My aunt once said to her, 'My dear Isabella, I think the error of which you are sometimes guilty proceeds from thoughtlessness. I think you will excuse me if I tell you that by sharing your duties more equally with your sister, you would give her opportunities for relaxation and amusement which would benefit her health. If you sometimes decline an invitation and induce her to accept it, it would be a pleasant reflection, would it not?' 'Yes, madam,' she replied; 'but how should I know which party to decline? I might lose the very pleasantest by being so obliging; and,' she added, 'if Mary will stay, moping at home, I need not do the same, I suppose.' 'But your mother,' answered my plain-speaking aunt, 'your mother, my dear, often needs the presence and attentions of her children, and I should think you would wish to share with Mary the duty which every child owes to a parent, especially to a mother like yours.' 'Oh,' replied Isabella, 'Mary wishes to stay at home, or she need not; my mother does not request it.'"

"Can she be utterly devoid of affection for her mother and sister?—wholly destitute of feeling?" interposed Wyndham.

"I hope not," replied his friend; "but, hitherto, she has evinced very little. Time, however, may effect a change in her character. Mrs. Howard may perhaps be blamed," he resumed, "for not resorting to some decisive measure to induce Isabella to attend in a more becoming manner to the duties which fall to her lot; but her error is perhaps a natural one. She could not be certain that the listlessness and aversion to employment evinced by her eldest daughter, were not the result of ill health; her frequent complaints could not pass unheeded by maternal solicitude; and, fearful of overtasking her child, she yielded, often, when she should have been firm. Her error was that of an indulgent mother, made fearful by experiencing the loss of idolized children, and herself rendered peculiarly sensitive by pain and sorrow. On the contrary, the uniform cheerfulness, and unwearied assiduity of Mary, reassure her mother on her account. Mary never interferes with her sister's plans of amusement unless a positive engagement stands in the way, or when her own powers are inadequate to the performance of a double duty. And now, my dear Frank, I have been thus communicative, because I have some reason to think your happiness concerned in knowing what I have told you."

"I have to thank you, Henry," said Wyndham, "for having required of me the promise which you did some time since. Had it not been for that, I might have been involved in an unpleasant dilemma, for I certainly did admire Miss Harwood exceedingly. I still think her person and manners when she chooses, very charming. I am happy to say that I am heart-whole as far as she is concerned."

"But, Frank," asked Freeman, "what are the 'kind offices' you expect from me? Do you intend to leave us without acquainting Mary with the state of your feelings?"

"Do you think she can be unconscious of my respect—my admiration—my love? If you do, I am not quite without hope, for I know Mary would bestow her regard only in return for love. But," he resumed, "I was going to bespeak your good offices. Mary regards you as a brother: speak for me to her; tell her my fondest wish is to win her regard, and"——

"And why not tell her so yourself?" interrupted Freeman. "Of course I can tell her that a handsome young fellow, for whom half the girls in his native city are pulling caps, is in love with her meek eyes. I will tell her, moreover, that this same handsome fellow has an ample fortune—a fine taste—elevated mind and brilliant talents—and, that with all these advantages, and many others to boot, he is afraid to sue for her favor, and delegates to me the honor of making the confession that trembles on his lips."

"Nonsense, Harry, you know what I mean," said Wyndham. "Afraid, I am not; but"——

"But you are modest, as all true lovers are," answered Henry. "Well, Frank, depend on my 'good offices,' but depend more on your own merit. I think you have no reason to despair."

Some trifling obstacles delayed Wyndham's departure for a few weeks; in the course of that time an event had occurred in Mrs. Harwood's family which increased, if possible, his regard for Mary, and determined him to hasten the avowal of his love. A maiden aunt of Mrs. Harwood's, who was very wealthy, and who resided in one of the Middle States, had repeatedly written to Mrs. Harwood, requesting her to allow one of her daughters to reside permanently with her, promising to provide amply for her: and describing her house, equipage, manner of living, &c., in the most seductive manner: her choice had fallen upon Mary, because she imagined that Mrs. Harwood could better spare the younger daughter, and because when she saw the children once in their early childhood, the gentleness of Mary's disposition had much pleased her. Mary had always firmly, yet in grateful terms, declined this offer, on the plea that she "could not leave her mother"—and now the old lady wrote again, to renew the request in yet more urgent terms, and she requested that if Mary still adhered to her resolution, the elder daughter would come to her, and promising that she "should have no cause to regret her acceptance of the offer of a permanent home."

Isabella at once decided on accepting the invitation, which Mary positively declined.

"Our mother more than ever requires our presence and attention," she said. "Our assistance is absolutely necessary to her support; if you, Isabella, can leave her, I cannot. Here we may be independent," she continued, "if not affluent. I am far happier now than I could be if separated from my dearest friends, though surrounded by splendor."

But Isabella declared she would go. "She was heartily weary," she said, "of her present way of life. A situation was offered her where she could enjoy ease and affluence, and not be subjected to the unpleasant memories: neglected duties."

It was apparent that Isabella's expectations were of the most brilliant kind—she talked of nothing but the new scenes she was soon to witness, and dwelt on the promises of their relative without ceasing. She joyfully made preparations for her journey, and speedy departure. Mary's tearful eyes, and the anxious countenance of her mother were unheeded—she called on them to assist her preparations without noticing their saddened looks.

"Remember, my child," said Mrs. Harwood, "that your hopes may be too highly raised—our relative may possibly over-rate her powers of making her home delightful to you. You may possibly miss the kindness and solicitude of your mother and sister, and wish for our sympathy. Should such be the case, there is still a home here, which however humble, is our own; where, if you are obliged to pursue some employment, you may, if you choose, be happy. I cannot resolve to oppose my will against your wishes, as I am unwilling to deprive you of these advantages which your aunt's proposal appears to promise—advantages which you prize so highly, and anticipate so joyfully. I can only hope that your expectations may be fully realized."

Isabella had no fears—she trusted to her power of pleasing and gaining the favor of her relative—and she departed, radiant with hope. It is true her voice faltered as she bade her mother "farewell!" and a tear might have been seen by a close observer, when she returned the parting kiss of her sister. But she kissed her hand to them when seated in the carriage, with a gaiety that forced an exclamation of indignation from the lips of Wyndham, who happened to be present.

"What has become of my first impressions?" thought he, as he turned away and saw the blue eyes of Mary obscured by tears. "She weeps," he said, to himself, "she weeps, though released from an unfeeling task mistress—from a sister who could not appreciate her worth, or understand her self-sacrificing generosity. She weeps because natural affection is strong within her, and because she is so free from selfish feeling—that she regrets the separation, though she must know it will contribute to her own comfort."

If Wyndham gave way to a feeling of anger, that made him more severe than was natural to him, the feeling soon passed away, and was succeeded by the pleasure he found in consoling the grief which he could not blame.

Of all the motives which influenced Isabella's decision, Wyndham was not aware, though Freeman and his sister guessed the truth. Isabella was calculating, as selfish people generally are;—from the time she first saw Wyndham, she expected he would, as the novelists say, "throw himself and fortune at her feet." Her feelings towards him never approached to love, but he was handsome, accomplished, and, above all, rich. He was, therefore, a prize worth gaining. She saw he admired her, and she determined to make the conquest sure; but she was not artful enough to conceal the selfishness of her character, or was too indolent to make the necessary efforts—the predominant feeling would appear—and Wyndham's heart was extricated from the web which her beauty had woven around it.

Isabella saw the change in his feelings, for Wyndham was unused to dissemble. She had for some time seen his yearning partiality for Mary; and while she imputed the change to fickleness, she determined not to witness the triumph of her sister.—

Foreseeing, as she thought, her own situation, should he offer his hand to Mary and be accepted, she determined to accept at once the offer of her relative, and thus escape the necessity of depending on her own exertions for support. She judged, as selfish people always judge of others, and she did not do Wyndham justice; for it was his determination, should he gain the hand of Mary, to place her mother and sister above the necessity of making those exertions which Isabella dreaded.

We are not skilful in describing love scenes; and holding, as we do, the opinion that they are seldom well described, we will pass over the period when Wyndham did declare his love to Mary, assuring our readers that it was properly done, and received in a proper manner—to prove which assertion, we quote a line from one who knew how to tell such things, who says, "All in sweet disorder lost, she blushed consent," and "The news immediate to her mother brought;" for Wyndham assured Mary that he "would never separate her from her mother," and that it would be his pleasure and pride to make her life happy.

If Mary had not loved Wyndham for his own sake, she would now have loved him for the sake of her mother, and so she frankly told him, and her lover was satisfied with the confession; for he knew that an ungrateful daughter seldom proves an estimable wife.

Henry Freeman, with his aunt and sister, were delighted with the prospect of happiness that opened for their favorite, and sincerely rejoiced in the felicity of Wyndham. The latter went for a few months to the South, to place his affairs in a proper train for his removal to P——. The tedium of absence was relieved by frequent letters. In due time he returned—and after purchasing a handsome house, with every thing requisite for a liberal establishment, he received the hand of his beloved Mary, while her happy mother wept tears of joy that the dutiful affection, uncomplaining sweetness and unwearied industry of her dear child, would meet an adequate reward, in the love and protection of an estimable husband.

And Isabella? She heard of her sister's marriage with none of the feelings of sympathetic joy which Mary's steady affection and generous forbearance ought to have called forth. Her emotions were of a mixed nature, and she felt half regretful, half indignant; but she wrote a congratulatory letter, in which the splendor of her aunt's dwelling, equipage, and all the etceteras, were copiously dilated on—and she described a gay party to which she had been the preceding evening, and half hinted that "people were not blind in the part of the world where it was now her good fortune to reside." In short, Isabella had found the ease and splendor which she had always coveted, and she tried to believe she had found happiness also; but she was subject to the caprices of a being as selfish as herself;—no tie but that of selfish interest kept them together; the lady could bestow splendor and ease—and Isabella, in return, could furnish attractions to the gay and younger part of society, which began to be necessary to one, who, in losing youth, had not lost her devotion to its pleasures. Thus they lived on together, and Isabella reaped the reward she expected—a handsome legacy—which the old lady's promise alone prevented her withholding.

Did Isabella return to reside with her friends at P——, when the old lady died? No. She married, rather late in life, an elderly gentleman, who, being possessed of wealth, wanted a handsome wife, to do the honors of his splendid house, and to visit with him the places of amusement which he loved to frequent. He furnished her with splendid dresses, that his wealth might be duly appreciated—and they were as happy as selfish people can be.

Isabella paid one visit to her mother and sister, and to her native place—but she found every thing so common-place, and the people so dull, that she did not feel very happy when there; and Wyndham often caught himself wondering what had become of his "first impressions."

The Maiden and her Mother.

[FROM THE SPANISH.]

Because my mother yesternight
Found out the kiss you gave
By stealth, (perhaps it was not right),
She's done naught else but rave.
Therefore, I think, I'd best at once,
Return your kiss, to end it;
For if there's harm done, any dunce
Must know that will amend it.
But mind, I would on no account
Give for your kiss another,
Nor add the least to love's amount,
But only for my mother.
So I'll at once my kiss bestow:—
Now then—be quiet, do!
So close our lips met—I don't know
Which first kiss'd—I or you!
Therefore, to save mistake, I must
Let that for nothing go,
And with one more replace the first:
Don't reckon it as two.
But mind, I would on no account
Give for one kiss another,
Nor add the least to love's amount,
But only for my mother!

DYING WORDS OF DISTINGUISHED MEN.

The Pittsburg Commercial gives the following account of the dying words of some of the most distinguished men that perhaps ever lived:—"Head of the army"—Napoleon. "I must sleep now"—Byron. "It matters little how the head lyeth"—Sir Walter Raleigh. "Kiss me, Hardy"—Nelson. "Don't give up the ship"—Lawrence. "I'm d—d if I don't believe I'm dying"—Chancellor Thurlow. "Don't let that awkward squad fire over my grave"—Burns. Schiller asked, when he spoke last, that he might be raised up so that he could see the sun, which, glorious as the Poet's fame, was slowly declining beyond the hills of the Rhine.

LOVE MATTERS ARE BETTER LEFT ALONE.

BY KATE.

"Where away, Ned?"

"To the North!"

"Pleasure, eh?"

"Hum!—yes, I 'spose so: though, in truth, personal pleasure has but little to do with it. In fact, I would rather stay with Jones a month longer."

"How?"

"Oh, I'm only off on furlough. Do you know the old man came last eve to bid me prepare for—don't smile—a wedding tour. Me a married man! fudge! I 'd as leave cut life, altogether, as write myself, 'Benedict, the married.' "

"What a fool you are, Ned; you've not stopped to ask who, or what, your bride to be is, I suppose?"

"No, indeed! Why should I? Is n't it enough to be told with a grin—'Eh, Ned, you're a happy fellow—a fortune of your own and beauty for a bride?' "

"What do I care for beauty, if so be there is no other considerations with it? No, no—I'm off."

"Luck be with you, Ned; meanwhile I 'll set myself to work to occupy the field you so readily forsake."

"Welcome! most welcome!—And hark ye, if it 's game, I 'll be in at the death."

"But how shall I inform you? Where shall you locate?"

"Advertise, of course. I 'll keep watch of the papers. As for a locality, I shall have none."

With a farewell, the friends parted, one to his quiet vocation, the other to a sort of half-willful, half-pleasant jaunt.

We may as well tell you here as any where, (unless you have already found out), that Ned was one of those wayward beings, who would n't do as he was a mind to, if it happened to agree with any body else's wishes. Not he! If he was a man, of course he had mind enough to decide for himself in all things. No need of discretion or advice even.—"was n't he old enough to know," and could n't he manage his own affairs; especially in those nicer matters of the heart, where "all for love" was the only consideration? Occupied with sundry such manly reflections, our hero sped on his way. He was too indignant to think of or care for any thing else. However, passion, like water, will evaporate, and so Ned found it. If he was angry he was too vascillating to retain it, and beside change of circumstance and scene will affect almost any body's feelings. In these days of "annihilation of distances," the transposition from Philadelphia to New York is but an item. Then up the North river, by moonlight, is most charmingly sentimental, and wasn't Ned sentimental when he left Philadelphia, and had not he always sentimental? Fastidiousness he abhorred, but sentiment was quite another affaiar. Nor is Ned the only reasoner on this wise. I'll be bound hundreds have thought so before, and hundreds will think so, if they have occasion. Ned's migrations were often in the pleasantest manner possible. There was no need for haste, and but little lack of pleasure; so what could he do better than enjoy whatever presented itself? Among other tendencies to remove ill humor, Ned found one quite prominent in the person of a young lady, who chanced to be the owner of a demure physiognomy, relieved somewhat by a pair of bright eyes. She was clad in the plain attire of a Quaker, and carefully attended by a gentlemanly Friend. Ned, who was somewhat famous for jumping at conclusions, immediately decided positions to be father and daughter. Nor was he very much mistaken—for the lady was most certainly a daughter, and the Friend was a father, but not her's. Of this, however, we shall soon be informed. Their baggage was marked "Nicholson"—a respectable name certainly—bound for the Lakes.

"Hum!" thought Ned, "I may as well visit the Lakes, too. However, I'll reconnoitre."

In the course of events—and who wouldn't have expected it?—Ned contrived an exchange of cards. A smile of intelligence crossed the elderly gentleman's face, but Ned saw it not. To him it was only a smile of satisfaction that one bearing so honorable a name as "Edward Warrington" should make their acquaintance, and join himself to their society.

"Who knows," thought he, "but Helen," (as she was called), "is all that's loveable? She certainly is agreeable, well informed, and pretty. If she isn't rich—no matter. Am I not so—and, beside, what else do I wish but an agreeable companion: one I can love, and who will love me, and me only. Selfish fellow, just as though one man was better worth loving 'all alone, entirely,' than another."

But such reflections would come, and who could help it? As story-tellers generally make circumstances suit their tale, let us fancy the smooth running of Ned's dreams, without the trouble of description. For what can be more dull than endearments by proxy? And what man or woman is there that wouldn't rather make love on their own account and to their own liking? We may as well remark in passing, that our friends soon exchanged the smooth water course for a stage-coach, and every one who has tried it, knows that stage-coaches up North are somewhat different from city coaches. Rough roads may have something to do with it, 'tis true, but each time the traveller happens to rebound, in the jolting process, he is half inclined to regard it as a particular providence—(not the jolting, mind you,)—that he is safe.

Arrived at Glen's Falls, our trio spent an hour about the rocks, made somewhat famous by an American novelist of some repute. Of course, our hero failed not in gallantry. Why should he? Wasn't he in attendance on one but little, if any, less than divine? And beside truth must out;—he was completely enamored of black eyes.

The nine miles from the Falls to the Lake are soon passed. The Nicholsons were fatigued—Ned not a bit. He wished the distance three times as great. Still he would enjoy Helen's society for some days, and who knows what time can and will accomplish? A restless night frequently follows a delightfully spent day; at least so Ned, and—shame to say it—Helen, too, found it. Morning, however, dawns at the usual hour, and those who have seen the sun rise, say it comes up gloriously over the clear surface of the horizon. (I have seen its golden settings,—its risings, ah me! I slept the west side of the house—so that's Sherrill's fault, not mine.)

As chance would have it, Ned and Helen met on the piazza which overlooks the water, to the great disappointment of—neither. Plans of pleasure for the day were discussed, and Ned almost gained courage to plan for the future. What he would have done, is at present a mystery, as our Friend made his appearance at the fortunate moment. Fishing, sailing, tea-partying, &c., are the order of the day with those who resort to the Lake shore, and most charming they are too. Promenades are out of the question—unless jumping stone walls is a part of the process—but quiet nooks, close corners, shady trees, and green grass, are abundant. Friend N—— was more fond of sitting on the porch, watching the graceful movements of the small boats, or gazing on the glorious clouds or mountain shadows, than rambling by the shore—and, shall I say it? our friends Ned and Helen were fond of his so doing. At least, the following letter from Ned to his friend, whom he left at P——, will give one some such impression:—

"Caldwell, June —, ——.

"Dear Jim—Will you favor me by calling on the 'old man,' and inform him of my entire inability to fulfil his wishes in the matrimonial line, as I am on the point of consulting my own? I left him in a pet, without the least explanation of my intentions; as in fact I knew not what they were myself. Now, however, I am better acquainted, and can only add, I shall be home next month, with one bearing my name, and whom I hope he will see fit to receive as the wife of his ward. Meet me, Jim, at 'Jones',' the fifteenth, and, deus volens, I'll show you the sweetest lip and brightest eye—I ever tasted or saw. I suppose the old man will be angry—but who cares? If I am suited, no one need find fault with the choice of

"Truly yours, E. W."

To say Jim was surprised, would not be true; he only wondered who it could be that had so fascinated his bachelor friend. He fulfilled his mission, however, and, as Ned anticipated, witnessed no gentle ebullitions of anger.

At the time appointed, Ned and his bride made their appearance, accompanied by Mr. N——. As a dutiful ward, Ned presented himself at the counting house of his guardian, passed through the cool civilities of reception, greeting, &c., but could not in the least molify the anger of his father's friend. Ned was too happy, however, to care much, yet would be gratified, he said, to introduce him. Returning to Jones', he told friend Nicholson of his ill success. He immediately asked him for his guardian's address, went out, and soon returned with the but late enraged guardian. The friendly terms of the two were soon explained by the latter's exclaiming—

"Ned, you dog, why didn't you tell me you had married Helen Nicholson—the very one of all others I at first proposed?"

Ned's turn now came for mortification. He had rejected his sweet bride when proposed by the guardian, but married her to please himself. The secret was soon out. Helen and Ned had never been told by their guardians of the wishes of their parents in regard to each other. By a mutual understanding, both had been informed of the day of our hero's departure—of an anticipated disposal of themselves—both had left P—— in a pet. Ned was recognized by friend N——, but as the recognition was all on one side, he concluded to let matters take their own course; and results proved that love affairs are better left alone—except sometimes.

SONG OF THE FORSAKEN.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS

Yes, meet me in my dying hour,
When life is growing cold,
And the story of thy cruel power
Upon the heart is told.
Come, while its strings are yet awake
And trembling still for thee,
And as they quiver, ere they break,
Thy soul shall feel for me.

Go with them when they bear me out
And lay me down to rest,
Then leave me in my loneliness—
The damp sods on my breast:
Go back to her for whom ye gave
The life that once was mine;
I shall not feel, in that dark grave,
This perfidy of thine.

[From the Rochester American.]

SONNET.

[JOHN AUGUSTUS SHEA.]

BY W. H. C. HOSMER.

Another voice is hushed—another lyre
Hangs on a dead and leafless bough unstrung;
Of wrongs that curse humanity he sung,
But changed to ashes is his heart of fire.
Far from the luckless isle that gave him birth
Wrapp'd in the raiment of the grave he lies:
Though Freedom there no more finds home and hearth
Dying he thought of her green fields, and skies—
Before his fading sight, in dim array,
Shades of the martyr'd and the mighty passed,
And light unearthly round the minstrel cast
A harbinger of everlasting day:
They came to guide his spirit to a land
That knows not broken heart, nor fetter'd hand.

ART AND LOVE;

Or, Catharine Lee and the Bachelor.

BY MRS. E. CARTER.

"Les malheurs perfectionnent les tetes bien organisees, de meme que les orages purifient l'atmosphere." ["Griefs improve the well-organised mind, as storms purify the atmosphere."]

"Mother! dear mother! do lay aside your work and take some rest: you will fatigue yourself to death."

The mother lifted her heavy eye-lids, and her eyes filled with tears as she beheld the delicate form of her daughter bending with unwearying assiduity over her embroidery at which she had been employed for many hours.

"You require rest even more than I do, my child," replied the lady. "Your face has become so thin and your cheek so pale, I do not wonder your ac' quaintances scarcely recognise you."

"Oh no, I feel very well," said the young girl, drawing up her slight but elastic form: "but lay aside your work, if you love me, mother; I will finish little Ellen's frock as soon as I have shaded this rose-bud."

"You lead a toilsome life, my child! How much does Mrs. Garnet promise to give you for your mantilla?"

"Thirty dollars. To be sure the materials cost twenty, but even that will be a very great help."

"It has cost you a month's hard labor."

"Yes: but we shall find ten dollars a most seasonable assistance just now. If we could only make up ten more to pay the Doctor, I should feel tolerably well satisfied. Do you remember, mamma," she said, after a thoughtful pause, "many, many months ago, before"—and here a slight shudder shook her frame,—"before our misfortune; do you remember how much Mr. Ashton used to praise my paintings?"

"Remember, love! do I ever forget what related to you? I recollect he said that the "fountain," and the "view of the bay" were much better executed than many pieces sent to the exhibition.

"And you know he sold a piece resembling the fountain for sixty dollars, and the gentleman who bought it professed to admire mine equally as much. I know," she continued, blushing, "that there is a vast difference between admiring the works of an amateur, and one who paints for a livelihood; but if I could get twenty, or fifteen, or even ten dollars for my pictures, I might perhaps be enabled to take lessons in miniature painting."

"The life of an artist would be very trying to one so delicate and enthusiastic as you are, my dear," sighed Mrs. Lee, "and yet not more so than the one you lead at present."

"Oh! I should love it above all things, mamma! Madam Gaudet tells me that she makes two thousand a year by it, and with a fourth of that, how comfortable we might be in the sweet little white cottage over the way! It almost seems like a glimpse of Paradise to think of. How charming it would look with a plenty of vines and white curtains, and books and pictures, and——"

Here she cast her eyes around the small, scantily furnished and dimly lighted chamber, which formed their only apartment, sighed, for she felt the uncertain nature of her airy fabrics, and was silent.

A long pause ensued, for thickly-coming thoughts thronged the minds of both. Mrs. Lee was thinking of the entire change which two short years had produced in her circumstances and feelings. Two years before she had been the indulged wife of a devoted husband—the fashionable and indolent mistress of a stylish establishment; and the careless and indifferent mother of the lovely girl on whose exertions she was mainly dependent for her daily bread. She thought of the sudden change from affluence to poverty which had taken place on the death of her husband, and then of the many conspiring causes which gradually reduced them to utter penury. Her mind then reverted with a pang to the conduct of her acquaintances, whose cold commiseration had gradually changed into perfect silence, and apparent forgetfulness of her very existence. But the mother's heart throbbed with thankfulness, when she thought of the noble, self-sacrificing spirit which her hitherto neglected daughter had shown in the hour of trial; when she remembered the patient untiring assiduity with which the gentle Catharine had ministered to her wants, and the fortitude which had supported her amidst all her own personal trials and inconveniences; these things filled her heart with thankfulness. But as she glanced towards her daughter, and thought how soon these bright eyes would dim, and that delicately moulded frame emaciate under the continued pressure of anxiety and toil, her own eyes became so dimmed with tears that she was obliged to put away her yet unfinished work.

"Come, dearest, we must both to go rest now."

"Oh, yes, do, dear mother: I am just putting the finishing touches to my mantilla. I will follow you directly."

The mother rose and approached a small bed in one corner of the room.

"What an exquisite subject for your pencil, Catharine!" said she.

The daughter was immediately by her side, and there they stood, those two weary and toil-worn women, gazing on a being whose loveliness seemed as a gleam of sun-light in that desolate and wretched apartment. Wrapped in the deep unconscious sleep of happy childhood—her rosy cheeks half shaded by the clustering curls of "paly gold," and her balmy breath coming quickly and regularly from between the rich and half-open lips—lay a beautiful child, apparently about five years old; her face and form bore no traces of the penury which reigned around. It was evident that no blight of poverty or sorrow had fallen upon her. Weary and toil-worn as they might be, struggling for the bare necessaries of life, Ellen's comforts and privileges had been held inviolable, and many a personal comfort had Catharine deprived herself of in order to procure enjoyments for her infant sister.

Faint and exhausted, Mrs. Lee soon after fell asleep: but Catharine, engrossed with her ambitious schemes, remained wide awake, until she had finished both her own and her mother's work. Kneeling at the foot of her sister's bed, she poured forth her feelings in the heart-felt language of earnest supplication; then stooping for a few moments she bent over her sister to press her lips and inhale her sweet breath, then stealing noiselessly to bed by her mother's side, she was soon wrapped in a slumber as sweet, deep, and unconscious as that of the child who slept near her. And doubtless "Guardian Angels"—"ministering spirits"—watched over, and hallowed that repose: for comfortless as was the apartment, it yet contained a jewel whose "price was far above rubies."

The morning of the following day rose clear and bright. The streets of C—— were alive with men, women, and children hurrying to and fro, some intent on business, others on pleasure, others appearing to have no motive but to enjoy the pleasant sensation produced by the sweet sunshiny day. Hurrying along one of the back streets, evidently anxious to avoid observation, might be seen our pretty Catharine Lee, with something which resembled a picture frame, about 20 by 25 inches in size, carefully pinned up in a white napkin. She rung the bell of a large handsome house, to which the surrounding shrubbery and shade trees gave quite a rural air, and was shown up stairs into a handsomely furnished parlor. A lady, dressed with great elegance, leading an intelligent looking little boy by the hand, seemed on the point of going out, but acceded with great affability to Catharine's request that she would spare her a few minutes.

"Place the picture a little more to the right—no, not quite so far. Ah! that is a very good light.—Mr. Ashton is very fond of that northern light; he frequently brings his pictures here for my inspection." Well, well, it is very pretty! How beautifully the sunset gilds that broken bit of bridge!—and the spray looks so cool and refreshing! But why did you bring it here?"

"I heard, madam, that you were a patron of the arts."

"Yes," said the lady, complacently.

"And as my mother is exceedingly poor, I was anxious to make something by disposing of my picture.

"Humph! you come to try to sell it, then!"

"Yes, ma'am."

The picture seemed suddenly to have fallen ninety per cent. in Mrs. Etland's estimation.

"What do you think of this, Louisa?" said she to an ordinary-looking lady who entered just then—"This young woman has brought it here to sell."

"A miserable daub," replied Miss Louisa Etland. "See how unnaturally blue the water is and the sky! Did you ever see anything like that in nature?" scarcely glancing at the picture. "You will be too late for your walk if you spend your morning here in this manner."

"It certainly is not well painted," resumed the other lady.

"Mamma," said little Peyton, who had been very much captivated by Catharine's winning manners, "that is the very picture Uncle Frank admired so much at Mr. Ashton's room last summer."

"Frank is an admirable judge of painting," replied Mrs. Etland, "and as he will be here this evening, I may as well keep it to show him. If he thinks it passable, I may perhaps give you a trifle for it, child. Call at the same hour to-morrow. Of course you cannot expect much for so very indifferent a production."

Catharine blushed, courtesied, and withdrew.—She had no heart to pursue her experiment further.

* * * * *

"What lovely young creature was that who paid you a visit this morning?" asked Mr. Frank Etland of his sister, soon after his arrival in the evening, which took place much earlier than was expected.

"I do not know who you mean; there were the two Misses Selby, neither of whom you admire, and old Miss Danby."

"A perfect witch of Endor!"

"And then there was the pretty bride, Mrs. Newman."

"Oh, no! none of those. This was a most lovely, interesting young creature, and she blushed so prettily as she drew her thick green veil over her face—how I anathematized that veil!"

Mrs. Etland began to experience a sort of undefined feeling of fear, for Brother Frank was very rich, and his taste so very fastidious, that his brothers and sisters already considered him as the bachelor uncle who would leave his fortune to his nephews and nieces.

"It was only a young woman," she replied, "who had brought a picture to sell." And she felt vexed with herself for having allowed the painting to remain; but how could she have foreseen that her wealthy brother-in-law would bestow a glance upon the humble picture-dealer.

"It is a beautiful picture, Uncle Frank," said Peyton; "don't you want to see it?"

And leading the way, the child soon had the satisfaction of seeing his friend in raptures with the painting he had admired so much.

"Wouldn't you like to feel that spray upon your face, uncle? It is a much finer fall than the one in our garden."

The mother had followed with as good a grace as she could.

"How beautiful!" rhapsodised uncle Frank "A rich warm tint pervades the whole picture!—the sky, the water, and foliage, are lighted up with that sunshiny hue which may well be termed the 'poetry of painting;'—and what an admirable effect is produced by that mass of gilded clouds to the left. This is the work of no ordinary genius, unpractised, perhaps, but giving high promise."

"The young lady said she painted it herself, uncle."

"Indeed! Then she is as talented as she is beautiful."

"And good, too, she is, for"—

"Peyton, bring me my work-box directly."

"Yes, mamma."

And the request was literally complied with, for he returned in an incredibly short time.

"And, as I was saying," he persisted, "she is as good as she is pretty, as generous at least; for I saw her give something out of her purse to the poor little lame boy in the alley, who was crying because he had broken his crutch; and she didn't seem to have much there for herself."

"Give this to the lame boy, Peyton," said uncle Frank, to whom the "little lame boy in the alley" suddenly seemed to become an object of unaccountable interest.

"This is more than he ever had in his life, I am sure," said Peyton.

"And sister, you may order me as many of these pictures as you please. At all events, I must claim this one at the young lady's own price."

This, however, had again found favour in Mrs. Etland's sight, and she positively refused to give it up.

Catharine, to her great surprise, received on the following day what appeared to her a most liberal price for her picture, and an order for four more at fifty dollars apiece. These were executed in her very best style in a few weeks: and a few months after, her mother, sister, and herself, occupied the charming little cottage whose possession had been the height of her ambition. They found it a delightful residence, so different from the one they had left. Catharine's taste and neatness soon made it the admiration of many a passing stranger. Mr. Francis Etland thought it the most charming place imaginable, and soon became a constant visitor there. At first Catharine rather objected to this.

"Between us," said she, "fortune has fixed a great gulf."

This sentiment, however, she could never impress upon the mind of her visitor; she daily found it more difficult to entertain it herself.

He had at last found the jewel which he had so long sought in vain; and he wished to give it so rich a setting as to make its value universally appreciated. And in the course of time he succeeded. As with mingled pride and fondness he drew the arm of his beautiful wife within his own, he felt that her mother indeed spoke most truly when she assured him that he had won "a pearl of great price."

Mrs. and Miss Etland were soon among Catharine's warmest admirers. Miss Louisa's passion for her dear sister's paintings became so great, that it proved quite inconvenient to that lady—and nothing but the timely present of a handsome pair of mirrors saved her from Miss Etland's importunate requests that she would adorn both Miss E.'s rooms with pictures.

Health soon returned to Mrs. Lee's cheek, and brightness to her eye, when she felt herself so comfortably situated, the object of her daughter's constant tenderness and affection.

Peyton and Ellen were the sweetest little playmates imaginable. And Catharine, in producing and diffusing happiness around her, finds her dearest hopes of happiness in life realized. "She stretcheth forth her hands to the needy."

LOVE, HOPE, AND MEMORY.

AN ALLEGORY.

BY J. STUART CARLTON.

One summer's eve, as I reclined
  Within a fairy bower;
Striving in vain to while away
  A weary tedious hour;
There came three merry, laughing friends,
  A happy company;
Three cheerful, loving friends they were,
  Love, Hope and Memory.

A year passed by—I sought the bower
  Where I before had lain;
I hoped that those same happy friends
  Might visit me again;
Love and Memory appeared,
  But they seemed sick and sad,
And when I asked for cheerful Hope,
  They told me he had fled.

Another year had passed away,
  Again, I sought that spot;
Memory was there—I waited long;
  But Love and Hope came not.
I asked of Memory where they were?
  He sadly shook his head.
He said—bright Hope had ne'er returned,
  And that young Love was dead.

A dozen Summers passed away.
  Still Memory was there.
And though I never saw him smile,
  He still seemed fresh and fair;
I asked him why he was unchanged—
  A tear stood in his eye;
He said—though Memory might be sad,
  Yet it could never die.

The warmest Love may die away,
  And brightest Hope take wings;
Memory, still the truest friend,
  To dark misfortune clings.
And though perhaps it may recall,
  Scenes that were best forgot;
Yet on the barren, withered heart,
  Shows many a bright green spot.

CHANGING PLACES.

A MYSTERIOUS TALE,

WITH A PLAIN MORAL.

BY HENRY PETERSON.

PART I.

"It's bitter cold," muttered Si Rackets to himself, not so much from there being any particular necessity of calling his attention to that fact, as from a kind of involuntary admiration of the way the wind whistled round the corners and swept past his head, as if it intended to shave his ears off. "It's bitter, bitter cold for a man whose supper will be none of the warmest," reiterated he, as a fresh blast swept by, nearly blinding him with its powdery load of new-fallen snow.

It was growing dusk, though not yet so dark but that objects were easily distinguishable, and as Si uttered these words, a sleigh dashed up to the door of a house near, filled with a gay party, and a young man sprang out, and bidding adieu to the company, gaily, hurried into the house.

"Aye, aye, young Robinson;" said Si: "now, there's that fellow, rollicking and frolicing all the day, and then comes home to his big house, and servants, and rich food: while I, poor dog, must toil hard from morning till night, and then think myself well off if I can get a bone to pick!"

The thought was too much for Si—he stopped and looked up through the window to where the red light from a coal fire played upon the ceiling of the room.

"I've half a notion," muttered Si, "to pitch a stone through the window! It would make the rascal a little uncomfortable, any how. Yes, I'd like to pitch a stone through every pane of glass in his house," continued he, growing excited with the idea. "I'd like him to feel for one night what some other people as good as him have to bear all the time—And then if I could only pour a jug of cold water in his bed before he got right sound asleep, I'd like it! Ha! ha! that would be fun!"

But inasmuch as the stones were all covered over, and besides being firmly chained down to the gound by the frost, and as the snow was too dry to make snow-balls, Si had to content himself as poor people generally have to do, with the pleasures of the imagination.

During this time, young Harry Robinson, owing, perhaps, to some mesmeric influence, was engaged in a train of reflections, somewhat similar to those that had been racking the brains of Si Rackets.

Upon entering his parlor, he had thrown himself upon the sofa, with the mental exclamation—

"Oh! but it's nice to have a warm, cosy, elegant room like this on such a bitter cold night;" and as his servant brought to him on a tray a dish of smoking stewed oysters, he exclaimed again, mentally, "oh, but it's nice to have a dish of hot oysters on such a bitter cold night!"

It didn't, however, take Harry very long to finish the oysters, and then, finding his appetite somewhat appeased, he began to moralize, for he had received a collegiate education, and had been a member of a debating society, and was so accomplished at the thrust and parry of argument, that he could argue both sides of any question himself, and do it so well that any candid man, and Harry had many such, or they lied, among his friends—would allow that both had gained the victory."

"It's a nice thing to have a hot fire, and hot oysters, and a spring-seat sofa, on a cold night like this: and I'm a good deal better-off than three-fourths of mankind, and should be thankful for it," reiterated Harry's first thought.

"Well, I don't know about that, either," commented second thought. "It's not much difference how a man lives—habit's every thing. See the Hindoo devotees how they'll get used to living on a post or hanging on a hook, and enjoy it, for all we know, as much as a house after they get used to it."

"Do you remember the horse that was to get used to living without eating, but when they got him down to a straw a-day, he died?" laughed first thought.

"None of your vulgar allusions," replied second thought, scorufully. "Give us something classical, or hold your tongue. Don't poor people look as happy as rich people?—don't their children seem as fat and hearty, rolling about the mud?—wouldn't miners rather work underground by the light of a lamp, than above ground by the light of the sun?—to be sure they would. A man that never gets oysters, what does he care about oysters?—a man that never had a good meal's victuals in his life, what does he care about victuals?—it's all habit—habit—nothing else but habit—just as the twig is bent the tree's inclined—it will grow one way as well and fast as another."

First thought was completely dumb-founded by such a concatenation of evidence, and Harry, finding second thought had so completely silenced if not convinced it, gave in his decision—

"Yes," said he, aloud, "It's all habit—I'd as leave be a poor mechanic, as a rich man—in fact, I'd rather be one. I'm nearly worried to death with that lawyer agent of mine, and his bonds and mortgages which, he says, must be attended to—yes, I'd rather any day be a poor journeyman mechanic, with nothing to do but take your wages and buy what you want: take your wages that other men must provide, and buy what you want—and so on, without any trouble, the whole year round. Yes, let me be a poor mechanic, with hard work for the day and sound sleep for the night, and take these houses, and lands, and mortgages, and bonds, to the devil——"

"Ah! what's that?" said a soft clear voice behind him.

Harry turned suddenly and saw a person advancing towards him, who seemed to have just entered the door, although he had neither heard the servant announce him, nor the door open nor shut.

"You spoke to me, I believe?" said Harry, haughtily, motioning his visitor to a seat.

"Excuse me—I never sit replied the visitor. "I had a little business with you, but I thought I heard you say, as I entered, that you would be willing to exchange your condition, with that of a common mechanic, and it was such a singular idea for one like you to confess that, you must excuse me, but, ha! ha! ha!—it was a very little laughable."

Harry was rather nettled at the freedom of these remarks, but as his visitor was an old man, dressed in a style of a gentleman of the old school, it would not do to express any resentment—he therefore contented himself with replying with some warmth, "that, laughable or not, he generally meant what he said, and that he would be willing, if it were possible, at that moment, to exchange conditions with any laborer in the land—that is, one as sound in mind and body as he was himself."

"Excuse me for doubting your word," replied the old man, in the same clear and soft tone, while the smile that perpetually played upon his inscrutable face deepened a little; "but would you, in earnest, be willing to take the place of a hoe and harrow, or jack-plane man, if it were possible—indeed I cannot believe you—you are only joking with me."

"I tell you again I would do it this instant," exclaimed Harry, vexed at the manner of his visitor.

"But," continued the old man, gliding to the window and pointing to our frend Si, who had taken a seat on the fire plug opposite, and sat gazing up at the house, seemingly unconscious of the cold, to the wonder of all those who passed by—"would you, I always like to be definite, be willing to change places even with that poor fellow who sits out there shivering with cold—I don't doubt that he'd be willing to take your place—ha! ha! ha!"

There was something peculiarly disagreeable to Harry in the cold, ironical laugh of his visitor—it irritated him without his knowing exactly why.

"Yes, I would, were it possible, this very minute," cried he, impatiently; "this very minute. Let him come in here and me go out, I'll get used to it as soon as he will, God knows."

A loud laugh shook the walls of the room—the old man grasped him by the arm—Harry felt a pang as if his whole body was turned inside out—and then he heard the cold winds whistle around his ears and felt his feet dangle against the fire-plug.

PART II.

We left Si Rackets on the pavement before Harry Robinson's house, indulging himself with the imaginary application of various disagreeabilities to the person of that rich gentleman, for the perversity displayed by him in preferring to toast his extremities before a good fire, instead of keeping them warm by thumping them against a snowy pavement. Si had heard when he was a boy and attended charity school in the evenings, that the effects of heat and cold upon the system were very much the same; but in spite of the philosophy of the thing, he still adhered to the old superannuated notion that the first was vastly preferable to the latter.

But Si still lingered before the house as if chained there by some mysterious attraction. He sat down on the fire plug and his mind seemed to sit down with his body. He wondered to himself what had come over him, and tried to rouse himself by humming a verse, the production of one of his fellow workmen, who thought himself a genius:

"With plenty to eat
And plenty to wear;
We'll beard ev'n the devil
And pluck have to spare."

"So we would !" ejaculated Si, fiercely, rousing himself, to a man, that was passing.

"You carry rather too much sail, my friend,—but take care or the watchey will bring you to anchor all of a sudden," said the stranger, calmly, as he shrugged his shoulder and passed on.

"Blast the watchey," exclaimed Si, indignantly. "We'll beard ev'n the devil and have pluck to spare!"

"What's that you observed ?" said a smiling old man at his side.

"Hallo—where did you come from?" shouted Si.

"You spoke, my dear fellow," said the stranger, in a whisper, "and I thought you wanted something."

"So I do want something," replied Si, more soberly, for a cold chill, notwithstanding he was even then nearly frozen, shot through him as the old man breathed into his face. "I want a good many things, I want a big house like this one of young Robinson's, and plenty of servants, and a hot fire—why blast it I want to live: that's what I want."

"Well, my young friend, but suppose you had Robinson's house—suppose you could jump this very moment right into his skin, you'd be no better off than you are now—indeed you wouldn't." And the old man laughed excessively in his smiling way without making any perceptible sound.

"I wouldn't be better off, wouldn't I old feller," said Si, giving a long whistle. "I'd like to try it for a little while anyhow. I'd just like to try it for a year or two. I'd like to jump into his skin and see if it didn't feel nice and warm."

"Well, I think perhaps it might be brought about, Si," said the stranger, patting him gently on the back with pats that seemed each one as if he was thrusting an icicle through his body; "I think I could if I tried to plump you right down into his skin."

"What do you mean?" exclaimed Si. "Who are you?" cried he, breathlessly, as a sudden thought passed through his mind, glancing around to get a view of the old man's back.

"No, no, Si; none of that—play fair," said the old man, backing off. "It's no matter who I am—I'm your friend, that's enough, and you shouldn't quarrel with your bread and butter."

"Well, blame me if I care who you are—but can't you stand a little further off; you make one so confounded cold.

"Now, Si," said the old gentleman, smiling blandly, "you see what it is to have a reputation. The world will have it, notwithstanding all my bosom friends bear continual witness to the contrary, that I am the warmest mortal on earth—that is, in existence—but men were always fools from the beginning. But coming back to your business: I'll try to accommodate you."

"Stay," said Si, in a faint whisper, "are you then in truth the—the devil?"

"Pshaw, pshaw!" exclaimed the old man, interrupting him. "There is no such thing—it's all an invention of the priests to frighten children with;—why Voltaire found that out a long while ago. Do I look like the devil—where's my tail?"

"Why, that's what I wanted to see!" said Si, humbly, again attempting to glance behind the old gentleman's back.

"Pshaw, what nonsense," said he, again backing off; "where's my hoofs, too?" poking out one of his legs—"Is that a hoof?"

"It's a very big foot though!" faltered Si.

"Well, hasn't a man a right to have a big foot, especially if he be old and have corns?" said the old gentleman pettishly. "Besides, if I could put my hoof in boots, why not also put my tail in my coat pocket?"

"I've heerd say that the devil daresn't hide both," suggested Si, very modestly.

"Daresn't?—who's to hinder him?" exclaimed the stranger, apparently unable to restrain his indignation; "who can give laws to the devil—say—tell me that, will you?"

Si hoped he hadn't offended. He was the last man in the world to speak disrespectfully of any one—and he thought the ministers were much to blame in what they said.

"Of course they are," said the old gentleman.—"They are too personal—that's the fault I find with them—and then throwing off all their own sins and every body else's on to the devil, as if he hadn't enough to do to take care of his own. But that's neither here nor there: you want to chage places with young Robinson for a while: now I have some reasons for believing that he don't value his situation one rush, and I shall be very happy to oblige you, even were it for nothing else than to disappoint my enemies, who villify me by saying that I have never yet done a good deed in my life."

Si was horrified at first at the idea of possibly being so near the evil one: but the old fellow was so smiling and polite, and seemed so anxious to oblige him, that he could not believe, notwithstanding his apparent unwillingness to allow his back to be seen, that he was really his Satanic majesty himself. Besides the liquor that he had drank on his way home in order to keep off the blues, kept up his spirits, and the wind was so keen, and the cold was so very bitter, and the inside of the house looked so warm and glowing through the window, that he could not regard as his enemy one who professed his willingness to do so much for him.

"Well, as I said afore," exclaimed he; "I say now: I'd just like nothing better than to change places with that 'ere lucky dog Harry Robinson for a while."

"Give me your hand on that," cried the old man, gaily."

Si thoughtlessly stretched out his hand, but the icy grasp nearly froze up his senses, and he liked to have fallen from his seat. As it was, he sunk into an apathy, through which he could just perceive the old man backing from him up the steps, and through the door, as if there was no door there, into the house.

It seemed but an instant ere the old gentleman was again at his side.

"Are you ready?" asked he, taking him by the collar.

"Aye!" feebly murmured Si, "all aboard."

"Then here she goes." And with these words, the old man seemed to tighten his grasp, and lifting him from the ground as if he were a child, slung him three times around his head, and then, with all his might, through the window into the dwelling he had so much coveted. At least, this was Si's belief forever after; for the pain he experienced was just that of being thrown through a pane of glass; and when he came to himself, he was standing upright in the middle of the parlour.

"Well, this is about a little bit the richest old gentleman," said Si, "I ever seen."

No one answered his remark. He was alone in the room. He walked to the window. To his astonishment, on the fire-plug, just in the place he had a moment before quitted, sat an image of himself—

"Confound it!" exclaimed he, rubbing his eyes. But his face seemed to feel smoother than usual; he passed his hand down to his chin, but missed his five days' old beard. "Why the old fellow was the devil, sure enough," thought he. Glancing down in his perplexity, his eye fell upon the polished boot which reflected back the blazing fire; from thence it stole up over black cassimere pants, to a black satin vest, and gold chain and seals. "It was the devil, then," reiterated he. A low chuckle answered him from the corner of the room. "Who's there?" cried he.

"Did you call, sir?" said a perfumed waiter, bringing in a light.

"Who am I?" asked he, sternly, letting the rays fall full upon him.

"Why, Massa Harry, what d'ye mean by asking of such a question?"

"No matter, Congo, clear yourself—make yourself vacant."

The black retired grinning, saying "dat Massa Harry was funny to-night."

No sooner had the waiter closed the door, than Si seized the light, and going before a long pier-glass, surveyed himself from head to foot. Sure enough, there he was, in the skin and clothes of the object of his envy. It seemed wonderful at first, but after a little while he began to feel the dignity of his station, and wondered that it had ever been otherwise. He began to consider himself the rightful heir, and the former occupant an usurper who had been depriving him all along of his rights.

"I wonder," said he, as he rose from the spring-seat sofa on which he had stretched himself, "I wonder if that loafer still hangs about the pavement." Whereupon Si walked hastily to the window, and saw that the fire-plug was still tenanted. Raising the window indignantly, he shouted, "Here, you lazy dog, what do you mean by loafing there all the evening? If you don't vacate shortly, I'll put the servants on to you."

His words seemed to rouse the person addressed from a brown study, for he jumped up suddenly, and muttering loud enough for Si to hear "Mean-spirited villain!" shook his fist at him, and walked slowly up the street.

"I can't begin too soon," said Si, aloud, "to keep up the dignity of my position. What's the use of being rich, if one's to be run down with vagabonds and beggars in this fashion. I must make an example of some of the first, or else I'll have my house a perfect hospital."

Si paused, for he heard the same low chuckle which he had noticed before, in the furthest corner of the room. It had not annoyed him then, but it did annoy him now, and he said fiercely—

"And I can tell all eaves-droppers, whoever they may be, that it also is a thing I won't submit to, and the sooner they clear out the better it'll be for their wholesome."

There had been one chuckle before. Now there seemed to be one in each of the four corners of the room.

"I won't submit to it," cried Si, not quite so indignantly as before, edging his way towards the centre of the parlour.

Again there was one low chuckle, but only one, in the farthest corner.

Si gathered courage again; he was mad, hopping mad, but the remembrance of those unearthly sounds all around him, constrained him to keep it to himself.

"I can't, then, be master, even here," said he, after a pause.

Again that odious chuckle in the far corner, admonished him of the danger of giving utterance to his thoughts.

PART III.

It was not with the pleasantest feelings in the world in his breast, that Harry Robinson left the fire-plug on which he had been dozing ever since his transformation, and walked up the silent street.

"The contemptible, mean-spirited villain," muttered he. "But I might have known it—put a beggar on horseback, and he'll ride to the devil. Well, it's all done now, and I must make the most of a bad bargain; but, bless me, it was rather green. It's confounded cold," continued he, as he walked up the street, trying in vain to make his coat meet and button over his breast. "I never knew it was quite so cold in these parts—why, it's a second Siberia—it's the coldest night I ever knew."

At last, when he had reached the outskirts of the town, having stopped before an old, dreary-looking brick house, he felt this was the place. He pushed open the front door and walked into the entry.—"That isn't the place anyhow, thank God," said he, as he heard a man's voice, in a room on the first floor, cursing and swearing. Up stairs his instinct led him. He listened at a door. He heard the voices of two females within, but the tone was too low to catch their words. He opened the door and walked in.

"Why Si, my son, you are very late to-night; we were afraid something had happened to you," said a middle-aged woman, with a face still mild and soft, but pale and haggard with care.

"What kept you so late, dear Si?" said the other, a pale, slender girl, coming towards him, and looking into his face with a fearful, sad expression in her blue eyes.

"Don't look at me so, dear sis, pray don't," said Harry, the words coming almost involuntarily to his lips. "I did take a glass or two, but that wasn't the reason; indeed it wasn't, mother, indeed it wasn't."

"Oh, Si, if you only would give up that altogether, mother and I wouldn't care how poor we were—we'd do anything for you we could, dear Si, if you would only say that you would drink nothing any more."

Harry gazed a moment in silence upon the sweet, wasted face and form before him.

"I will give it up altogether, Lizzie, for yours and mother's sake," said he at length.

"Bless you for those words, my son," said the widow, a light passing over her face, such as might have rested upon it in her youth—while the girl passed her arm gently around his neck, and kissed him repeatedly.

"But you've had no supper to-night yet, have you?" said Harry, glancing at the fire-place, "and your fire is nearly burnt out, though it is so bitter cold."

"No matter, dear Si," said the girl, "what you have said to-night will be both food and fire for us in many a long, cold evening, while we are waiting for you."

Harry thrust his hands in his pockets—luckily, right down in the corner of one of them he found a stray shilling; and hurrying from the room, he soon returned with a loaf of bread, some bacon, and some wood.

"But Si, dear, what are we to do to-morrow, if we eat this now? you know you don't receive your wages till to-morrow night."

"No matter, mother, I'll fix it. I know I can raise that much, any how," replied Harry, positively—so positively, that she believed he must have some certainty about the matter, and made no scruple as to gratifying her hunger.

After their meal was finished, Harry had a little further insight into the political economy of poverty. Si's mother raked the ashes over the fire, as a thing of course, and lay down with Lizzie in their clothes upon a straw pallet, dragging a thin coverlid over them. Poor people cannot afford to burn fire through the evening; and to sleep in the clothes you have worn all day, though not particularly comfortable, is decidedly preferable to running the risk of freezing to death. Harry therefore flung himself down upon another pallet in the opposite corner, and vowing inwardly that he would have the rheumatism before morning, fell asleep.

Harry slept pretty soundly till towards the middle of the night; then he was suddenly awakened by what seemed to be a rude slap in his face. He listened for a moment. What was it that so disturbed the night with noise and confusion? A moment more, and there came another stroke right into his face. He started up in a rage, exclaiming—

"Who did that?"

"It's only the rats, my dear," said a calm voice from the other side of the room. "I often wondered they never woke you before. They've been very bad for a week, now—and the smell of the meat to-night has made them worse than common."

"And so I am to lie still and be eaten to death by rats, am I?" muttered Harry.

"They won't hurt you, Si, dear; they'll smell a little at you, but they'll run as soon as you move."

"But I don't like to be smelled at," said Harry.

"Well, I'm not sleepy, dear; I'll sit up and keep them away," said Si's mother. "I've been keeping them away from Lizzie, poor child; she needs sleep so much; and I was afraid they'd disturb her."

"No, no, mother, no you won't; just you go to sleep as soon as possible; we'll bear them to-night, and to-morrow I'll see if I can't stop up their holes and keep them out."

But, though Harry spoke so philosophically, he had no idea of subjecting himself any longer to such familiarities. He therefore dragged his bed up against the wall, and prepared to sleep out the rest of the night in a sitting posture.

The next morning, Harry was up with the first grey streak of dawn. He didn't wonder any longer why poor people got up so early—his only wonder was how they managed to stay in their hard, cold beds so long. Mrs. Rackets and Lizzie were, however, up before him: and had between them raked up quite a little fire, which they fed with wood in the same manner that the world fed them with sustenance, as slowly as was consistent with the support of life.

The remains of last night's supper furnished a slight breakfast, and Mrs. Rackets having reminded him that they should have nothing for dinner, unless he was able to procure the money he had alluded to on the previous evening, Harry started off to his work.

As he walked along, and thought of the occurrences of the last twelve hours, while he could not account in any rational manner for the metamorphosis he had undergone, he was able to see clearly the nature and extent of it.

That he was not changed into Si Rackets was evident, because his mental perceptions, and modes of thought, were still, to a great degree, his own.—Whatever was material about him, his body, and those sensations that appertain to the body, and to this world, were changed. Even his memory of things relative to his worldly affairs as Harry Robinson, had departed nearly altogether from him, and a perception of Si Rackets' business and worldly connections awoke within him gradually, as it was needed.

He became aware, therefore, now, that Si was employed in a cotton factory—that he had but lately engaged himself there, and, knowing nothing about the business, was a laborer of the meanest grade, and receiving but a trifling pittance for his toil. He became conscious also that the present were "hard times," a phrase which he had often used before, but the meaning of which he never till now realized.

Under these circumstances he formed a plan to this effect. He knew that the owner of the factory, Mr. Simons, had the reputation of being a just and humane man; he would see him personally in the course of the morning, get a shilling from him on account of his week's wages, which, he had no doubt, he could obtain by representing the starving condition of his family, and also prevail on him to increase his wages, by convincing him that they were not such as could be lived upon without great suffering. All this seemed so fair and just to him, that he had but little doubt of a compliance with his demands.

Full of these agreeable anticipations, Harry went to his work with much alacrity, and, though the employment was not particularly pleasant, yet, with the aid of Si Rackets' not too fastidious organs and his stout body, he managed to get through the morning very well.

Upon the first stroke of the bell, at noon, Harry washed himself very quickly, and, making his way to the little room appropriated to Mr. Simons, desired a few minutes' conversation with him.

"Well, Rackets, what have you to say?" said his employer, pushing his spectacles up on his forehead.

"I have taken the liberty, Mr. Simons," replied Harry, "of coming to have a little talk with you about my wages. They are so low, now, that it is but just possible to live upon them. And I thought if I could satisfy you of this fact, you would be very willing to increase them to a sum sufficient to give me, and those that are dependent upon me, a decent living. I am willing to work hard, you know, Mr. Simons, and I think a fair day's work ought to be recompensed with a fair day's wages."

Harry paused, confident that such logic was unanswerable. But Mr. Simons smiled—he did not get angry, nor the least ruffled, as many employers would under similar circumstances—no, Mr. Simons was a good specimen of a man, honest, open, and liberal,—but he was also a business man, and prided himself upon his ability to make as much profit from a given capital invested as any man. Mr Simons smiled, as we have said, as if he had heard such things said hundreds of times before, and saw exactly where the fallacy of them lay.

"Now, my good fellow," replied his employer, "I can show you the folly, in a few minutes, of what you have just been saying. You have fallen into the common error of poor and uneducated men—that of supposing it is in the power of any man, or body of men, to regulate the wages of labor. You have never read any works upon Political Economy, I suppose?"

Harry hardly knew what to answer; for, as Harry Robinson, he had read several: but again, as Si Rackets, he had not read any, and consequently, it may be supposed, his ideas were rather confused upon the subject. He replied, therefore—

"Yes—no—I believe not."

"I thought as much," renewed Mr. Simons. "Now, my dear fellow, listen a moment. It is proven in those works, written by some of the ablest men that the world has ever produced, that you can no more regulate the wages of labor than you can the rising and falling of the tides. They regulate themselves. See—it is proven, moreover, by these learned men, that any attempt by government or individuals to interfere in the matter, only makes things worse.—Now, I'll shew you how it works. There is a certain amount of work to be done every year, and there is a certain number of men to do it: when the quantity of work to be done is larger than common, there is a demand for workmen, and wages go up; those are 'good times:' when there is not much to do, the workmen find difficulty in obtaining employment, and are consequently willing to work for lower wages; those are 'bad times'."

"Then," said Harry, interrupting him, "when a man can only get work three or four days in the week, he must also put up with smaller wages than common—that's hard, I think."

"I am not saying what is hard, or what is not hard," said Mr. Simons, more gravely. "If you're sick, and can't work at all, you get no wages at all, and that's hard, too, but it's a fact. The thing, see, regulates itself. The price of labour, which we call wages, must be determined like the price of everything else, by the demand. If we manufacturers make up too many goods for the market, they fall in value, sometimes even below the cost of production. Now, as to your case, if I had any difficulty in getting men to do what you are doing, of course you could hold back, and I would have to raise your wages. But it is very different, you know. I can get hundreds to do the same things for the wages I pay you, and you cannot expect me to give more than the market value. And suppose I was to do so, not in your particular case only, I mean, but as a general rule—I could not manufacture as cheap as other manufacturers; I should not be able to make a sufficient profit on my goods, and would have to discontinue the business, and, as a consequence, discharge all my hands; and so, instead of the little you now get you would get nothing at all. Don't you see it? It's as plain as the crown of your hat."

Harry scarcely knew what to answer to a discourse apparently so sound and reasonable. He had, moreover, a slight remembrance of having used such an argument himself, often, when he was a college debater; and this tended further to confuse his mind. Making a bold push, however, he said—

"But suppose all the manufacturers were to advance the wages of their men—then one would not be able to undersell the other."

"When the sky falls we shall catch larks, I suppose," replied his employer. "What is to make them all come into such a measure? And if any number hold out the rest would be ruined. Say, Rackets, who's to make them?"

Harry made another bold push—the cloud began to open a little.

"The government."

"Well, but didn't I tell you that all political economists have decided that the interference of government in these matters has always made things worse?"

"Perhaps," suggested Harry, "it was because government did not interfere wisely."

"Rackets, you're incorrigible," said Mr. Simons, rather pettishly. "Do you suppose you know better than learned men, who have studied the thing through and through? The thing regulates itself, just like heat and cold, like the winds, like the tides, like everything else in nature."

"But still, Mr. Simons, we don't submit to nature's regulations. We regulate nature, don't we? We build fires to warm the air when it's too cold—we build houses to keep off the wind and rain—we build steamboats to go right in the tooth of the tide"—

"What nonsense," ejaculated his employer, still more pettishly.

"Then," continued Harry, "if we don't submit to nature in these things, why should we in the regulation of wages?"

"Because you can't help it—that's why," exclaimed Mr. Simons. "There's but one way to help it, and that, you are too full of your carnal natures to pursue."

"What is that?" asked Harry, more submissively, for he began to fear that his chance of obtaining the other request he had to make would be rather small, if he was not more cautious in his opposition to his employer's principle of "self regulation."

"Why, that is to have nothing to do with marrying or giving in marriage. Don't you see that there are too many of you now? There is already so many people on the earth that there isn't near work enough for them—they can't get employment, and therefore have to wander about half naked and half starved, cursing those who were instrumental in bringing them into the world. You yourself have a wife and three or four children, I suppose?"

"No, sir, I have only a mother and a sister. But an't it according to those laws of nature which you were speaking of, which regulate every thing, and which it is impossible to regulate in turn, to get married?"

"What do you mean, sir, by playing upon my words in this manner?" said Mr. Simons indignantly.

"I meant no offence, indeed, sir," said Harry.

"You did mean offence—you meant to ridicule me—but I will put up with no insolence from any man in my employ. Go to the clerk, and he will pay you off and then never darken these doors again."

In vain Harry apologized—his employer was inflexible. He was indignant at the thought that a common workman had presumed not only to puzzle him a little in the way of argument, but also to ridicule his contradictions. And though generally a very good-tempered man, he was now too affronted to be easily appeased.

"Well," said Harry, as he trudged homeward, "I've got the shilling and more too—but what is to be done next week for victuals? Confound my foolishness!—what business of mine was it if he did talk like a donkey about his order of nature, and all things regulating themselves! It's regulated me out of a situation, and that's all the good I can see that will come of it."

The night that had been passed by Harry so uncomfortably, had been began by Si Rackets in a far more agreeable manner. Harry's body, tired with the sleigh ride, had soon manifested a disposition to sleep, a disposition that Si had no wish at all to discourage. And when he lay down upon the soft feathers, and mentally contrasted them with the straw pallet he was used to occupy, an expression of peculiar satisfaction passed over his features.

"I wonder who's got the best of the bargain now?" thought he, as he nestled down beneath the warm counterpane.

But warm and comfortable as it was, Si, after having enjoyed it for a few minutes, was not satisfied.

"Dang it! what's to prevent me having a fire in the room all night?" said he, ringing the bell violently. No one answering his summons immediately, he gave another tremendous pull, and in so doing broke the bell-rope.

"Confound the rascals! they must have heard me," he muttered.

He lay silent a few minutes—no noise.

"I'll see whether or not I'm to be treated in this fashion. What's the use of being rich and having plenty of money?" exclaimed he, as he leaped out of bed and groped his way through the dark, for he had blown out his lamp, towards the door. "Oh! the powers—blast it!" he exclaimed, as he, what is vulgarly called, "stumped his toe" against the leg of a chair. "Thunderation!" shouted he, as recoiling from the chair he knocked stars into his eyes against the door which he had carelessly left half open.

Half mad with rage caused by these various discomfitures and the cold, Si made his way down the long stairs.

"I'll see what the rapscallions are at; and discharge them all this blessed night as sure as my name's Si—Henry Robinson," muttered he. He opened the parlour door—all was dark and silent. He made his way towads the kitchen. "Now I shall catch them!" thought he. He was mistaken: all there, also, was dark and silent. "Dang it, if I don't believe the rascals have also had the impudence to go to bed too. Who's there?" he cried, as he heard a low laugh in the corner.

Si remembered the chuckles in the evening—he overflowed with indignation.

"Oh! yes, you may laugh: but I'll show you that they won't fool me in this way for nothing—they won't."

"They wont?" was spoken in a whisper, in the corner.

"No, they wont," shouted Si.

"They wont?" rung from the corner like an echo.

"Come, what's the use in plagueing me in this way, old gentleman?" said Si, a little apologetically, endeavoring to light a lamp by the coals in the fireplace. "You know I never injured you," continued he, even more apologetically, as he found that it was no easy matter to do so.

At last, however, Si succeeded in lighting his lamp without any further interruption, and then taking a large bell from the table, he went into the entry and began ringing it violently.

"What's the matter? What's going on?" cried several male voices down the stairs, interspersed with several female exclamations of thieves and murder.

"Oh, you're pretty rascals," shouted Si, back.—"Come down here, every one of you—what d'ye mean by going to bed this time of night?"

"Massa Harry's cracked, that's sartin!" said the waiter to his fellow servants loud enough for Si to hear.

"I'll crack your head, you black compound of ebony," exclaimed Si, indignantly.

"We won't come down," said one of the women, in a shrill cream.

"We won't come down either," shouted one of the men.

"You won't?" said Si; "well, I'll turn off every one of you to-morrow, that I will. I'll see if I won't be boss in my own shop. What's the use of being boss, if you can't have your own way? Send down that boy, anyhow."

"Yes, you want to beat him?" cried one of the women.

"I don't want to beat him—I want him to make a fire in my room, you fool, you!"

There was a long consultation—so long that Si began to shiver again with the cold—then it seemed that they had determined that the boy should come, for he heard his footsteps upon the stairs.

"Why didn't you come when I called you?" exclaimed Si, administering a box on the boy's ear, for the double purpose of venting this spleen and warming his fingers.

"They wouldn't let me!" said the boy, whimpering.

"Well, now get to work and kindle me a fire in the crack of a cow's thumb, or you'll pay for it," said Si, giving him another box upon the opposite ear.

"Well, this is a remarkable pretty state of things!" ejaculated our hero as he made his way up stairs again through the cold. "They call this being rich, do they? A man can't have a little fire even in his own room at night, without kicking up a row with the servants, can't he? And then his servants must be boss, after all; must they? Well, I'll turn them all off in the morning, that I will—I'd have turned them off to-night, but there'd be nobody to make the fires and get the breakfast to-morrow."

Si crept back into bed, and in a few moments the boy entered the room, but without any wood or shavings, or anything for a fire.

"Where's your wood?" said Si, glancing out from under the cover.

"Got none," replied the boy. "Cook says we havn't had any for a month, we don't burns wood, but coals."

"Well, now, if this isn't enough to try the patience of Job!" said Si, indignantly. "No wood—plenty of money and no wood. But you think I'll have to do without a fire, do you?" continued he, as he observed a slight grin on the boy's face. "You think you'll boss it over me here too, do you? But I'll show you what's what before I'm done with you. I'll have a fire here this night if I have to chop down one of the doors for wood—blame me if I won't!"

"Cook said," interrupted the boy, "that there was plenty of charcoal, and you might make a fire in the little oven, if you pleased."

"Run, you rascal: run then—am I to be kept awake all night in this way like a beggar?" said Si. "What's the use of being rich, if a fellow can't get sleep when he wants it?"

It was not long before the boy returned with the oven and the charcoal."

"Now that feels good," said Si, after the boy had left the room and the warmth of the fire began to spread over the apartment. "Some poor devils are sleeping, I guess, to-night without a blanket or bed, let alone a fire in their rooms. Well, if they enjoy it, let them do it!—that's all I have to say. What'd be the use in being rich if every body was? A feller enjoys a warm bed when he thinks how many have to sleep on cold boards, hard too as bones.—Every body for number one, that's my notion. Let every feller take care of himself," yawned Si, stretching out one leg. "If he don't like one birth, let him try another"—hauling it back from the cold sheets.

The clear, cold rays of a January sun were streaming into the room, but still Si slumbered on. We have said clear rays, and so they were before entering the window—but inside they mingled with a pale blue smoke that filled the apartment. Si lay upon the bed, and to any one at the first sight would have seemed to be in a sound sleep, but as you marked his face more narrowly, an unquiet, fearful expression occasionally flitted over it. We have said he slumbered, but it was not slumber—we have said he slept, but God forbid that sleep, sleep, "that balm of hurt minds," that calm power which brings back the disturbed balance of the soul once more to its centre, should ever be the unnatural stupefaction of the faculties which Si now experienced.

All through the long night, fearful dreams had pressed upon his mind. Awful shapes had flitted before his eyes and bade him drink from their goblets, molten gold. One had wound his body around with a heavy golden chain, until he quivered beneath the load to his finger ends. They scoffed at him—they mocked him—they offered him gold to eat instead of bread. They made the atmosphere around him a brazen wall and laughed to see him struggling to breathe it. At last they all disappeared when they had tormented him to the uttermost—and then the old man came who had been the agent of his metamorphose. He came, bland and smiling as ever, and stepping up on to the bed, sit right down upon his breast. In vain Si begged and implored him to choose some other seat. The old gentleman smiled and declined to comply—he was very easy himself and comfortable, and it must be all imagination in Si to suppose that such a trifling weight as his could inconvenience him. But heavier and heavier the old man seemed to grow with every inspiration, until at length Si could just breathe, and still he smiled and chatted on as if his victim was in the most comfortable situation in the world. At length he began to gasp for breath, and then the old man took a handful of coin from his pocket, and every time Si opened his mouth he would try to pitch one of the pieces in—a proceeding which when successful seemed to afford not him only but some others also, to judge by the laughter that then filled the room, a great deal of amusement. We say, not that these things actually did happen—in fact we know nothing about it—but Si always stuck to it that it was the truth till his dying day.

How long the old man amused himself with his game of "pitch penny" Si could not determine, for gradually a feeling of inertness took the place of his suffocation and pain, and finally all consciousness faded away, and when he came to himself, a gentleman with a peculiarly long face and nose was standing by his bedside, occasionally giving directions to one of the servants, who was bustling about the apartment as if a question of life and death were upon the carpet.

"Ah, he's coming too," said the long-faced gentleman, as Si opened his eyes slowly.

"Who's coming too—what's the row?"—Si would have said, but his mouth seemed closed as tight as a miser's fist.

"Now, I trust this will be a warning to you, all the days of your life," continued long face to the servant. The fumes of charcoal, which is oxygenated wood, are highly hurtful, that is, deleterious to human existence. This natural air we breathe," said long face, with an oratorical flourish of his arms, "may become poisonous, that is gaseous, that is mephitic."

"Laws me," said the servant girl, "you need'nt scold me—I didn't do it—Zeb done it."

Si by this time had managed to get his mouth a little open—but before he had time to speak the doctor seized a spoon that lay near, and emptied its contents right into his throat.

"Ugh—ugh," said Si, closing his teeth suddenly, as he perceived the doctor had already filled the spoon for another dose. "What's the use of being rich," thought he disconsolately. "First an old fellow flinging his dirty silver into your mouth, and then another dosing oil down your throat—and all because one's rich—that ere feller wouldn't waste his oil on a poor chap that couldn't pay him for doing of it—no, I know he wouldn't."

In the afternoon, having pretty well recovered from the effects of the charcoal furnace, Si concluded that he would walk down and see the gentleman who had the management of what was now his estate. What with being nearly suffocated over night and having to pay an exorbitant doctor's bill in the morning, Si was rather dissatisfied. He was, moreover, not only dissatisfied, but a good deal indignant at the remembrance of being turned into a cushion by the old gentleman, and amidst this mingled dissatisfaction and indignation, the unwelcome thought would at times creep into his mind, that after all, this being rich was not exactly what it was cracked up to be.

Si fortunately found his man of business at home, and having feasted his eyes upon a schedule containing all the houses and lands and appurtenances, thereto belonging, which were included in the estate of Harry Robinson, was about to leave the office, when a marvellous bright idea seemed to strike him.

"Did you ever see, Mr. Sharpun," said he gravely, "ten thousand dollars all together, in a heap?"

"How do you mean," replied that gentleman, "in notes, or in the hard money?"

"In the hard stuff, the real old silver shiners, just pulled off Uncle Sam's mint like scales off a fish—say, did you ever see ten thousand of them piled up in a heap, altogether?"

"No," said Mr. Sharpun, "I confess I never did."

"Well that's just what I mean to have, Sharpun," said Si. "And the sooner you get them for me, the better.—Didn't you say that feller, Jones, offered ten thousand for that house in Washington Row?"

"But my dear Mr. Robinson," expostulated Mr. Sharpun, "what a singular idea—I do not understand you—what would you do with the money after you got it?"

"Never mind about that," replied Si, "what I'll do with it; you know that chest I've got at home, I'll put it in that. I want to see my money—what's the use of being rich if a fellow can't feel it? I come down here and you say, see, Rack—— Robinson, I mean, that house is yours, that mortgage yours, that bond's yours,—but blame it, I want to see the stuff—then I'll feel I'm rich."

"But, Mr. Robinson," again began Sharpun.

"Not another word, not another word," interrupted Si. "I've made up my mind to it, and I intend to have it done. If you won't do it, Sharpun, I reckon I can find some one else that will."

"Of course, I'll do it, of course, if you desire it, Mr. Robinson—you know I'm, but your agent—I'll put it all in coppers, if it would oblige you—"

"You're the fellow for me," exclaimed Si, slapping him on the back. "In coppers? that 'd be fun—In coppers—that would make a fine heap."

"But then we must consider," said Mr. Sharpun, gravely seeming to enter into the spirit of his employer, "what trouble it would be to count it out, when you wanted to pay any body anything. Besides it makes your fingers smell so. A rich man you know, dont want to be fumbling for half an hour to pay a few dollars."

"That's the truth—I never thought of that," said Si, seriously. "What's the use of being rich, if a feller can't pull out his pus and pay 'em off in a jiffey?"

"Even silver," said Mr. Sharpun, "is liable to the same objection. A rich man, you know, don't owe money by quarters and halves, but by fifties and hundreds; he'd scorn to owe a quarter dollar."

"True again," said Si; "I won't have silver—it's the rich man's copper. No, I'll have gold, that's the stuff. In comes the waiter.—'Can you pay me my week's wages, sir?' 'Hem—let's see; here, can you change this eagle?—nothing smaller—nothing smaller, hem!' Yes, gold's the stuff, Sharpun."

"And after all," said Sharpun, abstractedly, "nothing is equal to good bank notes. Gold's heavy—gold's deceitful—gold's 'small potatoes' compared to notes. A rich man can pull out his pocket book any time and take out a note for a thousand, but he'd get tired if he'd lug that much gold about with him all the time."

"I don't care—I intend to have the gold," said Si, resolutely; "I want to feel myself, I tell you. If gold's heavy, it's all the better—it an't vulgar, and that's enough."

"Oh, of course," replied Mr. Sharpun; "I was merely discussing the abstract question. Abstract principles, you know, may be true in themselves, and yet it would be very foolish, if not even wicked, to attempt to practice upon them. It is your will, then, that I shall sell the house I was speaking of?"

"Yes, sell it—sell two houses, if you choose—but get me the money," said Si, impatiently. "When can you get it? I must have it by to-morrow; can you get it by that time?"

"I'll try very hard to oblige you," said Mr. Sharpun; "but it may cause me considerable trouble and expense."

"Never mind that," said Si; "you'll find me a different feller from Harry—I mean I'm not the stingy chap I used to be. What's the use of being rich, if you can't make the fur fly?"

"I agree with you perfectly," said Mr. Sharpun.

"Some men have souls and some havn't," continued Si. "When a man's heart's full it overflows and then you see what's inside it. Some men's hearts overflows coppers—them are little chaps; some overflow's quarter and half dollars—them are middling-sized fellers; but some overflows gold pieces," said Si, striking his breast ferociously, "and them's the big, whole-souled fellers."

Mr. Sharpun opened wide his eyes at this burst of enthusiasm, but allowed them to resume their usual half-closed expression, apparently satisfied that the fumes of some liquid stronger than water were beginning to ascend into his employer's brain.

"Shall I send for a cab?—it's a long walk here, I know," said he, as Si moved unsteadily towards the door, reiterating his commands relative to the ten thousand.

"Cab!" exclaimed Si; "cabs are of two kinds—the backups and the sideways; the backups are for them that drives carts and drays, and don't know better, but the sideways are for gentlemen—the sideways are for gentlemen"——

Mr. Sharpun here interrupted Si's remarks by offering him his arm, and begging to accompany him home, as he was going in that direction on an errand—an offer which Si accepted after many apologies and explanations—and, having seen our hero in his own house, left him, revolving in his mind the change that seemed to have so suddenly come over his employer.

PART V.

Harry Robinson had the next week full leisure to ruminate over those portions of political economy which his quondam employer had expounded, for he found, after repeated applications to other manufacturers, that there was, as is often the case, an overstock of labor in the market.

"I will explain to you, my man, the whole secret of it," said an old gentleman to whom he had applied for work. "The fact is, that there has already been so much produced, there have been such great quantities of stuff manufactured such thousands of boots, such millions of hats, such immense numbers of every thing needful to the comfort of man, that we have to slacken off and wait till a portion at least is consumed."

"And what are we to do in the meantime?" said Harry.

The old man shrugged his shoulders. "It's a hard case, I know," at last he replied, "but it's the way of the world—it's the law of nature—things regulate themselves."

Harry, as we have said, had full leisure to ponder over these lessons of political economy that he received in place of work and wages, and as it is notorious that nothing sharpens a man's wits like necessity, hit at last on some notable conclusions.

"There has been too much produced," said he to himself a dozen of times; "too much produced—that's strange. That men should complain of short crops and scarcity seems reasonable, but to have to complain of full crops and plenty is strange in the extreme. Let me see—suppose the whole earth and sea belonged to one man or one family, wouldn't it be better for them the more they were able to produce? Supposed it belonged to two families who divided the production equally—to two hundred—to two thousand—to two millions—wouldn't they say 'the more the merrier?'—the more we can raise out of the ground, or manufacture out of what grows in the ground, the better we shall be fed, the better we shall be clothed? But now it seems that the worse it is for some of us, if not all. How is this?'"

Harry had to scatter to the four winds all he remembered of political economy, and work out the puzzle with his own head. That it should be 'good times' when things were scarce, and 'hard times' when things were plenty, seemed at first a paradox, but after a while he studied it out to satisfy himself a little in this fashion. He supposed that instead of the productions of the earth being divided fairly among the inhabitants of the earth, that three-fourths of them got simply their daily living, and the one-fourth not only their living, but the balance that was left of unused productions. The one-fourth would be therefore accumulating from year to year a stock of needful articles both for wear and consumption. At last their stores and warehouses become so full that they say, 'well, we have enough on hand to last a year or two—let us stop producing for a while.' But what in such a case becomes of the three-fourths who cannot labor to supply their own wants, without the co-operation of the wealthy one-fourth? 'The market,' says the manufacturer, 'is already glutted,' but not because there are none that want anything, but because those that want, having received nothing for their labor during previous years more than a bare subsistence, have nothing laid up in the shape of money or commodities to subsist on now. If the poorer classes then were paid better wages—in other words, allowed a larger share of the yearly production of the earth—they would consume more yearly, and thus prevent the danger of over-production, or be able to lay up sufficient to support themselves during the years when, on account of such excess of production, labor was not in much demand.

"Then it's all a matter of the division of the products of labor, is it?" said Harry aloud, after turning the matter over in his brain a hundred times.

"To be sure it is," said a voice at his elbow.

Harry turned, but saw nobody—saw nothing—save when in passing through a darker shadow than common, a faint outline, as of that of an old acquaintance, was dimly discernible.

"Ah, you're there, are you?" said Harry, a little bitterly.

"Ha, ha, ha! I knew you'd enjoy it—you remember I told you you'd enjoy it. Ha, ha!"

Harry felt too proud to acknowledge his mistake—and besides, his mind was really full of the problem he had been endeavoring to work out.

"Then it's all a matter of the division of the products of labor, is it?" continued he.

"To be sure it is," repeated the voice at his elbow.

"And if the products of the earth were divided with some little regard to fairness among its inhabitants, there would be no complaints of over-production, would there?"

"I reckon not—ha, ha, ha!" said the voice.

"And there'd be enough for every body?"

"They'd work pretty hard if there wasn't, ha, ha!"

"And machinery and the steam engine would be considered blessings, would they not?" cried Harry, enthusiastically.

"What's the use of making a fool of yourself by asking such questions?" said the voice; "be sure they would."

"And to buy labour or any thing else as cheap as you can, without any regard to fairness of price, isn't right then?"

"Who says it isn't right?" said the old gentleman, becoming now quite visible, with a sneer; "ask your ministers of the gospel—ask your wise men—your political economists,—your political reformers—they'll all tell you that 'a man has a right to buy as cheap as he can, and sell as dear as he can,' whether it be merchandise or labour, and I say so too."

"You say so, do you?" cried Harry, a little angry.

"Yes I do—and I'd like to hear any body, who pretends to know any thing about business, deny it."

"The Apostle said," replied Harry, "that masters ought to give their servants what is just and equal."

"Oh, if you're going to talk in that way," cried the old gentleman, impatiently, "I'm off. What's the use of lugging in the apostles always—what did they know about business? I'm not going to deny that they were pretty good men in their way—but they were not practical men—I'd assert that any where," said the old gentleman, boldly; "I'd like to see Peter or Paul, either of them, at the head of a mercantile concern for a year or two; they'd blow up as sure as my name is Nicholas. Now that's what I always said—those notions of theirs are pretty good in the abstract, but they won't work—they are not suited to this world. Let one of the Apostles start a manufactory on their principles, and let me start one of the same kind on mine, and we'd see which would succeed. If I wouldn't undersell them and drive them out of the market, cut off my tail—that's all."

"I believe you would," replied Harry, rather amused at the old gentleman's warmth.

"I know it. I'd make more money in one year than all of them together would in five. I dared one of them to try it once, but he only smiled."

"Our manufacturers are crying out very loudly that new markets should be opened for them—if the laboring classes were paid better wages, would not that open a great and constant home market?"

"Of course it would; but what of that?" said the old gentleman, sharply. "But I see what you're after now, young man. The tendency of the present order of things is towards extreme riches on the one side, and extreme poverty on the other, which is right, for the Bible says so, it says that 'the poor shall never cease out of the land,'—but you want to introduce a new order of things, the tendency of which shall be towards an equalization of property—in other words, you are a leveller, an agrarian—one of those whom I have a most thorough dislike and contempt for."

"You cannot have a more thorough contempt of me than I have of you," replied Harry, scornfully.

Any other old gentleman would have flown into a rage at such language, but it seemed to restore Harry's antagonist to his usual self-possession, and cold, ironical courtesy.

"Of course it is natural you should think so. Men always hate those who confer obligations on them, and you will remember I once obliged you in a small way. No doubt you are well pleased with your change of circumstances. It's all habit, you know. It's nothing when you get used to it."

"I was a fool," replied Harry, while a slight blush mantled his face, "and although the confession will no doubt afford you much satisfaction, yet I shall tell the truth, even if it pleases, instead of shaming, the devil."

"Oh, I'm very sorry, indeed I am," replied the old gentleman, rubbing his hands in a very ecstacy of malicious delight; "but you know it was all your own doings; you would have it so; you cannot blame any body but yourself."

"And I do not blame any body else," said Harry, sternly; "perhaps it is even better as it is; for he who now has the wealth I once so foolishly squandered, knows what poverty is, and in his hands it is no doubt devoted to noble purposes."

"I am very sorry, extremely sorry, exceedingly sorry," replied the old gentleman, with excessive glee, "but a sacred regard for the truth which you know I am so famed for, compels me to undeceive you. He makes a tenfold greater fool of himself than you did. He even disgusts me with his folly, I assure you."

"I can scarcely believe it, and yet his language to me on that first night, was so very mean," said Harry, musingly.

"Why didn't he seek out and relieve his mother and sister?" asked the old gentleman.

"He must have lost all memory of them in the change," said Harry.

"Did you lose all remembrance of your former condition?" asked the old gentleman, slyly.

"He could not have the heart, surely, to desert that sweet, heavenly-minded girl, and his old widowed mother. He surely could not have the heart to do it."

"Pooh, what's the use in making such a fuss about it? you would do the same."

"I don't think I would," replied Harry, cautiously.

"That young girl has often starved herself, that he might have more to eat, and better clothes to wear," said the old gentleman, aggravatingly.

"The angel," exclaimed Harry.

"Oh, yes," said the old gentleman, tauntingly, "she is an angel now you are both poor, but if either of you were rich, you wouldn't touch each other with a pair of tongs, let alone putting your arms around one another so disgustingly."

"If I was rich again to-morrow, it would make no difference in my thoughts of her—I wish I were for her sake."

"Adam and Eve talked just that way one morning, and yet they quarrelled so before night about an apple, (both laying all the blame upon me afterwards, which is just the way with married people,) that they had to be turned out of Paradise."

"The mean-spirited scoundrel—and such a sister, too!" ejaculated Harry.

"Well, he's punished enough, even to satisfy you," replied the old gentleman—"I wish you could see him; he's got the gout all over, it seems to me, and yet he cannot control his appetite and live temperately—and so he goes on eating and drinking at meals, and groaning all the rest of the day and night, abusing his servants, and abused by them, till it would make you crack your sides to see him. He's as sorry as you are that he ever changed places with you—but it cannot be helped now—it's all his own doings; ha, ha!"

"You seem to enjoy it very much," said Harry, indignantly.

"Oh, I do, I assure you. When I can oblige a friend and myself too, I enjoy it—ha, ha! You didn't care about being poor, and he wanted to be rich, and so made a mutual transfer of circumstances—and I'm delighted to see you both so well satisfied with your bargain."

"I can hardly credit it," said Harry, again, more to himself than to the old gentleman: "that he should forget that pale, suffering girl, and squander every thing upon his own gross appetites——"

"Well, if you don't believe me," exclaimed the old gentleman, pettishly, "I can easily prove it to you. It's getting about the hour now, and he's got into a fashion lately of staring out the window at the old fire-plug, as if he expected to see you there again, some night, that he may offer to trade back. But that's all gammon—let every one stick to his bargain. I say—if he don't like it, don't make it—that's all."

"Well, I'll go with you, and see with my own eyes," said Harry; "and it must be so, or else why has he not sought out and comforted that lovely girl, who surely cannot really be his sister?"

"Pooh, what fools you youngsters make of yourselves—she's a pretty little hussey enough, now: but come this way again in ten years, and she'll be as coarse and ugly as a fish huckster."

PART VI.

Si Rackets, as the old gentleman had for a wonder truly said, had been playing all manner of antics with his easily acquired fortune. He had given himself up to all kinds of dissipation, until his body could no longer endure such treatment, and as he groaned under the necessary consequences of his own folly, he lamented that he had ever agreed to exchange evils which he knew and was habituated to, for those which he knew not. He longed therefore to meet Harry, and see whether it were not possible in some way to undo what had been done. His greatest fear was, that when young Robinson should see to what a state his formerly healthy body was reduced, that he would absolutely refuse to take it back again. Besides, at least half of Harry's fortune had been squandered away already in various ways, and Si looked forward in consternation to a time when it should all have disappeared in some miraculous manner, and he be left as poor as at first, and therefore in every respect worse off for the change. And yet to amend his manner of life seemed impossible. He made resolutions daily, but broke them equally often. In short, he saw no other remedy than to get back into his old skin in some way—if that could not be done, he perceived very clearly that in his own language "he was done."

But yet he had never met Harry, and he was ashamed, after his base neglect of his mother and sister, to seek him at his old home, and so he knew not what to do, except to station himself at the window every evening, about dusk, and gaze out sorrowfully upon the fire-plug, in hope that some night he should see the object of his search seated again upon it. It was melancholy, as the young fellows said who had gathered around him like flies around a drop of molasses, to see a chap of such genius giving himself up in that way to the blues and greens. But still, so long as they were allowed to feed freely on his substance, they did not much complain; they would not have complained at all, only they feared that perhaps he was "getting religious."

Si was annoyed, too, in addition to his bodily ailments, by the continued presence of those eaves-droppers who, with their disagreeable chuckling, had so plagued him the first night of his transformation. He couldn't do anything a little out of the way, curse the servants a little harder than common, tumble down stairs when a little intoxicated, or cry out at a sharper twinge than common of the gout, but that some low chuckle would run around the room, as if his misfortunes were a source of the greatest merriment to the beholders. He found also that though habit is a second nature, he never could get used to such treatment. Instead of that, it made him completely nervous, and he was afraid almost to stir, lest one of those perpetual watchers of his conduct should find some thing ridiculous to chuckle over. He had tried storming at first, but he found that only made matters worse. Then he tried soothing, but that seemed to amuse them infinitely. Then he tried letting them alone, and paying no attention to them, and that succeeded best—but bad was the best. And when in the drear watches of the night he lay some times unable to sleep for pain, and heard their mocking laughter around him, he cursed the folly that had ever led him to exchange places with Harry Robinson.

PART VII.

"What a bloated-looking object," said Harry to the old gentleman, as they stood before the house and saw Si gazing out of the window.

"Oh, he's nothing to what he will be," said the old gentleman, pleasantly. "And then he will die in the alms-house, I know he will, for he is spending his money as fast as he well can."

"And you could prevent it," said Harry, sternly.

"I—oh no—I couldn't prevent it—I've nothing to do with it—it's entirely his own doings. I wouldn't be guilty of such a thing for the world," said the old gentleman, perfectly delighted.

"You could prevent it and you must," reiterated Harry firmly, "you must change us back again."

"Why you are worse than he," replied the old gentleman, laughing: "you're willing for the sake of half the money to take that vile, repulsive caress for a dwelling. But I'm too much your friend to ever consent to it—indeed I am. You don't think you'd ever get Si's sister to love such a rum hog-head as he's turned your old body into?"

"I know what I'm about now, any how," said Harry, resolutely. "We were both agreed to make a change before, and you accommodated us—and now we are both agreed to change back."

"And do you think I've taken all this trouble merely to oblige two such nice young men?" sneered the old gentleman. "You must think me remarkably disinterested, my fine fellows. No, I'm not so particularly fond of undoing a good job."

"You shall not escape me thus," cried Harry, indignantly stepping forward and grasping him by the arm.

"What did you let go for?" asked the old gentleman, sarcastically, as Harry recoiled, as if he had taken an electric shock, from the touch. "You didn't know I belonged to the Torpedo genus, did you? Come, try it again, take another dose, won't you?"

"There is no hope, then, but in Heaven!" said Harry, despairingly.

"No hope but in Heaven?" said Si, throwing up the window, and gazing wildly out.

"Come, if you're going to make a scene of it, I'm off," said the old gentleman hurriedly, preparing to decamp.

"Stay!" said a voice.

Harry started, looked up, but saw no one, nor knew from what direction the sound proceeded, whether from the earth beneath their feet, or the clear blue heaven, with its peerless moonlight, over head.

"Stay!" repeated the voice, louder than before, and dying away like the fresh sound of a breeze among the pines at sunset.

"Yes, that's always the way," said the old gentleman, pettishly. "One can't do a little private business, but somebody else must be interfering with it. There's no encouragement to be industrious now-a-days."

Harry's heart grew bolder.

"Is not my foolishness forgiven?—may not my prayers be granted?" said he, in a whisper.

"No, I won't do it,' I declare I won't," cried the old gentleman, sitting down resolutely upon the fire-plug.

"Do it!" said the voice calmly.

"Yes, that's the way always; I get everything in a pretty train, and do all the work, and then some one else comes in and pockets the proceeds. I might as well not trade at all on my own account."

"Thou dost not!" said the voice, calmly.

"Well, come, then," said the old gentleman angrily, seizing Harry by the arm.

Whether it was owing to being transferred to such a miserable body, or to the peculiar malice of the old gentleman, Harry never knew, but the pang was most intolerable.

At last he staggered to the window in time to hear the last of the three halloos with which Si had celebrated the restoration of the old order of things, and receive his hearty good-night as he hurried homewards.

As for the old gentleman, he was among the missing.

CONCLUSION.

"And did Harry marry Si's sister?—But she would'nt have him, would she, with such a bloated mass of flesh hanging about him?—Besides, he wouldn't have her now he was rich again?—Why don't you tell us?"

Softly, my fair readers. More curious things than either or these have happened, and therefore may happen again. You remember the "beggar-maid and King Cophetua," perhaps.

Well, Harry practised abstinence, and at length was himself again, all except a few slight twinges of the gout which will probably keep him in mind of what has passed until his dying day—if he live so long—as an Irishman might add. And when he had grown presentable, he presented himself to Si's mother and sister, who were now pleasantly situated through the benevolence of some unknown friend, in a neat little house not far from town. And Si's sister was none the worse looking for the change in their circumstances. And, to make a long story short, they ultimately were married, and had as many children as one of Miss Bremer's heroines—And Si himself was set up in business, and became a very decent man.

And so our story concludeth, as all stories should, in a marriage; for, however crooked and strange the course of a tale may be, young ladies and gentlemen will never be satisfied, without it brings up at the same old stopping place in the end.

Oh, jealousy! thou bane of pleasing friendship;
Thou worst invader of our tender bosoms;
How does thy rancor poison all our softness,
And turn our gentle nature into bitterness!

THE USE OF FLOWERS.

BY MARY HOWITT.

God might have made the earth bring forth
Enough for great and small—
The oak tree and the cedar tree—
Without a flower at all.

We might have had enough, enough
For every want of ours,
For luxury, medicine, and toil,
And yet have had no flowers.

The ore within the mountain mine
Requireth none to grow,
Nor does it need the lotus flower
To make the river flow.

And clouds might give abundant rain,
The nightly dews might fall,
And the herb that keepeth life in man
Might yet have drunk them all.

Then wherefore, wherefore were they made,
And dyed with rainbow light,
All fashioned with supremest grace,
Up-springing day and night—

Springing in valleys green and low,
And on the mountains high,
And in the silent wilderness.
Where no man passeth by?

Our outward life requires them not—
Then wherefore had they birth?
To minister delight to man:
To beautify the earth—

To comfort man, to whisper hope
Whene'er his faith is dim:
For whoso careth for the flowers,
Will much more care for Him.

DEATH OF AN ONLY CHILD.

BY D. C. COLESWORTHY.

Light footsteps at the door I hear—
I raise the latch and look;
My bright-eyed boy!—thou art not there;
Returning with his book,
Another child, less fair than thou,
Smiles as he passes by me now.

Falls on my ear a gentle tone,
As through the crowd I press;—
'Tis not THY voice, dear cherished one,
Like thine would it were less—
And then this heart, so big with grief,
Would not in tears find such relief.

A gentle hand hath pressed my cheek,
While in my study-chair;
I seemed to hear thee sweetly speak,
"My father—I am here."
When, lo! I saw another child,
Who only mocked me as he smiled.

When dimly burns the chamber-light,
I kneel beside thy bed;
I seem to hear thy sweet "good night,"
But tears profusely shed,
While on that couch I look, where lay
So lately he, now passed away.

And in the morning when I rise,
I hasten to thy room—
But oh! the truth it drowns my eyes—
"Your idol cannot come;"
And then the agony I feel,
No soothing words of love can heal.

Where'er I see a happy boy,
Sadly it speaks of thee;
A mother's love—a father's joy—
All that a child could be—
Now sleeping 'neath the valley's clod—
How could it be—my God—my God!

"MEMENTO MORI."

BY C. L. MEECH.

There is no chord of human sympathy which vibrates so truly, so universally, as that mysterious one which connects the living with the dead. It is a chain whose one extremity rests within our grasp, while the other is hidden in the darkness of eternity, and upon which our thoughts, our fears, and our wishes travel, like the electric fluid. Humanity can exercise no purer, no holier feeling, than that which follows departed friends to the shadowy land, and holds them there in kind remembrance. In our intercourse with the living, we interchange the varied offices of love and friendship, and the graceful courtesies of conventional life; but there is no interchange with the dead—the sympathies, the remembrances we extend to them, are like a voice sent forth upon the Ocean's waste, which returns to us no echo. We feel an interest in whatever pertains to mortality, which extends beyond the circle of kindred and acquaintance. We may be in a stranger land, and the ordinary sights and sounds of active life may fall unheeded upon the sense; the charms of eloquence and music may pall upon the ear, and we may gaze with apathy upon the passing pageant. Yet, when we hear the bell which tells that "another soul floats on the Stygian river," or look upon the funeral train, we are constrained to acknowledge an acquaintance with death, a companionship with the grave.

The memory of the dead!—what a volume of retrospect it opens before us. Perchance the frosts of autumn, or the snows of winter have fallen upon our brow, and as we look back through the long vista of departed years, and recall with sad and mournful pleasure the memories of those who have fallen by our side, the thought naturally occurs to us that soon the chain of memory will be all which will connect us with the living. The desire to leave an unsullied reputation is one of the noblest aspirations of our nature: and when we tread the silent streets of the city of the dead, and pass on either hand the storied urn and the nameless grave; when we "muse upon the distinctions which follow mankind down to the very dust," and mark the oft-neglected resting place of the virtuous and the good, let us remember that partiality, vanity and ill-gotten wealth, may raise the marble tablet, or dictate the fulsome epitaph; yet worth alone, will cause our memory to be revered. When we look upon the monuments which have been raised to commemorate the tyrant and the demagogue, let us remember that the exercise and memory of a simple virtue shall outlast them all. The creations of monumental art, which are a fitting tribute to virtue, will but commemorate its opposite, vice. Our lot in this world may be lowly and obscure—our influence may be but an atom, as it were, in the narrow circle in which we move—we may be suffering under the withering discouragements of ruined health, or the blighting desolation of a wounded spirit—yet, let us remember that the same Almighty hand which rears the gorgeous tulip tree, plants also the humble violet; that if He sends upon one the periodical rain, He gives to the other the daily dew-drop; and that the perrennial unfolding petals of the lowly flower, and the multiplied glories of the other, equally fulfil the purposes of their creation. If we have performed our duties as members of the domestic circle, and citizens of the community—if we have respected the rights and feelings of others as if they were our own—if we have not libelled a holy profession by a gloomy, pharasaical spirit, or by indulging the narrow prejudices of sectarian feelings—if we have added an item to the social virtues of society, or blunted a single pang of human misery, we have not lived in vain. There are repeated instances where the example of the humblest individuals have exerted an influence in their own and future times, when the opposing efforts of the high and mighty have been rendered as naught.

In the mausoleums of the Kings of England, is the tomb of one who for many years wielded the destinies of that nation. While he indulged in all the pleasures of a licentious court, he, without the excuse of bigotted feelings, sanctioned the religious persecutions of a large portion of his subjects—persecutions as intolerant and bloody as any that have been dictated by any other power. "He died and was buried" with all the imposing ceremonies of Romish Episcopacy, with all the pomp of heraldry and military pride. His cenotaph was placed within consecrated walls, in mute companionship with kings and prelates—with the gifted and noble of the earth—within the sound of the pealing organ, and surrounded by the master-pieces of ancient architecture and the glories of modern art. Afar off, in one of the wildest glens of Scotland, is the solitary grave of a poor covenanting preacher, who was murdered by the minions of this King for daring to pray to his God as his conscience dictated; his humble followers buried him by night upon the spot where he suffered. The only light which fell upon his bloody vestments and pallid features (features wasted by privation and suffering,) was the fitful moonbeam from between the broken clouds; the only sounds which mingled with the hymn for the dead, were the sighing of the wind through the tops of the broom, and the scream of the frightened night-bird. A fragment from the neighboring cliffs marks his resting place, an unshaped, unlettered stone, a shelter for the humble field cricket—a resting-place where the moor-fowl plumes her wing: yet the memory of the lowly covenanter inspires a respect for human nature which the urned ashes of an hundred tyrants could not. His example will exert an influence upon society, when the achievements of Kings and Princes are forgotten. The spirit which bade an earthly monarch "stand from between him and his God," was a germ of that which prompted our fathers to seek a home upon this western hemisphere, and perfect a system of civil and religiously liberty. Nor are the sterner sex alone in the examples which have produced salutary influences upon society, and which contrast favorably with the high and mighty of the earth.

English History records the reign of no sovereign more brilliant than that of Elizabeth. We see her at the commencement of her reign triumphing over every opposing faction, and read the gorgeous descriptions of her coronation. We see her surrounded by a galaxy of the proudest intellects which any age has produced. Philosophy, History, and Poetry, had each its living personification of excellence Her power was supported upon land and sea by skilful Captains, animated with all the devotion and chivalry of the age. We follow her history through a reign of more than forty years, and while we admire the success of her policy, we look in vain for those private traits and excellencies which should belong to a magnanimous and amiable Queen. We see her during the last days of her life sitting upon the ground within the walls of her palace, refusing all comfort and sustenance, a prey to the most pointed anguish and remorse. Was it the prospects of the future which cast their dreary shadows upon her spirit? or the deeds of the past called up to memory's chamber? Was it the gory locks of a sister Queen, or the phantom forms of the princely Essex, the accomplished Raleigh, or a host of minor victims, who had expiated upon the rack or scaffold offences against her ambition as a sovereign or her jealousy as a woman? We only know that such were the last days of Elizabeth Tudor. Upon one of the little Islets of the British Channel, there lived and died a female in the very humblest ranks of life, whose history we will contrast with the daughter of the haughty Henry. Her simple history first introduces her as the heritor of poverty and toil, clad in the ornaments of a meek and quiet spirit, and bearing the recent bereavement of a member of the household with singular fortitude and propriety. We see her again prostrated upon a bed of sickness, the embodiment of all the graces of the spirit of the Redeemer. Again we approach the cottage. No change is visible around the quiet spot; the repose of nature is only broken by the booming of the waves upon the solitary beach; no pageant is there, no crowd send forth their shouts—yet, beneath this thatched roof is held a coronation for Heaven, and the pæans which welcome the elect of God are not for mortal ears. Historians of her own and future times have recorded the brilliant reign of Elizabeth of England. The few pages of a tract tell the simple story of Elizabeth Woodville. Yet when the arched roof of Westminster Abbey shall have mingled its dust with that of the monuments of the Kings who repose beneath, the memory and example of the Dairyman's Daughter will have multiplied in every land where her history has been read—monuments which time will only embellish.

TO LAURA.

BY WM. F. SPICER, U. S. N.

A vessel homeward-bound with glowing hearts
Breaks now her moorings in the silver sand,
Link after link above the clear tide starts,
To cling no more save to its native strand;
Each olden tune the shrill pipe gaily plays,
And every nerve is swelling in the strain—
Ah, memory lingers in those merry lays,
And glist'ning eyes behold their home again.

The twilight breeze flows down from "Andes" snow,
Its influence o'er their yielding sails to strew,
The golden tide to favor glides below;
And far aloft, the summer sky is blue.
Their voices mingle now in happy song,
And list that shout, "The anchor is aweigh!"
Her "courses" fall; and, with her gladsome throng,
She glides in beauty o'er the quiet bay.

To thee, sweet maiden, in this thrilling time,
When kindly voices breathe a warm good bye;
And homeward turning from a foreign clime,
The wand'rer's heart knows sweet felicity,
While sails are trembling in the evening air,
And moistened eyes proclaim the tongue's full meaning,
My eager soul yields up for thee the prayer
Which springs from love's unchanged and fervent dreaming.

ANNETTE, THE HEIRESS;

OR,

THE FORAGING PARTY.

A TALE OF THE LAST WAR.

BY J. H. INGRAHAM.

Edward Ogilvie was the youngest of five brave brothers who served their country, both in the field and on the sea during the last war. Their mother was a widow of comfortable estate, who dwelt in a pleasant homestead facing the waters of Boston Bay. Large elms overshadowed the roof, and broad fields interspersed with woodlands extended away on the right, till they met the fields and woodlands of the property of Squire Harwood, a man of substantial wealth, who had an only daughter of eighteen, who was a belle and an heiress. The road from the homestead of widow Ogilvie wound along the seabeach, with a hedge and green fields on one side bordering it, and the white, sparkling sand and blue waves on the other. The distance between the two mountains was little less than a mile; and about half way between was a bridge of stone spanning a small rivulet, that had a course of half a dozen miles from the interior.

It was about an hour before sunset, near the close of the war, in the month of October, that Edward Ogilvie was crossing this bridge on his way to visit Annette Harwood, the beauty and heiress; for the charms of the rustic belle had taken captive the young student's heart; and every evening for the last month he had directed his walk in the direction of her abode. Edward was in his twentieth year, of good figure, of a pleasing but somewhat diffident address, and with that calm, meditative aspect peculiar to students; for such was this young man. Annette was not loved without giving her heart in return; but the Squire, although he had observed with apparent indifference this mutual attachment, had a mind of his own touching a matter so interesting to the lovers themselves.

Edward had got upon the bridge, where he used to linger for a few moments as he crossed, to watch the flowing sea rush through the arch up the creek, and gaze upon its expanse of waters; or from the opposite side of the bridge contemplate the dark inlet, as it lost itself amid overhanging trees in a dell where stood a mill belonging equally to the two manors.

Edward had paused a moment on the bridge to watch the effect of the purple light of the western sky reflected upon its mottled bosom, when his eyes were arrested by a sail in the offing. He continued to watch it for a few moments, and then went on his way, from time to time glancing seaward to admire the stately and slow motion of its trackless passage over the ocean. As he came near the dwelling of Squire Harwood, he discovered that her course was towards the land; but seeing Annette on the piazza he forget the vessel to hasten to her. The meeting was more like that of brother and sister than that of lovers; that is, it was affectionate, frank, and free from restraint.

"We shall have a lovely evening to walk, the sunset will be so pleasant," said Annette, whom we would stop to describe, if our pen could do justice to her beauty. We will, however, say that the color of her eyes was a deep sea-blue, and they sparkled like waves glancing in the sunlight; her lips had doubtless once been a pair of cherries, stolen from Cupid, to make her mouth the prettiest mouth imaginable. Her smile was sunshine, her form sylph-like and blooming with youth, her voice full of music, and every motion as graceful as a fawn's. She was good-humored, intelligent, and suitably grave, and was just the maiden to ensnare a student like Edward Ogilvie.

"Yes, Annette, the air is rich with golden tints and soft as a June evening. Suppose we ramble towards the village; and listen to the martial music of the soldiers as they march from the ground?"

"I should like it of all things. My father says our company, the Blues, made the finest show of any on parade, to-day."

"He was at the review, then?"

"Yes, and acted as a major or colonel, I believe. At any rate, he has just come home, on horseback, in full uniform, with a sword by his side, and looks as brave, I tell him, as a crusading knight. He told me to hold my little tongue, and so I have for full a minute."

"And the longest time you ever held it, 'Netty," said the Squire, coming out of the house, his chapeau in his hand and his sword unbelted and beneath his arm. "Ah, Edward, good evening, man. Fine day we have had for the general muster?"

"Yes, sir! Are the troops dimissed yet?"

"Not all."

"We were going up the road to the hill-top, to listen to the music, father," said Annette.

"No—not stay at home, child," said the Squire, gravely. "I suppose Master Edward has asked you to go?"

"I did, Mr. Harwood; I thought the walk might be pleasant."

"Humph! Look you, young man," said Squire Harwood, bluntly; "military music is not made for the amusement of studious youths after idling the day over musty books, nor merely to please a lass sie's ear. It is the voice of the spirit of liberty, and calls the young men of the land to fight her battles, and the maidens to make them clothes to fight in, and colors to fight under! You, I see, like my Annette, and so far as I can see, she likes you back again. Now, Edward, you are a very correct, excellent young man, that I know; but you see I havn't but one daughter, and I don't mean she shall marry any man who, excellent as he may be, through all this war has never drawn a blade nor pulled a trigger for love of his country. Your brothers are all brave fellows, and serving her with honor. You stay at home to pore over dictionaries in the daytime, and come to make love to Annette by moonlight. Now, I have nothing against you, as I said before; but I've made up my mind Annette shan't marry a man that hasn't had a hand in this war against the English. If you are of a mind to follow the example of your brothers, and let me hear something that you have done I can tell my neighbors of with pride, then you shall have my consent to marry Annette; for her's, I dare say, she's given you long ago. A text, you know, is as good as a sermon, Master Edward. So, if you want my daughter, you know now how she is to be won."

"Thus speaking, Squire Harwood took Annette under his arm, and, bowing very kindly, but firmly, to the astonished lover, disappeared within the house.

Edward remained standing a moment upon the spot where they had left him, as if trying to realize what had passed. He then turned away in silence, his cheek burning with the glow of a mortified and sensitive spirit.

The profession which he had in view was that of a clergyman; and although not deficient in courage nor patriotism, he had suffered his brothers to take the field and the deck while he remained at home. The words of the Squire sank deep into his spirit. He walked slowly homeward, very sad, and filled with the painful idea of losing her who was so very dear to him. As he came upon the bridge he had made up his mind. He stopped, and, speaking aloud, said, firmly—

"If Annette is only to be won by my taking up arms, I will enlist to-morrow! It is honorable to serve one's country. I am not yet a clergyman, and I can therefore act freely. This is the last day the reproach shall be thrown upon me, that I remain dallying at home while my brothers are abroad exposing their bosoms to the weapons of their country's foes!"

While he was speaking, he saw that the ship, which he had noticed half an hour before at a distance, had drawn close in with the land, and had dropped anchor about a mile abreast of the inlet.—The sun had already set, yet he could see her distinctly, and discover that she was a merchant-ship. He remained for some time watching her, and listening to the distant drum of a detachment of the militia of the neighborhood, which was retiring homeward from the muster-field. The sound of the drum died away in the distance beyond the mill; and the low dashing of the waves against the bridge fell upon his ear.

"Well, to-morrow, I too shall march to the measure of pipe and drum! I will enlist as a private and make my way up. Annette shall be won!"

He paused, thinking he heard the sound of oars. He looked seaward, but the twilight rendered objects too obscure to detect any boat approaching. Yet each moment the fall of the sweeps came clearer and nearer, and he soon was enabled to discover a barge pulling in towards the bridge. His position, in the shadow of an overhanging limb, shielded him from observation. He saw that the boat contained at least twenty men. It moved slower as it drew nearer land, and a person standing up in the stern directed its landing. It struck the shore close by the bridge within the inlet; and almost beneath where he stood, the party debarked. He now saw that half of them were seamen and half marines, and that all were armed. They were commanded by a young midshipman, who, forming them into a column, marched them up the bank and on the bridge. Edward, as they came near, drew himself up into the limb, and was concealed by its foliage, while he observed with surprise their stealthy movements.

"How far is the grist mill hence, Sambo?" asked the young officer, looking about him after all his party had got on the bridge, save a man to guard the boat.

"The first mill am 'bout a third of a mile up de creek, and the to'ther one, where the most grist be, is a mile. There is a good path along the creek-shore!" answered a man, in the true Yankee negro intonation, but speaking with manifest reluctance.

"If you deceive me, darkie, you are a dead man!" said the middy, very positively.

"I knows dat well 'nuff, so I tells you de truth, tho' I hates to mightily! I knows all 'bout dis place, coz I used to lib here once! Ober dar is whar Squire Harwood live, and ober dat way am widdur Ogilvie, an' I wish dis nigger was safe in dark kitchen! I nebber go cook agen in Boston ship, nor no oder one a'ter bein' taken pris'ner by the British, as I am dis time! I wish I may nebber see blue water agen, if I gets my liberty dis time!"

"Hist with your noise! each of you march forward in silence. We are in an enemy's country, and must be cautious."

"Yes, I guess you better," said the negro, sulkily. "If de country people know'd you was skulkin' here arter corn, and flour, and sheep, and oxes, to keep from starvin' to death, as we have been a week past, they be 'round as thick as snakes in de grass, and debble one ob you get back to your boat! So, I adwise you, massa, to keep sharp eye to windward! Guy! how mad all on 'em be in de mornin', when dey find out you land here in a prize-ship wid on'y two gun aboard and thirty men, an' carry off clear to Halifax de grist from dese two mills, and sheep and turkeys, too, for de lieutenant's dinner! Dey sware den, and I expec' de Squire swear enuff for a whole regiment!"

"Forward!" cried the middy. "Silence, all of you, and advance swiftly and with caution!"

They filed off the bridge, and taking the path along which the negro led the way, they were soon lost to the sight of Edward in the gloom of the overhanging banks of the creek.

"These men, then, are English," he reflected, as he let himself down upon the bridge; "the vessel is a prize, bound to Halifax, with a midshipman and two-and-thirty men—twenty here and ten remaining on board! My course is decided on! It will take them an hour to visit both mills. Half of that time is enough for me. I shall know where to seek the militia party with the fife and drum; and if I can find twenty brave men among them to put themselves under my orders, I will win Annette before to-morrow's sun rise!"

As he spoke, he glided noiselessly away from the bridge, and, after getting beyond hearing of the man in the boat, he flew like the wind across a meadow in the direction of what was called the "Cross Road," a cluster of village habitations, the principal of which was a large country tavern where he knew he should find assembled many of the militia-men who had borne a part in the review in the neighboring town. This inn was about half a mile distant from the bridge, on a road in the rear of Squire Harwood's farm, across which, leaping fence after fence, Edward Ogilvie was now flying with the speed of a deer.

The tavern, as he came near, was so quiet that he feared that the men he sought had left for their respective homes. Seeing a light in the tap, however, he hoped yet to find some persons assembled there. Through the windows, as he approached the door, he saw that the bar-room was nearly filled with men. The next moment he was in their presence. His manner was divested of all excitement, and a spirit calm and resolute beamed from his eyes. There were at least twenty men in the apartment, most of them with knapsacks and bayonet-belts upon their persons, and some leaning upon their muskets; while the guns of the rest of the party were stacked in a corner of the room. Some of them were smoking, others drinking, and all listening to a long yarn told by one of the party, of certain exploits by himself, personally performed at the battle of Plattsburg.

On Edward's entrance, the landlord first noticed him—

"Ah—so you can enter a tavern on a training-day, Mr. Ogilvie; glad to see you. Though you are not much of a fighting man, I like you for you brothers' sake, who are all serving their country. But there must be parsons as well as soldiers, and every man to his trade!"

All eyes were now turned upon the young man. Advancing a little way into the floor, he said, with a firm tone:

"I am glad to find so many of you here assembled. If the brave men among you are willing to place yourselves under my direction for the next two hours, I will lead you where you can win both honor and prize money!"

"Spoken with spirit!" exclaimed several.

"That rings like your brother George!" said the landlord. "But what is it?" cried all, crowding round.

"Will you be led by me? There is danger to life and person; but I ask no man to follow me where I fear to lead!"

"The man has courage if he is a student," remarked one to the other with surprise.

"What have you discovered?" demanded two or three of the most forward of the men.

"Will you follow me and obey my orders, if I can place in your hands, as prisoners, twenty English seamen and an officer, who have just landed?"

"Yes—lead on!" was the general response, and the men commenced arming themselves.

Briefly Edward told them what he had witnessed. All was enthusiasm. Among the militia-men was a young man whom he despatched to Squire Harwood. In twenty minutes the Squire was on the spot, mounted on his horse, and armed with his broad-sword. Five of his form-men had followed him. Others came in from all sides.

Edward, with great coolness and skill, took upon himself the conduct of the whole affair. He suggested that the Squire, with thirty men, should cut off the retreat of the foraging party, and take them prisoners.

"And what will you do?" asked the Squire. "You are not going to keep out of the danger?"

"No sir! If there are twenty brave men here who will volunteer to go with me, I will proceed to their boat, take possession of it, and embark for the ship. In the night we can board her without difficulty, as we shall be taken for their own party. Once on board, the ship will easily fall into our hands, for the most of her prize crew are ashore! Who will volunteer?"

This bold proposition at first startled the boldest man among them. But in less than five minutes twenty of them had volunteered; and in two minutes more he was at their head, leading them to the bridge, while the Squire, with his detachment, proceeded to cut off the retreat of the enemy.

The result was in all respects successful. The English party at the mills surrendered after a brief skirmish, and were taken to the tavern as prisoners within an hour after the Squire had left it. Edward and his brave band boarded the ship without suspicion, and, after a short conflict, he was master of her. He took her, by the aid of the released American crew, into Boston harbor the next day; and we need not add that within less than three months, he was rewarded with the hand of the beautiful Annette Harwood!

WE'LL WEEP NO MORE.

'Tis time this troubled heart should learn
To weep no more: treasures fled,
Forgetting and forgetting on,
Till there's no memory for the dead.

What if perchance in earlier time,
A brighter dew-drop crown'd the hour
Must every pulse of memory tell,
The parting of the drop and flower?

And tears flow on, and vain regrets
For that which never may return,
While round our path, by every way,
A thousand living friendships burn?

The dead we may not bring again,
Or wake to life their sleeping clay,
Whose time of pain and tears are done
For joys that pass no more away.

They may not come—they may not come!
But we to them: when life is o'er,
Shall join their host, whose spirit bands
Fill all that bright, immortal shore.

While sweetly sleep as sleep they now,
The temples of our souls in trust
Of angel guards, whose circling bands
Watch round the slumbers of the just.

Then come, my heart, we'll e'en forget
All vestige of the broken flower,
And cherish each unfolding bud,
That comes to cheer the present hour.

For in that dark and threatening cloud
The Heavenly Father sets his bow:
Bright promise when the heart is sad,
And only sorrow seeks to flow.

And the pale mother yearns and weeps
From day to day: her infant lain
In the calm earth, whose bosom keeps
The striken bud from storm and rain.

And knows she not her cherub one,
A minist'ring angel hoverth near
To cover, with its wings, her sleep,
That e'en in slumber knows a tear.

Faith ne'er would treat the father so,
Whose angels sent to gather home
The bud, the blossom, and the leaf,
E'er yet the storms of winter come.

Behold, where now thy Willie sleeps,
A host of cherub ones are near:
While sparkling dew-drops crown the leaf,
And morning glows without a tear.

And birds rejoice in lofty strain,
And all the air is full of praise:
Come, then! dry up each bitter tear,
And mingle with our cheerful lays.

We'll go to Him across the flood:
We'll join him on that heavenly shore
Where parting and all tears are done,
And farewell sighs are heard no more.

DON'T BE TOO PRECIPITATE.

Herbert Hasty is one of those unfortunate individuals who always appeor to be "before their time." It is reported that his advent into this "vale of tears," was some two months earlier than the age at which the generality of mankind make their debut; but for the truth of this statement we do not pretend to vouch. However, we have incontestible proofs of his peculiar disposition, running back to his earliest infancy. But of these early indications of his peculiar temper, it would be useless to speak; they were manifold. At five years of age, Hasty was sent to school, but I am sorry to say he made but little progress in his studies. His alphabet was soon passed over, he was in such haste to learn how to spell; his spelling was neglected for reading; his reading for writing; his writing for arithmetic; and so on to the end of the chapter, and, finally, at the age of sixteen, he left school with a smattering of almost everything, and a knowledge of nothing.

As young Hasty grew up, the peculiar characteristic of his disposition, instead of being overcome or eradicated, seems to have acquired a stronger hold upon his constitution—displaying new developements and phases more injurious to himself.

Does Hasty go to an evening party—he is in agony all the time. He marks, perhaps, a couple conversing together in whispers, a little way retired, and he immediately concludes that he is the subject of secret conference. He advances to the gentleman and demands an explanation. The lady blushes, and the gentleman intimates that it would be better if Mr. Hasty would explain himself. Hasty begins to feel that he has placed himself in an awkward position; but he informs the gentlman of his suspicions, whereupon he is assured that the subject of conversation was of a more interesting character than it possibly could have been had Mr. Hasty been the theme. Confused and abashed, Hasty turns quickly away, when his ears are greeted with a burst of loud laughter, upon which he turns round fiercely upon the individual who perpetrates it, of course connecting the laugh with his discomfiture, and exclaims:

"Sir, you are not a gentleman!"

"And what the deuce are you?" exclaims the individual thus addressed, taken all aback.

"My name is Hasty."

"And a very appropriate name it is, too."

"Sir! Do you first laugh at and insult me, and then add taunt to insult?"

"I have no recollection of having laughed at you, says the gentleman, in some surprise.

"And pray, what were you laughing at then?"

"Hum! What was I laughing at? Why, I was laughing at a very witty story my friend here has just been relating."

"Oh! ah! I beg a thousand pardons;" and Mr. Hasty proceeds to apologize for his blunder in the best manner possible, which is but lamely after all, and he wishes himself at the bottom of the sea; any where but where he is.

But his trials are not yet over. His brow is feverish—the fresh air will do him good—he goes out upon the portico. But he still feels a little irritated, and involuntarily, almost, he closes the door after him with a "slam." Four or five young bloods are promenading without. The noise of the closing door, causes all eyes to be turned upon Hasty, and while undergoing this scrutiny, he hears one of the party remark, in a drawling tone—

"I say, Fred, isn't he green?"

It is needless for us to say, the remark was not intended for Mr. Hasty, but, notwithstanding, he applies it to himself at once.

"I'm green, am I; I'm green; you say I'm green!" he shouts, dashing into the midst of the astounded coterie, and seizing by the throat the unfortunate youth who had uttered the offensive words. What dire events might follow we forbear to speculate upon. Hasty is quivering with rage—he is preparing to dash his victim to the earth—but just then he hears uttered, in a sweet feminine voice, these words:

"I say, Lucy, isn't he green?"

This is too much. His hands drop powerless—a mist swims before his eyes—and with difficulty he supports himself by clinging to the column against which he leans.

But it would be useless to follow him through all the blunders of the evening. He makes miserable, not only himself, but every one with whom he comes in contact.

Hasty is now yforty ears old, and still a bachelor. Not that he is a woman-hater, for he adores the sex; nor because he has any objections to enter into matrimonial bonds, for he is a stout advocate of the marriage union. The fact is, Mr. Hasty would have married long ago, had it not been for his unfortunate disposition. He never could take time to win a woman's heart in the usual way. He always "popped the question" too soon. His courtships were always done up hurriedly, and therefore never well done.

Upon one occasion, however, Mr. Hasty did deem that he had finally linked his destiny with one of the fairer portion of creation. In fact, the vows had been passed between them, and it only remained to set the day for the nuptials.

With the determination of having this and other matters arranged, Mr. Hasty, one afternoon, stepped down to the dwelling of his "ladye love." It was rather an unseasonable hour which he chose to make this visit, if the truth must be told, but then he doubted not the relation in which he stood to the family would excuse the intrusion; or, perhaps, as is most likely, he took no thought about the matter. He entered accordingly, and without knocking; but what was his dismay and indignation, upon seeing his Seraphina in the arms—yes, in the arms of a tall, dark, foreign-looking man, who was in the very act of impressing a kiss upon her downy cheek! Ye Gods! what a moment! Mr. Hasty was brimful of wrath, insomuch that he could not speak—he could only stamp his foot upon the floor furiously.

This action was the first intimation he had given of his proximity, and his Seraphina and the foreign-looking gentlemen were, as might be supposed, "taken all of a heap." The lady quickly recovered herself, however, and motioning her companion to retire, who obeyed with a peculiar smile, she addressed Mr. Hasty.

"Dear Herbert"—

"Don't dear me," exclaimed Mr. Hasty;—"you're"—

"But, dear Herbert, I"—

"Don't dear me, I tell you. You're a coquette—a flirt—a jilt—a—a—so you are. You've broke my heart, so you have. I'll never see you any more. I'll leave you, so I will. You allow other men to kiss you; they may kiss and take you, too, so they may. You're no better than you should be, that's what I think; and I'm off, so I am."

Mr. Hasty reached the door, threw it open, and with a desperate spring bounded out into—a pail of new milk, which an old woman had just deposited upon the steps.

In his wrath he had neglected to observe that good old maxim, "look before you leap," and thus he paid the penalty.

Bestowing some curses upon the old woman, he gathered himself up, and turned, all besplattered and splashed, toward his lodgings. He had gone but a little way, however, when he was overtaken and accosted by the dark, foreign-looking gentleman.

"There has been a sad misunderstanding, Mr. Hasty," he said; "but if you will pause for a moment, I think I can explain everything to your entire satisfaction."

"You think, do you? Well, now, what do you think of that?" said Hasty, striking the stranger a blow between the eyes.

Had Hasty taken a single thought, he would have perceived the danger into which he was precipitating himself, for the stranger was a large, powerful man; but it was not his habit to take thought—in lieu of which he took a most severe drubbing from the exasperated stranger; from the effects of which he did not recover for a month. Poor Hasty!—for three days he was confined to his bed, enduring the double misery of his bruises and the consciousness of having lost his Seraphina through his own folly and unfortunate disposition. That he had lost her, was a point settled beyond controversy, the day following, by a note under her own hand, in which he was also informed that the foreign-looking gentleman was her brother.

This was Hasty's last love adventure. He has resigned all hopes of ever succeeding with the women; he sometimes sighs when a pretty ankle or a neat waist are brought before his eyes, but he stifles the emotion, and moves away from the dangerous vicinity.

Mr. Hasty has latterly turned his attention to politics. But here, too, his disposition leads him into many difficulties. He gets more curses from his opponents than caresses from his friends; more kicks than kindness; and more bruises than benefits.

He is growing old, too, "before his time." Gray hairs are upon his head, and wrinkles upon his brow; but years and experience have failed to correct his errors. While he is waxing old, his purse waxes light. He gives away of his substance to the undeserving without reflection. His enemies triumph in his decay, while his friends are falling away from him. And, yet, he is good at heart, and generous. Poor Hasty!

LINES TO AN INVALID SISTER.

I gaze upon thine eye, beloved, and mark its light grow dim—
And feel that thou must early yield thy spirit up to Him,
Who gave thee to this trusting heart, and bound with mighty chain,
My heart to thine, and yet will break each massive link again.

I've seen our household gods depart in silence, one by one,
And thought the reaper's weary task ere noon-tide heat was done.
But death is on thy track, beloved, and claims thee as his own,
And I, a weary, leafless branch, must tread life's path alone.

'Twere vain to weep, tears cannot bring a lustre to thine eye,
Else love for thee would bid the fount of bitter tears run dry.
Love cannot shield thee from the grave, else love like mine would make
The hand of death to yield its hold—for once his grasp forsake.

I mark thee fading, day by day, and know life's feeble thread,
Will soon be cut, and thou wilt rest beside our kindred dead,
And yet for thee I sorrow not, 'tis for myself I weep,
For I must dwell henceforth alone—when thou shalt fall asleep.

ONE DREAM
Better than a Dozen Doctors.

A PECULIAR INCIDENT IN THE LIFE OF A PECULIAR MAN.

BY T. MAYNE REID.

I am an artist, but the profession by which I "live, move, and have my being," is one of a rare and rather peculiar kind. It is not painting, nor poetry, nor sculpture, nor music, nor magazine-writing, though I make little doubt, that had I turned my attention to any one of the above, I would have reached a degree of eminence in it: but I followed the prompting of Nature, and embraced a calling which, though not of the first rank among the Arts, requires, nevertheless, mental development of a peculiar character: else it is completely unattainable either by study or labor.

In the year 1830, I practised my art in the city of Edinburgh, Scotland. Public attention was at this time directed to the striking developments that were about being made in the new science of Phrenology, and I had the pleasure of being personally and intimately acquainted with its most prominent professor, the celebrated Dr. Combe. I was a frequent visitor at his house, where I had the honor of associating with some of the most noted savans of the day—gentlemen of literary and scientific eminence, who resided in the Scotch Athens.

Reader, mine is, perhaps, the strangest shaped head you ever saw. It is oblong like a water-melon, of a good size, and on the super-cranium more square than round, possessing angular bumps not to be found in the Phrenological chart. To this queer physiological development, I attribute the talents and taste I possess for my peculiar profession, and so did Combe. It is not to be wondered at then, that my "cocoa," inspired the Doctor with interest and admiration, and that in many of our familiar conversations, it held a prominent rank. Indeed the learned doctor had frequently, though very delicately, offered hints that he should like to have a cast, which hint I as frequently, and with equal delicacy, had refused to take.

The truth is, I could not bear the idea of having my head, odd as it was, bolstered up in a mess of gypsum; making one feel as, I could easily imagine, half smothered and suffocated.

I had imbibed a decided aversion to plaster of Paris. I could fancy the limy stuff oozing into my eyes and causing pungent pain, like the sensations produced by soap—I could feel it in my nostrils and mouth, half choking me, and on the back of my neck cold and clammy like—pah! I came at once to the determination, in spite of the Doctor's insinuations about the benefit of science, that plaster of Paris should ever encase my living skull. Pursuant to this resolve, I was sitting one morning in my studio in the Canongate, when a servant rang the bell, and, entering, handed me a note. I found it to be an invitation to dinner, at the house of Dr. Combe—time, five o'clock. I returned an affirmative answer, and at the appointed hour, presented myself at the professor's house. I found assembled a select company of gentleman—all men of science, and several of them, like Combe himself, professors in the University. They were all more or less believers and advocates of the new science; and after the cloth was removed, the conversation turned principally upon this topic. Some of the party drank wine, others did not. They were all, however, in excellent humor, partaking freely of that hilarious disposition, for which the literateurs of the Scotch Athens have become so justly celebrated. Being acquainted with most of the party, I entered fully into the spirit of their mirth.

"Mr. E.," said the Doctor, addressing me, after the conversation had continued about an hour, "you are aware that the physical development of your head is somewhat different from the ordinary formation, and that your intellectual faculties, seemingly in consequence, have taken a somewhat remarkable direction—you will not then be offended, when I inform you that my scientific brethren here, and myself, have concluded to ask you for a certain favor?"

"I shall not be offended, Doctor, at any request that could come from such a source—but I fear me that you must be satisfied with a refusal, as I already guess the favor you would ask."

"What is it?" inquired they.

"You want my head?"

"A fac simile of it, my dear E.; you shall have your head—we only want a cast of it!"

"You cannot have it, gentleman—I object."

"But, my dear E., for the benefit of science—consider"——

"I have considered. I regret I cannot comply with your wishes."

"But what reason, E.?" asked the Doctor.

"Why, the truth is, Doctor, I have a horror of the operation—but hear me, gentlemen: though I cannot consent to let you make a mould of my living head, I am not particularly anxious that the worms should make mould of it when dead, and whensoever that melancholy event comes about, you shall have head, body, and all, to make casts, busts, and even full length statues on, if your pleasure; and you may embalm my body or dissect it, and wire it which-ever may please you, and you may clean my skull, and line and figure it, or make a foot-ball out of it! Now, gentlemen, what more can you want?"

"But, my dear sir!" cried out several of them, in the midst of a roar of laughter, "we will all be in our comfortable graves before such an event could happen."

"No likelihood of that. I am older than most of you, and exposed to more vicissitudes."

"But your profession will carry you over the world, and death may meet you a thousand miles from Edinburgh!"

"All the same, gentlemen! all the same! I here promise you that, no matter in what part of the world death may reach me, my last request shall be that my remains be transmitted to Dr. Combe and his brother professors of the University of Edinburgh. Now, gentlemen, you have heard my resolve!"

A loud peal of laughter, loud as intellectual lungs are capable of giving, was the only answer, and the remainder of the evening was spent with the utmost hilarity and pleasure.

A few weeks afterwards, I shook hands with my Edinburgh friends, and departed for the town of Glasgow.

One evening, in the month of November, I was walking leisurely along the Clyde, looking at the busy and ever-varying scenes that presented themselves on the bosom of the beautiful river.

My attention was attracted by a crowd, who had gathered around some object on the bank. I sauntered on towards them, and when I approached, found the coroner and his jury holding inquest upon a human body that had just been taken out of the water dead. It was the corpse of a criminal that had been discovered in trying to make his escape.

"Where will they bury him?" asked one.

"Bury him!—Bury a murderer? No—no! Christian burial is not for such as him!"

"What then, neighbor?"

"Why he'll go to the doctors, and be dissected!"

"He'll go to the doctors, and be dissected!" was my involuntary colloquy, as I turned on my heel and walked away from the disgusting spectacle. The words had made an impression upon me, and I could not help thinking of the promise I had made to my Edinburgh friends. A feeling of awe crept over me, and I could not repress an involuntary shudder at the idea of being classed with maniacs and murderers, and "taken to the doctors, to be dissected." I walked off in a kind of reverie, full of melancholy forebodings, from which I was awakened by the noise of two or three drops of rain falling heavily upon the crown of my hat. On looking around, and calculating the distance I had still to walk, I perceived that I was fairly "caught in a shower." It had become intensely cold, too, and as I had left my cloak at my lodgings, I was completely exposed to the bitter elements. All at once came on a heavy dash of rain and sleet, which blew directly in my face, pattering unmercifully against my cheeks. As I was nearly wet through, at the "first onslaught" of the storm, I did not value the shelter of a house, knowing that there would be little chance of dry garments, so I kept on towards my lodgings. When I placed my hand on the door bell, I was so numbed with cold, and wet, and exhaustion, that my fingers would scarce discharge the office of pulling it, and, to add to my misery, the fire that should have been burning in my studio, being neglected in my absence, had gone out. I was not long, however, in divesting myself of my soaked habiliments, and crawled into bed; but the severe exposure, to which I had been hitherto unused, was too much for me, and a chill, succeeded by a high and malignant fever, was the consequence, and from that hour I was stretched upon a bed of sickness.

"Three months from the date of my dinner with the doctors, I lay upon my couch in the last stage of an incurable malady. The physicians, of whom there were several in attendance, had failed to discover my disease, but the symptoms of death were evident, and they had just retired from the room, having executed their last solemn duty of informing me that there was no hope of my recovery. Of this I myself had been satisfied, previous to their making this declaration, and I was quietly awaiting my last. My breathing was momentarily becoming more difficult and painful; and it seemed as though the passage, through which I inhaled, was closing up.—A single friend—the only one in Glasgow with whom I was sufficiently acquainted to entrust my fortune—sat by my bedside. He had been kind and attentive to me during my illness, and had drawn up my last will and testament, which had just been signed, and in which, after my own children, he had been remembered. They, poor boys, were far distant in another land, and little thought that at that time their only parent was prostrate upon the bed of death! When I thought of them, of their affectionate grief—for I knew that they loved me tenderly—when I thought of their dear mother, who had gone but a short time before me—the hot tear stole over my burning cheek, and then only was death armed with terrors.

My friend (Rowson was his name) sat gazing at me with a sort of awkward earnestness, which I could not comprehend. He evidently wished to say something, which he at the same time feared might give me pain. I could perceive this in spite of my debilitated condition.

"What is it, Rowson?" said I, feebly, at the same time motioning him to proceed.

"It is painful to intrude the subject upon you," replied he, "but your firmness has encouraged me—you have not as yet given me any directions as to the name or place of your burial—you may have some desires?"

I remained silent. Rowson continued—

"If you but state the place, and whether you wish any particular ceremony, it shall be attend to."

He was again silent, and waited my reply.

"I do not wish to be buried, Rowson!"

"Dear E., what mean you?"

"Send me to the doctors, to be dissected!"

Rowson started from his seat as though a shot had passed through his brain, and I could hear him mutter, as he gazed pityingly on me—

"Poor E.! he has lost it—it has gone—gone!"

"What is gone, Rowson?" enquired I.

"Oh, nothing—nothing," said he, somewhat confusedly.

"I understand you, my friend: you meant that my reason was gone."

"I could not have meant that, E."

"Yes, but you did, Rowson. I will explain what seems strange to you, but first promise me that when I convince you that I am in the perfect exercise of my reason, you will fulfil my dying request?"

"If in my power, I will fulfil it—I promise."

"It will be perfectly in your power—hear it. As soon as I have ceased to exist, order a large case six feet by four—have it properly and strongly put together—place my body in this case in such a manner that it will not be jolted by carriage—screw down the lid, and, in a plain and legible letter, direct to—'Dr. Combe and the professors of the Edinburg University, with the parting respects of Mr. E.'"

After giving these directions, I looked toward

Rowson. There was a kind of a "holy horror" depicted in his countenance, and he evidently still doubted my sanity.

"But, my dear E.," said he, at length, "what can you mean by this?"

I then related the scene at the dinner of the doctors, and reminded Rowson of my promise.

"But it is a foolish whim—reject it, E.; no one will blame you for breaking such a promise."

"I will keep it."

"But your children, E.; think of it; they will yet visit the University—they will look upon your bones exposed, wired—horrid! do not will me the performance of such a duty!"

"Rowson, I have kept my promise—remember yours!"

"Enough—it shall be done."

"Who are these that are gathering around?—who are they, Rowson?"

My sight was fast failing, but I could see several forms stealthily approach my bed-side.

"They are only your physicians, E.; they wish as a last resource to try leeches."

"Well—but it is needless; they cannot save me."

And with the exhaustion of so much conversation, I fell into a half waking, half dreaming sleep.

* * * * * *

Stretched on my back upon a table near the centre of a large hall, I lay to all appearance dead—but I was not; I was full of life and sense, though I could neither speak, nor move, nor breathe, to signify this to those around me! The hall was lit up with numerous large candles. There were many gentlemen present (all apparently professional men) who crowded around me, and gazed upon what they supposed was my corpse! Among them were Dr. Combe, and my former acquaintances of the University. They one by one examined the conformation of my head, pressing their fingers down upon the bumps, and measuring my cranium with a tape.—My head seemed to be the principal object of their attention. "They are going," thought I, "to make a cast of it; it is wrong—it is rascally! I promised them a cast, but not till after my death. I am not dead—I am tied down—motionless; it is villainous, gentlemen, villainous and unfair!"

But they did not heed me. I could neither speak, nor move, nor breathe—I could only think! I was now interrupted. A man with his coat off and sleeves rolled up to his elbows, approached the table. He carried a vessel, which I could perceive contained gypsum or plaster of Paris. I was horrified when I saw this. They will blind me—they will choke me with the nasty stuff—but I cannot prevent them; they have tied me tight—tight—every limb, every muscle—all, but my soul!

I felt the cold clammy paste over my head, and on my face and neck, and for some minutes I could hear and see no more! At length it was removed. The same man, with the rolled up sleeves, washed away the particles that adhered to my cheeks, and I was once more sentient. I could see the cast they had taken. It was in the hands of Dr. Combe, and he was explaining something to his fellows. He then laid it upon the table, and once more turned toward me. So did the others. He took up an instrument and approached me. O God! the instrument was a scalpel! "Can it be that they are going"— I was interrupted by the voice of Combe, calling out in a jovial manner:

"Now, gentlemen, let us cut him up!"

"Horror!—horror!" but in vain did I cry horror! They neither heard nor heeded.

They crowded around me, Combe still brandishing the scalpel.

"Villain!—wretch!—homicide!—murderer! was this in our contract? You shall answer for it, Combe!"

It was all in vain—he did not pay the slightest attention to what I was saying, but proceeded to open my bosom with the horrid instrument. I could feel his fingers groping for the place of incision. I felt the cold steel resting on my skin, and then came a stinging sensation of pain, and with dreadful feeling I awoke!

* * * * * *

I awoke—but to find my dream a horrid reality! It was no dream! There was the man with his sleeves rolled up to his elbows, and with hands red and bloody—there stood the ominous group—and there were the lights burning around me. "O God! it was no dream; they think me dead, and are dissecting me!" This terrible truth now rushed with fearful distinctness upon my awakened senses, and collecting all my strength in one wild, superhuman effort, I raised myself up and flung the operator sprawling upon the floor, at the same time shouting in a voice of thunder and terror—

"Stop! stop! I'm not dead yet!"

I saw no more, having fallen back perfectly insensible.

When I awoke, it was like to a new life! I felt easy—in fact well; all pain was gone and I breathed without difficulty! So great was my pleasure and physical enjoyment, that I was for some time doubtful whether I was still upon the earth or transformed to a happier state of being! I was soon relieved of this uncertainty by hearing a voice which I knew to be Ronson's exclaiming—

"Astonishing, gentlemen! he respires freely and easily!"

"It is very strange!" said one, "it could not have been the leeches."

"No, no, impossible!—such an effect could never take place!" observed a third.

I opened my eyes, and instead of finding myself in the dissecting room of the Edinburgh University, I was lying on my couch in Glasgow. Several faces and forms were around me, whom I recognized as my attending physicians. Rouson was standing by the bed, and the man with the rolled up sleeves was picking up scattered leeches, and the fragments of a broken and bloody basin!

I at once comprehended the whole affair. The scene of the dissecting room was a dream, mingled and blended with which (on account of my half waking state) was the man with the rolled up sleeves, applying the leeches; but I had yet to learn what had happened to restore me so suddenly to almost perfect health.

I found this out afterwards. It was not the leeches, nor the doctors either—it was the dream!—aye, the dream!

Reader, if you recollect, I have stated that my physicians, from the first, were unacquainted with the malady that had prostrated me; consequently, their course of treatment had been worse than useless. It was occasioned by an abscess in the throat, which nearly stopped respiration, and would, consequently, by its increase have caused death. Now, the almost superhuman effort produced by the horror of my dream, burst this abscess, enabling me to breathe freely, and restoring me almost instantaneously to health!

Had it not been for the dream this never could have occurred, and death would speedily have ensued; so that in this instance, one dream was better than a dozen doctors, and forty le ches to boot!

"I am not dead yet," nor "a' weary of the world" either; and from my present feelings on the subject of dissection, I think it will be some time before Dr. Combe and the professors may expect me.—When you do receive me, "packed and directed," I beg of you, gentlemen, not to be hard upon my head!

"There is Nothing worth our Care but Heaven."

I saw one stand, but not in pride,
And gaze, but not in scorn—
She was a mother, and beside
The grave of her first-born;
Her precious one, in life's young bloom,
Was cradled in that cheerless tomb.

She stood and gazed—a burning tear
Came down her fading cheek;
The chastened and the bowed was there—
The patient and the meek;
A sob but ill suppressed—a groan—
Told the sad tale—she was alone!

Oft had she, anxious, while it slept,
Bent o'er its resting place,
Lest e'en the low light breezes swept
Too rudely o'er its face;
But vain her care—the tyrant Death
Had hushed, for aye, its murmuring breath!

One year ago—her home was then
A Paradise to her—
Her brow without a dark'ning stain—
Her eye without a tear;
And now, alas! the world has not
For her, one bright or lovely spot.

Oh! what are we—to what tends all
For which we hope or fear?
Go ask the bier—the funeral pall—
The dreamless sepulchre:
By each the same response is given—
"There's nothing worth our care but Heaven!"

THE FATED RIVAL.

A THRILLING STORY.

"This afternoon will seal my earthly felicity; I shall be the happiest man alive!" ejaculated Edmund, on the morning of the day on which he was to lead his Anna to the hymeneal altar.

It was no marvel, though Edmund exulted in the near approach of the hour which was to consummate the nuptials of two of the most devoted lovers the world ever witnessed; for Anna was possessed of every quality, mental and personal, which could be supposed to administer to the bliss of him who was fortuned to be her husband. But, independently of Anna's abstract fascinations, there were circumstances which must of themselves have produced in the breast of Edmund a peculiar attachment to her. Five suitors had importunately solicited her hand in marriage during her courtship with him: and among these was Melwyn, a neighboring nobleman, high in the esteem of his sovereign. But Edmund, though inferior in station to Melwyn and each of his four other rivals, was unhesitatingly and decidedly preferred to them all. And no less fervent was the affection with which he regarded Anna. His entire existence was bound up in hers, and the world, and life itself, when weighed in the balance with her, were found to be incalculably wanting.

The nuptial morn of the youthful lovers was one of the most congenial and pleasant which ever burst on the world since its creation. It was in the month of April. The superficies of the earth was beautifully carpeted with new-born grass—the garden, the orchard, the hedge, the plantation, the forest, all smiled in their new coverings. The sun poured forth his beams with more than wonted profusion, tinging the entire creation with an exquisitely yellow radiance; innumerable choristers of every species of the singing tribe imparted, by the melody of their warblings, additional charms to that bright morn.—Nature herself, in fine, seemed on this occasion to be jubilant at the approaching nuptials of a pair who were so worthy of each other.

The vassals of Emerson, Anna's father, exulted without measure at the circumstance of their chieftain's only daughter being about to be united to the youth of her choice; and as all were that evening to participate in the ample festivities of the baronial hall, they attired themselves in the best costume of their clan, and prepared to celebrate the joyous event with all becoming respect for their chieftain and the young bride and bridegroom.

The afternoon arrived, and at the hour of five, the beautiful bride approached the hymeneal altar, accompanied by her maids of honor, and the wives and daughters of the more respectable of her father's vassals. Edmund was present at the appointed hour, luxuriating in waking dreams of the matchless bliss which was about to be sealed from henceforth to him. The venerable Abbot of Kinloss, a man who was verging on seventy years of age, and whose countenance eloquently discoursed of his unaffected piety, stationed himself beside the interesting couple, and before proceeding to go through the matrimonial ceremony, he uttered, with a mingled air of mildness and solemnity, the usual behest of "join hands." The lovers stretched out their respective hands to each other; Anna's was white as the unsunned snow, while her beautiful countenance was suffused with a deep blush, indicative of her modesty—a blush which, if possible, imparted new fascinations to that unrivalled face. The reverend Abbot now commenced the marriage ritual. With uplifted hands, and a visage beaming with benignity, he was addressing his orisons to the Being in whose service the greater portion of his life had been spent, imploring His special benediction on the youthful pair now standing at the altar, when an arrow from some invisible bow infixed itself in his heart. That instant he dropped on the floor, at the feet of the party who surrounded him. All present were horrow-struck at the strange circumstance, and gazed on each other in mute amazement, simultaneously listening at the same time, as if by instinct, in the hope they would hear such sounds in some part of the large hall as would lead them to the discovery of the foeman; but the first thing that broke the death-like momentary silence that prevailed was the expiring groan of Heaven's aged servant. The bride fainted at the appalling scene; and while the bridegroom was in the act of raising her up, Melwyn, attended by a host of myrmidons, suddenly appeared at the portals of the hall, their flaming eyes speaking the deeds of blood on which they were intent.

"See to the protection of Anna!" cried Edmund, and he clenched his dagger in his hand. He burned to revenge himself on his deadly foe, but he could not so far master his feelings of affection for his bride as to quit her to engage in combat with Melwyn. Apprised of the presence of the unhallowed intruders, the clansmen of Edmund's virtual father-in-law rushed to the aid of their chieftain, his daughter, and her bridegroom. The hall was now crowded with foemen, ranged under two great divisions—each willing and prepared to shed the last drop of his blood in the quarrel of their respective chieftains.

The conflict now commenced with the utmost fierceness on each side; the clashing of the instruments of death might have been heard far and wide, till at length, overpowered by superior numbers, the clansmen of Edmund were almost all strewed on the floor of the hall, either already in the embraces of death, or momentarily expecting to be so, from the number and severity of their wounds. Edmund and Emerson defended Anna with a more than mortal bravery; but Melwyn and his leading vassals at last surrounded them, wrenching their daggers from them, and consequently rendered her further protection beyond the compass of human courage and power.

"Spare the two miscreants,"—referring to Emerson and Edmund—"spare the two miscreants, that mortification may be their portion," cried Melwyn, addressing himself to his surviving clansmen, as he seized the affrighted Anna in his arms, and proceeded with her to the door. A steed was there in waiting, which he mounted, and, placing Anna before him, he galloped off with his prize to his own castle, only four miles distant, followed by his vassals.

"Thou art now in safe custody, young bride," said he to Anna, as one of his servants shut the ponderous iron gate which fronted his walled castle.

On reaching his mansion, Melwyn led Anna into the most splendid apartment in it, and having placed before her the most delicious refreshments the house could afford, he pressed her to partake of it, but she refused.

"Is not thy foolish obstinacy yet overcome, lady?" said he to her, in a half-sneering tone. "Whether, think you," continued the haughty chieftain, "are a a dungeon and chains, or being made the lady of Melwyn Castle, most to be preferred?"

Anna was silent.

"Nay, young maid, hast not thou the use of that member so characteristic of thy sex?" said Melwyn, sarcastically.

Anna, who had but partially recovered from her swoon when wrested from the arms of Edmund, and who had taken it for granted that both he and her father had been the victims of Melwyn's limitless fury, implored the chieftain, in accents which were repeatedly interrupted by the irrepressible grief which swelled her gentle bosom, and which vented itself in an ocean of tears, to terminate her life that instant, as an act of tender mercy.

"A few hours of a solitary dungeon will perhaps bring thee to thy senses, and cure thee of thy regards for Edmund; if not, I shall then wed thee per force!" said Melwyn, and so saying, he dragged the agonized Anna to a gloomy cell, in which he was wont to incarcerate the persons of those of his vassals who had incurred his displeasure.

The enraged chieftain then despatched a special messenger for a priest to unite him and Anna together in marriage, but being some distance from home, several hours elapsed before his services could be obtained.

Emerson and Edmund, who, though worsted in the conflict between them and Melwyn's party, had been permitted to enjoy their liberty unmolested after the latter had decamped with Anna, began to muse on the calamity which had befallen them, and to think whether or not it was within the range of possibility to do anything for the recovery of the person of the bride.

Edmund was intimately acquainted with the localities of Melwyn's castle and its vicinity, and knew that after sunset there was one part of its walls defended only by one person, which to adventurous spirits it would be perhaps practicable to scale, and if they could succeed in this, and slay the sentinel, they might undiscovered enter the castle itself, and yet rescue Anna from the haughty chieftain.

The project wore a sufficiently desperate aspect; but Edmund—yes, and Emerson too, though comparatively advanced in years, were both in that reckless state of mind, which fitted them to undertake any enterprise within the confines of practicability.

Calling to their assistance, and acquainting them with their project, the most spirited of those of Emerson's vassals who had survived the recent conflict, the bridegroom and the bride's father accordingly armed themselves at every point, and hastened towards the neighborhood of Melwyn's walled castle.

The sun had buried himself below the western horizon two hours before they left Emerson's hall on their adventurous purpose. The night was exceedingly dark: hours had to elapse before the moon would show her visage, and not one of the countless lesser luminaries, which at other times bestud and sparkle, in the firmament, was visible to the eye; all were enshrouded from mortal gaze, by one apparently vast cloud. Emerson, Edmund, and their party, amounting in all to twelve, arrived at the part of the wall they were to attempt to scale, and one of the tallest and stoutest of their number placed himself in the position best adapted for enabling the others to avail themselves of the assistance of his shoulders, in endeavoring to scale it. Edmund, with sword in hand, was the first to make the attempt, and on reaching the summit, was astonished to find there was no sentinel there. Impressed with the idea, from the different voices he heard on the outside—and not being able from the pitchy darkness of the night to correct his error—that there were a vast number of regularly organized besiegers, the sentinel, instead of standing to his post, ran to the castle, for the purpose of giving the alarm. The remaining ten instantly followed Edmund, but the eleventh, not having any one to assist him to scale the wall, was necessitated to remain outside. Edmund's party were at the castle almost contemporaneously with the sentinel, and at the most important part of it before him.

The brilliant illuminstion visible in one of the most spacious apartments led them immediately to it. Edmund unceremoniously burst open the door, rushed in, and was followed by Emerson and others. There was exhibited to their astonished gaze, the spectacle of Anna in her bridal robes, pouring forth the agonies of her heart in deep-fetched, rapidly succeeding sobs and torrents of tears, and being supported by one of Melwyn's sisters. The lord of the castle held her snowy-white hand in his—around was a numerous party—and the priest, who had arrived but a few minutes before, had just enunciated the first sentence of the matrimonial service.

"Villain!" exclaimed Edmund, with his eyes directed to Melwyn, and flashing at the same time with boundless indignation; and as he uttered the epithet, he rushed towards his hated foe, and ere the latter had time to use a weapon in his own defence, he sheathed his sword in his bosom.

Melwyn fell prostrate upon the floor, but such was the jealous and deadly animosity he bore towards Edmund, that though he survived but two minutes thereafter, he partially rose up, seized his dagger, and aimed it at the breast of Anna, exclaiming at the same time, under the impression the thrust was successful—

"Nor shalt thou, scoundrel, enjoy her either;" but Edmund had already seized her in his arms, and the thrust which was made at her proved mortal to Melwyn's own brother, who, in the confusion of the moment, occupied the place on which Anna had stood but a moment before.

Entering the castle of Melwyn thus unexpectedly, and finding its inmates anticipating scenes of festivity rather than of mortal conflict, Edmund and his party found no difficulty—not even resistance—in carrying off Anna in triumph. The only obstacle was the massy iron gate fronting the castle, but a sufficiency of it was instantaneously demolished to admit of their exit. They reached home in an hour or two thereafter, and on the following day Edmund and Anna again approached the hymeneal altar, were united together, and spent the remainder of their days in peace and happiness.

BIANCA DE MONTI.

A VENETIAN STORY.

BY R. L., JR.

Bianca de Monti was the daughter of a proud and wealthy patrician of Venice, who boasted of ancestral honors in no small degree. Brought up under the jealous eye of an austere and stern father, Bianca led a weary and cheerless life.

In early life, the loss of a fond mother left her no female companion that might have cheered her almost monastic life in her father's house; true, he granted her every thing she desired, but what could atone for the loss of liberty, her isolated condition and lonely situation? Her father gave no encouragement to visitors, and treated those who had the courage to visit the house, with perfect coldness.

The darling object of his soul was to wed his daughter to some powerful nobleman; his patrician blood recoiled with horror at the bare idea of his daughter uniting herself to one of plebeian blood.

After looking about him for some time, he cast his eyes upon the Marquis Sansovini, a young sprig of nobility lately arrived from Rome, one who was exactly the mould for the haughty De Monti; for it might be said, one was the exact counterpart of the other, so nearly did their natures approach each other. To this worthy did De Monti propose his daughter, which the Don eagerly accepted, as his possessions were nearly squandered through his profligacy and debauchery; and the prospect of filling his coffers from the broad lands of the Duke De Monti, was to him a glorious anticipation: for Bianca, he cared not a straw—for the simple reason of his never having seen her.

The campaign thus being opened in earnest, his Lordship was invited to an entertainment given for the purpose, and formally introduced to Bianca. Her father had informed her of his design in the morning, but, notwithstanding she was wholly unable to enact her part. During the evening he paid particular attention to her, but she appeared to receive his compliments and flattery with perfect indifference, if not with disgust.

Her father's eye, as it caught her's at intervals, flashed in anger, as if to reprove her for her cold and ceremonious manner. Observing this, it caused her more embarrassment and confusion—so that the remarks of Sansovini fell unheeded upon her ear. At length, even his cold and reckless spirit saw and felt moved at her situation, and enquired if he could be of any assistance to her, as she appeared to be indisposed.

To hear even these few words of consolation from him, caused her to hope that her release might be effected without much difficulty. She eagerly replied that he could be of assistance to her, by conducting her to her father, as she did indeed feel very much indisposed, so much so, she considered it requisite to retire for the night.

Drawing her arm within his own, he wound his way through the throng and soon reached the extreme end of the room, where stood her father. Resigning her to him with an explanation, he bade them good night, promising to call in the morning to enquire after Bianca's health, which was listened to in silence by her, but warmly responded to by her father.

As they left the apartment, and when about resigning her to the care of her maid, he looked sternly at her, and telling her he desired some conversation with her in the morning, turned and left her.

When she had retired to the privacy of her own apartment with her favorite maid, of whom she had made a confidant, she ga escape from the fate that awaited her, and bitterly deplored her hard destiny.

As soon as Jessica, her maid, could recover from the surprise her mistress had thrown her in, at this unexpected exhibition of feeling on her part, so different from that she had expected—for she anticipated a rich description of the entertainment, of the dresses of the ladies, the gallants, and their witty remarks, &c., that she was thunderstruck at her lady's conduct—so soon as she could collect words, for which it was something uncommon for her to be at a loss, for she was celebrated for volubility of tongue, which, for spinsters in her calling, however, is the predominating trait of character, the questions were put with a rapidity truly astonishing: "Who could have offended her lady?" "What could it be?"—"What had happened?" and a thousand other questions of similar import.

When Bianca had in a measure composed herself, she related to Jessica her situation: stating that it was her belief that her father intended her to wed the Marquis Sansovini. And that with a man of the Duke's character there was no escape from his will, if once his mind was fixed. As she concluded, she gave way to a fresh burst of grief, as she thought of her lonely situation: no friend near her, of her own sex, to console her, save the kind-hearted and unsophisticated Jessica. As for her, she was in a perfect phrenzy, and vented her maledictions upon the Marquis, her father, and the whole world, for treating her lady in that shameful manner.

"And oh! my lady, what will poor Signor Alphonso say when he hears that you"——

"Cease, oh cease; your words harrow my soul.—Oh! Heaven support me in this trial, and grant me strength to bear it!" And poor Bianca gave full vent to her feelings, in spite of the rude consolation offered by the kind-hearted Jessica: who, finding she could not appease her mistress, joined in concert with her.

After Bianca had sufficiently composed herself, she sat down and wrote to the following effect:

"DEAR ALPHONSO—

"'Tis said the darkest hour is always succeeded by sunshine and joy: but alas! my case is, I fear, an exception. Since we parted, sorrow has overtaken me, to be more closely embraced by struggling to escape. Haste thee—haste thee, dear Alphonso, to console

"Thine ever. BIANCA."

This note she sealed and directed to Alphonso Romano, then absent a few leagues from Venice, entrusting it to the care of Jessica to see it safely conveyed in the morning. After committing herself to the care of her Maker, she retired to rest, but passed a sleepless and unhappy night.

Alphonso Romano was a Florentine artist, born of humble and virtuous parents. After struggling through his novitiate in the profession he had adopted, he gradually rose to a considerable degree of eminence; although not possessed of an independence, he was placed far beyond the reach of want. Added to his reputation as an artist, his many virtues rendered him an object of universal admiration—he was charitable almost to a fault, for he had often denied himself, to cater to the comforts of those around him. Nature had also been lavish in her favors towards him, for they were liberally bestowed upon his person. At a glance from his bright eye and sound of his full rich voice, many a light-hearted damsel had felt her heart flutter within her breast, and the crimson current mount to her cheeks. He was in fact one of nature's noblemen, with his patent of nobility direct from his Maker, notwithstanding he made no boast of his ancestry, his shield, which was unsullied—his honor was to him far above all the trappings and blazonry of heraldic device, so much cherished and worshipped by the Duke De Monti.

Is it to be wondered at that Bianca was deeply moved at one possessed of so many amiable qualities? Although her father had fancied his watchfulness had prevented Bianca from holding correspondence with any person without his knowledge, Alphonso and she had met, and passed hours together, for months before the opening of the story. Their first meeting was by accident, a short distance from her father's house, in company with Jessica, whither she had strolled towards sunset, to enjoy the grandeur of an Italian sky. Walking slowly along, they were suddenly alarmed at the appearance of two fierce-looking men, who left them but a short time in suspense as to their object, for they were immediately seized by the men, who commenced coolly divesting them of the ornaments about their persons; it was fortunate for them that Jessica possessed good lungs, for in an instant she made the hills re-echo again before the bandit who had her in charge could place his hand over her mouth. In an instant, as if by magic, a tall and well-dressed young man rushed from a by-path and seized the ruffian, who detained Bianca by the throat, with no child's grasp, and threw him on the ground, placed his foot upon his neck, and drew his sword in time to meet the thrust of the other, who had left Jessica to assist his comrade.—The robber soon found that as his passes were so well guarded and returned with interest, and at the same time, receiving a wound in his arm, he had no novice to deal with, thought proper to throw down his sword and take to his heels, leaving his companion behind.

The attention of Alphonso, for him it was, now turned to the villain who lay struggling on the ground, begging to be released, and venting imprecations upon the head of his cowardly companion, who left him in the hands of the Philistines; at the same time vowing upon his honor that should the signor release him, he would return the stolen articles, and ever more lead an honest life; he said he was a poor, weak, innocent fellow, easily led astray by artful advisers, without strength of mind to resist them—that it was his first offence and would be his last; stating that he was the father of ten small children, who, with their mother, would suffer from want, were they deprived of his support—and called upon all the Saints in the calendar to witness the truth of his assertion, at the same offering the trinkets he held in his hand.

Alphonso was hesitating as to the propriety of giving him his liberty, when Bianca, who had recovered from the fright the transaction had caused her, joined her supplications, with so much earnestness, that Alphonso was induced to release him. The ruffian rose to his feet, and with him his courage; for finding himself on his legs, he returned the articles with a sullen look and ill grace, turned on his heel with great indifference and walked away, without uttering a word. He had not proceeded a great distance from the spot, when he faced about, and flourishing his stiletto in the air, poured forth a torrent of abuse and curses upon the head of Alphonso, and vowed to have his heart's blood, should he ever cross his path again.

Alphonso made a motion, as if to pursue him, when the penitent turned about and quickly disappeared.

"What a rascal! How I pity his wife and children," said Jessica.

"If it be true," said Alphonso, smiling: "but I doubt his assertion."

Bianca was profuse in her acknowledgements of gratitude for the timely interference of the stranger, who received them with a becoming modesty, and seemed to be more affected by the dark eyes and beautiful features before him, than the overflowings of a grateful heart.

Bianca enquired the name and address of her deliverer, and, on being informed, told him she had often heard of him by reputation, but never before had the pleasure of seeing him.

Jessica was absolutely mad with joy, and gave way to her feelings in a different strain to her mistress. She said Alphonso was an angel from Heaven; but then again she resumed—

"What else could be expected from such a handsome young man but courage!" She had no doubt but the Duke would be delighted to see him, and be eternally grateful for his services.

There is no telling where her tongue would have ceased, had not Bianca blushingly apologized for the impertinence of her maid, and bade her cease her clamor.

Gracefully offering his arm to Bianca, he proposed to see her in safety to her home, which offer she readily accepted, as the recent event had left her very much discomposed.

Drawing her arm gently within his own, they proceeded in the direction of the palace. Conversing upon the boldness of the robbers to attempt so daring an act, where they might be so easily surprised—the gorgeousness of the sky, and scenery of the surrounding country—they soon arrived at the entrance of the palace, where they met the Duke, who was about starting in quest of his daughter: When he beheld Bianca thus approaching, with a strange young man, his brow became clouded, and his eye rested upon hers, as if to read an explanation of so uncommon an event. Bianca rushed to embrace him, and, quickly describing the adventure, she introduced Alphonso as her deliverer from the hands of the robbers.

The Duke coldly bowed to him, remarked that he was indebted to him for his kindness, and if he could ever be of any service to him, he would exert himself to the utmost; so saying, he made another formal bow, and, taking his daughter's hand, turned away and left him.

As they departed, Alphonso caught Bianca's eye, and in that look there was enough to repay him for a thousand such receptions as the Duke gave him.

He returned to his dwelling an altered man; the abode seemed cheerless and lonely; his favorite pictures and works of art had lost half their attraction, and remained unnoticed. The image of Bianca was ever before him, and seemed to mock the creations of his fancy that hung on the walls around him. He retired to rest, but even in his dreams her lovely form and gentle manners still haunted his imagination.

In the morning he arose, ate a hasty breakfast, and left the house in the fond hope of meeting with the object of his thoughts: but after wandering about the scene of the previous day's adventure for two or three hours, without success, he returned to his studio, to endeavor, if possible, to banish from his mind one whose position would effectually debar him from aspiring to: but it was of no avail—the weary hours rolled themselves away until evening, when he sallied forth determined to see, if possible, his enchantress.

He had just passed the garden at the back of the Duke's palace, when he heard female voices, and, on turning, beheld Bianca and Jessica issuing from the garden gate and approaching him. He was at that moment concealed by the foliage around him, but in a short time a turn in the path brought them face to face. Bianca started, and a deep crimson dyed her face; but it passed away, as she gracefully returned Alphonso's greeting, and replied to his tender inquiries after her health. She then proceeded to reiterate her obligations to him for his assistance the evening before.

"Name it not," Alphonso replied; "that act is a thousand times repaid by the pleasure I enjoy in seeing you recovered from the effects of the fright."

"Yes, Signor, and I myself am very much obliged to you, indeed, for saving an innocent damsel from those horrid ruffians," said Jessica; "and my Lady said a dozen times last night she would like to see"—

It is quite probable she would have exposed some little secrets, had not Bianca sternly ordered her to hold her tongue.

They had walked some distance from the palace, farther than Bianca had intended; for it cannot be denied that she hoped to meet Alphonso, and in case she did, had arranged her little plans accordingly: but she had been so wrapt up in his conversation, that she did not observe the distance they had walked. Suddenly recollecting herself, she apologized to Alphonzo for leaving him thus abruptly, as her father would be uneasy at her absence, and turned to retrace her steps.

At the name of her father, his heart sank within him at the recollection of the reception the night before by the Duke; but quickly recovering himself, he insisted upon accompanying her, at the same time pointing out the danger of returning unprotected.

Jessica thought it was her turn to expostulate, as she was an interested party, and loudly urged her mistress to consent: "for," said she, "what could two innocent females do, if those two ravenous robbers should meet them again?"

Bianca required but little persuasion to consent, and at length allowed Alphonso to return with her.

Without meeting any of the household they arrived at the garden gate, which was opened by Jessica with a master key. Bianca took leave of Alphonso, and was about entering the garden, when he begged that their acquaintance, so romantically begun, would not thus abruptly terminate, especially as living so near each other, they would often come in contact.

Bianca expected this, but still was not prepared with an answer; but stammering out some unintelligible words, said that it would, perhaps, not be proper to continue an intimacy with one, although he were her preserver, unknown to her father.—But it was uttered in such an undecided tone, that it amounted almost to an assent to Alphonso's proposition. His heart leaped within his breast as he bade her farewell, and he returned to his home in more elevated spirits than he had left it.

It was a most singular circumstance, some might say, that they met by accident, of course, in precisely the same place on the following evening, and passed the time away so imperceptibly that darkness was upon them ere they were aware of it. And so it was the next night, and the next, until their intimacy ripened into friendship, and friendship into love; their destinies had become woven together in such a manner that naught but death could separate them. Months rolled on, in happiness to both; they had pledged fidelity to each other, and vowed that death alone should part them.

Jessica was delighted with her office, as it gave her an opportunity for gossip, conveying billet-doux, &c., so that she was exactly in her element.

The morning after the entertainment previously described, Bianca met her father at the table. The meal passed off in silence, as she felt she was about to receive her sentence. And the Duke was silent, as if to cherish his words for something more important than common-place observations.

At length he broke silence. Bianca started when he opened his lips.

"My daughter," he said, "I am growing old, and in all probability I shall not live many years. It would be a source of extreme regret to me to go down to the grave without seeing you properly settled in life—wedded to one who is worthy the hand of a daughter of the house of de Monti. It has been a matter of great anxiety to me for some time past. I have been constantly on the alert for one suited to your condition, but have met with none whom I could approve of more than the Marquis Sansovini. It is my wish, and I expect you to acquiesce in it, that you give the Marquis all the encouragement that lies in your power. Depend upon it, you will find in him all that could be desired of a husband; so far as I can see, he is amiable, and obliging in his manners; and above all, he is descended from one of the best families in Rome. I suppose he will call here this morning to enquire as to your health. Be sure you give him a warm reception."

Bianca replied that she would receive him as any guest of her father should be received. As she was about retiring, he called her back, and said—

"Was not the name of the youth who rescued you from the robbers some time since Alphonso Romano?"

It was well for Bianca that her father's eyes were directed to the letter he held in his hands; for had a thunder-bolt fallen at her feet, she could not have been more surprised than she was to hear his name mentioned.

In a faltering voice, she answered that it was.

"I simply enquire," he said, "from the fact of having received a letter from the Cardinal de Mendici, asking me to introduce him into society, and further his interest as far as possible; he represents him as an amiable young man and an ornament to any society. 'He stands among the first in his profession, and is noted for his benevolence.' It is certainly a very good character; but, notwithstanding the high respect I entertain for the Cardinal, I cannot think of introducing him into society, as he calls it; meaning, I suppose, the society of noblemen; but I will endeavor to advance his interest, professionally."

Bianca could endure it no longer, but hastily retired, to conceal her indignation.

According to promise, the Marquis made his appearance, in great state, late in the morning, and was received by the Duke with all ceremony and parade, and conducted to the presence of Bianca.—She arose to meet him, when he tenderly enquired after her health, and expressed a hope that she had recovered her spirits by a night's rest.

The conversation was not a very animated one, on account of the feelings of the parties. Bianca's heart was too full to speak, for her conscience would not allow her to offer any encouragement to the Marquis, when she knew there was no prospect of him gaining his object: on the other hand he was taken aback at Bianca's reserve, for he expected to have met with a most cordial reception from her, as the Duke had informed the Marquis he intended to acquaint his daughter of his intentions towards him. Finding he could not draw her into conversation, he arose to take his departure. The Duke strongly urged him to repeat his visit, and desired him as a particular favor to consider the house at his command. Bianca took leave of him, and remarked that she considered it quite unnecessary to press him to call again, after the persuasions of her father, and that she was always ready to entertain his guests to the best of her abilities.

The Marquis retired, but determined in his own mind not to be baffled by this formal and cold reception, but to renew the attack thereafter with vigor. His estates were gradually diminishing by his gambling and debauchery, and it required some bold movement on his part to replenish his finances.

The Duke was in an ill humor at Bianca's conduct, and strongly censured her bearing towards him, and desired her, as she feared his displeasure, to be more cautious in future.

Bianca retired to her room, to while away the weary hours that would elapse ere she should meet Alphonso; for, had he received her note, he would have had sufficient time to arrive, as he was but a short distance from Venice, on a visit to an aged relative, whom he had not seen for many years.

When he received the note, he started, the colour forsook his cheeks, and he would have sunk to the ground, had he not supported himself by a chair. He immediately made arrangements to return to Venice post haste. It was but a few moments after his arrival, ere he was at the garden gate of the Duke's palace, and in another was Bianca in his arms.

"Thank heaven!" he exclaimed, "thou art safe, my own beloved; but what could have caused this hasty summons—does any danger threaten, or has something already befallen thee?"

In a few words she related to him her situation, and concluded amid a burst of tears. Alphonso was indeed troubled; and as he drew her to a seat, breathed in her ear words of encouragement, that he was as much in need of as herself, for he well knew the firmness of her father. After conversing until a late hour, endeavoring to console each other, they were forced reluctantly to part, Alphonso bidding her be of good cheer, for the cloud would pass away when her father discovered his daughter's happiness depended upon her own will in regard to her marriage, when, fervently embracing her, he tore himself away.

The Marquis set about his plan of operations without delay, well knowing that should the Duke discover his real character, his hopes would be blasted forever. Night after night he gave magnificent entertainments, which to her sorrow Bianca was forced to attend, as it deprived her of the company of Alphonso. In fact the caterers of pleasure were kept constantly employed, to win one smile from Bianca, but without avail. People began to whisper, and wonder why the marriage did not take place, as time enough had elapsed since he became her suitor, for such an event to be brought about, but she was almost as distant to him as the day on which she became acquainted with him. On many occasions had he pressed her to be his, as the world already looked upon them as affianced; but she invariably gave him some evasive answer, as she was not at present in any great dread from her position, and as she also daily met Alphonso, she became gradually more reconciled to her situation.

The Marquis had by this time become desperate; his estate was gradually wasting away through the expense he was daily under, in forwarding his suit. He called the Duke aside one day, and explained his case to him, and told him that if his daughter did not immediately give her consent to the union, he would directly drop the suit, as he considered it an insult to be thus trifled with by a wayward girl.

The Duke was much moved by the words of the Marquis, and pledged his honor that his daughter should give a final answer within three days. With this assurance the Marquis Sansovini took his departure.

The Duke ordered Bianca to attend him in his room. When they were seated, he told her he had brought her there for the purpose of hearing her views in regard to her marriage with the Marquis. "For," said he, "this trifling is quite unbecoming in a daughter of de Monti. I have pledged my honor to give a final answer in three days, and see, for your own welfare, that it is a favourable one."

"Never! never will I be the wife of the Marquis Sansovini," exclaimed Bianca; "my purpose is fixed."

The Duke expected some opposition from her, but flattered himself, by persuasive language, he would gradually gain her consent; but great was his astonishment to hear her speak so decidedly; he knew not what to say; he was astounded at her firm and resolute manner, and was for a moment incapable of utterance, but by the workings of his features it could be seen that he was in a great phrenzy. At length he spoke but in accents so terrible that Bianca trembled.

"Hark ye, Bianca," he said, "I have pledged my word to this thing, and it must be done; so in three days prepare yourself to accept the Marquis, or spend the remainder of your days in a convent, for my roof shall never shelter a disobedient child."

So saying, he left the room.

Bianca was placed in a fearful situation. The relation she stood in to Alphonso would never allow her to wed the Marquis, even could she overcome the disgust she entertained for him. The idea of entering a convent, to leave the being she madly loved was to her heart-rending in the extreme. Heavily dragged the hours that intervened before she could meet Alphonso. Night at length came, and the lovers met at the foot of the garden.

Alphonso was deeply moved as he listened to Bianca's description of the interview with her father. As she concluded, he pressed her to his bosom, and heaved a deep sigh.

"Bianca," he said, "it is indeed a fearful situation; but there is one chance of escape, and but one, which is, for us to fly and become united without the consent of your father."

Bianca started at these words, and strongly objected to such a course; but the powerful arguments offered by Alphonso, induced her to waver, and almost, ere they parted, to give her consent.

Alphonso arranged that they should on the following night repair to the neighboring chapel to be united; after which, they were to fly post haste, and take refuge with the Cardinal de Mendici, who had always entertained kindly feelings for him; with him they were to remain, until the excitement had in a measure blown over, and the Duke became reconciled, for notwithstanding his severity, he had a great deal of affection for his daughter. Alphonso was to appear on this occasion under her lattice, and give notice, by performing some little air, that the horses were prepared, and every thing in readiness for their flight: which Bianca was to acknowledge by throwing her glove from the window, in token she was willing to proceed; she was then to repair to the garden gate, to be received by Alphonso. Jessica was to await their return, to give some excuse for Bianca's absence, should she be enquired for.

THE CATASTROPHE.

It was evening, the soft twilight had given place to darkness, and the stars reflected upon the broad bosom of the noble Adriatic, seemed like dancing diamonds, as they ever and anon flashed upon its dark surface. The moon had just peeped above the roofs of the palaces which lined its bank and seemed to increase the gloom of their dark shadows, by contrast with the sky. The busy hum of day was over, and nought disturbed the silence of the scene, save the tinkling of distant guitars, or the plash of the oar of the gondolier, as he skimmed his light bark over the sea.

It was at this time a figure was seen standing beneath the portico of the Duke's palace, in the shadow of the building. Although the darkness rendered it quite unnecessary, the figure was closely muffled in a large cloak, with his hat drawn far down over his brows, as if for the purpose of disguise. At intervals he would start, and draw more securely around his person the disguise he was in, as he fancied he heard footsteps approaching. Satisfying himself there was no one near, he drew from beneath the folds of his cloak a guitar, with which, accompanied by his voice in a subdued tone, he performed a plaintive little air. After waiting a few moments, a lattice was cautiously opened above, and a glove was dropped at his feet; observing which, he smiled, drew his cloak around him, and disappeared in the gloom. He was soon at the garden gate, whither Bianca had also repaired, and was met as she thought by Alphonso, but in fact by the Marquis, who placed her upon one horse, when he mounted another, and rode rapidly off.

At the time Alphonso and Bianca were in the garden planning their escape, the Marquis called at the palace, and learning from one of the servants that Bianca was in the garden, strolled out there to meet her; as he arrived at the termination of one of the alleys, he heard voices in conversation, and as he approached nearer, he discovered one to be that of a man, the other was Bianca; and as the thick shrubbery rendered him invisible to the parties, he cautiously advanced so near as to hear every word uttered by them. He was at first struck with indignation at the boldness of the scheme, and his first idea was to rush upon them and secure Alphonso, but on second consideration he thought as there was no possibility of gaining Bianca by fair means, he would have her by foul. So, stifling his resentment, he determined to anticipate Alphonso the following night, and bear her away himself. The darkness, and disguise he should adopt, would effectually prevent his recognition by Bianca, as it was natural to suppose she would be in some agitation at the time. Pleased with the idea, he hurried from the place, and the next day privately engaged the services of a priest, to be in readiness at an earlier hour than Alphonso had appointed.

Alphonso arrived under the lattice a short time after the Marquis had left, having left his horses at a short distance in the care of a servant, and gave the signal agreed upon by performing a favorite air of his. When he had concluded, he looked anxiously for an answer from Bianca, but none appeared.—Supposing she hesitated to consent, he commenced again in a more feeling tone, but still no answer. He now became seriously agitated, and as he looked around him in agony, his eye caught Bianca's glove lying on the ground; hastily snatching it up, he shook with a convulsive tremor, for he knew that she had not made her appearance at the lattice since he arrived.

In a moment, he rushed round to the garden gate, where he saw Jessica anxiously waiting their return from the chapel. She screamed with affright at the appearance of Alphonso without Bianca, and in a few words, told him that she had gone off with a gentleman, whom she took to be himself. In an instant he mounted his horse, and bidding his servant follow with Jessica, dashed off in the direction of the chapel.

The place was feebly lighted, and before the altar stood Bianca with her eyes cast to the ground, about responding to the marriage ceremony—not with the object of her affection, but with one she heartily despised. The priest was progressing, when he was arrested in the ceremony, by the noise of horses galloping toward the chapel. The Marquis became extremely nervous, and, losing all self-possession, in a loud voice bade him proceed. At the sound of his voice, Bianca raised her eyes, and, beholding the Marquis, uttered a scream, and fell senseless at the foot of the altar. In a moment, Alphonso rushed in.

"Villain!" he exclaimed, as he reached the Marquis, "draw and defend thyself!"

The Marquis was a good swordsman, but no match for Alphonso. The contest was soon ended, even before the priest had time to expostulate at the desecration of so holy a place. After a few passes, the sword of the Marquis was whirled violently through the air, and fell at the other end of the room, and he was left wholly at the mercy of Alphonso.

"I spare thee now," he said, "but we shall meet again." And, lifting Bianca in his arms, he hastily left the chapel, mounted his horse, and rode rapidly off, followed by his servant with Jessica.

The cool air soon revived Bianca, so that she was able to sit on her own horse, and by that means their flight was greatly expedited. As they travelled on, their expressions of joy knew no bounds, as they discoursed upon her fortunate escape from the perfidious Marquis.

They rode until daybreak, when they arrived at an inn by the wayside, and halted to refresh themselves and horses; after which they resumed their journey, and in the afternoon safely arrived at Padua. Stopping only to engage post horses, they were soon on the road again, and the following day arrived at Verona, where they were united by the Cardinal de Mendici, who was at that time on a visit there, and with whom they proposed remaining until the excitement had blown over. Their cup of bliss was now filled, and all that remained was to pacify the Duke, if possible.

The Marquis thus frustrated in his design, was for a moment incapable of utterance; but quickly recovering himself, he picked up his sword, and muttering curses upon the head of Alphonso, rushed from the chapel, mounted his horse, and rode to the palace, to inform the Duke of his daughter's flight. His rage knew no bounds, and for a time he was perfectly beside himself, and soon was forced to take to his bed. He immediately gave instructions to the Marquis to post after them, and bring them back at all hazards.

He gladly accepted the commission, and collecting force enough to capture twenty runaways, immediately set forth. The party arrived in Padua but a short time after the fugitives had left it.—Whilst the horses were being harnessed to the chaise, the Marquis was pacing up and down the yard, and impatiently urging the hostlers to be more active, promising them great rewards for their diligence, when he was suddenly interrupted in his career, by three officers of the police, who advanced towards him from one of the servants they had been conversing with. The principal one respectfully addressed him, and declared him their prisoner, by virtue of a warrant he held in his hand.

The Marquis replied that there must be some mistake—they certainly could not mean him.

"I am the Marquis Sansovini," said he, proudly drawing himself up.

"The very person we want," said the officer. "You are charged with forgery—behold the warrant."

Burying his face in his hands, he groaned deeply, and sunk into a chair. The tables had now turned. The Marquis, instead of pursuing a pair of fugitives to Verona, was slowly conveyed thither himself—a prisoner charged with a heavy crime.

Some time before, he found that his resources were entirely exhausted, and that if he meant to keep up appearances, he must have money; but how to obtain it, he knew not. Forgery presented itself to him as the only resort, intending to cancel and destroy the paper before it could possibly be discovered, by money obtained from his future father-in-law. He accordingly forged paper to a large amount, which, quite unexpectedly to him, was discovered.

He was taken to Verona, tried and convicted, his title extinguished, and himself banished the kingdom. He died a few years after, in the south part of France, in needy circumstances.

Ten days had elapsed, and the Duke had heard nothing of his daughter. His anger had gradually subsided, and he longed to hear some tidings of her, for he fondly loved her, and required but little persuasion to forgive her entirely. Since she had left him, he had seriously thought of his conduct towards her, and seemed to think her marriage with Alphonso a heavenly interference to save her from the disgrace attending a marriage with a forger.

He was one day speculating upon these things, when a letter from Bianca was put in his hands. It was couched in the most affectionate language, and consideration for his health and comfort, and praying for his forgiveness for the only disobedience she had ever been guilty of.

"Willingly will I forgive thee," said the old Duke, as he prepared to answer Bianca's letter, "for I see the hand of Heaven in it."

His letter was despatched, and received by the penitents; and as soon as the fleetest horses could convey them, they were in Venice. The Duke wept for joy at beholding his daughter again, and slightly reproved her for giving him so much anguish. He warmly received Alphonso, and called him the preserver of his daughter's honor, for though she had not married a nobleman, she had married an honest man, which is far better.

The old Duke gradually became a very little more democratic in his ideas, but still stuck out for the honor of the nobility. In conclusion, we will say that he lived long enough to see the grandson that was to inherit his title and estate, and was often heard drilling the little fellow in regard to preserving his dignity, long before he knew the difference between nobility and gentry.

VARIATIONS OF THE ROSE.

Well pleased to see the roses bloom,
The muse demanded why
Should some the lily white assume
And some the crimson dye.

The cause was sought, but no essays
An answer could afford,
Till fancy, wrapt in ancient days,
The hidden cause explored.

Near where the tree of knowledge grew
In Eden's hallow'd ground,
A bed of roses struck the view,
And fenc'd the tree around.

Large sweets diffusing through the vale,
The milk-white beauties spread—
Their virgins' bosoms to the gale,
Nor yet assum'd the red.

While Adam strung the manly nerve
To dress and keep the ground:
His bride well pleased her Lord to serve,
Would range the garden round,

To cull the fruit, and tedd the flowers,
And mark their early bloom;
With smiling roses strew'd her bow'rs,
Which breathed a rich perfume.

This favorite spot her nurs'ry made
New beauties daily rise—
Her morning visits here she paid
To gather fresh supplies.

One morn (a fatal morn it was,)
She paid her usual suit:
But ah! from hence destruction rose,
She coveted the fruit.

Urged on by Satan's false pretence,
The chief and first of foes,
She dared to break the feeble fence
And trampled on the rose.

Unaw'd she stretched her impious hand,
The alluring sweets to prove—
Regardless of her Lord's command,
Regardless of his love.

The injured rose beheld the theft,
And, wounded, hung its head;
The snowy-white its bosom left,
And blushing changed to red.

Its foliage wept a dewy shower,
Which spoke some strange event,
Eve turn'd and saw the bleeding flower,
And marvell'd what it meant.

Awhile she stood and gazed threon,
Till, trembling, she withdrew—
Unconscious she had trampled on
The fairest plant that grew.

Here fancy paused and truth began
The wonder to disclose,
A nobler form than flower or man
Lies couch'd beneath the rose.

This only trodden to the ground,
Dishonor'd blushed a red—
'Twas "Sharon's rose" that felt the wound,
'Twas Sharon's rose that bled.

The atrocious deed no sooner done,
But Christ the victim stood,
In spotless white his godhead shone,
His manhood bathed in blood.

And hence the roses now unite,
To exhibit Him that bled:
This wears the justifying white,
And that the atoning red.

The muse these graces sought to prove,
And brighter beauties eyed,
Till lost in wonder, praise, and love,
She kiss'd the rose and died.

Oh, may my soul these blessings share,
In the decisive hour,
And ever in my bosom wear
This sweet, this lovely flower.

HASTY TEMPERS;

OR, THE TWO SECRETS.

BY MRS. H. MUZZY.

"Oh! put it back, sir!—do put it back! Nobody saw you take it but Elsie and I—and we'll never tell, if you'll put it back!"

These entreaties were uttered by a boy about thirteen years old, who stood beside a not very high wall that enclosed an orchard, and joined a small field, which latter separated the orchard from the public road, and they were addressed to a young gentleman who stood in the field outside the wall.

"Do, pray, do put it back, sir!" said another voice, silvery sweet in its tone, so sweet, that the gentleman leaned a little over the wall to look at her, for the last pleader was a girl between fifteen and sixteen, and the light of the rising moon showed a face and figure that corresponded well with the music of her voice. As the gentleman stepped nearer to the stone wall, the boy resumed—

"Now do, sir, put it back into the hole, or hand it over. I've got a very big dog here, sir, and he'll jump over if I don't hold him."

"The money cannot be of much use to you, sir," interposed the girl, "but it will be of great use to him that it is meant for."

"Money!" exclaimed the stranger: "I did not come here for money!" Then pulling a small packet foom his vest, where he had hastily deposited it, he said—

"This, indeed, is not what I came for!"

"What did you come for, then, sir?" enquired the boy.

"Why, then," resumed the speaker, laughing, and handing the packet over the wall, "I came here—I suppose I must tell you;—but, can you keep a secret, my lad, and you my pretty girl?"

"We told you we could, at first, sir," replied the boy.

"I came here for a letter," resumed the other; "but this is not the one I expected to find."

"No, indeed, sir," said the young girl, "this letter is for a—person who will be here presently, and"—

"But, if he is coming so soon, why not give it him yourselves?" enquired the stranger.

"You came sooner, sir," retorted the boy, "and yet you put your hand into the hole in our orchard wall for your letter."

"True!" replied the gentleman. "Then you have a secret too, I am to understand?"

"There is no harm in our secret, sir," said Elsie, "only"—and she hesitated.

"Only father is very angry, sir," interrupted the boy, "and he wont let us speak to poor Ned, nor"——

"Oh! hush, Tom!" said his sister; "don't tell about father—you know he's very kind to us—and the gentleman does not wish to know."

"No, my sweet girl, do not tell me all your little secrets: I have one already, which will balance mine," said the stranger. "You put a letter into a hole in the orchard wall, and I came to take one out of the same place—that is all; but I have a father too, who is quite as angry as yours can be: so I hope you will keep my secret, and I promise to keep yours."

The gentleman, as he spoke, again put his hand into the cavity, which accident or design had made in the orchard wall, and uttering an exclamation of joy, drew forth a folded paper.

"Well!" exclaimed the boy, "I did'nt think that hole was big enough to hold two letters at once. I wonder who could have put that one there!"

"It is a singular post office, is it not?" said the stranger. "But, good night, my young friends—remember your promise!" and, kissing his hand to them, he walked rapidly away.

"I wonder who he is?" said Tom, as Elsie, wrapping her cloak around her, sat down on the fragment of rock which was just beneath the large tree which grew near the wall.

"Some one from the town, I dare say," replied his sister: "but I am very sorry he has found out our hiding place. I cannot think who told him."

"Why," said Tom, "the person who wrote the letter, to be sure! as if you didn't guess, Elsie! You know it must be our boarder—but as father is not angry with them, I should think there was no need of being so secret about it."

"We do not know everything, brother," remarked Elsie, to which remark Tom had but just assented, in rather a doubtful manner, when they heard steps approaching through the field.

"'Tis he!" whispered the brother and sister at the same moment. Again Tom whispered still lower—

"Who's there?"

"All right, dear Tom," answered a manly voice; "I have it safe. Thank you, a thousand times. How is dear Elsie?"

"Well, and here, Edward, but I dare not see you," answered the young girl; "for father, you know"—

"Forbade you even to speak to me. I know it, my dear good girl! and you must not disobey him—we shall see each other when times are better. My uncle will hear reason some day. I am sorry that I was obliged to ask you to disobey him this time; but I could not help it! Do not be uneasy about me. I shall do very well now. I may be absent some time: but when I return I will endeavor to see you, and perhaps my uncle's anger will be appeased by that time. God bless him! and you too, my dear, kind cousins. Tom, your hand for once!"

Tom sprang up the wall, and not only his hand was offered, but his arms were thrown round the neck of the young man, and his tears fell fast upon his face. The example was contagious. Elsie jumped upon the fragment of rock, and reached her hand to be clasped for the last time, perhaps, by him whom she had always loved with a sister's fondness.

"Farewell, Elsie! dear, sweet Elsie! Tom, my dear boy, good bye."

"Farewell, dear Edward!" was repeated by brother and sister, and as they listened to his retreating footsteps, they sat down upon the fragment of rock; Tom leaned his head on his sister's shoulder, and they both wept bitterly.

"It is time to return, brother," said Elsie, at length. "I did not intend to stay out so long: but I could not help staying to see if he got it safe, after he came so near losing it."

"He would have lost it if I had minded you, and not climbed up to see him once more, and then I saw it was a stranger who had taken the money."

"He would have brought it back, brother, but not soon enough, perhaps," replied the young girl.

"There's father's horse trotting up the road, Elsie," said Tom, "and it begins to blow and rain terribly—let us make haste."

"Oh! brother, if father should suspect us!" exclaimed Elsie, "I had rather stay out in the rain all night!" and the poor girl felt that, like Lord Ullin's daughter, she would "meet the raging of the skies," but "not an angry father."

"We'll get in yet, before he comes!" said Tom.

The two children hastened to gain the house, and on entering the sitting-room Elsie was told by "Aunt Amy" that "Miss Cleveland" had "been asking for her." Elsie went up stairs to the boarder's room and Tom ran out to take his father's horse.

Miss Cleveland had been an inmate of the farm-house about three months, and had gained the good-will of the family, and won the love of Elsie, by the gentleness of her manners and the graceful ease with which she made herself at home among them. With Aunt Amy, who had superintended the household for many years, and supplied to the two children of her brother the place of their mother, who had died when the youngest was yet an infant, Miss Cleveland was a great favorite, perhaps on account of the perfect unconcern which she manifested in regard to her own particular accommodations. In that respect "the boarder" differed materially from some town-bred ladies, who seem to expect that degree of perfection in country lodgings to which they could scarcely have been accustomed in their own homes.

Miss Cleveland was much pleased with farmer Waring's daughter Elsie, to whom we have introduced our readers. The simplicity of her manners, and the beauty of her youthful countenance, added to the girl's constant endeavors to please and amuse her, had won the regard of the young lady, and she took pleasure in teaching her many things, which Elsie, though she was well educated for her age and station, had not had opportunities of acquiring.—When Miss Cleveland came to the farm-house, she expressed an intention of staying but a few weeks; her stay had, however, been prolonged to three months. She had been introduced to the family by a lady with whom they had some slight acquaintance, as a young lady whose health required country air; and they knew no more of her concerns, than that she was an orphan, and appeared not very liberally endowed with that which is a passport to most hearts, wealth.

Elsie found Miss Cleveland in a more serious mood than usual; her beautiful dark eyes looked as if they had lately been dimmed by tears; she spoke to the young girl with even more than her wonted kindness; and, after some preliminary conversation, she said—

"Elsie, I was sitting, one day, in the little arbour at the end of your pretty flower-garden; you and your brother came to the place, and were talking outside; you were not aware that I was within, and I heard you speak of a 'hole in the orchard wall,' where you intended to deposite a letter, and money, for some one who would come and take it. This happened nearly a week since. I will not ask you whether you have put your design in execution?"

"We have," replied the girl, with a promptness that rather surprised her friend.

"You are very young, my dear," resumed the lady, "and your brother is still younger; is it quite right to do such things privately? Your father, your good aunt, they know nothing of the matter. Your intention was to keep the knowledge of your design from your father. I am older than you are. I know that all actions that require secrecy, sooner or later, bring trouble upon those who resort to them."

"We were forced to be secret, Miss," interposed Elsie; "the money we put in the letter belongs to Edward; he is our cousin, and has lived with us many years; we only gave him back what was his own: he went away in such haste that he forgot to take it, and my father, when he ordered him to leave the house, forbade him to return here again: he ordered us, Tom and I, never to see poor Edward, or speak to him again—but when Edward wanted his money very bad, because he is going somewhere, and because he has no regular home now, he watched and waited for Tom when he went to town, and begged him to contrive some way to send him the money. It is not much, Miss, but it is his own—he ought to have it. If Tom and I had money of our own, we would give it all to poor Edward. So Tom thought of the hole in the orchard wall that he had noticed the day before, and told Edward to come there and get the money. As Tom was afraid to meet Edward again, and father would never think of that hole, I do not think he ever saw it. What you said about secrets causing trouble, Miss, I think is very true. I have felt very unhappy ever since we thought of disobeying father, and I hope we shall never be obliged to do it again."

"And why is your father so much offended with your cousin?" enquired the young lady.

"It is because Edward thinks differently, in some respects. Father wishes him to be a farmer, and thinks he is wasting his time in applying so much to books. And, in short, Miss, my father would assist my cousin all in his power, if he would follow his advice; but Edward dislikes the thought of being a farmer, and he has learned a great deal, and cannot bring his mind to it, he says; he earned the little money he has by keeping accounts, and writing letters for a gentleman in town. My father is very kind, but when he does get angry, he is very angry indeed: and perhaps my cousin was a little headstrong, too; but they had high words, and Edward said 'he would be under no further obligation;' and father ordered him to leave the house."

Elsie began to weep, and the young lady comforted her as well as she was able. She saw that the heart of the young girl was with her absent cousin, and she pitied the conflict between affection and duty.

During the foregoing conversation, Elsie's native delicacy had prevented her hinting to the lady her own reasons for supposing that she had had recourse to the same mode of secresy made use of by her brother and herself. She had not forgotten the circumstance, and if Miss Cleveland had alluded to it, the natural candour of her disposition would have led her to acknowledge what she believed to be the case. As it was, the young lady thought her secret safe, and the farmer's daughter trusted implicitly to the promise of the former, not to mention her knowledge of Elsie's having had any communication with her cousin.

When Elsie told her brother what Miss Cleveland had said to her, Tom shrewdly remarked—

"Well, Elsie, father is always saying that 'it is much easier for people to give good advice to other people than to follow it themselves,' and I suppose," he added, "that our boarder finds it so."

When, about two weeks after this period, Miss Cleveland took leave of farmer Waring's hospitable dwelling, she informed the family that it was her intention to return to the town from whence she came, which was situated about forty miles distant, and in a direction contrary to that of the nearest town, which was only distant seven miles from the farm-house. She took leave of the family, particularly of Elsie, with much regret; the warm-hearted girl shed many tears at parting with their gentle inmate, and Tom passed his red hand across his eyes more than once as he carried the lady's trunk across the field to the public road, to meet the stage as it passed. Miss Cleveland would not offer the boy money for performing an act of kindness, but she gave him when they parted a pretty brooch, which she had herself worn, and it matched very well with the small gold-rimmed locket, containing a curl of her chestnut hair, which she had tied round Elsie's white neck, suspended by a sky-blue ribband.—Treasures were these to those children of simplicity, and prized by them for the sake of the giver—not that their being so very ornamental was entirely overlooked, for Elsie found herself often handling the blue ribband, and Tom caught himself lowering his eyes to the bosom of his shirt, even in church.

Shortly after the departure of Miss Cleveland, Mr. Waring was surprised by a visit from a gentleman who resided in the neighbouring town, and who, the farmer knew, had the reputation of being very proud, as well as very rich. The stranger enquired for Mr. Waring, and when the farmer made his appearance, thus accosted him:

"Well, sir, I have come here on rather a singular business; it is to enquire what females you have in your family."

"Sir," replied Mr. Waring, "if they were taxable I should not be surprised at the inquiry; as it is, the question is easily answered—though why you should wish to know, is more than I can guess. There are two of them besides a girl in the kitchen—my sister there, pointing to Aunt Amy, and my daughter, who is somewhere about the premises."

"Your daughter, sir!" resumed the stranger, "then you acknowledge that you have a daughter."

"Acknowledge!" repeated farmer Waring; "yes, sir! I not only acknowledge my daughter, which I understand means owning her, but I am very proud of her, sir, and not ashamed to own that!"

"Well, sir, well—we shall see," said the visitor. "I suppose your daughter can write."

"I should suppose she could," replied the farmer; "considerable pains were taken to teach her!"

"Well sir, did she write this, sir?" enquired the gentleman, evidently becoming rather choleric, and exhibiting a folded paper.

"Can't say, sir, whether she did or not, especially as I don't see any writing," coolly replied Waring.

"The writing, sir, is inside, and I'll read it to you."

"Much obliged," said the farmer, "sit down, sir; take your time, as the song says."

"Then, sir," resumed the stranger, "this scandalous bit of a scrawl"——

"Scrawl is it," interrupted Waring, "then it isn't Elsie's, for the schoolmaster says she writes a very good hand, considering."

"Sir, I must say," resumed the visitor—"but I suppose it is your way to be rather facetious—but first, I'll tell you, sir, my name is Starton, sir."

Here the farmer bowed low, but, determined not to be put out, this time, Mr. Stanton went on.

"And I live in the next town. You may have remarked, sir, the large house with the marble portico, at the entrance of the principal street?"

Waring shook his head negatively.

"Well, sir," resumed the guest, "you see we are neighbors, only seven miles off, Mr. Waring. Well, I have a son, and he is the only child I have, sir. He is determined to disobey me. He says so, sir—and he left home a few days ago, and is still absent, and since he went away, this paper, sir, was found in his room."

"Did you send him away, sir?" enquired Aunt Amy, who had sat, till now, knitting away in wondering silence.

"Send him, ma'am! Why, not exactly. But why do you ask, ma'am?" said Mr. Stanton.

"Now do excuse me," replied the good lady. "I hardly know what made me ask, only I thought we should, may be, understand it all the better, if we knew that."

"We must not interrupt the gentleman, sister Amy," observed Waring, "or he will never get on with his story, which I acknowledge I am anxious to hear."

Whatever might have been Mr. Stanton's feelings, he repressed them, and continued:

"As I was saying, this letter was found in my son's room after he left home, dropped, I suppose, by accident, and the date shows it to have been written nearly three months ago; the letter proves plainly that some one in your house must have written it, for it refers to a hole in your orchard wall, sir."

"A hole in my wall!" exclaimed the farmer, interrupting the speaker; "I should like to see the man, or woman either, that dares to say I don't keep my fences in good repair. A hole in my wall, indeed!"

"Well, sir, hear the letter;" resumed Mr. Stanton, not sorry, perhaps, to see the farmer exhibit some signs of the irritation which he himself felt. And opening the paper, he read as follows:

"Dear Charles—You urge me to manage in some way to let you hear from me daily. I fear that is not in my power. I cannot send to the post office, you know. The only way I know of, is one that will put you to much trouble and inconvenience; but there is a place where I can safely deposit my letters till you can take them away. You may also leave yours there, and I will go every evening and look for them. I dare not ask you to come to the house, dearest Charles; my reasons you have in part. Patience is our only remedy. You well know the pretty farm house—the name, you know, is Waring; there is a field next the public road, which joins an orchard; there is a hole in the stone wall of the orchard, as you approach it from the field, just where a large pear tree projects far over the wall; the hole is about half way from the top of the wall; there, on Wednesday evening, you will find a longer letter from your own E——.

"P. S. Your strange messenger waits, or I should not be in such haste to conclude."

Mr. Waring had begun to look grave from the commencement of the letter, and now appeared rather uneasy. Aunt Amy looked as if she would fain speak, but a sign from her brother kept her silent, while Mr. Stanton surveyed them with an exulting look, the open letter in his hand.

"And so, sir," the farmer at length said, "you accuse my daughter of writing that letter. But here she comes to answer for herself."

And he beckoned to Elsie, who was just then crossing the garden. Elsie entered the sitting room. She had tried to confine her flaxen hair with a small comb, but the curls would escape, and fell negligently over her neck and brow; her blue eyes, beautiful in their soft expression, were cast down when she saw a stranger was present, and the color deepened on her rose-leaf cheek; her figure was graceful, though slight and girlish; she held, by its two corners, her apron, which was filled with a variety of papers containing flower seeds, which she had been collecting, to preserve against the time when she should want to sow them. As Elsie enquired in a soft voice, "Do you want me, father?" Mr. Stanton thought she was a very unlikely person to have written the letter he held in his hand. He had expected to see a very different figure from that which now stood before him—and he said, in rather a hesitating voice,

"I should think, perhaps, it would be needless to trouble the child."

"Oh, yes, yes," answered Mr. Waring, "I'll ask her. Elsie, my dear, did you ever write a love-letter to this gentleman's son?"

"No, indeed, father," replied Elsie, while her countenance expressed fear and surprise.

"Did you ever put any letter for this gentleman (Mr. Stanton's) son, into a hole in our orchard wall?"

"Oh, no, father!" replied Elsie—and she burst into tears—for she feared the time had come when she must betray her own secret, and the secret of another, which she had promised to keep.

Tom could stand it no longer. He had been sitting on the stairs, which were contiguous to the sitting room, and heard all that passed, and he would have enjoyed the evident perplexity of the proud gentleman very much, had not his sister's name been implicated. He now came forward, and stood by Elsie's side. He scarcely knew what blame there could be in putting a letter any where, for any person, unless "forbidden by father," but he saw that the stranger thought there was, and he resolved to stand by his sister, while he whispered:

"Never mind—don't cry—you know you didn't do it."

"Well, Tom, did you do it?" asked the father, looking keenly at his son.

"No, I didn't," replied Tom, unhesitatingly; "we don't know that gentleman's son—Elsie nor I either; what should we write to him for?"

"I did not suppose you wrote the letter, my boy," said Mr. Stanton, who now began to feel he was looking rather ridiculous, "but you might know who did. The letter is signed with an E. too; it is rather strange!"

"Why, dear me!" exclaimed Aunt Amy, "Miss Cleveland's name begins with E.—her first name—E. was marked on that beautiful cambric handkerchief that she"——

"Miss Cleveland!" exclaimed Mr. Stanton, "who is she?—where is she?—is she here?"

"No, sir," answered Mr. Waring, "but she was here. As to who she is, or where she is, I cannot tell you. She went from here about two weeks ago. She staid here about three months, or a little more."

"Do you think she was a likely person to write that letter?" enquired the gentleman.

"I cannot say, sir," replied Waring, "but"——

"She was a very likely person indeed," interrupted Aunt Amy, "I never saw a likelier young woman—her eyes were so beautiful, and she has such pretty brown hair. There is some of it in your locket, Elsie—show it to the gentleman!"

Mr. Stanton felt nearly frantic—but he made an effort to control himself, while he explained:

"I meant to ask," he said, "if it was probable she would have written that letter."

"I hardly know, sir," replied Waring; "there does not seem to be much harm in the letter. As my sister says, sir, Miss Cleveland is a very pretty young woman. Your son may have persuaded her to write to him, and all I wonder at is the great secresy that seems to have been necessary; but you may know more about that than I do, sir. But," he added, "if I find a hole in my orchard wall, I shall, may be, believe that Miss Cleveland made use of it to put her love letters in."

Tom here squeezed his sister's hand, and leaving her side, went for a moment to the window, and soon slipped out of the room.

"You need not stand there any longer, child," said the farmer, addressing his daughter; "your catechising is done now, I suppose."

Elsie gladly availed herself of this permission, and left the room. Mr. Stanton seemed unwilling to go, yet doubtful whether he ought to stay longer. At length he said, evidently making an effort to appear calm:

"The fact is, Mr. Waring, I fear my son has got entangled in some way. He spoke to me of marrying. I forbade it positively—he is too young. I cannot bear to think of his marrying a person whom I know nothing of. He hinted that he was in love, foolish fellow! and that his honor was engaged—worse still! In short, sir, he was determined, and so was I. He resumed the subject a few days before he went away—we had high words. He declared it was his fixed resolution to marry a young lady whom he loved, and who would do honor to any family. That is the way those boys always talk. At length I told him that if he married at present, and without my consent, I would never see his wife—and the sooner he began to provide for his family the better, as he need expect no assistance from me. The foolish, headstrong fellow took me at my word, sir, though he knows he is my only son, and that my money will all be his, if he does not provoke me too far; and after he left the house, and this letter was found, I thought it might throw some light upon the subject, if I came here, and"——

"Did you never enquire the name of your son's intended wife?" asked Mr. Waring, who had looked uncommonly grave while Mr. Stanton had been speaking.

"No, I did not," answered the old gentleman; "I was too much exasperated at his obstinacy."

"Is it not strange, Mr. Waring," he resumed, "that people are so determined to have their own way? If they would only hear reason, and give up a little to the wishes of others, how much more happiness there would be in the world! There's my son Charles, now! I have had so much trouble, and been so uneasy about him—but people will go on in their own way, and scorn to take advice; and see what trouble they bring upon themselves! I don't know where the boy is, and all on account of his obstinacy!"

To this rather unconnected and somewhat incoherent speech, the farmer made no answer; and shortly after, Mr. Stanton enquired if Miss Cleveland had left any direction to her present residence.

Mr. Waring told him the place she had mentioned, and added: "If it should turn out that Miss Cleveland is the person whom your son wishes to marry, I think he might easily do worse. She is a modest, sensible young woman, as far as I can judge, and no man need be ashamed of her as a daughter; except, indeed, his affections are fixed on wealth—and I fancy the person in question has but little of that."

Mr Stanton left the farm-house with little more knowledge than when he entered it, and, perplexed and unhappy, returned to his splendid home, where there was no kindred heart or gladsome smile to welcome him, and where everything reminded him of the son who had disobeyed him but once in his life, and to whose pleadings for love and happiness he had returned threats and revilings. "Perhaps," he said to himself, "perhaps if I had been more patient with him, and used argument instead of invective, he would have listened to me. I knew he was high-spirited and I should have been less taunting in my remarks. I drove him from me, and I have basely tried to throw the blame on him. I am very miserable!"

Mr. Waring searched for the fracture in the wall of his orchard, but none was to be found. If he had found one, he would have been almost certain that his former boarder had used it as the means of writing to Charles Stanton, and he could then have afforded a clue by which the father might have traced his son—but, as it was, he judged it best not to interfere in so delicate an affair, and though somewhat perplexed, he in some measure dismissed the affair from his mind, which was, to say the truth, rather overburthened by unpleasant thoughts of his own. He however said to his sister on entering the house—

"If our boarder did write that letter, she never found the place she meant to put the next one in.—That high-tempered gentleman has been made game of. There is no sign of any hole in any of my walls. To think of his turning his own son out of doors because he wanted to please himself in a wife! A tyrannical, unreasonable, passionate"——

Here Mr. Waring checked the expression of his indignation on hearing a deep sigh from his sister. He felt that he knew the origin of that sigh, and he abruptly left the room.

During the ensuing winter, farmer Waring was more grave and thoughtful than he had ever been in his life. He sometimes alluded to Mr. Stanton, whom he had accidentally met in town. On one occasion he said—

"I wonder whether he has ever heard from his son?"

"He must be very unhappy if he has not," remarked his sister. "It is a dangerous thing to turn a young man out of doors without money maybe, and without friends or good advisers. There is no knowing what evil courses they may take to. I would not have such a thing on my conscience for all the world!"

Farmer Waring sat uneasily in his chair and knocked the ashes out of his pipe with uncommon energy. Elsie hung her head, and dare not "wipe away a tear" lest she should be seen to do it. Tom whittled away most industriously. All thought what neither dared to speak: yet each one guessed the thoughts of the other.

To Elsie, the winter seemed cheerless and sad—she missed the cheerful face, and enlivening conversation of her absent cousin, and Tom seemed as if several years had been added to his short life, for at times even he was sad.

"I fear, Tom," Elsie would often say, "that we did wrong in hiding anything from father! Perhaps I ought to have gone boldly to father and begged him to send poor Edward the money he left behind him in his haste. Yet, he was so very angry and had forbidden us to mention Edward's name, that I had not courage! yet I think he would now be glad to know where our dear cousin is!—and, Tom, our secret led to another, and I'm afraid dear Miss Cleveland may be sorry too, by this time, for she often put letters there for some one. I saw her walk down to the orchard and stop by the wall, many times, before she went away."

Tom tried to comfort his sister on these occasions, but as he felt very much as she did, he could offer little more than sympathy. Yet, who that ever bore the burthen of an oppressed heart, will fail to confess that there is a charm in sympathy, however simple may be the mode of its expression, that never fails to give relief.

It was Christmas Eve: the family at the farm-house were trying to prepare for a "Merry Christmas," but none felt it to be so. Tom had brought in plenty of evergreens to ornament the walls; Aunt Amy had baked plenty of mince pies, and puddings, and cakes. The Christmas turkey was hung up, ready to be roasted. Elsie had a new dress which became her exceedingly, but there was something heavy at the little heart that beat beneath the nicely fitting bodice. "It was so long since they had heard from Edward—too long for such near relations not to to hear from each other!" And farmer Waring's thoughts were busy too—busy with the days that were past—with the scenes of his boyhood; of his youth—and this was the anniversary of a day, on which he had accepted a sacred trust. Just twelve years before, he had received from the hand of one, now no more, the child of his love; and the promises he then made were vivid in his remembrance. Edward was the son of a half brother, who, though the offspring of a step-mother, was beloved by him as much as if they had been the children of one mother. That step-brother was something of a scholar, and wholly adverse to the labours of husbandry. He went abroad in the world, and married a portionless girl, who, though amiable and lovely, was of a delicate constitution, and wholly unfitted for the rude storms of life;—she died young, leaving poor Waring one son. Always unfortunate, and constantly the victim of disappointment, the health of the younger Waring suffered in consequence: and when his boy was about seven years of age, he died. Previous to his last illness, he conveyed his young son to the farm-house where his brother had lived, and toiled, and prospered, while he had been a wanderer. He gave the boy to his care with many a solemn adjuration that he would aid and advise him as if he were his own son. The elder Waring had done all that he had promised, and more. But he wished to do all in his own way. He had a favorite scheme which he imparted to no one. It was that Edward Waring should, in time, wed his young cousin and establish himself on a farm near him, which farm was to be his own free gift to the young couple. There appeared enough of affection between the cousins to warrant a reasonable hope that the plan would succeed; but Edward had no liking for the life of a farmer, though wishing to oblige his uncle; he could never apply himself to its duties as if his heart was in them; though of a grateful disposition, and fully aware of his obligations to his uncle, he could never consent to adopt a way of life which he thought would force him to forego those tastes and pursuits more congenial to his feelings.

The farmer thought that the heart of his young daughter might be entangled by the winning manners and undisguised fondness of her handsome cousin, and his fears were aroused respecting what might be her fate, if Edward should continue obstinate in his refusal of the only means of a respectable establishment which he either could or would offer him; hence arose controversies which, till then, had been unknown in that tranquil dwelling: till, on one occasion, roused to an unusual pitch of anger on seeing the tears that fell from the eyes of his daughter at the bare mention which Edward made of trying his fortune elsewhere, and forgetting, in his wrath, that he had never disclosed to the young man the whole of his views for him, but only insisted that he should make choice of an occupation which he had declared was repugnant to his feelings, he so far lost sight of their ties of consanguinity, and of the youth's claims upon his forbearance, as to order him to "leave the house, and return to it no more, unless resolved to obey him."—To the proud spirit of Edward, these words were sufficient. The young man departed in such haste, as to cause difficulties on his first setting out in life, which led to the little incident at the commencement of our story.

It was Christmas Eve. Mr. Waring's family were trying to consider it a festival; but the master of the house rather dreaded the coming of some guests who were expected, from a place some miles distant, to spend the Christmas with his family—because he knew they would enquire why his nephew was absent. Aunt Amy secretly grieved lest the "poor lad should not be in a condition to spend a merry Christmas." Elsie and Tom missed their absent cousin, and grieved at the cause of their estrangement. As the evening began to close in, Tom, who had been out into the road, returned, ushering in a pedlar, who, as usual, stopped at the farm-house to exhibit his wares, and partake of the hospitality which, for many years, he had been in the habit of receiving, when going his rounds. The man exhibited his tempting stores, and each one purchased some small article, intended as a Christmas gift for the others. Elsie slyly bought a pretty pen-knife for Tom, who, in his turn, had secured a "splendid" ribband for his sister; and as the latter leaned over the pack to select some article that might please her father, the pedlar said, in a low voice—

"Here is something for you, my dear; somebody that we know of, told me to sell it very cheap."

Elsie took the packet, which was directed to her, in the hand-writing of Edward.

"What shall I tell him, if I see him when I go back," asked the pedlar, as Tom went up stairs to bring his money, and Aunt Amy had gone into the pantry to make preparations for supper.

"Tell him," said Elsie, "that we long to see him, Tom and I—that this is the dullest Christmas that ever was—that we send our love to him, and"—

The pedlar nodded his head as they heard some one coming, as much as to say—"Yes, yes, I'll tell that, and more, too!"

As soon as Elsie could steal away, she ran up stairs to her own little room to read her letter; and as soon as possible, after she had read it, she communicated its contents to her brother, and they both admired the ingenuity of their cousin in finding such a mode of conveyance. The letter ran as follows:

"Dear Cousins—The pedlar is going his rounds, and will stop, as usual, at the 'dear old homestead;' he will hand a few lines to my sweet Elsie, which is the only Christmas gift I have it in my power to send her. I have found employment here, which keeps me from want, but little more. I have a poor prospect, dear Cousin, of rising in the world without friends or resources. I must do the best I can for myself, and have to blame only my own rebellious spirit for my present condition. But I have news that will surprise you. There is a person here who knows you, my dear Elsie, and you, too, my kind, good Tom. In fact, there are two persons. One is a lady, who went to board at the farm soon after I was such a blockhead as to leave it; the other is young Mr. Stanton, son of the rich Stanton, at R——; they were married before she went to board with you. He told me about the 'hole in the orchard wall,' and Tom's 'big dog.' We lodge in the same house, and have become well acquainted. We both know what it is to be very poor, though he is the son of a rich man. He had a falling out with his father because he would marry the girl he loved; his father vowed he would never see her, and Stanton loves her too well to repent what he has done. I am very sorry for them, however, for they are unused to hardships. I wish he would try once more if his father would receive, or assist him, for the sake of his wife, who is not fitted to bear privations and penury. I think he ought to make the trial. I do all I can to comfort them, but my power is very limited. I think I would almost consent to bind myself to follow the plough all my life, for the sake of being near you, my sweet cousin. I am not fit to be the lonely, unconnected being I now am. I pine for the society of my relatives. I was, perhaps, too headstrong; but my uncle—if he were not your father, I could think he was rather hasty with me—but, God bless him! he was my friend a long time. Fear nothing for me, however. I shall do, always, the best I can. God bless you all. E. W."

"Ah, Tom," exclaimed Elsie, after they had finished reading the letter for the third time, "I wish I dare show poor Edward's letter to my father; but he would be angry with him for writing to us. Dear Miss Cleveland, too, is in trouble."

Elsie had many fits of musing, after this, and many were the consultations which she and her brother held together; and the result of these musings and consultations was, that Tom one day begged his father to let him have the horse and chaise to take Elsie to town, "just for amusement." Mr. Waring consented. Elsie and Tom set out, arrived safely at the end of their journey, stopped at a very large, handsome house at the entrance of the principal street; and there Tom assisted his sister from the chaise, tied the horse to a post, and making his very best bow to the servant who answered his ring at the door, enquired for Mr. Stanton. Being civilly invited to enter, and holding his sister fast by the hand, Tom followed the servant to the door of a handsome parlour, when they found themselves in the presence of the rich, proud Mr. Stanton. Tom again made one of his best bows, and Elsie summoned all her courage to her aid.

"Well, my lad," said that gentleman, as the servant closed the door, "you want to see me, do you? Come in—come in! Why, bless me," he added, "I've surely seen this pretty lass before, eh? havn't I?"

"Yes, sir," stammered Elsie, "you have seen us both; the day you called at our house about the letter"—

"Which Elsie never wrote," chimed in Tom.

"Well, yes, I remember," said Mr. Stanton; "have you anything to say now, my dear, about the letter? Speak freely. I shall not be angry with any body."

"Sir," said Elsie, "when you were there, I did not know certainly who wrote the letter. I had promised a person that I would never mention what I knew. I now know, sir, who wrote the letter—but I will never tell, unless you promise to forgive both the person who wrote the letter and the person to whom it was written. That was no harm, sir, none in the world. The lady is beautiful and good, and the gentleman must be good, too, or she would not love him—and they are very poor, sir, and they suffer hardships—and she is too delicate to bear them—and, sir, you are rich—you are alone; would it not be better to have them with you, to love and be kind to? They are married—they were married when she wrote that letter—and if he was disobedient, sir, you can have the pleasure of forgiving him!"

Overpowered by this torrent of eloquence, which received additional force from the pleading looks and gestures of the young speaker, who, carried away by her feelings, quite forgot to whom she was addressing herself, and that, in fact, she had told nearly all she knew, Mr. Stanton had remained silent, with wonder and surprise visible in his countenance. At length he said, still looking at Elsie, whose hands were clasped, and whose eyes were fixed on his face, as if she expected there to read her own destiny—

"Well, well, I am absolutely astonished. So you are resolved never to tell me of whom you have been speaking, unless I consent to forgive? Is that your condition?"

"Yes, sir," replied Elsie: "I will never—that is, I will never tell you where they are."

"You have been speaking of my son," resumed Mr. Stanton, "but how you have learned where he is, I cannot guess. I have tried to discover him in vain—I have tried all except advertising, which would disgrace us both."

"Yes, sir, so it would," interposed Tom; "and we can tell you all about them, sir, if you'll only promise to be kind to them, and let them come home, sir."

"And who employed you to come here to teach me my duty?" enquired the gentleman, in a broken voice.

"Oh no one, sir," replied Elsie: "no person, not even father knows of our coming—but, sir, I wished so much to tell you, for I am certain you love him, and would be glad to know, and I hoped you would not be angry with me."

"God forbid!" ejaculated Mr. Stanton; "I am hasty and violent; proud I have been, but my pride is humbled. I have suffered much! My girl," he added, taking Elsie's hand, "you may be the means of preventing much misery. Tell me, at once, where my son is, and I promise to forgive and receive him."

"Wife and all, sir?" enquired Tom.

"Yes—wife and all," replied Mr. Stanton.

Of course the required address was given, and Elsie and her brother drove away, much delighted with the success of their mission, and they entertained hopes that all might possibly be adjusted in another quarter.

Charles Stanton had become acquainted with Emily Cleveland while on a visit to a town at some distance from his own place of residence. A mutual attachment was the consequence. Charles knew his father was averse to early marriages, and also disproportionate ones, as he called them; he knew that he also expected him to marry a person possessed of some fortune, and, above all, Charles knew that in choosing a wife, of whom his father knew nothing, he run a risk of displeasing him—yet, knowing all this, he was so imprudent as to allow his affections to become entangled and to win the love of an amiable girl, who could know nothing of it,—but he flattered himself that he, an only son, and hitherto much indulged by his father, could not plead to him in vain. He knew his father's hasty temper, but he forgot that his own was far from being always under control—he forgot that if his father was proud, he was proud also, though his pride was of a different sort—in short, he forgot all, except that he loved Emily, and that his love was returned. Emily resided with a distant relative, on whom, as she was an orphan, she was entirely dependant, but who had not the means of doing more for her than to afford her a support, as long as she remained with him.—This person was now about to remove with his family to the "far west," as it was then called, and when that circumstance was communicated to Charles, he was nearly frantic at the thought that the object of his love would be separated from him, by such an immense distance. Emily, too, was much grieved at the thoughts of separation, but she told her lover she had no alternative, in answer to his earnest prayer that she would not accompany her friends to their new home. One expedient presented itself to the mind of the sanguine lover—to confess his perplexities to Emily, and urge her to consent to a marriage, which could be kept private until his father was apprized of it, and then, Charles said, he had little to fear. After much hesitation and many misgivings, Emily consented. One person alone, beside her relation, was acquainted with the event, and when they took leave of their adopted child, on departing on their journey, they greeted her as the bride of Charles Stanton.

What to do next, was now the question. Charles had a liberal supply from his father, but he had been educated to no profession, as the elder Stanton considered that his fortune was sufficiently ample to enable his heir to live without one. Charles wished to have Emily near him, while he employed his eloquence to win his father to his wishes, that he could hear from her frequently, if not see her. The friend before mentioned happened to recollect the family of Mr. Waring, with whom she was slightly acquainted; she made application, and they consented to receive a boarder for a few weeks. But when young Stanton broached to his father the subject of love and marriage, he found more determined opposition than he had anticipated. It was too late now for the young man to decide unyieldingly to his father's wishes, even if his own feelings could have been brought to consent,—but he loved his bride too sincerely to allow her to suppose for one moment that he repented the step he had taken. After the last attempt to soften his father in his favor, he removed his bride from the farm house, and took lodgings in a town about forty miles distant, where, after some difficulty, he found employment as a writer for a daily paper; and there he met with Edward Waring, who knew young Stanton slightly. Edward was the means of extricating Charles from an unpleasant dilemma, occasioned by the loss of the pocket-book which contained all the money he possessed. Edward paid the debt, which was nearly the means of depriving his new acquaintance of liberty, and introduced him to the house where he himself lodged. Won by the gratitude of young Stanton, and prepossessed in his favor by his pleasing manners, filled with respectful pity for his gentle companion, Edward befriended them all in his power. Stanton told Edward all his story, and the latter became the more attached to those who knew, and her who loved his gentle cousin.

About three weeks after Elsie's visit to Mr. Stanton, that gentleman called at the farm house.

"Well, sir," said the visitor, "I have found my runaway son. I have seen him, and his wife too, and as you predicted, Mr. Waring, I have no reason to be ashamed of her."

"It is Miss Cleveland, then?" replied farmer; "I thought as much all along."

"Yes, and she turns out to be the daughter of an old school-mate of mine. A fine girl she is, sir—Charles could not have done better."

"Except in regard to money, sir," remarked the farmer.

"Oh, never mind money," replied the other; "money cannot make people happy; I found that out when I did not know what had become of Charles. Why, sir, there he has been, toiling and starving, and all for the sake of love! I'll make up to the rogue for all he has suffered. I'll let that girl know what it is to have a father's house to go to."

Elsie had been shedding tears of joy in a corner of the room, and Aunt Amy frequently wiped her eyes with the corner of her apron, for Mr. Stanton's joy was contagious.

"I am glad to hear all this, sir," said Mr. Waring, with emotion; "hasty tempers, and hasty words, sir, often bring their own punishment, and I am glad that in your case it is no worse."

"Yes, sir, they do bring their own punishment," replied the gentleman, "and perhaps you have learned that by experience—there is a fine lad there with Charles, a very fine lad, sir, who has assisted my son with his slender means—has comforted him, encouraged him, and worked for him, sir—and this lad was turned adrift upon the world before he was twenty, because he would not consent to follow the occupation that his uncle followed—in short, sir, though the lad did not tell me all this, I guessed it in part from what he did tell me, and the lad's name is Edward Waring, sir—and I mean to make a man of him, sir—he may follow what business he chooses; I shall furnish him with the means, sir."

"No you won't, sir!" replied the farmer, as much excited as his visiter; "you shan't, sir—I'll do it myself—he's my nephew, and I'll keep my promise to his father; he was proud and hasty, but I set him the example, and I'll make it up to him, sir."

"Well, well," returned Mr. Stanton, "cannot we be friends, and agree to act in concert? Cannot you allow me to ease my mind a little, by doing something for the boy?"

"Why, perhaps so," said Waring; "after I've found him, and got him home, you know. I shall go after him, as you went after your son. I will not be outdone, Mr. Stanton."

"Very well, sir," replied Stanton, "we will not quarrel on that head. And here is one whom I have not yet spoken to—a lovely little girl—yours, neighbor Waring—an honor to any man to have such a daughter!" And he whispered to the farmer. "The lad and the little girl there would make a nice couple, hey, Waring?"

"What I always meant, sir," replied Waring, "but he would not listen to being a farmer, so"——

"Never mind that, man," returned Mr. Stanton, "he will listen to it now, I'll be bound."

The farmer nodded his head knowingly.

After Mr. Stanton had taken leave, Elsie said to her brother:

"Now, Tom, is my time to confess all to father."

Tom agreed, and they went hand in hand to their father, and told him all—of the hole in the orchard wall—of their visit to Mr. Stanton—and they laid Edward's Christmas letter before him—and Elsie said:

"Forgive me this once, dear father, and I will never keep a secret from you again."

"Elsie," said the old man, "I forgive you with all my heart. You were afraid of your passionate old father, and you dared not tell him the truth. But as you told no falsehood, I forgive you, and Tom too."

"Only I stopped up the hole in the orchard wall, father," said Tom, honestly; "but I did it to stop Mr. Stanton's questioning."

"Never attempt to deceive me again."

Tom promised he never would.

Spring came with its buds and blossoms. There was the hum of bees all day long in Elsie's pretty flower garden. Already she began to train the vines over the "little arbor at the end of the garden."—Every thing looked fresh, and green, and beautiful, about the farm house; and as Elsie tended her flowers and poultry, and watched her bees, she sometimes called on Edward to look at something which she thought particularly worthy of his attention, for Edward was again an inmate of his uncle's dwelling, and again his cheerful countenance and frank good humor cheered the hearts of those who loved him. And they were often visited by the family of Mr. Stanton, of which Emily was now the delight and pride. Old Mr. Stanton, with his son and daughter, often rode out to take tea at the farm house, and whenever any of Mr. Waring's family went to town, they never failed to call at the "large house with the marble portico, at the entrance of the principal street."

Mr. Stanton did not forget his promise with respect to Edward Waring. He offered to establish him in any way of business that best pleased him. Edward accepted from the rich man the means of purchasing a handsome library, but he gratefully received from his uncle the pretty farm before alluded to, resolved to devote the knowledge which he had gained, to better purposes than mere amusement; he had now become convinced that the cultivator of the soil need not necessarily forego the pleasure of literary acquirements, and that the latter afford an agreeable and useful relaxation, after the fatigues of labor. In short, he was convinced that the life of a farmer is not only respectable and independent, but also the happiest. And when, a year or two after, he received the hand of his cousin Elsie, he felt that his uncle's last gift was the greatest blessing he could receive. And the two old men, when they thought of their hasty tempers, and hasty words, looked at Elsie and said, "Blessed are the peace-makers."

TO A STAR.

Twinkling planet, yonder shining,
How I love to gaze at thee;
Would the peace thou art enjoying,
Could be felt on earth by me.

Deep into that lonely distance,
Far beyond this vale of ours,
Ever holdst thou thy existence,
Smiling through night's lonely hours.

Oh, could I but read thy story,
Could I learn what mystic hand,
Crowned with light of lasting glory,
Placed thee with that watchful band.

It is said that little spirits,
Taken from this vale of wo,
By their pure unsullied merits,
To thy starry regions go.

Canst thou tell me, little ranger,
Through yon deep unfathomed blue,
If there is with thee a stranger,
Lately from this land, and who?

In a garden budding sweetly,
By the woodbine's lofty form,
Was a slender flower, meekly
Bending to the daily storm.

Ere the sun unsealed its beauty
To the young morn's balmy breath,
Despite the skill of love and duty,
It was borne to dusty death.

Happy they who, like that flower,
Fade upon the parent stem,
And in childhood's happy hour,
Shine in night's bright diadem.

Twinkling planet, if that flower
Sparkles with thy watchful race;
If thou dost possess the power,
Point me to its shining face.

But I know thou hast for ever,
Little sufferer, gone to rest;
To return I'd have thee never,
From the kingdom of the blest.

Fare thee well, thou little ranger,
High on night's unclouded space;
Since thou canst not tell a stranger,
Of that little shining face.

Fare thee well, for I may never
Ask of thee another boon;
I shall know that secret never
'Till I dwell beyond the tomb.

TO MY ABSENT HUSBAND.

Kind faces mildly beam around me,
Sweet childhood's happy laugh is heard,
No voice I hear can grieve or wound me,
There's tenderness in every word;
Yet still I feel a weight of sadness,
As round I cast a searching eye,
And turning from each scene of gladness,
My heart heaves with the heavy sigh,
I am alone!

At morn I see the bright new day
Spring gaily from her couch of rest,
To dance along her brilliant way,
In robes of light and beauty drest;
The green earth wakes in songs of praise,
At each glance of her kindling eye,
I fain would join her rapturous lays,
But still my heart heaves with the sigh,
I am alone!

And when day's fleeting race is run,
And dims the lustre of her eye,
I sit to view the setting sun.

Array'd in glory's crimson, die;
Sweet monitor! as to thy rest,
Thou calmly sink'st with dew-gemmed eye;
I feel thy spell and call thee blest,
But still my heart heaves with the sigh,
I am alone!

And now whilst stars their radiance fling,
All glit'ring from the depths of heaven,
The dove of peace, on hov'ring wing,
Broods silent on the air of even,
And as the new moon's gentle beam,
Descends so softly from on high,
Of bliss in heaven I fondly dream,
But still my heart heaves with the sigh,
I am alone!

Dear husband! vain is every art,
To lure my thoughts away from thee;
I only feel when we're apart,
How little joy 's in life for me.
All earth may smile as glad and bright,
As though ne'er bliss could fade or die,
Yet still I feel at morn and night,
My heart swell with the heavy sigh,
I am alone!

THE UGLY EFFIE.

BY MRS. CAROLINE LEE HENTZ.

Mr. Horton, a rich and childless widower, made his first visit to his also widowed sister, Mrs. Dushone. A beautiful little girl, of about ten, was introduced to him as the darling Clara, his little pet neice, who was prepared to love her uncle better than any body else in the world, always excepting her mama. The child was remarkably beautiful, and all the decorations of dress were made to enhance her juvenile loveliness. The heart of the lonely man melted within him when he felt his neck wreathed by those white velvet arms, and his cheek kissed over and over by those sweet ruby lips.

"God bless her!" cried he, hugging her to his breast, again and again. "What a precious child it is!"

"I love you, dear uncle," muttered Clara, in the softest voice—"I have loved you a long time."

Mr. Horton gave the lovely child another warm embrace, then, releasing her, turned to his sister, with moistened eyes.

"If Heaven had granted me such a child as that, sister, to cheer my widowed heart, I should still be one of the happiest of men."

"You must look upon her as if indeed she were your own, my dear brother," said Mrs. Dushane, drawing Clara fondly towards her: "I am not so selfish as to wish to engross her exclusively, though I acknowledge I have a mother's pride as well as affection."

"But you have another daughter, your eldest born—where is she? My heart yearns to embrace them all. I came here to see if its aching void could not be filled."

"Oh! Effie?" said Mrs. Dushane, carelessly—"I do not know where she is. She is very shy and reserved—likes to be by herself—very different from Clara—remarkably ordinary in her person," continued she, in a lower voice; "and has a very singular and sullen disposition. She is a great affliction to me, but one cannot expect to be blest in all their children."

"Still I want to see the child," said the benevolent Mr. Horton—"I loved her father like my own brother, and he used to say his little girl was the image of himself; I cannot help loving his daughter."

"I fear you will not find much to love in poor Effie," replied the mother, with a deep sigh, "but you shall see her;" then, ringing the bell, she ordered a servant to bring Miss Effie to her uncle.

Soon after, a dark, thin, neglected-looking child was ushered into the room, who hung back on the hand of the servant, and whose looks and gestures expressed sullenness and reluctance. Her long, thick, dark hair hung in tangled masses over her neck and forehead, and it was difficult to distinguish her features, for she endeavored to cover them with her hair, as with a veil. With slow steps and averted face, she approached the centre of the room when her mother called to her, in a tone of authority—

"Put down your hand from your face, Effie, and come and speak to your uncle—come—quicker."

Effie looked at her uncle through her long tresses, then, letting her hand fall, she drew nearer, with a more willing step.

"Ah! that was her father's glance," exclaimed Mr. Horton, opening his arms as he spoke.

Effie hesitated a moment, then darted like lightning to his bosom, and clung round his neck with both her arms, as if she would never let him go.

"Effie," said her mother, reproachingly, "you are too rude—I did not tell you to tear your uncle to pieces."

"Let her be—let her be," said Mr. Horton pushing back her hair, and looking earnestly in her face. "Why her eyes are full of tears and her heart beats, as if she had been running a race. Don't be afraid of me—I'm your own uncle, who has no little girl of his own to love; I want you to look upon me as a father."

"That will do, Effie, said Mrs. Dushane: "you make your uncle too warm—come and take a seat by me."

Effie withdrew her arms from her uncle's neck, and, sliding from his knee, took the seat indicated by her mother's glance. Mr. Horton's eyes were still riveted upon her face.

"Is that child sick?" he asked, abruptly.

"No," replied Mrs. Dushane;—"she always had that meagre, half-famished look. She is a great deal stronger than Clara."

Mr. Horton did not reply, but looked earnestly at both children, while his sister watched his countenance with silent interest. Mrs. Dushane had anticipated the arrival of the brother with great anxiety. She knew the immense wealth he had acquired—that he had no children of his own to inherit it—that she was his only surviving sister, and she was sure that the moment he beheld her darling Clara, he would adopt her as the heiress of his fortune.

"My dear," said she to her, the morning of her brother's arrival, "you remember how much I have told you of your uncle Horton—your rich uncle. Now, though we have a very decent living, that is all;—I shall be able to leave you nothing, but your uncle is said to be worth a million—and, I have no doubt, will make you heiress to the whole, if you only try to please him, and be a dear, sweet, beautiful child, the whole time he is here."

"Oh! I will be sure to please him," cried Clara, dancing before the looking-glass. "I'll please him without trying."

"How are you sure of that, darling?" asked the mother.

"Oh because I am so pretty," replied the spoiled child, shaking back the ringlets from her bright blue eyes, and looking archly in her mother's face. "You know every body says I am pretty, mama, and that sister is ugly."

"Yes—but you must not repeat what ever body says before your uncle, for he would not be pleased if he thought you vain—and you must be very polite and affectionate to him—get in his lap, put your arms round his neck, and caress him a great deal. You must never get in a passion before him, for it spoils your looks; you know, my dear, you are too apt to do it. You must be very attentive to him when he is speaking, and be sure never to contradict him. I recollect it always displeased him to be interrupted in conversation."

"I hope he will not stay long, if I've got to listen to him all the time," said Clara, "for I know he must be a dry old thing."

"You will not think a million of dollars dry, one of these days," said Mrs. Dushane—"but, never mind, perhaps he will leave it to Effie."

"To Effie!" exclaimed Clara, with a laugh of derision "To Effie! the ugly thing!—Oh, no! I'm not afraid of her. You see if I don't please uncle, without trying very hard either."

A servant, whose chief employment it was to wait upon Clara, was full two hours curling her hair and arranging her dress, before the arrival of Mr. Horton, and when the business of the toilette was over, she led her in triumph to her mother, asking her "if Miss Clara did not look like a perfect angel?"

A rapturous kiss on her roseate cheek was an expressive answer in the affirmative.

"Oh! mama, you tumble my frock," cried the little belle, in a pettish tone. "I don't love to be squeezed."

"Shall I change Miss Effie's dress?" asked the servant, as she was leaving the room.

"It's of no consequence," said Mrs. Dushane, coldly: "she needn't come into the room to-night—I'm ashamed my brother should see her," continued she, in a kind of soliloquy; "she is so ugly and awkward and wayward, I want to keep her out of his sight as long as possible."

Mr. Horton had not been more than a week with his sister before he discovered that, though she was the nominal head of the establishment, Miss Clara was the real one, and that her varying whims and caprices were the laws that governed the whole household. Effie seldom made her appearance, and then she seemed more like an automaton than any thing else: never displaying any traits of that sensibility which had so touched her uncle's heart the first night of his arrival. When company was present Clara was summoned to the piano to entertain the guests with music, which she had been taught almost from her cradle, or she was called upon to display her graceful little figure in the mazes of the horapipe, or the undulations of the shawl dance, which her master said she executed to perfection.

One evening Mr. Horton sat reading in an upper piazza, which fronted the chamber he occupied. It was shaded by luxurious vines, which trailed their flowery tendrils through the diamond trellis-work, and excluded the rays of the setting sun. Embowered in the rich shades, he sat unseen, enjoying the sweetness and freshness of declining day. He heard the voices of the children in the adjoining room, and he could not but notice that Clara's tones wanted something of the dulcet softness of her parlour accents. He had scarcely ever heard the full sound of Effie's voice, and he now listened unconsciously to a conversation which promised to develope her character to a most interested auditor.

"Don't, Clara, press so hard against this geranium," said Effie, in an expostulating tone, "you know mother will be very angry if it is broken."

"I don't care," replied Clara, evidently persisting in her conduct: "she will not be angry with me."

"But she will with me," said Effie, "for I have the care of this flower, and if any harm happens to it, she will blame me. You've broken off several leaves already."

There was a moment's silence, and then a sudden and vehement exclamation from Effie again roused the attention of Mr. Horton.

"Oh, Clara, see what you've done! The most beautiful branch is broken—and you did it on purpose too."

Clara laughed mockingly, and at the same moment Mrs. Dushane was heard to enter the apartment.

"Effie! Effie!" exclaimed she, angrily, "what have you been doing? How dare you break that geranium, when I've forbidden you to touch a single leaf of it?"

"I didn't break it, mother!" answered Effie; "I wouldn't have broken it for anything in the world."

"How dare you deny it, when you are holding it in your own hand, you good-for-nothing little thing!" cried the mother, with increasing anger.—"I suppose you want to make me think that Clara broke it—don't you?"

"Clara did break it!" sobbed Effie; "she knows she did, and I tried to keep her from it."

"Oh! mama, I didn't do any such thing," cried Clara, with the boldness of innocence itself—"you know I wouldn't."

"I could forgive you for breaking the flower," exclaimed Mrs. Dushane, in the husky tones of suppressed passion, "but tell such another lie on Clara, and you had better never have been born."

Mr. Horton started from his seat in uncontrollable agitation, dropped his book, and rushed to the open door of the apartment just as Effie, smitten by a violent blow, had fallen prostrate to the floor, her hand still grasping the broken geranium, whose leaves were scattered around her.

"Clarinda!" cried Mr. Horton, sternly, "unjust, unnatural woman—what have you done?"

"She is a liar, brother, and I struck her. She deserved it," answered Mrs. Dushane, pale with anger.

"She is not a liar, and I know it," answered he, in a raised voice. "There stands the liar!" pointing to the now terrified and guilty-looking Clara. "I heard every thing that passed between them. She broke the flower wantonly, purposely, against her sister's prayers she broke it, and then basely denies it. Rise, my poor child," continued he, trying to lift Effie from the ground, "you shall have one friend to protect you, if your own mother casts you from her"

Effie was only stunned by the fall, and when she found herself in the arms of Mr. Horton, she struggled to be released.

"Oh! let me go," cried she, almost frantically—"she will hate me worse than ever. Oh! how I wish I was dead! how I wish I was dead!"

There was something terrible in the expression of the child's large, dilated black eyes, as in a wild paroxysm of passion, she repeated this fearful ejaculation. Mr. Horton shuddered, but he only held her more closely.

"Clarinda," said he, solemnly, "you have that to answer for which will weigh like iron upon your soul at the great judgment day. What has this poor neglected child done, that you treat her worse than an hireling, and lavish all your affection on that selfish and unprincipled girl?"

"Clara," said her mother, "leave the room instantly. This is no place for you. Why do you not obey me?"

Clara began to weep bitterly, but her mother took her by the hand and leading her to the door, gave her in charge to a servant, with a whispered injunction not intended for her brother's ear.

"Now, let that child go," said she. "If I am to be arraigned for my conduct, I don't want any listeners. Effie, follow your sister, and mind that there is no more quarrelling."

"She shall not go," cried Mr. Horton. "I fear that there is no safety for her out of my arms. Clarinda, I cannot believe the cruel, unjust, and unnatural mother I see before me, is the sister whom I remember in the spring-time of the heart's feeling, and in the gentleness of early womanhood."

"Brother, if you wish me to speak, let that child go. I will not be humbled before her, or any human being."

"Yes, let me go," cried Effie, again struggling; "I don't want to stay here."

"One question first," said Mr. Horton, "tell me truly, why you wished yourself dead?"

"Because every body hates me."

"And what makes you think everybody hates you?"

"Because I am ugly," cried the child, in a low, bitter tone, looking darkly and sullenly at her mother.

"I will love you, Effie, if you are good, as well as if you were my own child. But you must not give way to such violent passions. Be gentle if you wish to be loved. Be gentle if you wish to be beautiful."

He put her down from his knee, where he had seated her, and motioned that she might depart—She stood for a moment as if irresolute, then threw her arms around his neck, kissed his cheeks, his hands, and even the sleeves of his garment, in a most passionate manner, and ran out of the room.

"Oh! Clarinda," cried he, greatly moved, "what a heart you are throwing away from you."

"To me she has always been sullen and cold," said Mrs. Dushane; "she has never shown me any affection, but on the contrary the greatest dislike."

"Because the fountain of her young affections has been frozen, and her young blood turned to gall," replied her brother. "She has been brought up with the withering conviction that she is an object of hatred and disgust to those around her, placed in glaring comparison with her beautiful sister, treated like a menial, her dress neglected, her manners uncultivated, and her sensibilities crushed and trodden under foot. Talk about her affections! You might as well take those very geranium leaves, and grind them with your heel, till you have bruised out all their fragrance, and then murmur that they gave you back no sweetness. But that child has affections, warm, glowing affections, though you have never elicited them—and a mind, too, though you have never cultivated it; but if God grant me the opportunity, I will take possession of the unweeded wilderness of her heart and mind, and turn it into a blooming, domestic garden, yet."

Mrs. Dushane was thunderstruck. She saw in prospective her darling Clara disinherited, and she knew not in what way to avert the impending calamity.

"Brother," cried she, putting her handkerchief to her eyes, "you are strangely altered. You used to love me once, but now the stranger within my gates would treat me with more kindness. You don't know what provocations I have, or you would not accuse me of such cruelty and injustice."

"You forget, Clarinda, that I have been a witness myself of your injustice. I do not make accusations, but appeal to self-evident truths—and did you not suffer Clara to depart, without once rebuking her for her falsehood and guilt?"

"Brother, I believe you hate Clara."

"I have no love for her faults, and to speak the honest truth, I never liked favorites. From the time of ancient Joseph's coat of many colors, which excited the envy and hatred of his brethren, to our days of modern refinement, favouritism has been the fruitful source of sin and sorrow, and oftentimes of blood and death. Do not accuse me of unkindness, Clarinda, because I speak strongly of the evils you have caused. I would rouse you to a sense of your danger, and place before you, in all their length and breadth, the sacred duties you have too long neglected."

"I may have been wrong," cried Mrs. Dushane, apparently softening; "indeed, I know I have been, but I never could govern Effie in any other way than by severity. She is the most singular child you ever saw, and you are the only person who ever seemed to love her. You remember, brother, when I was a young girl, I was very much admired for my beauty, and perhaps was led to attach an undue value to it. My greatest ambition was to have a beautiful infant, and when Effie was said to be so remarkably ugly, I could not help it, but my heart seemed steeled against her, and she was a very cross infant, too, and cried day and night. I could hear the nurse calling her a cross, ugly thing, till I was ashamed to have her in my sight. Then Clara was so uncommonly beautiful, and such a sweet, smiling, bewitching little infant, I could not help idolising her. Every body called her an angel, and indeed you must acknowledge she has the beauty of one. Then she is so affectionate and loving. You don't know how she twines around one's heart. To be sure she was very wrong just now, very wrong; but pray forgive her this one fault. You saw how bitterly she wept. It was only the dread of your displeasure. You have no idea how tenderly she loves you. Forgive Clara, for my sake, and I will be kind to Effie for yours."

"For your own sake, my beloved sister," said Mr. Horton, seating himself by her side, and taking her hand affectionately in his. "The consciousness of a fault, is one step to reformation. Only cultivate a mother's feelings for Effie, and believe me, you will be repaid for all your care."

Late that evening, as Mr. Horton was walking pensively in the garden, whose walks and arbours were partially illumined by the light of a waning moon, he was attracted by a dark object under one of the trees. Supposing it some animal, which had gained unlawful admittance, he approached to drive it from the enclosure, when he was startled by the appearance of two large black eyes turned upwards to the Heavens, flashing out from a cloud of gypsy-looking hair.

"Effie," cried he, "what are you doing here, so late, and alone?"

"Nothing," replied she, springing on her feet; "I was only looking at the moon and stars."

"You had better go and look at them through your bed-curtains," said he, passing his hand over her dew-damp hair; "it is time for little girls to be in bed and asleep."

"I cannot sleep so soon," said the child; "I think too much, and I wish too much."

"What is it you wish so much, Effie?"

"Oh! I wish to be up among the stars, out of the way of every body here; and then they look as if they loved me, with their sweet, bright eyes."

Mr. Horton took her hand, and led her slowly and gently along.

"You seem to want to be loved, Effie?"

"Oh! yes," answered she, with energy, "I would die to be loved only half as well as Clara."

"Well, listen to me, Effie, and I will tell you how you may be loved even better than Clara.—You must not think that it is only beautiful persons who are loved."

"But they hate me because I am ugly," interrupted Effie.

"You are not ugly, my child, and as you grow older, you will grow handsomer. But you must forget your looks, and think of cultivating your mind and heart. You must try to be loved for something better than beauty, and beauty perhaps will come, without thinking of it."

Effie looked up to him with a smile which really had a beautifying influence on her face, seen by that soft moonlight.

"If I could only be with you all the time," said she, "I should be happy."

"Would you, indeed, like to leave your home, and come and live with me?"

"Would I?" cried she, suddenly stopping—"I would walk barefoot to the end of the universe; I would feed on bread and water all my life, if I could only live near you."

"Perhaps we will live together one of these days," said he, smiling at her enthusiasm, "but will I promise you better fare than bread and water. And now, good-night—and God bless you, my own darling Effie."

Effie retired to bed, but long after she laid her head upon her pillow, she whispered to herself the endearing epithet, which had melted into her inmost heart. It was the first time she had ever been so fondly addressed, and even in her dreams she thought a gentle voice was murmuring in her ear, "my own darling Effie." Oh! how sweet to the neglected, lone-hearted child, was the language of sympathy and love! It was like the gurgling fountain in the arid desert—the nightingale in the dungeon's solitude—the gentle gale that first wakened the wild music of her soul. It seemed that till that moment there had been a chill weight of lead in her bosom, cold and deadening, but that it was now fused in the glowing warmth of love, and flowing in one stream of affection, reverence, gratitude, and almost worship, to the feet of her benefactor and friend.

When Mr. Horton proposed to his sister to take Effie home with him, she could not disguise her mortification and displeasure. Effie the heiress of her uncle's fortune, to the exclusion of Clara, was a circumstance too intolerable to be endured. The ugly Effie chosen in preference to the beautiful Clara! She would gladly have refused the request, but she knew not what plea to urge against it. She had herself acknowledged her unnatural dislike to the child, and her neglect of all a mother's duties towards it, was a too evident truth. In vain she sought to stifle the voice of upbraiding conscience. It would be heard, even amidst the whirlwind of passion that raged in her breast. Mr. Horton's determination was to remove Effie as far as possible from the associations of her childhood, to place her at school, where she could have every opportunity for the developement of her talents and the discipline of her character—and then, if she fulfilled his hopes, to adopt her as his own, and make her the heiress of his fortune, and the inheritor of his name.

Clara was outrageous when she learned the new destiny of her sister. She pouted, wept, and stamped, in the impotence of her wrath. Effie should not go home with her uncle, and get all his money, a whole million of dollars, away from her. She didn't want to be pretty any more. She wished she were ugly. She would be ugly, if it were only to spite her mama, because she had not made her uncle like her better than Effie.

Her mother, instead of soothing and petting her with the halcyon strains of flattery, as she was wont to do when her favorite got up a domestic storm, now vented upon her the anger she dared not manifest before her brother.

"It was your own fault," said she, "you spoiled, ungrateful child; you broke my geranium, and then meanly lied about it. You had better not wish yourself ugly, for you will have nothing but your beauty to depend upon, when you grow up. Not a cent of money will you have for a fortune, while your sister will be an heiress and—a belle——"

"I don't care," cried Clara, scornfully pouting her rose-leaf lips, "I'll be a belle too; and I don't want a fortune. I'll marry somebody with a great big fortune, and you shan't live with me, either, Madame Mama."

Clara's appellation for her mother, in moments of passion, was "Madame Mama;" and Madame Mama began to feel a foretaste of the anguish caused by that "sharper than a serpent's tooth," the tongue of a thankless child.

Having depicted a few scenes in the childhood of the two sisters, and shown the different influences, emanating from the same source, which operated in the characters of both, the lapse of a few years may be imagined, and those who have become interested in the Ugly Effie, may see her once more in the period of adolescence—when released from the discipline of a school, she fills a daughter's place in her uncle's household. The mansion of Mr. Horton was such as became his princely fortune. It was on a lordly scale, and presented an elegance of architecture and refinement of taste unequalled in that part of the country where he resided. It was shaded on all sides by magnificent trees, and a smooth lawn stretched out in front, intersected by an avenue of symmetrical poplars, and surrounded by a hedge of perennial shrubs. Underneath one of the trees that shadowed the walls, and looking out on this rich, velvet lawn, sat the benevolent owner of this noble establishment, whose dignified person corresponded well with the other features of the scenery. A young girl stood near him, holding a bow in her left hand, and watching the motions of a young man, who was feathering an arrow fitted for that sylvan bow. Her figure had scarcely attained its full height, but it had all the rounded proportions and undulating outlines of early womanhood. Her head, covered with short raven curls, gave her the appearance of a young Greek, but her clear, dark complexion, of perfect softness and transparency, assimilated her more to the Creole race. Her features were not regular nor handsome in themselves, but they were lighted up with animation and intellect, and illuminated by such large, splendid black eyes, that it would have been difficult for the most fastidious connoisseur of female beauty to have judged them with any severity of criticism. From the bow, on which she partly leaned, the quiver suspended over her shoulder, the wild grace of her attitude, and the darkness of her complexion, she might have been mistaken for one of those daughters of the forest, which American genius has so often glowing described.

"That will do, Dudley," said she, playfully snatching the arrow, and fitting it to her bow; "better reserve some of your skill to fledge your own arrows, for you know I can shoot like Robin Hood himself."

The young man laughed, and the trial of skill commenced. They shot alternately, and scarcely had the gleaming arrow darted from the string, than they each pursued its flight over the lawn, striving for the glory of first reaching the fallen missile. At last the young girl hit the target in the very centre, and Mr. Horton pronounced her the victor.

"You must surrender, Dudley," said he, "there is no disgrace in yielding to Effie—as swift a foot, as true an eye, and as steady a hand"——

"And as warm a heart," interrupted she, approaching him, with a cheek to which exercise had given a color, like the coral under the wave, and seating herself on the grass at his feet. "But what shall be my reward, dear uncle? In the merry days of the 'Lion-hearted King,' the victor always received some crown or trophy of his skill or valor."

While she was speaking, Dudley had been gathering some of the flowers and perennial leaves of the shrubbery, and had woven them into a rustic garland, which, sportively kneeling, he placed upon her brow.

"I suppose, if I were versed in the language of chivalry," said the youth, "I should address you as the queen of love and beauty."

"Beauty!" repeated Effie, with a laugh that made the green walks ring. "What would my mother and Clara say if they heard such an appellation given to their ugly Effie? You needn't look so mockingly, Dudley, for you may ask my uncle if, four years ago, I wasn't the ugliest little gypsy he ever beheld."

"You have, indeed, changed most marvellously, Effie," replied he, passing his hand caressingly over the head that rested against his knee; "and you may thank the daily exercise in the open air, which you have been compelled to take, for its invigorating and beautifying influence."

"I may thank, rather, the parental tenderness, the kindness, and the care, that have been poured like balm into a bruised and wounded heart, healing and purifying it, and changing, as it were, the very life-blood in my veins!" exclaimed Effie, in her peculiarly impassioned manner. "Do you remember the night when you found me under the sycamore tree, and called me your own darling Effie? From that moment I date a new existence:—from that moment life became dear to me, and oh! how dear, how very dear it has been to me since!"

Mr. Horton looked down upon her with glistening eyes, and blessed his God that it had been his destiny to appropriate such rich treasures of intellect and sensibility, and as he looked on the fair lands stretching around him, far as the eye could reach, blessed Him again, that he could now leave one behind him who was worthy to be the mistress of those beautiful possessions. There was another pair of brighter, younger eyes, looking down upon her, and wondering if it were possible that she had ever been called the "ugly Effie." Perhaps she read his thoughts, for she smilingly said—

"I wish you could see my sister Clara."

"Why?"

"Because she is so exquisitely fair—so faultlessly beautiful."

"I do not like faultless beauties," replied he; "they are always insipid. I do not like blondes—they have no expression. I like to see a face that changes with the changing feelings—now dark, now bright, like the Heavens bending above us."

"Do you think your mother and sister would know you, Effie?" asked Mr. Horton.

"I do not think they would," she replied, "for I sometimes hardly recognize myself. I should like to see them as a stranger, to see what impressions I might make. When shall I see them, dear uncle? Something whispers me I may yet be blest with a mother's and a sister's love."

"Are you not happy with me? Do you wish to leave me, Effie?"

"Never!—I want no other home than this. But, in looking back, I blame myself so much for the sullen and vindictive feelings I once dared to cherish. I tried so little to deserve the love which was not spontaneously bestowed, I long to prove to them that I am now not utterly unworthy of their regard."

"I honor your wishes," said Mr. Horton, kindly. "And when we return from Europe, they shall be gratified. Two years will soon pass away. You will then have acquired all the advantages of travelling in classic lands. Dudley will have completed his education in the German universities, and in the freshness of transatlantic graces, can present himself to your fair sister, whose beauty you are so anxious he should admire."

Dudley began to reiterate his detestation of blondes, but Mr. Horton interrupted him to discuss more important matters.

Dudley Alston, was a ward of Mr. Horton's, the orphan son of the most intimate friend of his youth. When his father died, he left him to the guardianship of Mr. Horton, with the conditions that he should finish his education in Europe, and that he should never marry without the consent of Mr. Horton.

Mr. Alston had not been dead more than a year, so that Dudley had never seen Effie in her chrysalis state. They had passed together their last vacation, and now again met, free from all scholastic restraints, with spirits buoyant as young singing birds, converting the still home of the widower into a bright scene of youthful exercise and hilarity. Mr. Horton rejoiced in the circumstances which had thrown so closely together these two congenial beings so dear to his affections, and which promised to draw them together in closer and more endearing union. Dudley was handsome, intelligent, and high-spirited: generous almost to prodigality; unsuspicious almost to credulity; impulsive and uncalculating, and possessed of an independent fortune, free from any of those mortgages and encumbrances which so often neutralize the property of reputed heirs. Where could he find a husband for Effie, combining so many rare endowments, and where could Dudley find a being like Effie, with a soul of fire, a heart of love, and a person which he now thought singularly fascinating? He was too wise to speak his hopes, but he thought it as impossible that their hearts should not grow together, as that two young trees, placed side by side, should not interlace their green boughs and suffer their trembling leaves to unite. He wrote occasional letters to his sister, and received from her cold and brief replies. She expatiated chiefly on Clara's extraordinary beauty, and lamented her limited means, to introduce her to the world as she would wish,—hoped that Effie was improving, but declared her readiness to take her home, whenever her uncle was disgusted or weary of his charge. Mr. Horton never made known to her the astonishing improvement in Effie's appearance, for he wanted to dazzle her some day with the sudden lustre of the gem she had thrown from her heart. He always mentioned her in vague terms, expressed his general satisfaction in her good conduct, and approbation of her studious habits.—"As nature did not make her a beauty," said he, "I intend she shall be a scholar, and no fear of her being called a bas bleu, shall prevent me from giving her a thoroughly classical education. She is already familiar with Greek and Latin, and during our European travels, she shall become mistress of all the modern languages."

"Oh! there is nothing so disgusting as a pedantic woman!" exclaimed Clara, with a shudder, as her mother finished the perusal of the letter. "I know French and Italian enough to sing all the fashionable songs and repeat all the common quotations, and that is all a young lady requires. As for Greek and Latin, I detest their very idea. But poor Effie needs something to distinguish her, even besides her uncle's fortune. I wonder if she is as ugly as ever. I should really like to see her."

"So should I," replied Mrs. Dushane, with an involuntary sigh, for there were moments when nature spoke in her heart, and she had become convinced, from her own fatal experience, that there were other qualities necessary in a daughter besides personal beauty. There were times "when the whole head was sick, and the whole heart faint," when she would have welcomed a filial hand to bathe her temples or hold her aching brow, even though it were the hand of her neglected child.—There were times when the rebellious will, the selfish vanity, the careless disrespect, or bold defiance of the spoiled favorite, made her feel as if Heaven's retribution might be felt in this world. At others, when she saw her caressed and admired, and heard herself envied as the mother of such a paragon, she tried to convince herself that disobedience and ill-humor were only slight flaws in this matchless diamond, which it would be invidious to dwell upon. She had had no communication with her brother during his residence in Europe, and believing that all intercourse with him would now probably cease, and that there was no hope of his substituting Clara for Effie, she became more and more anxious to secure for the former an eshlishment worthy of her charms. Clara was now before the world as an acknowledged belle, occupying that place in society for which she had been solely calculated, and which she had been made to believe a part of her birthright.

One evening Mrs. Dushane, accompanied her daughter to the house of a lady who, being a great amateur in music, was very fond of giving concerts. Clara, as a beauty, and a brilliant performer, was always invited. This evening, the lady told Clara to look her prettiest, and do her prettiest, as a young lady was to be present—a stranger, just arrived in town—who was said to have most remarkable and fascinating accomplisments. Clara's vain and eager eye ran over the crowd, in search of one who would have the hardihood to rival her. She had scarcely assured herself that there were none but familiar faces around her, when the lady of the house approached and begged permission to introduce her to Miss Horton, the young lady whose coming she had announced. The company fell back as the hostess led Clara and her mother through the folding doors to the centre of another apartment, where a young lady stood beneath the full blaze of the chandeliers, leaning on the arm of a young and distinguished looking stranger. Clara gazed intently on the form of this rival beauty, and a feeling of relieved self-complacency dimpled the roses of her cheeks. Those on whom nature has lavished her living lilies and carnations, are very apt to depreciate the charms of those whose pretensions to loveliness are based on other attributes than mere beauty of complexion.—That of the young stranger was what Clara called dark, and it might have appeared so, contrasted with the dazzling whiteness of her own, but it had that oriental delicacy and transparency so seldom found except in eastern climes. Her eyes were so dark and resplendent that their brightness would have been almost overpowering had they not been softened by long sweeping lashes, of the same jetty hue as her luxuriant and shining hair. Her figure was exquisite in repose, and from its waving outline promised that grace of motion, which is more pleasing than beauty itself. There was nothing conspicuous in her dress save a small diamond star that sparkled amid the darkness of her tresses, like a lone planet on "night's ebon brow." The gentleman on whose arm she leaned, ah

> "Not his the form, not his the eye,
> That youthful maidens wont to fly."

Clara marked him as her victim, and met his exceedingly earnest gaze with a glance of soft allurement. The young lady, whose air and appearance betrayed familarity with the most elegant and fashionable society, nevertheless manifested no small degree of embarrassment while passing through the customary forms of introduction. She colored deeply, and her eyes were bent down with an expression of modesty and humility entirely unexpected from her previous bearing.

"Horton!" repeated Mrs. Dushane, when her name was announced: "I have a brother of that name now in Europe. It is a long time since I have seen him, however," she added, with a sigh.

"Then I hope you will have pleasing associations connected with me, madam," said Miss Horton, in a sweet, low voice.

Mrs. Dushane, who was prepared to wage warfare with one who might rival her daughter, could not help feeling the charm of such affability and sweetness. She wondered who the Mr. Alston was who accompanied her, but notwithstanding his juxtaposition with the attractive stranger, she could not but hope that he was the rich and distinguished individual Heaven had destined for her favourite child.

Music was the order of the evening, and Clara was led to the piano, Miss Horton declining to play first. Being from early childhood accustomed to sing and play in public, she had no faltering of modesty, to mar the brilliancy of her execution. She sang and played as she did every thing else, for effect—and it was generally such as the most exacting vanity could desire. Mr. Alston and Miss Horton stood near her and evinced, by their silent attention, the most flattering interest in the beautiful songster.

"And now, Miss Horton," cried the impatient hostess—and "Miss Horton" passed from mouth to mouth, as the circle pressed and narrowed around her—"Perhaps Miss Horton would prefer the harp?"

"She was more accustomed to the harp," she replied, and a splendid instrument was drawn toward her.

Clara was no proficient on the harp, having, in a fit of obstinacy, given up her lessons, because the chords blistered her delicate fingers. She felt a thrill of envy, as she beheld Miss Horton seat herself gracefully before the lyre, such as the "shepherd monarch once swept," and pass her white hands over the strings. At first her touch was soft, and her voice low, and she looked at Clara, as if deprecating her criticism; but, after a while, she looked at no one—she thought of nothing but the spirit of music that filled her soul, thrilled through her nerves, flowed in her veins, and burned upon her cheek. There was no affectation in her manner—there was enthusiasm, sensibility, fire—but it was the fire from within, illuminating the temple, which its intensity sometimes threatened to destroy. It is true, she once or twice raised her glorious black eyes to Heaven, but it was because music naturally lifted her thoughts to Heaven, and her glance followed its inspiration.

"Are you not weary?" asked Clara, after she had again and again yielded to the entreaties of her auditors to give them another and yet another strain.

"No," answered she, rising; "but I must not forget that others may be, notwithstanding their apparent sympathy with an enthusiast like myself."

"Oh! Mr. Delamere," cried Clara, addressing a pale, pensive, and intellectual gentleman, who had stood, as if spell-bound, by the harp, "do not look so reproachfully at me; I did not think of putting a stop to your ecstacy."

"You are right," said he, drawing a deep inspiration, "I was forgetting the mortal in the immortal!"

"Oh! that we all, and always could!" exclaimed Miss Horton; "but those who speak of immortality in a scene like this, must be singularly bold."

"Perhaps it would be more in keeping by that window, which looks out upon the magnificence of an evening sky," answered Mr. Delamere, with a smile so winning, she could not but yield to the invitation; and seated in a curtained embrasure, which admitted the fresh night breeze, she soon found she was with a compahion to whom she was not ashamed to communicate her most glowing thoughts, for she "received her own with usury."—He had travelled over many lands—over the countries from which she had just returned—and she felt as if she heard once more the song of the Alpine peasant, the rich strains of the Italian improvisitore, or beheld again the sublime and storied scenes so vividly impressed upon her memory. But, at times, her abstracted eye told of other subjects of contemplation. She thought of the mother whose unkindness had embittered her childhood, now smiling unconsciously on her neglected offspring, and she longed to throw herself on her neck, and ask her to forget the past, and welcome back her no longer ugly Effie. She looked at her sister, on whose angelic face evil passions had left no more trace than the rough bark on the glassy wave, and forgetting the scorn and contumely she had heaped upon her in the first dark portion of her life, she yearned to embrace her, to press to her own those smiling lips, and call her by the sweet name of sister.

"Not yet," said she to herself; "I have promised my uncle to shine before them a little while, at least till I have won their admiration as a stranger, and triumphed as another, ere I allow them to recognize in me the hated and ugly Effie."

Surprised at her silence, Mr. Delamere watched her thoughtful and varying countenance with an interest that surprised himself. His early history was romantic. In the very dawn of manhood, he had formed an attachment for a fragile and lovely young creature, who expired suddenly on the very morning of her nuptial day, and whose white bridal wreath was placed upon the shroud that mantled her virgin bosom. Delamere, in the anguish of so awful a bereavement, secluded himself long from the world, which, to him, seemed covered with a funereal pall, and devoted himself to the memory of the dead. But, at length, the solicitations of friendship, the energies of youth, and the strong necessity of social life, drew him back to the scenes which he had once frequented, chastened by sorrow, enriched by experience, the history of the past written on his pallid cheek, and speaking from his pensive eye. No wonder that the music of Effie's voice had thrilled through a heart whose strings had once been so rudely broken. He felt for the young songstress a most painful interest, for he saw she was one born to feel and to suffer; for when were deep feeling and suffering ever disunited?

"Is not Clara beautiful, Dudley?" asked Effie, the morning after the sisters met. "Is she not beautiful as the dreams of imagination?"

"She is, indeed, most exquisitely fair," answered he: "she has almost conquered my prejudices against blondes. But she is no more to be compared to you, Effie, than a clear, cloudless day is to a starry, resplendent night.

> 'Thou walk'st in beauty, like the night
> Of cloudless climes and starry skies.'"

"Don't flatter me, Dudley," cried she, impatiently: "I know its exact value, which few girls, as young as myself, can say. Let there be nothing but truth and sincerity between us. Now is the time to prove whether the love you bear me is the result of habit and association, or that passion which would have selected me for its object, though we had been heretofore sundered as far as from pole to pole. Unfortunately, my uncle's wishes are known to both of us, revealed in an unguarded moment. To me, I acknowledge his slightest wish is a law, and you know my heart has not murmured at his will."

She blushed, and averted her eyes, which she was conscious expressed in still stronger language the feelings she was uttering.

"What is it you mean?" exclaimed he, vehemently. "Do you doubt my truth and constancy, when, from the first moment I beheld you, I have scarcely had a thought or wish, which has not been entwined with you? You were the star of my boyhood, you are the cynosure of my manhood, and age will bring no change. No, it is for me to doubt; not you, Effie."

While this conversation was passing between them at the hotel, where Mr. Horton had put up, incog., for the purpose already explained, Mrs. Dushane and Clara were expatiating on the young stranger who had flashed across their path the preceding evening.

"I do not think her really handsome, mother," said Clara; "she is not fair enough for that. She reminded me of some one whom I have seen before, but I cannot think who it is."

"It is the same case with me," said her mother; "I have been trying to think who she is like, but in vain. She certainly created a great sensation, and she was very affable and polite to me. How I wish you had not given up the harp, Clara. It's a thousand times more graceful an instrument than the piano. It was nothing but your waywardness. I told you you would repent of it some day."

"If I did play on the harp," said Clara, pettishly, "I wouldn't put myself in such ecstasies at my own music, as she did. I don't believe Mr. Alston admires her singing much, for he talked to me almost the whole time."

"Yes, because you talked to him. But, seriously, Clara, he is a fine-looking young man, and may be very rich. You had better try to captivate him, even if he is already captivated by Miss Horton. How familiar that name does sound! We must invite them to our house—make a party for them—for they evidently are persons of distinction."

"Not a musical party, mother. One good thing, however, we have no harp here."

The party was given, and Effie crossed once more, with unconquerable emotions, the threshold of her childhood's home. She entered the drawing-room, followed by a train of obsequious admirers, and received by the mistress of the mansion, with all the pomp and ceremony of fashionable politeness. She was magnificently dressed, for it was her uncle's pleasure that she should be so, and Clara felt, with envy and bitterness, that she was eclipsed by this splendid stranger.

"I will win Alston, if I die," ejaculated she to herself: "for I know she loves him, and it will be such a triumph."

Monopolized as Effie was, with Delamere flitting, a pensive shadow at her side, it was difficult for Dudley Alston to claim any portion of her attention. It was therefore an easy task for Clara to monopolize him. She laid aside her frivolity, veiled her vanity, and taxed her mind to the fullest extent of its powers, to interest and amuse him. She had a great deal of tact, and could talk with a fluent tongue, while the loveliest smiles gave a charm to the words she uttered. Dudley could not help being pleased with this flattering attention. He knew from Mr. Horton that she was a spoiled and unamiable child, and was prepared to dislike and avoid her, but he could not believe aught but gentleness now dwelt in a breast so fair. Effie had entreated him to endeavor to think favorable of Clara, forgetting her childish foibles, and, for her sake he ought to do it. Mrs. Dushane was more and more delighted with Miss Horton, for nothing could be more deferential than her manners towards her. She sought her conversation, and turned from all her admirers whenever she had an opportunity of addressing her. Mrs. Dushane could hardly withdraw her eyes from her face. That haunting resemblance! It vexed and pained her.—Once, moved by a sudden reminiscence, she whispered to Clara—

"It is the most ridiculous thing I ever knew—and yet there is something about Miss Horton that really makes me think of our Effie."

"Shocking!" exclaimed Clara, laughing outright: "what would Miss Horton say, if she knew you compared her to such a looking thing as Effie?"

Alston caught the name of Effie.

"You were speaking of some one by the name of Effie," said he; "I have always admired it since I read the Heart of Midlothian. Is the Effie to whom you allude, as beautiful as the lily of St. Leonards?"

"Oh no—it is my own sister, whom my uncle adopted, and who is now in Europe with him. She is very far from being pretty."

"Indeed," said he; "is that possible, and your sister, too? Does she not resemble you in the least?"

"No," answered she, with a shiver of disgust.—"She is lean, swarthy, and almost deformed. But uncle will give her a large fortune, and that will make up for her defects."

"Perhaps she has improved since you saw her last," said Dudley, and he could not help casting an admiring glance towards Effie, whose graceful head was at that moment turned towards her mother—in the act of listening. Effie had been praising the beauty of Clara, and asked if she were an only daughter.

"No—I have one beside," answered Mrs. Dushane, in a confused manner, "but she lives with her uncle, who has adopted her."

"Is it long since you have seen her, Madam?"

"Oh! yes—she was a little child when he took her, and now she is a young lady."

"If she was as beautiful as her sister, I should think you would long to see her," said Effie.

"She wasn't to be compared to Clara; indeed, she was as ugly as her sister is pretty!"

"Poor girl!" cried Effie, "I hope you did not love her less because Nature denied the gift of beauty?"

"Why, no," stammered Mrs. Dushane: "one can't help their looks. But hers were uncommon."

"Do you think you would know her now, after so long an absence?"

"Yes—I should know her any where. She looked like nobody in the world but herself."

A half-suppressed sigh, which followed these words, sounded in Effie's ear like the music of the spheres. She unconsciously echoed it, and it was echoed yet again, for the pensive Delamere was lingering by her side, and this token of sensibility interested him more than all the brilliancy of her attractions."

"Can she have known sorrow?" thought he. The next self-interrogation was—"Has she known love"—"And oh! how ardently, how devotedly," thus continued his meditations; "such a being must love!—Would she accept the reins of a heart, once impassioned as her own? Would she mingle the unfaded blossoms of her youth with the dark cypress and melancholy yew?"

Effie, touched by the soft gloom that hung like a cloud around him, lent a more than willing ear to his conversation. But, while she listened to him, her thoughts often wandered to one whom Clara kept ever near her, and on whom her eyes turned with an expression of unequivocal admiration. A pang shot through her heart, such as but one passion can inflict. Then another succeeded that she was capable of yielding to such an emotion.

"If he be not mine, wholly mine, heart, soul, and life, I will resign him, though I die in the effort," was the language of the maiden's soul. Her love had hitherto flowed on, a clear, unruffled stream, rising in the green hills of adolescence, its channels margined with flowers, and its current gilded by the sunbeams. Now the waters were becoming troubled, for they were rolling over a rocky bed. Did the rocks betoken that a whirlpool was near, and was the frail bark of her happiness to be wrecked in its vortex?

One morning, when the demon of ill-temper, roused by some petty disappointment, had full possession of Clara, and proud Mrs. Dushane, as usual, was the victim of its inflictions, a letter came from Mr. Horton, announcing his return from Europe, and his intention of visiting her immediately, with his adopted daughter. This announciation could not have been made at a moment more propitious for Effie, for her spirit was chafed and smarting from the ungrateful conduct of Clara. She sat, however, like one in a trance, for she was ashamed and perplexed in what manner to receive her long-estranged daughter. An acknowledged heiress, fresh from the courts of Europe, was a being of some consequence, no matter how ugly she might be.

"Poor Effie!" exclaimed she, "I did treat her shamefully, and all for the most selfish and passionate of human beings, with nothing on earth to recommend her but a little beauty, of which I am getting heartily sick."

"Oh! Madam Mame," cried Clara, who still retained some of the deeply respectful language of her childhood, "it is too late to sing that song; you are ten times more vain of me than I am of myself. If I am vain, you taught me to be so; if I am passionate, you set me the example. It won't do for folks that live in glass houses to throw stones. But, good Heavens, what shall we do with Effie, at all these fine parties, they are making for Miss Horton? Oh! I forget she can talk Greek and Latin and French and Italian. She is a learned lady, and will put me quite in the shade. An heiress, too! Perhaps Dudley Alston will fall in love with her. What in the world shall I say to her? I declare I never felt so strange about any thing in my life."

"You had better treat her kindly, if it is only from policy, Miss Clara, for though you deserve it not, she may share her fortune with you—for I remember well the poor thing was generous to a fault!"

Clara, upon reflection, concluded to act upon this hint, and she began to think too that it would be a delightful thing to have Effie near, as a foil to her own beauty. She would shine still brighter in the dark-beaming eyes of Dudley Alston.

Mrs. Dushane felt in a state of trepidation the remainder of the day. The sound of carriage wheels made her start and change color. The sudden opening of the door made her heart beat almost to suffocation.

"Oh! how I wish it were over," she would say. "If I only knew how she felt towards me, I should be easy. If I only knew how she looked! She can't help being ugly though."

About the twilight hour, the carriage of Mr. Horton did indeed roll up to the door and Mrs. Horton beheld her brother descend with a veiled lady clinging to his arm. A large shawl wrapped her figure, though the weather did not seem to require such a protection. Even when she entered, they could see nothing of her face through the thick green veil that covered it.

"Ugly still!" thought Clara, "or she would not take such pains to hide herself."

"I have brought you back a daughter," said Mr. Horton, after embracing his sister and Clara; "but remember, my sister, if you place the least value on a brother's love, not to wound her feelings again, with regard to her personal deficiencies. She comes to you a good, affectionate and intelligent girl, who cherishes no vindictive feelings for the past, and who is anxious to show you all the tenderness of a child.

"Only promise to love me, my mother, half as well as you do Clara," said Effie, in a trembling voice, throwing her arms around her mother's neck and leaning her head on her shoulder, "and I will not ask for more."

Mrs. Dushane, completely overcome by this unexpected softness and humility, pressed the veiled figure of her child to her heart, and wept and sobbed till her brother led her to a seat, and calmed her agitation.

"And you too, my sister," cried the same sweet tremulous voice; "let us henceforth love one another."

Clara returned the embrace, with a semblance of warmth, but she was dying with curiosity to look under the green veil and the muffling shawl. She saw with surprise, however, that the hand which clasped hers, was of exquisite delicacy and symmetry, soft and jewelled as her own.

"Let me take off your bonnet and shawl," said she; "you must be very warm."

The servant at this moment entered with lights, thus dispersing the shades of twilight which lingered in the room. Effie first gave the shawl into Clara's eager hand, revealing by the act the full outlines of her splendid figure; then throwing off the bonnet and veil, and shaking back her jetty ringlets, she turned and knelt at her mother's feet.

"Behold your Effie!" exclaimed she, "no longer sullen and unloving, and I trust no longer ugly. My dear uncle was determined you should admire me, before you knew my identity, so you must forgive me for having appeared in masquerade. Having assumed his honored name, it was an easier task. I think you liked me as a stranger,—refuse not to love me now."

Mrs. Dushane was so bewildered and astonished and delighted, she was very near falling into hysteric fits. When she was composed enough to speak, she repeated in a kind of triumph:

"I said she looked like our Effie—I said she made me think of our Effie."

Clara's blooming cheek turned to the whiteness of marble. The chill of envy penetrated to her very heart. The fascinating being, whom she dreaded as a rival, was then her own sister: so long the object of her contempt and derision. The transformation was too great. It was incredible! Effie met her cold, fixed gaze, and an involuntary shiver ran through her veins. The image of Dudley Alston passed before her and she feared to think of the future.

Mrs. Dushane was so proud of her new daughter, so pleased and excited by the eclat and romance of the circumstances that attended her arrival, and her house was so thronged with visitors, she had hardly any time to think of Clara. But Clara was not forgetful of herself. To win Dudley Alston, whom she loved as far as her vain heart was capable of loving, was the end and aim of all her hopes and resolves. To win him from Effie was a double triumph, for which she was willing to sacrifice truth, honor, and that maiden modesty which shrinks from showing an unsolicited attachment. She believed that if she could convince Effie that she herself was beloved by Alston, she would be too proud ever to look upon him as a lover, and that if Alston supposed Delamere a successful and favored admirer of Effie's, that the same pride would make him stand aloof and forbid him to seek an explanation. Effie was too ingenuous and high-souled to suspect Clara of acting this doubly treacherous part. She felt as only a nature like her's can feel, that Dudley Alston was more and more estranged from her, but she belived Clara was supplanting her in his affections, and disdained either by look or word to draw him back to his allegiance.

"What do you think of Dudley Alston, Effie?" asked Clara, abruptly, once when they chanced to be alone.

Effie's quick blood rushed burningly to her cheeks.

"As the associate of my youthful pleasures, as my fellow student and fellow-traveller, he must naturally seem very near to me," she answered, with assumed composure.

"He is very handsome, very pleasing," said Clara, with affected confusion, "and I cannot help liking him better than any one I ever knew; you who have known him so long, can tell me whether I may trust him—I will say it, Effie—whether I may dare to love him!"

Effie turned deadly pale—she looked in her sister's face, and asked the simple question—

"Has he told you that he loved you, Clara?"

"Good Heavens! what a question!" exclaimed Clara, with a look of offended modesty; "do you think I would have made such a confession, had I not been in the first place aware of his love?"

"No, surely you would not," answered she, in a voice so strange and unnatural, that Clara trembled at the bold step she had taken. She began to fear the consequences.

"What's the matter, Effie?" said she; "are you faint?"

"I don't know," she replied, passing her hand hurriedly over her brow; "but the air is very close here. I will go into the balcony."

She rose as she spoke, and Clara rose simultaneously.

"I would rather be alone," said Effie; and Clara dared not follow.

"The hour of trial is come," thought Effie; "let me meet it without blenching!".

She wandered into the garden, and sat down under the shade of the sycamore, where her uncle had found her years before, longing, in the bitterness of her young heart, to die. How long she sat, she knew not—she was roused by the approach of Dudley Alston, who, seeing her sitting like a pale statue there, forgot, for the moment, the withering doubts which Clara had been breathing into his ear.

"Effie, why are you here, sitting so pale and still?" cried he, in a tone of the deepest tenderness.

Effie rose and leaned against the tree for support.

"Lean on me, dearest Effie," continued he, passing his arm round her waist, and drawing her towards him; "you are ill—you are faint."

Indignation gave her strength, as she released herself from his clasping arms.

"I can forgive inconstancy, Dudley, but not insult," said she, and the lightning darted from her eyes;—"you remember that I told you, if the hour should come, when your heart was not wholly mine, I would not wed my fate to yours, though life should be the sacrifice. Had you nobly and ingenuously told me that you no longer loved me, that my more beautiful sister had won the affection you once thought mine, I would have forgiven, I would still have loved you as a brother. But to mock me still with looks and words of seeming love—I cannot, will not bear it."

"By the Heaven above," exclaimed the young man, vehemently, "I swear this charge is false—who dares to accuse me? If it be Delamere, his lily face shall soon wear another livery."

"No, Dudley—wrong not one who is incapable of any thing mean and calumniating. Clara herself has disclosed to me your love and hers, and I here declare you as free from all allegiance to me, as the cloud that is passing over the sun. But she may as well build her home on that thin, grey cloud, as trust for happiness to a heart as light and vain as yours."

"Effie!" cried he, forcibly seizing her hand, and holding her back as she turned to depart; "you shall not go from me thus. Come with me into your sister's presence, and let her explain this shameful mystery. I have never breathed one syllable to her but the common-place language of admiration. My heart has never wandered from you toward her, or one of woman-kind. Come with me. I demand it as an act of justice—I claim it as a sacred right!"

"Yes," exclaimed a deeper voice from behind, "he has a right, and I will sustain it."

And Mr. Horton emerged from an arbor, which the foliage of the spreading sycamore partially formed. He had been reading in the shade—one of his daily habits in summer—and had overheard a conversation, fraught with intense interest to him. Strange!—the good man despised the character of a listener, and yet it was the second time he had involuntarily acted the part of one, in the really dramatic history of his sister's family. He was indignant and excited, and drawing Effie's trembling arm through his, he led her towards the house, with no lagging footsteps. As they came through a back path, they entered the room before Clara had time to escape. When she met her uncle's stern eye and frowning brow, she knew she was to be arraigned as a criminal, in the presence of the man for whom she had bartered her integrity, and bartered it in vain.

"I have lost him for ever," whispered her sinking heart, "but I will never recant what I have said—he never shall be hers!"

"Clara," said her uncle, approaching still nearer, and keeping his piercing eyes upon her, "tell me the truth, on your soul's peril—has this young man ever made professions of love to you?"

Clara bowed her head slowly, till her ringlets half veiled her beautiful face.

"I have revealed it to my sister, and I cannot deny it to you."

"This is too much!" exclaimed Dudley, his face turning hueless as ashes—"Oh, if she were but a man!"

"Peace, Dudley!" cried Mr. Horton in a commanding voice. Then again turning to Clara:

"I remember, years ago, a little girl, who wantonly broke the geranium her mother prized, and to screen herself from blame, boldly accused her innocent sister of the fault she had herself committed.—Have you forgotten it?—or the shame and sorrow of that hour? Clara, you are still the same—false, false to the very heart's core."

"You always hated me," cried Clara, trying to assume a bolder tone, in the desperation of her situation; "you always hated me, and took Effie's part against me. I wouldn't have told her what I did, though I have said nothing but the truth, if I had thought she would have cared any thing about it.—I'm sure she might be satisfied with her new lover, Mr. Delamere, without making such a fuss about a cast-away, to whom I condescend to show some favor."

"Clara," exclaimed Effie, raising her brow from her uncle's shoulder, where she had bent it in anguish and shame during this disgraceful scene—"Clara, you have betrayed yourself, by this double falsehood. You know that I have refused Mr. Delamere as a lover, but that I honor him as a friend. I considered such a secret sacred, but you have forced me to reveal it. Dudley, my heart acquits you fully, freely, humbly—for oh! how much have I erred in thus doubting thy honor and thy truth."

Their eyes met, as they turned towards each other. How they would have sealed their reconciliation cannot be known, for Mr. Horton threw his arms round them both so closely, in the fulness of his joy, that their hearts beat against each other, while they found a parental pillow on his own.—Tears fell from the good man's eyes.

"God bless you, my children," cried he, kissing Effie's crimsoned cheek, "and make you a blessing to each other. Let not the falsehood and guile of others ever again shake your confidence and love. Let your love be founded on a rock—even the rock of ages—then the winds and waves may beat against it in vain."

During this scene, the guilty, foiled, and consequently wretched Clara, stole unnoticed from the apartment, and in the solitude of her own chamber gave vent to the violence of long-suppressed passion.

"Oh! that I had been born ugly!" she said, stamping in the impotence of her rage: then running to a mirror, and gazing on her convulsed features—"I am ugly now—good Heavens! how horrible are the effects of passion! Yes, mother," continued she—for Mrs Dushane, who had heard the loud and angry voices below, without daring to enter, fearing in some way that Clara was involved in the difficulty, softly opened the door of the chamber and looked anxiously in—"yes, mother, come and see your beauty now! See your own work, and be proud!—If you hadn't called me your beauty, your pet, your darling, till I sickened at your flattery, and loathed the author of it—if you had cultivated in me one moral virtue, I should never have been the detested, hated and despised thing I am now!"

Poor Mrs. Dushane! she had sown the wind, and reaped the whirlwind.

Effie, who pitied her unhappy sister, would gladly have shared her fortune with her, but this her uncle forbade.

"If she should be in want and sorrow, you shall relieve and comfort her," said he, in answer to her prayers. "If she marries, for your mother's sake, you may supply her wedding paraphernalia; but I will never make her the guardian of Heaven's bounty—never give her the means of administering to her own evil passions."

The Ugly Effie, soon a happy bride, became her mother's pet and darling. The Beautiful Clara, still unmarried, continued to embitter her peace, and present a fatal example of the evils of maternal favoritism.

POEMS BY MRS. FRANCES S. OSGOOD.

A careless carol—idly, lightly sung,
Perhaps not worth the singing or repeating,—
But would you check a woman's pen or tongue?
Ah! teach her first to keep her heart from beating!

New York: Published by Clark & Austin, 1846. Philad: Carey & Hart, Fourth and Chesnut streets. 12mo. 220 pp.

It were a superfluous office to commend Mrs. Osgood's poems to the regards of our countrymen. They have long been universally admired for their grace of fancy, the naturalness of their imagery, and their depth of feeling. Her songs appear to inherit their inspiration from a happy and benevolent heart, and their sentiments find quick transit to the hearts of their readers. In perusing over and over again the poems of Mrs. Osgood, one cannot fail to remark the mellifluous rhythm, graphic, nay, almost speaking figures which distinguish the gentler verses of glorious Tom Moore. Indeed, for gentleness and purity we must not be blamed for giving our fair authoress the preference. To show how admirably balanced her mind is, and that her heart is "in the right place," we append a picture, the painter of which has evidently drawn from life.

"HAPPY AT HOME."

BY MRS. F. OSGOOD.

Let the gay and the idle go forth where they will,
In search of soft Pleasure, that syren of ill;
Let them seek her in Fashion's illumined saloon,
Where Melody mocks at the heart out of tune;
Where the laugh gushes light from the lips of the maiden,
While her spirit, perchance, is with sorrow o'erladen;
And where, mid the garlands Joy only should braid,
Is Slander, the snake, by its rattle betray'd,
Ah! no! let the idle for happiness roam,
For me—I but ask to be "happy at home!"

At home! oh, how thrillingly sweet is that word!
And by it what visions of beauty are stirr'd!
I ask not that Luxury curtain my room
With damask from India's exquisite loom;
The sunlight of heaven is precious to me,
And muslin will veil it if blazing too free;
The elegant trifles of Fashion and Wealth
I need not—I ask but for comfort and health!
With these and my dear ones—I care not to roam,
For, oh! I am happy, most "happy at home!"

One bright little room where the children may play,
Unfearful of spoiling the costly array;
Where he, too—our dearest of all on the earth,
May find the sweet welcome he loves at his hearth;
The fire blazing warmly—the sofa drawn nigh;
And the star-lamp alight on the table close by;
A few sunny pictures in simple frames shrined,
A few precious volumes—the wealth of the mind;
And here and there treasured some rare gem of art,
To kindle the fancy or soften the heart;
Thus richly surrounded, why, why should I roam?
Oh! am I not happy—most "happy at home?"

The little ones, weary of books and of play,
Nestle down on our bosoms—our Ellen and May!
And softly the simple, affectionate prayer,
Ascends in the gladness of innocence there;
And now ere they leave us, sweet kisses and light
They lavish, repeating their merry "good night!"
While I with my needle, my book, or my pen,
Or in converse with him, am contented again,
And cry—"Can I ever be tempted to roam,
While blessings like these make me happy at home?"

THE GYPSY LOVER.

Danger, long travel, want, or woe,
Soon change the form that best we know—
And blanch at once the hair.
Hard toil can roughen form and face,
Nor does old age a wrinkle trace,
More deeply than despair.
Happy whom none of these befall,
But this poor Gypsy knew them all.

Marmion.

It was now the depth of autumn; and, according to an immemorial custom, the poorer inhabitants of Debretzin, whose lands lie at several days' journey from their homes, pursued their way across the sandy plain; the greater portion in droskies, or little wagons, and not a few on small, lean-looking horses.

On the produce of these acres, though situated so far from them, depend their almost only hopes of sustenance, and thither, for a week or so, twice or thrice every year, do they journey with their families, as cultivation, seed-time, and harvest, call for their presence.

"Thrice did they cross the shade of night," and three times did the horn, blown beneath the morning sun, summon them to arise and be going, ere they hailed, at the base of the great Carpathian chain, the scantily tilled fields, enclosed with ranges of thinly scattered poplars; the only inheritance which had descended to them from their fathers. In the course of a few hours they came to a spot marked out by a gibbet, on which a criminal had been hanged, and the road branches out from a central spot in many directions; the calvalcade paused.

After a short halt, to permit of a general palaver, and interchange of amicable greetings, it divided itself into various portions; wagons drove to right and left, accompanied or followed by panniered horses, bearing women and children; while, perchance, a listless donkey lagged in the rear, with its burthen of kitchen utensils. Behind all, stalked the brawny peasant, with his long whip, which, ever and anon, he threw out before him, and smacked over the heads of the jaded animals, as a tale-bearer of threatening castigation; his wide, heavy jack-boots impeding the journey he strove to cheer with a timeous whiff of tobacco smoke, a loud shrill whistle, or the chanting of some old, rude, half-forgotten Sclavonian ditty.

The area of cultivation consisted of small fields, or rather patches of wheat mingled with rye, oats, or maize, the last of which predominated, from its being the most productive in crop, averaging, generally, in the rate of thirty-fold. No houses being erected, as no person took up a permanent residence in the neighborhood, the sound of the hammer echoed in a hundred quarters over the plain, as each family busied itself in fitting up an abode, such as was requisite for accommodation during the time of harvest, varying in shape and dimensions, according to the number intended to be packed in the interior, or as the geniality of the weather seemed to warrant.—Some constructed tents, by fixing four poles in the ground at right angles, stretching a blanket between them, and covering the top by means of skins, or oiled cloth. Others, by nailing boards together, while many contented themselves with simply sleeping in their oblong wagons, screened from the cold and moisture of night, by the envelopements of a coarse cloak, or by burrowing, like pigs in a barn-yard, beneath bundles of fresh straw.

It was now evening. Surmounted by masses of picturesque and illuminated clouds, the great sun was sinking majestically behind the mountain boundary of the west. The voice of song continued from the woodlands, as the birds chanted their vesper hymns; a shrill, murmuring monotonous sound, like the tinkling of a thousand little bells, was heard at a distance, which was afterwards discovered to proceed from innumerable little frogs, collected around the margin of the swamps and marshy grounds. The various encampments were now almost finished; and the cattle enjoyed, beside them, the privilege of a conscientiously long tether, to make up matters with their masters, and annihilate the marks and remembrances of fatigue, encountered in a long and difficult journey. The men in their loose cloaks, during the time that preparations were making for the evening meal, rested before the line of huts, in the fine, serene sunshine, smoking pipes, and making observations on the changes of the landscape, over which their eyes wandered; while, here and there, might be seen some one of the younger females, passing to, or returning, with the napkin on her head, from the stream that flowed beneath its fringe of pollards, at the western extremity of the enclosures. Among these was Theresa, the heroine of our little story, whom we shall now briefly introduce.

This Hungarian beauty was now in her twentieth year, fair as a lily of the brook; and, though born to the estate almost of a peasant, nature had beneficiently endowed her with those gentle and delicate feelings, which can alone add lustre to a higher station, and form the only real distinguished excellence of female character. With her aged parents, who were alike contented, virtuous, and respected by all who knew them, she had come up from their home at Debretzin, to assist in the labors of the harvest. In stature she was rather below the common, and more slender than otherwise, but her form was elegant in the extreme. She had none of that clownish heaviness and insipidity about her, which seems to hang like a dim wintry cloud over a countenance, which is thereby rendered unmeaning, though well favored; but, in the grace of her gait, and in the expressive quickness of her eye, dwelt the life and animation, which communicate themselves to others.—There is no doubt, in a word, that she was a bright, sweet little creature: and whoever glanced down for a moment at her small foot and taper ankle, knew at once that the elastic form to which it belonged was one of fairy agility.

She had reached the stream; one foot rested on a stone a little in from the brink; and, with her right hand, she was dipping down the pitcher, while, with the other, she supported herself by catching hold of a wild lilac bush which grew behind her, when she was accosted unawares by a voice, which caused her to start, as she had perceived no one, and deemed herself alone in the solitary place. Turning round to whence the sound came, she saw an old man rising up from the flowery bank, whereon he seemed to have been resting, clad in the habit of a Cygani, or Gypsy; and, as people belonging to this wandering tribe are to be met with in every section of the country, his appearance, after the first startle of surprise was over, excited no alarm.

"This is a fine, calm evening, my child; may I have a draught from thy pitcher?"

He drank, and proceeded:

"Now, by the sparkle of thine eye, I guess, that since we happen to be here alone, you would confess to me that you would like to have your fortune told. Say at once, now, that I am right. Is it not so, my sweet girl?".

"Nay, now," returned she, making an effort to draw her breath, which her momentary surprise seemed to have impeded, and blushing, as she lingered to answer him; "nay, now, good father, you are wrong, believe me; I have no such anxiety about me. How should I, pray now?"

"These are women's words," answered the Gypsy, "not to be taken just as they are spoken; though, like worn coin, they sometimes pass current at full value. There is one—nay, but look in my face—a secret one, in whose fate and fortune you are not altogether uninterested. Turn not away, child; look up, and tell me, if you dare, you simpering fairy, that it is otherwise."

Theresa looked half playfully at him.

"That may, or may not be. I will not make you wiser. You only want to try me; but, if I had secrets, I know how to keep them, my good father.—Isn't it foolish in an old man like you," added she smilingly, "to be prying into a poor girl's thoughts? But, good evening; I am loitering with you here when I have other things to attend to;" and with this she stooped down to raise the pipkin from the stone on which it rested.

"Nay, stop for a moment, my nightingale; I ask not for your secrets. But what would you say were I to tell you, without asking you any questions at all, what you oftenest think about? Love promises bring long hours of thought after them, before they come to their fulfilment; as the morning sun casts before him many a flattering and fleeting ray, before he shews his bright face over the mountains. Sometimes they may be altogether forgotten, when change of scene, and change of companions, bring about change of heart. Yours are not so—if I have any skill in reading a lesson from a fair face."

"Old man, you are flattering me. Farewell—I must away, good even."

"Nay, nay, another moment, and I have done.—Methinks I see one who is far away; yet, amid strange scenes, and amid strange faces, he is mindful of his home, and of a dwelling still dearer than his home. It stands on the banks of a stream; its windows look to the east; and at each side of the door are two barberry bushes. He is mindful of a love he left there: ah! as mindful as ever you could be of such a one. It will be well for you both when the wars are over, and the weapons put into their sheaths. Now, you look down, and sigh. I knew that I had something which you would like to hear."

"How can you, who are an old man, speak such silly things? or how can you know anything about foreign parts, or about people you have never seen? I could almost think—but I am a foolish girl, or I would not stand listening to your nonsense, as earnestly as if it were one of Father Nicholas' sermons. Really, I am foolish, and the evening coming down so heavily," she added, pointing to the hills, whose declivities were darkening to azure, and to the mass of sombre cloud above them, from whose margin the gold of day was decaying, and lifted up her pitcher to depart.

"Let me look at your hand a moment—but a moment, then, since you have no patience with me, and care not to hear my prattle, however full of good things, and fair promises, and I shall tell you in a breath, fair flower, whether the future shall be sunshiny, or sombred with clouds, like you. Why do you hesitate? Do you doubt my skill? Indeed, you have soon come to think yourself very wise."

Theresa stretched forth her small white hand to him; and, turning up the palm of it, she looked in his face, as, with a semblance of serious thought, he cast his eyes along the lines of life.

"Now I know your destiny, Theresa;—is that not your name?"

She looked at him perplexed, and then nodded assent. He then added, with a degree of fervor, as he gazed over her beauties with a more than momentary steadfastness, which made her shrink, and turn away her eyes from him:—

"He whom you love, Theresa,—he who loves thee as his soul, is not far distant. I, who perhaps have never gazed on you before, am prophet enough to assure you of this; and do you still doubt my skill? Lo, the truth is at hand, and the flight of time shall not be far, till my words be made good. But there are leisure hours till then: and I leave these things, my fair girl, for your dream this night. I bargained for no fee—but you will not refuse me this;" and, gently pressing her yielded hand, he raised her fingers to his lips,—"it is a sufficient reward for my fortune-telling. Despise not a Cygani hereafter.—Weeds are but flowers under a meaner name. Good night, and may Heaven bless you."

With a mind overflowing with meditation, Theresa returned home; and, during the remainder of the evening, her mother observed her pensive and silent. She sat, seemingly attentive to what was going on, yet absent when spoken to, and more inclined to gaze into the fire, than to look her neighbor in the face.

Night passed over, with many a dream, peaceful or perturbed; and, with the morning sun, all were astir, and preparing for the field labors. Theresa, like Juliet, was willing to mistake the nightingale for the lark, such a paradise of vision floated before her heated imagination; nevertheless, she arose with the rest, partook of their slight breakfast, and with her sickle thrown over her arm, passed forth in the early sunlight to the labors of harvest.—To the buoyant mind, toil is scarcely an effort. The birds sang, and the flowers bloomed; the waters made a pleasant sound, and hour after hour passed rapidly away, while Theresa dreamed sweet dreams, and never before felt such a delight in the soft breeze and the verdant landscape.

When the sultry day had journeyed by, beholding an industrious band gathering in the treasures which Providence had furnished so liberally for their support, and the evening star had arisen to light them on their homeward road, Theresa started, and her heart went a fluttering, when the band of females were met by the same old gypsy, who was loitering by the wayside. She knew not whether his eye had singled her out or not, as she turned away her head to avoid his gaze; but, when they had passed on a little way, she glanced behind, and saw him making up to the men, who were escorting the loaded wains. Like an idler, who had nought but his amusement in view, he turned back again with them; and, at a bend of the road, Theresa, mounting on a stone, saw him in conference with her father.

With that hospitality so characteristic of the Hungarian peasantry, he was invited to partake of the evening meal; and, when all were duly refreshed, the old men of the party replenished their pipes and seated themselves on the temporary settle before the door.

"Have you been long in these parts?" said old Peter Shemnitz to the Cygani, after an hour's conversation and fellowship had made them better acquainted; "or do you reside at a distance?"

"You may as well ask the direction to Cain's dwelling as to mine. We are none of your shell-fish that grow to the rock. As the swallow passeth from country to country, so pass we from town to town. Will you have a little music?"

"What can you give us?"

"Why, almost what you choose, on violin or dudel-sack—Zrinii's March, Maria Carlvitch, the song of Istolar, or anything you like. I have brought a famous pipe from Vienna."

"So you have been at the great city, come tell us something about it. 'Tis said all the great kings are there, carousing after the wars are over."

"True, indeed," said the Cygani, smiling; "the times are miraculously changed. The French Lion has at length been caught in the toils; and I hope that a long peace will bring prosperity and plenty along with it."

"Come, tell us what you saw. It is a mighty fine thing to have seen the world. 'Tis said the Emperor's town is ten times as big as Pesth."

"Truly I cannot exactly tell, but an immense place it is, without doubt; and so rich and fine!—Ah, if you only saw the nobles there, with their crosses and golden stars, galloping through the streets in their grand chariots!—If you only saw the palaces, and the churches, and the castles, you should never think any more of Pesth, and its bridge of boats. But other things than seeing rare sights caused me to travel. I had an only son, and he was called away to join the army; for we, borderers of Transylvania, must all be trained up as soldiers. He was an only son; and after he was torn from his home, I heard nothing of him for years. I had none to leave behind me, none to care for me, and of what value is life to a man in that case? The news of bloody battles came to us often and often, as the sound of far-off thunder comes upon the wind;—the yearnings of a father's heart are difficult to be borne;—so, having braced my little bundle on my shoulders, and taken my staff into my hand, I even locked the door of my widowed hut, and set out, on what many would reckon, a fool's journey."

"Was it so?—What success had you in your travels? I dare say you found him out after all?"

"Alas! you urge me to recall heavy thoughts to my mind, but"——

"No, no; save yourself the pains. We understand that he perished on the field of battle."

"Yes, indeed he did; but it was some consolation to my old heart (here he wiped his eyes) to find, that he still lived in the remembrance of his comrades, who cherished his memory with a fond regard, and welcomed the father from love to his son. There was one of them who had long been his tent fellow, and had stood by his side in many an action, in many an hour of danger. By the by, he came from this very neighborhood. His forefathers had possessed a place at Warlada for many generations; till forced in his father's time to mortgage it.—His name was Ludovico ——; I forget what more."

"Ludovico Marlin! I knew him well, I knew him well!—Theresa," he cried, turning round his head towards the cabin door,—"Theresa, here is one who has seen ——"

"So you knew him?"—said the Cygani, sharply.

"Knew him! how could I not know him,—Ludovico!—For years many, and full of pleasure, he ate at my board, and warmed himself at my humble hearth; though he was no doubt, born to a better fate. Our parting was as the tearing asunder of the nearest and dearest kindred, though, poor fellow, his only hold upon us was his good conduct, and our own compassion; for his parents, who were once in better circumstances, died early, and left him on the wide world, unprotected, and an orphan.—And are we to see him so soon again? The news is like a cordial to my heart."

"So you are the man I am in search of?" said the Cygani, catching hold of his hand. "That morning on which I parted from him, he asked me through what part of Hungary lay my road; and, on ascertaining that I journeyed this way on my homeward route to Buda, he begged of me to search out Peter Shemnitz, and tell him of his welfare."

Peter could scarcely refrain from hugging the Gypsy.

"Theresa," he cried, "Theresa, my love, bring us out a flagon of your elder wine, and let us make merry. Girl, why do you stand there, moping? make haste!—You have been crying, child:—a pretty occasion, too, surely."

The wine was set down, and circled: the pipes whiffed; the jest and the song went round; and the Cygani, elevated with the good cheer, shook off the weight of years; and, as he pressed his dudel-sack with might and main, he failed not to make it "discourse most eloquent music," till twilight had sombred into night, and the glittering stars were high in the forehead of Heaven.

Notwithstanding the most kind and hospitable entreaties, the Cygani could not be persuaded to consent to an abode among them for a few days. When sunrise warned the local colony to the fields, the old man buckled his knapsack on his back, and, taking his staff in hand, prepared for his onward pilgrimage. All set out together, as their paths lay for a quarter of a mile in the same direction. The morning was calm and delightful; the golden sunshine lay on the sides of the far-off Carpathian hills; and fringing the extensive plain, arose dark forests, which, in several places, bounded the horizon.

A delicious odor was wafted on the gentle breeze from the luxuriant wild-flowers; and the mild air was musical with the song of birds. Theresa lagged behind with some of her companions, who failed not to remark the feverishness of her looks, and the languor that slept on her heavy eyelid; but she smiled away their inquiries; listened, or seemed to listen, to their carols, as she pointed out the beauties of hill and dale that expanded around them. The Gypsy loitered with her father at the cross which parted their several roads; and when Theresa came up, he took her by the hand, bade God bless her, and departed.

If the reader is particularly anxious to know what kind of harvest these peasants had to depend upon for their next year's subsistence, we have the ineffable pleasure of assuring him that he may keep his mind easy on that score, as the crop was considerably above an average one: and day after day beheld them with grateful hearts gathering in the bountiful provision which a kind Providence had willed for their wants; but, with leave, we shall let them alone, until all be cut down, bundled up, and stored into the wagons; while we return, in the meantime, to the city of Debretzin, and endeavor to find something there to fill up what might otherwise prove a vacuum with respect to interest.

After six years' participation with the great army of the Germanic Empire, of the fatigues, horrors and casualties of war, Ludovico had returned to his native place. The field of Leipsic, so fatal to Napoleon, was that in which he had last been actively engaged; and though he had received wounds in less desperate encounters, from that great battle he had escaped unharmed. From that time his military career was restricted to garrison duty, till the arrangement, resulting from the throne-overthrowing victory of Waterloo, once more shed a hope of happy days through the wide extent of the continent, and restored many a war-worn soldier to the bosom of his family. Countless, alas! were the thousands that returned no more!

From the constitutional laws of Hungary, it results, that the tenure of property is next to unalterable—a certain way of maintaining the state vassalage to which the great body of the people is subjected, as their claims, when preferred, can be carried in all cases of emergency even from the Herrenstuhl, or court held by the nobles on their own estates, where they are but little likely to obtain impartial justice, to the general council of the nation at Offen. From the operation of an ancient edict, still enforced, property may be transferred on a mortgage for thirty years, but, at the expiration of that term, it is redeemable by the lineal descendants of the ancient proprietors.

Before Ludovico was born, the small property which, from immemorial time, had remained in the hands of the Marlin family, passed, with this feudal burden of course upon it, into the possession of strangers, who, doubtless, reckoned themselves secure in lasting occupation; for, in the lowly estate of a peasant, the only son had been permitted to grow up to manhood, and had been drawn away at the age of eighteen, in the conscriptions for the army. The time, at which restitution could be demanded, had now well passed on. A large placard was exhibited on the house of the Rent-richter; and, failing the appearance of a claimant, with adequate proofs of his consanguinity, the estate passed, within a month, irretrievably into the hands of the present occupier.

Fortunately, at this very era, fate put it into the power of our young soldier to make a personal demand for the restitution of his paternal estate; and immediately on his return to Debretzin, he laid his claims before the constituted authorities; and as immediately were they attended to. For, to conciliate the lower orders, this branch of their claims upon the state is most assiduously attended to—and the occupant, knowing that no countenance will be given either to litigation or refusal, on the mortgage being paid up, tacitly left the house and adjoining fields, already stripped of their autumnal honors, open for the entrance and occupation of their legitimate proprietor.

With all possible despatch, things were put into order, and the dwelling prepared for the reception of the young officer of hussars; for to that rank the fortune of war, and his own exertions, had honorably raised him. Though, from the absence of all his old friends, on their accustomed harvest excursion, he was literally surrounded by strangers, yet money is a rare talisman, and can work wonders which might startle the most profound adept in alchemy. In a few brief days, the house was replenished in a style to which it had not found itself equal for half a century. The plots were weeded and delved into trim; the wild wood pruned away; and the vines festooned with greater neatness about the slender pillars, which form, along with the projecting roof, common to the better houses throughout the country, a kind of piazza, where, during rainy or intensely warm weather, the family may work, sit, or amuse themselves.

In the course of a fortnight, all Ludovico's plans were executed—his grounds set in order—and his house such as he had imaged in his mind's eye;—nor could he look upon either without a degree of pride and satisfaction, that may readily be pardoned to a newly-created landlord. The future appeared bright before him; hopefulness sat upon his heart; dreams, long cherished, seemed verging towards accomplishment; after procrastination and absence, the anticipations of youthful ardor glowed in more beautiful colors, and he wearied for the time when Peter Shemnitz and his family should return, less that they might wonder at his wealth, than that he might shew them all his gratitude, for benefits which had been conferred without expectation of fee or reward.

Ten days had elapsed—and the harvest of the peasantry of Debretzin was nearly over; when, one evening, as the young of both sexes were indulging themselves in their accustomed dance on the green-sward, beneath the lilac trees, the Gypsy again made his appearance. He stood for a few minutes looking on with a pleased countenance, seemingly participating in the lightheartedness of youth; and, perhaps, revolving in his mind the many happy times, when long, long ago, on the banks of the far-off Danube, he himself joined in similar festivities—but the remembrance either overcame him, or some other thoughts called him away, for he shortly turned on his heel, and strayed by the hedge-row of pollards down to the temporary abode of Peter Shemnitz.

While yet at some distance, he descried the old man on his bench by the door, smoking his accustomed pipe; and, as he approached still more closely, was somewhat vexed to meet with rather a cold reception, Peter looking much more sombre and demure than usual. His mind seemed either otherwise occupied, or he wished not to take any notice of him, as he was almost upon him before he raised his head, or wished him a good evening. The old man started from his revery, but immediately recovering himself, recognised the face of the stranger, and proffered cordially the right hand of friendship.

"So you have come back to see us once more, have you? You are well met; for we are not right here. Most of your people pretend to skill in the application of remedies; and my daughter, poor soul, is ailing."

"What! Theresa?"

"Yes; I have but one daughter, and I am afraid to lose her. Better 't were that the old died first; but why should I dare to murmur?"

"Why, she looked blooming and healthy but two weeks ago, when I was here?"

"It is exactly since that time that I have observed her not looking well; food she would scarcely look at, and word would she scarcely speak any. Some slow fever is, I am afraid, working within her; but, come in, and you shall see her yourself."

Theresa started up from her seat by the hearth, as the Cygani entered; and a faintness came over her heart, insomuch that her head sank back on the wall, but, without complaint, she speedily reassumed her composure, and welcomed back the stranger to their dwelling. "That man," she thought, "somehow or other possesses secrets which give him a control over my destiny. He seems to know more of what lies nearest to my heart, than he seems willing to make me aware of. Sure he must be the bearer of evil tidings—he dares not to leave them unrevealed; yet he has not the heart to communicate them! May Heaven strengthen me for all things!"

"Your father tells me, Theresa," said the Gypsy, gently taking hold of her hand, "that you have been unwell since I saw you. Can I do any thing for you?"

Theresa, turning her beautiful, but languid eyes from him, looked on her father, and said, "My dear father, you deceive yourself; I have nothing to complain of, your affection for me deceives you. Believe me, I am well—nay, shake not your head,—quite well."

"Yes," added the Cygani, smiling, "I insist upon her being quite well; as I have returned back all the way from Debretzin, on a special errand to her. Theresa, believe me, it is true."

Theresa looked anxiously at him, and heaved an involuntary sigh from the bottom of her heart, that made her bosom swell, as if it would have cracked the girdle that surrounded her waist.

"Indeed, it is quite true. A young soldier has returned to his home, and is making bustling preparations to have all things in order against your return. Hither have I come at his earnest request, to remind you of an old promise, which now demands immediate fulfilment—always providing that your heart remains the same as when that promise was made."

Theresa read in her father's face the lines of doubt and anxiety; and, looking round to the Cygani, he said—

"To whom do you allude? There is but one person alive to whom my daughter shall, with my consent, give her hand; and, if I am not mistaken, that person is far enough away yet, I'll warrant it.—Though, droop not, my Theresa, the day may not be far distant, when the separated may meet to sunder again no more. If faith dwell in a human bosom, fear not. The token which claims you may come to——"

"Knowest thou that?" cried the Cygani, drawing from his breast a golden bracelet, marked with the letters T. and L.—"Knowest thou this?—By this token am I sent to claim attention to my errand!"

"Has Ludovico returned?" asked Theresa, eagerly, as she started to her feet, clasping her hands together as she approached the Gypsy—"Oh, say he is well!—Is he at Debretzin?—Oh, he will be here, father, he will not wait; he will be here to see us! Then all my fears and my dark dreams are false. Half did my heart assure me that he had fallen on the field of battle; that I—that we should never see him more."

"Stuff—stuff, Theresa," said old Peter, checking her; "you must be well now, and dream so no more."

"Stuff—stuff," echoed the Cygani. "On the word of an old man, with one foot in the grave, your lover is well, and awaits your arrival at Debretzin. He could not get away immediately, but hurried me back to apprise you of his arrival. He is to meet you on your road home, nevertheless, and I have my fears, Theresa—why do you look afraid, girl?—that when you enter Debretzin, it must be under a different name than that with which you left it. Nay, but you need not blush—neither need you pout and try to look angry. I am only telling you the plain truth."

"To-morrow we set out early," said old Peter, hobbling to and fro, with his hands thrust into his large coat-pockets, and looking ten years younger than he did but half an hour before; "and, methinks, it is a day too late. Warn our neighbors, Theresa, that we delay not in setting out by sunrise."

Peter and the Gypsy spent a blithe night of it together; and as the latter had seen much of the world in his wanderings, the hours passed over, winged with interest and cheerfulness, till the time of sleep arrived.

One of the lowest of the peasantry, with a strong twist of sinister intellectuality, whose province was that of a herd to, and feeder of, the cattle, aroused the little colony, by careering out on a donkey, and parading through the whole extent of the lines, whom he summoned by sound of a large crooked horn, to strike their encampment, and prepare for march. Nor was his part ill acted, as, in the course of an hour, the whole machinery of horse and foot was effectually put in motion. The dews of morning, as yet undrunken by the sun, lay on the grass when their journey commenced, and, by an hour before noon, they had gained the height that looked far forth into other valleys. Nothing particular occurred till the ensuing day, when the Gypsy produced a letter, which he seemed to have forgotten, purporting that Ludovico was to meet Theresa at the Chapel of St. John, and to claim her at the altar for his bride.

"And how looked Theresa?" the female reader, with very pertinent curosity, may be supposed to inquire, "and what like was the dress which, along with his letter, the Cygani brought her from her lover? It would be a pretty story, indeed, if essentials like these were to be omitted."

Well, then, Theresa looked charmingly. She had ever been considered a beauty, but, on the ensuing morning, when the spire of St. John's rose in sight, on the word of an honest tale-teller, I assure you, that, of all days in the year, she looked on that one the most bewitchingly. As to her dress, I suppose that I dare not pass it over, though really—but here it is. Over her head was thrown a square of very thin white muslin, wreathed so as to form a roll in front, one fold falling down the back, and another towards either shoulder, the margin of the whole being adorned with a rich lace, several inches deep. Her vest, which was without sleeves, of a fine crimson cloth, richly embroidered with silver spangles, accurately fitted her sylph-like figure, as far as the waist, which was confined by a girdle of blue silk, scarcely to be discerned, from the multitude of beautiful small beads ornamenting it. Below the girdle, the vest descended in loose folds to a little under the knee, and terminated in a deep fringe, corresponding with the girdle. At the bosom the vest opened, to display the curiously laced front of a satin bodice, held together by silver clasps, yet affording indistinct snatches of a breast fairer and finer than all that enveloped it; amidst the elysium of which, "a thousand little loves in ambush lay." Under the fringe of the tunic, a few inches of snow-white muslin petticoat were allowed to descend, so as only partially to interfere with the elegance of a finely turned ancle in its silken stocking, and contrasting well with the yellow boot, delicately edged with black fur, which enclosed her slender foot. Throw, now, a slight shawl of pale blue over her shoulders loosely, and you have her such as she entered the church for the last time in her state of "single blessedness."

Although no great judge of these matters, yet it may be affirmed that since she looked so passing well, the taste of her lover is not to be disputed. It may be said, that a genuine natural beauty must look well in anything. We stop not to dispute the point—but repeat, that in the costume selected by Ludovico, she appeared beautiful, beautiful as the feigned wood nymph, or the Oriental Peri—the light of love glancing in her dark eyes, and the rose of paradise alternately fading and flushing on her damask cheek.

But where was the expected bridegroom? The company were already assembled, and the priest, in his robes, awaited his arrival. Dressed out in their holiday garments, the whole agricultural colony, male and female, attended in honor and affection to the parties; so that the small chapel was crowded, and a hundred uncovered heads formed a semi-circle around the open space by the altar. Silence and expectation dwelt in the midst of them, and the eyes of every one were turned on the almost angelic beauty of the young bride, who was now led in.—The priest summoned the parties to stand forward. Theresa, attended by one of her companions, in a dress similar in fashion, but less costly than her own, was conducted forward by her father. But where was the bridegroom? The old gypsy, who was standing amid the spectators, exchanged looks of anxiety with the venerable Peter, as if in wonder what could possibly have happened. He read perplexity in every line of the old man's countenance—the perplexity of a father—and he stepped forward, in Christian charity, to breathe some comfort or consolation into his ear. Theresa lifted up her eyes to him as he came forward. His wide clumsy boots had been cast aside, in honor of the auspicious day, and considering his years, his step seemed elastic with youthful vigor. He exchanged a second glance with her, but could no more. The hoary beard and mustaches, which had so effectually disguised him, were in a moment on the ground, and, throwing aside the large Hungarian cloak which shrouded him, Ludovico, in a rich huzzar uniform, stood for an instant confessed—he rushed forward to his matchless Theresa—who, meeting him half way, threw her arms about his neck in her surprise and joy, and almost fainted away on his breast.

A murmer of delight and admiration arose—the priest proceeded with the ceremony, and putting the hand of Theresa into that of her lover, acted as the immediate vicegerent of the Deity, in uniting together a most deserving pair, and leading them to the choicest blessings that earth has in store for her children.

TO MY SISTER,

LATELY MARRIED.

Let not my sister, though a wife,
Bid all her fears adieu,
Comforts there are in married life,
But there are crosses too.

I do not wish to mar your mirth,
With an ungrateful sound;
But yet remember, bliss on earth,
No mortal ever found.

Your prospects and your hopes are great:
May God your hopes fulfil;
But you will find in every state
Some difficulties still.

The rites which lately joined your hands,
Cannot ensure content:
Religion forms the strongest bands,
And Love the best cement.

A friendship founded on esteem,
Life's battering blast endures;
It will not vanish as a dream,
And which, I hope, is yours.

But yet God's blessing daily crave,
Nor trust your youthful heart;
You must Divine assistance have
To act a prudent part.

Tho' you have left a parent's wing,
Nor longer ask its care;
It is but seldom husbands bring
A lighter yoke to wear.

They have their humors and their faults,
So mutable is man:
Excuse his failings in your thoughts,
And hide them if you can.

No anger nor resentment keep,
Whatever is amiss.
Be reconciled before you sleep,
And seal it with a kiss.

Should he see cause to reprehend,
Bear it with mild address;
Remember he's thy dearest friend,
And love him ne'er the less.

It's not the way to scold at large,
To clamor, rage, and boast:
For wives their duty best discharge,
Who condescend the most.

Mutual attempts to serve and please,
Each other will endear;
Thus may you spend your life with ease,
Nor discord interfere.

Thus give your tender passions scope,
Yet better things pursue,
Be Heaven the object of your hope,
And lead him thither too.

Since you must both resign your breath,
And only God knows when:
So live that you may part at death
To meet with joy again.

And may the Lord your ways approve,
And grant you both a share
Of His redeeming, saving love,
And providential care.

THE BIBLE LEGEND
OF THE WISSAHIKON.

FROM GEORGE LIPPARD'S SECOND LECTURE BEFORE THE WILLIAM WIRT INSTITUTE.

It was here in these wilds of the Wissahikon, on the day of the battle, as the noonday sun came shining through the thickly clustered leaves, that two men met in deadly combat. They grappled in deadly conflict near a rock, that rose—like the huge wreck of some primeval world—at least one hundred feet above the dark waters of the Wissahikon.

That man with the dark brow, and the darker grey eye, flashing with deadly light, with the muscular form, clad in the blue hunting frock of the Revolution, is a Continental named Warner. His brother was murdered the other night at the Massacre of Paoli. That other man, with long black hair, drooping along his cadaverous face, is clad in the half-military costume of a Tory refugee. That is the murderer of Paoli, named Dabney.

They had met there in the woods by accident, and now they fought, not with sword or rifle, but with long and deadly hunting knives, that flash in the light, as they go turning and twining and twisting over the green sward.

At last the Tory was down! Down on the green sward with the knee of the Continental upon his breast—that upraised knife quivering in the light, that dark grey eye flashing death into his face!

"Quarter—I yield!" gasped the Tory, as the knee was pressed upon his breast—"Spare me—I yield!"

"My brother!" said the patriot-soldier, in that low deep tone of deadly hate—"My brother cried for 'quarter' on the night of Paoli, and, even as he clung to your knees, you struck that knife into his heart! Oh! I will give you the quarter of Paoli!"

And his hand was raised for the blow, and his teeth were clenched in deadly hate. He paused for a moment, and then pinioned the Tory's arms, and with one rapid stride dragged him to the verge of the rock, and held him quivering over the abyss.

"Mercy!" gasped the Tory, turning black and ashy by turns, as that awful gulf yawned below. "Mercy! I have a wife—a child—spare me!"

Then the Continental, with his muscular strength gathered for the effort, shook the murderer once more over the abyss, and then hissed this bitter sneer between his teeth:

"My brother had a wife and two children!—The morning after the night of Paoli, that wife was a widow, those children were orphans!—Wouldn't you like to go and beg your life of that widow and her children?"

This proposal, made by the Continental in the mere mockery of hate, was taken in serious earnest by the horror-stricken Tory. He begged to be taken to the widow and her children, to have the pitiful privilege of begging his life. After a moment's serious thought, the patriot-soldier consented; he bound the Tory's arms yet tighter; placed him on the rock again—led him up the woods.—A quiet cottage, embosomed among trees, broke on their eyes.

They entered that cottage. There, beside the desolate hearth-stone, sat the widow and her children. She sat there a matronly woman of thirty years, with a face faded by care, a deep dark eye, and long black hair hanging in dishevelled flakes about her shoulders.

On one side was a dark-haired boy, of some six years—on the other a little girl, one year younger, with light hair and blue eyes. The Bible—an old and venerable volume—lay open on that mother's knee.

And then that pale-faced Tory flung himself upon his knees, confessed that he had butchered her husband on the night of Paoli, but begged his life at her hands!

"Spare me, for the sake of my wife, my child!"

He had expected that his pitiful moan would touch the widow's heart—but not one relenting gleam softened her pale face.

"The Lord shall judge between us!" she said in a cold icy tone, that froze the murderer's heart.—"Look! The Bible lays open upon my knee. I will close that volume, and then this boy shall open it, and place his finger at random upon a line, and by that line you shall live or die!"

This was a strange proposal, made in full faith of a wild and dark superstition of the olden time.

For a moment the Tory kneeling there, livid as ashes, was wrapt in thought. Then in a faltering voice, he signified his consent.

Raising her dark eyes to Heaven, the mother prayed the GREAT FATHER to direct the finger of her son—she closed the Bible—she handed it to that boy, whose young cheek reddened with loathing as he gazed upon his father's murderer!

He took the Bible—opened its holy pages at random—placed his finger on a verse.

Then there was silence!

Then that Continental soldier, who had sworn to avenge his brother's death, stood there with dilating eyes and parted lips.

Then the culprit kneeling on the floor, with a face like discolored clay, felt his heart leap to his throat.

Then in a clear, bold voice, the widow read this line from the Old Testament;—it was short, yet terrible:

"THAT MAN SHALL DIE!"

Look! The brother springs forward to plunge a knife into the murderer's heart, but the Tory, pinioned as he is, clings to the widow's knees! He begs that one more trial may be made by the little girl, that child of five years, with golden hair and laughing eyes.

The widow consents; there is an awful pause.

With a smile in her eye, without knowing what she does, that little girl opens the Bible as it lays on her mother's knee—she turns her laughing face away—she places her finger upon a line.

That awful silence grows deeper!

The deep-drawn breath of the brother, the broken gasps of the murderer, alone disturb the silence.—The widow and dark-eyed boy are breathless.

That little girl, unconscious as she was, caught a feeling of awe from the horror of the countenances around her, and stood breathless, her face turned aside, her tiny fingers resting on that line of life or death.

At last gathering courage, the widow bent her eyes to the page, and read. It was a line from the New Testament:

"LOVE YOUR ENEMIES."

Ah! that moment was sublime!

Oh! awful Book of God, in whose dread pages we see Job talking face to face with Jehovah, or Jesus waiting by Samaria's well, or wandering by the waves of dark Galilee. Oh! awful Book, shining to-night, as I speak, the light of that widow's home, the glory of that mechanic's shop, shining where the world comes not, to look on the last night of the convict in his cell, lightening the way to God, even over that dread gibbet. Oh! book of terrible majesty and child-like love, of sublimity that crushes the soul into awe, of beauty that melts the heart with rapture:—you never shone more strangely beautiful than there, in the lonely cot of the Wissahickon, when you saved that murderer's life!

For—need I tell you—that murderer's life was saved! That widow recognised the finger of God—even the stern brother was awed into silence.

The murderer went his way.

Now look ye, how wonderful are the ways of Heaven!

That very night, as the widow sate by her lonely hearth—her orphans by her side—sate there with crushed heart and hot eye-balls, thinking of her husband, who now lay mouldering on the blood-drenched sod of Paoli—there was a tap at the door.

She opened the door, and—that husband living, though covered with many wounds, was in her arms!

He had fallen at Paoli—but not in death. He was alive; his wife lay panting on his breast.

That night there was prayer in that wood-embowered Cot of the Wissahikon!

THE BRIDE'S DEPARTURE.

BY LIEUT. G. W. PATTEN, U. S. A.

Brother! speak in whispers light,
'Tis my last—my last good night!
Never more our steps will stray,
Through the garden's scented way;
By the homestead of the bees—
'Neath the shady chesnut trees;
By the meadow's winding stream,
Glittering in the sunset beam;
Gentle Brother! smile and bless—
'Tis my last—my last caress.

Sister! with thine eyes of blue,
Hither come and weep "adieu!"
Let thy arm around me twine,
Let thy cheek repose on mine,
While I gaze into thy face,
Circled in this dear embrace;
Thou hast ever proved to me
All that love could wish to be;
—Yet I leave thy heart alone,
Brother—Sister! bless your own.

Mother! thou hast rocked my head
Softly on its cradle bed;
When the storm was raging high,
Sweetly sung love's lullaby—
Yes I part—I part from THEE.
Who henceforth will sing to me,
—When my forehead aches with pain?
I shall miss that early strain.
Mother! with thy accents mild,
Bless, oh! bless thy weeping child.

Father! thou hast loved me well—
More than human tongue may tell;
More than wealth, since childhood's hour,
Thou hast lavished on thy flower;
Now, thy locks are waxing grey,
From thy heart I pass away;
Never more thy lips at eve,
On my cheek their kiss will leave,
—In thy prayer of under tone,
Mother! Father! bless your own.

MARY AT THE SEPULCHRE.

BY MISS HANNAH F. GOULD.

"Then the disciples went away again to their own home. But Mary stood without the sepulchre weeping."—John xx. 10—11.

O, he's gone! the tomb's forsaken!
They have come where Jesus lay,
Roll'd aside the stone, and taken
Him they crucified away!
Here's the shroud, we sorrowing made him
Whom they pierced with nail and spear:
Murderers of our Lord! they've laid him
Far from sight—he is not here.

Lo! I see, where he was sleeping,
Pale in death's cold, shadowy night,
Watchmen, they his place are keeping
Clothed in raiment dazzling white!
And, as consolation giving,
'Twas of him they sweetly said,
"Weep him not; nor seek the living
In the mansions of the dead."

They are angels! and they know me!
Sinful mortal, I'm afraid!
Stranger, sir, wilt thou not show me
Where my blessed Lord is laid?
'Tis his voice! my name he calleth!
Hail, Rabboni! Israel's King!
Conquered, death beneath thee falleth;
Broke his sceptre—lost his sting!

TO "JUNIUS."

BY "FRIEND" RICHARD.

They sometimes tell me those who dwell
Estranged by time, too long apart,
Smile not as fair, love not as well,
As when they mingled heart with heart.

It cannot be—the flight of years
Has closer knit thy heart to mine;
And every hour but more endears
The light that hues affection's shrine.

We dwell apart, but stronger ties
The distance weaves, than silken cords—
The long remembered smile of eyes—
The golden store of treasured words.

Like those who leave in childhood's day
The hearth they ne'er may see again,
Each sighing breeze, each summer ray,
Remind them of their cottage fane.

Thus tossing on the ocean tide,
Where'er our changeful voyage ends,
Though parted long or parted wide,
We were, and ever must be, friends.

THE MECHANIC HERO OF BRANDYWINE.

FROM THE LECTURE OF GEORGE LIPPARD, ESQ., DELIVERED ON TUESDAY EVENING, BEFORE THE WILLIAM PENN INSTITUTE, BEING THE FIRST OF A SERIES ON "THE ROMANCE OF THE REVOLUTION."

Near Dilworth corner, at the time of the Revolution, there stood a quiet cottage, somewhat retired from the road, under the shade of a stout chesnut tree. It was a quiet cottage, nestling away there in one corner of the forest road, a dear home in the wilderness, with sloping roof, walls of dark grey stone, and a casement hidden among vines and flowers.

On one side, amid an interval of the forest trees, was seen the rough outline of a blacksmith's shop. There was a small garden in front, with a brown gravelled walk, and beds of wild flowers.

Here, at the time of the Revolution, there dwelt a stout blacksmith, his young wife and her babe.—What cared that blacksmith, working away there in that shadowy nook of the forest, for war? What feared he for the peril of the times, so long as his strong arm, ringing that hammer on the anvil, might gain bread for his wife and child?

Ah, he cared little for war, he took little note of the panic that shook the valley, when some few mornings before the battle of the Brandywine, while shoeing the horse of a Tory Refugee, he overheard a plot for the surprise and capture of Washington. The American leader was to be lured into the toils of the Tories; his person once in the British camp, the English General might send the "Traitor Washington" home, to be tried in London.

Now our blacksmith, working away there, in that dim nook of the forest, without caring for battle or war, had still a sneaking kindness for this Mister Washington, whose name rung on the lips of all men. So one night, bidding his young wife a hasty good-bye, and kissing the babe that reposed on her bosom, smiling as it slept, he hurried away to the American camp, and told his story to Washington.

It was morning ere he came back. It was in the dimness of the autumnal morning, that the blacksmith was plodding his way, along the forest road. Some few paces ahead there was an aged oak, standing out into the road—a grim old veteran of the forest, that had stood the shocks of three hundred years. Right beyond that oak was the blacksmith's home.

With this thought warming his heart, he hurried on. He hurried on, thinking of the calm young face and mild blue eyes of that wife, who, the night before, had stood in the cottage door, waving him out of sight with a beckoned good-bye—thinking of the baby, that lay smiling as it slept upon her bosom, he hurried on—he turned the bend of the wood, he looked upon his home.

Ah! what a sight was there!

Where, the night before, he had left a peaceful cottage, smiling under a green chesnut tree, in the light of the setting sun, now was only a heap of black and smoking embers and a burnt and blasted tree!

This was his home!

And there stood the blacksmith gazing upon that wreck of his hearthstone;—there he stood with folded arms and moody brow, but in a moment a smile broke over his face.

He saw it all. In the night his home had taken fire, and been burned to cinders. But his wife, his child had escaped. For that he thanked God.

With the toil of his stout arm, plying there on the anvil, he would build a fairer home for wife and child; fresh flowers should bloom over the garden walks, and more lovely vines trail along the casement.

With this resolve kindling over his face, the blacksmith stood there, with a cheerful light beaming from his large grey eyes, when——a hand was laid upon his shoulder.

He turned and beheld the face of a neighbor.

It was a neighbor's face, but there was an awful agony stamping those plain features—there was an awful agony flashing from those dilating eyes—there was a dark and a terrible mystery speaking from those thin lips, that moved and moved, but made no sound.

For a moment that farmer tried to speak the horror that convulsed his features.

At last, forcing the blacksmith along the brown gravelled walk, now strewn with cinders, he pointed to the smoking embers. There, there—amid that heap of black and smoking ruins, the blacksmith beheld a dark mass of burnt flesh and blackened bones.

"Your wife!" shrieked the farmer, as his agony found words. "The British they came in the night, they"——and then he spoke that outrage, which the lip quivers to think on, which the heart grows palsied to tell—that outrage too foul to name—"Your wife," he shrieked, pointing to that hideous thing, amid the smoking ruins; "the British they murdered your wife, they flung her dead body in the flames—they dashed your child against the hearthstone!"

This was the farmer's story.

And there, as the light of the breaking day fell around the spot, there stood the husband, the father, gazing upon that mass of burned flesh and blackened bones—all that was once his wife.

Do you ask me for the words that trembled from his white lips? Do you ask me for the fire that blazed in his eye?

I cannot tell you. But I can tell you that there was a vow going up to Heaven from that blacksmith's heart; that there was a clenched hand, upraised, in the light of the breaking day!

Yes, yes, as the first gleam of the autumnal dawn broke around the spot, as the first long gleam of sunlight streamed over the peeled skull of that fair young wife—she was that last night—there was a vow going up to Heaven, the vow of a maddened heart and anguished brain.

How was that vow kept? Go there to Brandywine, and where the carnage gathers thickest, where the fight is most bloody, there you may see a stout form striding on, lifting a huge hammer, into light. Where that hammer falls, it kills—where that hammer strikes, it crushes! It is the blacksmith's form. And the war-cry that he shouts? Is it a mad cry of vengeance—half howl, half hurrah? Is it but a fierce yell, breaking up from his heaving chest?

Ah no! Ah no!

It is the name of—MARY! It is the name of his young wife!

Oh, Mary—sweetest name of woman—name so soft, so rippling, so musical—name of the Mother of Jesus, made holy by poetry and religion—how strangely did your syllables of music ring out from that blacksmith's lips, as he went murdering on!

"Mary!" he shouts, as he drags that red-coated trooper from his steed: "Mary!" he shrieks, as his hammer crashes down, laying that officer in the dust. Look! Another officer, with a gallant face and form—another officer, glittering in tinsel, clasps that blacksmith by the knees, and begs mercy.

"I have a wife—mercy! I have a wife yonder in England—spare me!"

The blacksmith, crazed as he is, trembles—there is a tear in his eye.

"I would spare you, but there is a form before me—the form of my dead wife! That form has gone before me all day! She calls on me to strike!"

And the hammer fell, and then rang out that strange war-cry—"MARY!"

At last, when the battle was over, he was found by a wagoner, who had at least shouldered a cartwhip in his country's service—he was found sitting by the roadside, his head sunken, his leg broken—the life blood welling from his many wounds.

The wagoner would have carried him from the field, but the stout blacksmith refused.

"You see, neighbor," he said, in that voice husky with death, "I never meddled with the British till they burned my home, till they"——he could not speak the outrage, but his wife, his child, were there before his dying eyes—"And now I've but five minutes' life in me. I'd like to give a shot at the British afore I die. D'ye see that cherry tree? D'ye think you could drag a man of my build up thar? Place me thar; give me a powder-horn, three rifle balls an' a good rifle; that's all I ask."

The wagoner granted his request; he lifted him to the foot of the cherry tree; he placed the rifle, the balls, the powder-horn in his grasp.

Then whipping his horses through the narrow pass, from the summit of a neighboring height, he looked down upon the last scene of the blacksmith's life.

There lay the stout man, at the foot of the cherry tree, his head sunk, his broken leg hanging over the roadside bank. The blood was streaming from his wounds—he was dying.

Suddenly he raised his head—a sound struck on his ears. A party of British came rushing along the narrow road, mad with carnage and thirsting for blood. They pursued a scattered band of Continentals. An officer led the way, waving them on, with his sword.

The blacksmith loaded his rifle; with that eye bright with death he took the aim. "That's for Washington!" he shouted as he fired. The officer lay quivering in the roadside dust. On and on came the British, nearer and nearer to the cherry tree—the Continentals swept through the pass. Again the blacksmith loaded—again he fired. "That's for mad Antony Wayne!" he shouted, as another officer bit the sod.

The British now came rushing to the cherry tree, determined to cut down the wounded man, who with his face toward them, bleeding as he was, dealt death among their ranks. A fair-visaged officer, with golden hair waving on the wind, led them on.

The blacksmith raised his rifle; with that hand stiffening in death he took the aim—he fired—the young Briton fell with a sudden shriek.

"And that," cried the blacksmith, in a voice that strengthened into a shout, "and that's for"——

His voice was gone! The shriek died on his white lips.

His head sunk—his rifle fell.

A single word bubbled up with his death groan. Even now methinks I hear that word, echoing and trembling there among the rocks of Brandywine. That word was—MARY!

ON A DEAR FRIEND.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

I am thinking of thee, Adeline,
Not as thou liest now,
With the damp earth on thy bosom
And death upon thy brow;
But I'm thinking of the olden times—
The times when first we met—
And my heart grows very heavy,
And my eyes are dim and wet.

I am alone, my Adeline,

In the little study room,
Where we have sat so often
Amid the twilight gloom—
Thy clasp seems warm upon my hand,
I almost feel thy breath
As it was wont to warm the lips
That now are sealed in death.

The past comes o'er me, Adeline,
Like shadows o'er the sky,
I feel the pure and tender love
That brooded in thine eye;
And here, within my silent room,
I seem to hear thy tread,
And feel thy kind hand trembling
Upon my fevered head.

And I am thinking, Adeline,
Of that holy Sabbath time
When our children stood together
Before the altar shrine;
When on their foreheads softly fell
The pure baptismal rain,
And the rich light lay around us
In many a gorgeous stain.

I've not forgotten, Adeline,
The promise often given,
That I would love those little ones
When thou wert called to Heaven!
We pledged the solemn promise,
With many a sigh and tear.
Dost thou think of it in Paradise
While I am weeping here?

Oh, I am thinking, Adeline,
Of the pathway thou hast trod
Through the dim and silent valley
Which leadeth up to God.
I am praying that my soul may be
As calm and strong as thine
When it passes through that darksome way,
To God's eternal shrine!

EMILY MUSGRAVE.

BY MRS. ANN S. STEPHENS.

In the Highlands, on the Hudson, Mr. Musgrave, a bachelor merchant of New York, had built a small, neat cottage, for his summer residence. It was a beautiful location, but the owner soon found it too secluded and romantic for one immersed in the speculations and bustle of Wall street, and consequently spent but little time there. But a spirit dwelt in that picturesque cottage, fully worthy of the place, a female spirit, whose lofty genius and fervent feelings accorded well with the sublime handiwork of the Almighty, visible all around. She was a poetess, with a heart full of the tender and beautiful. The thoughts which thronged the mind of Emily Musgrave, like sun-beams bursting the germ of a flower, had been arranged into language and sent forth to the world, not from a vain desire of shining before the multitude, but because the good and lofty of mind will seek sympathy with kindred intellects.

There was one room in the cottage to which we wish to draw the reader's attention. It was a small, square chamber, lighted by one large window, which opened into a balcony, and commanded a view of the opposite shore. Book cases of dark mahogany filled the recesses on each side of the mantlepiece. Two small tables of rose wood stood to the right and left of the window, one containing a little pallet and a half finished landscape in oils, the other covered with a work bag and other implements of needlework. In the centre of the apartment was a circular table with books, magazines, and a vase of freshly gathered flowers. Ottomans were scattered about the room; a rich soft carpet adorned the floor; a velvet curtain half concealed the window, and flung a rosy light within; and several busts and exquisite pictures ornamented the walls. Every thing bespoke refinement, taste—nay, genius. The ideality lavished on the adornments of that room would have composed a poem or picture. Mind had flung its beauty on every thing.

In this apartment Emily Musgrave had been alone all day. From early morning she had been laboring in the ideal world, and though evening was drawing on, her mind still lingered among her own beautiful creations, as the bee hovers around the honey blossoms. Sunset came, and, absorbed in its beauty, she for a time forsook her work. Insensibly she grew sad; twilight is always saddening. The deep shadows that followed the departing luminary, deepened her melancholy almost to pain, and as a resource, though weary almost to exhaustion, she took up a book which always lay by her side, filled with scraps of poetry, half formed thoughts, and dates of events, and wrote rapidly for a few moments. Her thoughts flowed like music. They always did when she wrote in that book; for there the rough, precious ore of her intellect was flung out without alloy.—There, unshackled by the thoughts of necessity and hire, her genius labored for its own exceeding reward. Every date was the landmark of an affectionate heart; every thought a rough gem snatched from the eternity of the mind. She would not have published a page from that little record for the universe; it would have been like baring her own full, warm heart, to the gaze of the multitude. She closed the book, and then opened it again; placed the date, even to the hour, under what she had written, and then laid it away, murmuring, "I wonder where and how I shall be this day twelvemonth." She had just remembered that it was her birth day. Emily was about to resume her former position, when a steamboat came ploughing up the river, and slackened its speed just opposite the cottage. She did not expect her brother, yet it might be him they were about to send on shore. Her features lighted up—she ran out upon the balcony, and looked eagerly toward the boat. A barge was lowered, and two gentlemen took their seats in it. One was her brother. With a child-like eagerness of affection she darted back into the study, threw a shawl over her, and ran down to the shore.

Emily Musgrave was not handsome. Nay, to one possessed of no idea of beauty, save that of a mere physical symmetry, she would have appeared nothing more than good looking, if not decidedly plain. In repose, her features were heavy and thoughtful; the eye lacked brilliancy, and the forehead was too massive and full of thought for mere beauty. But when any emotion lighted them up, the effect was like magic. The fire of a brilliant intellect, and the feelings of a kind, loving heart, kind ed them into something more impressive than mere loveliness. It was the living beauty of the mind, and it required mind to appreciate it.

If a mind capable of feeling the loveliness, and of forgiving the faults of a nature like hers, could have been found, it was possessed by Charles Woodbury, the companion of Mr. Musgrave. He stood quietly by, as she arose from her brother's embrace, her cheeks glowing and her eyes sparkling with the entire happiness of the moment—for Emily loved her brother. She saw his worldliness of mind, and regretted it; but the crust and iciness of monied ambition had left one green spot in his heart, and his sister knew that his love for her alone preserved its freshness. She was an orphan; he was the only being her affections might rest upon, and they adhered to him with the tenderness of a heart which must love something, and which has found but one object to lavish itself upon. Had Mr. Musgrave been of a loftier cast of mind, her heart might have remained content in its rich sisterly affection, to the exclusion of a more absorbing passion; but, as it was, there existed the attachment of habit, of association and of mutual bereavement, but not of perfect sympathy. He admired and loved, without knowing his sister: and she felt that lack of knowledge and of thorough appreciation, without understanding it. Her heart thirsted for something, without divining its own great want. It was sympathy of mind as well as of affection. Happiness gives beauty, even to the plainest features; the spiritual imbues the material with its own subtle influence—an influence to be felt, not described. Emily's face was radiant and alive with pleasurable emotions, when she turned to welcome her brother's friend.—He for the first time thought her almost handsome, as he took the little hand she eagerly extended. And she—it was the hour of her destiny! He had fine eyes, changing in their hue as the neck of a raven, the pupils dilating to his rising feelings, as if the soul itself expanded in their clear depths. The expression of those eyes haunted her forever after. There was unwritten music in their starlight darkness; the strings of her heart awoke to it, and henceforth they thrilled to a new melody.

"And so your friend Holmes is married at last," said Mr. Musgrave at the breakfast table the next morning, as he passed his cup to Emily that it might be refilled; "what choice has he made?—romantic, and what you call intellectual, I dare say; your men of genius have a great fancy for female comets, and Holmes, I believe, is considered a genius."

"Yes, he is a fine fellow, with a great deal of rough poetry about him," replied Woodbury; "but you are mistaken: his wife is soft and gentle in her nature, and very beautiful in person, but has no higher pretensions."

"And Holmes has selected her as he would a flower or a picture, from the fancy of a moment, I dare say," observed Emily, as she passed the fragrant coffee to her brother; "it is astonishing to me that men of deep feeling and of real talent can dream of happiness with minds of an inferior grade."

"Then you do not believe in the love of opposites," said Woodbury, with a little confusion of manner, while a slight color spread up to his clear, pale forehead.

"Yes, in the love, perhaps, but not in the entire contentment; to produce that, the whole nature should assimilate—intellect, feelings and principles."

"You may be right, Emily," interrupted Mr. Musgrave, "but my ideas of happiness are less comprehensive; I could be content with the entire love of a sensible, good-tempered woman, though her taste and pursuits might not exactly agree with my own. Of one thing I am certain; I could not love an ambitious wife, and all highly intellectual women are so."

"And all who are not intellectual, in one form or another," said Emily, smiling. "Ambition in some shape pervades all classes of society, except the utterly degraded. The only difference between the ambition of a strong mind and a weak one is, that the first centres itself on a lofty object, the last is [illegible] on pretty trifles. No matter whether energies be exerted to procure a niche in the temple of fame, or to outshine the belle of a ball-room: if the whole strength is put forth in the struggle, the weaker is just as much amenable to the charge of ambition, as the stronger: the aim may differ, but the arrows come from the same quiver. For my part, I prefer the spirit that will soar to the sun, to that which, from weakness of wing, is contented to flutter around a night-lamp. And now that I have delivered my pretty oration," she continued, blushing and half laughing at her own interest in the subject, "I will give you a fresh cup of coffee—that must be entirely cold."

"No, it will do very well—but I must still defend young Holmes' choice; a man in the daily habit of mental exertion, must require quiet and repose in his domestic relations—a gentle and dependant being in the companion of his life—a creature devoted entirely to himself—a—finally, Emily, you are the only woman of genius that I am acquainted with, and you make a capital sister; but I don't think that I should like you for a wife—you are too quick, too abrupt—in short, I could not feel exactly at ease with you."

Woodbury looked up in astonishment at this abrupt speech. The blood rushed over Emily's face, and her eyes sparkled with vexation. She had a quick and dangerous power of repartee, which even her privileged brother did not always escape. A sharp reply sprung to her lips, but she felt that Woodbury was looking at her, and checked the unfeminine impulse. It was the first homage of her heart to his. She had begun to fear his disapprobation. With her, anger was but the flash of a moment: but her better feelings had been shocked, and tears gathered in her eyes as she answered with an effort at badinage.

"I see that we are as far apart as the antipodes—you are for the beautiful—I prefer the sublime; Mr. Woodbury shall be umpire between us," she added, turning to her guest with an animated smile; for her tears, as well as her anger, had vanished with the momentary feelings that produced them; "I pray you decide for us—softness or strength—lilies or diamonds?"

"I shall play the diplomatist, and decide for neither," said Woodbury, returning her smile; "my beau ideal blends the beauty and rare delicacy of the flower, with the fire and durability of the gem: power of mind with depth of feeling and strength of principle; I care not how much of intellect, nay, of passion even, may exist in the female character, so long as deep feminine tenderness and true delicacy predominates. Ambition, though in a female breast, is an exalting and glorious passion, so long as it remains womanly in its essentials; while it exists secondary to the affections, and forbears to rush into the race-course of manly competition, I could forgive, and even admire its possessor. Indeed, a man of strong mind and lofty feelings can receive but imperfect happiness in the homage of a heart, which loves him as it would any of his race, who had happened to call forth its tenderness. I can imagine nothing more hopeless in its loneliness, than the heart filled with a thousand high impulses and god-like aspirations, which feels that the being it pillows is all incapable of sharing, or even of understanding its enthusiasm; it is the widowhood of the mind."

When Woodbury began to speak, there was a smile upon his lips, and his eye was brilliant and cheerful; but as he proceeded, the tones of his rich voice changed and deepened almost to melancholy; his eyes were misty, and though the smile still lingered about his mouth, it was sad and regretful in its expression. Emily marked the change, and became abstracted and thoughtful. There was a silence of some minutes, which Mr. Musgrave broke by the very original observation, that "after all marriage is but a lottery, and those that gambled least in it were the best off."

Woodbury dropped the spoon which he was industriously balancing on the edge of his coffee-cup, and Emily rose with a confused apology and left the table. The music of that voice was breathing in her heart, and her brother's common-places mingled with its poetry, like the croaking of a tuneless bird among a nest of ring-doves. She went away alone, that she might enjoy the luxury of thought. Her beau ideal had suddenly taken a palpable form, and she mused on it with a new and delicious sensation.

"Emily," said Mr. Musgrave an hour after, when he entered her study and found her buried in the easy-chair, with her morning dress unchanged and her dark ringlets entangled in the white hand on which her cheek rested; "Emily, I shall stay here a week or two, and then we will go to the city for the winter. Can't we, between us, manage to keep Woodbury?—he is a capital fellow, and I shall be deucedly lonely without him; besides, he is about writing a tragedy, or some such nonsense; you must give up this little room to him, and he can't have a better place to finish it in. Come, go down and see what you can do with him; he makes all manner of excuses to me, and be hanged to him! Why, what are you fidgeting and blushing about? Come—but no, I will bring him up."

Women like Emily Musgrave seldom plead in vain. It was soon settled that Woodbury should remain her guest till his tragedy was finished, though he refused to deprive her of the apartment, which had become the abiding place of her spirit. "He would just set his travelling desk on her work-table," he said, "while her avocation went on as usual—she would find him very quiet, and perhaps the genius of the place would inspire him;" and so, with this careless compliment, it was settled that two beings of kindred tastes and pursuits, mentally endowed beyond their kind, and possessed of feelings deep and imperishable as the spirit which gave them birth, should be flung together day after day and hour after hour—that their life should be one continued interchange of thought, till each new and almost mutually originated idea, became a link in the diamond chain, which was even then stealing its glittering folds imperceptibly about them—a chain to be sundered only with the hearts it interlaced; for such hearts change only when the eternal hush of the sodded grave is upon them.

The prominent traits of Woodbury's mind were strength and vigor. His ideas were comprehensive and grasping, rather than delicate; his genius of a kind to grapple with men and things—to obtain an ascendency over the understanding, as well as the feelings. In fanciful creation, and lady-like softness of style, many might surpass him; but in the arena of the world—in the strife of intellectual power—he had few compeers. The whole texture of his mind was essentially masculine; but to strong poetical abilities he added a taste rich by nature, and highly cultivated by study and travel. The lighter walks of literature were, with him, rather an amusement than an occupation; but when he did turn his attention to them, a passion for the beautiful and a love for the ideal breathed through every line of his creations; they were full of fire and originality, yet even there the prevailing quality of his mind predominated. There was nothing effeminate even in his lightest thought; in his very playfulness he was manly. Great was the wealth of feeling hoarded in that noble heart. In its affections it was gentle, enduring and delicate, almost as a woman's; yet, with its deep tenderness was mingled the pride of a holy nature; in its most exclusive devotion, there was dignity and self-respect.—The object of his love felt that he knew the value of the treasure he lavished, and that it exalted the receiver. His faults—and he had many—were those of a generous and too lordly character. They would have been the redeeming points of a weaker man. Such was the man with whom an ardent, talented and aspiring girl was to be thrown into daily companionship. From that day the chances of her fate took to themselves distinct paths; the one might end in happiness, such as few mortals have ever known—the happiness of entire love and appreciation; the other in broken-heartedness and the grave. The event of a moment might decide the track of her destiny; yet she did not dream of a future. She was content with her bed of roses, and forbore, perhaps wisely, to search for the serpents that might lie slumbering among their leaves.

It was the day before their departure from the cottage. Woodbury was busy with his tragedy, and Emily sat patiently working up an old oak in the foreground of a landscape. She rubbed out a dry limb, which she had been laboring over for hours, and, laying down her pencil, stole to the back of Woodbury's chair. Her movements had become less abrupt than formerly. Her steps fell more softly on the carpet, and her face was contented and very happy in its expression, as she bent over and read the lines he was rapidly tracing.

"Let me finish that idea," she said, laying her hand on his when he came to a period; "I have just thought of a beautiful simile."

"This passage is rather vigorous in its expression," said he, doubtfully; "do you think that you can carry it out in the same tone?"

"Oh, I can do anything but paint a dry oak limb!—but what matters it if I do vary a little from your deep bass, so long as the melody is preserved?"

"Well, have your way," he said, pressing his lips to the hand which prisoned his; "but I shall be indebted to you for all my blossoms."

"And so you should," she replied; "men have nothing to do with the flower-garden and the shady nooks of literature—their track should be through battle-fields, and on the wild mountain, 'where leaps the living thunder;' ours is in the valley, among violets and wild-flowers. I could not love even you, if the character of your writings were at all like my own."

"I do not think you would, nor should I like to find a rival in the person of my lady-love; but of that I have little fear—so there is my pen, and here I take my station to see that you do not smother my poor idea in a shower of rose-leaves, or carry it away in a cloud of butterflies. There, now, begin."

There was silence for a moment, and Emily began to write; but she was confused, and her hand trembled. The pulsations of a full heart, which was always tremulous, even in its happiness, rendered it unsteady.

"The will that do?" she said, laying down the pen, and looking half in triumph, half timidly, in his face; "now you need not praise me—I always know when you are pleased."

"And do you think I can be pleased that you have flung a softness and beauty into that passage, which I certainly could not have given it?" he inquired, laying his hand lightly on her upraised forehead, and looking with his smiling eyes into hers; "I ought to be jealous."

"You are quite too proud for that," she answered playfully; and she was right. He was too confident in his own powers to feel anything but pleasure in the lighter and more graceful exhibition of hers.—He felt that the thoughts which she had mingled with his, throughout that tragedy, like wild-flowers twisted with a chain of brilliants and pure gold, had sprung up fresh from a heart which loved him with too deep devotion, ever to wish for perfect equality of strength or power. Her genius sought only the protection and sympathy of his. It was the vine clinging, with all its beautiful leafiness and sunny fruit, to the tree of its support; or the rill, with its soft murmurs and sparkling wavelets, losing itself in the deep rushing stream. He loved her for her talents, and he loved her the better, that to all her endowments she had not sacrificed any portion of her womanhood; that in all things she had been true to her sex.

"And now," said Emily, moving toward the table on which her picture was standing, "come and help me fling some autumn foliage among these rocks—I want it to look exactly like that clump of trees in the cleft yonder, just below the fort; but I shall want all the colors of the rainbow—come, do, and I will leave the old oak for to-morrow."

"Oh, take a book for half an hour," said Woodbury, "then I shall have finished, and will be at your service for the rest of the day."

"And is it so nearly done?" she murmured, stealing again to his side, while a thoughtful and sad expression deepened on her face; "how I wish that we could live these days over again. I spoke of to-morrow, but then we shall be in the city, apart from each other, and surrounded by a crowd. It is strange how presentiments will haunt one; it is but a few hours' travel, and yet for days I have felt a perfect dread of going. We have been so happy here, that any change must be for the worse."

Woodbury had resumed his writing, and she supposed him carelessly inattentive to her regrets, when he answered in a low voice, "that they had indeed been very happy." Had she observed more closely, she might have detected a slight tremor in that deep, rich voice, and have seen that the pen quivered in its progress awhile, and then remained motionless, while the writer supported his forehead with the palm of his disengaged hand, and fell into a train of troubled thought, which had no relation to the theme of his composition. But the curse of quick, sensitive feelings, was Emily's unquiet inheritance. She felt the coldness of his silence with the keenness of a fond, loving spirit. Her heart was too exacting, perhaps, in its tenderness, but she had lavished the whole great wealth of her being on the object of her love, and anything short of entire devotion seemed coldness to her. After lingering by his chair for a moment, she took a volume from the table and moved to the couch; but though she heaped the cushions commodiously and held the book before her face, it was only to conceal the tears that gathered in her eyes. For the first time since she had learned to love, the deep contentment of her heart was disturbed. Who will deny that "coming events cast their shadows before?"

"Well," whispered Emily's heart, as she leaned on Woodbury's arm, watching with a regretful look the white pillars and shaded roof of the cottage, from which the steamer was bearing them, "well, let what will come, we have been happy."

The last quivering gold of the sunset, as it played over her study window, and deluged the withering foliage around it, flashed before her. The boat swept around a point, and she turned sorrowfully away.

Miss Musgrave was right in her fears. The quiet, domestic intercourse, which had been so delightful at the cottage, was broken up when they returned to the city. Woodbury resumed his usual absorbing pursuits, to which were added the thousand petty annoyances which attend the bringing forth of a new play. He visited Emily constantly, but even with her his mind was harrassed, and their interviews were interrupted and unsatisfactory; yet was their mutual attachment in no way diminished. In the crowded thoroughfare, in the halls of fashion, or in the silence of nature, their hearts were the same.

Carriage after carriage sat down its burthen of fashion on the steps of one of our theatres; faces gleaming with youth and beauty glanced by, and forms of symmetry moved gracefully to their seats, till the whole box circle was filled with a crowd of breathing loveliness. Flowers and jewels glowed in the brilliant gas lights; eyes sparkled, lips smiled, and white hands waved in graceful recognition; while the sound of soft murmuring voices stole up from among them, till the whole waving surface appeared like an immense flower-bed, stirred by a summer wind and haunted by a swarm of bees, or a cloud of young humming birds. Upward from the densely filled pit to the topmost gallery, was one continued scene of eager faces. The very lobby and passages were thronged, for Woodbury was a favorite, and it was the first night of his tragedy.

The green curtain was still down, when a party of four persons entered a private box on the right of the stage. There was a brief stir: then the drapery was slightly drawn back from the side, and a pale, anxious face looked out upon the audience for one moment, and was withdrawn behind the silken folds again, while a portly gentleman and two gaily dressed young girls took their seats conspicuously in front.

"Sit on this side, Emily," said Mr. Musgrave, for it was his agitated sister who shrunk from observation; "you will have a much better view of the boxes."

"Pray do not mind me—I am very comfortable," she replied with an effort.

At that moment the box door opened, and Woodbury entered. He looked at Emily and smiled, but it was an unquiet smile, and he was very pale.

"You seem anxious," he said, addressing her in a low voice; "do you fear the result?"

"Not when I reflect—but I can only feel here," she replied, with a faint smile; "there is something frightful in the thoughts that this great crowd has——"

"The power to hiss my poor tragedy down," he said, with an effort at gayety.

"No—no, I do not fear that—but this is a terrible ordeal—I had no idea of it."

"It is, indeed," replied he, with a sort of shudder; for at that moment the curtain was drawn up with a rushing sound, and the play commenced. Woodbury fixed his look steadfastly on the actors, as they went through the opening scene; but Emily bent her forehead to the railing, and remained breathless and still with intense anxiety. The play went on; now and then a slight murmur of approbation arose from the audience, which was succeeded by the stillness of a rapt multitude—a stillness more flattering to the author than the loudest burst of applause. But by degrees the thrilling passion and deep pathos of the piece roused the house to enthusiasm, and the second act closed with a burst of loud and general applause. Again the silken curtain of Mr. Musgrave's box was thrown back; but the face which glanced out from its shadow was no longer pale nor anxious. The dark eyes flashing with delight—the parted lips—the cheeks, warm with color and alive with smiles—nay, the whole face was radiant with happiness. Her hand trembled with eagerness, and the drapery shivered in its light grasp, as if disturbed by a sudden current of air, as Emily bent over the railing and looked down upon the shouting multitude at her feet. It was the most triumphant moment of her existence; she was revelling in the new and delicious pleasure of reflected fame;—how unutterably dearer to her woman's heart, coming thus from the object of her love, than if rendered directly to herself! The tribute thus offered to his genius, kindled at once the two leading passions of her nature—her love, and the ambition softened and hallowed by that love. It came to her heart through the sweet medium of the affections, like bright waters perfumed by the wild flowers they had kissed in their progress.

Woodbury remained in his seat, apparently but little elated by the enthusiastic applause, which came thundering up from every quarter of the house. The muscles of his mouth relaxed a little from their fixed composure, and the restless brilliancy of his eye softened to a more quiet expression, but his face retained its usual pale tranquility. While wavering under the excitement of uncertainty, his feelings were at the mercy of the lowest news-boy in the pit, for he was sensitively alive to public opinion; but the moment success was decided, his mind swayed around to its own proud anchorage. There was nothing in the praise, which came ringing up warm from the throats of an excitable crowd, to satisfy an ambition like his. There was something coarse and material in its nearness, and though defeat would have given him deep pain, success brought no proportionate pleasure. He loved fame, and he toiled and thirsted for it; but it was that which flows gently through the thousand channels of society, gathering a tribute of respect and power from all classes of men, and bearing them silently to its object; that which haunts the death-bed with tears and lamentations, and which lingers about the grave when its sods have blossomed for ages, and time has eaten away all traces of the sculptor's chisel. Such fame, and such alone, could satisfy the aspirations of a man like Woodbury.

There was one tribute paid to the successful author that night, which went to his innermost heart. The glance of mingled exultation and tenderness which Emily turned on his face as she drew back to her seat, was more to him than all of fame that that vast crowd had to bestow. She did not speak, and he had no desire that she should; but he felt that the bond between them was strengthened by the entire sympathy of her silence. The play went off triumphantly, and at the fall of the curtain, a cry for the author resounded through the house. A proud smile and a prouder glance interchanged between the lovers at the call. Emily had never thought of this demand, but her own heart told her that he had too much of the dignity of real genius to dream of obeying it. He was not ungrateful for the applause which they had lavished on him; but for the universe, he would not have appeared before that curtain, bowing and smiling his thanks for their noisy appreciation. He had neither enough of the actor, nor of the literary lion in him, for such an exhibition.

Emily would have returned home immediately after the play; but the young ladies of her party were eager for the farce, and she consented to remain. Woodbury had left the box, and she was leaning against the partition which separated them from the adjoining one, when the raised voices of its occupants fixed her attention.

"Are you certain that it is an engagement?" enquired a female voice of the gentleman who had been speaking.

"Why, I cannot say positively, but it is an old and mutual attachment—I have the authority of the young lady's mother for that."

"She looks very young from this distance," was the rejoinder; "is she handsome at a nearer view?—lend me your glass a moment;—yes, she is decidedly pretty—but, who is that tall man, half concealed by the curtain? He certainly leans over her with a very lover-like expression; here, take the glass, and tell me who he is."

"Why, that is the very man! He does well to keep in the shadow after the manager's apology; a fine-looking fellow, isn't he?"

"What! is that Woodbury?" exclaimed the female voice, in a tone of eager curiosity; "how I wish he would come into the light, and give me a good view of his face!—there, she has moved her seat—bless her, she is almost an angel for that!"

These broken exclamations were not lost to Emily. After hearing her lover's name thus connected with another, the transition from the most perfect happiness to the keenest torment, was like the sting of a serpent. The fang had shot deep, and for a moment she was alive to nothing but an acute sensation of pain; then she reached out her hand, drew the curtain slowly away, and fixed her gaze on the opposite box. A feverish red flashed to her cheek, when she saw Woodbury bending over a fair young girl, with soft hazel eyes and hair of light chesnut. Her manner was quiet and graceful, and an air of fashion pervaded her whole appearance. Her head was turned, and she was smiling in Woodbury's face. The expression of his eye was enough for the feverish being who gazed so intently upon them. Her look wandered from the slender and jewelled hand hanging carelessly over the edge of the box, to the graceful curve of the white neck, and the cherub head raised with an expression of mingled confidence and timidity to meet the glance of those eyes, till her own ached with the intensity of their gaze. Her cheek grew pallid and her breath came painfully, yet no gasp nor sound was wrung from that heart to betray its agony. She saw Woodbury bend his head and address his companion, who smiled, and whispering to an elderly lady by her side, laid her hand on Woodbury's arm, and they left the box together.

"Brother," said Emily, in a voice of strange calmness, "I am not well—let us go home now."

Musgrave looked into her face and saw that she spoke truth; there was something painful in the expression which he did not understand. "Yes, we will go," he said, kindly—"you have been so much excited—but where is Woodbury?"

"We need not wait for him," she answered, in the same unnatural tone, "he is probably detained; come, I am very tired."

A few minutes after, Woodbury entered the box with the young girl, who had caused so much misery, leaning on his arm.

"They must have gone home," he said, in surprise; "yet I am very certain they were here when we left the other side of the house."

"This is a disappointment," said his companion, evidently feeling what she said, "I believe there is a fate against my knowing Miss Musgrave."

"You shall call with me at her brother's to-morrow—she will be pleased with an introduction," I am certain," replied Woodbury; "shall we return to your mother, now?"

The next morning found Emily extended on the low couch in her bed-chamber. She was asleep;—yet how much of the heart's unrest was betrayed in her appearance. The scarlet flowers which she had worn the previous evening, lay broken among her loose tresses. One hand lay on her bosom, clenched among the dark folds of her lace mantilla; and the other fell heavily to the dress of rich satin, flowing in disordered masses about her person. Her breath came painfully, and a sickly white lay about her mouth and beating temples; but a feverish red burned in either cheek; and though her sleep seemed heavy, tears were continually streaming from her closed eyes to the embroidered cushion. The sunshine breaking through the window-curtain, aroused her. She arose languidly, and with a heavy feeling of pain about the heart, rang the bell and gave the servant a note, which she had written in the night. It contained a simple request that Woodbury would call early that morning. A half hour spent in restlessly pacing to and fro in her chamber, her cheeks glowing, and her eyes fixed on the glittering watch in her hand, and her messenger's step was heard on the stairs. She opened the door and took the answer; "I shall be very busy," it said, "all the morning, but will call sometime in the day, if possible."

Another period of anxiety was to be endured; but how? Not there in the stillness of her room.—The last night she had panted for its solitude, but now it was irksome to her. She put the note in her bosom and rang the bell again. "The carriage, John, as quick as possible!" and pulling the crushed flowers from her hair, she began to arrange her dress, eager for some change, she did not care what, so that the time passed. It was seldom that Emily spoke imperatively to an inferior, but when she did it had its effect. The carriage was hastened to the door before she was herself ready.

"Where shall I drive?" inquired the coachman, as she took her seat.

"Towards Harlaem—any where, only drive fast!"

"It is nearly twelve—he will surely come before dinner," murmured Emily, as the carriage swept into Broadway on its return; "at any rate I will go home—perhaps I will find him there." But as she spoke, her face changed, and she fell heavily back in her seat. On the pavement opposite she saw Woodbury, and that fair girl was leaning on his arm. They did not see her; his head was bent, and he was deeply engrossed by his companion.

"Where shall I drive now?" inquired the coachman.

"Home—home!" was the faint reply.

As she passed up stairs a card was put into Emily's hand. "Miss Julia Morton!" she muttered; "I do not remember the name;" and after twisting it in her fingers awhile, she tore it into fragments and flung them into the empty grate. Had she read the pencil marks on the back of that card, the course of her destiny might have changed. The clock struck ten that evening, and Emily sat pale and calm in her chamber, bereaved but resolute. She had heard nothing from Woodbury during the day. "I will wait till ten—I will do nothing rashly," she repeated to herself a hundred times, as hour after hour crept by, each adding to the intensity of her feelings. When the limited time was sounded slowly from a neighboring steeple, her heart became calm, but oh! how utterly hopeless! She went down to the drawing room, had a long conversation with her brother, and the next morning, at day-break, joined a party of friends, who were on board a packet, waiting for the tide, and sailed for Europe. Before Woodbury had left his rooms that morning, a letter was brought to him. He knew the writing, and a smile of pleasure was on his face when he broke the seal, but it died away as he read the contents. When he finished he turned over the page, as if expecting to find some postscript or afterthought; but he was disappointed, and his hand shook as he smoothed the paper and began to peruse it a second time. He examined the writing, and then the seal, to ascertain if there were no traces of agitation in either. The writing was even more than commonly distinct, but he missed the tasteful seal usually appended to Emily's notes; the wax was firm, but without crest or motto. After satisfying himself that there were no signs of indecision or wavering of purpose in the letter, he laid it down with a deep sigh amounting almost to a groan, and covering his eyes with one hand, remained with his lips pressed firmly together, and his right hand clenching upon the open letter, as if striving to nerve himself for some severe internal conflict. But in spite of his struggles his fine brow became paler and more contracted each instant, and the hand, though clenched forcibly, shook till the letter rustled beneath it as if stirred by the wind. At last he started up, snatched his hat and hastened to the Battery, looking impatiently at his watch, as he hurried along. An outward-bound vessel was just discernible hovering on the horizon. He turned sharply to a passer-by, and demanded the name of the vessel.

"I rather think—that is, I am certain—I rather think that it must be one of the packets."

"It is the Gladiator, sir," said an old sailor, who was loitering along the walk.

Woodbury thanked him and turned away.

"And who do you think has called on me this morning?" said Julia Morton to her affianced husband, as they sat together, a few days previous to the one appointed for their wedding.

"I am sure I cannot tell," replied Woodbury, abstractedly; "who was it?"

"No other than the Miss Musgrave you were so anxious that I should become acquainted with—you remember she started for Europe the day after we left cards at her brother's. I thought that it would please you, and so I asked her to be my bridesmaid."

"Did she consent?" inquired Woodbury, in a voice so hoarse and unnatural, that Julia looked anxiously into his face.

"Are you ill?" she inquired softly, when she saw how very pale it was.

"No, no—I am only tired—but you did not tell me Miss Musgrave's answer."

"Oh, she said that she should be very happy, only she made one condition—but that will please you, I am certain."

"What condition could she make?"

"Only that we shall go to her brother's cottage in the Highlands, to spend the first week after——"

"After our marriage, you would say," he added, abruptly, regardless of her timid hesitation. "Well, if Miss Musgrave can find happiness in the plan, she shall be gratified—we will go."

Julia was looking down, and did not observe the troubled and bitter expression that flitted over his features as he spoke.

"I never saw Miss Musgrave but once before," she said, "and that was across the theatre—but don't you think she looks much thinner than she did then?" If it were not for her brilliant spirits I should think her ill."

"Perhaps she is," said he, in a softened voice—but the subject became too painful for him. He took his hat, and pleading business, left the house.

Emily Musgrave and Julia Morton were alone in the dressing room of the latter, arrayed for the bridal. The same pearly satin adorned their persons, and the delicate orange-blossoms gleamed alike in the bright tresses of the bride, and in the dark ringlets divided from the high forehead of the bridesmaid. The contrast was that of the heart: the one was content in its destiny, and full of timid happiness; the other calm and tranquil also, but hers was the calmness of desolation—the tranquility which eats into the heart's core. Cold and composed she stood in her splendid finery, waiting for the hour of trial. Disease and sorrow had made sad inroad on that form, during the few months of sojourn abroad, The sword had worn fearfully upon its scabbard; the heart had turned traitor to itself, and had torn away its own altar stone.

"It seems like a dream that I am to be married to Woodbury," said she bride, looking with her soft placid eyes into the still face of her bridesmaid; "but I suppose it is because we have been engaged so short a time."

The blood rushed into Emily's cheek, and she gasped for breath; but the bride was intent on her pearl bracelet, and did not observe her.

"It is very strange, is it not?" she continued, drawing her ottoman close to Emily's chair, "that every body should have been talking of our marriage, long and long before he said a word about it; mother was always confident that he loved me—but I sometimes think——"

Her eyes glanced on the agonized face of her auditor, and she stopped suddenly.

"How strange you look," she said earnestly; "I suppose you think it wrong for me to talk so freely to you, but you have known him so long that you don't seem like a stranger. Do you know I was almost jealous of you once at the theatre the night his tragedy came out? Charles took me to call on you the next day, but you were out. How white your lips are? Do let me get something."

"No, no—say on, I can endu—I like to hear you talk. You were not engaged then, you say?"

"Oh, no—not till within the last two months—it is a short time, but then I have loved him so long—but I don't think he cared for me till lately. Dear Miss Musgrave what is the matter?—are you dying?"—she almost screamed, as the pale convulsed face of the bridesmaid drooped slowly forward, and the shrinking form slid helplessly to the floor.—"What can I do?" And the terrified bride ran to the bell-handle. Before she had time to ring, Emily had partially recovered herself.

"Do not ring," she said in a broken whisper, "I am better now—let me step into the next room a moment, and I shall be quite well."

She tottered feebly into the chamber, and when summoned for the ceremony appeared pale and calm, as if no indisposition had affected her. Her yet strong spirit had obtained the mastery, and she met Woodbury for the first time since their separation at the theatre, with a composure that more than equalled his own. He was proud and firm of purpose, and he felt that she had wronged him; but he could not look on the changed form, and on the forced expression of that face, unmoved in his feelings, for he had never ceased to love her.

The wedding guests smiled and praised the beauty of the bride and the quiet gracefulness of the bridesmaid, and amid the heartless glitter of a fashionable crowd, Woodbury was married. Compliments and congratulations were showered upon him, but the touch of one cold hand, the wretched expression of a pale face bending to his—the white lips moving, but speechless—the eyes glittering with unnatural lustre, and every lineament stamped with the heart's utter desolation, and yet shaded with long bright curls, and crowned with bridal wreaths. The touch of that hand and the expression of that face haunted him like a guilty thought.

Emily Musgrave had consented to stand up with Woodbury's bride, in the bitterness of a proud and irritated spirit, for she believed the request to have originated in him. While her heart was writhing under the supposed insult to its sufferings, she had made it a condition, that the bridal party should spend the first week after the wedding at the cottage. She felt a kind of resentful exultation in the flinging back the mockery in its most refined form. Strong in the power to witness his happiness with unflinching pride, she anticipated the season of self-inflicted torture with a kind of desperate eagerness. Filled with these bitter and almost stern feelings she had entered the dressing-room of the bride. But the knowledge which she had gathered from the innocent lips of her rival, had torn away the last consolation of the unhappy—a consciousness of right. The veil had been lifted, and she saw herself the wronger, not the wronged. What was she now, with all her powers? The pride of her high intellect, what had it done for her? Wrecked itself, heart and all, on an ungenerous passion, common to the weakest and lowest of her sex. The pride which had hitherto sustained her was utterly crushed and humbled; yet with her self-reproach there was something of happiness. If she had been deceived into misery, it was by the world and her own wayward heart, not by the idol of its worship. Those few soft words of truth brought a new and more generous sorrow to her heart, and the resentful and bad feelings, which had hitherto nerved it against itself, were swept away for ever. She gave herself up to a flood of regretful tenderness, humble and utterly without hope, yet dignified by a noble sorrow for the wrong she had done. She had performed her part in the ceremony calmly and well, but it was the firmness of a strong spirit, resolute to endure the penalty of its own acts. There was no pride nor stubbornness mingled with the deep agony of the moment; her heart was breaking, but it was gentle and patient in its suffering. And all this Woodbury read in that face, as plainly as if words had revealed it to him; but his honor, and the tender interest which a knowledge of her entire love for him created, had bound him to another, and he pledged his faith there, in the presence of that noble and suffering creature, with a heart agonised almost as intensely as her own.

Mr. Musgrave had preceded the bridal party to the cottage, and it was arranged that Emily should travel in the carriage with the newly-married pair.—Woodbury's manner toward her was gentle and forbearing to the extreme of delicacy. He fixed his large sad eyes on hers for one instant, as she appeared before him, haggard almost as a corpse, and so feeble that she could scarcely walk to the carriage. She knew that he had forgiven her. She smiled a mournful and patient smile, which had something of the grave in its meaning, as she returned the greeting of the happy bride; and the journey commenced.

Emily was ill when she started, and she became much worse on the way. For two or three hours before they reached the cottage, Woodbury had been obliged to support her. She felt the heavy beating of his heart as her head rested against it, and she could almost hear its increased pulsations, whenever one of the frequent spasms of pain started her a moment from her rest. Tears gathered in her eyes when they opened but to meet his commiserating look, and she lay on his bosom, with one hot hand clasped in that of the fair bride.

A feverish strength was lent to Emily as they drew up to the cottage; her cheeks became of a deep, hot red, and her eyes had the brilliancy of a wounded eagle's. She insisted on attending the bride to her chamber—examined the dressing-table, with its cushions of azure satin and its glittering essence bottles, to see that nothing was wanting, and drew up the snowy drapery where it had fallen too heavily over the bed. She even re-arranged some flowers on the mantel-piece, whose ill-assorted tints had caught her fastidious eye. Then she led that gentle bride to the window and told her the whole—her love, her jealousy, and that she was dying. She spoke of Woodbury—of his high and generous nature, and besought her, with broken but solemn earnestness, to make him happy. She parted the bright curls from that innocent forehead, kissed it, and blessed her; and then she went away, leaving that fair creature bewildered and in tears.

Emily opened her study. The golden sunset was playing over that picture, as it had done a year before; the apartment was flooded with a purple gloom, and the autumn foliage lay without in gorgeous masses, as it had then. She remembered that it was her birth-day. A year ago that day, and that hour, she had wondered where and how she should be now. She was there, and dying. A smile, broken-hearted but very sweet, stole over her face as she looked about. The landscape stood on its easel, with the dry limb half worked into the old oak, as she had left it; the stand of plants sent in their odor from the balcony, and the canary was fluttering, like a light winged spirit, about the window. She tottered to the easy-chair, unlocked the silver clasp of that embossed book of thought, and began to write. It was poetry, and her face beamed with the sweetness of the spirit's last earthly melody, as she wrote; but suddenly the pen began to wander aimlessly over the page; her face fell forward upon the book; and when she raised it, the forehead and mouth were contracted as with pain, and the page was soiled with blood. She struggled hard for one moment more of strength, while she folded up the book and directed it to Woodbury. His name was the last word she ever wrote; and it was blotted and almost illegible, for her hand was becoming helpless.

It was but a few minutes after the weeping bride had been left to herself, when she heard her husband's step on the stairs. She held her breath, and the tears swam, without dropping, in her soft eyes. The door opened, but it was not that which led to her. A half hour crept by, and then a voice of sudden and terrible grief broke from the next room—She went in, and there, on a low couch, Emily Musgrave lay a corpse, and kneeling over her, with his face buried on her bosom, and his arms wound convulsively around her lifeless form, was her own newly wedded husband. From his strong heart had that cry of agony been wrung. That form was pulseless, and yet the arms were still wound about his bowed neck, as the ebbing life had left them.—Julia crept to the side of the mourner, and her warm white arm was wound around him with the cold ones at the dead. He started at the touch, looked up, kissed her quivering cheek with a passionate burst of sorrow, and over that couch of death they bowed themselves together.

THE PRAIRIE ON FIRE!

BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.

The following ballad is founded, in part, upon a thrilling story of the west, related by Mr. Cooper, the novelist.

The shades of evening closed around
The boundless prairies of the west,
As, grouped in sadness on the ground,
A band of pilgrims leaned to rest.
Upon the tangled weeds were laid
The mother and her youngest born,
Who slept, while others watch'd and pray'd,
And thus the weary night went on.

Thick darkness shrouded earth and sky,
When on the whispering winds there came
The Teton's wild and thrilling cry,
And heaven was pierced with shafts of flame!
The sun seem'd rising through the haze,
But with an aspect dread and dire!
The very air appear'd to blaze!—
Oh, God! the prairie was on fire!

Around the centre of the plain
A belt of flame retreat denied,
And like a furnace glow'd the train
That wall'd them in on every side!
And onward roll'd the torrent wild!
Wreaths of dense smoke obscured the sky!
The mother knelt and pressed her child,
And all—save one—shrieked out, "we die!"

"Not so!" he cried—"help—clear the sedge—
Strip bare a circle to the land!"
That done, he hastened to its edge,
And grasped a rifle in his hand:
Dried weeds he held beside the pan,
Which kindled, at a flash, the mass!
"Now fire fight fire!" he said, as he ran
The forked flames among the grass!

On three sides now the torrent flew,
But on the fourth no more it raved:
Then large and broad the circle grew,
And thus the pilgrim band were saved.
The flames receded far and wide—
The mother had not pray'd in vain—
God had the Teton's arts defied!
His scythe of fire had swept the plain!

AMERICA, I LOVE THEE STILL!

America, I love thee still!
There's glory in thy name—
There's brightness beaming from thy birth,
And honor from thy fame;
There's beauty in thy naked soil,
Bespeaking smiles of love;
Thy rocks and blooming wilds proclaim
Protection from Above.

America, I love thee still!
Beneath thy valleys rest
The pilgrims of a tyrant's power—
Bright emblems of the blest;
And round them, clothed in silence, lies
The mouldering patriot's fame,
Embalmed in sacred Memory's fire—
Immortal honors claim.

America, I love thee still!
Thou art my native land;
Thy joys, so pure, can ne'er be found
Upon a foreign strand.
Though Pleasure's path and Fortune's smiles
In other climes seem fair,
The brightest of their hopes and joys
Can nought with thee compare.

America, I love thee still!
Resplendent glories gleam
Through all thy deeds;—the sacred light
Shall ever be my theme.
Pure from the realms of victory's sky
The crown was given to thee:
'Midst starry lights eternal stands
The Orb of Liberty.

TRUTH FOR ROYAL EARS.

As the court fool was the only one who in ancient times presumed to speak truth to royal ears, so Punch alone dares whisper many a serious admonition to the Queen, and to their majesties the people, in the guise of jest and song. The verses below are put in the mouths of a choir of German children, who, at the Gregorius' Feast at Coburg, read this lesson to the royal visiter, and the nation she rules:

We're happy German children;
You praise our glossy hair,
Our wreaths and pretty costumes,
Our cheeks so fat and fair;
Our little bodies never
Grew stunted at the loom:
Our infant eyes ne'er ached in
The pit-seam's choky gloom.
We never sobb'd to sleep, on straw
Close crouched for warmth, like vermin—
We are not English children;
No, God be thank'd, we're German.

They say our English sisters
Are never blithe, as we.
But, Queen, you look so gracious,
That this can never be.
They tell us they're ill-natured,
Of raiment scant, and rude—
Not picturesque, as we are—
A wild and wolfish brood!
Then bless good Saint Gregorius,
That did our lots determine—
We are not English children;
No, God be thank'd, we're German.

When you go back to England,
You'll think on what you've seen;
Then ask our English sisters
To dance upon the green.
Perhaps they'll look less savage,
With seemlier clothes and food;
Perhaps, with kindly teaching,
You'll change their sullen mood;
'Tis sad that they should go in rags,
And you, their Queen, in ermine—
We are not English children;
No, God be thank'd, we're German!

THE SOUTH MOUNTAIN MAID.

BY HENRY DIFFENDERFFER.

Beside a crystal, laughing brook,
I saw a gentle maid,
Seated within a quiet nook
Beneath the perfumed shade.

And far above the lovely maid,
The creeping vine had spread
Its tendrils in a clustering bower,
Around a flowery bed.

The morn was calm, and sweetly fair,
The sun rose brightly up;
The trees held whispering converse there,
Above "Sol's gilded cup"*.

The air was filled with odors sweet,
From breathings of the pink;
The wild-bird and its mate did meet
Upon the streamlet's brink.

The music of the mocking-bird
Rang joyously around;
The soft wind blew, and rippling stirred
The bosom of the Sound.

And o'er the gently swelling stream
The leaves did whisper tales;
The maiden's voice was lost among
The music of the vales.

Her voice rang loud, and silvery clear,
As forth she poured her lay;
She saw through leaves the sunbeams steer,
Like Hope, with Love to play.

She sang of rosy hope buds gay,
Of opening, flowery love;
How bright is young Affection's day,
When love is borne above

And when her mellow voice was hush'd,
She breathed a tender sigh;
And on her cheek a glow had flush'd—
A tear-drop fill'd her eye.

And on the breeze was borne afar,
The secret of her breast;
That he who was her brilliant star,
Was summoned to his rest.

And then she breathed a prayer to Him,
To grant her sins forgiven,
That in that blessed, perfect day,
The loved should meet in Heaven.

* This is a natural cup, seated upon a ledge of rocks, and receives a portion of the transparent waters of the Sound, a beautiful stream, winding brightly down the South Mountain, towards an expanse of meadows which lie in the prospect. It is called "The Cup of the Sun," because the first beams of the rising sun touch, and play, upon its waters, and gild them with the brightest radiance.

THAT WITCHING SMILE.

BY "D. S."

That witching smile has magic power
More potent than an armed host,—
Can make the sternest heart to cower,
And quickly yield its proudest boast.

The might of hosts may fetters bind
Around the unconquer'd captive's hands;
But here their power ends;—the mind,
Untrammel'd, spurns the tyrant's bands.

But let that rosy, playful smile,
Hold dalliance with the heart—the sprite
Has amply wrought her work the while
Supreme, with unresisted might.

The gentlest dews of Heaven that rain
At midnight's calm and silent hour,
Imparting freshness o'er the plain
And fragrance to the drooping flower;

And rosy morn whose golden rays
Unveil fair nature's weeping face,
And scattering night's dim, darksome maze—
Shed light and beauty in its place;

These, these are blessings, in their kind;
And blessings surely, not the least;
But all this loveliness combin'd,
Falls like the dew on arid waste.

But in Hope's fainting, darkest hour,
(Ay, hope abandon'd as it were)
Let "Sera" smile, a magic power
Makes joy and gladness enter there.

May never frown usurp its place,
Nor wasting grief her furrows plough,
Where lines of fairest beauty trace,
Perfection o'er that angel brow.

THE POETESS.

I heard her praises from each lip; they told the wond'rous power
That dwelt within her charmed lines, to soothe the weary hour;
She sang of holy things, they said; the great Creator's praise,
The glorious beauty of His works, the bliss of wisdom's ways;
And ne'er to earthly love had been her gifted spirit bow'd;
But pure and free as infancy, she moved amid the crowd.
I met her in the lighted hall—within her dark bright eyes
There dwelt a world of shadowy thought; her red lips smiling guise;
The calm brow, where the soft, brown hair in wavy ringlets swept,
Her low clear voice, her gentle laugh, told that she ne'er had wept,
O'er wishes wild, and burning hopes, or false love cast aside;
Or felt the passionate delight of love, the pure and tried;
And ne'er, I fancied, would her heart unlock its treasures rare;
For flattering tones and lovers' vows to her seemed empty air.

Long days passed by; I met her oft; her eyes were still as bright;
The same sweet smile upon her lip, her young foot-fall as light.
We dwelt beneath the same roof-tree; together knelt to pray;
And oft, in gentle converse, passed the hours of summer-day.
One night I bound her waving hair with wreaths of fragrant flowers,
And, while, amid admiring throngs, fled swiftly by her hours.
I sat within my quiet room, and thought of her calm face,
And prayed that love or sorrow there might never leave a trace.
I heard her gentle step; she came; her cheek and lip were white;
Her hands were clasped, her dark eyes shone with wild and fearful light;
She heeded not my anxious face, but sank upon her knee,
And wildly prayed, "O God, I ask my broken heart thou'lt free!
My pride is passed, no longer now the torturing mask I wear,
Of smiles above a weary heart, whose griefs were hard to bear."
Then with her long hair all unbound, she fell upon my breast,
And the wild throbbings of her heart were slowly calmed to rest;
While, with shut eyes, she told a tale that made my pulses thrill,
Of hidden, idolizing love, that lived on, hopeless still.
"I loved him, Mary, long ago, when first in youth we met;
We parted, I to dream of him, and he, to soon forget
The pale and silent stranger girl. Oh! you of calmer soul,
Know nothing of this fierce wild love, that mocks at all control,
Save that of pride. We met again, as strangers, in the dance,
And with a beating heart I saw his cold and careless glance;
I turned in posey for peace. I would not think of him,
And to the dazzling light of fame, I hoped that love would dim.
Ah! vain the wish; his image came when I knelt down for prayer;
'Twas in the poet's glorious lays, in music sweet and rare.
The wreath of fame was on my brow, and worshippers bent low;
They little knew the calm, proud smile was hiding heart-deep woe.

For years I never saw his face—to-night, amid the throng,
I marked his tall and stately form, and faltered in my song.
They spoke of him and said he scorned the gifted female mind,

But sought some trusting, feeble girl, in love's soft chain to bind;
And that the gentle one who stood unlooking at his side,
Before another day should close, would be his chosen bride.
It fell like lightning on my heart. I hastened home—to die.
O, make my grave by the lone lake, and let me quiet lie;
Nor to the cold and careless world, tell that love's burning flame
Consumed my heart. O, bless him too." The last word was his name,
The marble lips were crimsoned with the life blood's rushing tide,
And with one sigh, the Poetess, in her bright beauty, died.

MARY.

NEWCASTLE, N. Y.

THE PAINTING.

BY H. M. KLAPP.

"Grammercy! for your bounty, sir,
There's something else," said he,
"Which never had the traveller
The fortune e'er to see;
Nor shall you for your open hand,
Nor yet your mystic sign,
But rather for your father-land,
Which holds a boy of mine.

"It is that painting there, I wist,
That stands within the wing;
The lady bright, with hawk on wrist,
She withered in her spring:
The aged knight, to mount so fain,
Survived her but a day;
The gallant by her bridle-rein,
He died before, they say.

"They say 'twas taken by Vandyke,
Ere ever I was born;
You see they just are starting out,
Upon a hunting morn;
The gallant's glance is on the maid,
Her's fixed upon her glove,
The father's eye looks pleasantly
Unto the blue above.

"Alack! I may but feebly raise
So dim, so dark a veil;
A feeling for the olden days
Would cause my hand to fail;
The group you see were kinsmen all,
Ah! who could then foretell
That one should by the other fall,
For all they loved so well.

"Alas! it is a mournful tale,
For aged lips," he sighed,
"A bloody death in yonder vale,
That noble gallant died;
But more of this may not be told,"—
He turned his steps to go,
And nothing of that painting old,
Save what he said, I know.

FORGIVENESS.

"Judge not, that ye may not be judged."—DIVINE.

As God is merciful, and good
To man, in all his wickedness;
And Christ poured out His precious blood,
To purchase his redeeming Grace——
That man, by nature reprobate,
And given up to endless Wrath,
Might rise, and live, regenerate
Through Christ, by penitence and faith;
And since our sin is infinite,
Against the holiness of God,
And all have left the path of right,
Perversely seeking selfish good;—
Why should we urge our erring choice?
Why wish all but ourselves adjudged?
While God declares, with warning voice,
"Judge not, that ye may not be judged!"
Condemn not, and be not condemned;
God, and the monitor within
Enjoin on all, to whom descend
The common crime, and guilt of sin
Deep from the tomb of centuries,
And from the awful Throne of Heaven,
We hear, with moving emphasis,—
Forgive, if you would be forgiven.
God gave his only Son to die,
That none through Him might fail of Heaven;
Thus, teaching mercy from on high,
Forgive, that you may be forgiven.
Forgiveness, through the Grace of God,
Is freely offered all the living;
It is the source of ev'ry good,
Man must forgive, to be forgiven.
Judge not, the voice of mercy cries,
Condemn not, echoes loud from Heaven,
Kindly inviting us to rise,
Forgive! Forgive!! and be forgiven.

THE PRESENTIMENT.

BY CHARLES P. ILSLEY.

Chapter I.

Experience teacheth us
That resolution's a sole help at need.—[Shakz.

Do not, for one repulse, forego the purpose
That you resolv'd to effect.—[Ib.

"I have a presentiment!"—Uncle Ben, as he was called, was greatly given to presentiments, and as he was a rich old bachelor, his oracles were always received with the greatest deference by most of his relatives, who had an eye to the "last will and testament." "I have a presentiment, sister Ruth, that your Fred there will not come to much! He is always moping about the house,—why don't he bestir himself? Let him take his cousin Ben for an example—he is a bright, active fellow, and I have a presentiment will turn out to be a smart man!"

Widow Talbot turned a half reproachful look on her son, and sighed to hear this unqualified praise of her nephew to the detriment of her own child.—Frederic Talbot heard the presentiment of his uncle, and it called a blush, partly of anger and partly of shame, to his cheeks. When young Talbot was left to himself, however, he began to reflect on his course of conduct. This self-examination was anything but satisfactory, although it was not unproductive of good.

"Uncle Ben prides himself on the correctness of his presentiments," said the young man; "I'll see if I cannot falsify this one at least!" and as he uttered this resolve, Frederic's eye brightened, and an expression of determination rested on his fine-looking features.

Mrs. Talbot was a widow in rather straitened circumstances, and it required the closest economy to enable her to provide for herself and only child. Frederic was now about seventeen. As yet, he had never engaged himself in any employment. In his younger years the family had not known want, but since the death of Mr. Talbot poverty had gradually come upon it. Fred had been destined for a professional life, and had entered college, from which he was taken at the death of his father, ere he had completed the course. It was more from thoughtlessness than an indisposition to exert himself that Fred had remained a burden upon his mother.—Buried in his books, he forgot that a duty rested upon him to render himself useful. His mother made no complaint, and although he missed the luxuries he was wont to receive, yet his mind never reverted to the actual destitution of his mother.

The remark of his uncle, however, aroused him from his thoughtlessness. He realised for the first time the true state of things—he saw the struggles to which his mother was subjected, and he reproached himself for his life of inaction. He thought over his past life, and contrasted it with his cousin Ben's, who was a clerk in a wholesale store, and by his activity was fast winning a character for business, and the contrast strengthened him in his purpose.

"Mother," said Frederic, that evening, "I am thankful I heard uncle's remark this morning—it opened my eyes. I have been remiss, I know, but hereafter he shall have no reason to complain. I am determined to exert myself and prove him out, in my case at least, a false prophet."

In accordance with this resolve, young Talbot, with a half-sigh it must be confessed, locked up his books, and forthwith applied to two or three places for a clerkship. He was wholly unsuccessful.—Known as he was in the comparatively small place where he lived for rather an idle character—although that was the only charge that could be brought against him—the store-keepers were averse to employing him. Fred was considerably disheartened at his want of success, and for a brief period there was great danger of an abandonment of his resolve. He remained a day or two idling about the house—he looked wistfully towards his book-case—the obstacles in his path became magnified, and a settled feeling of discontent and despair began to fill his mind. It was no fault of his, he thought—he had sought employment—he would gladly avail himself of any opportunity to obtain business—but what could he do? Nobody would engage him—nobody gave him encouragement.

But a feeling of pride came to his aid. He one day met his cousin Ben, who joked him, and, as Fred thought, in a sneering manner, on his ill-success.—This aroused him anew. He felt that in point of capacity he was Ben's superior, and all he wanted was an opportunity—a field on which to display it. He was well aware that he lacked the habit of application, and this he doubted not he should soon acquire. He resolved to leave his native place, and informed his mother of his determination. Mrs. Talbot could not oppose the project, although the idea of parting with her son cost her many a sigh. On consulting with Uncle Ben, he approved the plan.

"One must try if one would succeed," said the old man, "and although I have not much faith in Fred's perseverance, yet we must encourage him."

Although the old gentleman spoke harshly, he acted generously, for he presented his nephew with a handsome sum to pay his expenses until he could secure a place. With a heavy heart, young Talbot left his mother, for he had strong affections, and started for a distant city. He immediately commenced looking around for employment. For a number of weeks he was indefatigable in his search, but ill success attended him. He advertised in the papers, but his "Situation Wanted" was unnoticed.—He frequently saw notices of "Clerks Wanted," but unfortunately he was always too late in his application, or he did not possess the necessary qualifications, or there was some other obstacle which his evil genius threw in his way. His funds were fast getting low, and he began to despair of success.—What should he do? Remain and pick up a living from hand to mouth, or go home and be a burden on his mother? He thought of her poverty—he thought of his uncle's presentiment—he thought of his cousin's sneer! No—he would resort to the most menial employment before he would go back and be subjected to the animadversions of his relatives.

One morning he started anew on his search, with but faint hopes it must be confessed. He had seen in an evening paper an advertisement for a clerk in a retail store. With a palpitating heart, he called upon the merchant. Joy! the place was not spoken for! The salary offered was small—barely sufficient with the closest economy to board and clothe him. He hardly cast a thought on this, but eagerly closed with the merchant, and that day entered on his duties. A mountain weight was taken off his spirits, and with an alacrity that won for him the good opinion of his employer, he applied himself to his task. He had but little knowledge of book-keeping, but making the most of his spare time, he soon mastered its mysteries. Frederic was naturally quick, and with a light heart and active hands, he became in a short time a proficient clerk. He wrote home to his mother, and with a little pride mentioned the satisfaction he gave to, and the praise received from his employer. Mrs. Talbot showed the letter to Uncle Ben.

"A new broom sweeps clean, but I have a presentiment it will not last long," was his rather ungracious remark.

It may be supposed the widow did not mention this discouraging language to her son in her reply, but congratulating him on his success, and expressing the delight which his conduct inspired, she warmly encouraged him to persevere.

At the close of his first year, Frederic was entrusted with the books of the concern. With his promotion he received an increase of salary, and it was with no ordinary degree of satisfaction that at the end of the first quarter, he enclosed to his mother the amount of money advanced to him by his uncle. Frederic had no small share of pride on this score.—He did not like to rest under an obligation to one who had predicted so badly of him.

"This looks more favorable," said the old man as the widow handed him the money. "I intended it though as a gift, not as a loan. However, it is well. But I have a presentiment, Ruth, that Fred has not a proper idea of the value of money. Mark my words, he will let it slip through his fingers too easily! There's Ben now, instead of returning this, he would have snugly hoarded it up!"

The widow felt really vexed at the seeming anticipathy of her brother towards her son. He appeared determined to view him in an unfavorable light. The opposition of his uncle, however, only increased, if possible, her affections for the absent one, and though it took off the edge of her delight as she thought of his success, it did not lower the high hopes she had begun to build upon him.

That wins each god-like act and plucks success
E'en from the spear-proof crest of rugged danger."

"Take an old man's advice,
'Twill do you good: truth waits on age."—New Play.

Before the close of his second year, an opportunity was offered Frederic to obtain a situation in a large mercantile concern. He consulted with his employer respecting the offer, stating that he would not leave him, who had taken him and made him what he was, without his free consent. The merchant said he should greatly regret the loss of his services, and were he to consult his own wishes merely, he should insist on his remaining; but such a course, he said, would be unjust to Frederic, and he therefore strongly advised him to accept the situation, volunteering to give him the highest recommendations.

The situation he had now taken was one of considerable responsibility. He had at first distrusted his ability to perform its duties, but, encouraged by his late employer, he entered upon them, with a determination to devote all his energies to his new calling. Before this brave spirit he found the difficulties he had anticipated were but as shadows, and more than ever was he convinced of the truth of the great poet's words—

"Our doubts are traitors,
And make us lose the good we oft might win
By fearing to attempt."

The pay he now received was more than sufficient for his wants. He had always been used to economy. It was indeed a habit rather than a virtue in him. He had kept wholly clear from the temptations incident to a great city. He had no taste for the mis-called pleasures, the indulgence in which jeopardizes alike the morals and the health. If he ever felt a desire to mingle in those scenes in which young men delight to participate, and which, if not positively evil, are of a doubtful tendency, a thought of his mother and his mother's prayers restrained him. Thrice blessed is the youth encompassed by such a heavenly shield!

In all his exertions, the crowning thought—the paramount desire of young Talbot—was his mother's welfare. The older he grew, the more experience he had of life, the more did he realize the struggles she must have undergone to provide for her household, and more earnestly did he resolve to devote himself exclusively to place her above want. It was with no slight degree of pleasure then that he enclosed to his mother a liberal sum from his wages, and at the same time forwarded her a number of articles of dress.

"I must write to that boy," said Uncle Ben; "he is altogether too free—too lavish. I have a presenti-ment he spends all that he earns. It's all very well to think of his mother, but I dare say he is quite as liberal with his money in other matters. These large cities are the ruin of many a young man, and I doubt if Fred has the stamina to resist the temptations that beset him."

One day, Fred was somewhat surprised on receiving a letter, superscribed in his uncle's handwriting; nor was his surprise lessened by a perusal of its contents. The letter was as follows:—

"My Dear Nephew:

"I am glad to hear, through your mother, of your success. You have thus far done better than I thought you would. I am a man of plain words, and what I say I mean kindly. I have a presentiment that it is my duty to give you a little advice, and I hope you will receive it in the same spirit in which it is given. It was well enough, perhaps, to return the money I advanced you as you did, although I intended it as a gift, not a loan. I have not much fault to find with that. Your sending the money and dresses to your mother, too, in one point of view, was meritorious, although she did not absolutely need your gifts—for so long as I live she shall not want. Your presents show a generous spirit, Fred—and that is what I wish to warn you against. I have a presentiment that you are too free with your means—that you do not know the worth of a dollar. I wish you would copy after your cousin Ben in this respect. Catch him returning gifts, or sending such presents to his mother! He knows the proper value of money, and he takes good care that the pennies do not slip through his fingers.

"There are many ways in large cities to get rid of the loose change, and I fear, Fred, that you are too easy—too thoughtless. Many a young man has been ruined in this manner. First, his own money goes—then his master's—then comes detection—disgrace. I pride myself than no foul stain as yet is attached to our family—see to it, nephew, that you bring no blot upon it! Imitate your cousin's shrewdness—imitate his prudence. Look twice at a dollar before you spend it—Ben does, I'll warrant you. Be economical in small as well as in great matters.—Keep the 'wet day' always in mind. Above all, be honest. Hold fast to your integrity, as the most precious of life's jewels! Swerve not a hair's breadth from the line of rectitude. Follow this advice, and I have a presentiment that you may make something yet.

"From your uncle and well-wisher,

"Benjamin Bushnell."

Frederic smiled as he read this letter—it was so like his uncle. The old gentleman was a plain, common sense man, who looked well to the main chance. And yet for all his prudential advice—for all his apparent penuriousness, he was by no means an avaricious man. Once Fred thought so. He had looked upon him as a close-fisted, hard-hearted miser. But of late he had formed a juster estimate of his character. Measuring him by his words and outward actions, he would have been of the same opinion still, but he had ascertained that beneath that exterior crust, there beat a warm and kindly heart. He knew that the very liberality, which he condemned in others, was a prominent trait in his character.—The voice of distress found a ready listener in him. He was generous, but his bounty flowed in secret. He was one of those who do good by stealth. The world called him selfish—the poor in blessing their unknown benefactor blessed him unawares. Such was uncle Ben. From his mother, Frederic had this revelation of his character since he left—his mother who knew him well, for often had she been the almoner of his charities.

Frederic smiled as he read the letter, but he appreciated the old man's motive, and resolved to profit by his counsel. Two things were apparent to him, however, viz—that his uncle entertained a wrong idea of his, Talbot's, character—and that he gave his cousin Ben all the credit to which he was entitled. His cousin had, by some means, wormed himself into the old man's favor. He was thoroughly selfish, to the borders of meanness. Truly had his uncle said, Ben never would have returned money advanced to him—he was altogether too fond of "hoarding" for that! Ben had a mother quite as destitute of this world's goods as the widow Talbot, yet little was the assistance he ever rendered her. He was very careful that none of his earnings were wasted in her behalf. It seemed strange to Frederic that his uncle, himself so liberal, should regard with such favor this unnatural illiberality in another. It would not have been such a wonderment to him had he known the whole truth of the matter.

His Aunt Bushnell was as thoroughly selfish as her son. She had an eye to the old man's property. She knew that her son was a favorite with him, and she was in hopes that he would make him his heir. Although she felt at times keenly the indifference manifested by her son to her comfort, yet she never alluded to the fact. On the contrary, she often, in the presence of Uncle Ben, spoke in the highest terms of praise of the attentions to her welfare shown by her son. The old man knew that Ben was prudent, and his kindness to his mother was therefore reckoned by him a virtue, while by a singular ratiocination he accounted the same thing a fault in Frederic. The reason was, perhaps, he deemed Fred's liberality as the fruit only of a total disregard of the worth of money. It was no virtue in him to give, because money was no object to him. This was the crotchet he had got into his head, and it bid fair to remain there, to the prejudice of Frederic's interests. Indeed the old man had made his will, and, save a small legacy to Talbot and his mother, the bulk of his property was devised to his favorite nephew and namesake.

Chapter III.

I'll devise some honest slanders
To stain my cousin with: one doth not know
How much an ill word may empoison liking.
[Shaks.

Be thou as chaste as ice, as pure as snow, thou
Shalt not 'scape calumny.—[Ib.

One or two years went by, and from a subordinate station, Talbot had become the head clerk of the establishment. With his improved means, combined with his habits of economy, he had been enabled to purchase a neat house for his mother, and provide for all her wants. This was a new source of vexation to Uncle Ben, who felt that the young man had fairly thrust aside the hand which he was wont to extend to his sister. And yet he could not but admire the spirit of affection manifested by his nephew, although he would persist in ascribing Frederic's expenditure in this manner, principally to a careless disregard of money, and he sighed to think his advice had not had more weight. He could not but acknowledge, too, that Fred's success in life thus far gave the lie to his presentiments; still he prophecied evil: and more emphatic than ever were his prognostics, when on one of Talbot's visits to his native place, he learned that the young man had engaged himself to a young lady, who had beauty and worth, but not wealth, to recommend her!

"I have no fault to find with the girl," said the old man to Widow Talbot; "she will make him an excellent wife, no doubt—but time enough to think of getting married, if one must think of it, ten years hence."

"There's Ben, now," he remarked to Widow Bushnell, "no such foolish thought has entered his head, I'll be bound, nor will it until he has laid up enough to support a wife, as a wife ought to be supported. But it is just like that Fred, and I have a presentiment that before such nonsense enters Ben's head, he will be surrounded by half a dozen responsibilities crying for bread!"

"To think he should do such a thing as that," chimed in Mrs. Bushnell, "and to such a girl as Adelaide Brown! My Ben will never be guilty"——

"Nay, sister," said the old man, interrupting her. "I cannot hear a word about the girl. She's good enough—too good, for that matter. I know her well—an industrious, pains-taking maiden—she deserves a better fate than that which awaits her, or I'm no prophet."

"That was what I was going to say, brother," added Mrs. Bushnell, artfully catching the clue, "Ben would never be guilty of plunging such a girl in distress."

The continued disapproval of his uncle would have been a source of vexation to Frederic, had he not possessed great good nature. Setting it all down to eccentricity of character, he let it pass. In time, he trusted, he should overcome his uncle's repugnance, and be viewed by him more justly. At any rate, he had the approval of his own conscience, and whether the old gentleman did him justice or not, that cheered him on. He had the happiness too of knowing, that by his own unaided efforts he had placed his mother in comfortable circumstances, and in the increased affection she lavished upon him, he found ample reward. She at least did not misjudge him—she had no gloomy forebodings—she viewed his conduct in a proper light.

Never were there two persons more unlike than Talbot and his cousin Ben. The former regarded wealth only as a means—the latter as an end: the one for the good to be accomplished by it—the other for itself alone. They both sought the favor of their wealthy uncle—Talbot because he truly admired his generous character—Bushnell because he hoped to reap a rich harvest from his good will. Frederic's views and feelings were so little in accordance with his cousin's, he had no inclination to establish a close intimacy with him; while on the other hand, Ben regarded Talbot with a jealous eye, and was apprehensive he might supplant him in his uncle's good graces. Consequently, there did not exist a very cordial friendship between the young men. There were other points of dissimilarity between them, which will be revealed in the course of our story.

It so happened that Ben paid a visit to the city where his cousin resided. On his return he had a great deal to say of the style in which Frederic lived. True he enjoyed a liberal salary, he said, but liberal as it was he did not see how it could support him in what seemed to him his extravagance. This was not spoken openly, but he took good care it should reach his uncle's ears, to whom he artfully insinuated that Frederic must have other resources besides his pay, to support him. He pretended at the time to excuse his cousin, as being in some sort obliged, from the company he kept, to follow this expensive mode of living. Yet while he seemingly strove to palliate his conduct, he was careful to throw out injurious surmises, all tending to prejudice his uncle against him. Nor was his mother backward in fostering her brother-in-law's ill-will. Although she in heart doubted the truth of her son's story, yet she considered it a good stroke of policy to favor the deception, and to further establish the spendthrift character of young Talbot, as well as to awaken baser suspicions, she cited an instance of his disregard of money on his last visit.

The circumstance to which she alluded was this. There was a family in town of the name of Parkhurst. They were poor, the father obtaining his living by manual labor, in which he was assisted by his wife and daughter, who took in washing. The daughter was very pretty, and quite vain withal of her comely appearance. Ere long, inuendoes touching the fair fame of the daughter, were whispered about. Alas, for her own and her parents' peace, time soon established their truth! No threats or persuasions could wring from her the secret of who was her destroyer. That she was bribed to this silence was evident, for she was from some source supplied with means to ensure her comfort at least. The Parkhursts were a morose couple, and held but little intercourse, especially since their daughter's shame, with their neighbors, and few cared to question them in relation to the matter. They bore their disgrace in sullen silence, neither seeking or receiving the sympathy of others.

On Frederic's visit to his native place, he had, as usual, employed the Parkhursts to do his washing, and in this way he became acquainted with the fact that they were in extreme want. It was apparent, from some cause or other, the supplies they had received through their daughter, had failed them. They had also experienced a falling off in their customers—the sins of one had been visited upon all. Perhaps the unsocial characters of the individuals themselves had tended to drive away employment. With the generosity characteristic of him, young Talbot, pitying their distressed condition, had contributed to their necessities. Nay, it was observed by those gifted with a prying propensity, that he took an unusual interest in their affairs, and lynx-eyed curiosity had ascertained that he made one or two calls at their house in the evening. After he returned to the city, it was noticed too that Mr. Parkhurst was not without means. Trifles are magnified in a small place, and gossip wags an unrestrained tongue. It may well be surmised that Mrs. Bushnell did not fail to improve the opportunity.

"I do not wish to insinuate any thing against young Talbot—Heaven forbid I should accuse him wrongfully," said Mrs. Bushnell, in a tone of apparent sincerity, to her brother-in-law—"but I must say it does look suspicious, this sudden friendship for the Parkhursts, and their cast-a-way daughter! To think, too, of leaving them a supply of money! It must have been him, for the shopkeeper's wife told me in confidence, that the money paid her husband by Parkhurst, was of the Bank of ——, the same kind of bills Frederic brought with him! I have no disposition to harm your sister's child, Mr. Bushnell—far from it—but one cannot shut one's eyes to every thing!"

"But how can it be?" said the old man, on whom this artful speech was not without its influence—"How can Frederic be implicated in this transaction, seeing that he has been away all the time?"

"Yes, but you forget, brother,"—and a hypocritical sigh accompanied the words—"that a little better than a year ago, soon after Frederic's visit, the shameless creature went away, and was absent some weeks."

"I do recollect now," replied the old man, a stern frown gathering on his brow at the probable disgrace brought upon the family through young Talbot—"she left about the time you went to the city, did she not, Ben?"

"I dont exactly remember—I think—I believe she did," was the confused reply of the nephew, a crimson blush overspreading his face.

The uncle was too absorbed in his thoughts to notice the appearance of his nephew, and by a movement of his head Ben contrived to conceal his face from his mother until his color had vanished.

Burdened in spirits, Uncle Ben paid a visit to his sister Talbot. The trouble at the heart was reflected in the face. His was a sad and grievous errand. He doubted not young Talbot's guilt. Young Bushnell's account of his manner of living in the city told against him, and all that he heard; his friendship for the Parkhurst family—his supplying them with money—every circumstance conspired to fix the charge on him. The family had been disgraced, and he came to make known to the mother the infamy of her son. The old man was too full of his subject—too weighed down with the bitter thought of the stigma brought upon the family to regard much the feelings of the mother, and in reply to his sister's enquiry as to what was the matter with him, for his lowering looks at once attracted her attention—

"Matter enough!" said he, in a voice of passionate sternness—"we are disgraced, sister Ruth—disgraced forever! The very children in the street will point and hoot at us, and no blame either!" and in the bitterness of his spirit the old man paced the room with impatient strides.

"Disgraced!—how disgraced—and by whom?" asked the widow in the utmost astonishment.

"Thank God he is not a Bushnell! There is some comfort in that!" said the old man in a still more irritated tone.

"But who is he?" demanded Mrs. Talbot.

"Frederic."

"Frederic!" echoed Mrs. Talbot, while the color for a moment left her cheeks.

"Yes, Ruth, your precious son, Frederic Talbot—he it is!"

This announcement was so sudden and startling that it was sometime before Mrs. Talbot recovered from the shock. After a brief silence, conquering her agitation, she said in a calm voice:

"There must be some mistake here. Brother, what has he done?"

"I wish to Heaven, sister, there was a mistake—but the proofs are too strong. I tell you, Ruth, he has disgraced the family!"

"But how?" asked the widow, in a forcedly calm voice.

"He is—". The old man paused through a sense of delicacy—perhaps for want of a proper epithet.

"What?—in mercy, tell me what!" exclaimed the widow in a voice of thrilling earnestness.

"The destroyer of Jane Parkhurst!" replied the old man through his set teeth.

"It is false!—a thousand times false!" rejoined the widow, starting up with a rapid movement, while a flush of scornful indignation passed over her face. "Who dares bring this charge upon him?—What proof have you to countenance this base slander?"

"Would it were a slander merely, sister Ruth—calumny would be a blessing now!"

"The proof!—give me the proof!" demanded the widow in a tone that showed all the mother's instincts were aroused.

The old man was hardly prepared for this energetic manifestion. He expected she should be overwhelmed with the charge against her son, and that he should be called on to soothe and condole, instead of confronting her. He little knew a mother's heart jealous of the honor of her child! He felt sensibly the awkwardness of his situation, and in rather a confused manner detailed the gossip he had heard.

"And this then," said the widow in a tone of withering contempt, after he had got through; "this then is the paltry evidence on which you condemn him! On this miserable gossip you would pass judgment on my son—rob him of his character, and without a word in his behalf, plunge him in infamy! Ah! brother—brother!"—and the widow's voice sunk to a low, aggrieved tone, and her lids swelled with tears—"I did not think this of you! I believed better of your heart—God forgive your unkindness!" and sinking into a chair, the widow gave vent to her over-wrought feelings.

The stoicism of the old man was not proof against this scene.

"I will believe him innocent, Ruth; for your sake I will believe him innocent!" said he, in a hurried, agitated voice.

"Not so, Benjamin," rejoined Mrs. Talbot, raising her head; "not for my sake, but for his—his only trust you hold him guiltless! You have wronged him, brother, heretofore—you have always cherished a feeling of unkindness towards him—always! Whatever he has done you have viewed to his disadvantage, and now, as if you would crush him with one overwhelming blow, you come to me with this revolting charge!"

"Bless me! bless me!" exclaimed Uncle Ben, fidgetting around his sister, and brushing the drops from his eyes, "I have a presentiment that I have been too hasty! I may have wronged him—God knows I would not do it intentionally! I hope I have—don't weep! I believe I have. I will believe him innocent—but—but—ah!" ejaculated the old man, breaking off as if a sudden idea had occurred to him: "I have it! I begin to see through it! Ruth, forgive me! The matter shall not rest here—I will probe it to the bottom: let the consequences be as they may. Yes, yes—I will believe him—I do believe him innocent!" So saying, the old man hurried away, glad to escape the contagion of his sister's tears.

A bitter, scornful expression flitted over the features of Frederic Talbot as he folded a letter he had just perused.

"The viper!" he muttered to himself, "I have him beneath my heel, and why should I not crush him! After doing what I have to conceal his villany—after succoring the poor victim of his passions, to be traduced in this manner is beyond endurance! A precious example indeed has my uncle given me to follow! It is my duty to undeceive him. He still harbors suspicions, and I owe it to myself, as well as to my mother, to clear my skirts of this foul stain at least."

The letter Frederic received was from his mother, informing him of the reports abroad respecting his connection with the Parkhurst family, and begging him for her as well as his sake, to visit her and clear up the charges against him. "There are other reports, comparatively insignificant, touching your conduct in the city," she wrote, "set afloat, I have reason to believe, in a certain quarter from interested motives, which it is due to yourself to have contradicted. Your uncle's mind is poisoned in a measure, I am sorry to say, and he is much more ready to listen to suggestions from that quarter, than from any other. Feeling confident that you can nobly and triumphantly vindicate yourself from all these foul aspersions, I hope you will not delay your visit. I need not add that this opinion is cherished by all most dear to you."

Frederic lost no time in complying with his mother's request, and it was not until he experienced the cool reception of some of his former friends, that he fully realized the unpleasant position in which he was placed. From his aunt and cousin he received the most pointed slights. The chilling coldness of their manner attracted the notice of all.

"He braves it out finely," said Mrs. Bushnell, in a spiteful tone, to her brother-in-law. "How can he hold up his head among those he has disgraced, is a mystery to me."

Uncle Ben shook his head gravely.

"We will not condemn him unheard," said he "let us first hear what he has to say for himself. I have a presentiment." He did not finish the sentence, but the expression of his countenance was anything but favorable to the supposed culprit.

Chapter V.

What have I done, that thou dar'st wag thy tongue
In noise so rude against me?—[Shake.

All your attempts
Shall fall on me like brittle shafts on armor,
That break themselves; or like waves against a rock,
That heave no sign of their ridiculous fury,
But foam and splinters: my innocence, like those,
Shall stand triumphant, and your malice serve
But for a trumpet to proclaim my conquest.—[Massinger.

A few evenings after his return, at the request of Frederic, there was a gathering of the family, and some of their intimate friends, at the old man's house. When Talbot entered the room, which was not until the company had been for some time assembled, a marked restraint was visible among the party. Uncle Ben was unusually grave. Mrs. Bushnell, in her starched dignity, scarcely condescended to return his courteous salutation. Young Bushnell, although he strove to appear calm, was evidently ill at ease. Widow Talbot and Miss Brown were the only ones present who seemed collected.

A smile of triumph played around the lips of young Talbot, and conscious innocence gave a dignity to his bearing, as after a brief silence he arose and addressed those present:

"I have requested your presence this evening," he said, with a slight hesitation, which soon passed off, "in the hope that I may be able to remove a foul stigma, which, designedly or not I will not say, has been thrown upon my character."

"I trust you will succeed, Frederic," said the old man, gravely; "serious imputations have been brought against you."

"I am aware of them all, sir—the absent seldom lack back-biters," and he glanced scornfully toward his cousin, who returned his look with a disdainful smile. "I have learned," he continued, "that my conduct while away has been brought in question."

"Nay, we do not so much regard that," said his uncle, interrupting him, "if you can only exculpate yourself from a more serious charge."

"But I prefer, uncle, to clear up all," said Frederic, proudly; "shall I trouble you to read this," and he handed his uncle a sealed letter.

The letter was from his employers, addressed to his uncle, and was a warm testimonial of Frederic's character. The old man's eye brightened as he read the following paragraph, with marked emphasis:

"And we would assure you, sir, so highly do we value his services, and such perfect confidence have we in his integrity, that it has been and is our purpose, at the end of the current year, to offer him a partnership in our house."

A murmur of satisfaction ran round the room as the old gentleman finished reading. Two voices only withheld their gratulations.

"Is that satisfactory?" asked Frederic, gazing collectedly around him, although there was a slight glow on his cheeks and a sparkle of pleasure in his eye, for this was the first intimation he had received of the generous intentions of his employers.

"Perfectly, perfectly, my dear nephew," replied his uncle, in a tone of unwonted kindness; "I had no presentiment of this!"

"We come now to that other charge," added Frederic, unable to repress a smile at the old man's admission—"a charge which more deeply affects my reputation. You all know what it is—it is one at which my very nature revolts! And he or she who first whispered it, — [illegible] contempt in the direction of his cousin and aunt—"knew that it was a base, a most malignant falsehood!"

"That remains to be proved yet," exclaimed Mrs. Bushnell, irritated at his pointed looks, and returning his glance with one of intense passion.

"It is very easy to protest innocence," muttered young Bushnell in a low tone, yet loud enough to be heard throughout the room.

"It will be well, cousin Ben," replied Talbot, significantly, "if others can establish theirs as surely as I expect to mine."

Young Bushnell's glance fell before the fixed look of his cousin, who continued:

"Let us see the grounds on which this charge rests. What are they? Why, that soon after my visit last year, this unfortunate girl left town. This is one link in the chain of condemnatory circumstances. It strikes me that this should tell against my cousin strongest, for if my information is correct, his and the poor girl's absence and return were nearly coincident. Why am I singled out, and he permitted to go unsuspected?"

"What, Ben—Ben Bushnell be charged with such a crime?" exclaimed the old man, hardly allowing Frederic to finish his sentence—"Why, I should as soon think of laying it upon parson Roberts himself!"

"It is well enough to throw out insinuations," was the indignant rejoinder of Mrs. Bushnell, "to cloak one's self!"

"It is a family failing, my dear aunt," replied Frederic, in a tone of mock affection. "But," he continued, "what is the next circumstance? Why, that I employed the Parkhursts to do my washing on my late visit. Was there any thing wrong, or calculated to excite suspicion in that?"

"And was in the habit of visiting them in the evening," added Mrs. Bushnell, unable to repress her ill temper.

"True. I called twice for some articles I wanted," rejoined Talbot, calmly.

"And manifested a singular interest in their affairs, particularly the girl's," continued his aunt, whose hasty temper led her to assume the position of an accuser.

"I found them in trouble, and I sought to alleviate it," replied Frederic, composedly.

"Yes, and supplied the girl with money—will you deny that?" added his aunt, in a tone of triumph.

"I did bestow upon the family a trifle, for they were wretchedly poor," answered Frederic, a little piqued at the disposition manifested by his accuser.

"Hem!—a trifle!—Folks are not so generous without a motive!" was the ill-natured answer.

"My generosity, as you call it, was not without a motive—a double one,"—replied Talbot, in a severe tone—"it was to relieve their necessities, and in some small measure to repair a great wrong."

"Ha, ha!" laughed Mrs. Bushnell, scornfully—"a wrong! we are getting at the truth, it seems!"

"Yes, madam," said Talbot, indignantly; "a truth too, you will not, perhaps, relish quite so well! The wrong I allude to was perpetrated by your own son!"

"My son!" exclaimed Mrs. Bushnell, in a voice almost inarticulate with indignant astonishment.

"Mine!" added Ben, starting up, and shaking in every limb with passion or apprehension.

"Frederic," said the old man sternly, "this is going too far—your temper has got the better of you. You cannot mean what you say!"

"No, sir, I repeat his wrong—and what I assert stand ready to prove. I charge your namesake, there, with being the author of that poor girl's misfortune—let him deny it if he can!"

Had the earth opened before them, greater astonishment would not have been depicted on the countenances of those present.

"This is not to be borne!" almost shrieked Mrs. Bushnell. "Mr. Bushnell, will you suffer the innocent to be traduced in this manner?"

"It is false!" shouted young Bushnell, in a voice hoarse with rage—his face distorted, and his lips trembling with excitement. "Let him produce the proof!"

"It is close at hand," replied Talbot, who retained his composure, and stepping into another room, he returned leading by the hand Jane Parkhurst!

At the sight of this unexpected witness—for he thought he had purchased or rather secured her silence—young Bushnell staggered backwards; his countenance assumed the hue of death, and leaning against the wall, he covered his face with his hands.

"Speak, girl!" said Mrs. Bushnell, striding furiously up to the abashed witness, and shaking her rudely by the arm—"Speak, if the truth is in you—who is the guilty one?"

"Your son!" said the girl in a low voice, pointing to the shrinking form of the accused.

"A trick!—a vile trick!—she is bribed! Ha, ha, ha!" hysterically laughed Mrs. Bushnell, and sunk overpowered by her feelings into a chair.

An attempt to portray the emotions of Uncle Ben during this exciting scene, would be utterly fruitless. Too much astonished to utter one word, he sat awhile in silence—his glance resting first on Frederic, standing proudly erect, then on the timid, shame struck girl, and settling at last on the cowering form of his nephew. Recovering from his surprise, he demanded in a tone of great severity of young Bushnell the truth or falsity of the girl's charge. Unwilling to confess his guilt, and unable to bear the scrutiny to which he was subjected, without heeding his uncle's words, the young man rushed from the room, and was immediately followed by his crest-fallen mother.

A silence of some minutes ensued after they had left, when all present offered their congratulations to Frederic for the triumphant vindication of his character, and foremost and warmest among them all was Uncle Ben.

"I protest, I protest," said the old man, "I had no presentiment of this! Sister, I am an old fool—a brute!—will you forgive me?" and seizing her hand, without waiting for a reply, he shook it heartily. "To think that Ben should be such a rascal, and I so blind as not to see through him!"

It was a nine days' talk of the town. Ben and his mother, to escape from their mortification, thought it best to take up their residence elsewhere. Frederic returned to the city with flying colors. In due time he became a partner in the concern, and took to himself a partner, who, through good report and through evil report, clung faithfully to him. Uncle Ben had a "presentiment" that there never was a wedding that promised a larger share of happiness; and in order to guard against the young responsibilities' "cry for bread," as he had once predicted, a codicil to his will revoked all the former disposition of his property; and, after providing for the victim of his nephew, left the whole of it to Frederic.

When the good old man was gathered to his fathers, the last words that fell from his lips were, "I have a presen—" Death cut short the sentence!

LINES

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG SISTER.

She was a child, most gay, and frank, and pure;—
Loving and mild, and wise beyond her years:
And thus in early morn she passed away,—
A budding flower of spring—untimely plucked!
A gem of rarest value—lost to earth!

Sweet sister! thou canst never be forgotten:
For there art circled round with memories
Of love, and all unspoken tenderness,
That bind thee in my heart's most cherished folds.
And though thy step is silent, though thy form
Is seen no more among us—though no more
The music of thy laugh is heard at home,
Thou in my mind dost live for evermore—
E'en as thou art—a rescuer of loveliness.

Oh, what a world of teeming fancies shone
From the blue depths of thy bright speaking eyes:
How full of life, and joy, and sprightliness,
Was thy young spirit!—Yet how tuned to all
Of gentleness and truth! And thou didst love,
At eve, to steal away from childhood's sports,
And listen to high converse of the stars;
Seeking with curious aspect to unveil
The hidden wonders of those mighty worlds,—
Till, to thy spell-bound gaze, their fairy realms
Seemed opening visibly. And now—oh, woe,
Thou 'rt gone! I may not tell how much I miss
Thy artless gaiety—thy winning grace—
The wisdom of thy childish thoughtfulness—
The cheering brightness of thy sunny smile.
I did not know—alas! till thou hadst fled,
How much of sweet companionship may be,
In childhood's truthful soul, and kindly heart.

Where shall I turn to meet thee? Where in space
Dost thou inhabit? Art thou still of earth?
And dost thou love to visit thine old haunts?
To trace each dear familiar scene, and glide,
With watchful care—unseen—among thy friends?
Art thou a wanderer in those starry depths?
A portion of their own wild brilliancy?
Was there indeed a secret sympathy
That drew thy young look heavenward? Did thy soul
Claim kindred with the sphered harmonies?
Or hast thou now become the denizen
Of some impalpable world, without the bounds
Of space?

Alas! no spirit's whisper e'er
Hath pierced the solemn stillness of the grave,
To solve us death's "unfathomed mysteries."
In vain imagination wings its flight
Above that shoreless void;—it brings no leaf
It finds no resting place! We mass and dream,
Till thought itself grows dizzy with its height—
Then turn and weep to know our ignorance.
And that blind Doubt denies the unknown world;
And Superstition peoples it with ghouls,
And vengeful demons, and all shapes of fear.

How passing wonderful—this human soul!
Shrined in a fragile vase—a fleeting speck
Of earth—lost in the world's infinitude,—
Bound by a feeble web—the very spot
Of circumstance,—this restless, sensitive soul,
Untrammeled by all chains,—still feels itself
An emanation of Divinity!
Th' aspirant of unearthly hopes and loves;
The heritor of immortality!
How oft we strive to trace its origin,—
But strive in vain! We seek its essence, but
We cannot learn it!

Does it mount from Death
Into new life, vague, mist-like, undefined—
A dim abstraction—cognizant of the past,—
All former ties forgotten? Can it be,
That friends who through long years of linked being
Have wound each fibre of their hearts—all thought
And hope about each other—can it be
That these shall live, and grow—apart, forever,
Unsought for, unreclaimed, unrecognised!
Believe it not!—It doth belie our nature.
Better the quiet sleep, than that cold waking!

Oh, let us cherish still the fonder creed,
That the bright flame within us is a thing
Of form and beauty—that, in truth, 'tis but
The lovelier resemblance of its bodily frame!
Cheered that our longing eyes shall greet the same
Familiar features that we loved so here;
And that, in blest re-union, we shall speed
Our high progression, with unbroken ties.
How sweet to think that we with long-lost friends
Shall mingle in yon glorious spirit-land,
And in delightful fellowship, look back
On death as but one portal passed, in our Eternal pilgrimage towards happiness.

Methinks, dear Mary, that I see thee now,
As with thy sister's spirit thou dost wend,
Ev'n from thine angel-playmates, turning back
A wistful look upon the earth thou'st left.
A glimmering smile, half joy, half sadness, sits
Upon thy airy face, and though thy lips
Are calm and voiceless, yet there seems within Thy beamy eyes, a spirit-glance that speaks
In almost audible language to the thought—
The wish for us to join thee.

Do I dream?
Can mind indeed hold commune with the dead?
Is it but dimmed by earthly clouds, which make
The vision faint and dream-like? Is the soul
Itself but thought? And can it soar alone—
When rapt from sense—more vivid than all sight,
Intenser than all feeling? And nay Death
Be still a brighter consciousness than Life?
Dark riddle all must read, but none can tell.

Sister, farewell! Thou will not wait us long.
Th' eternal path no mortal ever missed,—
The path that from a thousand avenues,
Leads to a single bourn—the "second birth,"—
Ere many years are past, we all must tread.
Then loved and loving once shall meet again!
Farewell, dear girl!—Till then—till then, farewell!

MUSINGS.

BY LYDIA LORIMER.

I sat me by the casement when the shades of evening fell,
And a sadly mournful murmur was in the breeze's swell,
And my thoughts reverted to old times, when friends were glad and gay,
Ere the funeral chimes were telling me that they had past away.

I looked up to the quiet stars that shone so purely bright,
With their blazonry of living gems in the diadem of night;
And methought one trembling jewel in its soft, refulgent ray,
Seem'd like that lovely one of earth, who early past away.

She was pure as is the snow flake when half way down from heaven,
Ere its spotless type is tarnished with aught of earthly leaven;
She was gentle as the murmur of a waterfall at play;
But her beauty and her gentleness, all, all have past away.

Oh! forgive me blessed spirit, from thy shining home on high,
That the fount of sorrow at my heart will gush up to mine eye
'Tis not for thee I sadden—far, far happier are they,
Who from this stormy world of ours, like thee have past away

But 'tis for mine own selfishness these scalding tears I shed,
For I am lonely without thee, mine early lost—my dead;
And yearning for the spirit's home, thus to that starry ray
I pour the musings of a heart that longs to pass away.

THE WIDOW'S DAUGHTER

BY ELIZA WALKER.

"Time, faith, and energy, are the three friends God has given the poor." [BULWER'S NIGHT AND MORNING.

It was towards the close of the busying month of April; but, though early in the spring, the weather was bright and bracing—one of those days which, from their clear, delicious freshness, give added buoyancy to the step, strength and elasticity to the spirit—when the boon of mere existence is felt as a joy and blessing, and the heart, forgetting the shadows which past grief or impending calamity fling over it, breathes unmixed aspirations of praise and thanksgiving to the Author of all good! How appropriate, then, was a day like this for the long-projected fete at Morton Grange! What was it commemorative of? Were the nuptials of the young and lovely the event celebrated? The birth or majority of an heir recorded thus by joy and festivity? It was neither of these occasions which collected all the elite of ——shire into one focus. It was to mark the recovery from long and dangerous illness, of Eva, the only child of the proud and pompous owner of Morton Grange—a young, still feeble, ailing girl of fifteen. The successive deaths of five other children, the long period which intervened between the demise of the last of these and the birth of little Eva, had made her to her parents an object, it might be said, almost of idolatry. Such affluence of love was scattered over her path, so fenced in was she by the eager, watchful care of parental affection, from the common casualties of peril and danger, that when, despite the vigilance exercised, disease struck her down, and the glad laugh was exchanged for the low wail of anguish, the bright glance dimmed by the films of sickness, the appalled parents started as from a dream. What, then, was she, the only and beloved, whom they had so cherished and caressed, hurrying, like their other little ones, to the dreary grave? There was agony almost to madness in the thought. All that consummate medical skill could effect was rendered; all that ceaseless, unremitting attention accomplish, offered. Heaven was besought with earnest, supplicating importunity, to spare their treasure; and Heaven listened to their prayers! The fever of delirium faded away, and the thin hand pressed once more in recognition the mother's fervent clasp; the pale lip wreathed into a faint smile on the fond father, who bent breathlessly watching each varying turn of the ashy face. Eva was pronounced out of danger; convalescence rapidly followed; and when entire recovery was established, every friend on their visiting list was eagerly bid to share in the exuberant joy which filled the whole household of Morton Grange, from its imperious master to its humblest retainer. And was Eva worthy of this prodigality of love? In truth she was. Not only did her face and figure give promise or singular and exquisite loveliness—not only in the large, deep-blue eye, whose dark lashes swept a cheek round and fair as sculptured marble—not only in the black shining ringlets which clustered round that cherub face, were there beauty and expression; but in every modulation of the low, sweet voice; every movement of the small rosy mouth told of the mind that dwelt within, of the warmth and sensibility of the heart beating in her young bosom. If ever there was a nature from which every taint of selfishness, that poisoner and corrupter of human motives and actions, was banished—if ever one utterly exempt from that cold, calculating, worldly wisdom which, fettering the nobler and more generous impulses, shapes each deed in accordance only with hard systematic policy, it was that of Eva Morton; sensitive, truthful, trustful, with the ready tear for any suffering, the open hand for every distress, the radiant smile for others' joy, the keen sympathy for humanity in all its varied aspects, from her parents, to her the first objects in creation, down to the bird and dog which fed from her hand, to the smallest insect which crawled in her path, the loveliness of her nature was developed and exhibited. The voice of harshness, the tone of reproof, never yet had met her ear. When she should be doomed to listen to these, how would her soft, but vivid and kindling temperament, bear the bitter novelty!

The fete at Morton Grange was in no respects dissimilar to the thousands that have gone before it, or the thousands by which it will be succeeded. The appointments, where the outlay of money is the last point considered, and over which exquisite taste presides to direct and design, could scarcely fail to be good. Under the superintendence of Mrs. Morton, they were perfect; for in all matters appertaining to dress or decoration, whether person, rooms, or gardens, were to be embellished, that lady's artistical skill was equally displayed, and was ever unimpeachable and faultless. On this occasion, when her heart was filled to overflowing with rapture and thankfulness, there was a peculiar pleasure in tasking ingenuity to its extremest limit in manifesting, by every outward symbol of splendour and gaiety, the feelings which possessed her. The result was quite satisfactory, even to her fastidious eyes, and those of the five hundred guests, partakers of the festivity. Among these, there were none peculiarly noticeable. There was the usual amount of match-making mammas, pretty, marriageable daughters, and handsome, well-dressed men, on whom to practise the authorized artillery of smiles and glances; much rivalry, much scandal—for, alas! in this country, even when "two or three only are gathered together," never is this most odious accessory banished; much make-believe love-making, and a little true; divers well-bred and appropriate compliments to the lady of the house; and a superabundance of caresses and flattery to the little invalid, the heroine of the day; with many speculative guesses as to what would be the probable amount of her fortune at the death of her father. Nor was it only the wealthy and influential who were called to eat the "fatted calf," to rejoice at the preservation and recovery of Eva. Every tenant, every cottager on Mr. Morton's estate, whether tottering with age or helpless through infancy, were invited to participate in the general demonstration of delight and pleasure. But to Eva nothing gave so sweet a joy as receiving from the children of her own Sunday-school their small offering of fragrant flowers, and rendering in return some pretty gift or toy.

But time still leaps onwards to eternity! Whether the hours be chronicled by the dial of joy or despair, unnoted, or bitterly, wearily counted, pass they must!

The fete ended amidst bonfires blazing, music pealing, and fireworks glittering. The guests retired to their respective homes; some with heartaches, which the next morning's sun should chase away; others, it may be, with impressions of a deeper, perhaps indelible character; as if to mock at the instability of all human pleasure, and show to the proud and exulting how slender is the barrier which divides happiness from misery, and that "in the midst of life we are in death." When the next sun shone upon Morton Grange, it dawned upon a heap of smoking ruins! Whether the fire which, in a few short hours, laid the stately fabric in dust and ashes, was the result of carelessness, or the work of an incendiary, was never clearly demonstrated.—Destruction, total and complete, was the consequence, whether accident or design had been the originating cause. Whilst every inmate was buried in profound slumber, overcome by the fatigues of the preceding night, they were roused to consciousness by the fearful announcement that a portion of the house was in flames.

A young officer, on a visit to the Rector of the village, who had risen early in order to reach the first railway-train which should convey him to London, from whence he was to embark with his regiment for the East, was the first person who gave to the horrified inhabitants announcement of the peril which surrounded them. The wind, which howled in terrific gusts, assisted the work of devastation, and they had barely time to escape with their lives, ere the noble mansion was blazing in every part.—And Eva, where was she? The tidings of her danger sufficed to fling her instantly into total insensi bility. Her parents, wild, yet helpless, through excessive fear, rent the air with their screams; but the very abundance of their agony seemed to render them impotent to direct, powerless to save. The domestics, intent on self-preservation, obeyed its instinctive impulse, and sought but their own safety. And she, the beautiful and beloved, might in a few moments have been a blackened corpse, but for the heroic exertions of Cyril Vernon, (the young officer before alluded to,) who, on hearing that she was yet in the house, only waited to ascertain the situation of her chamber, and, regardless of the flames which were gathering around him, rushed to the apartment where the gentle child lay lifeless and motionless, snatched her in his arms, covered her carefully with his cloak, and succeeded, despite the imminent peril which threatened both, in placing her, unharmed, unscathed, in her weeping mother's caressing arms.

Time would not permit the intrepid Cyril to wait to receive the fervent blessings poured on his head; he had only a moment to breathe a prayer of thanksgiving to his Maker, who had preserved him and made him instrumental in saving the precious life of young Eva; and ere she had unclosed her eyes to consciousness, he was again on his route.

Morton Grange, then, existed no longer, and it was the commencement of a train of successive casualties and evils, which ultimately plunged the family in sorrow, poverty, and ruin. A few days only subsequent to the conflagration of his house, Mr. Morton was called on to bear a yet more heavy calamity. Engaged to an enormous extent in speculation in the funds, he accepted the success which had hitherto attended his schemes as an augury and earnest of its perpetuity; but the tide of fortune, as is frequently the case, ebbed suddenly and ceaselessly. Political events darkened and convulsed the horizon of the "money market;" a rapid and ruinous fall in the funds was the consequence, and the hapless Morton found himself not only beggared, but involved in liabilities to the amount of thousands, which not the mortgage of every thing he possessed: not even the sale of the family jewels and plate, would avail to discharge. Maddened, desperate, cowardly, he staggered beneath the new and overwhelming evils which met him on every side, and, instead of waiting for the helpful, healing aid of the "time, faith, energy," which one of our first living writers has so exquisitely denominated as "the three friends God has given to the poor," put a pistol to his head, and became a suicide!

The brief limits of a tale forbid us to follow, step by step, the declining fortunes of the devoted family of Morton. The widow and her daughter found—as, alas! to the discredit of human nature, experience has ever proved—that the summer friends of prosperity fly with the first indication of penury's wintry chills. They gathered together the small remnant of property, which, after the payment of all debts, yielded but a poor pittance indeed; and, leaving the scene of their former splendour for ever, proceeded to London. They entered the vast metropolis of the world, as hundreds do daily, without aim, resources, or friends! It was now, and ever since the shadows of adversity had encompassed them, that all the beautiful points in Eva's character more prominently developed themselves. Though but a child still, such events seemed to have forced into sudden and perfect maturity the wisdom and intelligence of ripened years. She saw her mother, weak in nature, even in affluence, now absolutely helpless in grief and indigence, with only tears and sighs, and useless lamentations, to meet the evils which surrounded them, succumbing feebly to the accidents of the moment, without purpose and exertion for the present, or faith and confidence for the future. To add to their already "huge calamities," an attack of rheumatic fever laid Mrs. Morton on a sick bed, and deprived her temporarily of the use of her limbs; and thus was she made doubly dependant on the energies and capabilities of her youthful daughter for support. They had established themselves in a small lodging in Somers Town, as a cheap and obscure locality; but, though the rooms they tenanted were meanly and scantily furnished, and at a low rent, yet how were the swiftly recurring weekly payments to be met, with all the other incidental expenses? Of the money they had brought from the country, a large part had been consumed by the long illness of Mrs. Morton. To the few feminine occupations which in this country give bread (how often little else!) to those who require and seek it, Eva's tender age presented an insuperable barrier. Who would take a child of scarcely sixteen as teacher and instructress? Her surpassing beauty, also, would have retarded rather than have advanced the probability of meeting with an engagement of the kind, even had her years qualified her for the task.

The construction of fancy articles for the bazaars, after days and nights of ceaseless rumination to poor Eva, was the only medium that suggested itself to provide a roof and maintenance for her afflicted mother and self. In the scorching heat, the wintry snow, was the once pampered and delicate child of luxury and pomp compelled to traverse the streets, to procure implements for her work and purchasers for it when completed. She who had commanded wherever she moved, had now to sue for direction and employment from the hard, the ignorant, and the coarse-minded. But she repined not if success were the reward of her endeavours and labours, and they procured—the dearest boon!—the means to purchase some coveted dainty for her sick and querulous, but fondly loved mother. For herself, she cared nothing; her fare the scantiest, her dress the simplest, toiling from the early dawn to the midnight chime, yet no repining word, no fretful murmur, ever escaped her lip: she confided in Him who "cares for the fatherless," and trusted at His own good time the "three friends he has given to the poor" would effect her deliverance from the bitter thraldom of poverty. But, alas! incessant labour, broken rest, exposure to all weathers, worked their effect upon the delicate frame of Eva Morton: day by day her step became feebler, her eye more dim; still the same amount of work must be completed, or they would fall into arrear. Hardly could she drag her tottering steps to bazaars and shops, where she disposed of her pretty merchandise. But she did. The mighty force of will, the strong sustaining impetus of a holy duty, combated with physical weakness, and gave her the power to do, when thousands, beneath the paralysing influence of health so shattered, would have sunk in helpless and prostrate despair.

It was after a morning more than usually harassing, when weary hours had been spent profitlessly in endeavouring to dispose of her little wares, that Eva, on her homeward path, took her route through the Regent's Park, hoping that the fresh clear breezes from the Highgate hills might, at least, temporarily brace her. It was the height of the London season, when, at certain hours, all the Parks present so gay and animated an appearance.

The bright sunshine, the glittering equipages, the smiling faces, all were in sad contrast with the pale-faced, sorrowful girl, who was crawling, rather than walking, along the broad thronged path. A nursery maid, with two children, one an infant in arms, the other a beautiful boy of three years of age, were amongst the pedestrians. The baby dropped the toy it held in its tiny hand; the servant stooped to recover it, and at the same instant, the boy, in pursuit of an Italian greyhound which accompanied them, rushed into the midst of the drive where the carriages were rolling carelessly along; another minute, and the child would have been crushed under the wheels of a britscha, when Eva, who saw the boy's imminent danger, at the risk of her own life, and with a strength which, in her debilitated state, was almost superhuman, dragged it from the road. But, in her efforts to avert mischief from the child, she herself received a blow from the pole of the carriage, and she had scarcely placed him unharmed on the footpath, ere she fell bleeding and senseless on the ground. To summon the carriage of the grandmother of the boy, which was a little in advance, explain the nature of the accident, lift the lifeless Eva into the vehicle, and convey her to the nearest surgeon's, were events that followed in instant succesession. The injuries she had received were found to be, on examination, of a trifling nature. She was driven to her humble lodging, promising to call on Mrs. Leslie, the relative of the child, as soon as she was sufficiently recovered, and receive again and again her grateful thanks. But weeks passed ere Eva could do this,—a long and severe illness followed the event narrated above. Not uncheered, not unsolaced, however, was her sick-bed; Mrs. Leslie, ascertaining the straitened circumstances of the being who had saved her idolized grand-child from death, provided every appliance and accessory which generosity and wealth could supply to mitigate and relieve the sufferings of Eva. Finding, on a near and constant intercourse with her, the beautiful piety her character exhibited, she offered, on her recovery, a permanent asylum to herself and mother in her house in Curzon street. And when the period of convalescence arrived the offer was accepted, Eva becoming the instructress of young Arthur. The mother of the boy (Mrs. Leslie's only daughter) had died in giving birth to an infant, now only a few months old; his father was with the army in India, and the whole charge of the children devolved on Mrs. Leslie, whose love and wealth made her qualified for the task, but who labored under the affliction of total blindness. It was, therefore, with joy she found one so competent, so gentle, so accomplished, as Eva, to associate with her in the care of the children committed to her charge. And in another way also was Eva able to administer to her gratification. Gifted with a voice of exquisite beauty, music with Eva in her palmy days had been joy, almost passion; so was it also with Mrs. Leslie, and being incapacitated by her infirmity from indulging other sources of pleasure, she leaned on this one for solace and amusement. To listen to the songs she had loved in early youth, breathed by the sweet and bird-like voice of Eva, was a source of intense and unfailing delight. Perhaps in the locality of Mayfair, no house possessed a circle where the inmates amalgamated better together, or were more tranquilly happy, than were gathered under the roof of Mrs. Leslie in Curzon street. The disposition of Eva, serene, hopeful, unshaken in adversity, when the shadows had faded which once darkened her path, resumed the buoyancy and radiance which distinguished it in early youth. Hers was the temperament which not only is a boon to its possessor, but diffuses over a whole household its beneficent and genial power.—Whether romping with the children, singing to her old blind benefactress, or combating with loving words and sunny smiles the peevishness of her mother, she was equally at home, equally resistless.—But there was soon another being on whose destiny she should exert a mighty and abiding influence. Captain Stewart, the father of the children, arrived from India. "Truth is stranger than fiction." He that has proved—and where is he who has not?—that our common, every-day life is characterised by passages of such romance that the novelist would scarcely dare invent, will not marvel that in Captain Stewart, Eva identified the heroic Cyril Vernon, who bore her in his arms from Morton Grange on the night of the conflagration. For the life he then saved, she had almost an equivalent debt of gratitude to place to his account. His first-born, now in all the pride and beauty of healthy boyhood, had escaped an abrupt and painful death through her intrepidity. And so it is: retribution and reward, even in this world, are dealt out to us according to the deeds we have wrought, far more evenly than many admit. Captain Stewart, on the death of a bachelor-uncle in India had succeeded to his property, and assumed with it the name of his relative.

The reader will guess the sequel. Captain Stewart, after being domesticated under the same roof with Eva, soon found that his riches would avail little as minister to his happiness, unless shared with the gentle Eva. Fortunately she reciprocated his feelings, and the bright and blissful courtship of a few months was ratified at the altar of St. George, Hanover Square.

Eva Stewart, while basking in the light of undimmed prosperity, never forgot the deep and solemn lesson she had acquired while treading the thorny path of poverty and sorrow—that "her feet had well nigh stumbled," that she would have been overborne by despair, had she not remembered and confided in the promise, that "time, faith, and energy, are the three friends God has given to the poor."

Hope of the Broken-Hearted.

BY MAYNE REID.

God of Heaven! has she perished,
All on earth I ever cherished?
Can a hope not yet be nourished?
Say not every hope is fled!
Friend—physician—save her—save her!
Oh! but knew you how I love her,
You would try your soul's endeavor!
It is vain then?—she is dead!

Dead and gone, I know not whither—
But her soul returns not hither!
Could I only follow thither,
Thither joying would I fly!
For in life is no more gladness—
And the world is filled with sadness!
Living longer would be madness,—
I am willing now to die!

Shrouded in her long dark tresses,
Feels she not my wild caresses?
Feels she not the lip that presses—
Presses hot upon her brow?
Hears she not my widowed mourning?
No! that eye once passion burning,
Not an answer is returning;
Coldly staring at me now.

Go! and tell me not that sorrow
Such as mine can ever borrow
Consolation from the morrow—
Morrow knows no joy for me:
For each day brings some fresh token,
That in vain kind words are spoken
To the heart that has been broken—
Ever broken must it be!

* * * * * *

I have seen what men call fairest—
Each may think his own the rarest—
But my soul conceived her nearest
The embodiment of love;
She is there still—look upon her!
For not yet decay hath won her—
And though death's damp hand is on her,
Does she not your pulses move?

Saw you e'er a cheek so tender?
Or a hand so white and slender?
Or a waist that would engender
Such a yearning to caress?
Saw you eye so liquid ever?
Or a lip so luring? Never!
'Twould have made your heart strings quiver
But in life that lip to press!

And she loved me—she had sworn it—
She had won my heart, and worn it—
Oh! the anguish that hath torn it,
They alone can know, who part
With the one and only being,
Who by Nature's kind decreeing
Hath been blended with their being,
And entwined around their heart.

She had neither father, mother—
Without sister, without brother,—
She and I were to each other
All the world and all its joy.
From our hearts each day united,

By our lips fresh vows we plighted—
And our souls, with love benighted,
Never dreamt of its alloy.

Oft at midnight from my sleeping,
I have woke and found her weeping,
And her jealous vigil keeping:
Keeping o'er me in my sleep—
For her love was ever zealous,
Never cold and barely jealous;
For the loss of such love tell us
Is it strange that now I weep?

Oh! then tell me not that sorrow
Such as mine can ever borrow
Consolation from the morrow—
Morrow knows no joy for me!
For each day brings some fresh token,
That in vain are kind words spoken,
To the heart that has been broken:
Ever broken it must be!

* * * * * *

And I know 'tis vain, and folly
Most profane and most unholy,
Thus to mourn, since fate hath lowly,
Lowly laid her lovely form;
Yet far vainer were the notion
That a life-time of devotion
Could allay the wild emotion,
Burning now my bosom warm.

No! I cannot cease to mourn her—
Though 'tis God's own hand hath torn her,
And His angel that hath borne her
To that home where angels dwell!
As I gaze—remembrance reading—
In her dark eye's painful pleading—
Fresh my heart begins its bleeding
And life seems a hopeless hell!

Oh! then tell me not that sorrow
Such as mine can ever borrow
Consolation from the morrow—
Morrow knows no joy for me:
For each day brings some fresh token
That in vain are kind words spoken
To the heart that has been broken—
Ever broken must it be!

* * * * * *

Time passes, and a hope (not earthly)
Dawns upon the bleeding heart.
More cheerfully the mourner resumes:—

And they tell me, I am lonely—
To the world I seem so only—
But I never can be lonely,
For by day, in dreams by night,
There's a love-born spirit near me—
And it seems to see and hear me—
While a dark eye smiles to cheer me
With its pure and holy light.

In the sun at mid-day brilliance,
Round me still its kind surveillance
Luring woos to sweetest dalliance
As when she was by my side:
And when night is closing o'er me,
In the darkling forms before me,
Then an angel watching o'er me
Seems my own sweet spirit-bride.

In the midnight deep and sombre—
In my lone and voiceless chamber—
Pouring bliss into my slumber—
O'er my bosom dark eyes beam,
Till my sense is drunk—yet aching,
With a thirst that knows no slaking,
And my giddy soul awaking,
Half denies it was a dream!

Could a love so well united—
For our very souls were plighted—
Could such love by death be blighted—
Blighted never more to bloom?
Oh! give me hope that's sweeter,
Tell me—tell me, I shall meet her,
And with burning kisses greet her,
In a land beyond the tomb!

Yes! amidst my desolation—
'Tis not fancy's false creation!—
That a strange sweet consolation
Heals my bleeding, broken heart;
And it tells me 'twill be given—
For our hearts thus rudely riven
To unite again in Heaven—
Never—never more to part!

OUR DEPARTED FRIENDS.

It is a beautiful thought that when our friends die, they are not wholly absent from us in this world, but that they sometimes linger about their old accustomed haunts, and the companions they still love here. This consoling idea is finely dwelt upon in the following stanzas, quoted from the Portsmouth Journal:

Forget not The Dead, who have loved, who have left us;
Who bend o'er us now from their bright homes above;
But believe, never doubt, that the God who bereft us,
Permits them to mingle with friends they still love.
Repeat their fond words, and their noble deeds cherish,
Speak pleasantly of them who left us in tears,—
From our lips their dear names other joys should not perish,
While Time bears our feet through the valley of years.

Dear friends of our Youth! can we cease to remember
The last look of life, and the low-whispered prayer?—
Oh, cold be our hearts, as the ice of December,
When Love's tablets record no remembrances there.
Then forget not The Dead, who are evermore nigh us,
Still floating sometimes to our dream-haunted bed,—
In the loneliest hour, in the crowd they are by us,
Forget not The Dead! oh, Forget not The Dead!

The Little Hunch-Backed Girl.

BY ELIZABETH OAKES SMITH.

"Oh, mother," said little Ellen, bursting into tears, and throwing her head into her mother's lap, "how happy I am, that there is a Heaven; and I wish I could go to it now; now, dear mother."

Mrs. G—— took the child in her arms, hardly able to speak for tears. She well knew the many trials to which her unoffending daughter was subjected, and she felt for her, as none but mothers similarly situated can feel.

"What has happened to disturb my dear? Who has spoken harshly to you?"

"No one—no one, mother. And I never mind it much when the little girls do call me names; they don't mean any harm. But, oh, mother, how I might be loved, were I as beautiful as cousin Mary. Aunt says I am a better child, more gentle and kind, but every body loves cousin Mary the moment they see her; and they smile upon her and often kiss her.—This morning, Mary and I were playing together, and a lady passed by with a sweet, pleasant face. I loved her as soon as I saw her. She stopped and praised Mary's pretty ringlets and bright eyes, and kissed her rosy cheeks. And then she looked pitifully at me, and said, 'Poor child.' Then, mother, I could not keep from weeping. And—and—she gave me some money. She couldn't love me, and so she gave me money!"

"Ellen—Ellen," said the widow, in the bitterness of feeling, "you will break my heart."

"Mother, will you take the money, and buy some clothes for little John, who comes to the door to beg? I shall never bear to think of it. And now, mother, I will read, and not feel unhappy any more."

"I am afraid it troubled Mary to see you so much grieved; had you not better go and speak to her, my dear?"

"Not now, mother; I am afraid she don't love me so much as I do her. When I turned to come away, she said, 'What a fool you are to feel so, Ellen; the lady might, in welcome, have given you the kisses, had she given me the money; I shouldn't mind having a hunch-back, if people would give me money.'"

"Poor Mary, I am afraid her beauty will be her ruin. Would you not rather be as your are, dear Ellen, than feel as Mary does?"

"Yes, indeed, mother. But I have tried to feel and think what you say is true, that the good are always loved: but, mother, you are mistaken, beauty is loved: people hardly ever think of goodness."

"My dear, people cannot tell how you think; they regard you as a mere child. I love you because you are a good and dutiful child. When you are older, others will love you because you will be amiable, useful, and pious. And remember, my dear, that our Father above can see within you a soul, far more beautiful than the body of your cousin Mary. And, in a few years, this covering of the body will be dropped, and we shall all see each other, not the bodies, but that part which is truly, really ourselves And then, my dear, goodness will be beauty. Cannot my daughter wait patiently for that time?"

"Yes, mother, yes, so long as I have you to love. But I cannot stay long, to be loved by none but you, and pitied by all beside."

"My love, you will think less of the opinion of the world as you live longer. You will feel that we are placed here to do good to our fellow creatures, and be prepared for a better world."

"But, mother, can I ever stay to be as old as you are? I love the little birds, and the green tress, and pretty flowers, but still the world looks cold and dark, and I want to be away."

"My dear, we must wait our Father's time. Though your body is homely and deformed, God has made your spirit perfect, and that, you know, will never die, while the most beautiful body will soon crumble to dust. Think, my dear, of the great blessings you have received, and do not repine for those that are with-holden."

"I will, mother, and be grateful to God for giving me such a mother, who has taught me to be patient and contented under my trials. I might have been ill-natured, and envied dear cousin Mary for her beauty, had God given me a different mother."

The widow pressed her closer and closer to her heart, and the child and mother wept long and bitterly.

"Ellen, many and many have been the tears I have shed over you in your infancy, for I well knew if your life was spared, all these trials awaited you. But my prayers, that you might be blessed with a spirit to bear them, have been answered. Your good aunt, with her beautiful Mary, is a less happy mother than yours, Ellen."

"I will be patient and happy, dear mother, that I may grieve you no more," said little Ellen, throwing her arms about her mother's neck. Poor Ellen was scarcely eight years old. She had been subjected, from infancy, to the thoughtless taunts of her young companions, and even when they forbore their unkind and inconsiderate remarks, they unconsciously wounded her sensitive nature, and helped to break her young and gentle spirit. She was indeed sorely stricken; her body was stunned and deformed, and her face, with the exception of a very sweet and intelligent expression, was remarkably plain. She became thoughtful, affectionate and contemplative, and dwelt so much on the holiness and happiness of Heaven, that she longed to lie down and die. The widow felt that the desire of the child would be gratified. She saw her little frame wasting away, and a bright, unnatural fire gathering in her eye, while her countenance sometimes wore an expression almost of beauty. Her young spirit seemed already disenthralled from every earthly passion and feeling, and glowed with an intensity of love, a stretch of intellect, and depth of thought, that seemed almost supernatural. Her sufferings were so slight she was able almost to the last, to go about the house, and busy herself with her books and flowers. A few moments before her death, she laid herself upon the sofa, saying—"Mother, I am weary, and will sleep."

The mother felt it was her last sleep. She kissed her cheek. Ellen opened her eyes, and looked up.

"Mother, you will be all alone when I am gone, but I shall be so happy you won't wish me back, dear mother. How very good our Father in Heaven is to let me go up so soon!"

She half raised her little arms, as if to embrace her mother—they fell back—little Ellen had left the body. Mrs. G—— felt she was indeed a widowed and childless woman, but she scarcely wept. She lived many years like one who felt she was a "stranger and a pilgrim" here, administering to the sick and relieving the wretched, and was at length buried by the side of her beloved husband and Ellen.

A HUSBAND'S TRIBUTE.

BY S. D. ANDERSON.

Here, in the quiet of our humble home,
How sweetly falls the sunlight of thy love;
Pure, as some star that's seen in skies above,
By longing eyes, that from the ocean's foam,
Look to its light, and wish no more to roam.
Calm and serene, it sheds a tranquil ray
Of dewy freshness, round each passing day;
As deeply ladened with their bliss they come,
And find us love-link'd in a peaceful land
Of which thou art the soul and centre—thou
More fondly lov'd as Time upon thy brow
Lays the rude impress of his whitening hand,
But leaves untouch'd the fountains of thy heart,
From which a thousand streams of love outstart.

THE DRUID FESTIVAL.

BY EDWARD J. PORTER.

Chapter I.

The last beams of the setting sun were bathing with their gorgeous hues the leaves of the sacred oaks, which formed a delightful grove of circular shape, the chosen retreat, and place of worship, of the Druids, near the west border of Caernarvonshire, when two men had seated themselves beneath the ample shade of one of its venerable trees.

One of them was of the middle size, and his drooping form and whitened locks told, in their own unequivocal language, that the bard Eneurin, for it was he, had long since passed the meridian of life. The other appeared to be a young man, of some twenty-two summers, tall, and of a fine, manly form: his long black hair fell in rich clusters over his shoulders, in accordance with the custom of that age; and his bright black eyes beamed with an intelligence unusual to youths of that darkened period.

"The priests have not been inactive on the eve of this grand festival," said the younger, addressing the bard—for it was the evening previous to one of the great festivals of the Druids, and preparations had already been made for the coming solemnities. The taste, as well as the ingenuity, of that class of the initiated, whose peculiar province it was to pay attention to such matters, had been taxed to the utmost, in order to render the present one of the most imposing spectacles, as well as one of the most solemn celebrations of the mystic rites of the Druidical belief. Arbors had been formed in various parts of the grove, adorned with wreaths of oak-leaves, interspersed with different kinds of flowers; while the branches and gnarled trunks of the old patriarchal oaks were hung with chaplets and festoons of the same delicately woven ornaments—"But I am determined on rescuing the young Isabel from the fate the haughty Archdruid would assign her, let the task cost what it may. She is too young, too beautiful, to die, even by the sacrificial knife, at the altar of the pretended deity, who exists but in the imagination of an ignorant and weak-minded race. She shall not die to-morrow, for I am prepared for any emergency."

"My son," said Eneurin, "the stern rule of the Archdruid is not less displeasing to me, than the late malpractices of which he is guilty are distressing to you; yet it does not become you to impugn the ancient faith of your fathers, nor to deny the existence of those lights of our being, whose reflections we wear on the soul. I am aware of the hatred which the Archdruid bore to the late Earl of Arvon, your lamented father, and my warmest friend. I know its cause; and I know that its malignity has not subsided now that the Earl is no more. It exhibits itself at every opportunity, and like the slumbering fires on the shrine of Lok, it awakens at every breath that passes over it, while each glare that it casts is more lurid than the last. But you should not forsake the religion of your sires, because its most elevated offices, and most sacred rites are performed by the base and intriguing Conon.—Its tenets are not the less pure, its creed is still unfainted, though delivered by the lips of the most profane. I fear you have lent too willing an ear to the teachings of that crafty Culdee, and reposed too implicit a confidence in his strange doctrines, and hence our revered religion is treated by you with so much mistrust and indifference."

"Eneurin," said the young Earl, "long before the Culdee came to our shores, I felt that there was a secret spring within me, which only required some friendly touch to call into action the power of its movements, like a vein of pure water lying secretly in the depths of the earth, until some chance excavator breaks the chain that enslaved it; then it gushes forth, invigorating and refreshing earth, tree and flower. But we came not here to discuss points of belief, and such converse had better been reserved for a more befitting opportunity. The danger of the Lady Isabel is the cause of our meeting, and to her safety be our deliberations given."

"Be it so, my son'" said Eneurin. "She is about to become the victim of malevolent feelings, rather than a peace offering to our gods; and I hesitate not to say that she should be rescued, and those who engage in delivering her from death, will confer a greater favor, will yield more infinite pleasure, to the guardian deities of our land, than by suffering her to be immolated at their altars. I am in possession of a secret which will thwart the dark designs of Conon, save the Lady Isabel, and hurl the contriver of the secret scheme from his proud elevation, crushed beneath the weight of his detestable machinations, and overwhelmed with the ruin and disgrace his deeds have long since merited. The part assigned to me in the drama of to-morrow, is to sing the sacrificial ode ere the fatal knife be lifted: but my voice shall be raised in accusation—it shall come to the ears of the accused like the deep-rolling thunder, and as the lightning of Heaven blights the tree that it touches, the truth of my words shall sear his perjured soul. Ere the morrow's sun shall set, the pride of the haughty Conon shall be humbled—the victim of his vile projections shall be saved—and the punishment due to his crimes shall attend his guilt."

"Be not too confident of success, Eneurin," said the Earl; "the plans of the wily Conon are too deeply laid to be foiled by such a plan as you propose. None but coercive measures can compel him to submit. You may, however, pursue your purpose: if that fail of success, mine will not. The morrow will prove which will be the more expedient."

At that moment a band of priests, dressed in white robes, and each wearing a chaplet of oak-leaves, approached, in the midst of whom was seen the Archdruid, bearing a branch of that sacred plant, the misletoe, without which they could not celebrate the rites of their religion. Half frantic with joy at having found the object of their search, they shouted rather than sung the hymns with which they usually hailed the harbinger of propitiation, and attendant of their mystic solemnities. The band approached nearer, and Eneurin rising, said to his companion—

"We had better depart, lest some listener should catch a wandering breath, and reveal too soon the purpose of our meeting, and the heartless Conon baffle our intentions by some counterplot, of which his craft is so productive."

They separated, and the bard proceeded slowly towards the grove to meet the procession; but the Earl remained to ponder on the perplexing difficulties of his situation, and the danger that threatened the Lady Isabel, the companion of his boyhood and the idol of his later years, who, by a cruel custom of the Druid sect, was selected for the morrow's sacrifice, to appease the wrath of their imaginary deities.

Chapter II.

The hour of sacrifice had at length arrived, and numbers of the Druids had assembled to participate in, or witness the pageantry and splendor with which they were accustomed to celebrate such solemnities. Groups of priests might have been seen, engaged in some offices, in almost every portion of the grove. Here stood some half a dozen, dressed in their long white robes, chanting hymns; there, another group, arraying the images of their gods with garlands of oak-leaves; while, in the centre, a third performed several mystic evolutions around the principal altar, near which lay the sacred misletoe. In front of the altar sat the bards, on rude stone benches, leaning on their harps, and waiting for some particular part of the celebration, when the spirit of the lyre was to be poured forth in song to the presiding deity of the day.

In the mean time, a procession of young maidens, attended by the Archdruid, and some priest of the higher order, approached the grove. In their midst moved the Lady Isabel. Her dark brown hair fell in massy curls over her rounded shoulders, through the waves of which, at times, her snowy neck shone out, like half-caught glimpses of the moon, when some ragged cloud receives her, and fain would hide her liquid light from earth. Her form was erect, but her infirm step, as well as the pale hue that had usurped the place of the rose on her cheek, told plainly that it was not without reluctance she became the victim of that day's sacrifice, though the Druids neglected no opportunity of reminding her of the duty she owed to her country's gods, and that their decrees should be received with perfect resignation. Thus was she led on, in the first years of youthful loveliness, to yield up her pure spirit at the shrines of her country's gods, beneath the sacrificing knife of the Druid priest. The procession halted at some distance from the grove, for they did not suffer the uninitiated to enter their sacred precincts; and then it was that the little remaining fortitude of Isabel gave way. It was there that she was to take leave for ever of her friends—and having done that, was to be consigned to the grave. It was there that the memory of former years—the long-cherished hopes and fond aspirations of her youthful soul flowed back upon her in all their primeval freshness. Urged on by the impatient priests, she at length bade them all adieu, and having distributed to each some token whereby to remember her, was then borne to her station at the altar in a state of insensibility. The Archdruid having ascended his chair, with a smiling countenance, where lurked as much of malicious triumph as of secret satisfaction, congratulated, in a grave, hypocritical tone, the unconscious maiden—whose impregnable virtue had foiled and humbled him—for the signal honor which the divinities had conferred upon her, in selecting her as the offering of that great day. He then motioned with his hand for the ceremonies to proceed, and took his seat.

It was then that the bard Eneurin rose, and trembling with the consciousness of the duties he had to perform, instead of singing the ode usual on such occasions, thus addressed the assembly:

"Priests and ministers of the ever-living gods of heaven, and guardians of earth! Hear me for a moment ere a deed be committed which you cannot undo—ere a life be taken away which you cannot restore—ere the secret machinations of guilt triumph over unsuspecting innocence. We should have met to consecrate this day to the worship of our country's gods, with purity of intention, sincerity of heart, and a consciousness that our devotion would prove acceptable to the deities we adore. What intimation, what proof have we that the ceremonies of this day are agreeable to them? Has the sacred misletoe, the heaven-sent harbinger of peace to man, proclaimed that they were desirous of our celebrating this their festival? The misletoe has not appeared. That mystic messenger has not revealed to earth the propitiation of heaven. The all-wise beings of that glorious sphere refuse their sanction to this celebration. Need I tell you whence came the branch which graces the altar of to-day? It was plucked at an undue season, kept fresh and green by the fostering care of the Archdruid himself, placed on a tree, and torn from its pretended place of birth by his own hand, to aid a darker design, which no heart but his alone could conceive, and no hand but his put in execution. All, all is known to me."

"Despicable reptile!" cried the Archdruid, no longer able to restrain his rage, and trembling for fear of further revelations of his crimes, "how darest thou insult the majesty of heaven, with thy slanderous accusations of its minister? How darest thou to impeach in such a place, and at such an hour, one whose irreproachable name and stainless character are well known to all assembled here? Select then a more proper time, and more suitable place, where the truth of thy words shall be tested; and the ordeal of fire shall proclaim my innocence to the world, and pronounce its direful, though well-merited sentence, on the author of such vile falsehoods. Cease, then, ingrate, to interrupt further the sacred ceremonies we are now engaged in." Then turning to the priest at the altar, said, "Madoc! proceed with the sacrifice, nor list the wild ravings of yon frantic maniac."

He then resumed his seat, while a murmur of disapprobation rose from the entire congregation, at the conduct of Eneurin, and Madoc, raising the knife slowly, was about plunging it in the heart of Isabel, when the voice of Eneurin arrested his purpose.

"Friends," cried he, in a voice of thunder, "I am aware of the punishment due to those who accuse falsely, yet I fear not; and I charge you to beware how you trifle with my warning to you. Beware of injuring the Lady Isabel; for here, in the presence of this august assembly, and in the very face of the divinities, I solemnly declare that the Lady Isabel is not the victim those deities require. The Archdruid himself, breathing the very spirit of incarnate wickedness, has contrived that she should die this day—but heaven has raised one voice against him in defence of the innocent maiden."

Upon this the Archdruid, calling down maledictions upon the head of Eneurin, rushed from his seat, and snatching up the knife, which had fallen from the hand of Madoc, was about to put his horrible design into execution, when he fell prostrate before the altar, stunned by the blow of a mace, from one who had come there in the garb of a bard, and held the weapon concealed beneath the folds of his garments. The next moment a band of fifty archers sprung from their places of concealment, and surrounded the grove in all directions.

The confusion created by the appearance of the archers, may be more easily conceived than described. The Druids fled in all directions, leaving the intruders in possession of their grove. The pseudo bard, having laid aside his harp and long flowing robes, carried the fainting form of his long-loved Isabel to one of the rude benches, and having prepared a litter, had her removed to his castle, where their nuptials were celebrated with unequalled pomp and festivity, when she had sufficiently recovered from the shock she had sustained; and the old bard Eneurin, whose task it had been, some time before, to sing the dirge of the lady Isabel, sung sweetly to his unrivalled harp, a splendid nuptial hymn at her bridal.

In the meantime, the Archdruid met with deserved punishment at the hands of the Druid synod, which was convened shortly afterwards, for his trial—and the office was conferred on one who filled the chair with honor, which the hated Conon had disgraced.

The Earl and his beautiful bride lived a long time at the Castle of Arvon, and never did the lovely Isabel give her deliverer reason to regret that he had won for his bride the victim of the Druid Festival.

THE MEMORY OF THE PAST.

BY GEORGE P. MORRIS.

One balmy summer night, Mary,
Just as the risen moon
Had cast aside her fleecy veil,
We left the gay saloon,
And, in a green sequester'd spot,
Beneath a drooping tree,
Fond words were breathed, by you forgot,
That still are dear to me, Mary,
That still are dear to me.

Oh we were happy then, Mary—
Time linger'd on his way,
To crowd a life-time in a night,
Whole ages in a day!
If star and sun would set and rise
Thus in our after years,
This world would be a paradise,
And not a vale of tears, Mary,
And not a vale of tears.

I live but in the past, Mary—
The glorious days of old!
When love was hoarded in the heart,
As misers hoard their gold:
And often, like a bridal train,
To music soft and low,
The by-gone moments cross my brain,
In all their summer glow, Mary,
In all their summer glow.

These visions form and fade, Mary,
As ages come stealing on
To bring the light and leave the shade
Of days for ever gone!
The poet's brow may wear at last
The bays that round it fall;
But love has rose-buds of the past
Far dearer than them all, Mary,
Far dearer than them all.

DEAR FATHER, DRINK NO MORE.

Dear Father! "drink no more," I pray,
It makes you look so sad;
Come home, and "drink no more," I say,
'Twill make dear mother glad.

Dear Father! think how sick you've been,
What aches and pains you know!
Oh! "drink no more," and then you'll find
A home where'er you go.

Dear Father! think of mother's tears,
How oft and sad they flow!
Oh! "drink no more," then will her grief
No longer rack her so.

Dear Father! think what would become
Of me, were you to die;
Without a father, friend, or home,
Beneath the chilly sky?

Dear Father! do not turn away,
Nor think from me to roam;
Oh! "drink no more," by night or day;
Now come—let us go home.

Dear Father! "drink no more," I pray,
It makes you look so sad;
Come home, and "drink no more," I say,
'Twill make that home so glad!

Thus spake in tenderness the child—
The drunkard's heart was mov'd;
He signed the pledge! he wept! he smiled!
And kissed the boy he loved!

THE GOLD PENCIL CASE.

BY CAROLINE ORNE

"How provoking!" said Hester Draper, who was sitting in the drawing-room with her mother and her sister Emma, "that Lucy Mead should take it into her head to be married just as Emma and I want our ball dresses made. I don't believe, could we have our choice of a thousand, that we should find another girl able to turn her hand to every kind of needle-work as she did, and do it as well and as expeditiously. Do, mamma, for once, break over your usual custom, and let Miss Liscomb finish as well as fit our dresses."

"No," replied Mrs. Draper, "her prices are so high I cannot let her finish them, unless you will consent to dispense with the flounces of point d'An- gleterre, or the new evening dresses you talk of having. I am, as you know, trying to make up a sum to purchase some new window curtains, which cannot be done, unless we are very economical."

"Dispense with the flounces?" said Hester. "That I shall never consent to do—Emma can do as she pleases."

"If we cannot succeed in finding some one to supply the place of Lucy Mead," replied Emma, "I am willing to do without them."

"We must find some one to supply her place," said Hester, "and here comes cousin Charles, just at the right moment."

As she spoke, Charles Harleigh, a young man of an elegant figure, and prepossessing countenance entered the apartment.

"I am glad you have called," said Hester, "for we are all so busy we cannot go out, so we want you to go to the Intelligence Office, and see if some one has not applied for a situation, who will supply the place of our old seamstress, Lucy Mead. Unless we can obtain some one, Emma and I will be unable to attend to attend the ball."

"Do sit down a minute, Charles," said Mrs. Draper.

"No, I thank you," he replied, "I prefer to attend to Hester's request immediately."

"As we shall not have sewing enough to employ a girl all the time," said Mrs. Draper," please try to ascertain if there is not some one who can give lessons in music and drawing, and, perhaps, French.—Clementine and Mary are both old enough to begin to attend to them, and we cannot afford to hire a person on purpose."

"But, why not send them to school?" said Charles. "We have schools now, where all the branches you mentioned, are taught."

"If they go to school," replied Mrs. Draper, "they must associate with everybody and anybody. Besides, I consider it decidedly more genteel to have a governess, and you know if we have a girl to do our sewing, she can pass for their governess."

"I will be very particular in my enquiries," said Charles, as he left the room.

"Don't forget to call and report your success," said Hester, calling after him.

After an absence of more than an hour, Charles returned.

"Has any one applied at the office who will answer?" enquired Hester.

"As nearly as I can judge by the description given by Mr. Burt, I think there has," replied Charles.

"Let us hear it," said Emma.

"To begin with: her name is Gertrude Denham—she is about twenty-two, and would like to give lessons in music or drawing, or one of the modern languages."

"But that is all nothing," said Hester, "if she cannot sew."

"Go, on, Charles," said Mrs. Draper.

"If she cannot find employment at giving lessons in these, she will be willing to teach the primary branches of education, or even to do any kind of plain or ornamental needle-work, she being under the necessity of immediately engaging in some employment."

"If she can do everything she says she can," said Mrs. Draper, "she will go beyond Lucy Mead."

"I suspect," said Hester, "that her acquirements will on trial, prove to be of a very humble order.—Persons who can do every thing, seldom do anything well, and I shall be half afraid to let her touch my rich white satin dress."

"I will let her try her skill on mine," said Emma.

"She is so anxious to obtain employment," said Mrs. Draper, "that I shouldn't wonder if she were willing to receive lower wages than we gave Lucy Mead."

"Did you leave word for her to come?" said Hester.

"Yes," replied Charles. "Mr. Burt said that he would send her word if she didn't call, so that she will probably be here by four o'clock."

"I hope she is pretty," said Emma. "Lucy Mead had such a sweet face, it gave me pleasure to look at her."

"It is certainly very desirable to be eclipsed by a seamstress," said Hester, sneeringly.

"It is now nearly four," said Emma, "and you must stay, Charles, till Miss Denham comes, for I have made up my mind to like her, and I want somebody on my side."

"You speak as if you imagined a thing of course, for him to think as you do," said Hester.

"O, no I don't," said Emma, earnestly, but"—

Here she stopt, for a moment's reflection told her that it would not be quite discreet to say that Charles would not be prejudiced against her on account of her humble situation, as it might imply that her mother and sister would.

"I wish, Emma," said Mrs. Draper, "that you would break yourself of the habit you have of late contracted of leaving your sentences unfinished—it is really very impolite."

Charles, whose curiosity was a good deal excited relative to Gertrude Denham, quietly seated himself by the fireside on the strength of Emma's invitation.

"Come, Emma," said Hester, "if you are going to have your dress made first, you must order a fire to be made in the back parlor, for if she don't begin it this evening, she won't have time to finish it in season to make mine."

"It is, as yet, very uncertain whether I engage her or not," said Mrs. Draper. "I certainly shall not, unless her appearance and price both please me."

"We can take her a week on trial," said Hester; "which will be long enough for her to finish the dresses, and then, if we think we shall not be satisfied with her, we can dismiss her."

The fire was accordingly ordered to be kindled in the back parlor, and soon afterwards a girl entered and said that there was a lady at the door who wished to speak with Mrs. Draper.

"It is the seamstress, I suppose," said Hester, "and if it was a washerwoman, Janet would call her a lady."

"She looks like a lady," said Janet, by way of vindicating herself for the supposed mistake.

"You may go and tell her to come in," said Mrs. Draper.

Janet withdrew, and soon returned, conducting a young girl, who certainly, in spite of her faded mourning-dress, looked as the girl had said, like a lady.

"I apprehend," said Mrs. Draper, "that you are the person who applied to Mr. Burt's intelligence office for a situation?"

She replied that she was.

"And your name is?"

"Gertrude Denham."

"Yes, I recollect, now. You can, of course, refer me to some person of respectability, of whom I can make whatever enquiry respecting you I may deem necessary."

"I cannot," she replied; "I am a stranger in this city, having, till within a few months, resided in a distant town."

"And have you neither friend nor relation here?"

"Not one. My parents are both dead, and my only brother, I have reason to fear, has perished at sea."

"Under such circumstances," said Mrs. Draper, "it is very singular that you should come to a large city, where you are unknown."

"I came here with my father," replied Gertrude, "who died a few weeks after we arrived. He had, a short time before, engaged in some speculation, which swept away the whole of a large property."

"A mighty plausible story," said Mrs. Draper, aside to her daughter Hester, "and I shall believe just as much of it as I please. I don't think it will be prudeut to engage her."

And without waiting for Hester's answer, she again turned to Gertrude.

"I believe," said she, that under existing circumstances, I shall be obliged to decline engaging you. The mother of four daughters—to say nothing of our son, whom I consider more particularly under his father's charge—holds a responsible situation, and should admit no person into the family who cannot come well recommended."

A look of resentment and wounded pride was for a moment visible in Gertrude's countenance, while obeying the impulse of her feelings, she rose from her chair, in order to immediately leave the house. The thought, however, of her friendless and destitute situation immediately rose up before her, and in a voice rendered almost inaudible from emotion, she entreated Mrs. Draper to at least, permit her to stay a few days.

"Now, mother," said Hester, in an under tone, "the dresses must and shall be done—at least, mine shall; so what is the use of speaking about responsibility and all that, just as if your daughters were going to be influenced for either good or bad by a seamstress."

"But she is to teach Clementine and Mary, who, as they are much younger than you are, may be more easily influenced. Besides, if I throw difficulties in the way, it will increase her anxiety to come, and enable me to engage her at a much lower price than I otherwise should. Upon the whole, young woman," said she, addressing Gertrude, "if you will engage to teach my two younger daughters music, drawing and French, in addition to the common branches of education, and will attend to little George's reading and spelling, and will fill up the intervals by sewing, for two dollars a week, you may remain a short time."

Emma's cheek deepened almost to crimson when she heard the price proposed by her mother, it being considerably less than what Lucy Mead received merely as a seamstress.

"I must accept your terms," replied Gertrude; "though I hoped that you would feel able to offer a little more."

"I cannot see that it would be any real advantage to you to receive more," said Mrs. Draper. "You will have your board, of course, and as we always have our washing done in the house, that will occasion you no extra expense. Half what I offer you will be enough, or ought to be, to furnish you with suitable clothing."

Though Mrs. Draper could not see that it would be any advantage to her to receive more, Gertrude could see perfectly well, she having, since her father died, although she had parted with all the more valuable articles of her clothing, contracted a debt for board amounting to nearly fifty dollars, which the woman with which she had boarded had for some time been impatient to receive. She, however, saw that it would be useless to endeavor to enlist Mrs. Draper's sympathy by any further explanation of her peculiarly forlorn and unhappy situation, and, therefore, remained silent.

"It is a matter of very little consequence to me whether you accept my offer or not," said Mrs. Draper," after a short silence," as there are alawys a great number of young women, destitute of employment, who will be glad to come for less. On the whole, I think I may as well look further."

"I do accept your offer," said Gertrude, beginning to fear that, after all, Mrs. Draper would reject her.

Mrs. Draper, without replying, rang the bell.

"Janet," said she, when the girl made her appearance, "show this young woman to her room—the same that was Lucy Mead's."

"She is so nervous she will never be able to do anything as it ought to be done," said Hester, as soon as Gertrude had left the room. "Did you mind, Charles, how she trembled?"

"I did," he replied, "but I dare say that the infirmity may be remedied by a little kind treatment.

"Miss Denham," said Emma, "if I mistake not, is one of those persons I have heard Aunt Harleigh speak about, who needs something more to make her happy, than what is generally understood by the term good treatment. She requires sympathy, the same as I should were I an orphan and cast friendless upon the world."

Emma received no reply, though Hester, by a certain motion of her head, and curl of her lips, told as plainly as words could have done, that she considered sympathy a very unreasonable want in a person like Gertrude Denham.

"If you please, Miss Denham," said Mrs. Draper, after tea, "I should like, now Mr. Draper is in, for you to give us a specimen of your skill on the piano before you go back to your sewing."

Gertrude immediately took her seat at the instrument. At first her hands trembled, and her execution was timid and uncertain. Mrs. Draper, with a slight shrug of the shoulders, looked at her husband, who had laid down the newspaper he had just taken up, to listen to the new performer, but his eye being steadily fixed upon Gertrude, he did not notice the look of his wife. The music, however, soon began to carry with it its own animating and soothing influence, and the broken and uncertain notes were gredually exchanged for one of those airs, which, once heard, must ever afterwards, even through a whole life-time, haunt with its sweetness the lonely hours of those who love music. Mr. Draper, Emma and Charles, who were all keenly alive to the power of the divine art, were "not aware of fingers and strings"—they only heard the music; but Mrs. Draper, to whom the mechanical part was all in all, watched the delicate fingers of Gertrude, as they lightly touched the keys, and she too was satisfied. As for Hester, she had almost immediately left the room, that she might examine what Gertrude had done on Emma's dress.

When Gertrude had withdrawn, Mr. Draper again took up the newspaper, but was unable to fix his thoughts upon its contents. While in the midst of a fit of musing, Mrs. Draper re-entered the apartment.

"I think," said he, "that young lady's name is Gertrude Denham?"

"It is—why do you ask?"

"Because it struck me that she looks exactly as my cousin, Harriet Lee, did at her age. Harriet removed with her parents to one of the Western States, and I heard that she was soon afterwards married. The first time I have an opportunity, I must enquire of her a little concerning her pedigree, for I should not wonder if she were my cousin's daughter."

"Now, Mr. Draper," said his wife, "for the credit of Hester and Emma, who have just entered society, I beg that you will not try to trace a relationship between them and a poor seamstress, who would probably have the art, should she get a hint of the matter, to make it appear that she is your cousin's daughter, if she is not."

Mr. Draper prudently refrained from pursuing the subject, and as he afterwards recollected that Elton was the name of the gentleman whom his cousin married, he relinquished the idea of making the intended enquiries.

Several weeks passed away, and Gertrude was so fortunate as to give Mrs. Draper and Hester entire satisfaction. Her mornings were spent in the school-room, and Clementine and Mary not only improved in the common branches of education, but began to make some progress in music and drawing. Her afternoons and evenings were devoted to needle-work, embracing every variety, from the hemming of a plain handkerchief up to the most delicate embroidery, which alone, as Mrs. Draper found on making an estimate which she communicated confidentially to Hester, saved them more than twice her wages.

Gertrude never passed a day without being weary and worn, added to which, she suffered much anxiety of mind, on account of Mrs. Grover, the woman with whom she had boarded, who constantly harassed her for her pay. She hoped at the expiration of three months, Mrs. Draper would offer her what would then be due, and Mrs. Grover, though she really needed the money, was at last induced to wait till then.

The day which closed the three months arrived, and like those which had preceded it, was spent in unremitting toil. It was nearly nine o'clock, and not a word had been said by Mrs. Draper relative to paying her, though Mr. Draper, who was very exact in all his dealings, had in the morning handed her the money for that purpose. The truth was, she had laid it aside with the sum she was trying to make up to purchase the window curtains.

Gertrude turned pale and trembled, when Janet entered the room and told her that there was a woman at the door who wished to speak with her.

"Who is it?" enquired Mrs. Draper.

"I don't know her name," replied Janet. "It is the woman who has called to see Miss Denham so many times."

"I wish she would keep away," said Hester. "If there is anything I particularly wish to have completed, she is sure to come and take Miss Denham off her work."

"She says she must see her," said Janet.

Gertrude rose, then hesitated a moment, and turned towards Mrs. Draper, with the intention to ask her if she could make it convenient to pay her, but there was something in the lady's countenance so forbidding—an expression she knew well how to assume—that her courage failed her, and she left the room without speaking.

"Run, Emma, and listen," said Mrs. Draper, "and try to find out what that vulgar-looking woman wants of her so often."

"Why, mamma," said Emma, "you would not make an eaves-dropper of me."

"What would be the harm?" said Hester. "There is no need of your going though, for I know what she wants. It is the woman she used to board with, and she has come for her pay, I suppose."

The conversation was here interrupted by the return of Gertrude.

"The person at the door," said she, "is the woman with whom I formerly boarded. I am still indebted to her, and have no means of paying her."

"Then she must wait, of course," Mrs. Draper coolly replied.

"She has waited a good while," said Gertrude, "and I thought that perhaps you might make it convenient to pay me the three months' wages now due."

"You thought wrong then," replied Mrs. Draper, "for it would be very inconvenient. I have made my arrangements to pay you at the close of the year, and cannot a minute sooner."

The look of hopelessness and distress depicted in Gertrude's countenance as she turned to leave the room, was an appeal too powerful to the sympathizing heart of Emma to be resisted, and quietly rising from her chair, she succeeded in stealing out of the room without exciting observation.

"I have eighteen dollars," said she to Gertrude whom she overtook just as she had reached the door where Mrs. Grover stood waiting, "which papa gave me to purchase a few articles which I can very well do without. Wait one minute, and I will run and get them."

When she returned, "Not a word, dear Gertrude," said she, as the latter began to remonstrate—"four times the sum would only be your due."

Mrs. Grover received the money with many apologies, saying that she would be glad to wait till Miss Denham could pay her, but that a widow with four small children found it difficult to get along such hard times.

"I shall tell papa all about it, the first chance I have, but I wouldn't have mamma and Hester know what I have done for the world," said Emma, in a low voice to Gertrude. She spoke loud enough, however, to be overheard by Mrs. Grover.

"They will never find out by me, I will promise you," said she, "so you may rest perfectly easy on that score," and repeating the thanks she had already rendered, she bade them good-night.

The following day, Emma received a letter from a Miss Harwood, her favorite correspondent, who, being on the eve of marriage, was very desirous that her friend should be one of the bridesmaids. Emma applied to her father, who gave permission for her to go, and promised to furnish her with the necessary funds.

"I came near forgetting to leave the money for Emma, which I promised her," said Mr. Draper, turning back, and addressing his wife as he was about to leave the house, on the morning of his daughter's intended departure. "Here are twenty dollars which I will thank you to hand her."

In a minute afterwards, Emma came running down stairs in great haste.

"Where is papa?" said she.

"He is gone," replied her mother.

"And without leaving the money he promised me. What shall I do?"

"You don't need any," replied her mother. "He gave you eighteen dollars a few days ago, which will be ample to defray the expenses of your journey both to and from Mr. Harwood's."

Emma raised her eyes, and as they met her mother's stern and piercing glance, the sudden resolution she had formed of telling her what she had done with the eighteen dollars, died away. By running over in her mind the quantity of change contained in her purse, she found she had enough to carry her to the place of destination, and she determined within herself to write to her father when she wished to return, to furnish her with the means. She took an affectionate leave of Gertrude, who saw her depart with deep regret, for except her pupils, Clementine and Mary, and little George, she seldom saw any person but Mrs. Draper and Hester. Charles Harleigh, when he thought his aunt and cousin would probably be in the little back parlor, where Gertrude spent every afternoon and evening, would sometimes call for an hour or two, and these were the only intervals cheered by a single ray of sunshine. Even to him, they soon became the hours most dearly prized, and as every word and action evinced the purity and delicacy of Gertrude's mind, he made no effort to subdue a partiality which soon ripened into the most ardent affection, and which one of less just and liberal views, might have considered degrading on account of her humble situation.

Three weeks had passed thus, when one day, among other letters for the family, was one from Emma to Gertrude, from which we give the subjoined extract:

"Letitia Harwood is to be married next Thursday, and the day following I should like to start for home; but will you believe me, dear Gertrude, I have not a shilling in the world. More than a week since, I wrote to papa, to remind him of the promise he made to supply me with funds for my journey. By return of mail I received an answer from mamma, saying that she had read my letter, and should say nothing about it to my father, as I already had more than I ought to expend. Will you, my dear Gertrude, hand him the enclosed note? In it, as you may see, for I give you permission to read it, I have told him all about the eighteen dollars, which I confess I have not the courage to explain to my mother, even were I sure it would not be productive of any unpleasant consequences to you.

"I received a letter from my cousin Charles a few days since, in which he said a great deal about a certain person, which, though I long to tell you, I shall reserve for personal communication."

Unfortunately, Mr. Draper was out of town, and the time of his return uncertain; and as Emma's generosity to herself had been the means of involving her in her present unpleasant dilemma, Gertrude felt it to be a duty to make the only effort in her power to assist her. The only thing of value she had in the world was a gold pencil-case, which had been given to her by her mother. It was marked with the initials of her mother's name, which was Harriet Denham, and was the only memento of her beloved parent that she had been able to retain. It was, moreover, associated in her mind with several touching incidents, which rendered it not only a dear, but sacred gift, and she would have endured almost any annoyance or privation, rather than to part with it. Now, however, she did not hesitate, and taking the pencil-case from the box in which it had been locked, she put on her bonnet and shawl, and slipped from the house, as she thought, unobserved. As it was still quite early in the morning, there would be time for her to a pawnbroker's shop, which was at no great distance, before it would be time for her to meet her pupils in the school-room. The original price of the pencil-case was eighteen dollars; but five dollars was all that Mr. Hawkes, the pawnbroker, was willing to advance, if he complied with her request for him to give her an opportunity to redeem it at the expiration of eight months.

As Gertrude was about to leave the shop she saw Hester passing slowly along on the opposite side walk. She immediately drew back, and remained till she had passed, uncertain whether she had observed her or not. When she returned, she wrote a few hasty lines to Emma, and enclosed the five dollars in the letter, which she hoped to be able, after tea, to carry to the Post Office, before it would be time to commence her evening task.

"Where can Miss Denham be?" said Hester to her mother. "This cloak must be finished to-night, and she ought to have been at work a quarter of an hour ago."

"I guess she has gone out," said Janet, who had entered with a fresh supply of coals, "for I saw her pass through the hall just now with her bonnet on."

"That reminds me that I saw her in a pawnbroker's shop this morning," said Hester. "Stop a minute, Janet, while I make a memorandum of some articles I wish you to get at Miss White's."

While speaking, she furnished herself with a slip of paper, and then looked for her pencil in her work-box, where she usually kept it. Not finding it, as the pencil was contained in a valuable gold case, every other probable place was searched, but without success.

"Have you no suspicion where it is gone?" said Hester, after she had dismissed Janet.

"I don't know that I have," replied her mother.

"Don't you know that I told you I saw our seamstress in a pawnbroker's shop this morning?"

"Yes, I recollect now, and I think it does not need the aid of magic to tell where it is gone."

"I will know before I sleep," said Hester. "I will go to the pawnbroker's myself, for a pencil-case that cost eighteen dollars, is more than I can afford to lose, and as it is marked with the initials of my name, and is of an antique pattern, there will not be the least difficulty in identifying it."

"If you are determined to go," said her mother, "you had better take John with you, as it is now quite dark."

As Hester left the room by one door, Gertrude entered it by another, with her face flushed and breathing quick and short, as if she had been walking very fast.

A woman entered the pawnbroker's shop at the moment Hester arrived at the door, whom she immediately recognised as Mrs. Grover, with whom Gertrude had boarded.

"I hope," said Mrs. Grover, addressing Mr. Hawkes, "that you have not sold my silver spoons yet, for I very unexpectedly received a few dollars this evening, and have come to redeem them."

"No, I have not sold them," replied Mr. Hawkes, "though I came very near selling them this morning."

"Did not a young woman, by the name of Gertrude Denham, formerly board with you?" enquired Hester of Mrs. Grover.

Mrs. Grover answered in the affirmative.

"For a very particular reason," said Hester, "I should like to know if she has lately paid you any part of what she owes you?"

"And for a very particular reason," replied Mrs. Grover, who recalled what Emma had said when she gave the money to Gertrude, "I had rather not tell."

"Just as you please, but you may possibly be obliged to tell before long." Hester now turned to Mr. Hawkes, and enquired if a young woman did not call on him that morning in a faded mourning dress.

"Mourning dresses are so common," he replied, "that really I cannot recollect. Cannot you make your description a little more particular?"

"The person I allude to is somewhat taller than I am, and has quite an air with her, that some would call lady-like."

"I think I do recollect such a person."

"And do you remember for what purpose she called on you?"

"I do, distinctly."

"It was, I suspect, to sell or pledge some article?"

"That is what persons generally call on me for," he replied.

"May I ask what the article was?"

"Pardon me," he replied, "but as most persons generally feel some delicacy as regards such transactions, I don't feel myself at liberty to tell."

"I think I know without being told," said Hester, "that it was a gold pencil case."

"As you seem to be well acquainted with the transaction, it will be no harm for me to confess that it was a gold pencil case."

"Will you permit me to see it?"

Mr. Hawkes hesitated. "I promised," said he, "not to exhibit it to any person's inspection, till the expiration of eight months, when I shall be at liberty to sell it, if not redeemed."

"I have reason to believe," said Hester, "that the pencil case belongs to me."

"If you can prove it belongs to you, and will refund the five dollars I advanced on it, I shall certainly make no objection to restoring it to you. If you will favor me with a description of the pencil case that belongs to you, I can readily tell whether it is the one in my possession."

"The one I lost is marked with the initials of my name."

"As you have never honored me with a call before, I am not certain that I recognize you."

"My name, sir, is Hester Draper, and I am the daughter of Mr. William Draper, the merchant."

"Yes, I know Mr. Draper very well. The pencil case is probably yours then, for I recollect that it is marked with the initials 'H. D.' There can be no trouble, I think, for as the young woman has hardly had time to spend the money yet, it can easily be recovered."

"She has, I have no doubt, parted with every cent of it," said Hester, "to the woman who was in here a few minutes ago, who, as you will remember, said that she had received some money very unexpectedly this evening, and who in a very brazen-faced manner refused to tell me who paid it to her."

"Yes, I recollect—but give yourself no uneasiness—all shall be made right, I assure you;"—and bowing very low, he retired to his writing-desk, which was in a distant corner of the apartment, where his attention appeared to be wholly absorbed in the contents of an open ledger.

When Hester reached home, she found her mother in the drawing-room with Charles Harleigh, who had just returned from a short journey.

"I have sent to have our seamstress join us," said she to her mother, with a meaning smile.

In a few minutes Gertrude made her appearance. Charles rose at her entrance and exchanged with her the compliments of the evening with a warmth and interest that formed a striking contrast to the cold greeting he had bestowed upon Hester. The latter, though extremely piqued, inwardly exulted in the thought that she had it in her power to take her revenge.

"I wish to ask you a question," said she to Gertrude.

Gertrude raised her eyes with a look that implied a proper degree of attention.

"Did you not leave a gold pencil case in pledge at the pawnbroker's this morning?" said Hester.

A faint blush broke through the paleness of Gertrude's countenance as she replied that she did.

"I thought that it would be impossible for her to have the effrontery to deny it," said Hester, to her mother. "As I suspected, I found that the pencil case which I lost was in the keeping of Mr. Hawkes."

"Is it possible," said Gertrude, "that you can suspect that it was your pencil case I pledged?"

"I did suspect it," replied Hester, "but my suspicion now amounts to certainty. I saw you in Mr. Hawkes' shop this morning, and he confessed to me that you left a gold pencil case marked with the initials of my name."

"How unfortunate a coincidence," said Gertrude, "my pencil case was marked H. D., for Harriet Denham, which was my mother's name."

"Your assertion is of as little consequence as it is easily made," said Mrs. Draper.

"The assertion of one poor and friendless like myself," said Gertrude, "is, I suppose of no consequence when opposed to Miss Draper's?"

"Why didn't you request Mr. Hawkes to let you have the pencil case home?" said Mrs. Draper.

"I did, but he would not let it go out of his hands till he received the money back which he advanced on it."

"How much did he say it was?" enquired Mrs. Draper.

"Five dollars."

"Miss Denham," said Mrs. Draper, "as the five dollars you received by right belong to my daughter, you will be so obliging as to hand them to her."

"The pencil case," said Gertrude, "as I have already said, was my own, and I have already disposed of the money I have received for it."

"Will you have the complaisance to tell us in what manner you disposed of it?" said Mrs. Draper.

"I don't feel myself at liberty to tell," replied Gertrude.

"Surely," said Charles Harleigh, speaking for the first time, "it is quite immaterial what she did with the money, as the manner of its appropriation can neither prove nor disprove anything that regards the pencil case."

"There is another thing, however," said Mrs. Draper, 'that is not quite so immaterial. I think that you will agree with me, that the purloining of an article worth eighteen dollars, is too grave an offence to go unpunished."

"Oh, madam," said Gertrude, turning pale, "can you possibly intend to make the matter public?"

"Why not?" said Mrs. Draper.

"Because, however appearances may be against me, I am innocent. Spare me, and I will labor for you, unremittingly, for months, and even years to come, without any compensation."

"I don't choose," replied Mrs. Draper, "to be bribed into making myself a shield for vice.—Charles, you will oblige me by taking the necessary steps for her arrest."

"Pardon me, Aunt," he replied, "if I decline obeying your request, as I am as well convinced of Miss Denham's innocence, as I am of my own. Let the matter be thoroughly, but privately investigated, and I have no doubt but that her innocence will be made manifest."

"Very well," said Mrs. Draper, "if you don't feel disposed to oblige me, I must find some person that will. If Mr. Draper was only at home—but he won't be here for more than a week. One thing, however, I am determined on, and that is, not to give shelter another night to one who has proved herself so undeserving of the kindness she has so lavishly received."

"I am ready to go at any moment," said Gertrude.

"No doubt," replied Hester, "you would be glad to give us the slip, but we prefer to have you suitably escorted."

At this crisis, Mr. Draper unexpectedly entered upon the scene.

"My dear Gertrude," said he, as soon as he had had time to observe her, "what makes you look so distressed and agitated?"

The kind manner in which Mr. Draper addressed her, overcame what little firmness she had been able to assume, and burying her face in her hands, she she gave way to a paroxysm of tears as violent as uncontrollable.

"What is the meaning of this?" enquired Mr. Draper of his wife.

In reply, she gave him to understand that Gertrude had taken the liberty to pawn Hester's gold pencil-case.

"And did she do this," said he, "after you had paid her her quarter's salary, which I handed you for that purpose?"

"I have not yet paid her," said Mrs. Draper, "but that was no excuse."

"It was, at least, a temptation," he replied; "and if tempted to guilt through your negligence, we should, I think, deal leniently with her."

"It was for her good that I withheld it," said Mrs Draper. "At the close of the year, it was my intention to pay her the whole, which would have been much better for her than to have received it by degrees."

"I think you will be sorry for what has happened," said Mr. Draper, "when I tell you she proves to be our relation."

"Our relation?" said Mrs. Draper and Hester, both at once.

"Yes, I have ascertained that she is the daughter of a cousin, who was once as dear to me as an own sister. Her name, as you have often heard me mention, was Harriet Lee, and she married a gentleman by the name of Elton, who afterwards, though I did not know the circumstance, had his name altered to Denham, at the request of an uncle, who promised, in return, to make his will in his nephew's favor. That uncle has, I find, recently died, so that my cousin Gertrude, if she have no brother nor sister, may, at any time she pleases, take possession of a property which is, at least, worth a hundred thousand dollars."

It was amusing to see the change which this last announcement made in the deportment of Mrs. Draper and Hester. The severe and stern expression of Mrs. Draper's countenance at once vanished, and in a subdued whisper she began to express her regret to Charles Harleigh respecting the pencil case, saying that, after all, she thought it better be passed over as lightly as possible. As for Gertrude, while the shadow of so degrading a crime hung over her, nothing had power to cheer her. The dark picture which the suggestions of Mrs Draper had brought up before her, was one which could admit no ray of sunshine.

"I am not of your opinion," said Charles, in reply to his aunt. "Instead of passing it over lightly, I should, as I have already recommended, give it a thorough and patient investigation, as I have no doubt, could all the circumstances be laid bare, that they would not only prove Miss Denham's innocence, but be an honor to her character."

He was rewarded by a single glance from Gertrude, which told him how deeply she valued his good opinion. Mrs. Draper, who noted all that passed with a vigilant eye, could not, though the hundred thousand dollars were glittering in the back ground, forbear a supercilious toss of her head, while Hester, who was less guarded, was about to make some remark which would have betrayed her vexation, when Clementine entered with a pencil-sketch in her hand, which, having elicited the praise of her instructress, she wished to exhibit. As she crossed the apartment, Charles imagined he saw the top of a gold pencil case partly hidden by her fingers, which were clasped over it, the remainder being passed beneath the sleeve of her dress. Though the little girl resisted him, he drew it from its hiding place, and finding that it was marked with the initials of Hester's name, he quietly presented it to her.

"Clementine," said Hester, in an angry voice, "how came you by this?"

Clementine hung her head, but little George, who had climbed upon his father's knee, said,

"I know."

"Tell then," said his father;

"Hester," said he, "laid it down on the table where John puts the letters and papers when he brings them from the Post Office, while she peeped into a letter that was for Miss Denham, so Clementine saw it and took it to draw with, because she said she liked it better than she did her own."

The angry looks which Hester bestowed upon the child, while he innocently disclosed the attempt she had made to gratify her curiosity, was entirely lost upon him, conscious as he was, that, from the profound attention with which all listened to him, he was delivering an important piece of information.

A few days afterwards, as the same party were sitting together, some vehicle was heard to stop opposite the house. Charles, who went to the door, soon returned accompanied by Emma and a young gentleman, whose countenance bore a striking resemblance to Gertrude's. The word "brother," which broke from her lips, as she sprang forward to meet him, confirmed the suspicion which his looks had excited in those present.

The story was quickly told. Impelled by that spirit of adventure which often induces the youth who has been nurtured in the lap of ease and luxury to exchange his pleasant home for the privations and perils of the sea, he embarked in a vessel bound for China. A gentleman who intended to spend several years in that country, offered him a lucrative situation, which he accepted. He sent letters to his parents and sister by the same vessel that he went out in, which being wrecked, and all on board having perished, he was supposed to be of the number.—Letters subsequently sent, failed to reach them: so that they continued to believe that he had found a grave in the ocean. While on his way to the town where he expected that his parents and sister were still living, he met with an old acquaintance, a nephew to the Mr. Harwood, at whose house, Emma was then a guest. The nephew introduced him to his uncle and family, and his name, as well as his close resemblance to Gertrude, soon led to remarks and inquiries on the part of Emma which revealed to her who he was.

Shortly after Gertrude had retired to her chamber, she heard a light tap at her door. She opened it, and Emma entered with a letter in her hand.

"You must read this, dear Gertrude," said she, "now you are an heiress, as it will show you that my Cousin Charles was able to appreciate your worth amid all the disadvantages of poverty and dependence, and that he had fully made up his mind to offer you his hand. We have known each other from childhood, and though I may be somewhat blinded by partiality, I think—and it is saying a great deal—that he is worthy of you."

About three months after this, a young lady entered the shop of Miss Liscomb, one of the most fashionable dressmaker's in the city.

"I should think," said she to Miss Liscomb, "that the dress you have in hand must be a bridal dress?"

"It is," she replied, "and look, here is another exactly like it. They are the richest lace that has been brought into my shop for the season, and are, of course, to be worn over white satin."

"They are very beautiful," replied the lady, "who can they be for?"

"One is for a Miss Gertrude Denham, who has for some months been engaged to Charles Harleigh, the other is for Emma Draper, who is going to be married to Miss Denham's brother, who besides a very handsome property which he is said to have accumulated in China, found himself on his return heir to fifty thousand dollars, a like sum having fallen to his sister."

"I am very glad," said the lady; "that Emma Draper is going to marry so well, for she is, I have been told, as good and amiable as she is pretty. As for the other lady, I never saw her, but it strikes me that I have heard that the Draper's had a governess by the name of Denham."

They had, and Gertrude Denham is the very person."

"And has it not been whispered, that taking advantage of her friendless situation, Mrs. Draper and her eldest daughter treated her very ungenerously?"

"I make it a rule," replied Miss Liscomb, "to be silent relative to all matters of that nature where my employers are concerned—but one thing I may say, and that is, however ungenerously Miss Denham may have been treated, she is quite above retaliating."

JANE GRAHAM;

OR,

I Shan't Marry "that" Man.

BY KATE.

"I shan't do it."

"Do what, you vixen?"

"Marry that man."

"Who wants you to?"

"Nobody."

"Great need of will about it, then?"

"Or rather a waste of the commodity, you may think."

"Just so. From your tone, I judge you are in earnest."

"And so I am."

"Yet nobody wants you."

"Not so certain of that."

"Some one, not worth taking?"

"Not that, either."

"Pretty ado you make about nothing. You won't marry somebody, who at the same time don't want you."

"Suit yourself about positions. But I say again, I won't marry that man."

"Enlighten me. Who is it you are disposed to honor so highly by a refusal?"

"Charles Wentworth."

"Has he proposed?"

"No."

"Rather premature in the refusal, methinks."

"This letter tells me he is on his way here, for no other mortal reason."

"Have you ever see him?"

"No."

"Engaged by proxy?"

"Yes, an uncle of mine, blessed with more cash than sense, took it into his head that Charles and I would make a fine pair to torment each other, all that's needful for this life, so he named us as equal heirs, in case we married. I fancy I am woman enough to choose my own husband, and if he was half a man he would say so in regard to his own partner for life."

"Perhaps he is coming to look for himself, and tell you he is man enough for that."

"He takes a deal of trouble, if his only object is to get a peep at the animal mentioned in the documents as an incumbrance."

"Then you won't see him?"

"Not if I can help."

"Has he written you?"

"Yes, there's his letter."

"Poor fellow—he has the worst of it, after all."

"How so? Isn't it bad enough to be speculated upon as a cash article? What can he have worse, I pray?"

"If he is a man of delicacy, and his letter bespeaks it, he feels the awkwardness of the thing as much as you."

"Let him prove it then, that's all. It looks to me vastly like wishing to secure a fortune."

"What say you to playing him a trick to try his spirit?"

"Anything on earth, if so be I am rid of him."

"And you won't marry him?"

"No. Shall I tell you again?"

"That's sufficiently emphatic. By your voluntary relinquishment, I conclude whoever wins may wear?"

"Precisely."

"Hear my plan, then. I'll be Miss Jane Graham for the time being, and you plain Anna Cleaveland. If it's the fortune he wants, Miss Lucy Graham pro tem will outwit him."

"Good. By a little management we can make the plan work finely. Old Margaret don't much fancy what she calls 'selling a white body outright,' so she is safe; John must come into the secret, and then good-bye to Mr. Charles Wentworth and his pretensions."

"If he abide the trial, what then?"

"Fate will determine, I suppose."

"When does he arrive?"

"To-morrow. Plenty of time to arrange matters."

"Yes, and as fortune favors the brave, who knows but one of us will win."

The merry girls clapped their hands for joy, at the bare idea of playing a trick upon our luckless hero, while he, poor fellow, as innocent of all blame as need be, was only doing his part, because he felt obliged to. No wish of his led him to comply with his benefactor's request. It was only a simple act of courtesy to the lady, and if she had a spark of delicacy, he was sure she would refuse, and both go their ways in peace. So reasoned Charles Wentworth. His ideas of women were too exalted to admit of her being an article of merchandise, consigned in a bill of sale, as one would a bale of cotton. Besides, as Jane Graham said a decent man would feel, he vastly preferred to choose for himself. He couldn't love an angel, if selected for him by another, and he was sure Miss Graham was no angel. She might be sordid enough to wish to avail herself of the opportunity to possess at the same time a fortune and a husband; but he would not marry her, not he: or if he couldn't in decency help it, he would apply for a divorce the hour after the ceremony was performed. What silly airs a body will assume when conscious of their own importance, and how often a body is made to swallow pretty strong speeches. Did Charles Wentworth keep his word? We shall see.

The girls found no difficulty in making old Margaret coincide with their wishes; but John, the coachman, could not bear to see his old master's daughter only Anna Cleavland. True, he loved Anna almost as well—still his reverence was too large to allow of such encroachments on family rights. At length, however, he came round, and on condition that the game should be short, agreed to transfer his service to the Miss Graham to be.

By a process almost as expeditious as the modern mode of telegraphing, they were informed of the arrival of Mr. Wentworth at the village inn. Soon after came his card, desiring an interview with Miss Graham. As previously arranged, both girls were in the room when he was announced. The pro tem Miss Graham, with wonderful gravity introduced her friend, Miss Cleavland, who immediately assumed her part in the entertainment of the evening, which, despite the awkward errand they perfectly understood to be the cause of his visit, passed off pleasantly.

Surprised at the lateness of the hour, Wentworth took leave, with a request to be permitted to see Miss Graham on the morrow, and his eyes asked the same of Anna, but his lips did not. He was evidently exceedingly pleased with the latter, though his attentions were mostly confined to the to him Miss Graham.

"Are you sorry you changed conditions with me, Jane?" said Anna.

"Not a bit. I must confess, though, that he is very agreeable."

"Just the man for me. He is frank, courteous and agreeable—three very desirable qualities."

"Perhaps you will regret your metamorphose?"

"Perhaps so. Yet if I've any skill in determining symptoms, I shall be but second best. The plain Anna Cleavland will be the winner if she will."

"She can be won for love, not money."

"So be it, then; but remember, if I forego the pleasure of winning a lover because I chance to wear your honors, I shall deserve a bountiful recompense."

"The fortune goes with the rejected. That you are welcome to."

As Wentworth returned to his lodgings, his thoughts naturally remained with the ladies, whose society he had really enjoyed. Were it not for the awkward construction Miss Graham would put upon his motives, he could really fancy her. She was graceful, dignified and complaisant; but her friend, Miss Cleavland, charmed him with her frankness of manner and brilliancy of wit. To make proposals to the former, involved mercenary motives. To the latter, no such considerations could possibly accrue. His dreams that night were more or less influenced by the events of the evening, and it is no particular matter of wonder that he fancied himself the accepted suitor of the pretty Anna Cleavland. Dream-land is thickly populated, everybody knows; and its density of inhabitants must account for the strange confusion which attends some of their more prominent actions. It's well the laws of our land are not strictly enforced in that region—else some folks would find themselves arraigned for rather queer offences. At any rate, Charles Wentworth thanked his stars he was not accountable for the injudicious acts he knew himself to be guilty of while within its limits. What the particular crimes were, is not my province to relate—and if the culprit don't confess, the world must go unenlightened.—The sharers in his midnight wanderings fortunately lost all consciousness of them long before daylight, even if they knew at all,—and were quite too busy with their own affairs to meddle with other people's. Smith's Philosophy of Dreams, with his descriptions of remarkable hallucinations, were for once thrown into the shade by the fancy flights of the sleepers in question that night. I'll not answer for the half of them, and will be bound they could not either.

The next morning Charles Wentworth was an early visitor. Miss Graham was engaged, but her friend Anna helped to beguile the tedium of the morning. In fact, so interested did they become, that they forgot Miss Graham was absent till she apologized in person. That day Wentworth forgot to go for his dinner, having, by the bye, bespoken the same with the ladies he was visiting. The errand which he had journeyed so far to perform was again forgotten. And that night found him more enamoured than before with the merry, pretty Anna. She on her part congratulated herself that she was not obliged to receive his attentions as a consequent on the unlucky clause in her uncle's will. By the deceit practised, she could learn more of his real character—and judge his moral worth without the drawback of constantly reflecting that she was, after all, but a consideration in trade.

Day after day passed without bringing matters much nearer a conclusion. Riding, walking, singing and dancing, lent their aid, in the way of pleasant variety—till Wentworth found himself quite domesticated.

At length, as if for the first time aware of the impropriety of her course, he resolved on making the effort to broach matters to Miss Graham. His request for a private interview was followed by a speedy arrangement to that effect. He began by a brief allusion to the circumstances of her uncle's decease, and the motives which prompted him to seek her society. He regretted the dilemma in which both were placed, and begged she would forgive him, if ought he had to say gave her offence. Under different and more favorable auspices, he could not say what his feelings might have bee the whole matter savored too much of a mere business transaction to suit the taste of either. From the agreeable acquaintance he had formed, he was led to cherish high respect for her as a lady, and would ever be proud to acknowledge her as a highly-esteemed friend. But in the holy relationship proposed by the deceased, he must in all candor confess he had no wish to urge her to enter. The generous fortune connected with the gift of her hand, under such circumstances, was no consideration, and he cheerfully relinquished all to her.

He could not bear that the sharer of his fortune should be a sort of dowry—neither could she, he was sure, be pleased with proffers of attachment from him, under circumstances that must necessarily make him appear mercenary, whatever his true motives might be. He was perfectly aware of the almost ungentlemanly conduct he must seem to be guilty of if thus yielding up a claim on her, for love or anything else, ere he had ascertained whether he had rendered himself agreeable. If she would pardon him for it all, he would assume the responsibility of the rejection, and bear the obliquy, if there were such in the eyes of the world. His agitation of manner, together with his respectful and feeling tone of voice, convinced his listener of his perfect sincerity, and while she keenly felt the almost unwomanly predicament in which she was placed, she assured him of the high regard she must ever cherish for his manly conduct. His feelings perfectly coincided with her own. She could never consent to be disposed of by the will of another; so that the rejection would be mutual. It would always afford her pleasure to be numbered among his friends, and now that the barrier to confidence and friendly attachment was removed, she would be happy to continue his acquaintance, with the familarity their mutual understanding would warrant.

As Wentworth rose to take leave, he begged the favor of a moment's conversation with Miss Cleveland, which was most cheerfully acceded to. He hardly knew how to begin, as his past interview with Miss Graham had completely disarranged him. Without the slightest disparagement to the charms of her friend, Miss Graham, he begged to be allowed to confess the deep interest he felt for her—and if it were not asking too much, he hoped she would allow him to believe he was not altogether indifferent to her. From the delightful companionship of the few past days he had come to feel how much he could appreciate the same for life. It was premature for him to say that, but if she would only allow him to hope for her favor, he trusted he might be able to prove the sincerity of his regard, though quite sure a life-time would be too short to illustrate the depth and fervency of his attachment.

Poor Anna was overwhelmed by the earnest appeal thus made, as well as a sense of the false relation she had assumed. To him, she was only Miss Cleveland, and as such, received the highest honor a noble minded man can pay a woman. Convinced of his perfect honor, she reproached herself for the wrong she had done him—and this mingling of feeling kept her silent.

Unconscious of the mental operation through which she was passing, Wentworth waited with evident anxiety for a reply.

The tears that forced themselves through her fingers, in spite of Anna's effort to hide them, betrayed her.

Construing them as tokens of sorrow, he approached her, begging her forgiveness, and reproaching himself as the most unfortunate of men. One word and he would leave her—though by so doing he cast aside all hope of happiness. His deep love would lead him to consult her wishes rather than his own; and this, he trusted, would convince her that his words were not mere profession.

Thus appealed to, who could resist? Not many; and Anna was not of that number. Placing her hand in that of Wentworth's, she briefly related the whole manœuvre of which she had been guilty. She would not take advantage of his ignorance; if he could love her for just what she was, she could ask no more.

"Not Anna! Not Anna!" repeated Wentworth.—"To me you are such, and as such have I learned to love you. Speak my fate, and if need be, I am ready to say farewell!"

"There is no need of it, unless you choose."

"Bless you for those words; but"—pshaw! the talk of lovers don't look well in print.

* * * * *

Anna Cleveland, the rejected Miss Graham, is malicious enough to tell Wentworth to this day, that he was perfectly aware which was which, and that he undoubtedly discovered the "crock of gold"—as most men have wonderful penetration in such matters.

Reader, have you found out whether Jane Graham did marry that man? If so, let me assure you, he didn't get a divorce the next day.

THE ORIGIN OF FLOWERS.

INSCRIBED TO MISS ——.

BY EDWARD J. PORTER.

They say that the flowers which I twine for thee now,
Were in earlier ages unknown to earth's brow;
Till the light of earth's maidens drew down from their sphere,
The thoughts of the angels to shine round them here.

And each thought, in those love-breathing moments that fell,
Through the bright air, bore with it a power and a spell,
To gaze from the earth, to some bright being's eyes,
And breathe forth a lover's fond, passionate sighs.

Then how can love's language more sweetly steal forth,
Than from gems that have breathed it from earliest birth!
Then list while they whisper the wish, and the vow—
What they told once for angels, they breathe for me now!

SUMTERVILLE, S. C.

THE TWIN ORPHANS;

OR,

Traits of the Sailor's Character.

BY E. F. WELD.

Chapter I.

The brigs Nereus and Mohawk were lying in port on the N. W. together, and had been for many days. Both vessels belonged to one owner, and while the one was now, after three years' absence, to return home, the other was to remain trading upon the coast. Both vessels were alike short-handed, and an agreement had been made between the masters, to draft two men from the remaining vessel to man the homeward bound. The Mohawks were the last comers, and her crew were called aft, and in a few words the captain expressed his wishes, stating farther that it should remain with them to decide which should be the two. The day was given to them to spend as they chose, and the crew of the Nereus had a similar indulgence.

Liberty with "Jack" is liberty; and to answer his ideas of the same, he must be ashore, if it were on a sand beach even. Now leaving the skippers to overhaul documents, and the mates to write letters, and the remaining functionaries, the cooks and stewards, to talk of Philadelphia, which they are sure to visit when in funds, we will go ashore with the liberty men. Wherever a whaleman may put in to refit, or a chance merchantman may stop to trade, it may with safety be averred a pulqueria or grog-shop is to be found; and here, begging Jack's pardon for the same, you may be sure to find him. So having paid the way why, we will cross the threshhold of Don Jozea's groggery, and for the time being seat ourselves with the two crews.—"Hold on a bit," not too fast with your conclusions; we are not about to join a riotous set of vagabonds, but the reverse—intelligent, honest, generous tars, men who would honor any calling, and who are here for the very reason that on shore there is no other place for them.

Homeward bound and outward bound are conversing together, and if you will listen, you will find one theme mostly discussed, home. Yes, here are those destined to be absent, dictating kind messages and affectionate regards to friends, and as each dilates upon the good qualities of mother, wife, or sweetheart, as the case may be, you may believe as he says, that in his opinion there never was sweetheart, wife, or mother, who could compete with his.

The question as to who should embark in the returning vessel has been decided by lot; though to look about on the contented faces of the group, it would be a difficult matter to determine who were the fortunate ones, so buoyant is the sailor's character. It had been a hard trial to some, and one boy had retired to give vent to his feelings unperceived. Young to his profession, he had been months absent on his first cruise; not from home—for home he had none.

"I say, shipmates, but wont I have a time then?" said Bill Smith. He was one of the fortunate ones. He did not leave home in the ship, but had joined on the coast, and was known to have a handsome sum when he shipped. "Once in Boston, I take my land tacks aboard and hurra for the country.—Here I am, my old gal, says I, and do you see this, handing over the blunt; well, the standing part of that goes for making you comfortable, and I will lay back in the shade."

"Well, Bill, long as we've sailed together, I never heard of your wife afore," remarks one.

"No more should you, then, my good fellow, but you will allow me to have a mother, and I'm blowed if I believe there ever was a better mother, with a worse son to wallop than I've been. I say, though, did you mind how that youngster cried?"

"No."

"Take my word for it, 'mates,' but his heart is in the right place. If it was not for my old mother, God bless her, I would give him my chance, and stop the cruise with you."

At this moment, the lad in question entered the room; his tears were dried, though their traces were not effaced.

"Round too here, my lad," said Smith, "and give me your flipper. Don't hang down your head, my bantum—never be ashamed of a good heart; there's not the man here but likes you all the better for what you couldn't hide the while ago; and if Bill Smith hadn't a poor old mother on a lea shore, d'ye see he would give his chance up to you. Now, then, I will tell you what you must do. You just tell me how the land lays, and after I've seen my mother all right, I will find yours. I will tell her what a fine lad you have grown; what a good ship you have got, and the best ship's company to sail with I ever knew. She shall know her boy ain't forgot her; and you must send something to please her."

"I have no mother!" sobbed the little fellow.

"Well, your father, then, my boy."

"There is nobody cares for me but my poor twin-sister; my father died when we were children."

"Tell me where she is, and I will find her."

"Oh, she is in the work-house!" and no longer able to restrain his tears, he burst out crying afresh.

The lad's lonely state, and his tears for his sister, brought tears in turn from most of his listeners, and caused the thoughts of many to revert to their scenes of home and years of boyhood; and as they drew nearer, there was not one that did not pity him sincerely, and feel the regard they all entertained for him strengthened.

The boy at length looked up and earnestly regarding Smith, said—

"Tell me, will you indeed see her?"

"Aye! my lad, and there is my hand on it"—and whilst the right hand was proffered for his grasp, the left brushed away an unbidden tear.

"Then, Smith," said the boy, "I will ask the captain to pay me, and you will give the Squire the money, and tell him he shall have all I can earn if he will take my sister from the work-house. She can earn something, and my wages will help the rest. You don't know indeed how I feel when I think of her, with nobody to care for her in the work-house, and me so well off with you all so kind to me."

"Ship-mates," said Smith, exultingly, "I was right when I said his heart was in the right place; and now cheer up, my lad; but blubber a bit I must, and I don't care who does see it. I count myself a man, but this youngster is more of a man at heart than me, and how do I know how it goes with my old mother? Here, before all hands, I promise to do all for both of you that man can. Aye, I'll be a brother to you—so make yourself easy about your sister; she shall not only leave the work-house, but I will lay a plan that shall keep her clear on't. Do you mind, my mother's roof shall be a lee for her. Now, then, my boy, don't give it another thought; and meantime, just tell us all your life and how 'twas brought about that you fell so far to leaward."

"Aye, aye, my boy, tell us all about it; 'twill lighten your heart, and mayhap we can plan something for you," said the rest.

"I cannot remember my father," said the lad, "but mother used to often speak of him. She told us how when he died they sold his house and land to pay his debts. Mother hired a small house, and kept a school for children and took in sewing."

"We were poor but happy, and we never wanted for clothes or food. We had a small garden and a shed, and they left mother a cow. In the summer the cow used to run in the street, and sister and me helped to take care of the garden. When the farmers got their hay in I worked with one and another, and they gave us hay enough to last all the winter.

"We were ten years old when mother died. She was sick a long time: a kind neighbor took care of her all the while. We did not know how sick she was until we were led to her bedside when she was dying. The kind woman that took care of my mother staid there till the last. Well, the day mother was buried, she took us home with her, and then she told us we could not go to our old home any more. I remember I stole away and went down the lane toward the house, but seeing the Squire and two other men come out, I was frightened and hid. I saw the Squire lock the door, and put the key in his pocket; and one of the men turned the cow out and drove her off. They threw stones at poor Rover, our old dog, but they could not drive him far, and before they were out of the lane he had come back and laid down on the door-step. After they had gone, I went and laid down with Rover, and then I felt how lonely I was in the world, and it seemed as if my heart would break. I staid there a long time: it was dark when my sister came for me—for they watched me, and knew where I was.

"We tried hard to make Rover follow us—he would come a little way, then look up and whine, and go back again. I remember sister began to cry, and then I left off and took hold of her hand and said things to her I could not feel, to make her less unhappy, as we walked to the kind neighbors had taken us to her home.

"Day I used to steal away and go down to and always carry something for Rover—last he followed me to my new home. We were treated very kindly, and we promised we would cry no more, and I kept my word till one day in going down the lane, I saw them putting all my mother's things in a pile before the door. Rover ran to the house and barked so he frightened them; he went in and they could not drive him away. I had stopped and did not dare somehow to go close to the house, and they called me, saying if I did not come and take the dog, they would kill him. I went and had to tie a string round his neck and drag him away. I tried not to cry, but I could not help it.—One man spoke kindly to me and asked me if there was any thing he should buy for me, 'for,' said he, 'the law was that the things must all be sold to pay the doctor and other debts of the estate.' I asked him to get me the big Bible that had our names and father and mother's in it, because I knew it would please sister, as we took turns to read to mother out of it. It was the last thing mother asked us to do when she lay dying, and the minister who was there shewed us what to read. He said he would buy it, and he did, and brought it to us.

"Well, we staid a good while with the kind woman who took us, who was poor herself. At last some of the folks who used to help her, said if she kept us, they would help her no longer, and we might all go to the work-house together. None of the farmers round would take us: they all said we were too small to be of any use. It was like a second death to us when we left her roof for the work-house; but as some of the neighbors had told me how things were, I made my mind up that it was my place to go, and sister agreed with me. The day was fixed on, and our second mother bid us good night the night before hand, telling us where our bread and milk would be in the morning, as she should run into a neighbors so as not to see us when we left.—That night after she thought us asleep, I heard her pray for us.

"Well, we breakfasted, and with full hearts took our road for the work-house—poor Rover following us. I kept my spirits up on account of sister, until we were in the yard, when I saw my faithful dog cudgelled out, and the gate shut; I felt so bad I could not hold in longer, but cried loud and long. Although they had taken us from our friend's house, they could not from her kind heart and remembrance, and every Sunday we were allowed to visit her and read to her.

"At last I took it into my head to run away, and get my sister's consent only, when I promised to come back and take her out. Our benefactress, when I told her, at first objected, as she said boys that went to sea forgot their friends; but at last she said I might. Now, in the work-house there was a good deal of yarn spun, and stockings and mittens knit, which were sent down to Boston to sell by the wagon that used to go with cheese, and such things, to market. The driver had long before said he would take me, and help me when we got to the city. So one morning I started, and with my kind friend's blessing and half a dozen pair of socks she knit me, bid good-bye to my native town. The driver kept his word—he looked out for me in Boston till Mr. Titcomb, the Shipping Master, hearing my story, got me a chance in this brig."

"I like that old woman, though," said Bill, "and never fear, my lad, but she has kept an eye to windward for your sister. So give me her name, and I will see her too."

"Her name was Gray."

"Gray!—where did she hail from?"

"From"—

"God bless her, and you too, my boy!—tell me if she was hearty—for it is the first word a runaway son has heard for many a long day of his good old mother. Truly, she could say that sailors forget their friends. If but living, she shall never have room to complain again. Tell me, my boy, does she wear well?"

"Yes, many is the time that I have heard her speak of the good health she enjoyed."

"That's it—hurrah!" shouted the worthy tar, giving vent to his feelings. "Now, then, Don Jozea, let it be your best—and we will all drink to a happy old age to her."

"Aye, will we," said another of the sailors; "and mind, shipmate, to tell her that the Mohawks, man and boy, will give her a call when we get in. It will be a first rate lark to charter a coach and take a turn inland; and we shall see a shipmate's sister at the same time, and what ain't ship-shape, we'll put to rights. Now, then, here's the 'old gal,' and the young 'un. A dock berth to the one, and a weather set to the other."

Like a band of brothers, with their joys and sorrows in common, all joined in the rejoicing; and Bill and the boy had to shake hands, and receive the congratulations of all again and again.

"Now, messmates," said he who had called himself Smith, "one thing more. I've got a new ship, and there could not be a better time to drop my purser's name—the more so, as I feel right proud of my mother's. For my part, now, with the youngster, I should like to go aboard and see if the skipper will pay him off."

"Heave ahead, my hearty! We will all go with you, for the Mohawks have got a word to say to the old man, too."

The two masters had arranged their business affairs, and sat abaft on the hen-coop; while the mates of both crafts stood chatting in the waist.

"You did not tell the men to be off at this time, did you?" said the masters.

"No, sir, not this three hours," responded the mates. I expect they want to finish their frolic aboard."

"Just see dat, now!" said the cook, "dem boys can't get along widout me;" and the good-natured negro brought a fiddle as black as himself from its hiding-place, and proceeded to put it in tune.

"Supper first, doctor," said the Captain, in a pleasant tone.

"Aye, aye, sar!" and the cook's funnel became a smoke-pipe, while the hiss of the fry-pan struck the ear, though now and then another sound was faintly heard to emanate from the same office, not unlike the twang of a fiddle-string.

The boats had gained the side, and the gangway was thronged with happy faces. As soon as all were aboard, they proceeded aft in a body, stopping and removing their hats when within a few feet of the masters.

"Well, men, have you settled who is to go?"

"Yes, sir."

"Now, then, what else is in the wind?—out with it at once—short yarns."

"Well, d'ye see, sir," said Gray, advancing and leading the youngster forward, while the rest closed round—"we've all got a favor to ask for this boy, if you please. If you have no objection, we'd like to have his wages paid, or an order for them given for me to take home for him."

"So modest a request as that I can't listen to without a sufficient reason," said the captain; "another thing, the boy is under age."

Gray now backed his request by a repitition of the boy's story, not forgetting in his honest pride the share his mother bore in it. A glance of approval was exchanged between the masters, and the request was granted. The men as yet did not retire, and one old tar took the place of Gray.

"Well, Ashton, as you now seem to be the man, what do you want?"

"I would ask a half month's pay for each of the Mohawks, if you please, Captain, to send home to the youngster's sister."

"Why, Ashton, do you know what you're about? Tell us frankly what notion you've got in your head?"

"Well, you see, sir, we've talked the matter over, and thought as how what we could raise put with the lad's wages, would set the gal clear of the land sharks; and put her in the millenary way, or such like as Gray's mother thought best. You see what friends they has are 'hard a weather,' and any of us would feel bad at heart of a night watch, if we'd only one sister to think of, and her's a case like this."

"Cheerfully, my good fellow, will I grant your request; and you are a noble set of fellows to feel so, and count me as one of you"—

"The whole ship's company, if you please, Captain," said the mate.

"The Nereuses ask the same favor," said another; "the same amount for the same purpose."

"With the same unanimity," rejoined their Captain, "and they shall have it. We will see to drawing up the proper letters, and you, my boys, will feel happy in thinking you have saved an orphan girl a life of degradation. Away with you, now."

They barely cleared the quarter-deck, when all hands, with hats off, made the bay ring again with three hearty cheers, while the shores responded in distinct echoes, as if nature rejoiced with, and in her own noblemen.

"Stopper that!" shouted the mate; "get your suppers, and we will see who is the best dancer." And the eve of their liberty day was a happy one.

The morrow's dawn saw the Neureus canvass-capped, a cloud in the horizon.

Chapter II.

It would be as utterly impossible to paint the joy of Gray's mother, upon meeting her son, on his return, as it would the gratitude of the orphan girl at finding herself again an inmate of Mrs. Gray's cottage, and an apprentice to the milliner, as well clad as any of the girls in her station, and by far happier, for she had known adversity. The runaway son became strongly attached to home for more than one reason. All the reckless habits of the sailor were forgotten, and 'ere the return of the Mohawk, he trod the quarter-deck an officer; while the workhouse girl that was, but awaited a brother's return to become the wife of his former shipmate and friend.

It was summer, and the quiet of the little village where the parties resided was such that one might have ventured on a snooze in the road, if so inclined, 'thout placing himself in great jeopardy. Gray at home, daily employed about the little gar- 'in front of his mother's cott[illegible]. At one of its windows was to be seen a blooming girl plying the needle, while at the other sat a comely old matron, conning over an old-fashioned massive Bible. On the threshold lay the house-dog—not the attenuated and quaint Rover of former days, but as sleek and well-conditioned a dog as you would wish to see.

The cottage of Mrs. Gray was not singular in its repose, for the same air of quiet reigned throughout the place. That quiet was suddenly broken in upon, however; clouds of dust filled the open windows, and some little went down the mouths, and entered the eyes of the gaping curious, who thrust their heads out of these apertures. The village curs barked, and the dirty little urchins halloed; while the older part of the population were lost in astonishment, their curiosity excited to such a degree, that while the 'Squire was out doors without his wig, his daughter forgot her hair was in papers.—Miss Griggs never thought that her arms were bare and her hands covered with dough: and the very belle of the town ran into the road with her red arm encased in a stocking she was mending. What blushing, simpering, graceful manœuvering was displayed, by the different parties, upon a return to consciousness, as they retreated to their various domicils!

The city resident will smile when informed that the cause of this commotion was the passing of an omnibus. But then it was the first that ever appeared in their streets, and was no ordinary one, either, but very large, and very gaudy, and drawn by six white horses—and the lead horses were decorated with two miniature flags, while from a flag-staff erect on top of the carriage floated the union jack. As it passed, music and song had been heard. It now drew near the cottage of Mother Gray, before it became visible to the family. The burthen of a well-known song caused "Bill" to drop his spade, his mother her book, and the girl her needle; while old Rover looked as though he did not know what sleep was. Now was heard the shout, as dust-enveloped they drew nearer. The "Union jack" explained the matter to Bill, and shouting "Hurrah, it's the Mohawks!" he ran for the gate, accompanied by Rover, who appeared as rejoiced as Bill. By the time he reached the gate the carriage had drawn up, and its happy inmates came tumbling out all manner of ways, save by the door. Bill had his hands and heart full, as he met his old friends, while Rover jumped upon one and another, as if he knew and understood their kindness. Before the shaking of hands was over, and their friendly greetings through, the work-house boy had clasped his sister, and mother by adoption, in his arms.

"All's right, heave ahead, my hearties," shouted old Ashton, as with Bill he led the way to the house. Oh, but there was a joyous evening there. Old Mother Gray received them like so many sons, and the frank, honest ways of the worthy men ingratiated them in her favor; while the blushing girl, surrounded by her benefactors, did not know which way to turn: though it did not matter much, for turn which way she would, there was some one ready with a smile; and the musical cook, with his old fiddle under his arm, made a particular display of ivory.

The best room at the tavern was monopolized that evening by the Mohawks, and the landlord did, as he said, an "average business." The bar-room was full of the curious, but not a syllable of information got they yet from Boniface. He merely told them that his guests paid for their room and refreshments, and that they meddled with none of other people's business. At last the front room was opened, and the Mohawks were about to retire, when the town's people heard something for their pains. Old Ashton exclaimed "all's right" as he was shown to his chamber.

The next morning Gray started for the city in the tavern-keeper's carryall; and through the early part of the day the Mohawks were very busy in and round Mrs. Gray's cottage. The old elm tree was mounted, and a flag-staff lashed aloft, so as to o'ertop the highest limb. Before noon they had finished their tasks, and Mother Gray's front door and parlor were festooned and decorated with evergreens, flowers and pine boughs, in a very tasteful manner. The cottage was left to its inmates, and old Rover even deserted his post to follow the Mohawks, who now felt perfectly at home at the village inn. Before night, Gray returned, and when the vehicle entered the yard, the Mohawks were drawn up under old Ashton to receive their Captain and officers. If the landlord felt important before, he felt more so now. With their natural politeness, the men resigned the parlor to their officers. The villagers were more anxious than ever as the Minister and 'Squire came down the street and entered the tavern together, and they stood round the inn wondering what it would end in. Since Gray's return a clothes-pole had been put in requisition for a flag-staff, and lashed to the chimney, and now the brig's "bergee" was hoisted on it, flying where "bergee" never flew before, over the roof of a country tavern It lent the house quite an imposing appearance, being a blue flag, with the word Mohawk in large white letters. The sailors now returned to the cottage, and ranged themselves upon both sides, without the door, as precise as men-of-wars-men at muster.

And now the Minister and 'Squire, the landlord of the inn and the Captain, together with his two officers, approached the cottage, in the porch of which stood Gray and his mother.

"Aloft there," growled old Ashton.

"Hallos!" was the response from the forks of the tree.

"Hoist away as they bear down."

"Aye! aye!"

As the party left the road taking the path for the cottage, the union-jack was run aloft and the heads of the men were uncovered. They entered the cottage in the same order they came down the street, the sailors following. Old Ashton had the honor of giving the bride away, and performed his part to a charm; the grey hairs of the old man lending quite a dignified air to his appearance. The ceremony was over, and the orphan girl was the wife of their shipmate.

The awkward silence which followed the last response was broken by old Ashton's exclamation—

"I say, all's right, hey?"

"Certainly, sir," said the divine, with a bow.

"Away, then—tumble out you lubberly sea dogs, and tell the world the job's done." And the hip-hip-huzza of the Mohawks made echo ring again.

The tavern windows were illuminated that night, and the merry dancers shook the very house—our old friend the cook leading the orchestra: not that the Mohawks were alone in this, for a general invitation to the villagers had been given, and by the many accepted; and a very pleasant affair it proved to all.

The "omnibus" with the Mohawks left town the next morning, after taking a "round turn" through the place. They have never visited there in a body since, for their profession has separated them, although Grays's old ship-mates still visit his wife and mother; and the tavern that used to be, now has become the Mohawk House.

"THE ROCK" HOUSE.

Away within a mountain glen
"The Rock" House stands, now sadly worn
With many an Autumn's wind and rain,
And many a Winter's rugged storm.

And down that glen, as full of life,
As when it ran, long years ago,
A pure clear stream, lifts up its voice,
With music in its every flow.

Whose gentle murmurs, sweet and wild,
Float upward 'mong the whispering trees,
From flowery beds, whose breathings fill
With fragrance, all the summer breeze.

And here the birds together come,
To toss the spray from wing to wing;
While round about the waters play,
Like fairy creatures of the Spring.

And morning's sun and forest shade
Enjoy their frolic till the noon,
When o'er the whole a stillness wakes,
Like the still presence of the moon.

Wide spread and ample as a veil,
In this sweet spot young Ida grew,
A fair bright being of the light,
That nought of tears or sorrow knew.

And yet within that little heart,
A thought of care would come the while,
Like zephyrs to the morning flowers,
That only know to blush and smile.

And oft, when like a fairy thing,
She wandered forth among the flowers,
Or sat beside the blushing rose,
Still wet with evening's dewy showers,

A gentle stir of mingling wings
And voices in the atmosphere,
Soft as the breathings of a lute,
In mellow slumbers floating near,

Would o'er her senses steal the while,
Till lost in dreamy slumbers there,
Her spirit seemed in converse sweet,
With kindred beings of the air;

And once she dreampt, 'twas when the glow
That marks the fatal spoiler's sway
Had touched the roses on her cheeks,
Where smiling health was wont to stay;

And when the evening's steps were nigh,
And shadows gathered round the flowers,
She told her dream, while o'er her fell
The twilight of those peaceful hours.

'Methought, dear mother, in my dream,
While on my cheek there slept a tear,
Not born of sorrow or of pain,
But love, that placed the truant there;

'While to my cheek thy cheek was press'd,
And heavenly love was all our theme;
In that bright world where sorrows cease,
And life is one unsullied dream;

An Angel came on shining wings,
And o'er me threw a robe of light,
And whispering, bade my spirit leave
This world of sorrow, death, and night—

And while I lingered, others came,
And, wooing, caught my soul away,
When, swifter than the lightning's flight,
We passed the bounds of mortal day.

And far in the bright distance gleamed
A city, like to burnished gold,
Those walls with living sapphires glowed,
That grow not dim, nor ever old.

"Nor sun, nor moon, nor stars were there,
But light from the eternal throne,
With mellow glory filled the skies,
And o'er the heavenly landscape shone.

"And forth from those wide pearly gates,
A host of lovely beings came,
So beautiful, my raptured sight
Grew dim before the sumptuous train.

"And one there was in that bright band,
Who kissed my cheeks, and brow, and eyes,
And welcomed with a smile so sweet,
My spirit to the upper skies.

"He was my father, changed, I knew,
And glowing with immortal youth,
In glittering robes of spotless white,
And on his head the crown of truth.

"And you remember aged Ann,
So long a patient sufferer here,
That child of sorrow and of pain,
She too in royal youth was there.

"And then my heart grew sad for thee,
'Till a sweet cherub, hovering near,
Bade me behold a seraph-band,
Upon the wing, to guide thee here."

And so it was: e'er Winter came,
Or Autumn winds to crush the flowers,'
Young Ida passed from earth away,
As pass the gentle summer showers.

And soon the mother sought her bed,
As seeks the dying bird her nest,
To quit no more, till death unbound
Her spirit for eternal rest.

J. M. L.

Sedsburyville, January 10, 1845.

NEW YEAR'S DAY.

BY MISS CATHERINE M. SEDGWICK.

In the year 1836, when speculation—that black art evasion of the laws of God has instituted between labor and property, laws for the protection of human virtue—was at its fever height in the city of New York, Mr. Lyell, a gentleman whose years and position seemed to have moored him in one of those bays past which the stream might rush without dragging him with the torrent, returned to his home much excited. He was too much occupied with his own thoughts to observe that two young persons, whom his entrance disconcerted, were at that moment threading together one of those tangled paths that but for his ill-timed appearance might have led them into the bright world of their hopes. Ellen Lyell threw back the curls that had fallen over her burning cheek, and resumed her worsted-work, heeding neither colors nor thread, and Haskett Mercer snatched the evening paper and seemed devouring its contents.

"I am glad to find you here, Mercer," said Mr. Lyell; "it is not often I leave poor Ellen alone. Any thing new in the paper? Have you looked at the stocks? Still rising, are they not?"

Mercer turned mechanically to the stock-table and read it aloud.

"Yes, up—up—up," resumed Mr. Mercer. "What is the world coming to? every body is getting rich. William and Gordon have made a matter of forty thousand dollars since last week, Ellen."

"Forty thousand since last week!" repeated Ellen, without turning her eyes from her work.

"Yes, forty thousand. Is that such every day news that you answer me like a faint echo. Forty thousand dollars are worth your lifting your bright eyes from your work, Miss Ellen. If your brothers' luck holds, they will soon be the richest men of their name."

"Will they be the happiest?"

"To be sure—that is, they will be so much the happier as they are the richer. Mercer, why don't you go out into this shower of gold? What is the use of always having your plate bottom side upward?"

"I am afraid, sir, that we are deluded by a false light and that which now seems gold will prove to be mist, and melt away."

"Nonsense, Mercer, nonsense! Don't I tell you my boys have realized forty thousand dollars?"

"They have capital, Mr. Mercer. I have none—at least none but my regular business education and my industry. These afford no basis for speculation. Indeed that has no basis. The indolent, ignorant, and unscrupulous are the most daring in these times, and, for the most part, the most successful."

"It was so in the beginning, I admit," said Mr. Lyell, "but now everybody sees the times are peculiar, and all are putting into the lottery. Town and country are alive! Prudent old merchants that have gone on in a jog-trot way the last thirty years, are studying charts of new lots and maps of Western lands; lawyers are getting up monied institutions; literary men are in Wall street, and widows are speculating in the stocks. Common rules won't do now, Mercer. Every thing goes by a succession of accidents. I am sure nobody can explain why property, real property, should be worth fifty per cent more than it was two or three years ago?"

"Perhaps, sir, if you were to say why it should sell for fifty per cent more, next year may solve the riddle. The present prices cannot be sustained.—Land is at this moment selling upon a hypothesis of our having in a few years some millions of population on this island."

"Well, if it be a delusion, why not take advantage of it, Mercer? My sons offered me a share in a purchase they are to make to-morrow. I promised them to consider of it. I have done so during my cool walk home this evening, and come to the conclusion to follow the good old rule and let well enough alone. At my age, the care of new riches would be burdensome. I have been just as I am all my life, which, in this up and down city, few can say. I am not far from the end and I had rather finish as I began. I have enough for Ellen and me and my sons are getting rich on their own account. But you, Mercer—you are a young man; without a money capital, you will have a long struggle of it.—You will grow gray before you will dare ask a woman to marry you, if, instead of taking advantage of this strange state of thing, you plod on?"

"But what am I to do, Mr. Lyell?" replied Mercer, whose pulses were quickened by some of Mr. Lyell's suggestions. "I have no money for the venture, and if I could obtain credit I would not without property to sustain it. There is quite too much of this dishonorable mode of business carried on among us."

Ellen for the first time put in her word to say: "It seems to me this universal passion for riches is vulgar. Surely there is something better and nobler in this world to struggle for."

"Whew, Miss Ellen! 'Love in a cottage,' is it? 'That is bon pour la campagne,' as the French say; 'very well out in the bush,' as your old Dutch grand-dame would have had it, but in town (and Mr. Lyell winked at Mercer) love can't live in a cottage. It must have at least a neat two story house, with money enough to go to market in the morning and pay the servants on Saturday night.

"Now, Mercer, I am a prudent man, and have no fears. I will endorse your note. You shall go into this speculation with the boys, and, as matters are going, you may sell out at the end of a month with a very decent little fortune. Your share of the purchase will be about twenty thousand dollars.

"Enter not into temptation, Mr. Mercer," said Ellen, with an arch smile. But Mercer had already entered in. His castle was already built in the shape of the neat two story house, and the conviction that Mr. Lyell had discerned his hopes and had presented the only mode of attaining them took possession of him. After a short silence and a stolen glance at Ellen, which conjured up intoxicating images in his brain, he snatched his hat, saying, "I will see your sons this evening, Mr. Lyell, and if they are disposed to let me into this partnership I will accept your very kind offer."

"Not so very kind; no, if there were the slightest risk I would not make it—for twenty thousand dollars is nearly two thirds of all I am worth in the world."

"And if there be risk, I would sooner cut off my right hand than take it, be assured of that, Mr. Lyell."

And never was there a more conscientious assurance, but unfortunately Mercer was beginning to feel the general intoxication. He found the young Lyells eager to admit him an equal partner in their speculation. They particularly liked him. They suspected their sister was not indifferent to him.—They knew he was not to her. They were elated with their recent success, and fancied Mercer had only to embark with them to launch on the flood that led to certain fortune. But, alas! the ebb tide had even then, unperceived, begun.

The purchase was made, all the late gains of the brothers invested and the father's name pledged for Haskett Mercer.

Shortly after Mercer was employed by a company in New York, to go to Illinois to examine some recent purchases of "fancy lots" made there. Before leaving the city he went to Mr. Lyell's to take leave of Ellen. It was four o'clock—the steamer left the wharf at five. He had but fifteen minutes to spare. He had no purpose what to say, but he was in that excited state of mind when fifteen minutes gives the color to one's life. Nature is in some minds more rapid than the magnetic telegraph.

"Miss Ellen is not at home," said the servant who answered to Mercer's ring. "She and the old gentleman have gone down to Mr. Gordon's."

Poor Mercer turned away thinking how interminable the four weeks of his absence would seem, but vainly casting the fashion of the uncertain future, he little thought that was the last time his foot would be upon Mr. Lyell's door step.

As he hastened up the street he met an old mercantile friend of Mr. Lyell's, one of those men infallibly weather-wise in the trading world.

"I hope," he said, "the Lyells have not made the purchase they were talking of?"

"They have."

"I am sorry for it. It will be a bad concern. I am glad, at any rate, that my old friend's neck is out of the scrape. It may prove a good lesson to the young men."

Mercer had no time to hear further. He went on his way, and carried with him a load of remorse and anxiety.

His journey was long and painful. Wherever he went the demon of speculation had been before him and ruin was following in his train. His business was perplexing and detained him through the sickly season. He took the fever of the country, bad enough under any circumstances, but alarmingly aggravated by his complicated anxieties. Happily his ravings of Ellen Lyell, of an angry father, and of bankruptcy, fell on the ears of strangers. His discreet physician withheld the letters that came for him, till, though staggering with debility, he was on the eve of beginning his homeward journey. There were several from the brothers Lyell, one from their father, and one from Ellen. This last was first read and ran as follows. "My dear friend, my father told me yesterday that he had written you. I fear his letter is filled with reproaches. You will not be surprised that disappointment and loss should irritate his too susceptible temper. Your agency in this unhappy affair will, I know, grieve you, but you should be consoled by remembering that you embarked in it at my father's urgent request, and with expressed reluctance.

"For myself, I have nothing to regret, our condition is yet far above want. The wise people tell us that fortune and ease are not the best ministers to the human character, and I already find that enforced occupation, if it does not end the evils it opposes, at least furnishes a panoply divine against ennui and repining.

"My brothers have waked from their dreams of illimitable fortunes and have entered upon a career of patient industry. This early check is like to prove a great blessing to them. Already they have time and tranquility for domestic enjoyment. We have heard of your illness. Do not let your friends continue in ignorance of your precise condition."

This letter was four weeks old. If the tears were unmanly that fell upon it, they must be divided between the weakness of Mercer's body and the weakness of his heart. Its generous tone fortified him for the shock that was to follow.

The father's letter began: "Your scoundrelly conduct, Mercer, in sneaking out of town, and hiding yourself in the Western woods, while I was left to bear the brunt of this ruinous business, is not to be forgotten. Never presume to come into my presence again, nor, on any pretence, to speak to my daughter. Past friendships are forgotten—past injuries, which have involved me in remediless ruin, can never be."

The brothers' letters were filled with details of mercantile disasters. They informed Mercer that in default of his payment of his portion of the purchase money, their father, at a great sacrifice of his property, had met his engagements, and that, after satisfying the debt, nothing remained to him but his house and a few thousand dollars. They absolved Mercer from blame, and wrote with the courageous hope of youth.

But Mercer could not absolve himself. He had weakly yielded to the first temptation to join the rash and wicked throng who 'make haste to be rich.' He had departed from the principles which he had adopted as the rule of his life—the principle that fortune is the legitimate result of labor, and the representative of the economical virtues, and that it stands low in the scale of human felicities.

Expiation of his faults was all that now remained to him, and he determined to waste no time in weak inaction and vain repining. "I have lost," he said, as his thoughts reverted to Ellen, with an anguish that cut through his heart, "the greatest blessing ever within the grasp of man. I will not, too, lose true honor."

It was a brilliant New Year's morning in the year 184-. Many may still remember it. Ellen Lyell was still Ellen Lyell—but how changed since that memorable evening five years before, when love and its bright train filled the imagination of the young woman of nineteen! Sudden and sharp disappointment had followed, and to that a softened, thoughtful regret, which gave rather a pensive aspect to a life filled with rigorous duty. She occupied, with her father, a very small house in Madison street, where, by the rent of their nice house in Chamber street, the income of the wreck of her father's property, and her own earnings, she contrived to continue to him the ease and comfort of his more prosperous days. She had risen early to arrange her household for the day, and make her preparations for this pleasant gift season. She and her little German house-maid, her maid of all work, had, before the day dawned, put the last polishing touch of studious neatness, that adornment of a modest condition, to her two small, communicating parlors.

"Now, Miss Ellen," said Gretchen, "every thing is ready and right."

"Not quite, Gretchen; this window-curtain has been pulled out of its place. There, now the folds are even; do you hold it while I tie it."

This was done, and both mistress and maid turning their eyes towards the sky at the same moment, saw the moon still shining through the immeasurable depths of a clear winter sky.

"There!" exclaimed Gretchen, "is the waning moon seen over the right shoulder of us both on a New Year's morning: the best token of all the year, if sent, not sought—for no eye but yours, Miss Ellen, would have seen the curtain was not straight, and but for your seeing that, we should not have seen the moon."

"Well, dear Gretchen, what particular happiness of the happy New Year does this lucky sight betoken?"

"Ah, that the day must show, Miss Ellen. If you have a betrothed, he will bring you the gifts you desire, or if you have not one, the day will show him to you. Something will chance concerning what maidens think most of. I see you don't believe a word of it, Miss Ellen, but it is so in my country. Among my people, there are signs and omens for every day in the year, and unseen spirits for every dark hour; but here, you only see and hear with the eye and ear of flesh; not even the blessed Christchild, that comes to prince and peasant in my country, comes to this dreary land."

"Dreary and disenchanted it seems to you, Gretchen, but our matter of fact lives save us from idle expectations. Now, for instance, if you and I, believing in this sign of yours, were looking for our betrothed or his gifts to-day, it would be all moonshine."

"Oh, as to me, Miss Ellen, I am away from my people, and have left my luck behind me; but you—what does Mr. Lawrence come every day for?—and why is it that one bunch of flowers has never time to fade before another comes in the place of it?"

"Nonsense, Gretchen, we are wasting time; bring me down the covered basket from my bureau."

"Miss Ellen," thought Gretchen, as she proceeded to obey her, "thinks I don't know; but I can tell her there are some things that speak the same in all languages. I can tell what that look in the eye, and that melt in the voice, means, as well as another. Well, Mr Lawrence is a nice man; good, every body says, young and rich, and that is what few ladies despise; and Miss Ellen knows the worth of it by the want of it. It's only by working and sparing from year's end to year's end, that she gets wine for her father's table, and cigars for him to smoke. It's strange how some people do all the work in this world and others all the play. The old man is often fretting and Miss Ellen never is. The workers are the happiest, may be, after all!"

We did not get at Gretchen's thoughts by any necromancy. She was one of those liberal people who inflict the reveries of their solitary moments upon the first doomed ears they encounter, beginning their social chats with, "I was thinking."

The basket was brought, and Ellen arranged the gifts she had prepared for her brother's children on her beautiful lauristina, whose top, as it stood in the corner of the room, brushed the ceiling. Net purses, gay colored bags, embroidered suspenders, for a favorite little nephew, and dainty little bright slippers, peeped from among the rich clusters of white flowers.

Skill and love were inwrought in all these pretty gift. Every stitch in them had been set by Aunt Ellen's kind hand: every flower upon them was an emblem of her unwearied love. Money could not buy gifts so rich."

"There is something for you, my good Gretchen," said Ellen. Gretchen's eyes sparkled as she took from her mistress' hand a small, pretty plaid silk shawl. A shower of thanks was pouring from her lips, when Ellen said, "do you not see there is something within the shawl?" Gretchen unpinned and opened it. It was a picture, a colored view of a small town on the Rhine, done with great exactness of coloring and drawing, by a young artist friend of Ellen Lyell, at her request. Gretchen's words were checked for a moment, but tears, far more eloquent than words, gushed from her eyes as she turned from the picture to Ellen.

"Oh, dear Miss Ellen," she said, "who but you would have ever thought of this?—and now don't you believe the blessed moon, this morning, was a true token? Ah, Branback! my dear old home! Ah, Miss Ellen, look here, look here just under that part of the castle. There is where we lived; there all the Wepels lived back and back in the ages, when the old castle that stands there now, on the very top of the rocks on that high hill—Oh, many's the time Brant and Hildergund and I have climbed to it.—What was I saying? Yes, when the castle, that's as old as St. Mark, had its jolly knights, the Wepels lived in the cottage below it; and when it was a prison of state, it was one of my forefathers that kept the keys of the discarded room of torture, and when it was turned into a hospital, it was my grandmother's mother that tended the sick. There is the old chateau, too, and there the chapel, and there the old stone bench, and those parings; and there the very pile of dirt always before old Weisen's door; and there, where you can almost touch the boats as they pass up and down, the terrace garden to the old chateau; and there you turn and go up to the vineyard planted among the rocks, and so steep that they go on ladders to the vines. Oh, my beautiful land!—my home!—dear old Branback!"

Poor Gretchen had forgotten herself—the picture of her home had worked a spell upon her imagination, and her last exclamations were in German.

"What is all this lingo about?" exclaimed Mr. Lyell, entering the room, and effectually breaking the spell. "The little, dirty village of Branback," he added, turning his eye on the picture. "I remember it well, and the greasy dinner I got there. I see no sign of breakfast, Ellen. Do you think I can eat your New Year's gifts?"

"Not eat them, but wear them, sir," replied Ellen, placing at his feet a pair of new slippers. "We have set the breakfast-table in the next room; it is quite ready. Bring up the coffee and cakes, Gretchen."

"It will be cold there; it's always cold there in the morning. What did you put it there for?"

"The children begged to have their presents hung on a tree, and I could not move my lauristina."

"And they must have it their own way. It used to be 'first come first served,' but now the very last come is first and best served; the brat of a baby before its grandfather."

Ellen made no reply, but opened the door into the next room, where the fire having been kindled long before day-light, the air was genially warm, the coals glowed in the full grate, the coffee sent up its aromatic perfume—incense fit for the gods—and the lightest buckwheats were smoking on the table. There was sausage, too, (Mr. Lyell's sine qua non,) and fresh honey, and Scotch marmalade, his favorite dainties, got by Ellen with some trouble, by way of a New Year's treat to her father.—His frosty humor melted; the slippers, he said, "were a nice fit, the room was warm, and, on the whole, he did not care if the children for once had their own way, and it was thoughtful of you, Ellen, to get this delicious honey for me."

Ellen was not hardened to the caprices of her father's temper. She was fortified by the resolution not to resist, but endure. She had long ago made up her mind that it was an infirmity not to be cured, but that patience was armor of proof against it.—Patient continuance in well-doing is a sovereign remedy against most of the evils of life, and a certain salvation from its worst remorse.

"Where is the morning paper, Gretchen?" asked Mr. Lyell. Can't you remember to put it on the table. You know I always want it."

There is no morning paper on New Year's, Mr. Lyell."

"Ah! true! Give me last evening's paper then."

"The old gentleman must have his morning and his evening paper," said Gretchen, to a visitor in the kitchen, "though Miss Ellen would not even buy herself one new gown this New Year's; well, she looked pretty enough in her old ones. It seems as if her beautiful soul came out more and more every day into her face."

Mr. Lyell's eyes ran over the paper carelessly. Suddenly his attention was arrested, as Ellen observed, by something keenly interesting. He knit his brows, bit his lips, threw down the paper, lighted his cigar, smoked a few whiffs, then threw it away, walked up and down the room biting his nails according to his habit, when excessively vexed, and was leaving the room when at the door he met Gretchen, all smiles, bringing in a very beautiful lady's writing-desk of ivory, inlaid in ebony.

"Where did that come from?" he asked.

"It is for Miss Ellen, sir, and the servant that brings all Mr. Lawrence's flowers and things, brought it."

"John, from the Aster House: was there no message?"

"None, sir."

"It is from Lawrence, of course, Ellen. Splendid, is it not? No you hear, Ellen? Do you see?"

"Yes, sir," replied Ellen, looking cold and impassive.

"I would not advise him to waste his gifts here. Strange—strange!" he muttered, "that the only man you ever cared for should have been that rascal!"

"I do not deserve that, nor does Mercer," she thought. "I wish Lawrence would send no more of his gifts here; they ruffle my father, and are embarrassing to me; my father was just getting into the spirit of the day. But it was something in the paper that turned the current. Stocks have fallen, I suppose; but what is that to us?" She was familiar with the stock-table for she read it every evening to her father. She looked it over. Stocks were rising, and she came to the natural conclusion that her father was vexed that he no longer had any interest in the prosperous turn the affairs of the city had taken.

That an old age which should have been serene and grateful should be chafed by sordid cares—that all her pains to soften it with the luxuries that habit had made necessary should be unfelt, filled Ellen's bosom for a moment with sadness and a sense of injustice. It was but for a moment; she wiped away the gathering tears and turned to receive with smiles and caresses the children who were bursting into the room with their clamorous "Happy New Year to Aunt Ellen." The stream must deposit a portion of the golden sands its channel is bearing onward. Ellen Lyell could not be unhappy while she was the source of happiness or cheerfulness.—There are those who would have reckoned it a hard fate to minister to a thankless, fretful, exacting old man; to have been cut off in the prime of youth from the dearest expectations; to receive, as Ellen did at first, employment as favor and patronage; to see her gay young friends and fashionable acquaintances falling away from her; to be obliged to contract the circle of her wants, and to cut off the accustomed gratifications of her past position and the pleasures natural to her time of life. In all this there were elements enough of discontent to a common character.

But my friend Ellen's was not a common character. She began with the great truth that it matters not so much how we are, as what we are—that it is not our circumstances, but what we make of them, that is our great concern; not the agreeable sensations of to-day that are of most import to us, but the retrospect of to-morrow. If her father was more than usually unreasonable, she redoubled her patience. She smiled at the supercilliousness of late friends (friends after common parlance) become patrons, and she received gratefully employment from those whose respect was enhanced by the manifestation of virtues which the change of her condition brought into action. If her gay young friends fell away from her she felt no asperity towards them; they had their pleasures, she her duties; there were few points of real sympathy between them, and in her secret heart she might well have thought she was rather the gainer than loser by the change in their relations.

One evil there was in her condition which was a serious unhappiness to her. The Mr. Lawrence to whom we have adverted, was her persevering lover. His sister was her favorite friend. He had an immense fortune. He was a young man of good principles and good feelings. The world said "a splendid match for Ellen Lyell." "You know the most fervent wish of my heart," Margaret Lawrence had once said to her, and she said no more.

"You must do as you choose; all young people do so now-a-days," said her father; "but I would lay any wager you are the only woman in the United States who would not snap at Arthur Lawrence."

"Do as you think best, my dear sister," said her brother Gordon, "but I must say there are few worthier men than Arthur Lawrence."

"You would marry Arthur Lawrence, Ellen," said her brother William, "if you could forget——and those should forget who are forgotten!"

"You misunderstand me, William," she replied, provoked to express the feelings her delicacy had restrained; "I would not marry Arthur Lawrence were he the only man in the world. I do not love him, that should be reason enough. I cannot love a man whose character in no sense accords with mine. Arthur Lawrence is, you know it, William, a common man—nothing more nor less; of virtuous habits, no doubt; amiable and well-disposed; but would you, would my father, would Gordon, would any of my friends esteem him a suitable match for me were he stripped of his fortune? I may seem to you proud or vain, or both; but I should require in my husband some correspondence of endowment, of cultivation, of capability, of taste to my own, and I hold that only to be a pure marriage where this exists. I have not forgotten," she added, blushing to her temples, "that such a marriage was once within the circle of my hope; nor do I forget that it no longer is. I cherish no vain wishes nor vain regrets. I see no danger of uselessness or dreariness in single life; no danger of wanting objects for my affections while yours and Gordon's families are multiplying every year."

"Forgive me, dear sister," said her brother, "we have erred in measuring you by common women."

"That is not quite all your mistake, William; women are not allowed to use their powers of independence. The vulgar world has made marriage a necessity to them, and they dare not follow the true impulses of their hearts—the honest demands of their nature; and thus it comes that marriage, God's own most blessed institution, is so often perverted to what it is."

But we have left too long the conclusion of our short story. The day went on; Ellen's visitors were not numerous, but they were old and well-tried friends, with a sprinkling of young ones, who were attracted out of the fashionable beat by Ellen Lyell's charms and graces, which, if they had lost the effect of novelty at twenty-four, in our world of Spring blossoms, had gained by their maturity, expression and force.

Arthur Lawrence came with the first and lingered to the last.

"I have not seen your father to-day," he said to Ellen.

"You can see him," said little Nelly Lyell, "for I saw him take a big parcel of papers off the entry table, and go up stairs with it, and I went up to show him Aunt Ellen's new desk; I could not make him look up from his papers; but he did not look cross, and he did not scold me, though I spoke twice to him."

"Have you seen Aunt Ellen's new desk, Mr. Lawrence?"

"No, Nelly, I did not know your aunt had a new one."

Ellen looked at him with surprise; but as Lawrence was one of those people who never ambush their actions, she was convinced he was innocent of the gift.

"Don't you know, Aunt Ellen, who sent you the desk?" pursued the little girl.

"No, Nelly, I cannot even guess."

"Oh, she does know! she does know!" insisted the child, mischievously; "she knows it's you—because you know you send her every thing: lots of flowers, and lots of books. I should love you if you gave me so many things; don't you love him, Aunt Ellen?"

To Ellen's infinite relief the door opened and her father appeared at it, not lowering as he had left her in the morning, but bright and smiling as a clear October sky at mid-day.

"Ellen, my dear," he said, "I am going out to ask a friend to come home and dine with me; don't ask any other company. You have a good dinner, I hope. Oh, Mr. Lawrence, I did not observe you; good day, sir."

He stood for a moment, as if wavering, then beckoned Ellen to him and whispered—

"If you want to know what company you are to have, look over the arrivals in last evening's paper."

But last evening's paper was not to be found, and Ellen could get no solution of her father's sudden good humor and extraordinary abstraction; for most extraordinary it was that he should have remained for one minute unconscious of Mr. Lawrence's presence.

"There is no use," said Lawrence, that very evening to his sister, "in thinking any longer of Ellen Lyell, she is as cold as an icicle to me."

"You are right, my dear brother," replied his sister; "Ellen knows her own mind, and is not a woman to be won by perseverance."

"No, that is proved—well, it will be all the same a hundred years hence!"

This veritable conclusion of Mr. Arthur Lawrence's love-tale proved that he was not matched, with Ellen Lyell in Heaven, where, as we honestly believe, all true matches are made.

All the Lyells—sons, wives, and children—remained, as was their custom on New Year's day, to dine with their father. The communicating doors between the rooms were thrown open. One table was arranged for the little people and their nurses, and the other for their elders.

"You see what your Aunt Ellen has done for you, my children," said Gordon Lyell. "Mind and keep quiet, or my father will stand a chance of having rather too much of what your Aunt Ellen calls the 'music of your voices;' but why does he not come? I never knew him delay a dinner before. Who upon earth can this newly arrived friend of his be? Some old crone of an India merchant, whom he knew forty years ago——oh, it's that old Harvey, who was a school-mate of his, and who has been Consul this hundred years at ——, what do you call the place? I heard yesterday he had come home."

"Whoever it may be," said Ellen, "we should be grateful to him, for his arrival seems to have made it really a happy New Year to my father."

"He must be a special dear friend to reconcile my father to making another place at our small table. You know his notion of Heaven, Ellen?—that there's plenty of elbow-room there!"

"Hush, Gordon—they are coming; ring the bell for dinner, Willie!"

"Now for a reverend white head," said Gordon; "make your best bows and curtsies, children, to grandpapa's friend, and don't speak above your breaths."

The door opened, and old Mr. Lyell, his face smiling all over, ushered in—not an 'old crone,' but a tall young man of six-and-twenty, with his head covered with bright, chestnut hair—his large dark eye brightened and moistened with mingled emotions. Gordon and William Lyell sprang forward and grasped his hand.

"Is it you, Mercer? My dear fellow, welcome—most welcome!"

Ellen's first impulse was to run out of the room, but her feet refused to move. She became frightfully pale, and little Nelly, whose eye, on all occasions, first turned to her aunt, exclaimed, "What is the matter, Aunt Ellen?"

The exclamation produced a re-action. She rallied, and the eloquent blood rushing to her cheek, expressed the welcome she could not utter. She gave Mercer her hand: neither spoke. The awkward chasm was filled by Mr. Lyell.

"Mercer deserves our welcome, boys," he said; "he is a good man and true. He has worked hard for five years, and lived on of humanity's reach in China. I know what it is to live there; and here is some of the fruit of his industry—here are the documents." Mr. Lyell threw on the table a parcel of papers. "He has paid his debt to me, with interest and compound interest—God bless him!"

"A little too much of this, my dear Mr. Lyell," said Mercer, deprecatingly.

"Not a syllable too much; my children and grandchildren shall know who, of all men living, they should most love and honor."

"This is much more," said Mercer, rather embarrassed by Mr. Lyell's excessive enthusiasm, "than an act of simple honesty deserves."

"Not a bit—not a bit. Simple honesty do you call it? Well—yes, paying one's debts is simple honesty; but I can tell you it is the rarest of virtues now-a-days. You have not heard of repudiation out in China, have you?—our new way of paying old debts? I hate these new-fangled words and doings. But come, come to dinner, my children."

A few days after, when Ellen imparted to her loving maiden, Gretchen, the secret of her engagement to Haskett Mercer, "Ah, ha! Miss Ellen," she said, "I knew when that mysterious desk came the true love would soon come after it. Remember the waning-moon of New Year's morning, and don't laugh at my country signs again."

THE WAY-SIDE INN;

OR,

The Trial of the Portraits.

A STORY ABOUT A YOUTH AND A MAIDEN.

BY J. H. INGRAHAME.

It was towards the close of an afternoon in August, not many years ago, that a young man with a pack on his back, and much travel-worn, drew nigh to a small inn by the way-side. He was covered with dust, and as the day was sultry, he seated himself for a few moments upon the drinking-trough, before the inn door, and drank freely out of an iron bowl, which was suspended by a chain to the nose of the pump.

The inn was just upon the outskirts of Philadelphia, upon the Old York Road, and situated just on the verge of suburb and country. It was a low, stone structure, with a Dutch gallery running round it, and had, altogether, an air of Dutch comfort, and, to a wearied traveller, like the young man, must have worn a very tempting and inviting look.

He did not look like one who carried much money to expend on hostelry entertainment, yet his appearance was by no means that of a mendicant. His dress, though unfashionably cut and something worn, was neat and becoming, though one of his shoes was broken at the side, and his coat lacked a button. The pack, which he laid by his side, was large, and firmly done up in oil-cloth, secured by two straps, which could also be passed over his shoulders, to sustain it in travelling, something after the fashion of the Jew-pedlars, that in such numbers now traverse the length and breadth of the land. Yet, he did not look like a pedlar, though a careless observer might mistake him for one. There was an air of good breeding and gentleness about him, which, combined with his handsome face and pleasing smile, rendered his appearance prepossessing, and awakened an interest in him, especially among females.

The hostess had been regarding him from her window for some moments, with such feelings. She saw him smile and speak pleasantly to a dog that approached him, and pull his ears and pat him as he drew his head upon his knee.

"Poor young man!" said the good dame—for a benevolent and good body was Jenny Steiner—"poor young man! he seems to love Bose as if he felt he had nobody else to love! It seems to make him happy to have the old dog take notice of him. He looks a nice young man, and I dare say is going away from home for the first time, to seek his fortunes in the city. How genteel he looks, dusty and poor as he is; and with what a pleasant voice and smile he fondles the dog! Poor young man! he is getting up to move on. Perhaps he has no money, or he would like to stop here. See how wistfully he looks up at the house! If I don't get paid for it 'till I get to Heaven, he shall have supper and lodging before he goes further this night!"

Dame Steiner having but little custom that sultry afternoon, had been seated in her window under the shadow of the stoop, in her best cap and cleanest apron, knitting and looking out together, now at the horses frisking in the yard, or at the quiet, cud-chewing cows, or at the occasional traveller, who paused to let his steed drink from the trough. She had, therefore, full leisure to observe and comment upon the appearance of the young foot-journeyer, as he took his seat, unconscious of observation, upon the end of the old canoe which served the inn as a drinking-trough.

Having formed her hospitable resolution, she called from the window, without rising, in a loud, landlady-like, but kind tone, as the young man was resuming his pack—

"Young gentleman, walk in, if you please, and take a chair in the house. You will find it cooler, and perhaps I can give you something better than spring water."

"Thank you kindly, madam," answered the traveller, looking at her with surprise and a gratified expression upon his finely intellectual face. "I will come in with pleasure, as you are so good as to invite me."

And, taking up his bundle, he ascended the cleanly swept stone steps to the piazza, and entered the door, which opened directly into the room where Jenny Steiner sat.

"Your room looks so neat," he said, glancing round upon the white scoured floor, the shining dresser, and the stainless furniture, "I think that I had better take a seat on the gallery."

"Not a bit of it, young man," she said, very positively. "I dare say you've seen nicer rooms than mine in your day. Take that seat, and lay your bundle down upon the table."

"Not upon the table, but the floor, good madam," answered the youth.

"Jeannette!" called the landlady, in a tone elevated so as to reach the ear of some far-off Jeannette. "I will order you a mug of ale—my own brewing. Jeannette!"

"Do not, madam," answered the young man, colouring and looking embarrassed. I have not—"

"Tut, tut," cried Dame Steiner, with a pleasant laugh upon her good-natured face, and speaking as if she would prevent the mortifying confession of his poverty. "I will do as I please in my own house. I mean to give you what I order, and what you order you may pay for if you like! Can't a landlady, pray, give away anything, like other Christian folk? If I thought I should have to take pay for what every body eats and drinks and sleeps in my house, I'd never keep open inn another day. I will take pay when I please—I will give away when I please. Jeannette!"

The door opened, and a young girl came into the room with a bound, her cheek blooming, her hair waving in the wind of her graceful motion.

"What, mother?" she cried, in an animated tone, and with a sort of hoydenish hilarity.

"Where have you been, Jeannette? I have been calling you this good while. One might as well keep the run of a wild pigeon as of you!"

"I have been up the garden, and so through the gate, into the field, and down by the brook, in full chase after Juba!"

"That old black crow is more plague than profit!"

"I love him dearly, and—"

Here the maiden's voice was suddenly arrested, and her face crimsoned, while her eyes dropped to the floor, and she half drew back instinctively, as she noticed, for the first time, the young man, and saw his handsome hazel eyes fixed upon her face with undisguised admiration, united with that reverence with which one would gaze upon a beautiful vision.

"I am glad something can tame you for a moment," said the Dame, laughing at the instant change, and her subdued, bashful air. "Go and bring this young gentleman a mug of Brew No. 3. Take the silver mug."

"Yes, mother," answered the daughter, retiring quickly, as if glad to escape from the gaze of the fine, penetrating eyes of the young stranger.

"She is a wild creature, is Jeannette," said Dame Steiner; "but one can't get vexed with her, she is so good-hearted and clever. If ever there was an angel, she is one, sir."

"I could easily believe it," answered the youth, with an animation of manner and energy of tone that told how deep had been the impression made upon him by the presence of the beautiful maid.

"She has a pet crow that she calls Juba, and if any thing can be more mischievous than Jeannette it is her crow. He——but here she comes!"

Jeannette entered, but with a slow step and a subdued air, and approaching the young man, she handed him the foaming silver tankard, though without more than stealing a glance at his face.

"Bless me, child, you seem to be afraid! The young gentleman, I'll be bound, wont bite you! If you are afraid of him, it is the first time!"

Jeannette blushed, and seating herself by the window, turned her back to the room and amused herself by looking out, while at the same time she hid her confusion; for she was really confused, first by the expressive eyes of the young stranger, which had seemed to penetrate her soul, and produce there emotions novel and delightful, and secondly by the words made use of by her mother, which she feared would betray to the young man the effect the glance of his eye had caused upon her. How wonderful the power of a mutual glance between those whose spirits, though hitherto strangers, are kindred and congenial. One interchange of expression unlocks both hearts, and the river of love forever flows in and out, bearing upon its bosom all the joys of life. The last five minutes had unveiled to these two, the youth and the maiden, a new world. New emotions were awakened! New thoughts—new feelings—new aspirations—filled their bosoms! Never before had the maiden stood abashed, and with drooping eyes before the face of a young man! Never before had the gaiety of her spirits been chastened and tamed for a moment. Wild and free as the chamois, she knew no other world than that of rocks and skies, trees and green sward, birds and water-brooks. She knew not that she had a heart which would become to her the true world. Now for the first time, she sat by the window in thought!

"Your ale, madam, is very nice, indeed. It is refreshing to one who has travelled as far as I have!"

"How far have you walked to-day?"

"Forty miles. I hope to reach the city to-night, and with this rest, and your good ale, I shall do so with ease! It is but four miles, I believe!"

"Four and a quarter. But forty miles to-day, and to go four more, and the sun just setting! No, no! You shall have a room here to-night, and supper and breakfast, and start fresh in the morning."

"You are very kind, but, my dear madam," he answered in a manner courteous and grateful, "I have but little means and——"

"Don't talk of pay, sir. I know young men that walk forty miles a day haven't much silver in their purses! What little you have, keep. You must lodge and eat somewhere to-night. So stay with me and save your money!"

"How good you are!" answered the young man, with real emotion. "I know not how I shall ever re-pay you! I will remain with great pleasure. You are indeed generous to place such confidence in a stranger."

"I know how to read people by their faces. I haven't kept tavern seventeen years without learning something of human nature! I know you are just what your face speaks you. I'd be willing to trust you to-morrow to carry a hundred dollars into the Bank, when you go in. Is your mother living?"

"Indeed I cannot tell you, madam. I wish I could!" he answered, a sad expression coming over his fine features.

Dame Steiner thought to herself that it was very strange he did not know whether his mother were living or not; but she had too much delicacy to press the subject. She sat a few moments knitting in silence. He placed the tankard upon the table and then glanced towards Jeannette, who still looked very steadily out of the window, as if fearing again to encounter the dark, admiring eyes of the young man. Her heart fluttered with unwonted throbbings.

"You have asked if I have a mother," at length said the young man. "I am, I believe, an orphan. Your kindness calls for confidence on my part. I will tell you all I know about myself."

Jeannette bent her ear to listen.

"Indeed I didn't mean to be curious, sir," said the dame, apologetically.

"You were not so. I am an artist by profession. In this pack is contained all my worldly wealth, save a silver dollar and some few pieces of copper which I have in my pocket. But I have health and a knowledge of my art, and I do not fear for the future!" he said, with beaming and ingenuous looks. "I have come in the last five days from a valley in the Western part of the State, where I have dwelt from boyhood with one who has been more than a mother to me. You remind me of her in your goodness to me. When I was about seven years of age, so she has often told me, I was discovered in a small skiff floating down the Susquehanna, about sunset. Her husband, who was a boatman and forrester,—that is, cut timber in the majestic forests upon the river, and rafted it down to a market,—discovered the skiff floating by, his attention being drawn to it by a dog standing upon the bows and violently barking, as if to attract his notice. Supposing it contained only the dog, he sprang into his boat and pulling out into the rapid stream, came to it, and discovered to his surprise a boy lying in the bottom, quietly sleeping."

"That was yourself, sir," observed the dame.

"Yes. He took me into his boat, and towing the skiff ashore, hastened with me to his humble home. His wife, kind and good like yourself, received me with joyful surprise; and, as she had no children of her own, she resolved to adopt me if no one came for me."

"Yet you must have been not long before with your dear mother," said the good dame with tenderness.

"Yes. The river for miles above flowed through a wilderness, and only here and there was a woodman's hut. When my father, as I called the man who found me, went up the river after timber in the fall, he made every inquiry, but in vain. He could hear of no one who had lost a child within seventy miles. So, he and his wife resolved to look upon me as their own. My dress being different from that of the children of the foresters, it was thought by them that I must belong to some family emigrating to the west, and that, in crossing the river, I had been separated from the party. As for myself, the account I gave was that I lived in a large house upon the river, and that I had left my father and mother to play by the water-side, when, getting into the boat with the dog, it got loose, and I was drifted down by the current. But as nothing could be heard of such a family for upwards of seventy miles, my account was supposed to be incorrect, and that I was really too young to give a true relation of the facts. As my new mother became very much attached to me, she did not anxiously prosecute the search, and by and by the affair was forgotten in the neighborhood, and I was looked upon as her son.—I grew up with this family as a son. In my twelfth year, her husband was drowned in the lower Susquehanna, and I became her only solace and dependance. So far as my age and strength permitted, I devoted myself to providing for her comfort.

"About this time I began to evince a taste for drawing, and though my sketches were rudely done with colored chalks found in the banks of the river, they inspired me to new efforts. At the age of fifteen, a gentleman who was travelling passed a night at our house, and, seeing my drawings, said he would send me from Philadelphia a box of colors and brushes. He fulfilled his promise. The next year I resolved to visit the city, and see something of the works of art of which I had heard and read in the newspapers, for one of these prints occasionally reached our remote home. I travelled, as now, on foot, sketching likenesses on the way of farmers and their families, at twenty-five cents a head. In this way I paid my expenses to the city and back again. I remained in the city some months, working with the celebrated Mr. Sully, who kindly employed me. At length I returned home, and there devoted myself to my beloved art for three years. Thence I travelled the country, sketching landscapes and taking portraits of remarkable faces that I fell in with. All this was done for art, not for gain. Sometimes I painted signs for inns, to get such little money as I needed. Again I returned to my humble abode, rich in art but not in purse. I would now gladly have sought the metropolis, to study there all the higher works of art; but my mother would not suffer me again to quit her; and I owed her too much to act contrary to her wishes, much as I panted to distinguish myself in the great world."

"You were good, indeed," said Dame Steiner. "I knew you would never desert her."

Jeannette had long since turned round from looking out at the window, and had been during the latter part of his simply told story gazing upon him with intense interest. Her whole soul seemed absorbed in listening. How her heart was dissolving and gushing out into the deep channels of love—sweet, fresh, delightful love, in its first awakening in the soul. She listened—she sympathised—she admired—she forgot herself in him.

"At length my dear mother—my more than mother—died," continued the young artist. "It is two months since. I have not ceased to lament her, for she was my only friend on earth!"

"Not so—we are your friends," continued the dame, with moist eyes. "I will be to you a mother as she was—you will find me so! Jeannette shall be a sister to you! For one lost you shall gain two!"

"How can I appreciate such kindness!" he said, glancing from one kind face to the other, and appearing deeply moved. "Surely Providence hath directed my steps hither! But I cannot be a burden to you, my dear friend. I am now a man, and can make my own way in the world. But I shall never forget your generous affection."

"But, wherever you are, your heart will want a home to turn to—a home to think upon where hearts throb congenial with your own," said Jeannette, leaving the window, and approaching him with the frankness of youth and the warm enthusiasm of a noble and guileless spirit. "Let this be such a home! We shall ever remember you away from it, and welcome you whenever you revisit it."

"Beauteous maiden, how shall I express my emotions! My heart is indeed taken captive. I will not cease to regard this as my home wheresoever I may wander."

Jeannette ingenuously placed her hand in his.—Her mother took his other hand, and the nameless stranger was at once enshrined in their home as he had already been in their hearts.

"Now, my dear mother and sister," said the young artist, looking from one to the other, with beaming eyes, which gratitude both moistened and brightened; "now will I make known to you my present object in visiting the city, for I know you will both feel an interest in my success."

Here his gaze rested upon the face of Jeannette, who, after having impulsively placed her hand in his, had blushingly withdrawn it, and seated herself a little way from him.

"Last week I saw in a city newspaper that the Emperor of Russia had sent to his Consul at Philadelphia to have taken for him a portrait of Washington. The Consul therefore issued an advertisement 'To Artists' of the State, inviting them to compete for the honor, offering a thousand roubles for the best portrait, to be presented to him for inspection within sixty days.

"Upon looking at the date of the advertisement, I saw that it was already five weeks old, and that three weeks only remained. But with my ambition already aroused by the notice, this drawback did not lead me to abandon the determination to become one of the competitors. I resolved to make the attempt. My preparations were soon made, and the next morning I left my lowly home, after bidding adieu to my mother's grave, and disposing of her few articles of worldly goods, which just sufficed to pay her debts. With my pack upon my back, and my staff in my hand, I set forth; and now, on this the fourth day of my journey, has Providence brought me to this hospitable roof and these kind friends!"

Jeannette listened to his words with eager attention. Her soul seemed to enter into his, and participate in all his hopes and plans for fame.

"And, dear young man," said the good lady, "how is it possible you can hope to succeed? You have no room in the city, little money and no friends there, and but two weeks and three days! And then there is such a sight of painters, old ones and great ones, and you so young and unknown!"

"I know that he will succeed, dear mother!" said Jeannette, warmly. "He cannot fail!"

"Thanks, a thousand thanks, kind Jeannette! Your words find an echo in my inmost being! I feel that I shall succeed, if I can only obtain a good portrait to copy. This is my only fear."

"What is that, young man?" asked the dame, who had now become as deeply interested in all that concerned the handsome, intellectual-looking young stranger, as if she had known him from infancy.

"I fear I shall not be able to obtain a portrait to copy; there will be so many competitors that every authentic likeness will be hired at a large price."

"I have a picture of the General in a frame up stairs that you shall have," said the lady, eagerly. "Run for it, Jeannette!"

"It is an engraving, dear mother! He cannot wish to paint from an engraving."

"No," said the young man; "you judge rightly, beautiful Jeannette! I can only copy from a genuine portrait. You seem to be reflecting!"

"If you can obtain a likeness for which General Washington sat, will it do?" asked Jeannette, with a finger on her lip, and in a hesitating manner.

"Do! It would insure my success. But there are, I am told, but three in the country, and to these I fear I should find it impossible to obtain access. But why do you ask, and with such a look of knowledge?"

"I know who has a likeness of Washington for which he sat, but"——

"But what?" asked the youth, earnestly.

"But it is only a miniature."

"A miniature would be every way as good as a portrait. But where can such be obtained? I fear you are in error."

"No, I am not," answered the young girl, firmly. "If a miniature will do, you shall have one within the next twenty-four hours!"

"Is it possible you know of the existence of such a picture?"

"Yes. It is in New Brunswick, New Jersey, where I was at school for two years with an aunt. While there, I saw it by accident in the family of General E—— I was told that it was painted by a French Countess, to whom General Washington sat, expressly to oblige her. This Countess presented it to her relative, General E——, whose grandson now has it in his possession."

"This seems too good news to be believed!"

"I saw it, and remember it perfectly. The hair was powdered, with a queue, and his dress was plain, I think, with a sash over the shoulder."

"You were at school then in New Brunswick?"

"Oh, yes!"

"Jeannette has had the best of education, sir," said the mother, with an air of pride. Her aunt sent for her, and there she learned music, embroidery, and painting; but this didn't spoil her, for she is as good a cook and housewife as her mother, every whit, though I say it!"

"She could not hope for better praise! I must see this picture, if possible."

"I will go and get it for you!" said Jeannette.

"You? Why it is a day's ride in the stage! How generous you are to offer. No, I will go! I will wait upon him and ask permission to copy it. He cannot refuse me! How fortunate every way I am in having seen you!"

"Will you come back and paint here?" asked Jeannette.

"Yes, if he will permit me to bring it away. If not, I must stay there and complete it. But you shall see it, for I will bring it this way."

The next morning our young artist got into the stage, supplied with money in spite of himself by the generous hostess, and the same evening arrived at New Brunswick. He did not hesitate to call, late as it was, at the house of General E—— To his joyful surprise, the account given by Jeannette was confirmed. The miniature, a beautiful work of art, was shown to him, and permission kindly given him to copy it in the house.

Early the next morning he was at work. During the day he snatched a moment to write a few lines to Jeannette and her mother. They were addressed to the maiden.

"Dear Jeannette—I have seen the miniature, and am at this moment at work copying it. I shall complete it in eight days. You shall then see it! A thousand thanks for your information and kindness. Were I a prince and my heart and hand would be accepted by you in return, you should have them, and by the gift, I should be the gainer. But I am only a poor artist, and can offer you but thanks. If you will not be angry, I would tell you how much I love you! The confession is written! I will not recall it, trusting to your forgiveness. My love and gratitude to your mother. One line from you acknowledging this, would inspire me with new courage in my work.

"Your friend, ever,

"Henry Bayard."

The reply came. It breathed the depth of Jeannette's pure and delicate affection. It artlessly told her heart's tale of love.

Jeannette was too frank and innocent to conceal her feelings or adopt disguises. She said she was not angry, but happy, that he said he loved her. She said she was glad he was not a prince, for if he were, she should feel they could never be friends, adding that if he should by chance turn out to be a prince one day, she would be ready to break her heart, knowing that he would think of her no more.

Henry was made very happy by this single-hearted letter of the young maiden of the inn, and pursued his task with renewed ardour, for love was now added to ambition, to inspire him to success.

The portrait was at length achieved. The next night after its completion he was at the inn. To say that it was praised by Jeannette and the hostess, would be useless. The artist listened with trembling to their assurances of his success. True genius always doubts itself! It is sanguine in action, but when the work is done, then it trembles and distrusts!

The next day the portrait, in a sealed cover, was taken into town by the artist, and delivered to the Consul, with his name simply upon a card, without any address. The decision upon the portraits offered, was to be made by a committee of five distinguished connoisseurs.

The day of trial came. The artist spent it at the inn, sustained in his hopes of the result by the consciousness of genius, yet fearing the worst.—Jeannette was sanguine of his success, and the hostess "knew well" he would bear off the palm.

The next morning the decision was made public in the Gazette. The market boy had been early sent in, with orders to hasten out with the paper as soon as it was printed. It came. Henry could not open it. He was very pale, and though he smiled, his fingers would not do their office. Jeannette, with a firm hand, unfolded the paper. Her rapid eyes ran over it, and then a glad cry escaped her! The artist sprang to her side, to look over! The good hostess clapped her hands, and laughed aloud, crying—"I knew it! I knew it!"

Jeannette read, with a flushed cheek, and brilliant eye, and nervous lips, as follows:

"The successful aspirant in the competition for the Portrait of Washington, ordered by the Emperor Alexander, is a Mr. Henry Bayard. The committee, three of whom knew Washington personally, decided upon his work unanimously. The number of portraits offered was thirteen.

Who this Henry Bayard is, is now exciting no little curiosity. The name, hitherto, is wholly unknown; and that he should at once burst forth upon the world in the full plumage of fame is not a little surprising, and affords theme for very general conversation. When he applies for the price of one thousand roubles to be awarded for this production of his genius, the world will probably have their curiosity gratified. There is an on dit that the picture is Sully's, or Stewart's, under an assumed name; but it is not in the style of either, and both deny the authorship, and are in as much perplexity as to the identity of the artist as others."

What pen shall pourtray the emotions of the young artist, as he read, almost blindly, this paragraph. He staggered to a chair, covered his face in his hands, and burst into tears.

Our story is done. We could not record for our hero any higher glory! He had stepped at once to the summit of the temple of fame, and there received a world's homage. To crown his happiness, Jeannette became his bride a few weeks afterwards, and fitting up one of the rooms of the inn as an atelier, he there devoted himself to his profession, and shrinking from the world's unsatisfying admiration, he chose in lieu of it the charms of friendship, made sacred by wifely love.

THE HERO WOMAN.

A Legend from George Lippard, Esq.'s Fourth Lecture on the "Romance of the Revolution," delivered before the William Wirt Institute.

In a thick wood, not more than half a mile from the Schuylkill, there stood, in the time of the Revolution, a quaint old fabric, built of mingled logs and stone, and encircled by a palisaded wall. It had been erected in the earlier days of William Penn,—perhaps some years before the great apostle of peace first trod our shores,—as a block-house, intended for defence against the Indians.

And now it stood with its many roofs, its numerous chimneys, its massive square windows, its varied front of logs and stone, its encircling wall, through which admittance was gained by a large and stoutly-built gate; it stood in the midst of the wood, with age-worn trees enclosing its veteran outline on every side.

From its eastern window you might obtain a glimpse of the Schuylkill waves, while a large casement in the southern front commanded a view of the winding road, as it sunk out of view, under the shade of thickly-clustered boughs, into a deep hollow, not more than one hundred yards from the mansion.

Here, from the southern casement, on one of those balmy summer days which look in upon the dreary autumn, toward the close of November, a farmer's daughter was gazing, with dilating eyes and half-clasped hands.

Well might she gaze earnestly to the south, and listen with painful intensity for the slightest sound! Her brothers were away with the army of Washington, and her father, a grim old veteran—he stood six feet and three inches in his stockings—who had manifested his love for the red-coat invaders, in many a desperate contest, had that morning left her alone in the old mansion, alone in this small chamber, in charge of some ammunition intended for a band of brave farmers, about to join the hosts of freedom. Even as she stood there, gazing out of the southern window, a faint glimpse of sunlight, from the faded leaves above, pouring over her mild face, shaded by clustering brown hair, there, not ten paces from her side, were seven loaded rifles and a keg of powder.

Leaning from the casement, she listened with every nerve quivering with suspense, to the shouts of combatants, the hurried tread of armed men echoing from the south.

There was something very beautiful in that picture! The form of the young girl, framed by the square massive window, the contrast between the rough timbers, that enclosed her, and that rounded face, the lips parting, the hazel eye dilating, and the cheek warming and flushing, with hope and fear; there was something very beautiful in that picture, a young girl leaning from the window of an old mansion, with her brown hair, waving in glossy masses around her face!

Suddenly the shouts to the south grew nearer, and then, emerging from the deep hollow, there came an old man, running at full speed, yet, every few paces, turning round to fire the rifle, which he loaded as he ran. He was pursued by a party of ten or more British soldiers, who came rushing on, their bayonets fixed, as if to strike their victim down, ere he advanced ten paces nearer the house.

On and on the old man came, while his daughter, quivering with suspense, hung leaning from the window;—he reaches the block-house gate—look! He is surrounded, their muskets are levelled at his head, he is down, down at their feet, grappling for his life! But look again!—He dashes his foes aside, with one bold movement he springs through the gate; an instant, and it is locked; the British soldiers, mad with rage, gaze upon the high wall of logs and stone, and vent their anger in drunken curses.

Now look to yonder window! Where the young girl stood a moment ago, quivering with suspense, as she beheld her father struggling for his life, now stands that old man himself, his brow bared, his arm grasping the rifle, while his grey hairs wave back from his wrinkled and blood-dabbled face! That was a fine picture of an old veteran, nerved for his last fight; a stout warrior, preparing for his death struggle.

Death-struggle? Yes!—for the old man, Isaac Wampole, had dealt too many hard blows among the British soldiers, tricked, foiled, cheated them too often to escape now! A few moments longer, and they would be reinforced by a strong party of refugees; the powder, the arms, in the old block-house, perhaps that daughter, herself, was to be their reward. There was scarcely a hope for the old man, and yet he had determined to make a desperate fight.

"We must bluff off these rascals!" he said, with a grim smile, turning to his child. "Now, Bess, my girl, when I fire this rifle, do you hand me another, and so on, until the whole eight shots are fired! That will keep them on the other side of the wall, for a few moments, at least, and then we will have to trust to God for the rest!"

Look down there, and see, a hand stealing over the edge of the wall! The old man levels his piece—that British trooper falls back with a crushed hand upon his comrades' heads!

No longer quivering with suspense, but grown suddenly firm, that young girl passes a loaded rifle to the veteran's grasp, and silently awaits the result.

For a moment all is silent below; the British bravoes are somewhat loath to try that wall, when a stout old "Rebel," rifle in hand, is looking from yonder window! Here is a pause—low, deep muttering—they are holding a council!

A moment is gone, and nine heads are thrust above the wall at once—hark! One—two—three!—The old veteran has fired three shots, there are three dying men, grovelling in the yard, beneath the shadow of the wall!

"Quick, Bess, the rifles!"

And the brave girl passes the rifles to her father's grasp: there are four shots, one after the other; three more soldiers fell back, like weights of lead, upon the ground, and a single red-coat is seen, slowly mounting to the top of the wall, his eye fixed upon the hall door, which he will force, ere a moment is gone!

Now the last ball is fired, the old man stands there, in that second-story window, his hands vainly grasping for another loaded rifle! At this moment, the wounded and dying band, below, are joined by a party of some twenty refugees, who, clad in their half-robber uniform, came rushing from the woods, and, with one bound, are leaping for the summit of the wall!

"Quick, Bess, my rifle!"

And look there—even while the veteran stood looking out upon his foes, the brave girl—for, slender in form, and wildly beautiful in face, she is a brave girl, a Hero-Woman—had managed, as if by instinctive impulse, to load a rifle. She handed it to her father, and then loaded another and another!—Was n't that a beautiful sight? A fair young girl, grasping powder and ball, with the ramrod, rising and falling in her slender fingers!

Now look down to the wall again! The refugees are clambering over its summit—again that fatal aim—again a horrid cry, and another wounded man toppling down upon his dead and dying comrades!

But now look!—A smoke rises there, a fire blazes up around the wall; they have fired the gate. A moment, and the bolt and the lock will be burnt from its sockets—the passage will be free! Now is the fiery moment of the old man's trial! While his brave daughter loads, he continues to fire, with that deadly aim, but now—oh horror! He falls, he falls, with a musquet ball driven into his breast——the daughter's out-stretched arms receive the father, as, with the blood spouting from his wound, he topples back from the window.

Ah, it is a sad and terrible picture!

That old man, writhing there, on the oaken floor, the young daughter bending over him, the light from the window streaming over her face, over her father's grey hairs, while the ancient furniture of the small chamber affords a dim back-ground to the scene!

Now hark!—The sound of axes, at the hall door—shouts—hurras—curses!

"We have the old rebel, at last!"

The old man raises his head at that sound; makes an effort to rise; clutches for a rifle, and then falls back again, his eyes glaring, as the fierce pain of that wound quivers through his heart.

Now watch the movements of that daughter. Silently she loads a rifle, silently she rests its barrel against the head of that powder-keg, and then, placing her finger on the trigger, stands over her father's form, while the shouts of the enraged soldiers come thundering from the stairs. Yes, they have broken the hall door to fragments, they are in possession of the old block-house, they are rushing toward that chamber, with murder in their hearts, and in their glaring eyes! Had the old man a thousand lives, they were not worth a farthing's purchase now.

Still that girl—grown suddenly white as the kerchief round her neck—stands there, trembling from head to foot, the rifle in her hand, its dark tube laid against the powder-keg.

The door is burst open—look there! Stout forms are in the doorway, with musquets in their hands, grim faces, stained with blood, glare into the room.

Now, as if her very soul was coined into the words, that young girl, with her face pale as ashes, her hazel eye glaring with deathly light, utters this short yet meaning speech—

"Advance one step into the room, and I will fire this rifle into the powder there!"

No oath quivers from the lips of that girl, to confirm her resolution, but there she stands, alone, with her wounded father, and yet not a soldier dare cross the threshold! Embruted as they are in deeds of blood, there is something terrible to these men, in the simple words of that young girl, who stands there, with the rifle laid against the powder-keg.

They stood, as if spell-bound, on the threshold of that chamber!

At last, one, bolder than the rest, a brave, whose face is half-concealed in a thick red beard, grasps his musquet, and levels it at the young girl's breast!

"Stand back, or, by ——, I will fire!"

Still the girl is firm; the brave advances a step, and then starts back. The sharp "click" of that rifle falls with an unpleasant emphasis upon his ear.

"Bess, I am dying," gasps the old man, faintly extending his arms. "Ha, ha, we foiled the Britishers! Come—daughter—kneel here; kneel and say a prayer for me, and let me feel your warm breath [illegible] you [illegible] soul," he continued, as Henry look on my face, for I am getting cold——O, dark and cold!"

Look!—As those trembling accents fall from the old man's tongue, those fingers unloose their hold of the rifle—already the troopers are secure of one victim, at least, a young and beautiful girl; for affection for her father, is mastering the heroism of the moment—look! She is about to spring into his arms! But now she sees her danger! again she clutches the rifle; again—although her father's dying accents are in her ears—stands there, prepared to scatter that house in ruins, if a single rough hand assails that veteran form.

There are a few brief terrible moments of suspense. Then a hurried sound, far down the mansion; then a contest on the stairs; then the echo of rifle shot and the light of rifle blaze; then those ruffians in the doorway fall crushed before the strong arms of Continental soldiers. Then a wild shriek quivers through the room, and that young girl—that Hero-Woman, with one bound, springs forward into her brothers arms, and nestles there, while her dead father—his form yet warm—lays, with fixed eye-balls, upon the floor.

HOW TO CHOOSE A WIFE;

OR,

THE BACHELOR'S BRIDE.

BY ANGELINE E. ALEXANDER.

Chapter I.

Charles M. Howard was a bachelor, of thirty years' standing, and yet, singular as it may appear, he was not at all afraid of his age being known, though he could readily have passed for several years younger. His countenance possessed that frank, open, intellectual expression, that inspires respect and confidence in the beholder, and tells most certainly of a mind within. His principles were noble and lofty—his disposition confiding and generous, with a heart peculiarly formed to inspire and reciprocate sentiments of affection. His respect for and admiration of the female sex were unbounded, and only in their society was his happiness complete; yet, on his fortieth birth-day, he was an unmarried man. He had created in his imagination the being he could love, but no where could he meet with her in the sober realities of life. Mr. Howard was a wealthy man, and had become impressed with the idea that it was his riches that made him an object of interest, consequently he was very distrustful of the bewitching smiles and cordial welcome with which he was always greeted. He was, just at this time, on the eve of quite an important event. An early friend and college companion, Mr. Thomas Irwin, was about entering the matrimonial state for the second time, and, at his earnest request, Howard had consented to act as his groomsman. He had waited upon his friend in that capacity at his first marriage, and it was in consequence of this, and his great regard for him, that he yielded to his wishes, and, to use his own expression, became a young man again. A few days before the wedding, Irwin paid him a visit at his handsome apartments at the Astor. The approaching nuptials were, of course, the engrossing topic of conversation.

"I have been thinking a good deal about it, Irwin," said Howard to his friend, "and I am almost sorry I consented to stand up for you; I am afraid I shall make an awkward affair of it."

"You are endeavoring to draw out a compliment, I perceive: for, as you well know, it would be impossible for the graceful and accomplished Charles Howard to do anything awkwardly."

"Come—come! don't be throwing your jests at me in that way. Heigh-ho! I wish, with all my heart, that it was I that was to be married, instead of you."

"Not to my lady, I hope—for, if that be the case, instead of standing at my side in a few days, I shall expect to meet you to-morrow morning, face to face, at ten or a dozen paces, as our seconds may see fit. But, jesting aside, Howard, you ought to marry, calculated as you are to make a wife happy. It is a duty you owe your Maker and society. Beside, you know not the happiness your are losing——"

"Yes—yes I do—I feel it—I know it all. I gaze around these luxurious apartments and despise their splendid loneliness. I sigh for a gentle voice to sooth me—for soft, loving eyes upturned to mine—for the delicate and unobtrusive attentions which affection alone can prompt, and for a heart in which I can safely trust, and that will understand and appreciate my love."

"Then why not secure to yourself such a treasure—depend on it, you will never repent it."

"It is for this treasure I am seeking. I can easily love—the difficulty is to find one who could love me for myself alone."

"Poop—pooh! how do you suppose any fair lady could love such a crooked old bachelor as you?—indeed you ought to be thankful to kind Heaven for endowing you with the solid charms, wherewith to attract their attention."

"I am much obliged to you for your compliments, and have no doubt but the 'fair ladies' think just as you do—therefore I am as you see me."

"But to be serious, Charles, you are entirely wrong. Your diseased imagination has conjured up the idea, that you are courted alone on account of your wealth and influence. Now, in this, you are mistaken, and until you divest yourself of this foolish notion, you will be a discontented and unhappy man, a prey to ennui, and standing in the way of your own happiness. Take the advice of a friend—clear your vision of this beam, and open your heart to the charms of the sweet creatures who are constantly flitting around your path—and as I consider myself a man of judgment and experience in such matters, any assistance in my power shall be most cheerfully rendered."

"You are a kind soul, Irwin, and now the thought just strikes me—you are the very one to choose a wife for me, as I find it impossible to make a selection. Do you not know of one that you think will suit me?"

"Of one?—yes, I could tell you of several, with either one of whom your felicity would be complete."

"Name them—and as sure as my name is Charles Howard, I'll marry the one that pleases me, provided she'll have me."

"A very good proviso! Well, then, to commence—there is the bridesmaid, as pretty a little girl as trips along Broadway, and would look perfectly bewitching on the night of the wedding, but for my bride, whose charms, I must confess, will throw her's somewhat in the shade."

"She has a beautiful face, and that is all. She lacks expression, fervor of sentiment, and is too inanimate even to dance. She always reminds me of a beautiful piece of statuary—soulless, unimaginative. Depend on it, she could love no one but her own pretty self."

"Well, then, there is her oldest sister, a tall, splendid woman, that can move with the grace of a sylph, possesses a mind of the highest order, upon which rare cultivation has been bestowed, can converse on any subject like a philosopher——"

"Stop—stop! I beseech you. I do not want tomarry a female Solon, neither do I relish the idea of looking up to a wife, which would certainly be the case, both personally and mentally, with regard to that magnificent lady, who ought to have graduated long since as 'Mistress of Arts.' No—no, I could not love her;—

'What most I prize in woman
Is her affection—not her intellect.'

I have a very good opinion of my own intellectual powers, and imagine they are quite sufficient for any reasonable woman and myself. In a wife I desire an amiable and intelligent woman, who will love me with her whole heart, and be willing to take me for her guide and counsellor."

"Ah, I have one now—a sweet, mild girl, who was made for love and you, who just answers your description—Emily Austin."

"She is too young—not more than eighteen. I do not expect to marry a woman of forty, or thirty-eight either; but I cannot think it possible that a girl of Emily Austin's age, could love a man who is old enough for her father—I like consistency."

"Too young! strange objection for an old bachelor to urge. But I have just thought of a lady who is different from all the others, and I think will suit exactly—Miss Clara Stevens."

"She is too old—at least twenty-seven—a regular old maid. A woman who has reached twenty-seven unmarried, has been in love half a dozen times. Her affections have been divided and frittered away among her conquests, until nothing is left."

"Eighteen too young and twenty-seven too old—you are hard to please; but I have a medium—the beautiful young widow, Mrs. Walters. A highly accomplished and loveable woman, with a plum into the 'bargain'."

"A widow! Heaven forfend it. I should never marry a widow unless her husband had been guilty of treason against the Government or piracy upon the high seas. It would be impossible to please her. Only cross her in the least, then you would have it—'Ah, me! when dear Mr. —— was alive, he used to do so and so, and such a thing for me, and I had everything just as I pleased, and was so happy: but now'—then would follow a fit of the hysterics. I am not particularly fond of having living men held up to me as paragons, much less dead ones."

"Hump! you are so fastidious that I despair of pleasing you. However, I'll try once more. There is the reigning belle of the season—the exquisite Miss Rosalie Montague."

"The reigning belle of the season! The very sound startles me. No man in his senses would think of marrying a belle—that compound of fashion, vanity, and heartlessness. I have too much self-respect to bow at the shrine of such a being."

"Perhaps a lady from the country would suit you. I understand that Miss Herbert expects a young cousin, who lives in the upper part of the State, to spend the winter with her, and if we may credit report, she is as lovely and amiable as fallen human nature can be. I would advise you to apply there as soon as she arrives, ere she is contaminated by fashionable follies, or finds out your peculiar notions."

"I do not think that I could commit my happiness to the hands of a country girl, because they are generally so amazingly taken with the fashion and gaiety of city life. It comes to them with the charm and freshness of novelty, and runs away with what reason and common sense they possess. I'll describe the being I could love:—About the colour of her eyes, or the regularity of her features, I am not particular, so they wear the expression that pleases me. I do not want her to be too wise, yet she must know sufficient to appreciate properly my talents, and make her an intelligent companion. After all, it is the heart I seek for. It is the unreserved, uncalculating, and confiding love of a delicate, refined, and gentle woman, for which I yearn, and in return for which, my whole soul, with its powers, desires, and affections, shall be cheerfully resigned to her keeping, and acknowledge no sway but hers."

"And what woman, do you suppose, would be so foolish as to become the slave of such an overbearing and tyrannical master? I shall take very good care to sound the note of warning to all my fair friends. Upon my word, you must rate your qualifications very high, since none but an angel is worthy to enjoy them. Here have I been compromising the dignity of some of the finest women in the United States, by allowing you to discuss their capabilities of aspiring to your hand, (not one of whom I am sure would have you,) and forsooth, you have found some fault with every one. As a punishment to you, they ought to be informed of your opinions concerning them, that they might seek revenge in their own way. If ever you do marry, (which is very unlikely,) I pity you from my heart, and sympathise deeply with the unfortunate being who gets you for her despotic sovereign."

"You had better bestow your sympathy where it is needed—for if it is in the power of a man who can love passionately and devotedly to make a woman happy, the one whom I call wife shall be supremely so."

"We will see," replied Irwin, and after some farther conversation left his friend to sigh amid his "splendid loneliness."

The night of the wedding arrived, and Howard stood beside the groom. Strange thoughts passed through his mind. Ten years before he had occupied the same station at the side of his friend; but many changes had taken place since then. He thought of the fair, gentle girl who leaned tremblingly on Irwin's arm, and with tearful confidence gave her hand, with her heart in it, to him. She had passed away, and left nought to remind him of her save her image in her child. Howard felt sad. He wondered if his friend ever thought of this. Irwin looked so happy that he was afraid he had forgotten her, yet he could not blame him. He had been a tender and affectionate husband, a kind and indulgent father—had waited many years, and had finally made a very judicious choice, and Howard felt that he acted right, still for himself, he determined that he would never marry a second time. 'Twas strange, that an old bachelor who had been searching in vain two and twenty years for the first wife, should be thinking about the second, but strange thoughts will intrude themselves. At length Howard came to the conclusion that he had better not marry at all, lest his wife might die, and he be tempted to violate his sentimental feelings by marrying again, or the event of his death might leave a widow possessed of a handsome fortune, who would bestow it on some young fellow to squander away at pleasure—either of these thoughts were intolerable, especially the latter.—The idea that while he was sleeping quietly in the grave, his own money was flying through the four quarters of the globe, by a graceless young spendthrift, was more than could be endured. So he came to the full determination that when he married he would immediately make his will, providing handsomely for his widow so long as she remained such, but leaving the bulk of his property for the establishment and support of a society, to be called the "Indigent Single Gentlemen's Society," and whose object should be the relief and sustenance of those unfortunate beings who had dragged out a life of single blessedness, and at their decease to afford them a decent burial, with the following inscription on their tombstone—"Here lies a Bachelor." In the codicil, it was to be distinctly stated that, in case his widow married again, her portion was to revert to the aforesaid society. Howard felt wonderfully relieved after settling this point in his mind, and at the close of the ceremony was entirely himself again, ready to perform the delightful duties that devolved upon him, which he did in such a graceful and captivating manner as won the heart of many a beautiful damsel present.

The parties that followed the wedding were very brilliant, and produced much effect. The bride, as all brides do, looked charming as she received the congratulations of her friends, and their wishes for her future happiness, which, considering she was the second wife, there was every reason to suppose would be perfect and uninterrupted. The groom, would have served as a model of bliss personified.—The bridesmaid and groomsman were a remarkably handsome couple, and showed to great advantage in the conspicuous part they acted. Many were the whisperings and surmises as to the next wedding, although Howard only paid his [illegible]ful companion those attentions which their r[illegible] positions demanded. In vain did scheming [illegible]ritia lay their plans, and lisping daughters smile[illegible]er and look languidly, Charles Howard walked about a free man still—proud of his liberty.

Chapter II.

Lieing among the verdant hills of New England, the river washing their base, is the beautiful village of S——. It is somewhat removed from the regular route of travel, and being at a distance from rail road stations, the go-ahead spirit of the present day is almost unknown among its inhabitants; consequently, they are a happy and contented people, retaining much of their puritan simplicity. Near the upper end of the village, a pretty little cottage peeps out from among the trees. There are other cottages scattered around, but about this one there seems a peculiar charm. From the modest violet, which, in unpretending loveliness, opes its meek eye in the early spring, to the showy chrysanthemum, that lingers to glad us awhile amid the sad and gloomy winds of autumn, all the flowers seem to have chosen this be auty-spot in which to hold their court, and by displaying their charms, if possible, rival each other in loveliness. Around the porch of the door, the sweet honey-suckle clasps its graceful tendrils, while the queen of flowers, blushing at her own beauty, disputes the fragrance with the exquisitely-leaved jessamine, that showers its delicate blossoms beneath the parlor windows, around which it is trained. But the loveliest flower of all blooms within the cottage—sweet Anne Leslie.

Anne Leslie was not sixteen, nor was she twenty-six; she occupied a position between the two, but where we dare not tell, as it is very impolite even to guess at a lady's age, whom you suppose to have completed her sixteenth year. Her father had been the pastor of the church that stands in the centre of the village, and associated with her earliest recollections was his image. Well could she remember how he used to take her by the hand to church, and leaving her in the pew with her mother, would fill his place in the pulpit, to lead the devotions of the people, and as he became animated with his subject, and seemed borne upward, forgetting every thing around, Anna would almost tremble, and fear that her dear papa would never again be willing to share her childish pleasures. Her youthful imagination had invested him with exalted attributes; and often did she wonder how a great man like her father, could love a little simple child like her.

As Anne grew older, and her mind expanded in beauty and richness, under the watchful care of her father, until she could in some degree enter into his feelings, how did she adore that beloved parent, and with what emotions of awe and delight would she listen to the pleading and impassioned tones of eloquence, that fell from his lips, stirring the very depths of her spirit. Proud and happy was she to be the daughter of such a father. But death entered the happy home of her childhood, and marked the husband and father for his victim. The hand of affection smoothed the dying pillow, closed the weary eyelids, and laid gently down the village pastor, to rest from his labors.

Anne Leslie was inconsolable at the loss of her father. In the garden of her soul was hewn a sepulchre, in which lay buried the source of her happiness. Time, that blessed soother of the wounded heart, gradually softened her bitter anguish, and when the image of her exalted father rose before her, Anne would bow her head and weep submissively. Mrs. Leslie and her daughter left the parsonage upon the arrival of the new pastor and his family, and rented the neat cottage which they occupied.

Four years had passed since the death of Mr. Leslie, and Anne felt that their slender means, although husbanded with the strictest economy, would soon be insufficient to support them, without some exertion on her part. She thought much upon the subject, and finally her determination was taken.—Anne Leslie possessed a mind beyond her years, and upon its development her father had devoted a large share of his time and talents. Her plan was to resume her studies, and pursue them with untiring diligence, until she was fully qualified to become a teacher. She could then hope for employment in the female seminary near the village. She quickly made known her intentions to her mother, who at first opposed her, fearing lest the confinement and fatigue attendant upon such a course would injure her health; but Anne assured her there was no occasion for her fears—that the low state of their funds made it absolutely necessary for something to be done—and that she had chosen this in preference to any other employment. Mrs. Leslie gazed upon the plump cheek and sparkling eye of her daughter, kissed her, and gave her consent. So the fair student was to enter upon her duties as soon as a competent teacher could be found to direct them.

Towards the close of a day in the early part of April—that month of sunshine and tears—the stage-coach might be seen toiling up one of the hills by which the village of S—— was surrounded. In a little while it entered the village, and stopped at Mrs. Leslie's gate. Anne went out and received from the driver the roll of music and package of books that she had requested him to bring her from the county town. He then gave his horses the whip, and away went the stage, dashing and rattling along down to the tavern. One passenger was left here, who called for a room, and ordered his baggage into it; then enquiring for the residence of Colonel Ridgway, departed in the direction pointed out to him. The stranger did not return until the next morning, when, requesting a private interview with the landlord, he asked his opinion concerning the prospect of sustaining a female seminary in the place. His host gave him considerable encouragement—so much indeed that the stranger at once decided to remain in S——, and as a consequence engaged board of the worthy landlord at the sign of the Anchor.

In a short time, Mr. Meredith—for such was the schoolmaster's name—was snugly ensconced in a neat school-room, in a retired part of the village. His school was very select, and, as he taught only the higher branches of education and the languages, his pupils were generally young ladies—the daughters of the aristocracy of S—— and its vicinity—and as many of these were too indolent, or too proud to go to school again, he was not overburdened with scholars. His arrival in S—— was most opportune to Anne Leslie, at least so she thought, and eagerly did she enter upon the course of study he recommended.

Days and weeks rolled by, and four months after the opening of Mr. Meredith's school, an observer might have noticed considerable change in the little community, even in that short space of time. Many had become wearied with learning and turned back. Others did not like Mr. Meredith—they thought him too quiet and reserved—and preferred whiling away the warm summer days in their own pleasant homes, to solving problems and parsing Latin sentences with the dull schoolmaster. A few were still eagerly pursuing the path of knowledge. Among these latter was to be found Anne Leslie. But a change had come over the spirit of her dream, and yet she knew it not.

Mr. Meredith, from an occasional call at the cottage to satisfy Mrs. Leslie with regard to Anne's improvement, had become quite a frequent visitor. Anne felt a kind of pleasurable awe steal over her in his presence, which made her very quiet—and, leaving to her mother the duty of entertaining their guest, she would reserve for herself the pleasure of listening. If for an instant his eye rested upon her, or in the course of conversation he addressed himself to her, it would make her tremble, and cause her heart to beat so violently, that she feared he would notice it, and attribute it to awkwardness, in her having lead so secluded a life. Anne thought it strange she should feel so. She could converse with Colonel Ridgway, and Dr. Douglass, the village physician, and even the minister himself, without trepidation; and she was sure there was nothing very terrific in the appearance or conversation of the schoolmaster that would account for her agitation. Ah! Anne Leslie was a novice, and little imagined the state of her heart. Anne had never been to school before, for her father taught her at home, and she thought it a delightful occupation.—Before going out in the morning, she would arrange her pretty hair very smoothly, and often wonder if the schoolmaster liked white muslin dresses better than pink gingham ones. Then she would blush at her own thoughts, and, tying on her cottage bonnet, wend her way to the school-house. Anne was a very attentive student, but oftentimes on the very page she was studying would appear the dark eyes and noble brow of the schoolmaster. Anne would start and shut her eyes, but very soon she would open them again, and then—right down on the book—so plain—would be the same vision, and as it is rather embarrassing to have a pair of eyes looking all the time into yours, it is no wonder that Anne would have to close the book, and look out upon the moonlight to divert her for awhile. In this way time passed on.

Col. Ridgway's eldest daughter was Anne Leslie's intimate friend, and at her solicitation Anne consented to spend a day, that she named, with her. Towards evening, as she was preparing to return home, the clouds assumed a very threatening aspect. Col. Ridgway was from home, and the family urged her to remain, but Anne felt sure she could reach the village before the storm came on. She had proceeded about half the distance, when a vivid flash of lightning, followed by a rattling peal of thunder, told her of her perilous situation. The terrified girl looked around in vain for shelter—pale and breathless, she was ready to sink to the ground with fear, when, to her great joy, she saw Mr. Meredith approaching, apparently on his way to Col. Ridgway's. [illegible] you were [illegible] Soon, [illegible]

Anne blushed and trembled, and quite forgot that she was in the midst of a thunder storm, as he gently drew her arm within his, and she felt the blessing of having such a support for her faltering steps.—But at length there came a flash of such startling brightness, succeeded by a peal so terrific, that Anne, forgetting every thing but the danger, clung to her companion with convulsive fear. He drew the trembling and almost lifeless girl to his bosom.

"Anne, dearest Anne, are you hurt, or only frightened? Speak but one word to quiet my fears," and Meredith gazed on her pale face with unutterable anguish.

"I am not hurt—and I know it is wrong to be so frightened. But that awful flash! Oh, I cannot endure to see another such!" And the still trembling girl nestled closer to him, and hid her face in his bosom.

Meredith enfolded Anne in his arms to shelter her from the storm, which was now descending upon them in all its fury; and but for his anxiety on her account, could have wished for a perpetual thunder storm, while it procured for him the happiness he enjoyed.

"Anne," said he, "may I speak to you? In this to you, moment of terror—to me, the happiest of my life, may I be allowed to open my heart to you?—Anne, I love you—deeply love you. Long have I desired to reveal to you the rapturous feelings cherished in my yearning bosom—diffusing there the light, the warmth, the fragrance of love; but an indefinable dread of your rejection, prevented me. Yet I have dared to imagine that you sometimes thought of me. Have I presumed too much in fostering such a hope? Look up, Anne, and let me know my fate."

Anne did look up—looked up into eyes that were bent on her in a gaze so tender and impassioned, that it sent a thrill of rapture to her heart. She gave him no answer—there needed none. But as Meredith clasped her yielding form to his heart, and imprinted on her cheek his first most precious kiss, he felt that Anne loved him, and tasted the deepest bliss this world has to bestow.

The rain having abated, they hastened their steps towards the village, for Meredith was alarmed lest serious consequences might ensue from Anne's exposure to the violence of the storm.

Anne Leslie slept but little that night. She was too happy to waste in forgetfulness the precious moments. The next day at school it was very evident that she had not prepared her lessons as carefully as she was wont to do, and many were the awkward blunders made in her recitations. But Meredith overlooked all, lending her an uncommon share of his assistance, and when school was dismissed, he deemed it his duty to walk home with her, doubtless to impress upon her mind the necessity of bestowing better attention for the future. In an incredibly short time it was known throughout the village that Mr. Meredith and Anne Leslie were to be married. It called forth a world of wonderment. Every body was astonished that Anne could fancy a man who was at least sixteen or seventeen years older than herself, especially after having refused the hand of the dashing son of Mr. Lawrence, the wealthiest man in S——. Many thought that her mother ought to have used her influence to prevent such an occurrence as her marrying the poor schoolmaster; while the envious tossed their heads, declaring that in their opinion it was a very good match, as they did not know what reason Anne Leslie had to look higher. But these whisperings and remarks produced no effect upon the object of them, for Anne Leslie had yielded up her whole heart to one in whom she had implicit confidence. Mr. Meredith was by no means deficient in manly beauty. His form was handsome, and his eyes very fine.

> "On his bold visage middle age,
> Had slightly press'd its signet sage;
> Yet had not quenched the open truth,
> And fiery vehemence of youth."

But it was not his handsome person or agreeable manners, that engrossed Anne's love. These doubtless had their due weight. It was the soul enshrined within that Anne worshipped. It was the majesty of thought, the elevated tone of feeling that dwelt upon his broad, serene forehead, that Anne loved to contemplate. Her mind enthroned him lord and king, and proud and delighted was she to yield him the homage that his intellectual powers won from her. The eyes, that kindled with rapture, and from which sparkled the beams of his soul, could also melt with passionate tenderness when bent on her. When conversing with his equals in intelligence, he would draw, from the rich resources of his mind, topics of discussion that would interest all, and support them by unrefutable arguments, with a dignity and eloquence that was sure to command respect and admiration,—how would Anne's heart throb with pride! But when she was alone with Mr. Meredith, in her own quiet parlor, or walking by the river side, leaning on his arm, then he would lay aside those grave and abstruse disquisitions, and subduing his full, rich voice, to milder tones, would converse with her on subjects better suited to her gentle and loving nature. Anne understood and ap-

...ated his virtues. The summer had now closed, ... the falling leaves and withered flowers brought ... and thoughts to her happy heart, and amid the ...bdued sunshine and gorgeous drapery of Autumn, gentle Anne Leslie became the schoolmaster's bride. It had been arranged that immediately after their marriage, Anne should accompany her husband on a visit to his relations in New York, and on their return to S——, he was to resume the occupation of teaching, as the means of support. On the morning of their departure, Anne visited her father's grave, kissed her mother, bade farewell to Col. Ridgway and his family, who were at the cottage to see her off, and was soon seated beside her husband in the stage. It was a lovely season for travelling, and Anne's spirit responded joyously to nature's softened charms. Meredith, who had travelled much, could tell her all she wanted to know.

He pointed out all the objects and places of interest, and would relate some truth or legend connected with them, to amuse her. What she did not understand, he made plain and clear, and was so ready to answer her numberless questions, that she loved to ask him. And then the manner in which he did all this—so full of tenderness and love, and so intermixed with pleasing degressions, and words, and looks of fond endearment, that Anne felt quite thankful she was not very wise, else she would have lost the exquisite happiness she derived from her husband's superior knowledge, and his happy manner of imparting it to her. Their journey was a delightful one, and in due season they arived in New York. Anne had never before been out of the quiet village of S——. She had heard and read of this great emporium of business and fashion, but the utmost stretch of her imagination failed to convey the least idea of the strange sights she beheld as the boat touched the wharf. It was the dusk of the evening, but not so dark as to obscure the surrounding objects, which Anne gezed on until the novelty became painful. The ships of different nations lying at anchor, with their gay streamers floating in the wind—the numerous steamboats constantly arriving and departing—the springing up of lights on shore—the ringing of bells—the hurrying to and fro—the noise and confusion attendant upon an arrival—was all so new and startling, that it quite bewildered her. She felt frightened, she knew not why, and wished herself again in quiet S——. At length Anne stole a timid glance up to her husband's face, to see if he looked frightened. Had that glance confirmed her fears, she would have been overpowered. But they were quickly dispelled by the look of fearlessness and dignity upon his manly brow, and the promptness and decision with which he gave the necessary directions concerning their landing, showed that he was perfectly accustomed to such scenes.—Anne was reassured, and pressing closer to her husband's side, her heart went up in thankfulness to Heaven for granting her such a guide and protector, while a tear of happiness and gratitude involuntarily started to her eye. Mr. Meridith handed Anne into a carriage, and very soon they were rattling along Broadway, amid carriages, cabs, and porter's barrows. With her husband's arm around her, she felt quite safe, and might venture to admire the beautiful stores, and make observations on the passers-by. After riding some distance, the carriage stopped, and, on looking out, Anne discovered that they were at the door of a large and splendid mansion. She was astonished, for she had never thought to enquire of her husband if his connections were wealthy or otherwise. Anne trembled violently as her husband led her up the steps, but she remembered that she was now to meet his relatives, and for his sake she endeavored to tranquilize her agitated feelings. At the door they were received by a man servant, who ushered them into the brilliantly-lighted and richly-furnished drawing-rooms. Meridith supported Anne to a sofa, upon which she sank.

"How long are we to remain here?" whispered she.

"As long as it pleases you. It is our home, my own sweet wife," replied her husband, as he folded her in his arms."

Anne looked at him in bewilderment.

"Will you forgive me, dearest, for this trial of your love? You have known me as Mr Meredith, the schoolmaster of S——. My true name is Charles Meredith Howard. Had I been born in humble circumstances, I could have passed along unnoticed and unsought, but, being a favorite of the blind and fickle goddess, I was courted and flattered by all. That my wealth and influence were the cause of this heartless adulation, I was well aware, and it wearied and disgusted me. Col. Ridgway, who has long been my intimate friend and correspondent, had frequently urged me to visit him, and without appriz-ing him, I suddenly determined to accept his repeated invitation.

"Upon our arrival at S——, the driver stopped at your cottage to deliver some packages he had for you. I was greatly struck with your appearance, but having been deceived so often, I had become wary of myself. Being of rather an independent turn of mind, I did not wish to order my baggage to Col. Ridgway's; so I engaged a room at the tavern, and then proceeded to the Colonel's. I met with a most cordial reception from my old friend, and passed a very agreeable evening. Your image had constantly filled my thoughts from the time I first beheld you. During our conversation, I managed to draw, from the unsuspecting Colonel, your past history and future intentions. The more I heard of you the deeper became the interest I felt for you, until I determined to gain your acquaintance, that I might study your nature and feelings. With this in view, I frankly confessed to Col. Ridgway the uncommon interest you had awakened in me, who did all in his power to encourage it. But wishing to satisfy myself, we concocted together the plan which I adopted. I was to retain only my second name, which is also the name of my mother's family, and become an humble schoolmaster, while he was to treat me with the politeness due to a stranger only. If I was at first captivated by your beauty, when I came to look down into your mind and heart, and discovered the hidden stores of the one and the trusting affections of the other, my thraldom was complete. The fear that haunted me was, that my love would not meet a response in your bosom. The disparity of years, the circumstances by which I was surrounded—a stranger and unknown to you—filled me with apprehension. I will not attempt to describe the wretchedness I endured until I ventured to tell my love. The rest you know, my own Anne. Once more I entreat your forgiveness for the stratagem that has completed my earthly felicity, by convincing me that I am loved for myself alone. Say, dearest, is it granted?"

Anne's joy was too great to find utterance in words, but Howard read his forgiveness in the beautiful orbs that were raised to his. Then Anne laid her head fondly on his bosom, to hide the tears she could not suppress, but they were tears of happiness, and her husband wiped them away as fast as they fell.

The next day Mrs. Leslie arrived under the escort of Col. Ridgway, upon whom Howard had imposed the delightful duty of explaining all. At the solicitation of Howard and Anne, Emma Ridgway, who accompanied her father and Mrs. Leslie, remained through the winter, and a gay and happy season they spent. Howard's connexions and acquaintances being among the elite of the city, Anne was at once introduced to those circles of taste and elegance where her own accomplishments and refined manners so well qualified her to shine. But her greatest pleasures she finds in her own house, with her husband for a companion. Still she goes into society, as it is Howard's wish, and her pleasure consists in gratifying him. When she witnesses the respect paid to his intellectual powers by men of learning and distinction, and listens to his instructive conversation, displaying the results of varied reading and extensive travel, her heart swells with pride and happiness, and, could her thoughts speak, their language would be that of the fair Portia:

Though for myself alone
I would not be ambitious in my wish,
To wish myself much better; yet for him,
I would be trebled twenty times myself;
A thousand times more fair,
Ten thousand times more rich;
That, only to stand high on his account,
I might in virtues, beauties, livings, friends,
Exceed account; but the full sum of me,
Is sum of something; which, to term in gross,
Is an unlesson'd girl, unschool'd, unpractis'd;
Happy in this, she is not yet so old,
But she may learn; happier in this,
She is not bred so dull but she can learn;
Happiest of all is, that her gentle spirit
Commits itself to his, to be directed,
As from her lord, her governor, her king.

As a Benedict, Howard's felicity is complete.—Whether his happiest moments are spent amid the gay world, where the grace and loveliness of his beautiful wife make her "the observer of all observers," or at the romantic cottage of S——, which he has purchased, enlarged, and beautified, in an exceedingly tasteful manner, and where he resides the greater part of the year with his beloved Anne, listening to her musical voice, or kissing off from her sweet lips the name of Meridith, which she persists in calling him and he so loves to hear—the reader may judge. Two things, however, are certain: first, he did not make his will on his wedding day; and, secondly, if Indigent Single Gentlemen calculate on a maintenance from him, they will be most egregiously mistaken, as he has entirely changed his views with regard to a society for their support, which he once thought so philanthropic.

MARY'S REQUEST.

BY MRS. L. H. SIGOURNEY.

There was a shaded chamber,
A silent, watching band,
On a low couch, a suffering child
Who grasped the mother's hand.

She told her faith in Jesus—
Her simple prayer was said,
And now, that darkened vale she trod,
Which leadeth to the dead.

Red fever scorched her bosom—
Frost chilled the vital flame,
And her sweet brow was troubled,
As anguish smote her frame.

Yet 'mid the grasp and struggle,
With shuddering lips she cried,
"O, mother—dearest mother,
Bury me by your side."

"But where will you be buried?—
My darling Mary—where?—
In the green, shady dell you loved,
With earliest violets fair?

Or in the ancient church-yard,
Where we were wont to stray,
'Mid the white marble monuments,
My little Mary—say!"

But the thought of flowers had faded—
The green dell charmed no more,
Dim grew those marble monuments,
With all their lettered lore.

And one lone image lingered—
Bright 'mid the wreck of earth—
That love, with which her soul was knit,
Even from the hour of birth.

One only wish she uttered,
While life was ebbing fast—
"Sleep by my side, dear mother,
And rise with me at last."

'Tis o'er, the spirit parted—
With that long, tender moan—
Check not thy grief, fond mother—
Thou daughterless and lone.

Weep freely—Christ hath hallowed
The tear that nature wrings—
And see—how peaceful rests the clay,
That pain no longer stings.

Look! look!—the thin lip quivers,
The blue eyes open wide,
And what a hollow whisper steals—
"Bury me by your side."

And did the spirit falter
Upon its upward track,
To strew this never dying flower
In tender token back?—

Even at the gates of Heaven,
Whence songs of angels flow,
Remembered it the cradle hymn
That soothed its infant wo.

LINES ON A STATUE OF HIS DEAD CHILD.

BY RICHARD LANE, ESQ.

I saw thee in thy beauty?—bright phantom of the past,
I saw thee for a moment—'twas thee at time and the last;
And, though years since have glided by of mingled bliss and care,
I never have forgotten thee, fairest of the fair!

I saw thee in thy beauty! Thou wast graceful as the fawn,
When, in wantonness of glee, it sports along the lawn;
I saw thee seek the mirror—and when it met thy sight,
The very air was musical with the burst of wild delight.

I saw thee in thy beauty! with thy sister at thy side—
She in a lily of the valley, thou a rose in all its pride;
I look'd upon thy mother—there was triumph in her eyes;
And I trembled for her happiness, for grief had made me wise.

I saw thee in thy beauty, with one hand among her curls—
The other with no gentle grasp had sent a string of pearls;
She felt the petty treasure, and she child thee, though she smil'd;
And I knew not which was loveliest—the mother or the child.

I saw thee in thy beauty! and a tear came to mine eye,
As I press'd thy rosy cheek to mine, and thought even thou couldst die!
My home was like a summer bower, by thy joyous presence made;
But I only saw the sunshine, and felt alone the shade.

I see thee in thy beauty! for there thou seem'st to lie,
In slumber resting peacefully!—but, oh, the change of eye—
That still serenity of brow—those lips that breathe no more—
Proclaim thee but a mockery of what thou wast before.

I see thee in thy beauty! with thy waving hair at rest,
And thy busy little fingers folded lightly on thy breast;
But the merry dance is over, and thy little race is run,
And the mirror that reflected two, can now give back but one.

I see thee in thy beauty! with thy mother by thy side—
But her loveliness is faded, and queth'd her grace of pride;
The smile is absent from her lip, and absent are the pearls,
And a cup almost of Widowhood conceals her envied curls.

I see thee in thy beauty! as I saw thee on that day—
But the mirth that glanced'd thee my home, fled with thy life away;
I see thee lying motionless upon th' accustom'd floor,
But my heart hath blinded both my eyes, and I can see no more.

MY MOTHER.

TUNE—Mo Mere

My mother dear, a kind adieu!
Ere with full heart I part from you,
Knowledge in foreign lands to gain:
But, soon, I hope, to come again.
Your son from harm kind Heav'n will keep!
Oh, trust in God, and do not weep!
Oh, mother, mother, do not weep!

I see your anxious cares and fears
Suffuse your eyes with bitter tears;
For in your arms as I am press'd,
You seem just dying on my breast.
Your son from harm kind Heav'n will keep!
Oh, trust in God, and do not weep!
Oh, mother, mother, do not weep!

With knowledge fill'd and learned lore,
When I again approach our shore,
A man full grown with joy you'll see,
Mother, you'll then be proud of me.
Your son from harm kind Heav'n will keep!
Oh, trust in God, and do not weep!
Oh, mother, mother, do not weep!

BUBULCUS.

BENEDICT ARNOLD.

A SCENE FROM THE LECTURE OF GEORGE LIPPARD, ESQ., ON THE LIFE, TREASON AND DEATH OF BENEDICT ARNOLD, BEING THE THIRD OF A SERIES ON THE "ROMANCE OF THE REVOLUTION," DELIVERED BEFORE THE WILLIAM WIRT INSTITUTE.

There was a night, when an awful agony was passing in the breast of Arnold; the struggle between Arnold's revenge and Arnold's pride.

You have all seen that old house, in Second near Walnut street, which once the Home of William Penn, once the Palace of Benedict Arnold, is now used as a manufactory of Venus De Medicis, and sugar candies. That old house, picturesque in ruins, with battlemented walls and deep-gabled roofs.

One night a gorgeously furnished chamber, in that house, was illumined by the glare of a bright wood fire. And there, with his back to that fire,—there, looking out upon the western sky, gleaming in deep starlight, stood Benedict Arnold. One hand was laid upon his breast, which throbbed in long deep gasps; the other held two letters.

Read the superscription of those letters, by the light of the stars; one is directed to General Washington, the other to Sir Henry Clinton. One announces his acceptance of the command of West Point, the other offers to sell West Point to the British.

And now look at that massive face, quivering with revenge, pride and patriotism; look at that dark eye, gleaming with the horror of a lost soul; look at that bared throat with the veins swelling like cords!

That is the struggle between Arnold the Patriot and Arnold the Traitor!

And there, far back in the room, half hidden among silken curtains, silent and thoughtful, sits a lovely woman, her hands clasped, her unbound hair showering down over her shoulders, her large blue eyes glaring wildly upon the fire! Well may that bosom heave, that eye glare! For now the wife of Arnold is waiting for the determination of her husband's fate; now, the darkest shadow is passing over the Dial-plate of his destiny.

While Arnold stands brooding there, while his wife sits trembling by the fire—without, in the antechamber, three persons wait for him.

One is a base-browed man clad in the blue uniform of the Continentals. Turn that uniform and it is scarlet. That is a British Spy. He is waiting to bear the letter to Sir Henry Clinton.

That handsome cavalier, dressed in the extreme of fashion, with embroidered coat, red heeled shoes and powdered hair, is a nobleman of France; the Ambassador of the French King, the Chevalier De Luzerne. He has come here to listen to the offer of Arnold, who wishes to enter the service of the French King.

The third—look! A silent and moody red-man of the forest; an Indian chief; wrapped up in his blanket, standing there, proud as a king on his throne.

He has come from the wilds of the forest in the far northwest, to hearken to the answer of Arnold (the Death Eagle, as the Indians call him,) to their proposition, by which they agree to make him chief of their tribes.

Now look: the door opens; the three enter; Arnold turns and beholds them.

Then occurs a hurried and terrible scene.

While the wife of Arnold sits trembling there by the fire, he advances, and greets the Chevalier De Luzerne:

"Look ye," he mutters in quick tones, "Your king can have my sword, but mark! I am in debt, the mob hoot me in the streets, my creditors are clamorous. I must have money!"

This bold tone of one used to command, little suits the polite Ambassador.

"My King never buys soldiers!" he whispers with a sneer, and then bowing, politely retires.

Stung to the quick with this cool insult, Arnold—turning his eyes away from the British Spy—salutes the Indian chief—hark! They converse in the wild, musical Indian tongue.

"My brothers are willing to own the Death Eagle as their chief," exclaims the Indian. "Yet are they afraid, that he loves the pale faces too well—"

"Try my love for the pale faces"—mutters Arnold with a look and a sneer that makes even the red Indian start.

The chief resumes: "My brothers who are many—their numbers are as the leaves of the forest—my brothers who sharpen their war-hatchets for the scalp of the pale face, will ask the Death Eagle to lead them on the towns of the pale face; to burn, to kill, till not a single pale face is left in the land.

"Try me!" was the hoarse response of Arnold, given with knit brows, and clenched hands.

"Then shall the Death Eagle become the chief of the red men"—said the Indian—"But his pale face squaw there! He must leave her; she can never dwell in the tents of the red men."

Then it was that Arnold—who had embraced with a gleam of savage delight, the proposition, to become the chief of a murderous tribe of wild Indians—felt his heart grow cold!

Ah! how he loved that wife!

Arnold who in his mad revenge, was willing to sweep the towns of the whites with torch and knife, quailed with the idea of leaving that fair young wife.

"The Death Eagle cannot be your chief!" he said as he turned from the Indian. The red man went from the room with a sneer on his dark face, for the man who could not sacrifice his wife—the loved one of his heart—to that revenge, which was about to stamp his name with eternal scorn.

"Now take this letter to Sir Henry Clinton!" gasped Arnold, placing the fatal letter in the hands of the British Spy. And then Arnold and his wife were alone.

Then that wife—gazing on the noble countenance of her husband, now livid as ashes,—gazing in that dark eye, now wild and rolling in its glance,—gazing on that white lip, that quivered like a dry leaf—then that wife of Arnold trembled as she felt that the dread Rubicon was passed, that Arnold, the Patriot, dead, she sat in the presence of Arnold, the Traitor.

HENRY AND CHARLES; Or, Honesty and Dishonesty.

BY D. C. COLESWORTHY.

O, dark and fearful is the path
That leadeth man astray;
No blushing flowers to love it hath—
No greenness spreads the way.

He is a brother and a friend,
Who when our lot is low,
With pleasant words, will aid extend,
And wipe the tears that flow.

"Be a good boy, Henry. You are now fourteen years old, and I have made arrangements with Mr. Simonton to take you into his store. Be obedient to your master: in all things just and reasonable. I have confidence in him, or I would not consent for you to go from home. He will be kind to you and always treat you well, if you do your duty. Be perfectly honest, Henry: never take the value of a copper from your master, even if you stand in great need of money. If you do your duty and are faithful to Mrs. Simonton you will secure his confidence and the respect of all who know you, and become a useful man. Mind what I tell you—be honest—be industrious—attend strictly to your business, and never associate with the vicious and unprincipled."

Thus spake Mr. Jones to his son, who was about leaving the parental roof for a clerkship in a store. Henry was a dutiful child, and had received excellent precepts and good examples from his parents.

"I shall try, father," said the boy, "to please Mr. Simonton, and I think he will never have occasion to speak a cross word to me."

"You must do your best to give satisfaction to your master," said his mother. "Remember that you will have to put up with more inconveniences than you would at home, and that you cannot always do as you would desire. Endeavor to be obedient to Mr. Simonton, so that he will never have occasion to reprove you, and so conduct yourself that he will never hesitate to trust you."

With cheerful spirits and a happy heart, the youth left his parents and entered the store of the merchant. Mr. Simonton did an extensive business for the place, and employed another clerk, who was about two years the senior of Henry. His name was Charles Bedford. It was not long before Henry became the companion and friend of Charles—the latter could not help loving the former, he was so gentle and amiable in his disposition. There was a difference in the feelings of the youths. Henry was strict in his adherence to what he considered correct principles. He abhorred deception and profanity, and strictly observed the Sabbath by attending church, as he had been brought up by his parents.—But Charles would often evade and equivocate, and sometimes utter falsehoods. When he was displeased, he did not hesitate to make use of profane words, and as for the Sabbath, he did not believe in its observance, and would often pass the day in strolling about the streets.

The boys boarded together with their master.—One night as they retired to rest, Charles remarked:

"I don't see why you are so plaguey particular about what you do."

"In what respect, Charles?"

"In every thing. You won't stay at home on Sunday, you know, and seem to think it wrong to enjoy yourself on that day. I think as we are confined to the store all the week, there's no harm in enjoying oneself on Sunday."

"But I take more pleasure in attending church than I should in loitering about. In a good sermon I feel considerable interest. I also like good singing. I would not stay away from church on any account."

"And then, Henry, you are so particular to speak just so. I don't know as I ever heard you swear.—There is no harm in using a few trifling words."

"But, what good do they do!"

"Oh! one appears better to use them—and then they come in so easy, that I cannot help using them."

"If I cannot appear well without swearing, I shall be contented to appear badly. I know I shall never learn to use profane words."

"You will get over such feelings by and by. You'll never be thought any thing of unless you do, and there's another thing, you will not smoke a cigar.—What harm is there in smoking, I should like to know?"

"It does no good. I have heard it said that smoking leads to drinking, and that there are few if any drunkards who do not use tobacco in some shape or another. You wouldn't wish to be a drunkard, I hope?"

"No—and I never intend to. I don't exactly like your temperance societies; I wouldn't join one on any account. I like freedom from all restraint."

"I am sorry to hear you talk so. The temperance societies, I believe, are doing a great deal of good."

"You are foolish, Henry, to think so. But you will change your mind before long."

Thus the two youths conversed till they dropped asleep. It was evident that Charles had had a different education from his companion. His parents were of that class who look upon mere morality as a virtue, even though the heart be depraved. If outwardly the man appeared well, it was sufficient—and thus they taught their children.

For a few months Charles and Henry moved on pleasantly together, but a keen observer could have noticed the bad influence that young Bedford exercised over his companion. Being with him constantly, and hearing his conversation and observing his conduct, Henry by degrees learned the disgusting habit of using profane words, and was less particular in his observance of the Sabbath. He less frequently called upon his parents and often spent his evenings walking the streets, or in some improper shanty, where the rum glass was freely circulated. His mother saw the alteration in her son, but knew not to what cause to impute it. One evening when he called upon her, she remarked—

"Henry, where is it that you spend your evenings? You have not been at home for more than a week."

"I generally go with Charles Bedford."

"Where do you go?"

"Sometimes to one place, and sometimes to another."

"I am afraid, my son, that Charles is not so good a boy as he ought to be, and that he will lead you astray."

"So you always say, mother, when I go with any body I like."

"But, my child, I never speak unless it is for your good. It troubles me to have you away from home every evening."

"You no need to have any fears of me. I shall not go into bad company."

"I have known many a boy to be ruined by bad associates, and I fear that boy is not so upright as he ought to be."

Thus would Henry's mother talk with him. She was apprehensive that he would be led away by Charles and ruined. Her fears were not entirely groundless. Young Bedford was loose and irregular in his habits and had so insinuated himself into the favor of Henry, that the latter did not hesitate to follow his advice and example. Charles was in the constant practice of using profane words, smoking cigars and spending his evenings among those who did not hesitate occasionally to take a glass of cordial. Henry had learned to swear and smoke, from his companion, and every night he accompanied him to his favorite resorts. Once Charles took a glass of wine, and invited his friend to partake with him.

"I should rather not," said he.

"Come—don't be afraid."

"No—I don't wish for any."

"It will not hurt you. Come—come, drink a glass with me."

Stopping a moment to think, he replied—"I will not drink any to-night."

"You are foolish, Henry."

"Yes, he's a devilish fool," remarked the retailer; "and I'll be bound he has been to the temperance meetings and heard that cursed Dow, or that brawling Walton, or that notorious Joe Lord speak.—Drink away, Charles, and I'll drink with you."

"I am no fool, sir," said Henry to the bar-keeper; "but what use is there for me to drink when I do not need it, and have not the least desire for it?"

"Then drink to please your friend, who has so kindly offered it to you."

"Suppose I drink one glass, it may be the ruin of me."

"Who told you that story? John Crockett, I'll be bound to say. Let John look at home. He has enough to do to mind his own affairs."

"Who is John Crockett? I don't know him."

"You don't. He has been whispering in your ears more than once, that I can swear. Come, take hold and drink."

"Yes, don't be fearful, my little lad," said one who was lying upon a bench; "don't mind what the temperance folk tell ye. What do they care about you or any body else? All they want is power, to rule the State. Then they'll be satisfied. Come, my fine fellow," he continued, rising from his seat, and patting Henry on the shoulder; "take one glass, just to please us all."

"Do, Henry, do," said Charles, putting the glass to his lips; "there, drink. That's a fine fellow—I knew you were no fool;" he continued, as Henry took two swallows.

"I knew that youth was too intelligent," said the retailer, "to listen to the harangues of Dow and Walton. Keep him from their influence, and he will grow up a fine fellow."

After conversing for about an hour in a like strain, cursing the temperance societies and all who addressed their meetings—Henry remaining most of the time silent—he and his companions went to their lodgings and retired.

"What's the matter with you?" said Charles, addressing his friend, as he jumped into bed.

"What would my mother say, if she knew how I have conducted? I have tasted of ardent spirits to-night." And the poor boy could not help shedding tears.

"Your mother will never know it—and certainly, she would not object to your enjoying yourself, if she did."

"But what will it lead to? Who knows but I may become intemperate?"

"You'll be a fool if you do. Can't you now and then take a glass of wine or cordial, without being a drunkard? I pity you if you can't."

"The greatest drunkards commenced by one drop. If my mother knew what I have done to-night, she would not rest till I had left this place."

"Your mother is like the rest of the orthodox, always borrowing trouble, and always afraid somebody's going to be ruined."

Without extending the conversation, Henry closed his eyes in sleep—not, however, without resolving in his mind never to go into a grog shop again.

Early in the morning, as he was passing down the street to his shop, he met the retailer, who sold his companion the spirit the night previous.

"Ah, my little fellow," said he, "I was much pleased with you last night, and should be happy to have you call on me again. That Charles Bedford is a capital fellow. Follow his advice, and you'll make something."

Henry made but a word in reply, and entered upon his duties at the shop. All that day he said but a few words, while Charles appeared to be as cheerful as a lark. He felt he had taken a wrong step, and disobeyed a kind mother, and he was unhappy.

But, by associating constantly with Charles, the idea that it was wrong to drink a little spirit occasionally gradually wore away, and he objected less to go into the retailers' shops. With his companion, Henry denounced the temperance people as fanatical, and was as earnest in condemning their course as any of his associates. He now preferred the company of the profane and drinking to the steady and industrious, and often absented himself from church on the Sabbath. So much for the influence and bad example of a companion. His parents noticed the change in their son, and entreated him to keep aloof from bad associates; but they knew not the extent of his departures from their precepts.

After they had got through with the business of the day, and supper was ended, Charles and Henry went into their chamber, when the latter remarked,

"I have an idea of taking a ride this evening—should you like to go?"

"I don't know but I should. But where can you obtain a horse?"

"Say nothing, and I will tell you. On the floor of the shop, under the money drawer, I picked up a two dollar bill."

"It probably belongs to Mr. Simonton."

"How do I know that? I found the money, and it is mine. If you will go with me, I will hire a horse and chaise."

After a moment's hesitation, Henry decided to go. That evening, they spent the two dollars. Henry, by the request of his companion, handed the bill to Mr. Plummer, the stable-keeper, to take out his pay for the horse.

Early the next morning, Mr. Simonton took Henry one side, and remarked—

"I have often missed money from my drawer. It is unpleasant for me to accuse any one of dishonesty; more especially one as young as you are, whose integrity I never wish to doubt. But I must say, I have strong suspicions that you are not so honest as you ought to be."

"Sir, I have taken no money from you," said Henry, shedding tears.

"Look here," continued Mr. Simonton, taking a bill from his pocket-book, "did you ever see that before?"

Henry saw it was the very bill he had passed to Mr. Plummer the night before.

"Yes, sir," said he, "I think that is the bill I passed to the stable-keeper last evening."

"It is the very one, and it belonged to me, and you must have taken it from the money drawer."

"It was handed to me by Charles, who said he found it on the floor."

"A likely story. But if it were true, you knew that it belonged to me. But the story I do not believe. Charles has been with me a number of years, and I always found him trustworthy."

"Certainly is as I tell you," said the boy, [illegible] aloud.

"You should have wept before. I cannot consent to have a dishonest boy in my employment. I shall directly send you to your father."

"I am not so guilty, sir, as you may suppose, and if you'll try me once more, I'll be more careful what I do. I am sorry I consented to go with Charles, and would not do it again for the world."

"I am aware, Henry, if I turn you away—and for dishonesty, too—it will nearly ruin you. Who will trust you again? Where can you get a place?"

"It is this thought that makes me feel so; and I know my mother would not sleep if she knew this. If you will try me again, I will study your interest, and never be guilty of a dishonest or improper thing."

"Henry, you know my feelings towards you. I have felt a deep interest in your welfare, and have always been kind to you."

"I know it, and for this reason I feel so much the worse," said the boy, continuing to weep.

"If I should consent to have you remain in my store, you must turn over a new leaf to day. I understand that you have been in the habit of late of visiting the miserable grog shops in ——— street, and spending your evenings among the people who meet there to drink and carouse—and also that you have sometimes taken of the intoxicating cup. Is this true, Henry?"

"It is true, sir—I am sorry to say I was led away and over-persuaded to drink; but I will not do so again. I'm ashamed to think I have abused your kindness and have come to this. If you'll forgive me this once I will give you no future trouble."

"You know, Henry, I feel for your situation, and would not hesitate to retain you, if I were sure that you would be faithful to me and keep away from bad associates."

"Just try me, sir, this once."

"Well, Henry, as you are sorry for the course that you have pursued, and seem resolved to become a good boy, you may continue with me, and I shall say nothing about this affair. Henry, I wish you would listen to my advice, and never go near a grog shop, or spend your evenings with a gang of unprincipled youth. Use no profane words yourself, and discountenance their use in others. When you came with me, you were free from this charge, and I feel sorry that you ever associated with other than upright and virtuous youth. Guard your heart and your lips—watch against temptation, and you will grow up an honest man, to be respected by all."

Henry thanked his master for his kindness, and resolved, as he attended to his duties, never to do any thing that would displease him.

When Charles had an opportunity of speaking to Henry, he remarked—"How did you like the old man's blowing up?"

"I don't blame him. We have both done wrong."

"He said but little to me, and he'll forget all about it in a few days. Don't be so chop-fallen Henry."

"Mr. Simonton has been kind to us, and it makes me feel unpleasant to know that he has had occasion to find fault. We must try to conduct better in future."

"Don't be frightened too soon. We've done nothing out of the way."

"We have not spent our evenings as we should you know."

"What harm is there in enjoying ourselves? I shan't stay in the house for any body, after my work is done."

"I shall visit the shops in ——— street no more."

"The bigger fool you are."

"There is one thing we should look at, Charles. While we disobey Mr. Simonton, and visit improper places, we are injuring ourselves. Suppose we continue in the course we have pursued the last two months—what will be the consequence? If we accustom ourselves to smoking, drinking and swearing, the habits will grow upon us, and we may become unprincipled men and common drunkards.—We should look a little ahead."

"Enjoy ourselves while we can, I say. This is what I intend to do; but you are at liberty to become a deacon, if you please."

Henry did not feel like prolonging the conversation; but he was surprised and grieved at the language of his friend. He felt that he had erred, and was now resolved on a different course. In the evening, instead of going with Charles, he visited his parents; and when he retired to rest, he felt happier than if he had been with unprincipled associates. It was late before his friend came home. He remarked to Henry—

"I have had a glorious time this evening. I never in my life enjoyed myself better."

"I am afraid you have not been in good company to-night?"

"If you were not a ninny, you might enjoy yourself, too. Henry, why don't you join the church?"

"To tell you the truth, Charles, I wish I was good enough to."

"Ha! ha! ha!—so I thought. Well, every one to his taste, I say."

Young Bedford continued to grow more unsteady, and stay out later at night. He was generally cross and disagreeable, and began to find fault with his companion. So different were the tastes and dispositions of the two boys, that they now associated together but very little, except in the way of business. Thus a few months passed away. The leisure time with Henry was passed in reading valuable books, and in various kinds of study, to improve his mind. Charles seldom took a book or a paper into his hands. Mr. Simonton was still kind to the boys, and seldom spoke a cross word to them. While in his shop, they attended to the business, and every thing seemed to go on prosperously. One day, as Henry was sitting at the dinner-table alone—having been detained at the store later than usual—Sarah Simonton, his master's eldest daughter, a girl about eleven years old, came running into the room, and spoke to Henry—

"Pa has lost some money, and you have taken it."

"What is it?" anxiously enquired the boy.

"You have been taking some money from his drawer at the shop."

That moment the girl's mother came into the room and took her out, leaving Henry astonished beyond measure. He knew that he was innocent of the charge of theft, and without half eating his dinner he hastened to the shop. Mr. Simonton being alone, Henry stated to him what his daughter had said.

"It is true, Henry, that I have lost several dollars of late, and it is unaccountable to me where it has gone. Last evening I called Charles to me, and made inquiries, but I could learn but very little from him. Have you seen Charles with money of late?"

"No, sir, I have not."

"Have you had any money?"

"The last I had were the three dollars you let me have a week ago last Saturday."

"Have you the bills now?"

"No, sir; I have but fifty cents in the world."

Upon his stating thus, Mr. Simonton took him into his counting-room, with Charles, who had just entered the store. Being seated, Mr. S. inquired of Charles—

"Did you not tell me that Henry had some money?"

"Yes, sir—I thought I saw him put some bills in his trunk the other night."

"It is a mistake, Charles," said Henry; "I have had no money since the three dollars Mr. Simonton gave me, a little while ago, and my mother bought me some things with the money."

"What made you think you saw him have money, Charles?"

"I saw him put something into his trunk, and I had no doubt it was money, but I may have been mistaken."

"Now tell the truth," said Mr. S., turning to Henry—"have you not money in your trunk?"

"Not but fifty cents, sir."

"Have you any objection to let me have your key, and look into your trunk?"

"Do you not believe me? I tell you the truth."

"Just loan me the key of your trunk."

"I have nothing in my trunk but what is my own;" but the boy could not keep from shedding tears.

By his reluctance to let him have the key, his master supposed he might be guilty, and insisted on having the key.

"Well, sir, you may take it; but you will find that I have not been dishonest nor deceived you."

Mr. Simonton took the key, and went directly to the house. He opened Henry's trunk, and, after looking a moment or two, stowed away in one corner, he found a one dollar bill. With more grief than anger, he locked the trunk, and took the bill with him to the shop.

Calling Henry into his room, he said—

"I am pained to the heart to find that you have deceived me."

"Deceived you I have not."

"Do not add lying to dishonesty, I beg of you. It will be worse for you in the end. It is better to acknowledge the whole."

"I have nothing to acknowledge," the boy wept aloud.

"I found this bill in your trunk," holding it in his hand.

"Then it was put there without my knowledge."

"Henry, I am sorry to hear you talk so. For the last few months, I have put the utmost confidence in you. You remember your promise to me, when I concluded to keep you, and say nothing about the former affair? but I must dismiss you now."

"Say not so—it will ruin me."

"I have tried you, after I found you not to be trustworthy, and this is my reward. I regret you have done this, but I cannot keep you longer. You may take your trunk from the house, and go home to your father."

With his handkerchief to his eyes, Henry left the store, and went directly to his mother. He told her the whole affair, amid sobs and tears.

"Never mind, my son," said she, "the really guilty person will be detected at last. It is hard to be accused of dishonesty, but it will be best not to say a word about it. Mr. Simonton is wealthy a we are poor, and, if he were disposed, he could injure us a great deal; but he is deceived. By and by, when he knows who is the really dishonest person, he will not hesitate to do justice by you. Dry your tears, and for the present you can assist me about the house. Perhaps you can find a good opening in the course of a few weeks."

Mr. Jones exceedingly regretted what had happened when he came home to his dinner, but he whispered not a word of reproach against his son nor his master. Like a Christian philosopher, he remarked:

"Never mind, my boy, innocence will be vindicated in the end, while crime alone will be punished. Dwell not on the unhappy circumstance, but be happy at home, till you can obtain another place. It will turn out right in the end. Your motto always has been, 'look on the right side'."

When Henry took his trunk away from Mr. Simonton's, he went into the parlor to bid Mrs. S. and her daughter good bye, but they took no notice of him. A tear in his eye told how keenly he felt the slight.

"But I'll not mind it," said he, as he brushed the tear from his cheek.

In a few days he met Charles.

"What a fool you was," said he, "to leave that money in your trunk. You might have known the old man would find you out."

"I didn't put the money there, and you know it."

"I know it? Tell me that again if you dare!"

Henry made no reply, and passed on.

It was not a long time before young Jones obtained another situation. He went into the store of a gentleman, who, liking his appearance, asked him if he did not wish for a place in his establishment.—Henry was pleasantly situated with Mr. Roberts, and gave perfect satisfaction to his employer. He was attentive to his business, and took care to improve the spare moments of his time.

Henry had been in his new situation about four months, when he received a request from Mr. Simonton for him to call and see him at his house, on the following evening. Without hesitation, Henry called on his old master. When he was seated—Mr. Simonton and he being alone in the room, the former remarked—

"You may think it strange that I have sent for you, Henry; but I must tell you that I think I have done injustice to you. Until very recently, I believed that you were dishonest and lied to me. My opinion is now changed. Charles I believe to be the villain. I have missed money at various times, and a few days ago I accused him of being the thief, and I think I had sufficient proof of his guilt; but he used very insulting language to me, and during the day took away his trunk and went to the South, as I understand, in a steamboat that evening. Since then I have found that he was very dishonest. I have lost more than a little by him. Henry, I am sorry I treated you so unkindly. I think you told me the truth."

"Yes, sir, what I said at the time was what I believed to be truth. I never could tell how that money came into my trunk."

"From what I have learned of Charles, I have no doubt that he opened your trunk and put it in."

"I cannot believe that he would have done it."

"There is no doubt in my own mind. It has always been a rule with me, when I have wronged another, intentionally or otherwise, to ask his forgiveness; and it is my duty to ask yours, for I have seriously injured you."

"Say nothing about it, sir. With all my heart I forgave you a long time ago. I knew you had a wrong impression, and hoped the time would come when the real offender would be detected."

"Another thing I wish to say to you. I should be pleased to have you come and reside with me again. If you are not engaged for any length of time with Mr. Roberts, and will come with me, I will do well by you."

Henry thanked Mr. Simonton, and as he was always pleased with the general treatment he received while he remained with him, he concluded to go with him again. His present master regretted to have him leave, but finally gave his consent, and Henry was once more in the employ of his old master.

No man could be more kind to another than was Mr. Simonton to Henry. He treated him as a son, and favored him in a thousand ways.

Young Jones remained with his kind master till he became of age, and soon after, he was taken into equal copartnership with him. The firm of Simonton & Jones did as much business in their line as any two firms in the place. For moral worth, and sterling integrity, no men in the community stood higher. They dealt fairly and honorably with all, and were perfectly free from those contracted views and mean contrivances that make so many detested and abhorred.

In a few years, Henry had acquired some little property, and in a neat and pleasant part of the town he built him a neat and commodious house.—When his dwelling was completed, he married Sarah, the daughter of Mr. Simonton, than whom a kinder and more agreeable young woman could no where be found. She was well calculated to make him happy—and two more congenial hearts probably never came together.

Mr. Jones had been in business something like six years, when he took a journey to the South, partly for business and partly for pleasure. Among other States he visited, he went to Louisiana, and spent several weeks. One day, in New Orleans, he saw several persons gathering, and inquiring the cause, he was told that a thief had just been placed in the pillory. On his head was a paper cap, on which was printed in large letters the word volense. Henry thought the countenance of the felon was familiar, and in a moment it struck him that it was his old companion, Charles Bedford. He could not be mistaken—it was he. But the marks of degradation were on his person. He had the appearance of a man of forty-five, when in fact he was not more than thirty. A tear or two struggled down the cheek of Henry as he gazed upon the miserable man. On the breast of the thief was a placard, upon which his crime and sentence were written. He had been stealing, and was to stand in the pillory one hour, and then received fifty lashes. Henry waited and saw the punishment inflicted upon the person of the young man, nearly every blow of the whip drawing blood with it. Though a painful sight, he remained till he saw the poor fellow removed for the dressing of his wounds.

That day Henry called upon him, but he found him a miserably wicked and polluted being. Without at first making himself known, he remarked—

"My good friend, what has brought you to this condition?—if I may ask you the question."

"Intemperance and dishonesty. I have brought it all on myself."

"There is a chance for your reformation—why not forsake the bowl?"

"Sir, I am too far gone, now; I am houseless and friendless."

"None are beyond the reach of hope, while they can move and breathe. You may yet be a man again."

Seeing him in much pain from his chastisement, Henry left him, promising to call again in a day or two. But, feeling a sympathy for the poor fallen wreck of humanity, the next day he was at his side, with some trifles he had bought for his nourishment. The unhappy man appeared exceedingly grateful, and thanked Henry with tears in his eyes.

"Who am I indebted to for this kindness?" enquired he.

"I am a stranger in this place."

"Sir, I can never forget you. No other person but yourself has shown me any pity. I have done wrong, I know. Once I might have been something. I commenced early a career of folly; but I knew not the bitter consequences till now."

"You are not now too old to reform. Give me your word that you will from this time cease to drink ardent spirits, and become a reformed man, and I will see what I can do for you."

"Sir, your kindness astonishes me. Can I have one friend in the world? Is there yet hope for me? O, sir"—and tears checked his utterance.

"You have a friend in me, if you will do your duty."

"I will try to, with all my heart."

"There is one gentleman in New Orleans with whom I am acquainted. Upon my recommendation, he has agreed to take you as a porter in his store. If you are faithful, steady and honest, he will do well by you. If otherwise, I am to sustain the loss."

"A thousand thanks, sir. I will become a man again. Such kindness I never expected to see. Sir, what may I call your name?"

"Jones—my name is Jones."

"Jones, did you say?"—and the poor fellow looked up astonished beyond measure. "I once knew a person by that name—a fine little fellow too—would that I had been like him—but I wronged him"—and the tears again began to flow. "I will tell you what I did: I led him away from virtue. God forgive me—I took money from our employer: for we lived with the same man—and to screen myself, I placed a bill in his trunk—wretch that I was—and our master dismissed him as a thief. How can I be otherwise than miserable, to treat a kind, honest, and virtuous youth in this manner? What has become of him I do not know, but I trust he is yet virtuous and happy, while I am miserable and wretched. You are no relation to this Jones, who lived in a distant State?"

"I know him well."

"You astonish me."

"Charles, without longer deceiving you, I am the very person—don't you know me?"

"True as I live, 'tis he"—and it was sometime before he could speak—while the tears gushed in torrents from his eyes. "Henry, my benefactor and friend, forgive me! O, forgive me!"

"My dear fellow, you have long been forgiven. I never harbor any thing in my heart against a fellow creature."

For an hour they conversed together and each related the history of their past lives. Charles had suffered every thing but death. He had been degraded and miserable in the extreme. Several times had he been imprisoned for his dishonesty. But now by the kindness of his friend, he resolved to reform, and before Henry left the place, he saw him pleasantly situated in a store, where, if he should prove faithful, the prospect of a good living and something more was before him.

Henry returned to his native place after an absence of one or two months, and continued to prosper in his business. He occasionally received letters from Charles, who had faithfully kept his promise, and became an altered man. The last time he heard from him, he had been promoted to chief clerk in the establishment, and was about taking to himself a wife.

We have but little to add to our story. Though virtue for a time may be cast down, yet will she triumph at last. All should remember this fact, and let nothing keep them from the path of duty.

Kindness will work wonders in the human heart. When a man errs, reproach him, and you drive him farther from virtue; but be kind: persuade and encourage him, and you change his heart and save a soul from ruin.

THE ADVENTURES OF A BANK NOTE.

BY J. B. FOSTER.

It has become quite fashionable, of late, for persons who are possessed of any notoriety, to have a sketch of themselves and their adventures written by some friend. And, in many instances, where friends are not easily found, or their discretion not to be trusted, believing that some knowledge of themselves may be of advantage to the public, they have, with commendable zeal, and for the benefit of "unborn millions," consented, though with extreme reluctance, to favor the world with some events in their remarkable career, written by themselves.

While thinking upon this subject, I came to the conclusion that some account of myself might be interesting to the reading public, for I have travelled much, and in almost all kinds of society. I have been the companion of the rich, who looked upon me as only made for their especial benefit; again, I have, by accident, fallen into the hands of the poor, who wept for joy, while thinking that now, with my assistance, they could provide, for a short time, at least, food for themselves and starving families.

And I have concluded to write my adventures myself,—not that I have no friends, for I have many. In fact, there can scarcely be found a person who will not look upon me with pleasure; and, by many, my presence is hailed with joy. Nor am I only received with pleasure by all, but my stay, no matter how long, is looked upon as a matter of kindness;—and many means are resorted to by the not overscrupulous, not only for the acquisition of my important self, but for my retention, after I have once come within their avaricious grasp.

But there are many, I must confess, who would gladly depreciate my worth, and who make long harangues against me, and all my kin: decrying my power and popularity: and doing all they possibly can to injure my reputation and standing in society. Foolish men! they should know that if my reputation were gone, I should, indeed, be worthless—beneath the notice of any. Why, then, do they slander me? for all that can be said is not only an injury to me, but, in many instances, to the very slanderers themselves.

But I look upon such men as these as mere declaimers and hypocrites, who wish to revenge themselves upon me, for my absence from their pockets. For they will receive me cordially, and with evident pleasure: and that too many times in payment for the tirade of abuse just emanated from their shallow brain.

Therefore, if I trust to friends to write my ramblings, I shall be in danger of being belied. And, in place of a correct narrative of my adventures, my readers will be shammed off with a half-told tale: and that replete with fulsome praise, or mere twattle about my utter insignificance.

So, dear reader! (for dear you certainly are, or you would not read these, my lucubrations), I shall depend upon the friendship of none. For friendship, like the sun's rays, may be obscured, perchance, by the first passing cloud. Stifled by the first ill wind that blows: smiling only when all is fair: blasted, withered, and gone when storms arise and trials come.

The first circumstances appertaining to worldly matters, which I can recollect, is a sort of squeezing sensation I experienced, when first I received an impression. And I remember nothing more until I, with many others, was spread out upon the counter of a banking-house, in the city of New York; (this, and many other things, of which I was then ignorant, I learned after some acquaintance with the people of the world.)

My face was what some would call rather pretty:

then considered it much disfigured, having up-each side the character V stamped in black, and right through the centre of my otherwise handsome face was the word FIVE, in large letters.

A stout built man, with the rotundity of a New York alderman, and small grey eyes, that twinkled like an expiring candle, took me up: and after examining my face some time in silence, he exclaimed—"Beautiful impression! Nicely done! Rawdon, Wright, Hatch & Co.* are the fellows after all!—They do their work up in a style of elegance not to be surpassed."

He then wrote his name upon the right hand corner of my face, and, after again praising my appearance, handed me over to a tall, slim fellow, whose skin was as dry as parchment, and who carried a pen behind his ear, and continually muttered to himself some thing about per cent., interest, bonus, and other phrases which I did not then understand. He followed the example of his worthy superior, only putting his cognomen upon the opposite corner of my face, and, finishing the last letter with a flourish, which resembled the contortions of an anaconda in its dying agony.

I was then carefully packed away in an iron box, or safe, with many others, and for a time I feared that my life would thus ignobly pass away. But my fears were of short duration: for one day a man, rather past the prime of life, with care and anxiety plainly stamped upon his features, entered the office.

"Ah! how d'ye do?" exclaimed the officiating clerk, sticking his pen in its accustomed place behind his ear, and muttering to himself—"come after more money, I guess! Good enough!—devilish slack though. Must get good backers—his paper wont go here any longer."

The stranger approached the counter, and, presenting a paper, asked—

"Is that good?"

The clerk took the paper. "Good enough—short time, too, only thirty days—wonder where he got it? none of my business. You can have the money, sir." His last remark was addressed to the stranger, whose face lit up with a smile of joy, and he mentally exclaimed—

"I am saved!"

The clerk then took myself, and many of my kin, from our resting place, and, after counting us over one by one, as though he was loth to have us go, we were handed to the stranger, who, taking from his coat a large pocket-book, safely deposited us therein. He then returned the book to his pocket, took a pen presented him, and wrote upon the back of his paper S. Johnson, and left the office.

My master (such I call him, for I am the slave of my possessor,) walked with rapid steps until he reached one of the North River Hotels.

"Well, landlord," said he, as he entered the house, "how much is my bill? I must be off in the boat at four o'clock, and it only wants half an hour of that time now."

"Yes, sir, in one moment. Ah! by the way, is not your name Johnson?"

"Yes."

"Here is a letter left in your absence. I'll make out your bill immediately."

Mr. Johnson took the letter, and quickly tearing the seal, read—

"Dear Father—Hasten home as soon as possible. Our creditors are growing quite clamorous: and some of them have the impudence to say that you have absconded. I have promised them that if you are not here by to-morrow, I will then open the store (which I have kept closed since yesterday morning,) and let them take such a course as they may think for their interest. Come home, at any rate, for in a very few days money will do us no good.

"With many wishes for your success,

"I remain your son,

"I shall be there in season, and with money too," said the old man: "for I have got enough to pay every debt I owe. And when I am once clear, I will never trust to friend again—they have come near ruining me this time, and I will never put faith in man again. But my bill, sir—how much did you say it was?"

"Three dollars and a half."

"Very well—here it is. Good day, sir," and he immediately departed for the boat.

We were soon on board—the bell rang—and puff—puff—we were off up the river at the rate of fifteen miles an hour.

My possessor appeared to think of nothing but myself and companions, for he was continually putting his hand upon the pocket in which we were contained. This, by the way, he ought not to have done: for, if a person is noticed to be particularly anxious about the contents of a certain pocket, there are those who will take extra pains to find what the pocket can contain.

We had steamed it some five or six hours, when the boat, panting a like wearied horse, drew near the wharf at one of the pretty villages that rise, almost as if by enchantment, along the banks of the Hudson [illegible]

"You have come at last!" said a young man, as he grasped the hand of my master.

"Yes my son, I am here. Are your mother and sister well?"

"Yes, father, they are well, and everything is safe yet. But have you accomplished your object?"

"Yes," said the old man, and again his hand was placed upon the pocket as though to make sure that we were yet there. Let me get my baggage," he continued, "and I will accompany you."

Just then a hand was placed upon the pocket—it was not the owner's—he was in search of his trunk, or portmantua, and did not notice the liberty. The book was abstracted—and we were in the possession of a tall, well-dressed individual, who appeared to be anything but a pickpocket. But a fine exterior often hides the vilest sins from observation.

The merchant left the boat with his son; but we were no longer in his possession. How he bore his loss I cannot tell. It is probable he went to his house, greeted his wife and daughter with smiles, and was happy because he believed he had the means of freeing himself from debt, and making his home a pleasant and cheerful one. Alas! how keenly he must have felt the disappointment! Perhaps when the grief occasioned by his loss had somewhat abated, he informed his creditors of the loss of his means. Perhaps they did not believe his tale—called him dishonest—seized his remaining property, and turned him, with his family, into the street, homeless, and without the means of procuring a night's lodging. Broken hearted, and dispirited, the old man, perhaps, gave up all hopes for the future, and thus his family, which no doubt he once prized, was broken up, their prospects in life blasted, and all of them made miserable by the villanous act of my new possessor.

On sped the boat, like a thing of life; while the man in whose possession I was walked the deck with a complacent smile upon his features, well satisfied with his day's work. He had been below, and in a secluded corner of the cabin, counted his ill-gotten wealth.

"By Heaven!" said he "no small sum is this!—three thousand dollars is pretty good pay for one day's work. And how the old man will feel when he finds out his money is gone. He walked off just as though he was sure of it. Ha! ha! ha! I was enough for him that time. If he had wanted his money, he should not have been so anxious to let me know he carried something valuable in that pocket. Every time he put his hand upon it, it was just as much as to say, 'it's there, my boy! get it if you can.' Ha! ha! that was a good one."

So saying, he walked to the bar, took a glass of brandy, and waited impatiently for the boat to arrive at Albany.

As soon as that city was reached, my master ordered a carriage, and was conveyed to one of the best hotels. Here it appeared he made his home, for he immediately repaired to his room, which was well furnished, and ringing the bell for the servant, ordered supper to be served, which was soon done.

After supper he threw a cloak over his shoulders and entered the street. This time he did not call for a carriage, but walked rapidly, and seemed to shun observation. The street lamps were already lit, and guided more by their light than by a previous knowledge of the place, he entered an obscure street, and soon stopped before a door, over which, on an illuminated sign, were the words, "billiards, two tables up." Here he entered, and was soon engaged in that all-absorbing game.

It was late in the night when he left this place; and he had succeeded, by losing a few dollars, in getting nearly all his money changed. This was his object, for he was no gambler; in fact it was not, in his estimation, as safe a business as picking pockets. I still remained with him, and now, with no fear of the money being found upon his person, he was well pleased with his good luck, as he styled the theft of the merchant's pocket book. He had nearly reached his hotel, when he was surprised by a hand laid upon his shoulder. He instantly turned around, and a tall, brawny man stood before him.

"What do you wish?" he asked.

"Well," said the stranger, "don't treat your friends so unhandsomely."

"My friends!"

"Yes; don't you know me!"

"No."

"Don't be so short, for I know you do. Didn't we do that pedlar out of a cool thousand, and you had half of it?"

"Yes, yes, I remember; but don't talk so loud—what do you want?—tell quick."

"Oh, you are a fine gentleman now, and afraid to speak to me, I'll warrant. But never mind—I want money."

"I have not got any."

"Yes you have. I watched you while you were playing, and I know you got enough of it. I am run dry—so hand over."

"But I"——

"None of your buts. Money I must have, or I'll set the police to work. I tell you hand over."

"How much?"

"All you can spare."

"How much will you take and never call upon me again?"

"Five hundred dollars."

"I'll give you two."

"Not any more?"

"No—not another cent."

"Well, just look here. Give me five hundred, or I'll give you a steady home, and may be a rope's end, with nothing to stand upon. Will you do it?—Tell quick, for I swear I will have the money."

"Will you promise never to speak to me again?"

"Yes, unless you are cut down as poor as I am—then I'll help you if I can."

My master took out his wallet, and I feared that that wretch would have me. But no, he approached a lamp, selected a note next to me, and handed it to the stranger. He carefully examined it to see that all was right, and then, apparently satisfied, turned to leave.

"You will remember you are not to speak to me after this?"

"Yes—honor bright; I'll remember."

My master, with a muttered curse, returned me to his pocket, and turned to go, when he received a blow upon the head that sent him reeling to the pavement. The villain to whom he had just given the money, was standing over him, searching for his pocket book. A shout, long and loud—a struggle, blows—and the watchmen came. They rescued my master from his assailant, and one of them accompanied him to his hotel, while the others marched off with the prisoner.

The next morning the daily papers were eloquent upon "the unheard of outrage attempted upon the person of George Clark, Esq., a Southern gentleman who was spending the summer in that city. He was," they said, "knocked down by a villain; and had it not been for the bravery evinced by him, would in all probability have been robbed of his money, a large amount being at the time in his possession."

With this notice my owner was well pleased. In fact, I more than half believe that he had some hand in its appearance. If he did not, it answered every purpose, for it served to make a lion of him for the time; and many called to hear from his own lips an account of the bold assault. This he was very ready to give—stating at the same time that he had that morning received a remittance from the South, of which the villain was probably aware.

In a few days the trial of the robber came on. My master was called upon the witness stand. He stated that he had never seen the prisoner until that night—that the first notice he had of his presence was a blow upon the head—and that had it not been for the watchmen, he believed he should have been murdered. Suffice it to say the prisoner was convicted, and sentenced to prison. While I could not but think that there was little or no difference between the prisoner and the witness, only one was dressed in rags, and occupied the prisoner's box—while the other, dressed in a costly suit, caressed and flattered by all, swore away the liberty of him who, although guilty of crime, was no more so than his accuser.

My possessor soon paid me to the landlord, and for more than a year I met with no adventures worth relating—merely passing from one hand to another; one day with the millionaire, the next with the day-laborer. The fine lady mistress of a lordly mansion, and the kitchen wench, were alternately the dispensers of my humble self. But I was not destined long to remain in such an ignoble sphere, for one beautiful morning in summer I was paid to a young lady by a shop-keeper, in the way of change, and I really felt delight as she wound me around her slender fingers of snowy whiteness, and then deposited me within her bosom, which rose and fell with the aspirations of an innocent and guileless heart.

She had but just reached her father's house,—a splendid mansion—when a visiter was announced. I could feel my fair owner's bosom heave with emotion, as he entered the room in which she was sitting.

"Ah, George," said she, "I thought you had forgotten us;"—at the same time extending her hand, which he passionately kissed.

"Forget you, Ellen! No, never"——

But I heard no more of the sentence, I was so surprised at seeing my old master (for it was he,) so kindly received by an artless and confiding girl.

"When did you arrive?" asked my mistress.

How I wished that I had the power to warn her of her danger—to have told her that he upon whom she lavished her affections, was a villain, beneath her contempt.

"To-day: and this is the first call I have made."

"Thank you for the favor."

"And is thanks all I am to receive from my lovely Ellen, my plighted love?"

"What else, dear George, can I give? You know you have my heart's best wishes—in fact, my love is yours—only, wholly yours."

"It is my turn for thanks now," said George, as he pressed to his breast the lovely girl, and imprinted upon her blushing cheek a kiss.

"When, Ellen, shall the happy day arrive, that will make you for ever mine?"

"Soon, George; but my father still opposes our marriage."

"On the old grounds?"

"Yes; he says you are, or may be, a nameless adventurer, and that my property, left me by my uncle, has inspired your love."

"But you do not believe him?"

"Believe him! No. But he is cold and calculating. Write to your father, dear George, at the South, and have him write to mine; he will believe him."

"My father!"

"Yes; for my parent, (you know I have but one living,) thinks you are an impostor, and"——

"I shall not stoop to clear my fame from his malicious slanders."

"No, George; do not get angry with him; he means it for my good."

"It may be: but I must leave you now, perhaps for a week or two; and I hope by that time your father will have regained his senses. So good bye."

"Good bye," and again he pressed the lips of the lovely and confiding girl.

It was nearly a week after the departure of George. My lovely mistress was sitting alone in the parlor, thinking perhaps of her absent lover, or obdurate father. She sighed often, and placed her hand upon her head, as though to still her throbbing temples. There was a tumult of thoughts congregated there—for her father had just told her that she must never see her lover again. One moment she thought she would scorn her father's commands, and unite her destiny with that of her lover, let the consequences be what they might. Again her better nature whispered that he must be obeyed. While engaged in these thoughts the door opened, and a girl, poorly clad, entered the room.

"I have brought home your work," she said, addressing my mistress.

"Ah! yes, but why did you come in the rain?"

"I did not get much wet."

"But I was in no hurry; I should not have ventured out now."

"Not I, fair lady, only"—

"Only what?"

"It is no matter,—is the work done to your taste?"

"Yes, it is well done. Wait a moment—I wish you to make another dress just like this. Will you?"

"With pleasure."

She gave her the cloth; but still the girl did not offer to go home.

"Is there any thing you want?" asked the lady.

"I want—my father is sick—we have no—in fact, lady, we are poor. My mother is unable to work, my father has been sick for more than a week, and I came here as soon as I had finished that dress, in hope you would pay me for making it; for I can assure you we need it."

"Pay you? so I will, and would have done it before you commenced your work, had I known you were in want."

"Thank you!—I am not used to asking for pay before the work is done."

"But have you always took work to do for other people?"

"Ah! no, lady."

"I thought not. You have met with misfortunes, have you not?"

"My father has."

"Tell me how it was; for I take an interest in you, and will render you all the assistance in my power."

The rain had ceased, and the sun shone brightly out upon the trees and flowers that sparkled in its rays, as though their watery gems were glad to meet its smile. Yet, no greater was the contrast in nature, from the storm to the sunshine, than appeared in that poor girl's face while she listened to the voice of pity and friendship. They were sounds to which she was almost a stranger—and the kind words of the lady had brought to her mind the scenes of former days; and though she tried to restrain her feelings, the tears, in spite of all her efforts, coursed down her cheek while she told to her fair listener the following short but mournful tale.

"My father," she commenced was a merchant in a pretty village on the banks of the Hudson. By a bad speculation, he was involved in debt. He went to New York, and by great exertion forced the sale of property he had there to raise money to discharge his debts. He sacrificed nearly half of his property—that is, sold it for half of its actual value because he must have the money. After he had accomplished his purpose, he returned home, having enough to pay every creditor, and leaving him something besides, with which he could carry on his business. But, before he arrived at home, some villain stole his pocket-book—(I remember it well: it was one I had made for him, and expended upon it a great deal of time). But, as I was saying, it was stolen. My father was arrested for debt, our house sold, and we left without a cent in the world."

"But did you not try to recover the money?"

"We could not, lady—for father was thrown into prison and kept there nearly a year, and by that time we could not trace it."

"You have been unfortunate, really, and I will"—

Just then Mr. Clark (my former master) entered the room. How to receive him my fair mistress knew not. Her love almost impelled her to greet him cordially—but then her father's commands. She was not long left to hesitate, for her father entered almost as soon as Mr. Clark. The gentlemen bowed coldly to each other, and the father commenced—

"Mr. Clark, if that is your name (for I believe you have gone by another), I do not wish you to visit my daughter any longer. I have good reason for the course I pursue—and, sir, you will oblige me by leaving the house immediately."

"But, sir, you may be misinformed in respect to me, and my claims to gentility. Tell me what you object to, and perhaps I can satisfy you that you are mistaken."

"Well, sir, you say your father is a planter in a certain town in one of the Southern States."

"Yes, sir."

"Well, I have written to men residing there, with whom I am acquainted, and they tell me there is no such man as you have represented your father to be, in that section of the country."

"But, sir, I have letters from men probably well known to you, which will substantiate my assertions."

"I should be pleased to see them."

"You can, sir," said Clark, at the same time drawing from his pocket an elaborately finished pocket-book.

No sooner was this presented, than the poor girl, who had remained a surprised listener to their conversation, uttered a loud scream. All eyes were turned upon her, when she starting up, exclaimed—

"That is the pocket-book stolen from my father!"

"Who the devil are you?" asked Clark.

"I am—a poor girl"—

"A poor girl! What have you to do with my pocket-book? How dare you say I stole it?"

"I did not say that; but it is one that was stolen from my father."

"Liar!"

"Hold, Mr. Clark," said the old man; "I believe yur are a thief. Call me a liar if you dare!"

Just then they were interrupted by the appearance of a police officer, who seized Mr. Clark by the collar, exclaiming—

"You are my prisoner!"

"You have planned this to ruin me in your daughter's presence."

"I have planned it, to be sure, but not to ruin you particularly. My friend, here, (turning to a man who accompanied the officer), had his pocket picked to-day. He knew you were the thief. He followed you to my house, and informed me of the circumstances. I came in and conversed with you while he went for an officer. You know the rest. And now, Ellen, was I not right?"

"Yes, father, you have saved me?" faltered she, and fainted in his arms.

I was given to the poor girl, who hastened home and told her parents what she had seen and heard. In a few days I was paid to a lawyer, who I found was engaged by my original owner, to commence suit for the recovery of his lost money. But this I afterwards learned was unnecessary, for the thief acknowledged his crime, restored the money, and the last I heard my present master say about him was, that he was sentenced to twenty years' confinement in Sing Sing.

Thus am I out of the hands of villains and pickpockets, and my only wish is to pass the remainder of my days with those who, if they are poor, are also honest.

THE LOST GLOVE.

A Story of Domestic Life.

BY MARIE C. SUBLETT.

Gathered around the large fireplace of an elegantly arranged parlor, one cold winter evening, were a group of interesting young people. They had been spending a social evening with the master and mistress of the mansion—Mr. Weston and his beautiful wife—who had recently taken up their residence in the village, and of whom little was known, except that he was a young physician, eminently handsome, with a dignified and impressive manner. The young being who was his wife had been the talk and admiration of the village since her arrival in it. Rather above the middle height, graceful and elegant, her manner was so fascinating that few could withstand its influence. Her beautiful hair was dark chesnut, and curled in natural ringlets over her neck and face. With a complexion of dazzling fairness, and so very changeable, that many thought it too pale, while others co[n]ed that the deep carnation which sometimes her cheeks was unnatural, her eyes were so d[ar]k that it was but seldom their blue tint could be d[is]cerned. Then the thrilling glance of those eyes revealed an intellect of great power, and a heart f[ull] of warm and passionate emotions.

If the reader is tired of admiring our lovely hostess, and wishes to know the subject of the animated conversation carried on in the parlor to which we have introduced him, his curiosity shall be gratified. It was love, courtship and marriage—subjects more generally interesting, we believe, than any other. Some of the younger ladies, professing profound ignorance on the subject of courtship had requested a widow lady of the company to enlighten them, and she had just given her experience, in which she related, laughingly, that the gentleman whom she married had been, unfortunately, so timid and bashful, that it required much encouragement and patience on her part to enable him at last to make a declaration.

"I am sure that will be my case," said a bashful young gentleman present. "If I loved ever so devotedly I don't think I could ever summon courage to tell my love to the object of it—no, never!" he repeated, despairingly.

"Then you deserve to be an old bachelor all your life!" exclaimed a sparkling little beauty. A loud laugh followed this gay sally. Our bashful man blushed crimson, and the young lady continued, more seriously—"I do not agree with you, I think, if a warm attachment subsist between any two persons, nothing is more easy or natural than the expression of their feelings."

"I am just of your opinion," said Mrs. Weston, with a glance at her husband.

"Oh, Mrs. Weston," said the young lady, eagerly, "I am thinking your courtship must have been very interesting; you are so romantic, so beautiful, and so unlike others, that your love passages must have been very different from any thing we poor girls have any idea of. Now do relate it to us, my dear Mrs. Weston," continued the gay girl; "it will not only be intensely interesting, but it will be of use to a little unsophisticated creature like me."

This request was echoed by the whole company, but the lady playfully refused, until Dr. Weston said—"Suppose you relate it, Isabel; at least that part of which concerns the sleigh-ride."

Mrs. Weston laughed, blushed slightly, and consented. Her listeners disposed themselves to hear the relation of their beautiful friend, and she commenced:

"I was about seventeen when Frederic and I first met, and I believe our destiny was decided at the first glance. We did not see each other very often, nor did he pay me any particular attention, but I fancied that his manner was different when he addressed me, from what it was to others, and I was sure that when his eye met mine it expressed more than it did to any other. As yet, I did not acknowledge even to myself that I loved him, but my heart beat quicker when he approached. I trembled when he touched my hand. Thus several months passed, and our love remained unexpressed, save by that beautiful language of the soul which no one that loves can repress.

"One evening I had promised to attend a large party with Frederic. I was already dressed and awaiting him, when a vehicle dashed up to the door, and in a few minutes Mr. Ashby, a young gentleman who had recently come into the neighborhood, and who was reputed wealthy, entered the room in which I was sitting. He came to request my company to the party; and when I replied that I was under an engagement to accompany another gentleman, he said, 'I regret it extremely, Miss Isabel; but may I ask who was so fortunate as to be before me?'

"I was conscious of blushing slightly, for his eyes were fixed eagerly on my face while I replied, 'Dr. Weston.'

"'Oh,' exclaimed Mr. Ashby, in a tone of vexation, 'I suppose we must all give up to Weston; he is privileged, at least with you.'

"'You are very much mistaken,' said I, considerably annoyed; 'Dr. Weston is no more to me than you or any other gentleman.'

"'Well,' replied Mr. Ashby, 'I suppose I must believe you, though report says the contrary. Now do, Miss Isabel, prove your words by going with me this evening; you would not hesitate, I am sure, if any other gentleman were concerned.'

"This provoked me again, and I began to waver, for I was very anxious to prove to Mr. Ashby and the world that I was perfectly indifferent to Dr. Weston. Mr. Ashby saw my hesitation, and took advantage of it.

"'Be generous for once, Miss Isabel,' said he, 'and consent; besides, I am sure, Weston has been prevented from coming, or he would have been here before; it is already late, and it will require an hour to drive there.'

"'Oh well,' said I, rising gaily, 'if you think so, I will go with you immediately.'

...a few moments we were driving rapidly from the house. I was in high spirits. Conscious of acting ungenerously, I tried to banish my unpleasant thoughts by forced gayety.

"We had gone but a short distance when I saw a carriage approaching.

"'There is Weston after all,' exclaimed Mr. Ashby. 'Now, Miss Isabel, I shall discover the truth or falsity of those reports,' he continued, laughing. 'I shall watch you very closely as we pass.'

"'Do so,' said I, gaily; 'make use of all your penetration.'

"Before he could reply, we had passed the other carriage. Though we were driving very fast, Fre-'s eye met mine, and such a look! It haunted me for long months after. Though I was very wretched, I believe I succeeded in appearing as usual during the ride; but my thoughts were so painfully interesting that they were indelibly impressed on my memory, while the frivolous conversation I carried on with Mr. Ashby has long since been forgotten.

"I determined to apologize to Frederic, for he might ascribe my conduct to unworthy motives. Mr. Ashby was very rich, and Frederic was poor, and withal immeasurably proud—he would never forgive me—and all for a thoughtless though foolish act, which I was so bitterly repenting. I was relieved when we arrived at our destination. I wished to escape from Mr. Ashby, whose company had become in a few moments hateful to me.

"I will not describe the weary passing of that long evening. I looked around the rooms in vain for Frederic—he was not there. When would I see him again?—perhaps never. The thought was agony, and I repressed it.

"During the next fine day I looked anxiously for him, but he came not. At last I heard that he had left the neighborhood, to be absent several months!

"For a whole week, which had seemed years, he had been the subject of every thought. I had firmly resolved, when I saw him again, to confess that I had acted wrongly; but now he was gone—if he cared for me, he would have forgiven so slight a transgression—pride came to my aid, and before the expiration of the term of his absence, I had persuaded myself that he was forgotten.

"After the lapse of about four months, I heard of Frederic's return, and, in spite of myself, my heart beat wildly at the thought of seeing him again; but I blushed for the momentary weakness, and determined, if I must meet him, to be as cold and unconscious as himself.

"After this we met frequently, and treated each other as common acquaintances. I always tried to be gay and thoughtless in his presence, but it was not so with him; he was more grave and serious than usual, and I fancied that he was very pale, and seemed in delicate health. This idea was confirmed one day by the careless words of a lady whom I heard telling my mother that Dr. Weston intended leaving for the South soon, as he had been threatened with consumption.

"Then I knew that I had been deceiving myself: that he was as dear to me as ever, and in the solitude of my own room I wept without restraint. I felt utterly desolate—all hope of reconciliation was over—and I must in reality forget the past—the bright and beautiful past!

"Winter was approaching, and a heavy fall of snow was the commencement of merry-making among the young people in the vicinity; sleigh-rides without number, and that old-fashioned amusement, quiltings, were all the rage. Several young ladies were staying with me, and we had been invited to a quilting at the house of a friend, some miles distant. Early in the morning, some of the beaux arrived in sleighs for us. Dr. Weston was among them: a very unusual piece of gallantry for him—as he had almost entirely relinquished the company of ladies. After a gay discussion as to who were to occupy the different sleighs, and a thousand different opinions had been expressed, I found myself alone in a sleigh with Frederic!

"It had been so long since we had any intercourse with each other, that we were both embarrassed.—There was very little said by either of us, but I thought he was less cold to me than he had been since that fatal evening. Our conversation consisted of the most common-place remarks in the world—but then we were friends! Intoxicating thought! He had forgiven me! I knew it—I felt it—and when I sprang from the sleigh on arriving, I was the happiest being in the world. I am sure Mrs. Brown may thank Frederic for the small amount of work I accomplished that day: but fortunately some of the company proved themselves able quilters, for about dark it was finished, and then came the most delightful bustle imaginable—dressing, laughing and talking—for we were to have a regular ball that night. About eight o'clock we commenced, and danced until twelve. I will not attempt to describe a ball,—all of you have no doubt attended a counterpart of the kind.

"I had just wrapt my shawl around me, and was ready to depart, when good Mrs. Brown, our hostess, came up to me.

"'Why, Isabel,' said she, 'you are not going out this dreadful cold night, with nothing on your hands but them little gloves?' pointing to a pair which covered about half my hands.

"'Oh! Mrs. Brown, I shall not be cold,' I said, hastily; 'I can keep my hands under my shawl.'

"'No, no,' replied the good lady, 'you must take mine,' and she gave me a pair of thick woollen gloves, in one of which I could have thrust both my hands. She would take no refusal, and putting them on, I gave my hand to Frederic, and we soon left the door at a rapid pace. For some time, neither of us spoke—I suppose we were admiring the beautiful effect of the moon-light on the glittering snow.

"We had not proceeded far, when I observed that Frederic wore no glove on the hand which held the reins—it was very cold, and at last I ventured to ask him why he wore no glove on that hand.

"'I must have dropped one of my gloves before we left the house,' he replied; 'but it makes no difference.'

"'Your hand must be very cold,' said I, pityingly; 'take one of mine.' Mrs. Brown would lend me these great thick things. I am sure they are large enough for you or any one else,' said I, laughing; and, drawing off one, I handed it to him.

"'Oh, of course I would not deprive you of it,' he replied, with a glance which sent every drop of blood to my heart; and you must know that glances in the moonlight are very different from glances any where else.

"'Indeed, you must take it!' I said; 'you are obliged to expose your hand in driving, and mine will be sufficiently protected by my shawl—now do take it: I shall be offended if you do not.'

"'Nothing could be more dreadful to me than your anger,' he replied, in a soft low voice, 'but I cannot take it!' Then smiling, he continued—'except on one condition.'

"'What can it be?' said I, raising my eyes to his; but there was something in their expression which caused me to turn mine away.

"'That you will permit me to clasp that little hand, which I deprive of its covering,' said he, in a thrilling voice.

"I could scarcely speak, but pretending to think him in jest, I said, smiling:

"'But I am really in earnest; you must take the glove: I ask it as a favor.'

"'I too am in earnest,' he said; 'I will wear it on one condition.'

"I was almost dying with vexation—it would be unmaidenly—improper to accept his condition—I could not do it! Then his hand: it would certainly be frozen! For some moments I hesitated—but his poor hand looked so blue and cold that I could not refuse. I handed him the glove with downcast eyes, and a burning blush on my cheeks. Frederic clasped my hand with a look of ineffable tenderness, saying:

"'Forgive me, Isabel—and"——

Mrs. Weston ceased.

"Go, on! go on!" cried several voices.

"Oh! no," exclaimed the interesting story-teller; "I can tell you no more! Frederic may tell the rest."

But Frederic begged to be excused, and the young people were obliged to content themselves with an unfinished story.

THE CONFLICT.

BY MRS. H. MUZZY.

At night, when all was hushed and still,
The voice of anguish rose—
"Oh, Father! if it be Thy will,
Assuage my bitter woes.

"Restore my drooping lily flower,
My dying babe restore!
And I will bless Thy saving power,
'Till life's last throb is o'er.

"That marble brow, so damp and chill—
Those blue eyes, closed and dim!
Father! Thou canst, if 'tis Thy will,
Give life to me, and him!

"Oh! take him not—my hope, my pride—
My all of earthly joy!
Why, why should ruthless death divide
The mother from her boy!"

And midst her bosom's conflicts, still
At intervals arose—
"Oh, Father! if it be Thy will,
Assuage my bitter woes!"

Fainter and fainter grew the spark,
The quivering spark of life;
The feeble ray of hope grew dark,
And fainter grew the strife.

And still she struggled with her woes,
But now on bended knee,
And now at intervals arose—
"I yield him, Lord, to Thee!"

"I bid each rebel wish depart,
Peace! yearning love, be still!
Oh, Father! teach my stubborn heart
To bend beneath Thy will!"

All night she watched the panting [illegible]
And knelt in humble prayer,
And when approached the victor, death,
He came in quiet there.

And when the early dawn-light stole
Into that chamber still,
The mourner had subdued her soul,
To meet her father's will!

Kneeling in pallid beauty there,
Beside her first-born son,
The youthful mother breathed the prayer,
"Father, thy will be done!"

WHY SHOULD I LOVE?

BY THOMAS H. LANE.

Why should I love? Love can but be
A meteor light to one like me;
A gleam to gild a passing hour;
A lightning flash in summer's shower,—
A star that glimmers through a cloud,—
Or diamond clasp that binds a shroud;
Take from my heart the baseless bliss,
I dare not taste a draught like this;
The wealthless wretch should never try,
To win what wealth alone must buy.
Loved by a beggar! Woman's soul
Disdains to own the mean control,
Of one whose riches are but pride
And changeless truth! What, be a bride,
And wear no bridal gems, nor dress!
No, rather "single blessedness."
Rather, unloved, uncared for, be
A mateless maid eternally;
Rather a purchased, paid for slave,
Of age and avarice; or the grave;
Or rather death by dull decline,
Than share a goldless fate like mine.

REPLY TO THE LINES,

WHY SHOULD I LOVE!

There is a bright and peerless gem
Devoid of pride or art,
'Tis pluck'd from Nature's diadem,
Its setting is—the heart.
When Summer's sun is in the sky,
And all around is fair,
When fortune's gifts are flitting by
It shines but dimly there;—
But when the clouds of anguish lower,
When sorrow wrings the breast,
When pale distress asserts his power
Then, brilliant is its crest,
And can a poet doubt its charm,
Or say that love is bought?
Has he ne'er felt his bosom warm,
To meet a kindred thought?
Nay—sure 'twas jest when thus he vow'd
That "love's a summer shower,"
"A star that glimmer's through the cloud"
"To gild the passing hour."
Where then would be the poet's song,
Or rather—woman's muse?
For Nature's lords might deem it wrong
To advocate our views.
While they delight in tempest's roar,
We seek the flowery vale:
They on the Eagle's pinions soar,
We prize loves humble dale.
'Tis well—for in our gushing breasts
Love dwells—with truth combined:
Contentment there forever rests,
With one congenial mind.

DEATH TO BE FEARED.

BY L. B. PERT.

"It is not all of life to live, nor all
Of death to die"—this world is but an age,
A stepping-stone to vast eternity.
We live—to die whenever death may call
Our feeble bodies from this fleeting stage—
This fitful scene of brief mortality.
We live—endeavoring to satisfy
Those strong desires which never know control,
With unsubstantial forms of vanity:—
Like bubbles on the tide of time, we try
Its angry surge, till bursts upon the soul
In living light, its own reality.
Reality, how dreadful! to the soul
Of him who dies estranged from God;
Since true repentance scarcely wins the prize,
And firmest Christian faith but makes us whole:
Prepares our bodies for the silent clod,
Our spirit for its joy beyond the skies.
The carnal heart is enmity; it hath
No love for God, nor saving holiness.
So lost, so fallen is humanity,
That all have sinned, departed from the path
Of primitive and perfect happiness,—
Not one from sin originally free.
And though, to reconcile himself, God gave
His own beloved Son to die for man,
And promised life to all who would believe,—
Though, penitence, and love, and faith, may save,
Yet He has set his Awful Throne, nor can
A soul escape the judgment He will give.
Christ out of God is a consuming fire
To all, who do not faithfully obey
His law, confess his name, fulfil his word;
To all, who do not cheerfully desire
Salvation in His own peculiar way,
Through righteousness and faith in Him their Lord.
How fearful, then, to die, and fall into
The hands of God, the judge of quick and dead,
And answer, at that Awful Throne on High,
For ev'ry purpose, thought, and motive, too,
When, in His everlasting word, 'tis said,
Of truth, the soul that sinneth, it shall die.
And if the righteous scarcely can be saved,
Where will the enemy of God appear?
"They that are holy, shall be holy still,"
The wicked shall remain, with soul defiled,
Abandoned to eternal shame and fear.
And feel—the filthy shall be filthy still!

...E OF POCAHONTAS.

"Thou farewell, thou earth!
And loveliest spot of earth! farewell Ionia!
Be thou still found beautiful, and
Aloof from desolation! my last prayer
Was for thee, my last thoughts, save one, were of thee!"

SARDANAPALUS, ACT V.

One struggling sunbeam found its way alone, through the dim panes and heavy transomes, into a small and dusky chamber, where lay one whose vital spark was fluttering in its earthly tenement, about to be extinguished forever.—Within that narrow apartment, all was as silent, as though it were the grave of her, who was soon to be borne from thence to the last home of poor mortality. The floor was strewed with fresh green rushes, which, in that rude age, supplied the want of carpets, even in the mansions of the great; a faded curtain, once of gorgeous hues and rich material, covered the low couch, on which the attenuated form lumbered, as it would seem, in that feverish, uneasy sleep, which so often precedes the near approach of death; and a small expiring fire of wood was smouldering on the hearth, although the month of June was far advanced in its maturity, so needful was the aid of artificial warmth, to banish the unwholesome damps contrasted from the river. A wide reach of the Thames, glancing like silver to the evening sun, was visible from the windows, with the raking masts and long yard-arms of a caravel, that lay at anchor in the stream, tossing against the bright blue sky, as the short tides succeeded one another in quick rotation. Ever and anon, the cheerful voices of the crew rose high on the light air, and, at every recurrence of the sound, a shade of deep anxiety flitted across the brow of a young and noble-looking man, who watched beside the couch of that lovely invalid, with all of woman's care, and more than woman's love. His unclouded [illegible] eyes, were singularly contrasted by the deep tint which had completely overspread his brow and hands; and his dress partook of the style common to the camps or courts of the period, as well as of the ruder habiliments of a settler in the wilderness. Several large chests of foreign wood, banded and clasped with metal; arms of unusual materials and strange construction, were piled in the nooks of the chamber, or suspended on the walls; the bow, the hatchet, and the war-club of the Indian, hung beside the musquetoon and rapier; while baskets, moccasons, and girdles, decorated with simple skill by the natives of another hemisphere, were scattered among the highly-prized adornments of European luxury. From time to time, the limbs of the sleeper were slightly agitated; a light shudder, a convulsive groan, and now a few half uttered syllables, showed that she was on the point of awakening from what might have been too surely deemed her last repose on this side immortality. The anxious husband hung over her, in that uncertain state of mingled hopes and fears, which lingers yet in the bosom of affection, even when the reason is convinced that hope is now but self-delusion; she and again relapsed into tranquility, when a brighter ray flashed through the drapery, as it yielded to his trembling hand, and fell upon her feverish eye-lids. "John," she whispered, in musical but foreign accents. "Dear John, is it you?" A fervent pressure of her delicate hand, was all the answer that the wretched husband could return to the endearments of his dying wife; at length he faltered forth an inquiry, the loudeness of which, his sickening spirit perceived too well; he spoke of happier days to come, of the influence which might be exercised upon her spirits and her health, by the free atmosphere of her native land, to which she trusted they should be restored in safety before a second moon should wane. "Never," she replied, in soothing but yet sorrowful tones, "never shall I again behold the shores of my own lovely land; even now, the spirit is fluttering within my breast, ere it shall wing its flight to the land of souls. Raise me up, John, raise me, that I may look once more upon the bright sun, who is journeying at this very moment, towards the country of my fathers!" Silently he performed her bidding, and as he drew the curtain, to permit her eyes to look abroad for the last time upon the beautiful face of nature, the sunlight fell upon the tawny features of an Indian. Dark, however, as were those features, there was a world of thought in the smooth, high forehead, unshadowed by a single tress of the raven locks that were simply braided around her classic head. Eyes still swimming in unutterable tenderness, although the mists of death were gathering fast around them; a mouth, which might have rivalled in its voluptuous curve, the smile of her of [illegible] and a form, which though wasted from the fullness of its exquisite proportions by protracted illness, yet bore the traces of surpassing loveliness, would have rendered her, before the evil days had come upon her, a dangerous rival for the proudest beauty of European climes. Long and wistfully she gazed upon the declining luminary, while her husband, undaunted as he had proved himself in scenes of the most terrific danger, completely overpowered by the sense of his approaching misery, bowed his head upon her hands, and wept aloud. It seemed, however, as if there were some spell connected with the sinking of the day god, which had rivetted her imagination on the skies; and devotedly as she loved the pale-faced youth to whom she had plighted her troth in the far forests of the West, she had neither eyes nor ears for his sufferings, till the last verge of that disk had disappeared behind the hills of Kent. "He is gone," she whispered, after a painful pause,—gone to bless the land of my birth with his presence, to look down upon the lodges of my people, and upon the bones of my Fathers! He is gone; and when he shall again shine upon the white dwellings of my husband, Pocahontas will be in the land of Spirits. But shame to thee, John," she continued, "is it thus that a warrior, such as thou art, should look on that which he can neither overcome by force, nor escape by cunning. Thou hast often told me how he, who hath been my God, for that he was thine, died that all should live forever. Thou hast told me that the pure of heart, and the humble minded, whatever may be the color of their skin, shall be united beyond the tomb, in happiness that shall have no end, and love that shall know no separation.

All this hast thou told me, dearest, and all this have I believed! Can it be, that thou hast told me that which thou believest not thyself;—that thou hast taught the Indian girl to forsake the Great Spirit of her fathers, for a God whom thou dost not thyself adore?—Or, can it be, that thou hast not the strength to bow thyself in meet submission, which thou dost teach others? Oh! my husband, my husband, if thou believe indeed that we shall meet again, where-[illegible] head [illegible] eyes full [illegible] tall and stately figure [illegible] your [illegible] ...ppearing [illegible] slowly stole into the chamber of death. His bearing was that of a man to whom warfare had been a sport; his swarthy brow, scarred by the sabres of the Moslem, and bearing yet more recent traces graven by the ruder implements of savage warfare, was shaded with hair so blanched by years of toil, that its original color could be no longer distinguished; yet there was no symptom of decay in his erect carriage and sinewy limbs. The general expression of his features might have been stern and even harsh, but now their severity was absorbed in a deep though tempered melancholy. It was Smith, the sword and buckler of Virginia—Smith, the founder and the sole support of English dominion in America. It was Smith, who thus, contrary, as it seemed, to the ordinary course of human events, looked down in bitter but self-restrained sorrow, upon the premature decease of the loveliest daughter of the wilderness. When his mind recurred to the free and sportive being, who, just bursting into womanhood, had cast herself down beside him on the block; who at the hazard of her own life—a life which sorrow had never then embittered—had preserved him from a cruel and protracted death;—when he remembered her unchanged affection, manifested by a thousand benefits, proved in adversity, and strengthened by affliction;—when he thought, that perhaps, but for himself, who had projected her alliance with the young and gallant Rolfe, this amiable being, now fading before his eyes in uncomplaining agony, might yet have been carroling free and happy, as when he had first beheld her, in her unconquered wilderness;—his high heart sunk within him, and for a moment he almost felt himself to be the murderer of her, who had so nobly, so devotedly rescued him, the natural fooman of her race, from the very fate to which his policy had doomed, as it would seem, his sweet preserver. But again, when he listened to the pure and lofty morality, which in this dark hour, flowed in untutored eloquence from her lips;—when he heard the beautiful consolations, by which she strove to wean the thoughts of her lord from the hopeless present, to the blessed future;—when he heard her proclaiming her own steadfast trust upon the Rock of Ages, better and happier reflections occupied his mind! He thought upon the soul, which, by his humble instrumentality, had been brought from Pagan ignorance into the radiance and glory of that religion, which alone preserveth unto everlasting life; and there was an illumination, as it were, of joy upon his passionless features, as he drew near the death-bed of one whom he loved, even as a father loves his only-begotten child. "Well hast thou spoken, my daughter," said the old man; "well and beautifully hast thou spoken!—and even as thou believest, so shall it be to thee!"—"Father," she replied—"Father, I am going—and I believe, I feel, that you have taught me truly. Father, for the life I gave to thee in that dear land, which I must never more behold; cherish, and love, and be a father to this my husband, as thou hast been to me. My little son, too; teach him to love and honor that great Being, who has dried up all my tears, and given me power to part from those, for whom alone I have lived, without despair;—so shall we all once more be joined together, never again to part. Husband, thou wilt not forget the Indian girl, who left her home, her father, and her god, to follow in the steps of a stranger;—simple and artless have I been, unskilled in the graces of the pale-faced dames: but thou art my witness, husband, that I have never loved but thee! Rememberest thou that green valley by the waters of my native stream—rememberest thou the cool shadow of the pine, beneath whose canopy I first beheld my lord?—and wilt thou not bear my bones to that valley—wilt thou not sometimes lead thine Indian boy to the grassy tomb of his mother; and oh! above all, wilt thou not love him for my sake, dearest; and if he offend at any time, bethink thee, that his mother offended NEVER? If the hapless ignorant Indian should bend the bow, or raise the hatchet against thee, remember that he was the countryman, the kinsman of her whom thou lovedst once, whom thou wilt love always—wilt thou not, husband? Mine eyes grow dim and my breath fails me—give me thine hand—thou art going from me—husband!—my country—dearest—thou wilt not forget my country!"

THE SPIRIT BIRD.

BY EDWARD YOUNG.

The subjoined was suggested by the following incident:—While a mother was watching the cradle in which her infant was sleeping, a bird entered at the open window, and alighting on the pillow, sang a few notes in the baby's ear; then circling a few times round the mother's head, flew out of the window and was seen no more. The bird, (the mother says,) was of a kind she never saw before or since, and wears a rare beauty; its wings, particularly, being of a dazzling brightness. The child, who had heretofore been very healthy, immediately sickened, and in a few days died. However foolish the idea may appear to others, it would be hard to convince that mother that the bird she saw was a native of this earth.

Whence comest thou, oh! bird?
Bird of the dazzling and unknown wing,
Thou of the song which no ear hath heard
A bird of our greenwood sing.

From Araby the blest!
Where the odors from gardens of flowers in bloom,
Loaded each breeze that rocked thy nest,
With an exquisite perfume?

Or from some lone isle,
That lieth afar in the Southern sea,
Lovely and pure as an infant's smile,
Ere earth stains its purity.

An isle where the sunlight gleams,
Fairer and purer than gilds our clime,
On groves and meadows and silvery streams,
That never have witness'd crime.

Where man hath never been
To sully the air with his sinful breath,
Where never was sorrow, or tears or pain,
Where never yet was Death?

No! thou comest from none of these,
But from some rank swamp where noxious weeds
Infect with their poison the sweltering breeze,
Where the deadly serpent breeds.

Where the very air is fraught
With death to all save to deadly things;
There wert thou nursed, and thence hast brought
Its poison upon thy wings.

For thou can'st where an infant lay,
Hover'd awhile around his innocent head;
Breathed on him, chirrup'd, and pass'd away—
Next evening he was dead.

Grief thou dost ever bring;
Sighs and moans in thy train are heard;
Woe unto them who shall hear thee sing,
[illegible] fatal bird!

[illegible] SPIRIT BI[illegible]

Oh! my is Araby
And so [illegible] are the odors [illegible] bowers
And many an isle gems the deep blue [illegible]
Unknown to the rest of earth;

And, since the curse on Eden fell,
Many a spot on earth there is,
Where loathsome and deadly creatures dwell
But I come from none of these!

There's a land which never did man behold,
But that every mortal some day shall see,
Whose splendor surpasses, a thousand fold,
The beauties of wonderful Araby.

There flowers more fair than the buds of earth
Are ever in blossom; yet never decay;
And there that sanctified stream has birth,
Whose waters can wash every sin away.

And, oh! the music of that blest land,
That gushes in one never-ceasing song,
As the golden harps of the seraph band
Vibrate to the touch of the choral throng.

There never was sorrow, or crime, or pain;
There never was death; nor ever shall be;
For the breath of God is the air of that land,
And a breath of that air is eternity.

There the sun shines not, yet 'tis never night,
But day, brighter day than the earth hath known,
Beams, ever beams, in eternal light,
From the diamond steps of Jehovah's throne.

A seraph there was in that realm above,
Who had lost one string from his golden lyre;
'Twas the string whose tone praised a mother's love,
And he was banished the seraph choir.

Exiled, he came as a little child,
And nestled awhile upon woman's breast,
'Till he learned from the being that o'er him smiled,
How holy was that mother's love, and blest.

I came to tell him he was forgiven;
To tell him his harp had regain'd its string;
And how that the angelic host of heaven
Were waiting his welcome home to sing.

Saw ye not how the sleeping infant smiled,
When I sang in his ear that seraph-strain?
He knew that no longer was he exiled,
But that heaven was open to him again.

Then say not that sorrow and tears I bring,
And pain unto those who my voice have heard;
Rather, blessed are they who shall hear me sing;
Thrice blest are the called of the Spirit Bird.

I AM WITH THEE.

BY MRS. C. H. ESLING.

I am with thee upon the billowy surge,
In the still watches of the silent night,
My voice is mingled with the winds' low dirge,
Whispering of home, and all its calm delight.

I am with thee, when clouds above thee lower,
In the quick lightning, and the thunder's roar,
Thro' the wild storm a sweet mysterious power
Seems hovering o'er thee, from a far off shore.

I am with thee, when quiet stars look down
From the blue sky, like sentinels above
Placed by His will, who 'neath night's jewell'd crown
Sees the weak heart, and all its hopes and love.

I am with thee, tho' others may surround,
The other voices fill thine eager ear,
Altho impalpable to sight, or sound,
And yet, beloved, thou knowest I am near.

Yes, yes—the viewless links of that bright chain,
Length'ning with distance, closer round each heart
Tightens its pleasing fetters—and as twain
Making to each its nearer, dearer part.

Yes, I am with thee, whether in the hush
Of gentle night, whose voice speaks in the still
With softest music—or in day's bright gush,
Believe me ever—I AM WITH THEE STILL!

THE DESERTED NEST.

BY PAULINE A. BANGS.

A beauteous bird, day after day,
That broke my spirit's dreamy spell,
With such a sweet soft thrilling lay
As one might fancy, but not tell:
Which waked me at the early dawn,
Which lulled my heart to rest at even,
With strains so sweet at night and morn,
The song seemed less of earth than heaven—

An infant spruce chose for her nest,
That grew beside my cottage door;
Whose deep green fringe half hid its guest,
As happy as those youths of yore,
Who, after years' pursuit in vain,
To reach the Isle of Beauty's shore,
Crowned with success, forgot their pain,
Forgot their toil in that blest grove.

I loved that bright free bird; her lay
So oft had charm'd my weary heart:
I loved to watch her varying play,
And felt it would be pain to part.
Alas! my singing bird is gone!
In careless mood a veil I threw
Across the tree, to dry, one morn,
And frightened thus, sweet bird, she flew!

And thus I mused—may some rash word
Drive from the heart the love away,
That nestles there, like little bird;
Beware! and shorten not its stay.
Oh, tender are its mystic springs;
The heart is ours, alas! in vain;
If love's sweet sounds have left its strings,
We may not call them back again.
