PREFACE.

THESE Votes, beginning with the firſt Settlement of this Province, are now publiſhed under the Inſpection, and by Order, of the Aſſembly; they begin with the Meeting of ſo many of the Freemen as thought fit to appear, as they had a Right to do, by the ſixteenth Article of the original Frame of Government, or Charter, to the End there might be an univerſal Satisfaction in laying the Fundamentals, and eſtabliſhing the Government and Laws of the Province.

THIS Charter, upon Experience, was ſoon found inconvenient, if not impracticable in ſome Parts, and particularly in the too great Number of Repreſentatives returnable to the Provincial Council and Aſſembly; upon which a Second was granted, dated April 2, 1683, which continued in Force till after the Revolution in England, when the Proprietary had the Misfortune to be ſuſpected of too great an Attachment to, and Correſpondence with, the late King James, ſo that he was under a Neceſſity of concealing himſelf for ſome Years; during which Time the Government of this Province was adminiſtred by Colonel Fletcher, under the immediate Authority of the Crown. But in the latter End of the Year 1693, on a Hearing before the King and Council, the Proprietary ſo effectually cleared himſelf, that he was readily acquitted, and reſtored to his Government of this Province.

THE Proprietary being thus reinſtated, appointed William Markham his Lieutenant-Governor, who paſſed the third Frame of Government, dated November 7, 1696, which was enforced by ſome ſubſequent Laws, and continued until the preſent Charter was accepted by the Repreſentatives of the Province, in October, 1701, tho' totally rejected by the Members of the Three Lower Counties, which had been till that Time annexed to the Province, under the Name of The Territories; ſo that a Breach enſued, which at length terminated in an entire Separation; and the Repreſentatives of the Province, and of the Three Lower Counties, have ever ſince compoſed Aſſemblies independant of each other, as had been provided by this Charter, in Caſe of Diſagreement.

IN order therefore to introduce the firſt Acts paſſed by the Repreſentatives during the Time the Province and Territories continued united, and to give ſome Account of the Country, at that Time, ſo far as is conſiſtent with a Work of this Nature, the Proprietary's firſt Application to the Crown for a Grant, and the ſeveral Deliberations thereon till he obtained it, as well as a Report aſcertaining the Boundaries of the Lower Counties, between the Crown and the Lord Baltimore, are inſerted from authentick Papers and Records; as likewiſe the Royal Charter, and Deeds under which the Proprietary claims; and, in the Order of their ſeveral Dates, the Proprietary's Conceſſions to the firſt Purchaſers; the original Frame of Government, in 1682; and the Laws agreed upon in England; all theſe being previous to any Act of Legiſlation here.

IN the Appendix ſuch Acts as tended to unite the Province and Territories are added, and the two ſucceeding Frames of Government herein before mentioned, with the Laws relating to the Confirmation of the laſt; ſo that this may be conſidered as the End of our firſt Conſtitution, and accordingly at this Period the firſt Part of the Votes are cloſed. It appears by the Minutes of the Twelfth of the Third Month, 1707, that the Houſe were then poſſeſſed of King CHARLES the Second's Grant to the Duke of York, for the Three Lower Counties, but it is not now to be found among the Records belonging to the Aſſembly.

Part II. Page 171.

THE Second Part of the Votes comprized in this V[illegible]e, begins with the Provincial Charter, and the Charter of the City of P[illegible]ladelphia, under which the Government is at this Time adminiſtred, and ſo well underſtood as to need no Remarks upon either of them; but in regard to the Minutes of the Aſſembly, from the Time the Proprietary left the Province, in October, 1701, till the Beginning of the Year 1704, as they are very defective, that Time having been chiefly taken up in Diſputes between the Repreſentatives of the Province, and Territories, Care has been taken to ſupply that Defect, from the Minutes of the Council.

LETTERS,

Preceding the ROYAL CHARTER

Order of Council upon the Diſpute between the Virginia*ers, and Lord* Baltimore.

At the Star-Chamber, Third of July, 1633.

PRESENT,

Lord Keeper,
Lord Privy Seal,
Lord High Chamberlain,
Earl of Dorſet,
Earl of Bridgewater,
Earl of Danby,
Lord Viſcount Wentworth,
Lord Viſcount Falkland,
Lord Cottington,
Mr. Secretary Windebank.

1633. July 3.

This Order is mentioned in Lord Baltimore's Petition, Aug. 3, 1734.

This is a real Order, but determines nothing.

WHEREAS an humble Petition of the Planters in Virginia, was preſented to his Majeſty, in which they remonſtrate, that ſome Grants have lately been obtained, of a great Proportion of Land and Territories, within the Limits of the Colony there, being the Places of their Traffick, and ſo near the Places of their Habitations, as will give a general Diſheartening to the Planters, if they be divided into ſeveral Governments, and a Bar to that Trade which they have long ſince exerciſed, towards their Supportation and Relief, under the Confidence of his Majeſty's royal and gracious Intentions towards them, as by the ſaid Petition more largely appeareth. Foraſmuch as his Majeſty was pleaſed on the Twelfth of May laſt, to refer to the Board, the Conſideration of this Petition, that upon the Advice and Report of their Lordſhips, ſuch Order might be taken, as to his Majeſty's Wiſdom ſhould ſeem beſt; it was thereupon ordered upon the Fourth of June laſt, that the Buſineſs ſhould be heard the ſecond Friday in this Term, which was the Twenty-eighth of the laſt Month, that all Parties intereſted ſhould then attend, which was accordingly performed; and their Lordſhips having heard the Cauſe, did then order, that the Lord Baltimore, being one of the Parties, and the Adventurers and Planters of Virginia aforeſaid, ſhould meet together between that Time and this Day, and accommodate their Controverſy in a friendly Manner, if it might be; and likewiſe ſet down in Writing the Propoſitions made by either Party, with their ſeveral Anſwers and Reaſons, to be preſented to the Board this Day, which was likewiſe accordingly done. Now their Lordſhips having heard, and maturely conſidered the ſaid Propoſitions, Anſwers, and Reaſons, and whatſoever elſe was alledged on either Part, did think fit to leave the Lord Baltimore to his Patent, and the other Parties to the Courſe of Law, according to their Deſire; but for the preventing of further Queſtions and Differences, their Lordſhips did alſo think fit and order, that Things ſtand as they do; the Planters on either Side ſhall have free Traffick and Commerce each with the other, and that neither Part ſhall receive any fugitive Perſon belonging to the other, nor do any Act which may draw a War from the Natives upon either of them; and laſtly, that they ſhall ſincerely entertain all good Correſpondence, and aſſiſt each other upon all Occaſions, in ſuch Manner as becometh Fellow-ſubjects and Members of the ſame State.

Order of Council upon Clayborne's Peti

At Whiteball, the Fourth of

Lord Archbiſhop of Canterbury,
Lord Keeper,
Lord Treaſurer,
Lord Privy Seal,
Earl Marſhal,
Earl of Dorſet.

This is mentioned in Lord Baltimore's Petition of Aug. 8, 1734. and the Report of the Board of Trade (in January (February) 1734, is founded upon this Order, whereas there is no ſuch Order.

The Original hereof is in the Books, at the Board of Trade (ſuch as it is) being a blank Paper, never ſealed nor ſigned by any one, but put up in a Book amongſt Let-ters, Directi-ons, and o-ther looſe Papers.

Note, The very Original of this Paper was produced before the Committee for Trade, on Oct. 8, 1685, they then gave Lord Baltimore Time to find out an original or authentick Copy thereof; and he, on Oct. 17, 1685, owned to them, there was no Original.

Note, That was not for the Loſs of Books, for the Councilbooks of that time, nay, of that very Day, are perfect, and de-ny in Being, and of many Acts that Day a-bout other Matters, but not a Syllable of Clayborne's or the Iſle of Kent.

on a table, o which the host had spread a ori of bread, a slice of Brie cheese, two glasses, and a mea sure of what is called wine in the suburbs, and even in the interior of Paris. They conversed in a low tone, and seemed to feel a powerful interest in the subject of their conversation.

"'My boy,' said the eldest to his companion, 'thou haldest thy fortune in thy hands.'

"'How so, father Garnot?'

"'Look here—listen to me. All the houses on the side of Chaillot where he wants to build a palace for his son, are pulled down; thine is the only one left; he cannot do without it; comprehendest thou now? Eh? thou must make them pay for it—pay roundly.'

"'Indeed, thou hast reason; but tell me then, old fellow, how much could I demand? The house with the ground is not worth, at the most, above 400 francs, and that is a great deal.'

"'No matter! no matter! make them pay thee hide and hair.'

"'Let's see, could I ask a thousand francs?'

"'Peuh! Jauber: demand ten thousand, and I predict it will not be refused thee.'

"'But you dream, father Garnot, or you are already drunk,' replied Jauber, opening eager eyes at the discourse of his companion; 'ten thousand francs for a barrack that therestens every day to tumble down on my head!'

"'Yes, yes! ten thousand francs—nothing less. Think, too, he must buy it of thee.'

"'But if he does not buy it, eh!'

"'Then he cannot build his palace for the King of Rome; for, after the plan I have seen, I, who work on the building (Garnot was master-mason, and I often employed him,) after the plan, I who know all about it, thy house, my honest Jauber, falls exactly in the middle of the court of honour.'

"'All that is very well,' resumed the young man; 'but if he takes me, and commands me to pull it down?'

"'Let me alone, for if that happens, thou canst summon him before a justice of the peace, who will condemn him to build it up again for thee.'

"'Summon the Emperor before the judge of peace!' said Jauber, bursting into a loud fit of laughter.

"'Certainly! he must appear as well as any other man. Seest thou, Jauber, he may take as many kingdoms as he pleases, and it is no harm; but to touch the least property of his poorest subjects, berniqué! that is forbidden him; he will not thou pull down thy house without thy consent.'

"'Very well! But ten thousand francs, think of it, father Garnot—it is a big sum, that!'

"'To be sure, ten thousand francs, not a farthing less! Whereupon thou wilt lend me a thousand crowns I want for an enterprise I have in view; a thousand crowns I shall expect from thee; then with the 7,000 which will be left thee, thou may'st hire a work-shop at Passy, buy wood, get help, be master-cooper, marry Rosette—thou lovest Rosette—is it not so?'

"'Your daughter, father Garnot?—Certainly!'

"'Then, my son-in-law, do as I tell thee, and thou wilt be well off.'

"Jauber disputed a little longer with his future father-in-law, till at last, vanquished by his reasons, and dazzled less with the idea of marrying Rosette than that of becoming master-cooper, he gave up, and made Garnot a formal promise he would not sell his property for less than ten thousand francs. That point settled, our two drinkers separated, as much excited from wine as from ambition.

"The next day, with all his resolutions fortified by the reflections of the night, I received Jauber's visit.

"'As soon as he entered, I said:

"'Jauber, I have good news to tell thee. The Emperor wants to buy thy house. The building at double its worth, with the ground, is valued highly at 500 francs, and I am authorized to give thee a thousand; art satisfied?'

to offer three a thousand francs, and no ten thousand; I must, therefore, refer this to the Emperor. Return to thy labor; I will let thee know what he decides to do in this affair.'

"The day following, I informed Napoleon of the interview I had had with the cooper; of his unreasonable exactions, and the danger his majesty run in being cited before the justice of the peace of the arondissement, if he did not take care.

"'Parbleu!' said the Emperor, laughing, 'this is the counterpart of the mill at Sans Souci; but I am more fortunate than Frederick, for the famous miller remained master at home, not willing to sell at any price. If ten thousand francs will make the happiness of this poor devil, I shall not regret them: give them to him.'

"The same day," continued M. Fontaine, "I told Jauber the Emperor consented to give him ten thousand francs; so he must take out his furniture, for in three days I should send workmen to pull it down.

"Although Jauber was quite satisfied with the success of his demand, yet he persuaded himself, by degrees, while conning it over, that if he had named a greater sum, he could have obtained it as easily. With double the sum he had fixed himself, instead of being a cooper at Passy, and rolling casks into the cellars of that commerce, and the neighboring places, he could, he thought, establish himself as a manufacturer of casks in Touraine, Anjou, or Bergundy; and instead of Rosette, who was neither rich nor pretty, and whom he did not love beyond mediocrity, marry a proprietor's daughter, and have no need of borrowing money from him, but who, on the contrary, would give him with the hand of the heiress, handsome crowns, or good vineyards.

"With these ideas fermenting in his brain, he became ungrateful as well as covetous, and inwardly cursed father Garnot, who had spoiled his fortune, by estimating his house and land at only ten thousand francs.

"While reflecting upon it, he remembered there were no writings, and a word given might be retracted; consequently, he resolved to retract his.

"Such things were done then, (and now too,") he added, mischievously.

"When the men arrived to commence their work, Jauber, who had not removed a single article, forbid their touching his house, and sent them away. Informed of this, I sent for him again to know what he meant. He declared loudly and firmly he would not sell his property for less than 20,000 francs.

"'But did you not offer it me for 10,000?' said I.

"'That is true,' he replied, 'but you should have taken me up then; now I have thought it over, I want double.'

"'Is this the last price?'

"'Probably: still, I will not say. Let the Emperor decide promptly, or it may cost him something.'

"The same evening there was to be a grand reception at the Tuileries; I went. The Emperor, who was not fond of noise and crowds, yet knew these routs were necessary, did not help to animate these reunions, except by his presence; he would fix himself in a corner, and there often converse with his ministers and generals.

"When I entered the saloon of the Marshals, I saw Napoleon talking with Duroc, Bertrand, Junot, Lannes, and other military men; the moment he observed me, he called me to him and said:

"'Well, have you finished your affair with the cooper?'

"I informed him how matters stood; he frowned, and explaining the affair to those around him, turned to me, and with that brevity which characterized him, said:

"'Give him 20,000 francs, Fontaine; but make him sign the contract on the spot, lest the comical fellow carry his pretensions still higher.'

"But when Jauber, to whom the acquiescence of the Emperor was announced, found himself in presence of the notary, he declared he would not sell for less than 30,000. In vain the public officer represented to him how wrong he was acting—in vain [illegible], with all who were present, to make him [illegible] solution: he still remained unshaken.

"'How you talk!' replied the Emperor; 'to build the foundations of an edifice upon usurped soil, would not be building very securely.' Then turning to me, he continued: 'Go on with the work, M. Fontaine; there is much to do that will take time, and time brings about many things.'

"He was right: time did indeed bring many things; it first brought the Russian disaster, the glorious and fatal campaign of France, and at last the Emperor's abdication.

"All these events suspended the progress of the projected palace, and it was soon after abandoned; there is all there is left of it;" added M. Fontaine, pointing to the frame my father spoke of, "and I do not think I shall ever be employed any further in its construction, unless the King, Louis Philippe, should think of building it for the son of the Duchess of Orleans." (This conversation took place some months after the marriage of the Duke of Orleans with the Princess Helene.)

I wo[illegible] not [illegible] [illegible] fingers off, to oblige fifty Mrs. Goodrich.

"But you know, Caroline, that she has been a good friend to me, and I really would not like to offend her.

"Yes—yes. All that is well enough among common folks; but you have no occasion to work for such people now. Indeed, Ma would rather not have you take in sewing while you remain with us. We are rich, and it doesn't look respectable for people to run here with their work."

Amelia felt wounded, and made no reply.

"I see how it is," continued Caroline, in a tone of captious feeling; "you do not care so much about the displeasure of Mrs. Goodrich as you pretend.—You only wish an excuse to remain at home to receive that ugly Carpenter beau of yours."

"There, Caroline, you are at least mistaken. I do not expect Frederick Mortimer to-night. He has gone to visit his sick mother in the country, and it is uncertain when he will return—not for a fortnight, at all events."

"Well—well, I cannot abide him—he is so rough and vulgar. I wonder what you see in him to admire? Really, I would not have a mechanic for my lover, if I were never to have a husband—I'm sure I would not," rejoined Caroline, in a haughty and perverse mood.

Amelia bit her lips, and struggled for a moment to stifle some unpleasant feeling which rose up in her bosom.

"Oh, I suppose you will marry young lawyer Hamilton. For my part, I cannot look so high.—Frederick Mortimer is plenty good enough for me!"

A tear welled to her eye as she spoke—but in an instant she brushed it away, and composedly resumed her employment.

Caroline immediately left the room, and the remainder of the morning was spent in shopping and hearing all the gossip of the city.

It is necessary here, to give a brief outline of the history and fortunes of the two fair cousins, in order to the better development of our story.

It was the misfortune of Amelia, the younger of the two girls, to be left fatherless, at a very tender age, and before she had reached her fifteenth summer, her mother also was called hence for a better world.

Her father had been a merchant, but affairs had never prospered with him; and at his death, his wife and child became dependant upon their own resources for the means of livelihood. Her good mother then opened a millinery and mantua making establishment, and was soon enabled to support herself and Amelia, in comfort and respectability; and the fair young girl had thus an opportunity of receiving a good English education, and in her leisure moments from study was taught to render herself useful with the needle. Her mother, however, finding that the close application which was required in her business, was rapidly undermining her health, at length resolved to give up her shop, for employment less sedentary, and accordingly entered upon the active duties of keeping a boarding-house. Amelia remained with her mother, and devoted her attention to mantua making for such of her old friends and others, who required the service of her needle.

Among the boarders of her mother, was Frederick Mortimer. He was from the country, and sojourned in town to finish his trade, previous to entering upon the pursuits of life, on his own account, when he had attained to his majority. He was the son of a good could command. She grew up a beautiful, but a proud and haughty girl. She had received a fashionable boarding school education,—could draw and paint, sing and dance, hem-stitch and embroider, and was an adept in numerous similar accomplishments. But she had acquired very little substantial knowledge. True, she could read and write very well, but she knew nothing of Geography, or of those sciences becoming and proper in a female—especially in a lady of wealth and refinement—to understand. As to any idea of domestic economy, that was entirely out of the question. She would scarcely condescend to help herself to a glass of water, to say nothing of busying herself in household employments—assisting in dishing up a cup of coffee, broiling a steak, making a tart, ironing a collaret for herself, and similar little essential duties of a well regulated household. She never reflected that the knowledge of domestic affairs is an indispensible requisite of every female—the rich as well as the less affluent. But she was still young, and her parents could afford to employ "help," and therefore there was no occasion for her to soil her lady-like taper fingers in menial employments. Of course, the fair young girl was pampered and indulged in her every whim and wish.

She sprang up to the full maturity of beauteous womanhood, and was regarded as the reigning belle of the city. She was indeed a glorious and fascinating creature—not a grace seemed wanting to the tout ensemble of her personal charms. Yet, with all her perfections of person, she wanted a soul. She knew the power of her rare beauty, and made the most of it in her flirtations with her many male admirers. She was a trifler with men's hearts, and reminded me of the gayest, as a matter of bird does with the flowers, without ever having thought seriously of fixing her affections upon one object, if indeed such a heartless creature could ever really love. The folly of such a course at last made itself apparent. She had already rejected so many honorable and advantageous offers for her hand, that she began to be regarded as an incorrigible coquette, and now stood a fair chance of dying an old maid, notwithstanding the wealthy parent that Fortune had continued to wait upon her to the last, even up to the period of the conversation with her cousin, Amelia respecting the Ball, of which affair it is now proper to make some further mention.

Caroline returned from her morning walk in high spirits, and soon gave her feeble-minded mother a glowing account of her perambulations—upon whom she had called—what ladies were going to the fête—what dresses they would wear—what gentlemen were to gallant them on the occasion—with a thousand other little matters of gossip, which she had, funnel-like, received at the ear only to run out at the mouth. She had fairly talked herself out of breath, when the bell rang for dinner.

The whole of the afternoon was spent by her in precious beauty at her toilet. She tried on one article of dress, and then another, to see which most became her person. The one gown which she had ordered expressly for the Ball, did not please her—it had ribs and that fault, and before she was done, she quarrelled with her dressing-maid, who had dared express her opinion that it was really beautiful, and became her very much. Still, she could not arrange her things to suit her fancy. She fairly made herself sick in her anxiety to dress the richest and handsomest of all her fair acquaintances who were expected to be present at the Ball. At length, however, she had finished her toilet to her satisfaction, and really did look surpassingly lovely in her pure snow-white dress, with her hair plainly done up, and having a circlet, flashing with gems, around her beautiful forehead.

Soon the carriage rolled up to the door. Young Hamilton, in company with his sister, accompanied it. Caroline was assisted up the steps by Hamilton, and the gay little party proceeded on their way at a merry rate.

The large saloon was already crowded with beauty and fashion when they arrived. It was an enchanting scene. Flags and festoons were hung in gorgeous profusion around the walls of the room. The large chandeliers threw down and around a flood of mellow light. The numerous mirrors placed at the sides of the saloon, reflected the images of those present, and made them seem like duplicate forms of beauty and glory. The music was soul-enlivening; and fantastic, grotesque and elegant were the waltzes and quadrilles. All was gaiety and mirth.

Caroline was spontaneously recognized as the handsomest woman present, even amid a host of brilliant and transcendent beauties.

The elite of the young gentlemen of the city graced the festival, and among the distinguished personages who figured in the joyous scene, was the Count d'Aumaille, of La Belle France, who attracted general notice by his distingue air, his costly and superb dress, and above all for his splendid moustache, imperial and whiskers! His princely rank was at once an introduction to the good graces of nearly every fair creature present in that assembly.

He danced, and made himself so agreeable to [illegible] he had so many pretty compliments for his fair partners, that the brains of more than one of them were fairly turned by the honied flattery of his silken tongue.

Towards Caroline he was particularly attentive, and soon they were observed apart from the rest of the company as far as possible—he whispering suggared words into her ear, and she delighted and fascinated with his ardent devotion. From that hour, her heart was carried away captive. Hamilton was no longer the favorite suitor. The Count was the happy man, and Caroline gloried in the brilliant conquest she had made. She had never seen him before, and did not even know that such a character lived, until his appearance at the ball; yet she had actually fallen in love with him, and he had proposed to make her his bride, and elope with her to his sunny land and home. He waited upon her home from the ball, and planned all the arrangements of the elopement, which was to come off as speedily as possible.

He was a dashing, noble fellow, and made short work of his courtship. What romance, for a young American girl to be carried off by a foreign gentleman of rank! What a sensation it would make when they were married and gone! These were the thoughts that floated in Caroline's bewildered imagination. Her gallant lover had enjoined her to keep the affair strictly a secret—not even to acquaint her family with the happiness in store for her, until they were wedded and away—it would give the circumstance more eclat. Oh! sweet was Caroline's dream that night of future never-ending bliss!

She kept a coarse of the following day after the ball. She took tea with the family circle, as usual, and shortly after retired, apparently into her own room. Late in the evening, however, a man called at the door, and left a package, addressed to Caroline's mother. It was a rose-colored note, folded in the form of a billet doux, and sealed with white and gold wax, on which was stamped a pair of doves nestled among roses. It was a love-letter—a missive, and the hand-writing, too, could not but excite the curiosity of Caroline's mother. She broke the seal, and read with astonishment these laconic lines:

"Dear Mo—I have married the Count, and go with him to France. We sail from the city of ——. The coach is now ready to start for that place. I am so happy. Heaven bless you all—farewell!

Your affectionate CAROLINE."

This intelligence was like a thunder-clap to Caroline's mother. It was so unexpected, that she was immediately seized with illness, and it became necessary at once to remove her to her chamber. With all her faults, she was a fond mother, and really idolized her daughter; and for her to desert her parents thus was really very unkind treatment.

Her father, however, who was a man of very few words, and of exceedingly cool temperament, merely remarked,

"Sweet girl! She was always so full of romance! I hope he will make her happy."

A few days after the elopement, which, of course, produced a tremendous sensation among Caroline's circle of acquaintances especially, it was discovered by her father, that his name had been forged to a check for ten thousand dollars, and the money drawn from the Bank, without any suspicion having been excited in the minds of the officers of the institution. It now became rumored that the distingue Count was no other than an arrant impostor, an accomplished chevalier d'industries; and this conviction was strengthened into positive assertion and belief, when numerous tradesmen and others with whom he had direct and indirect transactions found that they had been duped and swindled!

Caroline's father now raved like a madman at his loss, and cursed not only the swindling vagabond, as he was pleased to call the Count, his son-in-law, but also his own child in the bitterest terms. But in vain were his imprecations! He had only himself to blame for allowing his wife to pursue a system of education and government in the rearing up of their daughter, which was as false in theory as mischievous in practice, and which had already resulted in their deep mortification, if not in Caroline's dishonor and shame!

The absence of Caroline from her father's house, soon produced a sad change in that magnificent mansion. Her mother never recovered from the illness with which she was pized on the night of the elopement, and, after lingering a few months, died, calling upon the name of Caroline. Her father, too, became sullen and morose, and seemed to brood over some secret sorrow which could not be alleviated. Two years passed over, when, by some strange influence or caprice, he married his house-keeper, and not long after gave himself up to the inordinate indulgence of wine, which soured even more than ever his disposition, and rendered him totally unfit for the rational fellowship of his female companions and friends.

Meanwhile, Amelia became the wife of Mortimer, and retired with him to dwell in a beautiful little cottage residence on the outskirts of the city, which he was enabled to purchase from the proceeds of his honest industry. He was happy in the love of his wife, who sought every means to promote his comfort while at home, while he exerted himself to deserve her affection and proved at once both a kind and considerate husband and parent, a beautiful bright-faced boy having now been given them, as the pledge of their holiest truth for each other. He continued to prosper in his wordly affairs, and speedily gathered around him many of the elegancies of refined life.—His wife made his cottage the paradise of earth. She taught the creeping lives to wander in elegance and grace over the portico and around the sides of the dwelling. The sweet blossoms bloomed in choicest profusion, in her carefully weeded and cultivated parterre, while the strawberry patch, and the shrubbery and trees in the garden, yielded grateful fruit for the enjoyment of this happy family, in their proper seasons.

Mortimer had plenty, and more than he required, of this world's goods; and the benevolent heart of Amelia knew how to dispense the bounties of Providence to the needy and worthy with her husband's sanction and commendation. But the more they multiplied their charities the more abundantly became their store of wealth. But their good fortune was yet to be augmented.

They had now been married over two years, when a stranger, who proved to be a gentleman whom Amelia's father had credited in his mercantile transactions, in the sum of five thousand dollars, sought out Amelia as the only surviving heir of her family, and paid over to Mortimer in her sight, not only the principal, but the compound interest of the money, amounting then in all to the snug round sum of double the original debt.

This Godsend was unexpected, but it produced no change in their dispositions and habits. They seemed to regard themselves as stewards, who would be called upon to render an account of the disposition of their treasure. They lived in ease and comfort, and enjoyed a circle of delightful acquaintances, among whom was the worthy Mrs. Goodrich, the grocer's wife, who always ranked the first in the esteem of Mortimer and Amelia.

Thus their wedded lives flowed tranquilly onward, like the woolly stream, with scarcely a wave to ruffle the placid ovenness of its surface.

Amelia had often reflected upon the singular fate of her uncle Warfield's family, and surmised in vain the destiny of her cousin Caroline, from whom no intelligence had been received since her elopement with the Count.

The third anniversary of the ball had passed and gone, when a poor distressed looking woman was observed to stand at the door of Caroline's father, and ring the bell for admittance. She was a pale, careworn, emaciated looking person, and seemed as one far advanced in consumption. She wore a faded and tattered dress of coarse texture; her shoes scarcely seemed to protect her feet from the ground, while about her head and shoulders was wrapped a shawl which had seen much service. She carried in her arms a small child, apparently less than two years of age, and vainly strove to suppress its sobs, caused evidently by hunger and the intense cold weather.

She rang the second time before the door was opened.

"Is Mr. Warfield at home," inquired the woman of the waiting man, in a feeble voice, and shivering with the cold.

"He's engaged, and can't be seen by the likes of you," said the man in an impertinent tone; eyeing her from head to foot.

"Will you not, tell him that a poor woman would speak with him a moment?"

"No! I tell you master is engaged, and I dare not interrupt him, Go away," said the fellow impatiently, and about to close the door in her face.

"Yet, stay! I must see her. Will you not call your mistress hither?"

"You John! Why do you stand all day at the door, and keep a body waiting so. Do you hear me?" uttered a harsh, squeaking voice within the hall.

"Here's a beggar woman, marm, who wants to speak to you."

"Tell her she can have nothing here. I declare we are run down with such people! Why don't they go to the almshouse, I wonder?"

"Do let me come in. I must see them. I will see my father!" replied Caroline, (who has no doubt been recognised,) in the energy of despair entering the vestibule as she spoke.

"Your father!" exclaimed the servant in surprise, and then breaking out into a forced laugh, he continued: "Your father! Lor' bless me, that's a good 'un."

"What's that! What did she say? Her father!—Let me see her!" responded the house-keeper-wife, as she now ran to the door, and peered inquisitively into Caroline's face.

"Who are you? What do you want?" the woman inquired.

"I am Caroline Warfield. Do inform my parents that I am here," uttered Caroline, vexed at the treatment she received—for she knew not of the changes which had taken place in her absence.

"Indeed, I will not. You are an impudent impostor. Caroline is dead this long time. She ran off with a rogue, and broke her mother's heart—she did!"

"Why, Barbary! is it you? Do you not know me? Am I really so much altered?"

"Don't Barbary me! I'm housekeeper no longer. I'm your mother—Mrs. Warfield, I mean—let me tell you that!" said that important personage, stretching up herself with an air of consequence.

"You! Surely I dream! No—no! It cannot be! Oh, my father, I will die if I do not see him."

"I say you cannot see him. Here, John, put her out! Graceless hussy! Caroline, indeed! Think I wouldn't know her? Leave the house, I say!"

The servant man was about to lay forcible hands upon Caroline, when she gave him a scowling look, and left the house. She heard the key turned in the door upon her,

She seated herself upon the steps a few moments, and wept. Suddenly a thought passed over her mind, a slight smile came over her countenance, and she arose and went away. Her cousin Amelia suggested herself to her memory, and she immediately resolved to search her out, feeling assured of a kinder reception from her gentleness and affection.

She wandered along, but was soon directed to Mrs. Goodrich's house, and from her learned of Amelia, without making herself known to any one.

It was in the dusk of the evening when she reached the portico of Mortimer's pleasant home. She knocked, and was at once admitted into the room where Amelia sat in front of a cheerful fire, in conversation with her husband. She rose promptly to meet the stranger, and placed a chair for her near the fire.

Caroline was stiff with the cold, and faint from the want of food. She staggered into the seat without being able to open her lips. She recovered herself in a few moments, and spoke.

"Pardon, kind madam, this intrusion. I have come!"——

"Surely that voice! That pale face!" interrupted Amelia, as the shawl fell from Caroline's face, and revealed her countenance. "It is—it is Caroline—my dear cousin Caroline!"

"Amelia!"

The cousins were locked in each other's arms, and ardent was the greeting.

"Oh, Amelia! you are too kind not to spurn me from you. I do not deserve your affection."

"Dear Caroline, do not speak thus. I am so happy to see you!" And snatching up her cousin's little girl in her arms, Amelia exclaimed—"What a pretty sweet child it is! Poor thing, it must have suffered much."

It is needless to detail all that then passed between the two relatives. Amelia proved at once by her assiduous attentions to the wants of her distressed cousin, how glad she was to see her again, while Mortimer strove to revive her spirits by his affable manners and lively conversation.

In a few moments Amelia had conducted Caroline into her own room, where she provided her with apparel becoming her former station, and soon was rejoiced to find, that although she was quite ill, and dejected in spirits, she still retained much of her original beauty of appearance. Meanwhile a good dish of coffee was prepared, with suitable relishes, and the whole party sat down to the supper table, with a sensation of joy and happiness, which added greatly to the zest of the repast. Even the two little children, Amelia's boy and Caroline's girl, seemed to unite in the pleasure of their parents. They were soon on familiar terms, and the house fairly resounded with their innocent and frolicsome mirth.

The evening advanced, and at length Amelia conducted Caroline to her sleeping apartment, where they again embraced each other and separated for the night. When Caroline was left to herself, her feelings overflowed in tears. She now found herself surrounded by nearly all the comforts she had known in her father's house. The fine warm bed, and all the luxuries of an elegant toilet and sleeping-room, called up the associations of former times, and caused her to reflect upon her own reckless and infatuated course of conduct, which had brought first misery and humiliation, and now heart-felt repentance of her follies. The Caroline of the present hour—how different from the proud belle in her days of sunshine and prosperity. Ah! bitter were the lessons of experience, but they were not without profitable instruction.

Hard indeed had been the lot of Caroline. Within four-and-twenty hours after her elopement from home with an entire stranger, she discovered how shamefully she had been deceived. Her husband, instead of a princely gentleman and lover, proved to be no other than Harvey Butler, a former footman in her father's house. He had conceived a violent passion for her, but dared not declare it while serving in a menial capacity in the same dwelling with herself. He was a singular compound of intelligence, assurance, and roguery, and a shrewd observer of men and things. He had acquired various arts and cunning devices—such as legerdemain and ventriloquism—and could assume almost any character, and mimic the human voice to a nicety. He saw how hopeless it was to aspire to the hand of the proud and beautiful girl, under the circumstances in which he was then situated; but the ardor of his passion soon suggested the means to enable him to carry out his purpose, and win her as his bride. He left her father's employ—retired awhile from the city—and finally returned in the character of a Count. His appearance at the ball, and the success of his stratagem, are already known.

On that eventful night, he met Caroline at the foot of her father's garden, and repaired with her at once to a clergyman's dwelling, where the marriage ceremony was performed—although, it is proper to state, in his impatience to fly, he strongly urged the bewildered girl not then to delay for the ceremony of the priest, but happily for her, she refused to acquiesce, and was saved from dishonor.

The coach and four rolled rapidly away; and after a number of hours of fast driving, stopped for the night, at an obscure tavern, some fifty miles or so from her native city. The pretended Count preserved his incognito entirely unsuspected until the following morning, when he boldly threw off his disguise, and revealed his true character; and moreover, avowed the perpetration of the forgery, by which her father had been wronged. The horror and indignation of Caroline may be readily conceived. A sense of burning shame, and a spirit of revenge, alternately swayed her feelings. Her husband told her that she might return back to her father's house, if she preferred so doing; but that he loved her truly and devotedly, and that for her sake, he had made himself a villain and a fugitive.

The step had been taken, and it was now too late to retrieve her error. The tears filled her eyes, and bitter were her feelings. She knew not how to act. She loathed the very sight of her betrayer, but she could not bear the thought of returning back, and he laughed and jeered at her for having eloped with her father's footman! That idea was terrible! Poor Caroline! The opinion of the world, or what others would say of her imprudence, influenced her mind more than her sense of what was her duty under the embarrassing situation, and she finally allowed herself to be disposed of by her husband as he pleased. He hurried on with her to the next sea port, where he chartered the entire cabin of a packet vessel, and was soon on the voyage to a distant and strange land.

The conduct of Butler towards his wife, on the voyage, and for a long time afterwards, was all kindness and attention. He seemed really anxious and solicitous for her welfare. He protested that he loved her dearer than his life, and adduced as evidence in this respect, the stratagem he had devised to secure her to himself. Strange is woman's heart! Caroline's feelings gradually warmed in his favor; and as his conduct was now all that she could expect of him, she made up her mind resolutely to her apparent destiny, and thenceforth strove to fulfil the duties of a wife as far as it was in her power.

He found a new home for her among strangers, and made it the abode of comparative comfort and happiness for weeks and for months; but gradually his conduct changed towards Caroline—his habits became dissolute—his house was often deserted for the gaming table and its kindred vices—and finally he was brought home to his wife, a murdered, bleeding corpse! He had quarrelled over his wine with a character as reckless as himself, when he received the poignard wound which caused his death!

Caroline had long watched his headlong career, and sought by her love and gentle persuasion to wean him from dissipation and crime. But in vain. He gave himself up eventually to his debased inclinations, and left her in poverty, humiliation and wo. Her only remaining affection now centred in her beautiful child, and yearning for the kindred sympathies of her native home, she resolved to return and throw herself at her parents' feet, trusting to their love for pity and forgiveness.

Amelia and her husband were deeply interested in the recital of Caroline's story of suffering and deprivations: they administered the oil of consolation, and soon the crushed soul became in a degree cheerful and buoyant.

Caroline's dearest wish was now to see and be reconciled to her father, and Amelia undertook to bring about an interview between them, although it had been a long while since she herself had visited her uncle's dwelling—for he had kept himself entirely secluded from society, and the receptions which his housekeeper-wife had always given her, were unpleasant and mortifying.

She accordingly accompanied Caroline and her child to Warfield's dwelling. She had dressed the child with exceeding taste, and felt that her pleasing gentleness would prove a powerful pleader to soften the grandfather's heart, should it be found that it was insensible to the ties of natural affection. Her heart leapt in joy of the blissful moment which would reconcile a father to his erring child. She anticipated the gushing forth anew of the wells of love and kindly sympathies, after having been so long dried up even to their inmost fountains.

Fortunately, Caroline's step-mother was from home, and the little party found no difficulty in gaining access to the old man's presence. Caroline remained without the door while Amelia and the child entered the apartment. He was seated in a cushioned arm-chair, with his head reclining back and eyes directed towards the ceiling, and with one gouty foot placed upon an easy stool before him. He seemed to be buried in deep contemplation, and Amelia felt reluctant to disturb his musings. She, however, recollected the importance of her errand, and rushed forward and threw herself at her uncle's feet.

"My dear, dear uncle, I am so happy to see you. I am sure you will pardon my intrusion—I have much good news for you," said the warm-hearted Amelia, seizing her uncle's hand and kissing it with enthusiastic fervor.

"How now! Why, are you mad? I want no company: leave me," he replied, in a rough voice and petulant manner, twisting uneasily in his chair as he spoke.

"No, dear uncle: you will not have me to leave you! I have such news. Caroline—our Caroline has returned, and yearns to embrace her dear old father once more!"

"I will not see her! She is no daughter of mine. Why did she run away with that swindling foreigner? I disown her for ever! Heaven's curse on her!—she must not come here!"

"Oh, uncle! do not be so cruel to your poor child," replied Amelia, with tears and a full heart; "Oh, she has suffered much—do permit me to bring your penitent Caroline to you! See! here is her child—a sweet, gentle creature! here, uncle, kiss your grand child—you will not spurn her from you!"

The appeal touched the old man's heart. Its iciness was thawed by the warmth of returning love, and tears gushed into his eyes.

"Yes—yes! I must love her. My child! my child! Poor innocent thing!"

He clasped her to his bosom and kissed her again and again in the transport of his joy.

"I am happy—happy now! Where is my sweet girl—my Caroline? Let her come to her old father's arms. I am so happy—so happy!"

"She is here!" said Caroline, as she threw open the door, and rushed into her father's room. Holy and pure was that embrace of father and child!

But alas! blissful moments are ever evanescent!—The old man relaxed his arm from the embrace of his daughter. A sudden illness seized him, and before assistance could be rendered, he fell back in his arm-chair and expired!

The excitement of the interview and the breaking up of the sealed fountains of affection, had been too much for his precarious health. Apoplexy ensued—but he died pronouncing blessings upon his daughter and her child.

After the demise of Caroline's father, his will was found among his papers, and it proved that he had bequeathed the whole of his property to his housekeeper-wife. Subsequently, however, a flaw was detected in the instrument—its validity was contested, and it was finally declared to be null and void. The whole of his wealth, with the exception of a small moiety reserved for his second wife, reverted back to Caroline, who was consequently enabled to maintain her former affluent position in society. But the possession of riches was not now her care. She remembered the lessons which adversity had taught her, and the principles of the Christian religion inclined her to direct its dispensation for the relief of suffering humanity and in philanthropic objects. That same holy religion taught her, too, that true happiness was not to be found in a world of fashionable folly; and that humbleness of station in society was rather a blessing than a misfortune, since its tendency was to wean the soul from earth and fit it for the latitude of a celestial home.

For a time Caroline made Mortimer's cottage her home, and Amelia her dearest companion: but was at length induced to give her heart and hand in marriage to her old lover, Hamilton, for whom she had all along cherished the germ of attachment, he having, some time before, abandoned the profession of law for that of Divinity, and had became already one of the most popular preachers of the metropolis.

She has learned to look upon the professional and mechanical distinctions of society in their proper light, and to estimate the value of character in the individual rather than the adventitious relations of society—for after all it is the intrinsic moral worth of the man alone, which gives honor and dignity to every employment and profession in life. The mechanic and professional man, in regard to the mere vocation, are both indispensible adjuncts of human existence—they are alike honorable and respectable within themselves—and as useful in their several relations, as are the distinct members which make up man's whole physical organization. Thus the moral is—that life has its thorns and its flowers. A career of folly and misdirected pursuits produce the bias of discontent; while a course of virtue and true benevolence brings the roses of peace wet with the dews of love and gratitude.

THE TWO SUITORS; OR, THE SISTERS.

An Interesting and Instructive Tale.

In a large city in Germany dwelt two sisters—Jeannette and Pauline. Jeannette had the good fortune to be very handsome, and this had fortune to find it out very soon. She soon accustomed herself to look in the glass—that was natural; she soon took pains in dressing—that was pardonable; she endeavored to acquire accomplishments—that was prudent; but she thought nothing more was necessary—that was foolish. True, she played well upon the harpsichord, and sung heavan airs with taste; she drew landscapes after Hackert, and embroidered flowers from Nature. But she only played the harpsichord in great companies, and only sung airs at concerts; she only drew landscapes for exhibition, and embroidered flowers for sofas and screens. At home, time passed tediously, although her old, weak mother was continually praising her beauty. This old truth could only give pleasure by coming from new lips; hence Jeannette was continually seeking new society. Ladies always practice a certain economy in the praise of other ladies, but gentlemen, on the contrary, are generally very lavish of praise; and therefore Jeannette was fond of the society of gentlemen.

Her sister Pauline would probably have thought and acted in the same manner; but no one praised the poor girl, simply because no one noticed her, for the small-pox had rendered her appearance homely. She was also far behind her sister in showy accomplishments. She played the guitar, and sung agreeably, but merely simple little songs. She was not behind Jeannette in the art of drawing; but except a few landscapes which hung in her mother's chamber, which no one but her mother saw, no one knew of her talent; for the homely Pauline was as diffident as the fascinating Jeannette was unembarrassed; and it only required a second look from any one to cause her to blush deeply. Fortunately, this did not often happen, for no one looked at her twice. She embroidered as well as her sister, but only upon workbags for aunts and grandmothers. She appeared best at home,—in company, the consciousness of her homeliness gave her an air of constraint; but affairs could not go on without her.

When the girls grew up, their mother thought proper that they should take charge of the house each one by turns, week about. Pauline soon became accustomed to it, and in her week all things went on right. When Jeannette's turn came, she hurried about busily the whole forenoon, but when noon came the dinner was spoiled. She grieved, also, at the time she lost from her singing and harpsichord, and the little time which was left her to arrange her head-dress, for her evening parties. The good-hearted Pauline frequently took her task off her hands, until finally the practice was neglected entirely; each other weekly, and Jeannette troubled herself no more about domestic affairs. The weak mother did not interfere, for she could not be displeased with the lovely face which pleased every body. There could be no large party unless Jeannette Western graced it; her name served the poets for a subject, and was the universal toast. Few only knew that she had a sister.

Two young officers, Edward and Maurice, saw Jeannette, and both became extremely enamored.—Both were of a good family, brave, noble, and both very rich. Jeannette was delighted with her conquests, and her mother, who was in moderate circumstances, indulged herself in sweet dreams of the future.

"If both should be in earnest," said she to her daughter, "which would you prefer?"

"I don't know myself," answered Jeannette—"they both please me, but I like the rich one the best. Then I would take care of you, mother, in your old age, and I would have my sister to manage my house for me."

The fooling parent wept for joy at the filial sentiments of her daughter, and Pauline was grateful for such a mark of sisterly affection.

In the meantime, both of the young men wooed earnestly for the beauty's favor, and both were equally kind to the homely Pauline, because she gave them the pleasure of being alone with her sister.—Jeannette was really in embarrassment, which of her adorers to prefer. Edward gave a ball, at which she was queen, and she thought on that evening that she was in a fair way to love Edward. Maurice gave a sleigh-ride, and she flew along the street in a splendid equipage, and on that day she thought Maurice more amiable than his rival. So she delayed her decision from one to another, attributing her hesitation to her heart.

"If I were in your place," said Pauline one day, "I should take Edward."

"Why?" asked Jeannette. "Maurice is as rich, and you will acknowledge he is handsomer."

"He is generous, too," said the mother.

"But he is fickle," replied Pauline. "Our aunt told me a great many things about him."

"Our aunt," answered Jeannette, snappishly, "is an old aunt."

"Edward, on the other hand," continued Pauline, "is more steady; and I think I have often remarked, that he feels more deeply and more sincerely than Maurice."

"Pshaw!" said Jeannette, tossing her head, while she stuck a flower in her hair before the glass, "they both feel so deeply that I hardly know how to manage them. Meanwhile, what harm will there be in delaying my choice awhile! Their rivalry makes my time pass very pleasantly, and finally accident will decide."

Pauline was silent. Both suitors continued their attentions without remission.

One day, Mr. Edward entered the room, he found Pauline in tears, and Jeannette laughing loudly. He asked modestly the cause of the tears and the laughter.

"I am a child," said Pauline, blushing; and left the room.

"A child, indeed!" said Jeannette, laughing after her; "you would never guess what she was crying for."

"If it is not improper to ask——"

"Oh, not at all. You have probably sometimes seen the old blind dog that lay on the sofa? He was mine, and in his younger days used to make a good deal of sport. This morning he broke a handsome dish. At first I fretted a little; at last I thought the old blind animal was good for nothing, and only did mischief so I sent him to a tanteman and had him shot."

"And was that the cause of your sister's weeping?"

"That was it. One would think we were living in the times of old Romance."

Edward was silent, and soon changed the conversation. But after that time he never overlooked Pauline as he had formerly done. He conversed with her, became acquainted with her unpretending worth, admired her modesty, and began to think her less homely. Her mien, which she has been accustomed; and you know that poverty always depends upon the different wants of mankind."

Pauline raised her head and looked at him kindly. She said nothing, but her countenance spoke. The needle trembled in her hand. She bethought herself, and continued her embroidery. After a pause, she asked, as if merely to renew the conversation—

"Where does your mother reside?"

Edward answered at Stuttgard, where, in reality, she was in the highest circle of society. Pauline then spoke of the pleasant situation and advantages of Stuttgard, and nothing more was said of Edward's misfortune.

For the purpose of confirming what he had said of his losses, he limited his expenditures, and sold his fine horses. He continued to visit the sisters, and the calmness of his feelings permitted him to see a thousand little things that had formerly escaped him. None of his observations were of a kind to rekindle his former love; on the other hand, Pauline daily appeared more amiable to him, and her homeliness less striking. As he now conversed more with her than with Jeannette, she felt more confidence toward him, her bashfulness was conquered, and she unfolded her heart. What conduced very much to this, was the modest supposition that Edward would have no thought of a marriage with her; that removed her embarrassment, and she showed her pure, unrestrained sisterly affection.

Jeannette, on the other hand, did not receive much pleasure from his visits, which were especially disagreeable when Maurice was present. To him she now confined her whole coquetry, and soon drew the net so tightly over him, that he besought her pressingly every day to make him the most enviable of mortals, at the altar. She still took airs upon herself and treated him awhile, and at last jestingly gave her consent. The lover was delighted excessively, time, to look upon her beauty without a wish to possess her. He would probably have wooed her immediately, if vanity had not prevented. She loved him; that she would have had no chance in the hall, if she had not been dancing with Maurice, that it was he who made her forget her self for a moment. His feelings could not withstand the flattering thought of being loved by so beautiful a girl, and all that reason could win from him was a determination to put her supposed affection for him to the proof.

He waited until her mother recovered, and then went one day with an air of trouble in his countenance to Jeannette, and informed her that his estate in Suhia had been ravaged by the enemy, and that it would take at least a year's rent to put it in its former condition.

"But," added he, tenderly, "if Jeannette only loves me, my income will be sufficient to protect us from want."

She was visibly shocked, and changed color as he began his relation, and her endeavors to conceal her confusion did not escape him. An anxious pause ensued. She soon recovered her composure, laid her hand upon his in a friendly way, and said—

"My good friend, I will not deceive you. I am a spoilt child, and cannot do without many things. We are neither of us romances. We know that the hottest love will grow cold in a cottage. That I am well inclined towards you, I will not deny, but we must act reasonably—remain my friend."

This declaration was thrust in the heart to Edward, but it was a beneficial operation. He soon after repeated the story in presence of Pauline. She did not look up from her embroidery, but he remarked that her eyes were moist.

"What gives me the most pain for the misfortune," continued he, "is the poverty of my mother—my good mother. If I should devote the whole of my income to her, it will not be sufficient to provide her the luxuries to which she has been accustomed; and

He sighed, and looked at him kindly. She said nothing, but her countenance spoke. The needle trembled in her hand. She bethought herself, and continued her embroidery. After a pause, she asked, as if merely to renew the conversation—

"Where does your mother reside?"

Edward answered at Stuttgard, where, in reality, she was in the highest circle of society. Pauline then spoke of the pleasant situation and advantages of Stuttgard, and nothing more was said of Edward's misfortune.

For the purpose of confirming what he had said of his losses, he limited his expenditures, and sold his fine horses. He continued to visit the sisters, and the calmness of his feelings permitted him to see a thousand little things that had formerly escaped him. None of his observations were of a kind to rekindle his former love; on the other hand, Pauline daily appeared more amiable to him, and her homeliness less striking. As he now conversed more with her than with Jeannette, she felt more confidence toward him, her bashfulness was conquered, and she unfolded her heart. What conduced very much to this, was the modest supposition that Edward would have no thought of a marriage with her; that removed her embarrassment, and she showed her pure, unrestrained sisterly affection.

Jeannette, on the other hand, did not receive much pleasure from his visits, which were especially disagreeable when Maurice was present. To him she now confined her whole coquetry, and soon drew the net so tightly over him, that he besought her pressingly every day to make him the most enviable of mortals, at the altar. She still took airs upon herself and treated him awhile, and at last jestingly gave her consent. The lover was delighted excessively,

"But the bill of exchange was sent to my mother."

"I know nothing of that; it is no business of mine."

"I beg of you to tell me the person."

"I cannot."

"You will probably cause the happiness of my life."

The banker looked at him in surprise.

"Will you tell me the truth," said Edward, "if I name the person?"

"Yes."

"Miss Pauline Western."

"You have guessed it."

Edward hurried out. In two minutes he was at Pauline's feet, and asked her hand. She was confused—she could not answer—she sighed.

He put his arms around her—"Am I disagreeable to you?"

"Oh no, I have long loved you; but how could I hope?"

The first raptures of love flowed through two noble hearts. Pauline could not comprehend how Edward had taken such a sudden violent resolution.—She often asked the reason—he smiled, but did not answer.

Her nuptials with the poor Edward were fixed for the same day on which Jeannette was to marry the rich Maurice. Pauline made disposition for strict frugality in her future domestic affairs; her white, plain bridal dress contrasted powerfully with the silver lace of her sister.

Edward pressed her to his heart, and smiled.

"To-morrow," said he, "I will inform my mother of the choice I have made. You must also add a letter."

Pauline promised it, not without some embarrassment, and Edward smiled again. On the next day she handed him the letter, but showed him at the same time her finger bound up, which had compelled her to get her sister to write the letter. Edward kissed her finger, cast a look of love upon her, and a tear stood in his sparkling eye. She blushed, and thought something was not right, but he said "very well," and smiled.

The marriage day appeared. Edward came early in the morning, and laid a valuable necklace in his bride's lap. Pauline was astonished, but Jeannette was more so, for the necklace was more valuable than her own.

"I have been practising usury," said Edward, jestingly. "A little sum advanced by a noble lady, a friend of mine, has doubled itself a thousand fold."

"By a noble lady?" said Pauline.

"The necklace is very fine," continued Edward, "but what adorns it most, and will make me the happiest of men, is concealed in this paper."

She opened it confusedly—it was the wedding ring folded in the bill of exchange. Pauline recognized it at the first glance, and cast down her eyes blushing. Edward fell at her feet. She sunk down.—"To deceive me so!" whispered she.

When all was explained, Pauline's mother embraced her, while Jeannette tossed her pretty head. She endeavored to conceal her vexation; but her marriage day was the commencement of her matrimonial ill humor.

Several years passed. Edward found to his astonishment that he had been blind—that his wife was really handsome; and his domestic happiness increased every day. Domestic happiness never made its home with Jeannette. Pauline was surrounded with blooming children. The sisters seldom saw each other: for Pauline only lived for her husband and children—Jeannette only for the great world. Here she found sufficient amends for the only true happiness of marriage, as long as her beauty daily attracted new admirers, and as long as her husband's riches afforded the means of expensive luxuries. But, alas! her charms began to vanish—she grew sickly—the affection of her husband became deadened—his coffers were emptied—poverty introduced discord.—They avoided one another—Madam run in debt—Monsieur gambled away her jewels. They began with complaining, and ended with reproaches. At length, one morning, Maurice rode away without taking leave, and was never heard of afterward.

Poor and helpless Jeannette was forced to seek an asylum with her sister. She was kindly received, and treated with the most tender forbearance; but her conscience was not at ease; a violent cough enfeebled her frame, and in her twenty-eighth year, no trace of her former beauty remained. Her mind was soured and embittered, so that she was rendered unfit for any domestic joys. The servants of the family trembled before her. If the nurse wished to hush the infant, she had only to say, "Aunt is coming." The larger children, when at play, if they heard her cough at a distance, slipped into one corner, and whispered to one another, "Aunt is coming."

JOY AND HOPE.

Joy's a sweet, yet fragile flower;
It loves bright lands and sunny skies;
When days are dark, when tempests low'r,
It droops to earth, and fades, and dies.

Hope brightest blooms amid the storm!
Its verdure owns not Fate's control:
Joy comes array'd in mortal form,—
Hope dwells a portion of the soul.

LUCK IS EVERY THING.

BY JOSEPH R. CHANDLER.

The course of true love, it is said, did never yet run smooth; and those who have had experience on that turnpike of the affections, or rather rail-road, as it is soon run over, bear testimony to the jolts, "runnings off," and mashings up alive, of which the poets speak. We have no great taste, in this time of politics and perplexities, to dabble in "fancy stocks," and risk our reputation for gravity; yet the illustration of an aphorism of admitted truth, may be considered seasonable, and the moral deduced from the illustration may compensate some for the time of reading it.

In the year 1814—we remember the time well, because a part of the incidents of the story were connected with a great event, an event not likely to be forgotten—well, in the year 1814, a young man, who, to a visionary mind, and a consequent want of employment, added a most desperate affection for a young lady, quite too good for him, if his business pursuits were alone considered, but just his match, if confiding affection, purity of mind, and innocence of purpose, are the reward of large endowments, strict integrity, and a desire for honest competence, without the means of obtaining it.

There was no more pleasing young man in the thriving village than Henry Bradford; and every body agreed with his neighbors, that he was the most agreeable person, and the best educated about. But he did not study law, he despised medicine, and did not take to the church; he had frequently thought of "merchandise," but that required a capital, which he could not raise, and so he did not get ahead, though he was forever on the brink of some wonderful success, which he certainly would have secured, if he had only entered upon the enterprise.

Mary Carver evidently loved Henry Bradford; for knowing that, excepting his handsome person, pleasing manners, and good character, he had nothing to offer, she would not otherwise have been deaf to the offers of so many young men, whose character and positions rendered them desirable to the family. These offers were repeated so often, and hints so strong were given to Mr. and Mrs. Carver, that it was deemed proper, after a serious deliberation in cabinet council, to admonish their daughter that Henry was in no business, and was not likely to be in a way to maintain a family.

Mrs. Carver opened the diplomacy with her daughter, and after two or three conferences, retreated under the laugh of Mary, who declared that she did not doubt that Henry would one day be rich enough to take care of both, for he had had a dream that he should be. Mrs. Carver had no disposition to laugh in such a serious mission, and no desire to be angry with her daughter.

Mary, however, knew that when her father came to negociate, she would have to use other arguments than laughter, and therefore she admonished Henry of the approaching storm. Henry thought of it two or three days, an unusual time for him to devote to any thing like his personal affairs.

At length the family was honored by a formal offer from a clergyman in a neighboring town. He was learned, pious, rich, and respected, and such an offer was not to be slighted. It was not slighted. Old Mr. Carver took the subject to heart, and Mrs. Carver gave her sheer muslin cap a double clear starching upon the very idea of becoming mother-in-law to a minister. Mary pondered these things in her heart. She saw the improbability of Henry's ever attaining a situation that would warrant matrimony. She was listening to her mother's account of his want of application to business, his apparent disregard for all the ordinary means of attaining competence, and of his utter lack of what is called common sense; and the old lady concluded her homily with a remark, that she believed Henry Bradford would think more of a dream of wealth twice repeated, than of the best prospects that ever presented business preferment.

"Mother," said Mary, "Henry is not a fool."

"No," said Mrs. Carver, hesitatingly, "he is not a fool, certainly."

"Why then do you talk so of him?" asked Mary. "But there he is coming now," continued the girl.

"Speak to him plainly, my child," said Mrs. Carver.

Mary made no answer, for she was a little mortified at the ludicrous turn which her mother had given to Henry's rather dreamy proposition, though she never had heard him build any castles in the air out of such materials.

Henry came with his usual pleasant humor, and sat down by Mary, and after a few words, he perceived that something was wrong.

"Mary," said he, "have you been reading the Sorrows of Werter?"

"No, Henry, but I have been listening to mother's sorrows—her lamentations over you. She says—"

"Never mind what she says, Mary, as I perceive it is not very good; just listen to what I have to tell."

"Well, what is it, Henry? I hope it is good."

"Excellent, capital; it will be delightful."

"Do, then, tell me what it is."

"Why, last Sunday night I dreamed that—"

"Dreamed?" exclaimed Mary, with a most dolorous sigh.

"Aye dreamed."

"Well, go on."

"I dreamed that I had drawn ten thousand dollars in the Plymouth Beach Lottery."

"Well, what then?"

"Why, I dreamed the same on Monday night, and on Tuesday night, and the numbers were 5, 4, 3, 2. Well, I sent right to Boston on Wednesday, and purchased the ticket, and here it is; you shall keep it, Mary, and when I go up to Boston for the prize, you shall go with me."

Poor Mary smiled mournfully and reproachingly. Henry left the house, and went home satisfied that he had made a right disposition of the ticket.

Day after day did Henry watch at the Post Office, to read the first report of the drawing; but day after day passed without the desired information.

At length one of the young men was heard to remark, that Henry Bradford had shot out of the Post Office, as if he had received some strange intelligence.

"Mary," said Henry, "here is your father's paper, and look at the returns, No. 5, 4, 3, 2—TEN THOUSAND DOLLARS!"

Mary turned pale—the news was unexpected.

"Let's go to Boston," said Henry, "and get the money."

"The prizes are payable thirty days after drawing," said Mary, looking at the bottom of the ticket.

That night Mary told her mother of Henry's luck. Mrs. Carver seemed rather startled.

"Are you not pleased, mother?" asked Mary; "do you wish to oppose other obstacles to our union?"

"Mary," said Mrs. Carver, "do you recollect the most uncompromising hostility which your father has to lotteries—his utter abomination of money thus distributed? This prize will be worse to him than poverty. Ever since they refused to make him a manager in the Plymouth Beach Lottery, he has set down the whole as gambling, and every prize as the devil's gift for mischief; and, to say the truth, most people begin to hold opinions with him."

"Why, mother, every body did not ask to be made a manager in the lottery."

"No, no; but people may, like your father, arrive at correct conclusions from selfish considerations, and good opinions may become general without any special motive for change."

The next day Mary gave back Henry his ticket, with an account of the conversation of her mother.

Henry was mortified at the result; he understood and appreciated the feelings of the "old folks," and in any other person's case, he might have approved of it.

"But what does your father want?" said Henry.—"Does he suppose that the mode adopted to build churches, endow schools, and finish public works, is too impure to supply the needy purse of one who wishes to be his son-in-law? He is more nice than wise."

"My father," said Mary, "may not think himself called upon to be as particular about what concerns the public charities, corporations, or indifferent individuals, as he is, and is bound to be, in what concerns the respectability of his own family."

"But if I acquire wealth by lawful means—"

"Henry, father never asked that you should be wealthy; he thought it proper, and he makes it a condition of our marriage, that you should have some respectable business, since you have not wealth."

"And your father is right," said Henry: "but how I am to get clear of the odium of my lottery prize, I can neither see nor guess."

"Perhaps you will dream it, though," said Mary, archly.

"I can dream of nothing but schooners, brigs, and ships," said Henry.

"Oh, if you only owned a good vessel," said Mary, "I do not know but father would almost forgive its coming as a prize."

"A prize to the privateer," said Henry, "but not in a lottery."

Henry wandered down towards the wharves and unoccupied ship-yards. The war allowed of little or no work among the ship-builders. The hull of a fine brig lay at the wharf. She had been launched a year, and there was none to purchase her. She was too clumsy for a privateer.

"Mr. Holmes," said Henry, "what is that vessel worth?"

"She is worth twenty thousand dollars," said the owner and builder; "she cost that as she is, and she will bring twenty-five thousand the very hour peace is declared."

"Would you like the money for her at a cash price?"

"Nothing would be more acceptable. But there are not fifteen thousand dollars in the county.

The remarks of Mary about her father's respect for a ship owner had been running in Henry's head ever since they were uttered, and he beckoned aside the owner.

"Mr. Holmes," said Henry, "I have a commission to fulfil, and, as you know I am not much of a business man, I must ask you to consider a proposition which I am about to make to you, and to answer it explicitly."

"Let me hear the proposition."

"I will give you ten thousand dollars for the brig as she now lies."

"And the time of payment?"

"Within forty days. You cannot want the money sooner; the river is frozen over, and you could make no use of the cash before that time."

Mr. Holmes turned to Bradford and said—"You know, Henry, that I am aware that you have not the means of payment, and also that you are not a person likely to be employed as an agent in such business, and yet I have every confidence in your word."

Henry explained fully to the ship owner the state of his affairs, and exhibited to him the lottery ticket, No. 5, 4, 3, 2.

"But," said Mr. Holmes, "there may be some mistake about the matter, or some failure of the lottery, by which I should lose."

Henry explained his motives and wishes, and in two hours he held in his hand a bill of sale of the brig Helvetius, which, as the papers were not obtained, he immediately re-named MARY. The condition was, that Henry was to hold the vessel for forty days, and if, within that time, he should pay ten thousand dollars, she was to be his; if not, she was to revert to Mr. Holmes, who, in the meantime, held the ticket as a sort of collateral. The bill of sale, as I saw it, bore date the 5th of February, 1815. Henry felt like a new man. He was a ship owner in a little where that character was a sort of aristocracy. He went day after day to look at his brig, wishing for the time to pass away for the prize to be paid; but he said nothing yet to MR. CARVER.

One evening, while Henry was walking with Mary, she asked him what he intended to do with his vessel when the forty days were up?

"Rig her, bend her sails, and then sell her, or send her to sea."

"Why, Henry, it took the whole of the ticket to buy the hull and the standing spars, and it will take half as much more to rig her and find canvass; and besides that, how can you sell her for more than Mr. Holmes could?"

Henry hesitated: he had not thought of that; but he did not doubt but it would all come right yet.

Henry was sitting the next day on the quarter rail of his brig, looking at the masts, well covered with snow and ice, and thinking of the better appearance she would make when the rigger had done his duty. At length he felt the hand of Mr. Holmes upon his shoulder.

"Henry," said the latter, "I am sorry to have bad news to tell you. Read that paragraph in the Boston Centinel."

"CORRECTION.—The ticket which drew the highest prize in the Plymouth Beach Lottery, was 4, 5, 3, 2, and not, as our compositors stated last week, 5, 4, 3, 2. We understand that a gentleman of wealth in the southern part of this town, is the fortunate holder."

"What do you say to that, Henry?"

"Only that the old gentleman will not now say that I have the wages of gambling."

"No, nor will he give you the credit of being a ship owner," said Mr. Holmes. "You have been unfortunate, Henry, and I am really sorry for you!" continued Mr. Holmes, clasping his tone considerably, "and regret my own loss, as I have need of the money; but, as you cannot pay for the brig, you would better hand me the bill of sale, and let us destroy it."

Henry drew from his pocket the precious document, and, while he examined it from top to bottom, he said to Mr. Holmes—"This affair has been to me like a pleasant dream, not only on account of my aspirations for Mary, which you are acquainted with, but day after day I have felt a growing energy for business, a sort of outreaching of the mind, a determination, with such a noble beginning, to proceed cautiously but steadily, to do what I ought to have begun years since. Thus, Mr. Holmes, as the bill has yet some days to run before I can be chargeable with violation of contract, I will restore it to my pocket-book, and, if I cannot dream as I have done, I shall not, at least, be awakened too suddenly."

Mr. Holmes, of course, consented, as he really had no right to claim the vessel until the forty days should have expired; and Henry went up to tell Mary of the new turn his luck had taken.

Though Mary respected her father too much to feel pleasure in Henry's new possession, yet she loved Henry too much not to feel deeply grieved at his bitter disappointment.

"That dream," said Henry, doubtingly; "that dream has not yet come to pass."

Some days after that, there was, as usual, a gathering at the Post Office, at some distance from the shipyard, awaiting the arrival of the mail. The stage, at the usual hour, drove up, and the driver said, as he handed the mail-bag into the house, that he guessed there was better news to-day than he had brought since the victory on the Lake.

"Another victory, HEY?—Woodward?"

"No, not another victory, but PEACE!"

"Can you tell me," said a dapper looking young gentleman, as he slipped from the stage, "where I can find Mr. Holmes, the owner of the brig Helvetius?"

"Mr. Holmes lives on the hill yonder," was the reply; "but it is thought he does not own the Helvetius now."

"Has he sold her?"

"Yes."

"I am sorry for that—who is the owner?"

"Mr. Bradford—the young man whom you see reading the newspaper."

The stranger stepped into the house, and inquired of Henry whether he would sell the brig.

Henry said that he would cheerfully part with her.

"At what price?"

"At the peace price."

"Stage is ready," said Mr. Woodward, the driver.

"We will ride over to the village," said Henry, "and converse on the matter as we go along."

Henry soon emerged from the stage coach, and hastened to Mr. Carver's.

"You look cheerful," said Mary.

"I have drawn another prize!"

"Not another, I hope!"

"Yes, and a larger one; I have sold the brig for twenty thousand dollars to a Boston house, and I am to be in Plymouth at four o'clock, to get my pay at the Bank."

"But the brig was not yours, Henry. Surely you are not deranged—you could not hold the brig after a mistake of the prize was corrected."

"There is a just where you are mistaken, Mary. There is a bill of sale which allows of forty days from date for the payment. Say nothing to any one," cried Henry, "and I will be with you before I sleep."

"What's the matter with Henry?" said MRS. CARVER, as she entered the room; "has he drawn another prize?"

"I guess not, mother," said MARY, "only dreaming again, perhaps."

At nine o'clock Henry arrived from Plymouth, with an accepted draft for ten thousand dollars, in favor of Mr. Holmes, and a Bank book in which he had a credit for an equal sum; and the brig Mary made some of the most profitable voyages that were ever projected in Boston.

She was in the East India trade, and, as her return was noticed in the papers, (and it was usually announced about the same time that the very respectable family of Bradford had an increase,) Henry was wont to exclaim, "luck is every thing."

Some years after that, twenty-five at least, as I was riding into Plymouth, with Bradford and his granddaughter, I referred to the anecdote, and the conclusion, that "luck was every thing."

"There may be something in luck," said he; "but the more which I gathered while I held the ticket, with the belief that I had a prize, the resolutions which I formed while sitting and gazing at the lofty spars of my brig, and the enabling virtue, the filial piety, and the perfect love of Mary, did all for me, and I should have been rich without the brig; so, you see, it was Hope, contemplation, woman's virtue, woman's piety, and woman's love, that made me what I am. And let me tell, friend C., that you and I owe more to woman than the world credits to her. Let us, at least, do her justice."

BY MRS. FOLLEN.

"Dear Edward," said his wife, "you have something on your mind: your brow looks troubled—what is it?"

"Only anxiety about business, Amy. How often have I wished I had not been bred a merchant! But my mother said it was a favorite wish of my father, that I should be an accomplished merchant."

"I have sometimes wished so too," answered his wife; "and then again, I remembered, that the very evils which belong to your profession, may be turned into good. He that has it in his power to do wrong with impunity, though he gains by it, yet he chooses the right by which he is the most eloquent preacher of righteousness."

"Very true, Amy; but sometimes this is indeed cutting off the right hand and plucking out the right eye; and then thinking always about money and bargains, has such a counteracting influence upon one's mind!"

"But, how often, Edward, have I heard you say, that no man has such wide and various connexions with the human race, as a well-educated, upright, and active merchant. Every part of the world sends him its tribute of knowledge, as well as of riches. He sees men under all aspects; and while he may, with a certain degree of security, indulge in dishonesty, and be an enemy to his fellow-men, perhaps no man can be so true, and self-sacrificing, and efficient a philanthropist, as a Christian merchant."

"It is not always so easy as you may imagine, for a merchant to act as remembering that he is under his great Task-master's eye."

"Not for all or some men; but for you Edward, the difficulty would be to act otherwise. When I think of your profession, Edward, it gives me pleasure to notice that merchants in general, as they acquire property more easily, are most disposed to spend it liberally."

"Yes," said Edward, as his eye kindled at the thought, "the greater portion of our public benefactors have been merchants. Their money has given eyes to the blind, and ears to the deaf—health to the sick, and peace and comfort to the forsaken; it feeds and instructs the ignorant poor; it sends the glad tidings of salvation to the unbeliever and the penitent; it takes little children in its arms and blesses them. But all this glorious power supposes wealth, Amy."

"And you, dear Edward, are rich enough to enjoy this highest of all privileges; to be the dispenser of good to others. You have cause only for thankfulness. But the poor, the unsuccessful merchant, who has not the means of educating his children, whose spirits are broken down by failures, and whose temper is soured by what he considers the injustice or dishonesty of others, perhaps, may be excused for finding fault with his profession. My heart aches for him."

Edward started up, and walked hastily backward and forward through the room, as if he had been seized with some sudden and intolerable pain.

"What is the matter?" said his wife. "Are you ill?"

"O nothing—nothing of consequence," said Edward—"I happened to think of something unpleasant then. It is late now, and my head aches."

They retired for the night. The next day Edward looked depressed and thoughtful, and as if he had passed a sleepless night. Amy was troubled by his silence. This was the first cloud that had rested on her husband's brow since they were married.

"He has," she said to herself, "he has always confided everything to me. He will tell me what it is that hangs so heavily upon his spirits. He will never shut me out from his sorrows any more than his joys."

She thought, when he returned from the counting-house for the day, that he looked more free and happy, though he was still silent and thoughtful.

"Come and sit by me, Amy," said Edward to her, when they were alone in the evening.

Amy sat down by her husband.

"Do you not enjoy, Amy, our handsome house, and pictures, and carriage, and—"

"Surely, Edward, I take great pleasure in these things. But why do you ask?"

"And you love to have money enough to give to those who want it?"

"Why, what a question, Edward! you know that I value this power more than I can tell."

"And can you voluntarily resign all these luxuries, Amy?"

"Why should I voluntarily resign them, Edward? What makes you so enigmatical? Tell me what you mean."

"Suppose that all the money that enables us to indulge in the luxuries is not our own; what would you have me to do, Amy?"

"Is it you, Edward, that asks me whether I would be dishonest?"

"But suppose, according to the law of the land, and the customs of society, and the tacit consent of those most interested, this property was secured to you?"

"When I am satisfied," said Amy, "that I can plead the law of the land, the customs of society, and the opinion of the world, before the judgment seat of God, as an excuse for violating that higher law, which he has written on my heart; when I have placed the opinion of the world in the scales against my own self-respect, and find it weightiest, then Edward, I might hesitate. But why ask me such questions? Why do you not speak plainly?"

"I will, Amy," answered her husband. "When I failed in business before our marriage, I made a settlement with my creditors, by which I paid them seventy-five cents on a dollar. They knew that I paid them all I could, and signed a release from all future claims. Of late, my mind has been troubled about these debts, or such as I consider them. A few days ago, one of my creditors brought his son to me, and asked me to take him into my store. He mentioned, in course of conversation, that he had intended to send his son to college, for the boy had a thirst for learning: that he was in fact, fitted to enter, but that he found he was poor. 'If,' said the father, 'by denying myself everything but the necessaries of life, I could feed my boy's mind, I would thankfully do it: but I cannot honestly indulge myself even in this luxury.' I felt smitten to the heart. When I failed, I owed that man twelve thousand dollars. I paid him but nine. I now, of course, owe three and the interest upon it. The sum would enable him to give his son the advantage which he so much desires. I have been thinking over the whole subject, and studying it fairly. Drymond's Essay would satisfy me, if I were not convinced before, of what is right."

"And you will of course do it, there can be no doubt?"

"I knew you would say so, Amy; but you must think over it calmly. You know upon the subject of property, as well as other things, we have no mine and thine; as we have one interest and duty, so we have equal rights. I cannot take this step without your full approbation and consent."

"Is that all that has troubled you for these few days past?" said Amy, as she looked into her husband's face, with an expression of joyful relief.

"All," said Edward.

"And why not speak to me at first about it?—Why not let me share every trouble as it arises?"

"O, Amy, I felt it only on your account. I hated to deprive you of all these luxuries. You know with what delight I see you doing good, real good, with money."

"Never again, Edward, do me the injustice to suppose that I prefer the lower virtue of charity to the higher one of justice."

EDITH AND ALICE;

Or, WOMAN'S LOVE.

BY A LADY OF MARYLAND.

"Edith! dear Edith, is it you?" exclaimed a tall, handsome man, as he sprang from an open carriage and advanced to the side of a female, who was reclining in a negligent but graceful attitude against the trunk of a tree near the road-side. But as he attempted to take her hand, the lady turned her head, which had hitherto been averted, and opening a pair of brilliant dark eyes, answered—

"No, sir, it is not Edith; it is me!"

"And who is me?" asked the stranger, surprised and amused by her manner.

"I am Alice, sir, and you are Mr. Henry Percival!"

"Rightly guessed; though unless you are a witch, I cannot tell how you have divined it, for I am sure I never saw that fair face before."

"Indeed, sir, I am not a witch, but I remember you perfectly, though it appears you have forgotten me."

"Forgotten you! why surely you are not little Alice Lee."

"I am Alice Lee, but not little Alice Lee, now, sir," and the lady primmed her pretty mouth, and drew up her small but beautiful figure to its greatest possible height.

"No, truly," answered her companion, laughing, "you have completely grown out of my remembrance. When I saw you last you were a little sallow hoyden, with a face all eyes, and a figure all angles, and now you are—"

"A young lady almost sixteen," interrupted Alice, "but I must hasten home or my uncle and Edith will wonder what has become of me."

"Nay, but you shall not go alone, my sweet coz;" and throwing the reins to his servant, Henry Percival drew his cousin's arm within his own, and proceeded with her to his father's house, from which they were only a few rods distant.

"My father and Edith are well, I trust," said the young man, after a few minutes silence, during which his eyes had been rivetted on the blooming face of the young creature at his side.

"Oh, both quite well, and very anxiously expecting you."

"And to what accident do I owe the pleasure of seeing you here?"

"Why to say the truth," replied Alice, laughing and blushing, "I knew you were expected, and I strolled out to meet you, having a curiosity to see a gentleman who has travelled all over Europe," and with an arch smile and a deeper blush the young girl raised her eyes to her companion's face, and then cast them demurely on the ground.

"And Edith! why did she not accompany you?—Had she no desire to see the companion of her childhood?"

"Oh, yes, but she would have deemed such a step unbecoming. You know how dignified she is."

As she spoke they came within sight of the house, and Henry hastened forward to meet his father, who was standing on the steps with a tall and elegant woman by his side.

When Henry Percival turned from his father's embrace to meet the welcome of Edith Glenville, he was painfully struck with what seemed to him the coldness and reserve of her manner, and involuntarily his feelings assumed the character which he imputed to hers. He little guessed the feelings which glowed beneath that quiet and placid demeanor. Left an orphan at an early age, Edith had been confided to the guardianship of Mr. Percival and his amiable wife, by whom she had been reared and educated with all the care and tenderness which could have been bestowed on an only daughter. From her father she inherited great firmness of character, and from her mother a capability of deep and passionate feeling, to control which promised to require all her powers of self-government. Henry Percival, who was about her own age, had been educated from home, but in his occasional visits he had formed an attachment for his father's ward, which was warmly approved by his parents, and repaid by the object of his affection with a fervent intense devotion of which those who looked not beyond the surface would scarcely have believed her capable. There was nothing demonstrative in her character, and even Henry, when he plighted his faith and received hers in return, had but an imperfect idea of the value of the pure heart he had won. It was Mr. Percival's wish that his son should travel for some years in Europe, and their marriage was deferred until his return. In this interval Mrs. Percival paid the debt of nature, and Edith was left to supply her place to her bereaved husband and to Alice Lee, the orphan child of a deceased relative, who had been for some years an inmate of the family, and who was entirely dependent on her guardian for protection and support. Alice had been, in her childhood, the plaything and pet of Henry Percival, and the years of his absence, which had transformed her from the romping, careless child into the beautiful, graceful girl, had not altered her character. She was still the creature of impulse—wilful and wayward—but warm-hearted and affectionate, and she welcomed the friend of her childhood with an undisguised delight which the deeply feeling but proud and delicate Edith shrunk from; displaying it the more so that in the later letters of her lover she perceived or thought she perceived a diminution of the ardour by which in the first months of his absence they had been characterized.

"What has become of Mary Milton?" said Henry, as a few mornings after his return he was seated in the parlour where the ladies were at work.

"She is married and gone with her husband to Texas."

"Did she marry Walter Brandon?"

"Yes," answered Alice, eagerly, "she eloped with him, and left her home and her friends and all that she had loved to go with the husband of her choice."

"And her mother?"

"She is dead," said Edith. "She did not long survive the desertion of her only child."

"It is said," rejoined Alice, "that she died of a broken heart, but I do not believe it, and if it were so, Mary could not help it, she had to choose between her mother and her lover, and how could she hesitate? I think," she added, and as she spoke her cheek flushed and her beautiful eyes sparkled with enthusiasm, "I think that no woman who truly loves can hesitate to make any sacrifice, even that of life itself, for the object of her affections."

"And are such your sentiments, Edith?" asked Henry, as he turned from the glowing countenance of the animated speaker whom he had hitherto regarded as a lovely child, but who now appeared to him an impassionate, enthusiastic woman; "tell me, Edith," he repeated earnestly, perceiving that she did not reply, "are such your sentiments?"

"I think," said Edith, speaking firmly, though her cheek was pale and her lips compressed with the effort to appear calm, "I think that no true woman will shrink from any sacrifice which does not involve a dereliction of principle."

"Nay, Edith, no reservations. Should she not sacrifice all?"

"No, not her principles. No right-minded woman will yield them, and no man worthy of her love will require it." She left the room as she spoke, and Henry fell into a fit of musing, which ended with a deep sigh, and a conviction that however perfect the character of his betrothed might be, it was deficient in that warmth and tenderness which could alone satisfy a heart so exacting as he felt his own to be.

Edith Glenville sat alone in her chamber. There were traces of tears on her cheek, and her hand trembled as she opened an ivory box which lay on her dressing-table, and drew from thence a packet of letters. From these she selected two, and read them again and again, seeming to ponder deeply over their contents. At length a smile broke over her face, and carefully replacing the letters, she said, in a low voice—

"I have been mistaken, and my unjust suspicions have caused me to treat him with a coldness which has wounded a noble heart. But I will explain, and repair my injustice," and hastily arranging the ringlets which her previous agitation had displaced, she quitted the apartment.

Upon entering the parlor where she had left her lover, she found it deserted, and she seated herself at the window to await his return. She had been there but a few minutes, when the sound of voices reached her ear, and looking forth she saw Henry walking with Alice Lee leaning on his arm. Her eyes were bent on the ground, and his rested on her face, while he conversed with her in a tone which, though she could not distinguish the words, struck coldly on the ear of Edith. Involuntarily her former suspicions returned, and abandoning her purpose of explanation and apology to her lover, she again sought refuge in her chamber.

Thus weeks passed on, and every day seemed to increase the distance between the lovers, and every day served to bring into more unfavorable contrast the cold and guarded manner of Edith with that of her young and impulsive companion. Gradually, Henry yielded to the fascination which the extreme beauty of Alice, her girlish romance of character, above all, the delight she evinced in his society, threw around her. Her suspicions once aroused, it was not easy to elude the observation of Edith, and with a calm exterior, but with many a bitter pang, she watched the progress of an attachment which crushed all the fond hopes in which she had so long indulged. Her woman's pride, however, and her firmness of character sustained her, and when, without a word or look which could imply reproach, she released her faithless lover from his engagement, he deemed not that her gentle smile and unfaltering voice were but the mask to hide a breaking heart.

Months had passed away. Henry Percival had wedded Alice Lee, and impatient to display to the world the beauty of his fair bride, had borne her to a splendid home in a distant city, while Edith remained to cheer and soothe the declining years of her venerable guardian. It may be that her cheek was paler than before, and her step less firm, but she complained not, and in the faithful performance of her duties, she sought to lose the remembrance of the dream of love from which she had been so rudely awakened.

Alice Percival sat alone in her splendid drawing-room. The months which had passed since her marriage had matured and perfected her beauty, and the rich satin robe in which her slender figure was enveloped, displayed its delicate proportions to the utmost advantage, while the jewels which sparkled on her breast, and bound her dark ringlets, increased the lustre of her eyes, and lent a brighter bloom to her cheek. She was evidently attired for some festal occasion, and apparently waiting the arrival of the vehicle which was to convey her to a scene of gaiety. Presently, footsteps were heard on the stairs, and Henry Percival entered the apartment. He started with surprise at his wife's appearance, and advancing to her side, said gravely and earnestly—

"You are not going out, Alice?"

"Yes," said she, with some confusion, "and I hoped you would accompany me."

"Nay, Alice, I cannot enter into scenes of gaiety now. It is true, the time which the world assigns as the period of mourning has expired, but I have too recently followed my father to the grave, to have any relish for the heartless amusements of society."

"I am sorry to leave you, but I have promised to chaperone my friend Miss Bernard, and I cannot disappoint her."

Henry sighed. He had not now to learn that the young creature whom he had made his wife obeyed every impulse of feeling or of fancy, heedless of consequences, and without regard to the comfort of those around her. The world, the gay flattering world, to which he had so proudly presented her, had readily recognized her claims to admiration, and the gratifications of vanity had become more precious in her eyes than the love of him for whom, in the romance of early girlhood, she had professed herself willing to sacrifice even her existence.

"And where are you going to-night, Alice?" asked her husband, after a pause, during which he had endeavored, by reflecting on her extreme youth, to repress the displeasure which the heartless levity of her conduct excited.

"To Mrs. Linden's."

Alice watched the countenance of her husband, and was not surprised to see his brow darken as she pronounced the name of this lady, whose society he had strictly prohibited. She had more than once braved his displeasure, and was prepared now to assert her right to choose her own associates; but her resolution was shaken when, with a manner totally free from passion, but with a decision and firmness which announced an unalterable determination of purpose, he said—

"Alice, I have hitherto forborne to interfere with your pleasures, because I would not require from you any sacrifice which your own feelings did not prompt. But my duty to you, as well as to myself, requires that I should now speak plainly. Mrs. Linden is a woman with whom no delicate female should associate. Her reputation is more than doubtful, and I should suspect the purity of any woman who, with a knowledge of her character, would willingly be found in her society."

He paused, but his wife did not reply, and he resumed—

"Have I said enough, or shall I speak yet more plainly? Shall I tell you that if you go to Mrs. Linden's party to-night, we part to-morrow forever? It must be so," he added, "for I could not regard as my wife the woman who would sully the purity of her nature by a contact with vice, however it may be tolerated by the corrupt votaries of fashion.—Speak, Alice, shall I countermand the carriage, and send an apology to Miss Bernard?"

Alice assented by a silent gesture, and Mr. Percival, after issuing his orders, left the house.

Scarcely had he departed, when Miss Bernard, who had left home before the messenger was sent to her, entered the apartment.

"Come, my dear Mrs. Percival," she cried, "are you ready? I have been detained at home [illegible] fear we shall be late."

"I have changed my mind," said Alice; "I shall not go to Mrs. Linden's to-night."

"Not go! Why, what can you mean? You are all ready."

"True, but my husband objects to my going, and I have promised him to remain at home."

"Nonsense, my dear Madam, you are surely not afraid of your husband? Why, the whold world will be there. There will be two foreign noblemen there, and they are dying with impatience to see the beautiful Mrs. Percival; and you are looking so lovely to-night. Come, do order the carriage. Indeed, we shall be late."

And Alice, bewildered by her friend's persuasions, and by the suggestions of her own vanity, yielded as usual to her impulses.

Three years have passed away, and Edith Glenville is once more alone in her chamber. The rose of health is faded on her cheek, and in its place is a bright hectic spot which tells that the grief so carefully hidden has done its work. The noble beauty of her features is still unchanged, but blended with their pure intellectual expression, is a softness and tenderness which they did not formerly wear, and which has, perhaps, been caused by suffering or perhaps by compassion for the altered but still beautiful creature, who now enters the apartment, with a paper in her hand. She advanced to the side of Edith, and pointing with her slender finger to a paragraph in which, among a list of passengers just arrived from Europe, was the name of Henry Percival, said,

"He is come."

"I knew it, dearest: and to-morrow we will seek him, and you will again be happy."

"Oh! Edith, I dare not go to him. When I remember how coldly he left me, without one word of farewell. When I read again and again the cruel lines which told me I had forfeited his esteem and was unworthy to be his wife, and reflect that by my unfeeling levity I deserved it all, my heart faints within me, and I have not courage to meet him."

"Do not give way to despair, my sweet Alice.—Henry Percival loves you, and those who love can forgive much. You have long since repented the errors into which your youth and want of self-discipline betrayed you, and are now far more worthy his affection than when he made you his wife."

"And if I am, it is to you I owe it. Dear—dear Edith, how shall I repay you for all your goodness? When I was deserted by my husband, and exposed to the sneers of an unfeeling world, and the contemptuous pity of the hollow friends whose flatteries had seduced me from my duty, you alone came to my relief. You watched over my bed of sickness—soothed my despair—and led me to the only true source of consolation. And now you will leave your peaceful home to intercede for me with the husband whom I dare not approach alone."

"I have done nothing for you, Alice, for which I am not repaid a thousand fold by your affection, and by the improvement in your character. But we must travel early to-morrow. Good night, love," and kissing the cheek of her companion, the latter fondly returned the caress, and withdrew from the apartment.

"A lady to see you, sir," said a waiter at the Astor House, as he threw open the door of a room in which a gentleman was seated with a book in his hand, the leaves of which he was carelessly turning, while his mind appeared totally abstracted from its contents. He arose from his seat as his visitor (who had closely followed the servant) entered the apartment, and sank apparently exhausted on a sofa. As she removed her veil, and the light fell upon her features, the gentleman who had hitherto remained standing in silent amazement, exclaimed, in a voice of surprise—

"Edith Glenville! is it possible?"

"Yes, Henry Percival; I have come to restore you to happiness—to give to your arms a wife worthy of all your tenderness."

"Edith, what can you mean?"

"I mean that Alice Percival, your wife, is in this city—in this house—waiting only your permission to implore your forgiveness of her past errors, and to dedicate her future life to your happiness."

"It is impossible, Edith; I can never regard her as my wife. She has forfeited my esteem, and it is not in my own power to restore my confidence in her principles.

"She is far more worthy of esteem now, than when, an inexperienced child, you took her from the home which had sheltered and the friends who had watched over her, and exposed her to the temptations of society. Examine your own conduct. Have you been to your wife the watchful guide, the firm, yet gentle friend, which her youth and her ardent and volatile temperament required?"

"Perhaps not—but, though my own conduct may not have been blameless, it cannot form an excuse for the criminal levity of hers."

"Her heart is pure, Henry, and she has been sorely punished for her faults. The agony which your desertion caused, has robbed her young cheek of its bloom, and should your severity continue, and the hope which for three years has sustained her, be withdrawn, she will not long survive it."

"And where have those years been passed?"

"In my house, and under my care. When you left her, and refused to listen to her passionate pleadings, the agony of her mind produced a violent illness, which brought her to the brink of the grave.—Her attendant wrote to me, and I hastened to her bedside. For weeks her life was despared of, and when at last she recovered, I brought her to my home, where she has since remained, living in utter seclusion—cheered only by the hope of your return, and endeavoring to correct those errors which had been so fatal to her happiness. And she has succeeded.—Adversity has given strength to her character and firmness to her principles. Henry you will not refuse to see and to forgive her?"

"I cannot be, Edith—you know not what you ask. Your feelings have never been outraged nor your heart wrung by the conduct of one that you loved."

"Has it not?" said Edith, the calmness she had hitherto preserved, giving place to a startling vehemence of manner; "Man!" she continued, rising, and throwing off the cloak which enveloped her person, look at this attenuated form, these dim and shrunken features; think you this is the work of time? I tell you no! It is your own heartless ficklenss which has made me what you see. I am fast hastening to the grave. Do not, by your cold selfishness, break another trusting heart."

Edith ceased to speak, and before her astonished auditor had time to reply, she had left the room.

Early on the ensuing morning, Henry Percival rapped at the apartments of Miss Glenville. To his request for admittance, he was informed that Edith was confined to her bed by illness—having ruptured a blood vessel on the preceding night. Hastily scribbling a few lines, he gave them into the hand of the attendant, who, presently returning, conducted him into the chamber of her mistress.

Edith was lying on her bed, pale as the drapery which surrounded her, and exhibiting every token of approaching dissolution. She extended her hand as Henry entered, and motioning him to a seat at her bedside, the attendants withdrew and they were alone. Then, in a low and broken voice, Edith said,

"I did not mean to pain you last night, Henry.—Forgive me if I said aught that was harsh or unkind." He bowed his head, but did not speak, and she resumed—"To promote your happiness, I long since sacrificed every earthly hope, and in confessing that I have never ceased to love you, I have revealed a secret which I had hoped to carry to the grave. Do not make me feel that this last and bitterest sacrifice of woman's pride and delicacy has been made in vain. Receive to your heart your penitent wife, and let my last hours be soothed by a consciousness that I have given happiness to the only being I have ever loved."

Henry pressed the feeble hand he held, and Edith, pointing to the door of a chamber which communicated with her's, whispered—"She is there. Bring her to me." He obeyed, and Alice knelt with him at the bedside. Then, with a last effort, Edith joined their hands, and blessed them; and at the death-bed of his early love, Henry Percival clasped to his bosom his erring but repentant wife.

EMMA WILFRED;

OR, THE COUNTRY GIRL.

BY J. B. FOSTER.

Chapter I.

"Well, it is curious! I who have flirted, danced, and chatted with half the pretty women in town, without being in love, or even feeling one shaft from the quiver of the blind god Cupid, am now madly in love! and that, too, with a rustic country lass. Yet so it is; strange, but true; and there is as much—nay, ten times more happiness in possessing the love of this artless, confiding creature, than to be caressed and flattered by a dozen of these city belles, with their set phrases, and affected airs, which their mothers (poor souls) have taught them, for the purpose of catching, in the noose matrimonial, some rich devil of a bachelor like myself. But thy image, dear Emma, is constantly in my mind's eye. Of thee I think, and of thee alone! for thou art all that is lovely—and I will be true to thee."

Thus thought, or, rather said George Dermot, while listlessly lounging upon a sofa in his father's richly furnished mansion. He was an only son of one of the wealthiest and most aristocratic families in the city of New York. Young, possessed of polished manners, and a faultless exterior; and, above all, the heir to an immense fortune; he was looked upon by many a managing mother as all that was necessary to secure the happiness of themselves and daughters, if he could only be caught. And many were the mild-eyed, simpering daughters, who had been instructed to play the agreeable to him. But all in vain. He was ever the gayest of the gay, and without feeling preference for any, he visited with all. In part, because he was fond of company, and it was necessary in the circle which he moved. Still his heart was free as the morning air—and though a favorite with all, he cared for none.

But now "a change had come over the spirit of his dream," and he was in love. He had withstood all the lovely glances of the talented, proud and coquettish girls of his acquaintance, only to be caught by the modest look and unassuming manners of a plain country lass.

Emma Wilfred was certainly beautiful as the rose of her native valley; with bright, laughing eyes, a polished brow as white as virgin snow, and cheeks that were painted by the same hand that decks the flowers with their lovely hues. Still, in the estimation of some fastidious city beaux, she might suffer in comparison with those whose only wish is to be admired, and who, like a foot pedlar, carry all their valuable commodities upon their backs.

But not so with George; he knew her worth, her innocence of heart and pure affection, which had not been contaminated by the foolish passion of rivalry, which too frequently exists among the fairer portion of the human family.

Chapter II.

A few months previous to the commencement of our story, George, while riding with a companion for pleasure, was thrown from his horse and seriously injured. This accident happened near the residence of Emma's father. She saw the stranger borne towards the house, and ever ready to render assistance to the unfortunate, used her best endeavors to restore the unconscious George to his senses. He was laid upon the bed, and his companion immediately rode back to the city, to inform Mr. Dermot of the unfortunate occurrence, and procure the assistance of a surgeon.

Emma was anxiously bending over the still senseless form of the stranger, bathing and chafing his temples, when, with a groan, he opened his eyes, and gazed wildly around the room.

"Are you better?" asked Emma, in a low, musical voice.

George started, looked at the speaker, and said—

"Better? Where am I? What—Oh! I recollect I am hurt!—Curses on the horse! But how came I here?"

"You were brought here insensible, after falling; and your friend has gone for a surgeon, and to inform your father."

"My father? he will feel—but I do not know—my head! Oh! my head!" and again he fainted.

"I fear," said Emma to her father, who just then entered the room, with some medicine he had been preparing, "that he is seriously injured; what can we do for him?"

At this moment Mr. Dermot, accompanied by a physician, arrived. George was soon restored to consciousness, but he was weak, and in much pain, occasioned by the bruises he had received.

"Well, doctor, is he dangerously hurt?" was the first enquiry made by Mr. Dermot.

"Why," said the doctor, "I think not: but he must be kept very quiet for a few days.

"But we must carry him home."

"You cannot."

"Then he is worse than you wish to have me know, or there could be no danger in moving him so short a distance."

"No! no! Mr. Dermot, he is not dangerously hurt; but he must be kept still, for if a fever should attack him in his present situation, it would be worse to manage than his bruises. Therefore you must be content to let him remain where he is for a few days; and with good care he will soon recover."

"But how can I attend to him here?" enquired the anxious father.

"He shall be well attended, sir," said Emma, blushing at her boldness in thus addressing a stranger.

Mr. Dermot, at the sound of her voice, looked up, and seemed for the first time to notice the lovely girl—he had been so much engaged in attending to his son.

"Yes, yes, dear girl," said he, "I do not doubt it, and to your care I entrust him. I shall send some one from the city to assist you, and remember, he is my son, my only one, and must recover. And now," continued he, approaching Mr. Wilfred, "I must be still more indebted to your kindness, and I beg that you will let my son remain here until he is so far recovered as to be able to bear the fatigue of a removal; and you shall be amply remunerated for all trouble and expense."

"All I can do I will, without any remuneration. And every attention shall be given to the wants of the young man," said Mr. Wilfred.

With this assurance, the father returned to the city, and left George to the care of the farmer and his lovely daughter. Notwithstanding all the care and attention he received from Emma and her father, it was some weeks before he so far recovered as to return to the city. And then he seemed to be in no haste.—In fact he was charmed by the appearance of his lovely nurse, and knew not how to leave the place that held one so dear to his heart as she who had watched over him, and soothed his troubled spirit, by her mild voice and gentle manner.

At last he returned to his father's house, and tried to forget the rustic lass, by mixing again in the jovial circle of his acquaintance. But in vain! her image was ever present, and he turned with disgust from the coquettish companions that surrounded him, to think in private of her who had stronger claims upon his affections than those of mere friendship.

He soon visited Emma, and was received by her with evident pleasure. They rode, conversed, and sauntered over the green fields in each other's company, until George, who had, at first, only admired, now loved, deeply loved the beautiful, unsophisticated country girl.

And on the morning he is first introduced to the reader, he determined to offer her his heart and hand. But, like a dutiful son, he proceeded to inform his father of his intention.

"Well," said the old man, "I have been thinking some time that I must look to you to furnish a mistress for my house; but I did not think you was fully prepared, as yet, for such a change."

"But, father, I may not choose such a one as will suit your tastes."

"Oh, I'll risk that; suit yourself and you will suit me, for I can trust to your good sense in such matters; only I hope you don't think of that proud, conceited Stanton girl."

"There is no danger of that, father; but what put such an idea into your head?"

"Why, you visit there, ride with her, and all those little things that make people talk of a match.—Why, I have heard a number of times, within a few weeks, that the thing was all settled; and been congratulated upon your 'good luck,' (as they termed it,) in securing so accomplished a lady as Miss Stanton."

"Well," said George, "it must be that such reports have originated from her, or some of the family, for I have never thought of the matter, and have waited upon her only because I could not with politeness refuse."

"I was satisfied it was a mistake. But who have you found that is to be the happy bride? Come, let me know."

"You recollect the farmer's girl, where I was sick?"

"What, the one with the laughing blue eyes and cherry cheeks?—yes, yes, I guess I do; for I thought then she was the prettiest girl I had seen this many a day?"

"And you would have no objections?"

"Objections! bless your soul—no, none at all; I had rather have her for a daughter, with her sweet voice, and smiling face, than all the formal, affected belles in the city."

"So I thought, father; but she may refuse me."

"Then you have not made an offer yet?"

"No."

"Well, do so immediately, and she cannot refuse you—at least, I hope not, for I am half in love with her myself," said the old man, laughing.

Chapter III.

George immediately visited Emma. He was, as usual, received with kindness, but that frank, artless manner which he so much admired was gone. Emma looked sorrowful and dejected. She, however, soon assumed a cheerful manner, and engaged in conversation; and, before George left the house, he told to her his love, proffered his heart and hand, but was not accepted,—nor refused.

"May I not hope?" asked George.

"Ah!" answered Emma, "I can but love! But you know not what you say. You are wealthy, and admired by all—I a poor farmer's daughter. You will soon forget me for others more inviting."

"No, by Heaven, never!" exclaimed George; "you are all I hold dear upon earth! and to you, and you alone, I offer myself. I care not, nor do I ask for riches."

"But your father"——

"He has given his consent, dear Emma."

"I cannot answer you to-day, George—I must see my father—mother, I have none."

"Well, I will not urge you; if you refuse, I"——

"Ah! George, I do not refuse, but must have time to converse with my father."

"Well, Emma, I know not your reasons, and will leave you now. But when again I see you, I hope you will grant my wishes."

Thus saying, he bade her farewell, and left the house.

Emma mused long upon her conversation with George. "Can he be sincere in all his offers?" said she; "or is this the way he would work my ruin?—That I love him, I cannot deny; but will he, rich and respected as he assuredly is, marry me? Ah! no! I cannot believe it, and yet he cannot be so base—he is not, I know—and then this letter—but perhaps it is a forgery"—at the same time unfolding a letter which she read aloud.

"To Miss Wilfred—Although a total stranger, I take the liberty of addressing you, to warn you of the danger which threatens to blast your brightest prospects, and shield your sun of happiness in gloom. For these reasons, I take the liberty which I now do, hoping you will pardon my interference when you consider why, and that it is for your good.

"George Dermot I know. That he was for some time an inmate of your father's house, I also am aware. And I am not surprised that he has gained your affections by his winning manners and polished address: for he is well calculated to work upon the best feelings of a woman's heart. But beware of his insinuating ways and honeyed words, for he is full of deceit. You may ask me why I take so much interest in your welfare, and how I became so well acquainted with the subject of this letter. I will tell you. You are young, beautiful and innocent, and may be led from the path of duty by the wily villain. And how I know George Dermot, you shall learn.

"I had a sister, lovely as yourself, happy as the birds of spring, with no care to cloud her sunny brow. But, alas! the betrayer came—George Dermot gained her affections, and promised to marry her, and in an evil hour she listened to his words, and—but enough—she was ruined forever! All his promises of marriage had been forgotten. His purpose had been accomplished, and the victim of his arts was left a poor, despised being, degraded in the sight of the world, while her betrayer is admitted into society of acknowledged respectability, and his acquaintance sought after by many. For these reasons, have I warned you to beware!—and do not let this warning be in vain! For, although I do not give you my name, yet rest assured that it is the truth which I have written, and that, unless you immediately forbid his visits, you will one day reap sorrow for an acquaintance which can do you no good; for Dermot is proud and wealthy, and would never think of uniting himself with a plain country girl, no matter how good or lovely she may be.

"Your Friend."

"Well," said Emma, when she finished reading the letter, "it may be true—at least, I fear it is. I know he is far above me in birth and fortune; but still he may be honest in his pretensions. Would that I knew—for, from the first time I saw him, pale and senseless, I loved him. But my father must decide. In him I can trust.

Chapter IV.

We must now leave Emma for a short time, and introduce the reader to Mary Stanton, the daughter of a reputed wealthy merchant in the city. She was called by many a beautiful girl, and in truth such she was, as far as form and features go, and no farther; for her grace of person was all she possessed to make her agreeable.

She was seated in the richly furnished sitting-room of her father's mansion, when her mother entered.

"Mary," said she, "was that George Dermot that just went out?"

"Yes, mother."

"How did he appear?"

"As usual; how do you suppose?"

"Why, Mary, you know what I mean; has he made any advances?"

"Not to me."

"Not to you!—what do you mean?"

"I mean that all the interest he ever shewed for me appears to be lost, or all swallowed up in the thoughts of that country Miss; and I actually believe that he is madly in love with her, because, forsooth, when he was hurt, she watched and tended him just as any servant would have done for the pay she received."

"But do you suppose that he has any idea of really marrying her?" asked the mother.

"I hope not, but fear that he has; for he is one of that kind, that care but little or nothing for what people say or think, if he only pleases himself. And he just now said, when I intimated his frequent visits to the country, that he, in looking for a partner, did not look for wealth, for he had enough of that; nor fashion, for he was sick of it. But I think I shall spoil his fun with that Wilfred girl."

"How?"

"Why, that letter I wrote, I think, will do the work: if not, we must call upon her by accident, and inadvertantly make some remarks derogatory to George's morality."

"But do you know that she got the letter?"

"Yes, by what George said about the coldness of those we love, I know that she has her suspicions awakened, and he has noted the change in her manner."

"Did he call her by name?"

"No—and I pretended to not understand his allusions to rural simplicity and innocence."

"Well, time alone will determine whether you succeed or not; but I think he will propose to you."

"He would if it were not for this Wilfred girl.—And we must call there, mother, and follow up what I have commenced."

"Well, manage to suit yourself, and secure him if possible; for he is the best match in the city."

Thus saying, the mother left the room.

Mary sat for some time in silence, apparently engaged in thought. At last, rising, she said—

"It is the only way! I must see her, and accidentally tell her of what I have written; and she can but believe it to be true. And if she is the girl I believe her to be, she will discard a man whom she thinks to be a rake and libertine."

When George again visited the house of Mr. Wilfred, he was met at the door by the father, who informed him that Emma was absent from home;—"but," continued he, "I wish to converse with you a few moments." So saying, he led the way into the house. After being seated, he asked, with a tremulous voice—

"What are your intentions towards my daughter?"

"My intentions?" exclaimed George, with surprise.

"Yes."

"They are honorable, sir. I would, with her and your consent, make her my wife."

"You marry a plain farmer's daughter," said the father, with a smile of derision upon his lips.

"I assure you," said George, "that is my wish. And I would now make a formal request of your compliance with my wishes."

"I cannot doubt your sincerity, young man," said the father; "but look at that letter, and see if I had not cause, as a father, to make this formal inquiry." At the same time he handed to George the letter with which the reader is already acquainted. With surprise he saw the means some unknown enemy had resorted to to work his downfall; and in silence he mused long to think whom it could be that would thus traduce his character—but in vain! He could think of no one of his acquaintance that, in his estimation, would be guilty of so base an act. At last, starting from his reverie, he said—

"I know not who the author of that note can be. But, sir, upon the honor of a gentleman, I assure you there is no truth in its statements. And I am now ready, nay, anxious to unite my destiny with your daughter's; and all I ask is, your consent to the union."

"But you do not censure me for taking notice of an anonymous communication?"

"No, I do not—and if you have any suspicions, I wish you to make such enquiries in regard to my respectability as you may see fit."

"I wish to make none," said Mr. Wilfred, "your denial is all I ask—nor would I have taken any notice of such a communication, only my daughter is dear to me—her reputation must be kept sacred. And many men, or those who call themselves men, are ever ready to beguile the innocent, and betray them from the path of rectitude. And my duty as a parent was to satisfy myself that your intentions were honorable towards her. Of this I am satisfied; and you have my consent to the marriage; and the love of Emma I know you possess. And all I now care for is, to know by whom, or why that letter was written."

"If," said George, "we say nothing of the circumstance, perhaps more will be written by the same hand, and perhaps something will transpire that will enable me to detect the author."

"Well, well: I am satisfied. Emma will return within a few days, and then we shall be happy to see you."

George then departed for the city—and to inform his father of the unexpected reception he had met.

Mary Stanton was determined to secure to herself the person of George Dermot, either by fair means or foul. And to accomplish her ends, she resorted to the vilest means in thus assailing, anonymously, the character of a friend, and that friend one whom she wished to make her husband, by the course she took to ruin him in the estimation of others. But as is generally the case in like instances, what she expected would work for her benefit, was actually to her disadvantage—for it brought matters sooner to a crisis; and she, of course, had less time to captivate the object of her wishes by her fashionable appearance—which she foolishly thought could not be withstood.

A few days after her conversation with her mother, they rode into the country, and leaving their carriage within a short distance of the residence of Mr. Wilfred, proceeded on foot to the house. Although total strangers, they were received by Emma with politeness.

"We have been rambling around," said Mary, "admiring the beautiful scenery of the country, and inhaling the pure air scented with the flowers of the fields until we are tired; and I prevailed upon mother to stop for a short time in your pretty cottage—presuming that we should not intrude."

"Not at all," said Emma: "no intrusion." And she offered them some refreshments, of which they liberally partook.

"Do you not prefer the country to a city life?" asked Mary, anxious to commence conversation with her whom she hoped to make her dupe.

"I have never resided in the city: nor do I believe I should like it," answered Emma.

"'Tis much pleasanter here, I think: but then I should be so lonesome with no company."

"Oh, we have company!" said Emma.

"Yes, I presume so—but I mean no parties, no balls, no theatre to attend, or any such thing."

"Balls and parties, I presume, are not so frequent here as in the city, but we have a plenty of [illegible]

I think."

Mary made no answer to this, but rose and walked towards the window. At length she exclaimed, turning to her mother—

"Is not that the place where Mr. Dermot was thrown from his horse?"

"How should I know, child?"

"Why, you knew of it at the time."

"Yes, and it was near here that the accident happened;—but where, I cannot tell."

"Yes," said Emma; "that is the place; he was thrown down that bank, and taken up quite insensible and brought here."

"Then, this is where he was sick?"

"Yes."

"And he remained here until he recovered?"

"He did—some three weeks."

"I should have thought he would have been in love with you before this time, then," said the mother.

"Perhaps he is!" said Mary; "but I beg your pardon, lady—I meant no allusions to you, nor do I know that you were here, while George—Mr. Dermot—was sick."

"I was at home here," said Emma, blushing; "and as to the love you speak of, I presume he could inform you, if you would take the trouble to make the enquiry."

"Oh! he never tells his love affairs," said Mary; for if he recounted them all, it would occupy all his time."

"Yes, that it would," said the old lady. "Let me see: there was Maria Johnson; he was in love with her—and then the next one was Caroline Seymour: and it would have been a blessing to her if she had never seen him."

"Why, mother? I have never heard any thing about that."

"Well, well, child, he was the cause of her disgrace, and that's enough for you to know."

"Why, mother, you must be mistaken."

"No, I am not; and it would have been an advantage to the world if he had have broken his neck when he fell."

"No, no, mother—don't say any more about him," said Mary, in a whisper, loud enough, however, for Emma to hear; "he is our next door neighbor, you know."

"Well, child, what of that? I shall say what I know to be true, and he is a"——

"Mother, do stop—for he is about to marry this girl, they say!" said Mary, again whispering.

"About to marry her? No, never! Let me say to you, young lady, that he will do no such thing; he is already engaged to a rich, fashionable lady in the city, and"——

"It cannot be possible!" exclaimed Emma, thrown off her guard by the old woman's conversation.

"Cannot be possible! I tell you it is true."

"Well, mother, say no more to injure the lady's feelings."

"I do not wish to injure her feelings; but it is my duty to speak. And if I had known that that libertine, George Dermot, was here to"——

"Much obliged, Mrs. Stanton, for the character you give me—pray, proceed," said George Dermot, at that moment entering the room. Mary screamed with fright, and fainted; while the old lady, struck dumb with wonder, gazed around the room with a vacant stare.

Emma was busy trying to restore the fainting girl to her senses. At last she opened her eyes, and starting to her feet, said—"Mother, let us leave; all is lost!" and hurried towards the door.

But not so with her mother. She had by this time recovered her composure; and seeing how matters stood, she wished to make the best she could of a bad job. Therefore, advancing towards George, she said—

"Mr. Dermot, you probably know what I have said, and why."

"I heard, unintentionally, however, a few words, coupled with my name, that need a little explanation," said George.

"I will explain! But do not expose us to our friends—will you promise that?"

"If you have reasons for your charges, I should like to hear them," said George.

"Come, mother!" said Mary, who was anxious to get away.

"Soon, Mary;—what did you say, Dermot? Will you promise what I request?"

"If you will answer my questions, I will."

"Ask them, then," exclaimed the old lady.

"Did you write this letter?" said he, producing the one given him by Emma's father.

"My daughter did."

"Is there any truth in the statements here made?"

"Not to my knowledge."

"Why was it written?"

"To secure—to make"——

"Mother! are you coming?" exclaimed Mary, who had already gone out.

"It was because my daughter wished to secure—to make"——

"Don't make her say any more, dear George," said Emma, feeling for the embarrassment of the poor woman.

"Well, well, I understand," said George.

"And you will not expose us?"

"No."

"Upon your honor?"

"I will not! I say."

"I believe you! I have done wrong and ask your forgiveness."

"You have it, Mrs. Stanton."

"And yours," said she to Emma. "If I have caused you any pain, I am sorry for it. Will you forgive me?"

"I do!"

"Thank you," said she, and following her daughter, they were soon out of sight.

"Now, you suspicious creature! I hope you are satisfied—are you not?" said George.

"Yes, yes—but who would have thought that they could have been so base—but I see their object—But how happened you to come in so unexpectedly?"

"I was coming to again offer you my heart and hand, when, stepping into the hall, I heard my name mentioned by Mrs. Stanton. I therefore listened a moment to hear, and found that writing was not sufficient to satisfy her; but she must come in person.—And I think she is convinced by this time, that managing does not always succeed."

And now, reader mine, need I tell that in a few short weeks the pretty country lass was the wife of the honored George Dermot; and the mistress of one of the best and most costliest mansions in the city of New York. Her society courted by all, and she a loved and loving wife.

THE FAITH OF LOVE.

BY MRS. TORRE HOLME.

I.

I blame thee not, my peerless bride,
Though envy hints in sneering tone,
That to thy beauty's graceful pride
More hearts are captive than my own;
'Tis so perchance, yet not a pain
Or doubt, such idle taunts can move,
The force of calumny is vain
Before the stedfast Faith of Love.

II.

I blame thee not—Oh, who would blame
A lily's chaste and snowy flower,
Because some wanton breeze that came
To steal the soft and scented shower
Of her delicious breath, should claim
The treasure of that love-fraught sigh,
Regardless it bestowed the same
On every Zephyr wand'ring by.

III.

I blame thee not—Oh, who would blame
A star that glittered pure and bright,
If some enthusiast loved its flame,
And madly deemed the gentle light
Stole from the cold and distant sky
For his enamour'd glances alone,
Forgetting that to every eye
With equal charm its beauty shone.

IV.

I blame thee not, if some who meet
That gentle voice's magic tone
May vainly hope that sounds so sweet,
Must breathe a passion like their own—
Unconscious that a guardian spell
Some blessed angel casts o'er thee,
Within whose circle nought may dwell
Save Honour and Fidelity.

V.

I blame thee not—no thought of blame—
No Coward doubt—no jealous fear
Sullies the brightness of a name
My inmost soul exults to hear;
No—if before my idol's shrine
The incense of the world is thrown,
There let it burn—the form divine
Is marble, save for me alone.

INVITED BY MISTAKE.

BY MRS. ABDY.

"It is for homely features to keep home;
They had their name thence."—[Comus.

Cheltenham is noted for the gaiety and variety of its entertainments: it must be a remarkable sort of party to cause much excitement at Cheltenham; nothing short, one would imagine, of such an affair as the Kenilworth Tournament could hope to effect it!—Mrs. Estcourt, however, a widow lady of moderate fortune, achieved the wonder; she issued cards for an evening party, neither a ball, nor a concert, nor a private play, nor even a supper, but simply an evening party: the invited were as happy as Cinderella's eldest sisters, the uninvited as melancholy as Cinderella herself!

Mrs. Estcourt's brother, Mr. Amherst, was wealthy and eccentric; he had been thrice married, but died a widower and childless; he had been singularly fortunate in the matrimonial lottery, his three wives having been "positive, comparative, and superlative," in their various amiabilities and excellencies. He was consequently a most determined friend to matrimony, and had used every argument in his power to persuade his nephew, young Amherst, to enter into that desirable pale. The young man professed great readiness to comply with his desires, but was so long in making his choice, that the old gentleman departed from the world before it was decided. His will was opened, and it was found that, after leaving a handsome legacy to his sister, Mrs. Estcourt, he bequeathed the whole of his large property to his nephew, in the event of his marrying within two years after his uncle's death; if he failed to comply with this condition, he was merely to enjoy a life-income of five hundred a-year, and the bulk of the property was to revert to a third cousin with thirteen children! A year and nine months of the allotted period had elapsed, and Amherst was yet unmarried. He came, at the earnest request of Mrs. Estcourt, to pass a few weeks with her at Cheltenham: one of his most intimate friends was staying in the town at the same time, and Mrs. Estcourt soon held a private council with the latter gentleman on the affairs of her nephew.

"You are aware, Mr. Tyrold," she said, "how important it is that my nephew should shortly select a wife; I wish he would allow me to choose one for him. Can you give me an idea of the sort of person he prefers? But why should I ask? I know the catalogue of impossibilities that a bachelor's bride must possess; she must be a kind of union of Corinne, Lucilla, Stanley, Rose Brawardine, and Flora M'Ivor, gifted with the prudence and self-possession of Miss Edgeworth's heroines, and 'finished off' by the grace and fashion of those of Mrs. Gore!"

"Nay," said Tyrold, "you do great injustice to bachelors in general, and to Amherst in particular. He is far from being unreasonable in his requisitions; he only covets exquisite and perfect beauty; like the knights-errand of old, he would fain throw down the gauntlet of defiance to the world in assertion of the charms of his ladye-love."

"I wish my nephew had more sense," said Mrs. Estcourt, (who had never been handsome herself,) in rather a pettish tone.

"That is a very common wish for uncles and aunts to entertain in behalf of their nephews and nieces," replied Tyrold; "but I confess that the infatuation of Amherst has sometimes been too much even for my patience. Life seems to him a mere 'Book of Beauty,' the most eloquent lips would fail to enchant him if they did not,

'For redness, make
Roses look pale beside them.'

Nor would he be satisfied with eyes that beamed intellect and kindness, unless they were canopied with arched eye-brows, and fringed with silken eye-lashes."

"But, since my nephew is indifferent to mental acquirements," said Mrs. Estcourt, "why does he find it so difficult to fix his choice? Surely beauties are not so very uncommon!"

"They are far too common," said Tyrold; "Amherst has been smitten by a beautiful blonde in London: and going next week to Richmond has succumbed to a still more beautiful brunette. Ramsgate has enchanted him with an earthly Titania, and Bath dazzled him with a terrestrial Juno; I wish that, like a prince in a fairy tale, he could have twenty or thirty portraits of beauties submitted to him at once, and make up his mind to choose the most lovely of the collection."

"Would it not be better," asked Mrs. Estcourt, with sudden animation, "if the realities could be presented to him in the same manner?"

"Certainly it would," answered Tyrold. "Bacon says, very justly, that 'the best part of beauty is that which a picture cannot express.'"

"Have you ever been in parties," inquired Mrs. Estcourt, "where they got up a beauty quadrille?"

"Yes," said Tyrold, "and thought it very theatrical and very inexpedient: it caused a decided feeling of envy and jealousy among the guests."

"Oh!" said Mrs. Estcourt, "one must not mind doing a little harm when a great deal of good is to come of it."

Tyrold totally disagreed with the lady's logic and morality, but, impatient to hear what she had to propose, did not trouble himself to contravene her opinion.

"I know many beautiful girls in Cheltenham," said Mrs. Estcourt; "there are others in the neighbourhood. I will give a party: the gentlemen shall be such as I would ask on any other occasion, but the ladies shall be all beautiful."

"And what will you do," asked Tyrold, "if the beauty should happen to be afflicted with two or three ordinary sisters?"

"I shall not invite them," said Mrs. Estcourt.—"With the exception of a few necessary chaperons, who will form an admirable background to the picture, my guests shall all be young and lovely. I shall immediately give out [illegible]."

"Do so," said Tyrold; "whether or not you succeed in providing a partner for life for your nephew, you will make your own name famous in Cheltenham for ever. You will have proved yourself a perfect goddess of mischief, not only throwing one apple of discord among the fair ones of your acquaintance, but a whole basketful of them!"

Tyrold immediately communicated this conversation to Amherst, and, although he affected to laugh at his aunt's folly, it was evident that he was greatly delighted at the idea of the party in preparation for him. But how shall I describe the effect that Mrs. Estcourt's invitation-cards produced in Cheltenham? The cool indifference of the professed beauty, who carelessly threw by her card of invitation, saying that "of course there could never have been a doubt of her receiving one;" the ill-disguised satisfaction of the doubtful belle, who was not quite certain whether she should come up to the requisite standard of appearance; the indignation of the merely pretty girls who received no card, although each had half a dozen flirts who had compared her to Helen, Hebe, and Euphrosyne; and the triumph of the unmistakably plain, at finding that the passably handsome were as much excluded as themselves. A singular circumstance attended this party—not one invitation was refused; several of the beauties had previous engagements, which they broke through to favour Mrs. Estcourt with their society. Some people were so uncharitable as to say that the report of young Amherst's "search for a wife," and the conditions of his uncle's legacy, had a great deal to do with their line of conduct; the report had certainly become public, but of course the young ladies gave themselves no trouble about it, and the variety of exquisite new dresses, ordered during the next few days in Cheltenham, would have been ordered all the same, had Mrs. Estcourt's "beauty party" never been thought of.

"Did you not say," asked Tyrold of Mrs. Estcourt, "that you had mustered all the beauties within a few miles of Cheltenham?"

"I have done so," she replied; "and, in some instances where I have not known the families, I have prevailed on friends to give me an introduction. I have shown myself so open to all suggestions, and talked over the matter with so many of my acquaintance, that I am sure not one beauty, really deserving the title, has been omitted in my invitation cards."

"You are much mistaken," said Tyrold; "the most beautiful girl I ever beheld lives within five miles of Cheltenham, and has not received a card from you."

Mrs. Estcourt stood aghast; she had thought her party the triumph and perfection of good taste and unwearied activity: she felt much as the Princess Badroulboudour might be supposed to have felt when she was told that the palace which she thought so exquisite required a roc's egg to be hung up in the centre of the hall.

"Do you know Mrs. Gerard," asked Tyrold, "who lives four miles from Cheltenham?"

"I met with her several times a year ago," said Mrs. Estcourt; "and have since had the opportunity of conferring a favour upon her without putting myself to any inconvenience, by transferring to her, through a mutual friend, a present which I had just received of some rare flower-seeds, which I had no garden to sow in, and no inclination to sow if I had. I cannot, however, imagine that she can be of any use to me; she is a widow, and lives alone on a moderate income, visits no one, and hears nothing; her only passion is for flowers, and the friend who introduced her to me, said that she always reminded her of the good woman in the 'Temple of the Fairies,' who dwelt in a house of roses."

"All this is true," said Tyrold; "but Mrs. Gerard has a brother in London with a family, and she has, within the last six months, taken to live with her his eldest daughter. Mrs. Gerard visits a few friends in her immediate neighbourhood, and at the house of one of them I yesterday met herself and her niece. Miss Gerard is as lovely as a poet's dream. I never saw beauty at once so winning and so dazzling. I will not tell you that her intellect equals her appearance; to say the truth, she reminded me much of 'Indiana' in Madame D'Arblay's Camilla: but intellect, as I have told you, is not one of the qualities that my friend Amherst insists on in a wife. Miss Gerard is of a respectable family, perfectly lady-like in manner, and just the sort of person to captivate your nephew at first sight: you must lose no time in securing her."

Mrs. Estcourt paused irresolute; the other beauties invited to her festival she either knew to be such by ocular demonstration, or by the voice of popular acclamation; but Tyrold, like many other young men, might have been pleased by an easy deportment and showy person, and magnified the possessor into an enchantress. She gently insinuated her doubts.

"Perhaps," she said, "every one might not think Miss Gerard so handsome as you do."

"You can judge for yourself," said Tyrold eagerly, "by merely accompanying me to the High Street. Miss Gerard told me that she had been sitting for her portrait to an artist with whom I am acquainted; I called on him this morning, and prevailed on him to allow me to see the miniature: it is a speaking likeness."

Mrs. Estcourt, not without smiling at her romantic error, accompanied Tyrold to the artist, and was favoured with a sight of her "fair Portia's counterfeit," which was on the point of being despatched to the residence of her aunt. It was perfectly and unexceptionably lovely, and Mrs. Estcourt returned home in high spirits, to indite her invitation-card to the fair original. Mrs. Estcourt had far too much tact to expect that the quiet, home-loving Mrs. Gerard would leave her garden walks, her blooming flowers, and her warbling aviary, to pass several hours at a Cheltenham evening party, if she had suspected it to be one got up for the purposes of vanity and display. No—Mrs. Estcourt wrote to her in the kindest and most friendly manner, hoped the flower-seeds had answered her expectations, requested that she and her niece would pass the evening of Thursday next with her, and promised in that event to shew her several rare specimens of dried plants, and a new work on botany, illustrated by splendid engravings. A favourable answer was soon forwarded from the "house of roses." Mrs. Gerard, grateful for the past gifts of her correspondent, anxious to see the dried plants and the work on botany, and happy in the consciousness that it was "the merry month of May," and that she had nothing to apprehend from dark nights and rheumatism, replied that she and her niece would be happy to accept Mrs. Estcourt's friendly invitation,—and actually—good, easy, old lady!—prepared herself for a cup of coffee and a biscuit, and subsequent glass of sherry and macaroons, partaken of in company with five or six people as quiet, domestic, and garden-loving as herself!

When Amherst's faithful friend announced to him that a "Queen of Beauty" had been procured for the approaching festival, he received the intelligence with even more satisfaction than could have been anticipated. Amherst, although, as I have shown, the infatuated slave of beauty, was not at all deficient in a right sense of what was amiable, kind, and benevolent; he had recently, in one of his walks in the neighborhood of Cheltenham, met with a family in humble circumstances, to whom he had been the means of rendering much kind assistance in London: they had now become possessed of a little legacy, and had purchased a cottage and some ground close to the residence of Mrs. Gerard. Of her they spoke with the utmost respect, and of her niece with something like rapture, describing her as a ministering angel, dealing to her inferiors not only pecuniary aid, but the kindest and truest sympathy. They did not mention her personal appearance, nor did Amherst ask any questions on the subject, having conjured up in his active and creative mind a vision of an erect figure, with a somewhat faded complexion, a green veil and parasol, and a deep dowdy bonnet! He was delighted to find that the amiable unknown possessed the beauties of the person as well as those of the mind, and, as he began privately to be excessively nervous about his uncle's legacy, and to be apprehensive that, after all, he should be obliged to link himself with a blooming termagant or graceful simpleton, he felt reconciled to the idea that the beautiful and excellent niece of good Mrs. Gerard might prove an eligible bride for him.

The evening of the party arrived, the beauties began to pour in, all looking as lovely as nature, their milliners, and hair-dressers could make them; chaperons wisely filed off to enjoy cards and annuals in an adjoining room, and the houris had "a clear stage and fair play." The whole thing, however, proved a failure; it was all light and no shade; the eye was fatigued with brightness, and longed to rest on some refreshing and quiet object; it gave to the beholder more the idea of a scene in a theatrical pageant, or a beautiful collection of wax-work, than of a meeting of the "Women of England," of future wives and mothers.

Neither were the beauties themselves at all in good humour: each had been accustomed to be the star of her own circle, and to look down with a tranquil sense of superiority on the cheeks lacking bloom, and eyes lacking brightness, in her vicinity: now she enjoyed these triumphs no longer; all were beautiful—some, perhaps, more so than herself!—and in several cases, an admirer, who had hitherto been devoted to one alone, seemed, for the first time, to find out that there were others so fair, or fairer.

Have any of my readers been smitten with the vain ambition of collecting a party of wits together at dinner? If they have, and have succeeded in their undertaking, I appeal to them whether the conversation was not far less brilliant and agreeable than when the party was judiciously compiled of wits and commonplace people. There can be no enjoyment where there is not ease; and nothing is so destructive to ease as the spirit of competition. A few of the beauties were engaged in discourse with their accustomed flirts, but the consciousness that the eyes of Amherst, his aunt, or his particular friend, were sure to be upon their proceedings, imparted unwonted constraint to their manner. Mrs. Estcourt proposed music; but beauties are not, usually speaking, a very accomplished race, and there were few "nouns substantive" among the ladies in question—they had been accustomed to lean on some other person; one could sing duetts with her cousin, and another could play on the harp if her sister accompanied her on the piano; but the cousin and sister were not beauties, and had therefore been pronounced uninvitable.

Mrs. Estcourt began to grow very impatient for the arrival of her "Queen of Beauty," and made up her mind that Mrs. Gerard was a great deal more worldly than she had supposed her to be, to [illegible] keeping back her beautiful niece till a late hour, to enhance the effect of her appearance. Such, however, was an uncharitable conjecture; the fact is, that Mrs. Gerard would have arrived the first of the party, had it not been for the sudden indisposition of the solitary steed attached to her small chariot, which rendered it necessary that another of his species should be procured from some distance.

At length Mrs. and Miss Gerard were announced, and the heart of Amherst beat violently. But why should I particularise Amherst? The hearts of the whole company beat; for Tyrold, with the charitable intention of plaguing the beauties, had signified to them that a guest was expected who would decidedly outshine them all. Mrs. Gerard advanced in a brown silk dress and close lace cap, looking with perfect astonishment on the spangles, jewels, and feathers, embroidered waistcoats, and lighted chandeliers, that surrounded her: she was accompanied by a young lady whom she introduced as her niece, Miss Gerard.

Alas! had some evil enchantment been at work upon her, like that which, in Don Quixote's opinion, has transformed the lady Dulcinea del Toboso into a rustic girl! She was short, without being sylph-like; her complexion was pale, and rather inclining to sallow; her features were irregular; her teeth, although white, were far from even; an animated smile and an intelligent eye might have just preserved her from the imputation of being plain in a party of the usual description, but on this occasion, in the presence of so many beauties, she looked decidedly and undeniably plain, and her unadorned white muslin dress offered a complete contrast to the shining aerial draperies which flattered around her. Mrs. Estcourt felt enraged at Tyrold, who, she concluded, had invented the report of Miss Gerard's beauty, and shewn her a suppositious picture, with the intention of hoaxing her and spoiling the effect of her party. She caught his eye, however, and he looked so unaffectedly astonished and vexed, that she felt convinced that he was guiltless of any wilful deception.

"I need not," she said to Mrs. Gerard, in a low voice, "introduce Mr. Tyrold to you; he had the pleasure of meeting you and your niece last week, and, I believe, was somewhat smitten with the latter."

"Not the niece who now accompanies me, and who is, I am happy to say, my constant inmate," replied Mrs. Gerard. "She was confined to the house that day by indisposition, her sister Angelica, whom we consider quite a beauty, was then staying with me; she left me, however, two days afterwards, to join her family in London. She is to be married in a few weeks, and, therefore, I ought not to blame her for paying her sister and myself a very short visit."

Poor Mrs. Gerard! she thought she had made a plain, straightforward speech, and wondered why Tyrold looked mortified, and Mrs. Estcourt looked worried, and Amherst looked confused, and all the company looked much as the audience at the Opera-house look when an apology is made for "the unavoidable absence of the prima donna through sudden and severe illness." How simple was the solution of the mystery! how natural did it seem that the Miss Gerard now present should have been "invited by mistake!" It was nobody's fault, yet Mrs. Estcourt felt that it was decidedly her own misfortune. How could she at once acquaint all the fair ones present with this provoking blunder? Would they not suppose that she had violated the rules of her party, and introduced this unquestionably plain girl to cast a burlesque over the whole thing? Nay, might they not imagine that the arrival of the damsel in question heralded that of a score of similar appearance, and that they were to be speedily overwhelmed with an avalanche of dowdies? Here, however, were the unwelcome visitors, and, apparently, they both felt quite at their ease.

Mrs. Gerard, although at first rather startled by finding that she was in the midst of what she denominated "a regular party," soon settled the matter with herself by deciding that "Cheltenham was such a gay place, she supposed these were every-day doings." She was very near-sighted, and did not perceive that the young ladies were at all superior in appearance to the "fresh female buds" of parties in general; her thoughts, therefore, immediately reverted to the botanical work, and Mrs. Estcourt gladly accompanied her to the room occupied by the chaperons, and furnished her with an ample source of amusement, wishing that she could so easily get rid of the obnoxious niece.

Miss Gerard became more speedily enlightened on the subject; her quick eye made her aware of the remarkable beauty of her fair neighbors, and her quick ear made her mistress of a conversation carried on by some of them in a whisper, which convinced her of the circumstances under which she had been "invited by mistake." Miss Gerard, however, looked as tranquil and unruffled as Serena, in the "Triumphs of Temper," might have done in a similar situation, cast a complacent glance around her with eyes that had not the slightest tinge of envy, and, having sufficiently enjoyed the contemplation, arose to [illegible] the inner room, thinking that the books on the table there would afford her the means of passing her time more pleasantly than in listening to the vapid and desultory discourse of a very dull set of people.

Amazing sight! Amherst crossed the room to address her! Perhaps his motive was one of unmixed kindness; he might not like the benefactress of his poor pensioners to feel herself neglected. I am afraid, however, that the wish for a little variety had something to do with his action; for, sooth to say, he found the party extremely stupid, and had privately whispered to Tyrold that his aunt, in collecting her assemblage of beauties, had unwittingly been dealing with him much as pastrycooks are said to deal with their apprentices—allowing them such an initiatory profusion of sweets, that they become indifferent to them ever after!

"Do not leave us," he said, arresting the steps of Miss Gerard; "we are not a very brilliant party, but perhaps we may improve."

"Nay," she replied, resuming her seat, "I was about to leave you, because, in one sense of the word, you are so very brilliant a party, that I feared I was injuring the general effect by remaining. Perhaps, however, I was wrong; there is great virtue in a decided contrast; jewellers always display their diamonds upon black velvet, and the pretty faces around me are so numerous, that it must be quite refreshing to them to be put in mind of their advantages, by gazing on a plain one."

Amherst was literally incapable of replying to her. Queen Emma, walking unhurt over the burning ploughshares, could not have offered a spectacle more surprising to the witnesses of her achievement than did this homely young woman, frankly and cheerfully jesting on her homeliness, to the astonished Amherst.

"You look surprised," she said with a smile; "perhaps you expected that I should take refuge in sarcasm or sulkiness; but, believe me, I feel rather amused than annoyed. Having been aware of my plainness of person from the days of childhood, and having borne the misfortune with praiseworthy philosophy, I should no more think of making myself suddenly unhappy on the subject, because accidentally thrown into company with a bevy of beauties, than I should sit down to bewail my want of riches if surrounded by a select detachment of millionaires. I am sorry for Mrs. Estcourt, for I am afraid the Cheltenham paper will dwell as unmercifully on the solitary drawback to her party, as a ruthless critic does on one weak stanza in the course of a clever poem; but, as regards the beauties themselves, I am sure that in their hearts they must consider me a far more desirable visitor than my sister Angelica would have been: she would have rendered them dissatisfied with their own attractions; I can only increase their feelings of self-satisfaction."

Miss Gerard had a delightfully toned voice, full, clear, sweet, and beautifully modulated. Amherst drew a chair, and sat down by her side.

"How correct are your sentiments!" he said; "and how much am I obliged to you for the frankness with which you express them."

"Not at all; I am merely repaying a debt of gratitude to you; your motive could have been only a kind one in coming to sacrifice a part of your evening in talking to a plain person, when you were surrounded by so many handsome ones, and I could not find it in my heart to requite you by a series of 'Yes' and 'No' replies, even with the variation of 'Do you think so?' 'Very true;' and, 'I have often considered so myself!'"

"And can you really suppose that I feel it a sacrifice of time to converse with you?"

"Not now, because it is evident you are entertained by my conversation; but, when you only judged of me by my exterior, your taste could not incline you to cultivate my acquaintance, however your pity might induce you to do so."

"Be more charitable to yourself, and to me."

"I am not conscious of being uncharitable to either."

"Yes, you fail in one species of charity, however you may excel in another; the bounties of Miss Gerard in her own neighbourhood are not unknown to me."

"The bounties of Miss Gerard are all unworthy of being so publicly chronicled."

"Would that she might condescend to indulge me with a private communication of them!"

"Nay, you would soon grow weary of the annals of the cottage and the village school."

"Not when related by one who——"

"Pray pardon me for my want of courtesy in interrupting you, but I am anxious to save you from a still greater lapse of courtesy; a young lady is preparing to sing."

Amherst was silent, and the song was begun and finished.

"Let me prevail on you to favour us," said Amherst to Miss Gerard, with the slightest possible tinge of patronage in his manner; "you need not be discouraged by the style of the lady who has just quitted the piano."

"Assuredly not," she replied, with a smile; "her style is very defective, she has evidently not, like myself, had the advantage of a good master."

"And you also possess," said Amherst, "that advantage which is defined to constitute two-thirds of the requisites in a singer; I am much deceived in your voice in speaking, if your tones are not delightful in singing."

"I suppose I ought, in accordance with the established rule, to say that I have no voice, and that I have a severe cold, and that I am quite out of practice; but, as I could not say any of these things with truth, I am not disposed to say them at all."

"Then you will oblige us?"

"Willingly; as I cannot be ornamental with Mrs. Estcourt's party, the least I can do is to make myself useful."

Amherst led Miss Gerard to the piano, thinking, at the same time, that, clever, animated, and entertaining as she was, she certainly seemed the least in the world vain of her musical abilities. The young lady who had preceded her, and who, on account of her profusion of sunny ringlets, was generally known by the name of "the fair one with the golden locks," had played and sung as fair ones with golden locks are very much in the habit of doing. She had played the symphony of her song with a feeble, confused touch, and when she had got to the end had played it all over again, meaning to perform much better, but in reality performing somewhat worse. She had begun her strain in a very faint, quivering tone; as she progressed, her voice had grown loud, but proportionably husky; when she came near the end of the air, she precipitated the time in her anxiety to get her task over; and she concluded with a cadence pencilled for her by her master, which put every one in mind of a slovenly shuffle at cards, and which she crowned with an imperfect, ill-sustained shake. As she had played the symphony twice over at the beginning, she made matters even worse by merely striking a chord (which was a false one) at the end of her song; smiled around on her auditors as if she were waiting for three rounds of applause, and when told that the song was charming, and that she had sung it divinely, meekly responded, "Do you think so?"

A different sort of exhibition awaited the party. Miss Gerard, after a brilliant and scientific prelude, began to sing a well-known popular song; her splendid and exquisitely managed voice rather resembled the clear, ringing tones of professional excellence, than the low, languid murmuring of amateur performance. She displayed neither diffidence nor confidence; it was evident that the language of song was as that of speech to her, and she was completely careless as to the effect she produced upon her auditory, knowing beforehand what it was certain to be. Few people are accurate judges of either music or painting, but the brilliant singer and the exquisite artist find their way at once to the hearts and taste of the multitude. Of Miss Gerard's singing there could not be two opinions; a child would admire it for its sweetness, and a professor for its science: the room was hushed in silence, and even a few of the chaperons came in from the adjoining apartment to add their tribute of wonder to that of the rest of the party. Miss Gerard carelessly struck chords on the piano, which showed her perfect familiarity with thorough bass, while the burst of applause that greeted her song continued, till, on hearing "the fair one with the golden locks" whisper to a friend that "she thought very little of singing, and that it was far more desirable to excel in instrumental performance," she immediately struck into a wild extempore piece of music. "Mrs. Anderson" could scarcely have made the instrument speak more intelligibly, she absolutely electrified the prim cabinet piano, which had never reverberated to such a touch before. She then rose to quit her seat, but Amherst, almost passionately entreating for "one more song," induced her to resume it, and with exquisite pathos she sang words of high poetic beauty which were unknown to Amherst, adapted to an old Scottish melody which was well known to him.

"Now then," she said to Amherst, "I must hope you will not ask me to sing again, for I do not wish you to subject yourself to the mortification of a refusal."

"And why refuse me, Miss Gerard? Are you tired yourself, or do you think that your hearers are tired of listening to you?"

"Neither; but I have engrossed the attention of the company quite as long as an individual ought to do; a good voice always draws a good deal of notice on its possessor. You observe those two respectable elderly ladies, in purple satin dresses and bird of paradise plumes in their hats; had I sung in a common-place manner, they would not have deigned to recognize my existence, and now I can see, by the complacent way in which they eye me, and the confidential whispers that they are exchanging with one another, that they are each intent on securing me for a party, and are anxious that their evenings should not clash: I shall, however, be hard-hearted enough to disappoint them both. I came into the country in quest of quiet, not of parties, and certainly should never have come to this, had I been aware that it was otherwise than the meeting of a few friends."

Amherst began a speech with "Oh! Miss Gerard," which was doubtless intended to be very pathetic, but his flowers of eloquence were nipped in the bud by the approach of Mrs. Estcourt, followed by the matrons in the bird-of-paradise plumes, whom she introduced to Miss Gerard, and that young lady proved herself deserving of the name of a sybil as well as of a syren, for in a few minutes one of them hoped she was disengaged on the ensuing Monday, and the other professed the most ardent desire to introduce her to a distinguished amateur on the Wednesday following.

Miss Gerard courteously but firmly declined both these invitations, and while satisfying the ladies as to who had been her master, whose music she preferred, and who was her favourite singer, Amherst entered into conversation with Mrs. Gerard, who had been allured from her work on botany by the sweet tones of her niece.

"Can you inform me," he asked, "of the author of the beautiful lines which Miss Gerard sang adapted to an old Scottish melody?"

"Undoubtedly," said Mrs. Gerard, with a smile; "the verses were written by herself: she has a valuable taste for poetry."

"Nature has been very bountiful to her," said Amherst."

"Very much so," answered Mrs. Gerard, "in every respect but that of personal attraction. My niece Angelica, who has just been staying with me, has engrossed all the beauties of the family, but she has not a single accomplishment; her masters gave her up in despair, and in mind she is just raised above absolute silliness. Her intended, Sir William Holbrook, is passionately attached to her, but I think he will find, in a few months after wedlock, that marrying a girl without half-a-dozen ideas, on account of her beautiful face, is something like taking a residence in a dull and unfrequented part of the country for the sake of its beautiful prospect: the eye is soon tired of gazing, and the mind requires to be amused in its turn."

Miss Gerard at this moment joined them: Amherst immediately informed her of his discovery of the authorship of the exquisite verses she had sung, and in a few minutes they were in deep discussion of the merits of Campbell, Wordsworth, and Coleridge.—Mrs. Estcourt petitioned many of her fair visitors for music, but none chose to exhibit after Miss Gerard.

"We must contrive to get up quadrilles," she whispered to Tyrold; "things are going on flatter than ever; mine will be the most stupid party of the season."

Accordingly quadrilles were got up; there was no beauty quadrille, because all the lady dancers were beautiful, with the exception of one who looked among them much as a cheap plaster image might be supposed to do if it found its way into the sculpture-room of the Royal Academy: yet to that individual did Amherst offer his hand, and "led her forth to dance," to the no small anger and displeasure of "the fair one with the golden locks," and many others of the guests. Miss Gerard danced in a quiet and lady-like manner, but nothing more; she declined joining the quadrilles a second time, and Amherst also retired from the dancers, and resumed his conversation with her on the poets. It was the first rational conversation in which he had ever indulged with a young lady; hitherto he had only breathed them the language of complimentary adulation, concluding that all else would be unwelcome to them; but now he was greatly surprised to find that even his clever friend Tyrold could not quote from its poets, or discuss their beauties, so fluently, as the still more clever Miss Gerard. They arrived at length at Alfred Tennyson, and had completely forgotten the gay scene around them, while dwelling on the exquisite images of solitude, dullness and deprivation, contained in "Mariana in the Moated Grange," when Mrs. Gerard, who was growing almost as weary as Mariana herself, although from a different cause, approached her neice to deliver her opinion that "it was not right to keep even a hired horse waiting two hours after the time at which it was ordered to attend."

The party now broke up, and Amherst, after escorting the last beauty to her carriage, just looked into the drawing-room to bid his aunt good night in his way to his chamber, not being able to summon resolution to undergo the lecture which he feared was in store for him respecting his conduct during the whole of the evening. Tyrold was more courageous, he purposely stayed behind, that he might express to Mrs. Estcourt his sorrow at having been the innocent cause of leading her into so untoward a mistake. He began to address his hostess with a most penitential face, when he was startled by seeing her whole countenance radiant with joy, and feeling his hand cordially grasped.

"How can I thank you enough?" she exclaimed; "you are the cause of it all; my nephew will certainly marry this Miss Gerard whom I invited by mistake."

"But," stammered the contrite Tyrold, "she is not a beauty."

"She is all the better for it," replied the vivacious lady; "you know I have always had a particular dislike to beauties, and I think this evening I have disliked them more than ever."

The fact was, that Mrs. Estcourt had caught divers glimpses of her own figure, and of those of her fair visitors, in one or other of her great looking-glasses during the course of the evening, and did not feel at all pleased by the contrast of their appearance to hers.

"I perceive how it is," said Tyrold, brightening up; "you invited a party of beauties because you believed that Amherst would choose no other for a wife, but, in reality, you would prefer Miss Gerard for a niece to any other of your guests."

"Most undoubtedly," said Mrs. Estcourt; "it will be a most desirable connexion: her sister is engaged to a baronet. Then what a voice she has! No beauty possesses such a spell as a fine singer to draw a crowd around her. She will, also, of course, inherit her aunt's fortune, and probably a few thousands from her father, and although my nephew will soon take possession of a large property, yet you know, Mr. Tyrold, as your favorite Burns says, it is always desirable to 'make muckle mair.'"

Tyrold was too sleepy to take the trouble of enlightening the lady's mind as to the real meaning of Burns' passage, but he told her that Miss Gerard was a delightful person, and wished her a good night and pleasant dreams.

Pleasant, indeed, were her dreams, and pleasanter still were her waking thoughts. She had a sincere regard for her nephew, and was anxious to see him married and rich (since he could not be the latter without the former), and was very well pleased to think that his bride, although younger, was not at all better looking than herself.

And all happened as Mrs. Estcourt had predicted. Amherst was a visitor at the "house of roses" the next day; in a few days he spoke of love, and was listened to; and in a few days more he obtained permission to wait on Mr. Gerard in London; and Mr. Gerard (having previously looked at old Amherst's will in Doctors' Commons) received him most favourably, and said he was just the man he would have chosen from the whole world for a son-in-law; and Sir William Holbrook (to whom he had said the same thing when he proposed for Angelica), instead of being jealous of his brother-in-law elect, took a violent fancy for him, and, thinking that marrying would be much more cheerful if done in company, joined him in petitioning to the heads of the house of Gerard that the weddings should take place on the same day, which petition was graciously granted.—Angelica was the loveliest of brides, but Amherst did not envy her bridegroom; the charm of his chosen one's talents, and the brilliant vivacity of her conversation, had developed themselves daily more and more, and Amherst not only felt resigned to her want of personal beauty, but actually began to think that his first impression had been erroneous, and that her appearance was exceedingly attractive!

His marriage caused some emotion in various quarters, and was the occasion of a severe nervous attack to the third cousin with thirteen children, who had begun to make himself quite secure of the speedy possession of "poor, dear, old, eccentric Mr. Amherst's property."

A year has now elapsed since Amherst's marriage, and, although he admires his wife at all times, he particularly admires her when she is in the act of inditing a note of invitation.

"There is something," he said, "in one of these delicate rose-coloured perfumed billets, which conveys a delightful association to my mind; it always brings before me my aunt's Cheltenham beauty-party, and the moment when I first became known to her who now constitutes all my earthly felicity, owing to the happy circumstance of her having been Invited by Mistake!"

LOVE'S MISTAKES.

ALL'S WELL THAT ENDS WELL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LOVE AND MARRIAGE."

"Jilted—deceived—betrayed!—who may ever put faith in woman again! And yet she seemed so good, so noble—I would have staked my life on the sincerity of her affection. And I loved her so fondly—so devotedly—all my hopes of happiness were bound up in her. Oh, Emma! Emma!—how cruelly, how basely have you deceived me! I loved you blindly—I strove to resist all conviction of your perfidy, till at last this fatal letter has proved to me, beyond all possibility of doubt, that you are false. Unworthy girl! I must endeavour to forget you—but I feel how hard the effort will be—how hopeless——"

Such were some of the distracting thoughts which in gloomy confusion filled the mind of Edward Villars, as he paced his apartment, unable to sleep, though the summer night was nearly past. The letter which he held in his hand had confirmed his previous doubts of the truth of her he loved, and had cast him from the summit of happiness to the wretched consciousness of betrayed affection and the utter destruction of the dearest hopes he cherished.

Edward Villars was young, handsome and rich, intelligent and well educated, and endowed with all the arts of pleasing. It is therefore no wonder that he was a general favorite; but though he met everywhere with the most flattering reception—though all the fair sex smiled on him—he reached the age of twenty-six without bowing to the Divinity, who, we are told, is, was, or ought to be the master of us all. His hour was, however, to come. About a year previous to the period when I have first introduced him to my readers, he spent the greater part of the summer in a prolonged tour to the spots most worthy of interest in the Northern and Eastern States.—A cold, caught at a fishing party, on Lake George, was, by imprudence and neglect, increased to a fever, which, by the time he reached Newport, confined him to his room for more than a week. Illness, away from home and among strangers, is a sufficient trial to the spirits of the most cheerful; and Edward Villars' sick room would have seemed to him the most gloomy prison imaginable, but for a circumstance which brightened and cheered his solitary hours.—The sound of a piano reached his ear from an opposite room, and a female voice of remarkable sweetness and power sang with great spirit and expression a variety of songs, from the most intricate Italian opera airs, to the simple and touching ballads of Scotland. He was a passionate lover of music, and as he eagerly drank in these sweet sounds, the restlessness and languor of fever seemed abated, and the minutes, which had passed so heavily before, now fled only too swiftly. Each morning and evening, he waited anxiously for the hour when the tones of the fair musician would steep his senses in Elysium, and make him forget his sufferings and loneliness.—Voices and laughter sometimes reached his ear, and he distinguished one clear, merry laugh, which he fancied must belong to the unknown songstress. As his strength returned, and he looked forward to soon leaving his room, he dwelt upon the hope of seeing and becoming acquainted with her who had unintentionally alleviated his hours of illness. But before he was sufficiently recovered, the sweet tones were no longer to be heard, and when at last he dined for the first time at the common table, he was surprised to find that the numerous lodgers had all disappeared; the season was over—and except a few travellers passing through, he was the only stranger left. His disappointment was great, and was increased by the fruitfulness of all his inquiries as to the name and abode of the unknown musician. The parlour in which the piano stood had been used by all the company, and no one could inform him which of its numerous occupants had been the songstress.

He left Newport as soon as his strength was sufficiently established to allow him to travel, and amid change of scene and occupation, new impressions soon effaced the vividness of that which had been made on him. A pleasurable feeling of gratitude and some slight curiosity still remained whenever he recurred to his stay at Newport; but this was more and more seldom, and he would no doubt have soon forgotten it all, but for an incident which occurred soon after his return to the city of his birth.

The regular season of gaiety had not yet begun—but a few days after his return, Edward received a note from Mrs. Thornton, a lady with whose family his own was distantly connected, containing an invitation for the next evening "to meet the Stanhopes, a southern family, whose acquaintance she was sure he would be pleased to make."

He arrived at Mrs. Thornton's rather late, and found the rooms quite full. A crowd were collected round the piano, and the buzzing murmurs of voices subsided as soon as some one struck, with a firm and experienced hand, the opening notes to the beautiful aria in Norma—"Casta Diva." As soon as the first tones of the singer's voice swelled upon Edward's ear, he recognized the well-known voice of the Newport incognita. He was too far from the piano to see her, but he listened in breathless attention as she proceeded through that beautiful invocation and the following cavatina:—"Ah! bello a me ritorna." The whole soul of the singer seemed poured forth in that enchanting melody, whose words and music are so fitted to express the tender reproaches of slighted affection, neglected and betrayed, yet still ready to forgive—still eager to welcome back the false one; and a murmur of admiration and applause ran through the assembly as she concluded. Edward pressed closer to the instrument, and at last saw her as she stood receiving from the gentlemen round her, the gloves, handkerchief, fan and bouquet, which had been committed to their charge. She was very beautiful—about the middle size, delicately and finely formed, with dark expressive eyes—features not exactly regular, but extremely pleasing in the tout ensemble—a clear, fair complexion, and curling chestnut hair. She was dressed in pale blue satin, with a wreath of blush roses in her hair. Edward eagerly enquired her name of an acquaintance.

"Don't you know?" was the reply. "Miss Stanhope, from Carolina. That tall, aristocratic-looking man opposite is her father. They have come here lately to reside on account of Mrs. Stanhope's health, which is said to be delicate. She is a most fascinating creature, and will no doubt be the belle of the season. Shall I introduce you?"

The offer was at once accepted, as may be supposed; and though Miss Stanhope was surrounded by too many beaux to allow Edward Villars much conversation with her, his admiration was not diminished by the slight acquaintance he obtained. He soon became one of her most devoted admirers, and her constant attendant in all public places. She appeared to him the most lovely and interesting creature he had ever seen—and before the winter was far gone, he was deeply in love with her. His admiration was by no means surprising, for Emma Stanhope was formed to excite and retain the interest of all who knew her. Intelligent, well-informed, and animated—with warm, generous feelings, and the most winning manners, she was still unspoiled by all the flattery and adulation, which, as a prosperous belle, she met with from all who surrounded her.

It was some time before Edward Villars could hope to be distinguished among the numerous young men who filled her father's parlour in the morning—who hovered round her in society—who were always ready to walk with her, to ride with her, to load her with bouquets, books, engravings, and all the tokens of zealous admiration. From her father, his visits always met with the most flattering and marked encouragement. Mr. Stanhope was a man of dignified and elegant manners, but with very little feeling, and a harsh, imperious temper, which rendered him more feared than beloved by his family. His wife was a gentle and amiable woman of delicate health, and rather depressed spirits, who rarely appeared in society, and seemed absorbed in the care of her younger children and her household.

Gradually Edward began to hope that he was creating an interest in Emma's heart, and that he need not despair of ultimate success. His society seemed agreeable to her, and she acknowledged that their tastes and habits assimilated—but whenever he attempted to speak to her of his love and his hopes, she would change the conversation, or laugh at his protestations, and burst forth with exquisite archness and expression into the lively little Scotch song—

"Oh, I'm o'er young—I'm o'er young—
I'm o'er young—to marry yet;
I'm o'er young—I would be a sin
To take me frae my mammie yet.
I am my mammie's ain bairn,
Nor of my hame am weary yet;
And I would have ye learn, lads,
That ye for me must tarry yet."

He was grieved and mortified at her receiving his avowals of attachment in this manner, which he knew not whether to attribute to indifference or coquetry. Her behavior to her other admirers could give him no cause for jealousy. There was only one individual who caused him any uneasiness of that nature. Mr. Forrester, a second or third cousin of the Stanhopes, came to the city which they had chosen as their residence, and was immediately invited to become an inmate of their house till the business was concluded which had brought him from home. He was, of course, supposed by the world to be a lover of Miss Stanhope, though her friends all protested that he neither was nor wished to be more than an old and intimate friend. He was a man of about thirty-eight—not at all handsome, and possessed of no shining qualities; but with an openness and sociability of manner, a benevolence of disposition, and a fund of small talk, which made him liked by every one who knew him. There was nothing lover-like in his manners towards Emma, but the perfect good understanding which existed between them, their frequent recurrence to events of former days, and the confidence she reposed in him, often alarmed Edward Villars, who, like all lovers, could not imagine the possibility of any one knowing the object of his affections without becoming desperately in love with her, and who feared that old friendship and childish partiality might lead insensibly to a warmer feeling.

His fears, however, soon seemed superfluous. Emma ceased to laugh at him, and no longer refused to listen. She would not give him a decisive answer, but asked time to consider—to know him better. Edward had too much delicacy, too much honor, to wish to hurry her into an engagement—and after enduring with patience a probation of some months, he was recompensed for all he had suffered, and made the happiest man in the world (in his own opinion) by the assurance that he was tenderly loved by Emma Stanhope.

June had now arrived, and the Stanhopes, instead of spending the summer, as usual, at Newport, removed to a country house about three miles from the city. Here Edward passed many happy hours every day in the society of his beautiful fiancee. They rode, walked and read together, and seemed to become more and more dear to each other. Their marriage was arranged to take place in the autumn, on the return of the Stanhopes to town.

For a few weeks Edward Villars was perfectly happy; but at the end of that time Emma's spirits seemed unaccountably depressed. Occasionally, she was gay and animated as usual, but for the most part, she was silent and thoughtful; and when Edward talked to her of their plans for the future, and consulted her about those arrangements in which she had formerly been so much interested, her gloom seemed to increase. To his enquiries, she uniformly replied that she was perfectly well—that nothing was the matter—that her sadness could only [illegible] his imagination—and immediately exerted herself to be as gay as usual. Edward was not satisfied by these assertions—he could only account for the change by supposing that some new outbreaks of Mr. Stanhope's violent temper had disturbed for a while the domestic peace of the family, and he looked forward with fresh impatience to the period when he could remove Emma to a happier home, where his true affection would watch over her happiness with untiring devotion.

One afternoon he rode out rather earlier than common, to pay his daily visit. Emma was not on the lawn, or the piazza, watching for him as usual. She did not come to meet him in the hall or the parlour, where she generally sat. He went in search of her, and opened the door of a small library, which was seldom occupied. As he entered, he found her sitting in deep and earnest conversation with Mr. Forrester. They both started on seeing him, and an expression of vexation and disappointment appeared for an instant on Emma's face, which was dyed with a deep blush. Mr. Forrester came forward to meet Edward with his usual cordiality, and entered at once into conversation with him; but it was some time before Emma appeared perfectly recovered from her embarrassment.

Edward reproached himself for being discomposed by this incident, but in spite of all his efforts, he could not overcome the feeling. He had learned to laugh at the folly of his former jealousy of Forrester, and to like him as much as all the Stanhopes did; and during the course of this afternoon he repeated to himself a thousand times that it was ridiculous to be uneasy because Emma and her cousin were talking together earnestly and in private. Nevertheless, Emma's manners seemed rather cold and constrained, and many uneasy reflections passed through his mind as he rode home.

The French proverb is very sensible which says, "La Nuit porte conseil." There is something inspiriting, too, in the influence of morning, and when Edward rose the next day, he came to the conclusion that he had been very silly and suspicious the day before. He rode out again that afternoon, and was received with bright smiles by Emma, who was seated with her mother in the piazza.

It was a lovely day, and he asked her to walk with him to a beautiful view about a mile distant.—She hesitated, and before she could answer, Mrs. Stanhope (who fancied that every body must be as easily fatigued as herself) exclaimed—

"You had better not walk any further, to-day, my love. You will tire yourself too much. You know you were out with your cousin several hours this morning."

The walk was abandoned, and they went into the parlor to sit down to a game of chess, during which Edward's thoughts dwelt more than was altogether pleasant on this long walk, in connection with the incident of the afternoon before.

Emma was usually an excellent chess-player, but to-day she played as if her mind were pre-occupied. The game had not proceeded very far when Edward observed that her attention seemed distracted from the board—her color rose—and she appeared to be gazing eagerly through an opposite window, which commanded a view of the avenue leading to the house. He turned his head to discover what could cause her agitation, and saw Forrester approaching. A pang of jealous uneasiness seized his heart—and he was still more disturbed on observing, when Forrester entered the room, that secret looks and signs of intelligence were passing between him and Emma. The evening passed heavily to all, and Edward fancied that Emma was impatient for his departure, and would be relieved when he bade her adieu.

Edward Villars had given with his love his fullest esteem and trust to the woman of his choice. He was not one of those who think jealousy a sign of love. On the contrary, he believed perfect confidence a far better proof of affection. His reason would not acquiesce in the possibility of her deceiving him; and though what he had observed was, to say the least, suspicious, he was willing to leave it unexplained, or to account for it in any way, rather than to suppose that Emma was cherishing an affection for another while her faith was pledged to him. This was the conviction of his cooler moments, but his feelings were often at variance with his reason, and caused him many hours of uneasiness. Insensibly his manner towards Emma was influenced by the state of his mind. He was either cold and reserved, or irritable and suspicious. She resented his ill-humor, and their intercourse became constrained and painful in the extreme. Such a state of estrangement cannot be better described than in the beautiful words of Moore—

> "And ruder words will soon rush in
> To swell the breach that words begin,
> And eyes forget the smiling ray
> They wore in courtship's earlier day,
> And voices lose the tone that shed
> A tenderness round all they said—
> 'Till, fast declining, one by one,
> The sweetnesses of Love are gone,
> And hearts so lately mingled, seem
> Like broken clouds, or like the stream
> That smiling left the mountain's brow
> As if it waters ne'er would sever,
> Yet ere it reach the plain below
> Breaks into floods that part forever."

Forrester had left Mr. Stanhope's house on a journey which was to occupy several weeks. His absence at this period was some alleviation to Edward's fears; but his suspicions were again roused as one day he surprised Emma reading a letter, which she hastily concealed on perceiving him. Corresponding with her cousin might be perfectly proper, but her eager desire to secrete the letter seemed to imply a consciousness of guilt, which he could not reconcile with his pre-conceived ideas of the high-minded Emma.

About this time, a friend, whom he accidentally met, informed him that a young artist, whose genius Villars had some years ago encouraged, had returned after a long absence, to his native city, in great poverty and declining health, with a wife and child dependant upon him for support. Edward enquired the residence of his former protege, and repaired thither, accompanied by his friend, early the next morning, anxious to impart all the assistance in his power.

The artist's abode was in a remote quarter of the city. As Edward was proceeding thither, he was struck with the appearance of a lady, walking arm-in-arm with a gentleman, on the opposite side of the street. Something in her dress and air reminded him of Emma, and as they came nearer he was convinced that it was indeed she, and that her companion was Forrester, whom he had supposed several hundred miles distant. His surprise and displeasure were extreme. His first impulse was to join her: but the presence of his friend prevented such a step. The view of the sufferings and destitution of the artist's family, and the pleasure of contributing to alleviate their distress, effaced, for a while, the impression left by this unexpected light of Emma. But on his return home, he resolved to remain no longer without an explanation of her conduct. If she were still true to him, she must tell him so, and put an end to his tormenting doubts—if her heart was given to another, he felt that, however unworthily treated, her happiness would still be dear to him, and no act of his should disturb her peace.

With a heart full of melancholy forebodings, he repaired to Mr. Stanhope's dwelling. He entered the parlour, and beheld Emma asleep in a large arm-chair in front of a writing-table. She looked so lovely that he would not for worlds have disturbed her slumber. She was dressed in white—one elbow rested on the arm of the chair—the loose hanging sleeve had fallen back and displayed her snowy-rounded arm: while her little hand supported her head, and was almost hidden amid its clustering chestnut ringlets—the other arm hung listlessly by her side, and a pen on the floor seemed to have dropped from her fingers.—A rich color tinged her cheek—her lips were slightly parted, and the expression her features wore of perfect repose, of almost infantine sweetness, seemed to Edward no less lovely than when her dark eyes were lighted up with animation and intellect, and feeling breathed from her beautiful countenance. As he looked on her, his fears and doubts vanished, and his love and faith returned in full force—but as a half-finished letter on the table met his eye, wonder and suspicion again returned. His own name at the beginning caught his glance; it would no doubt explain all—he seized it, and read as follows:

"Edward—I have struggled with my feelings, but they are no longer in my own power, and I must confess all to you. Before my faith was pledged to you, I loved another—but he was poor: my parent's consent was not to be hoped. My father, whose will I have never dared resist, insisted on my becoming your wife—the man I loved, unwilling that I should suffer by sharing his poverty, entreated me to comply and forget him; your amiable qualities won my esteem, and I yielded to the wishes of all around me, hoping that time would heal the wounds of my heart. I was mistaken—the too dangerous presence of the beloved object, kept alive all my tenderness for him: he, too, strove in vain to learn indifference. We were wretched—we acknowledged to each other the strength of our mutual affection. You saw the gloom I could not hide while love and honor were struggling in my heart—my resolution is now taken: I can offer no excuse for my conduct to you. Spare me your reproaches—I shall have enough to bear from my own conscience and my father's anger. Perhaps some other more worthy"—

The letter stopped abruptly here. Edward read it hastily, crushed it violently in his hand—cast one last look at her he had loved so fondly, and who was now lost to him forever—rushed from the house, and galloped back to town.

It would be useless to attempt to describe the tumultuous feelings which agitated him during the sleepless night which followed. He had imagined that the certainty of the worst would be preferable to the doubt and suspense he had previously undergone; but now he felt how slight had been those sufferings in comparison with the anguish he now endured. Misery, in the destruction of his cherished hopes, and the contemplation of the joyless future in store for him; anger with himself, for having been so long and so easily duped; indignation and hatred for his successful rival; bitter disappointment in the discovery of the falsehood of her on whose truth he had so fondly relied, and whom even now he could not hate; vague ideas of vengeance, soon abandoned, at the thought of all that Emma had once been to him. These formed a chaos of wretchedness, which it would be impossible to depict. The violence of his feelings at last subsided into exhaustion, and as the day began to dawn, he threw himself on his bed and fell, for a few hours, into a troubled sleep.

He had not been long awake to a fresh consciousness of his unhappy fate, when a servant of Mr. Stanhope's asked to speak with him, and delivered to him a note directed in Emma's well known writing. Edward's first impulse was to send it back unopened, but his curiosity, or perhaps an undefined hope, conquered, and he read as follows—

"I am afraid, my dear Edward, that a sheet of paper, which I missed yesterday afternoon, has fallen into your hands. I fear very much that its contents may have misled you. I have no time now to enter into explanations, but I entreat you to come to me as soon as possible, that I may remove any misapprehensions it may have occasioned.

"Ever your own,

"Emma ——."

Edward was divided between surprise and indignation, at the deceptive tenor of this note, and curiosity to know by what means she could attempt to palliate her conduct or explain away what she had yesterday written. He was resolved not to be again her dupe—she had forfeited his esteem, and whatever efforts she might make towards a reconciliation, she could never now be his. But he would see her once more—he would upbraid her with her perfidy—assure her of his indifference and contempt, and leave her forever. So he said to himself: but a feeling of hope, which he would scarcely acknowledge, and strove, though in vain, to suppress, secretly actuated him, and whispered that however incomprehensible and contradictory her conduct, she might yet perhaps succeed in justifying herself.

The bitter contempt—the cold indifference of manner he had endeavoured to summon up, all vanished, and gave place to softer feelings as Emma—radiant with beauty and smiles, her eyes beaming with tenderness—came forward to meet him. The reproachful speeches he had prepared, were all forgotten, and hope again sprung up in his heart, as with a playful and half mischievous expression on her lovely face, she led him into the house.

The conversation that followed, which raised Edward Villars from the depth of despair and wretchedness, to happiness and peace, removed the dark stain that seemed to rest on his Emma's truth, and elevated her to a still higher station in his heart, must be given in substance, not in detail. It would be a breach of confidence to relate all that passed—the reader could not sympathise entirely with the happiness of the lovers, who had always been faithful, and were now more closely united than ever. Where there has been estrangement and misunderstanding—where something is to be confessed and forgiven on both sides—when the dark cloud is cleared away, which rested between those who loved each other fondly and truly, and hope and joy again beam forth brightly—how much must be said which would appear tiresome or, perhaps, ridiculous to a third person. I will, therefore, proceed to relate as succinctly as possible, all that is necessary to the comprehension of what has gone before.

Five or six years previous to the date of my story, Maria Graham, the daughter of an only sister of Mr. Stanhope, came to reside in his family, in consequence of the death of both her parents. Gifted with uncommon beauty and superior powers of mind, warm-hearted, ardent, and enthusiastic, she soon won the love of all the household—even Mr. Stanhope, cold and stern as he usually was, seemed softened by her sweet and winning manners, and was evidently proud of his relationship to a creature so gifted and lovely. When the time of mourning for her parents expired, and she began to take part in the gayeties afforded by a country residence in the Southern States, Maria Graham became the belle of the county—admirers crowded round her, but her heart seemed untouched by their flatteries. At this time, a young artist, who had created some sensation in the neighborhood by some beautiful portraits he had just executed, was engaged to paint a likeness of his niece by Mr. Stanhope, who, among his other pretensions, wished to pass for a connoisseur and patron of the fine arts. The painter was young, handsome, and graceful; and endowed with unbounded love for his art, and a poetic temperament which tinged his conversation and his whole deportment. The long sittings were as dangerous to his peace as to Maria's.—Vowed to the worship of beauty by his vocation, he yielded without fear of danger to his admiration for a face and form as exquisite as any that had haunted his visions—his poetic fancy found a corresponding chord in Maria's soul—her ardent imagination was roused and fascinated, and before the completion of the portrait, which was delayed as long as possible—the painter and his beautiful model had confessed their mutual love and vowed to share each other's fate.

For her uncle's displeasure and opposition Maria was in some degree prepared, and it was with a trembling heart that she made known to him her engagement; but the anger, the contempt, the violence, with which she was assailed, were what in her worst anticipations she had not looked for. His indignation and threats were so overpowering, and the treatment to which she was subjected so humiliating, that she fled from his house and became at once the wife of Claude Seymour. Mr. Stanhope never recovered from the wound his pride received at this misalliance, as he deemed it. His expectations for his niece had been very high, and his mortification was proportionate. Maria's name was forbidden to be mentioned—every object which could recall her remembrance was removed, and her picture destroyed.

For a time, the painter and his bride were as happy as mutual love could make them; but poverty, the worst of all cares, soon penetrated into their Eden. Seymour was improvident and extravagant, and Maria's small fortune was soon dissipated. In the second year of her marriage when, reduced to extreme want after a severe illness, consequent upon the birth of her child, Maria ventured to address a letter to her aunt, imploring forgiveness and assistance. Mrs. Stanhope stood too much in awe of her husband to take any step without his permission.—In spite of all her entreaties and those of Emma, he persisted in depatching himself an answer so unrelenting in its severity that its was evident all hope was vain. From that time nothing was heard of the once idolized Maria, though Mrs. Stanhope wept many tears in secret for her, and Emma's thoughts recurred often with sadness to the probable fate of the beautiful and beloved friend of her earliest youth.

In the absorption of her feelings during Villar's wooing, in the gradual change of her sentiments from indifference to interest, friendship, love, Emma, as was natural, dwelt less than formerly upon the thought of her unfortunate cousin. Early in the summer, soon after her removal to the country, she was shocked and astonished to learn from Mr. Forrester, that an accident had discovered to him Maria and her husband in wretched lodgings and in extreme poverty in the neighboring city. Seymour's health was apparently completely shattered, so that he was able to make no exertion for the support of his wife and child, and the whole burden of the family fell upon Maria, who, by incessant application to needle-work, could scarcely obtain the neccessaries of life. Emma's warm feelings were immediately roused. She visited her cousin secretly, and was shocked to behold her faded appearance, and the wretchedness of her present condition. To alleviate this was her most anxious thought—from her father nothing was to be hoped—her mother could do nothing—to mention the subject would only afflict, and in her week and nervous state of health might be produstive of serious injury. All her pocket money was devoted to the purchase of small comforts for the destitute family—but this, with all the assistance which Forrester could give, (which was but small, owing to his extremely limited means,) was inadequate to the supply of their necessities. When she contrasted her own brilliant prospects with the miserable fate of her once gay and prosperous friend, she was overcome with sadness, which she endeavored in vain to hide from the watchful eye of Villars.—More than once she was tempted to make known the case to him, and trust to his generosity and benevolence for the fulfilment of her own wishes, but a feeling (perhaps unwarrantable) of delicacy and pride, was too strong to allow her to beg charity of him for so near and dear a relative.

About this time, while turning over her portfolio one day, she met with a manuscript which for some time she had entirely forgotten, but which she now recognized as a production in which she had amused herself in pouring forth some of the many fancies with which her girlish brain was filled. It was so long since she had seen it, that she now opened and read it with all the curiosity of novelty, and she could not resist the conviction that it was by no means deficient in interest or merit. The idea struck her that perhaps some of the many magazines which now engross so large a portion of the attention of the reading public, might think it worth publishing, and thus, what had for so many years been neglected and useless, might become a source of profit, and contribute to the relief of those whose wants were constantly present to her mind. Forrester, as an old and intimate friend, seemed the most proper confidante in this scheme. Her eager desire to obtain the means of assisting Maria overcame any hesitation she would otherwise have felt, and she communicated her project to him. She found she had calculated rightly upon his obliging disposition; he promised to offer the manuscript to the editor of a well-known periodical. The conversation which Villars interrupted related to this subject, and her emotion on seeing Forrester the following afternoon, arose from her anxiety to learn the result of his application, on account of which he had gone to town. The article was favorably received—the money for it was advanced, and an offer made for the reception of others from the same hand. Thus encouraged, Emma spurred her inventive imagination to produce another tale, one sheet of which was the paper she once concealed on Edward's approach, and which he supposed was a letter from a rival. The letter which, as he supposed, confirmed his suspicions, was, as may now be readily inferred, a part of the same story, to the hero of which Emma had given the name of her lover. The evening before the day when Villars paid his visit to the artist (who was no other than Seymour), Forrester returned unexpectedly from his journey—as an unlooked for event had allowed him to finish his business sooner than he had anticipated. The next morning Emma took advantage of a shopping expedition to town to visit her cousin, accompanied by Forrester, and it was thus that Villars met them in the neighborhood of the artist's residence.

"And the moral of it all," said Emma, as all was explained, and both were again happy, "is, that I was wrong not to give you my whole confidence at first. Had I allowed no feelings of pride, of delicacy, of reserve, to deter me from making you, my dearest, my best friend, acquainted with all my actions, all my feelings, I would not have been pained by your apparent coldness, nor you tormented by unfounded jealousy. Henceforth, dearest Edward, let us resolve that neither of us shall ever conceal any secrets from the other, but that perfect unreserve and mutual confidence shall always reign between us."

The married life of Edward and Emma, which was always governed by this determination, was as happy and peaceful as can be the lot of humanity.

Claude Seymour, placed above want by the generous kindness of Edward Villars, was removed from his wretched lodging to the purer air of the country, where his health was gradually restored. Taught wisdom and prudence by suffering, he applied himself steadily to his profession, in which he soon rose to eminence, while his wife recovered her spirits and her bloom in the happy change in their circumstances.

Emma's literary efforts ceased with the necessity for their exertion. Her husband and she often laughed at the mistake which the fictitious letter had occasioned, while Edward acknowledged the truth of the proverb—"All's well that ends well"—and confessed that the happiness he enjoyed was heightened by the recollection of the perplexity and misery he had for a short time endured—or, to use the words of the great Dramatist,—

"——and if it end so meet
The bitter past, more welcome is the sweet."

A Rail Road Adventure.

BY THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

If poverty, as it is said, makes us acquainted with strange companions, rail roads assuredly introduce us to as strange associates; and, perhaps, this very circumstance is not one of its least recommendations, for by it we become acquainted with a class of persons whom we might otherwise never have encountered, and acquire a knowledge of human nature which, if not always agreeable, is certainly not without its advantages. How far the adventure I am about to relate may exemplify this hypothesis I leave my readers to judge, but to me it was not void of interest.

Having occasion to go to Norwich to visit an invalid friend, I proceeded to the station whence the rail road trains depart, and, finding I was ten minutes too soon, I entered the waiting-room, and, for want of other occupation, glanced around on the motley groups, who, like myself, were waiting for the sound of the bell to hurry to the carriages.

Amongst the persons present, I was struck by a very pretty young woman, neatly, if not elegantly, dressed, near to whom sat a man whose eyes were rivetted on her face, and who whispered to her words which, whatever might have been their import, brought bright blushes on her cheeks. So intently and so wholly occupied was this man by his fair companion, that he appeared totally unconscious of the presence of the persons who surrounded them, while the woman evinced a degree of unaffected timidity, which indicated that she had not been much accustomed to scenes like that in which she was now placed. The female part of those waiting for the train, eyed the person in question with a curiosity that urged more of ill than good nature. Her smart bonnet, rich veil, neat robe, and fashionable cardinale, were alternately examined; but neither these, nor her pretty face, seemed to find favor in their sight; and all the marks of exclusive attention paid her by her male companion—and they were many—only served to increase the expression of ill-nature so visible in their countenances. The men, too, at least the younger portion, stared more than good breeding could justify, at the pretty woman, and glanced somewhat spitefully at her protector. What is it that renders the generality of women so dissatisfied at observing one of their own sex occupying the exclusive attention of one of another? And what is it that indisposes men towards him who engages the whole attention of a pretty woman, although that pretty woman is a total stranger to them? Alas! for poor human nature, the question may be easily solved. At length the ringing of the bell summoned the passengers to leave the waiting-room, and I noticed the glance of alarm with which the pretty stranger shrank, from the pressure of the bustling crowd who rushed by her, and clung closer to the side of her companion, who involuntarily pressed her arm to his heart as if to re-assure her. This pair were the last to quit the room, for he appeared unwilling to expose her to the rude contact of the crowd; and, prepossessed in their favor, I was glad when I saw them enter the carriage in which I was seated, and take their places opposite to me. But, scarcely had they done so, when the woman exclaimed—

"Oh, dear! I have left my reticule in the waiting-room, and my purse and keys are in it!"

"I will get it in a moment, dearest," replied the man, and he rapidly left the carriage, and rushed towards the place he had named. He had not, however, reached it, when the signal was made, and off started the train like lightning, groaning and shrieking, as if in torture, as it flew along, leaving, every moment, a vast space between it and the route it madly passed over. Houses, chimney-tops, trees, and fields, seemed to fly past us with an incredible velocity, that made the head giddy, so that a minute elapsed before I thought of my pretty travelling companion. When I did, I was really shocked at the metamorphose that had taken place in her countenance. Pale as marble, and her eyelids distended with alarm, she looked the very personification of Terror. I suppose the sympathy that my looks expressed touched her, for she burst into tears, and her bosom heaved with sobs.

"Do not be alarmed," said I, with all the kindness I could throw into my voice and manner; "your friend will certainly follow in the next train."

An elderly woman, with a countenance exceedingly repulsive, pinched in her thin lips, and shook her head in a manner that denoted her opinion that the absent gentleman was not likely to follow.

"It was very strange that your friend should jump out of the carriage at the very time he must have known it was about to start," said the elderly lady, "and somewhat suspicious that he should have done so, on hearing you say your purse was left behind.—People should be very cautious with whom they travel;" and the speaker looked suspiciously.

"If you have lost your purse," said a vulgar young man, dressed in a showy style, "let me be your banker."

I know not whether this offer was heard by her to whom it was addressed, for she took no notice of it, but the elderly woman who had before spoken to her glanced sternly at the young man, and remarked, that "it was well for those who were so rich as to be able to offer to pay for any stranger with whom they might chance to meet."

"Any money you may require until your friend comes, I will gladly furnish you with," said I, taking hold of her hand, which trembled exceedingly.

"Thank you; I am very sensible of your kindness," replied she; but her tears still continued to flow.

"Well, some people have rare luck," observed an elderly woman; "offers of money are made them at every side, without any one so much as asking them who or what they are, whence they came, or who was the person that jumped out of the carriage the moment a purse was mentioned to have been left behind."

"How soon, madam, will the next train follow?" asked the pretty young woman, addressing herself to me.

"In two hours," answered I.

"I can, I suppose, remain in the waiting-room until it arrives?" inquired she; "and though it will be very disagreeable to find myself alone and unprotected——"

"Oh! for the matter of that, I don't mind staying with you," interrupted the young man.

"I thought as much," muttered the elderly lady. "Some people can always find people to stay with them, though other people can't. No one ever offers to pay for, or stay with me; though for the matter of that, if they did, I'd scorn to be beholden to any one: but then I take care not to leave my purse behind, or to travel with people who jump out of the carriage the moment the train is going to start;" and she looked spitefully at the pretty young woman.

"I shouldn't wonder," said the young man, impudently. "Does your anxious mother know you are out?"

"And what's that to you, I should like to know?" answered she, angrily.

"Instead of remaining alone two hours in the waiting-room, would it not be as well for you to continue your route to the place of your destination?" said I.

"And where are you going to, if it is not a secret?" demanded the elderly woman.

"To Norwich," answered the pretty woman.

"I am going to the same place," resumed I, "and will gladly take charge of you to your friends, as doubtless you have friends there, and are expected."

"I am expected," replied she; "but the friends who look for me I have never yet seen;" and she blushed a rosy red while making the avowal.

"Expected by friends whom you have never yet seen!" repeated the elderly woman; "well, that is a strange thing, I must say;" and she looked more suspicious and spiteful than ever.

Many were the attemps made by the forward young man to enter into conversation with [illegible] travelling companion, and as many were those made by the elderly woman to draw from her the particulars of her position; she, however, behaved with a modest but dignified reserve, that foiled the efforts of both, and increased the efforts I felt towards her. Arrived at the station where the rail road terminated, the passengers entered the waiting-room, and I again renewed my offer of pecuniary assistance to the fair unknown, in case she wished to proceed to join the friends who expected her at Norwich, when, to my surprise, she confided to me that she had, only that morning, been married to the person who had been left behind; that she had never previously been separated for even a day from her mother; and that she was proceeding to pass the honeymoon with the parents of her husband, whom she had never yet seen; and that this had been her first journey on a rail road. No wonder, then, that the youthful bride felt alarmed at the embarrassing situation in which she found herself,—a situation which she was pleased to say would have been infinitely more so had she not met with kindness from me. This communication was made to me in a whisper, as we stood apart from the herd of passengers, for her modesty revolted from declaring herself a "deserted bride" in the presence of the impudent young man and suspicious elderly woman. It had hardly been made, when the former walked up to renew his offer of pecuniary assistance and personal protection, both of which, it is needless to add, were coldly rejected; on which he entered the stage-coach waiting to convey the rail road passengers on their route. The elderly woman then approached, and with perfect sang froid asked my pretty companion what she intended to do, and what her name was? Not content with the reserved reply, which did not satisfy her curiosity, she muttered something, in which the words "pride and conceit of some people, who pretended to lose their purses, and were deserted by other people, whom she was sure were no better than they should be," were audible, as she hurried to the coach, the driver of which was loudly vociferating that he would leave her behind, if she did not instantly take her seat. The pretty young bride was so fearful of being left alone for three hours in the waiting-room, and so unwilling to proceed without her husband to the house of his parents, that I, not being particularly pressed for time, determined to remain and keep her company until the arrival of her husband. The three hours passed away agreeably, to me, at least, as I found my companion, well-informed, sensible, and unaffected, and in a few minutes after I had the pleasure of restoring her to her husband, who, judging from the paleness of his face, the agitation of his manner, and his delight at again beholding her, must have suffered nearly as much as his bride at this unlooked-for separation.

THE BOUND GIRL.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

Deeply Interesting and Instructive.

BY SKETCHER.

Chapter I.

In the drawing room of the most princely mansion in Philadelphia, sat Mrs. Marston, and her daughter, Amelia, a fashionable young lady of seventeen—the former engaged in reading, the latter in working upon lace, from a beautiful design which lay before her. It was a magnificent apartment in which they sat, correspondent with the unlimited means of the wealthy merchant, Mr. James Marston. The luxurious sofas—the highly finished mahogany chairs, with their spring-seats—the rich, soft carpets—the large French mirrors in their heavy gilt frames—the superb paintings that adorned the walls—and the many other magnificent things that decorated the apartment—all spoke of the circumstances of its inmates. A bright fire glowed in the grate, and diffused a grateful warmth throughout the room, and whose value was more deeply felt as the biting December wind was heard whistling without.

"Ah!" exclaimed Mrs. Marston, as she arose from her seat, with the newspaper still in her hand, "I see the Harpers have just published another novel, by James. I must send Kate for it immediately."

So saying, she left the room. In a few moments she returned.

"Dear me! how cold it is! It makes one shiver to leave the fire but for a moment."

She drew her chair nearer the fire, and again took up the paper. She cast her eye over it, and read aloud the following paragraph:—

"We have been informed that a committee of benevolent gentlemen have been busily engaged these few days past in calling upon some of the wealthy families of our city, for the purpose of soliciting donations for the relief of the suffering poor. It is a praiseworthy undertaking, and they deserve the warmest eulogiums, as also do those who have already contributed most munificently. We have the names of some of the donors, which we intend publishing, that the poor may know to whom they are indebted. Let the good work go on. Remember, that 'who giveth to the poor, lendeth to the Lord!'"

Scarcely had she finished reading, when the door bell rang, and, shortly after, a servant ushered in the Reverend Mr. Warner and Mr. James. The former was the pastor of the Episcopal church in which the Marston family held an elegantly cushioned pew, with a silver plate upon the door, and which said pew they filled regularly every Sunday morning. The other gentleman was a leading member of the church, and a distinguished literary man.

The usual salutations were soon gone through with, and the gentlemen were seated.

"It is very cold to-day, gentlemen," observed Mrs. Marston.

"Very!" replied the visitors.

"Almost too blustering to move from the fire. Is it not bad walking through the snow?"

"It is, indeed, madam," answered the clergyman; "and you no doubt are surprised to find us paying visits on such a day. But our object in doing so, is one that calls for prompt attention—one that our hearts bid us not delay. Simply, it is this, madam. We are about raising a fund to be appropriated to alleviating, in some measure at least, the condition of the poor, and we are now soliciting subscriptions. We have called upon many, and they have responded willingly to our requests. Here is the list of names, with the amounts given."

She took the paper, and read it over. Then taking a gold pencil from her belt, she wrote upon the scroll, "Jane Marston—two hundred dollars."

"There," said she, as she put the paper into Mr. Warner's hand, "I do indeed feel for the suffering poor, and am always happy to do what I can for their relief. Theirs is a hard lot."

"Thank you—thank you, my dear madam! Yours is a generous heart! And now we must bid you a good afternoon, for we have many calls to make.—Allow us again to thank you warmly. Good day." And, bowing low, they departed.

"How foolish you are, ma!" exclaimed Miss Amelia, when their visitors were gone. "Two hundred dollars thrown away for nothing. I'd have seen them far enough before I would have given them such a sum."

"Yes, yes, my dear; but the list—the list! There was Mrs. Walton down for a hundred—Mrs. Fitz Lee for seventy-five—Mrs. Darley for one hundred and fifty—and many others for such sums; but none were there for two hundred. So when the names are published, mine will be at the head. You see, my dear, I could not help it, could I?"

"No, certainly not, ma, if that was the case."

Oh! what kindliness of heart! Vanity had taken the golden pencil in her hand, and over the signature of Charity had subscribed herself to Poverty as one in friendship warm!

Chapter II.

Scarcely had the door closed upon the visitors, ere it again opened, and a young girl, apparently about fourteen years of age, entered. She was a pretty little creature, with a lithe and graceful form, and an innocent expression of countenance that gave a beauty to her face, which many a daughter of wealth might have been proud to possess. But, alas! what signified that to her? The thick, clumsy shoes—the coarse linsey frock, scarcely reaching below her knees—the rough tow apron—the old slouch bonnet she took from her head as she entered—told plainly of her station in life. She was a bound girl!

She stopped short when she had passed the threshold, and, with her eyes cast to the floor, stood some minutes in silence, save, ever and anon, when a sob escaped her bosom—for her eyes were red with weeping—and the tears coursed each other down her dimpled cheeks. A quick shiver ran through her frame, as the warmth from the grate came in contact with her chilled limbs, for her bare arms and neck were blue with cold.

"Well, Miss, what's the matter now?" said Mrs. Marston, sharply, rising from her seat as she spoke, and approaching the girl.

The poor thing opened her lips as if about to speak, but burst into tears.

"What's the matter, I say?" reiterated her mistress. "Where are the books I sent you for, eh?"

"I—I—indeed I could not help it—"

"Could not help it?—help what? What have you been doing now, miss?"

"I lost the—mon—ey, ma'am." And again she burst into a flood of tears.

"Lost the money!"

"Yes—ma—am!" she answered, brokenly.

"You lost the money, did you? Pray what did you do it for?" asked Mrs. Marston, white with anger.

"Indeed I could not help it, ma'am!"

"You couldn't, eh? Well, take that, Miss—and that,"—and she dealt the child a couple of blows across the face that made her reel again. Now be off, and hunt it, Miss Trollope, and see you don't return without it, d'ye hear?"

So saying, she thrust her from the room, and shut the door.

Verily, "Charity covereth a multitude of sins!"—This woman had subscribed two hundred dollars to the poor!

Chapter III.

The girl returned to the place where she had been so unfortunate as to lose the money, and, though almost frozen, diligently commenced searching amid the newly-fallen snow. Every spot and cranny, where it might possibly have rolled to, did she rigidly explore. For fully an hour she continued her endeavors, but all to no purpose. At length, almost dead with cold, she gave up the search as hopeless, and returned to Mrs. Marston. She told her of her vain search, and explained how she came to lose the money: that as she was pursuing her way to the book store, two boys suddenly ran against her, and caused her to drop it from her hand. Whether they had picked it up, or what had become of it, she knew not, for she could not find it. She begged her to forgive her—told her she could not help it—it was accidental—but Mrs. Marston bid her begone and find it, or never return.

Again did the poor bound girl return to the place where her misfortune had occurred. Again did she renew her exploration of the unlucky spot—groping with her stiffened fingers amid the snow, and peering with anxious gaze upon the whitened pavement, until her eyes became dim, and she could look no more.—She seated herself upon a step near by, and gave vent to a flood of bitter tears.

The streets were full of people, hurrying hither and thither, many of whom passed her by unnoticed. Some few inquired the cause of her distress, but passed on without even a word of comfort; others condoled with her in a few common-place words of kindness, but moved on without offering assistance, and left her there still crying and sobbing.

At length a carriage came down the street towards her. It was a plain but substantial equipage, with no footman dangling on behind—no gaudy housings and liveried driver—yet the sleek and spirited coal black steeds that pranced before it, bespoke such appendages not without the owner's reach. It had almost passed, when a voice from within commanded the driver to stop, and, doing so, he jumped from his box, and, opening the door, let down the steps. An elderly gentleman, of perhaps fifty years of age, alighted, and, approaching the girl, inquired the cause of her grief.

"What is your name, my girl, and why are you sitting here in the cold?"

"My name is Kate Clarendon. I lost some money, and my mistress will not let me return home till I first find it. Oh, I am so cold, sir."

"Tell me all about it, my dear, how did you come to lose it?"

"Kate looked up in his benevolent face, and felt that she had found one friendly heart to sympathize with her, so she told him of the manner of her loss, of her return to Mrs. Marston, of her unfeeling conduct towards her, and her vain search for the money.

"The unfeeling wretch!" exclaimed the old gentleman, "and she struck you, too?"

"Yes, sir," sobbed the girl.

"And bid you find it, or not come back?"

"Oh! yes sir. What shall I do? I am so cold."

"And you have no friends, or relations?"

"None, none," and poor Kate's tears burst forth with increased violence.

"Then you shall go with me, my dear, unless you would rather not. 'Tis a good way from the city—my home—but you shall be kindly treated."

"Any where! any where!" exclaimed the weeping girl, and the old man raising her in his arms bore her to the carriage, and putting her therein ascended himself. The driver closed the door, and, mounting upon his box, drove on.

Chapter IV.

Old Time drives fast. His swift chariot, with "its sightless wheels, and its airy steeds" has rolled on, and left four years buried with the past. It is a lovely summer morning. A brighter sun never shone on the quiet town of N———, or a bluer sky looked down on the glassy and romantic stream which flowed before it. A short distance from the town, on an eminence that gradually sloped even to the very edge of the river stood a stately mansion. It was of ancient architecture, partaking somewhat of the Gothic order, and apparently had stood there for at least a quarter of a century. Yet there was no vestige of decay or ruin in its appearance: it was like a hale old gentleman of some three score years and ten, on whom, the marking hand of time is firmly laid, yet doth he scarcely feel the touch. The grounds surrounding the house were beautifully laid out in gravelled walks—rich beds of rare flowers, and grassy plots, with summer houses and arbors, forming cool retreats from the summer's sun; whilst marble figures and statues, placed at intervals throughout the grounds, gave to the place a most magnificent appearance. Rich fields of fruit and grain, interspersed with rustic cottages, extending as far as the eye could reach on every side, and which appertained to the same estate, told of the good old gentleman of Linden Hall.

Beneath a large arbor of flourishing grape that extended from the immediate front of the mansion for some twenty yards, or more, towards the river commanding the cool breeze that arose therefrom, sat an elderly couple, who, like "John Anderson my Jo" and his dame, had already began to descend the hill of life. If the face is an index of the heart, surely their placid and benevolent countenances told of good and upright ones, and indeed it was even so, for none were more universally beloved for their kindness and benevolence than Col. Liston and his estimable lady. It was a perfect picture of contentment as they sat there, the old gentleman reclining in his large, easy chair, his head bared to the breeze, and his white silvery locks floating adown his neck, ever and anon addressing a few kind words to his companion, as, now and then, he raised his eyes from the newspaper which he held in his hand; while she, in her old cushioned rocking-chair, leaned leisurely back, and alternately plied the knitting apparatus with which she was employed, or replied to the words addressed her by the Colonel.

The old gentleman laid down the paper, and sat for some time in thought. At length he said, suddenly,

"I've been thinking of Doctor M.'s orders this morning. By zounds! I'd rather stay at home than go to Saratoga."

"Yes, but you know it may do you good, my dear, and besides it will give Kate some opportunity of seeing the world. I think you had better try it."

"Well, I suppose if I must I must, and in fact I don't mind it so much now, since you've mentioned Kate, for it is high time she should see somewhat of life. She is a dear, sweet girl. Ah! here she comes."

Just then a clear ringing laugh was heard—the light bounding of feet, and the next instant a lovely girl of perhaps eighteen summers rushed into the arbor, and kneeling gracefully at the old man's feet, emptied her apron of a load of wild flowers which it contained.

She was an exquisite creature, with lithe and graceful form, just rounding into womanhood, somewhat about the middle height, and most symmetrically proportioned. Her head seemed cast in nature's canniest mould, and every feature harmonised into one striking whole. The broad leghorn flat, which had fallen back from her head, left her shining curls of jet free and unrestrained, and they fell in rich masses adown her neck, almost burying her round white shoulders in their vast abundance, save one or two which shaded that sweet and open brow, so fair and snowy, it seemed like breathing marble. The prettiest pair of rosy lips that ever tempted one of Adam's sons were Kate Liston's, and her eyes—those deep blue sparkling eyes, so eternally dancing in very glee—shaded by the longest and silkiest lashes, oh! what a world of language was there in their glance. And then her complexion, always so clear and beautiful, but now heightened in its beauty by the recent exercise which had spread so abundantly the rich carnation over her damask cheeks, and her smile—ah! after all, it was her bewitching smile, so full of archness, so winning, that made her what she was—a sweet and lovely woman.

"Only see what a load of flowers I have gathered!" she exclaimed.

"Ah, you have been taking your usual ramble this morning, you rogue, eh?" and the old man patted her playfully on the cheek.

"O, yes, dear papa, I do so long to roam the fields, and woods; and I love the flowers so, and the birds, and the streams, and every thing in nature."

"It is your pure and innocent heart that makes you love them so, dear child," said the old lady:—May you always hold them dear."

"Ay, and you too, dear mother; for it was you who taught me first to admire all things that bore the impress of His hand," and rising from her kneeling posture, she threw her arms around Mrs. Liston's neck, and pressed her lips fondly upon the old lady's cheek.

"You are a good girl, Kate," said Mrs. Liston, affectionately, "and a happy one, too, I ween."

"And if I am happy I owe it all to you, and dear papa," replied Kate with a look of gratitude. "Ah! how can I ever repay you both for half the kindness I have received at your hands."

"There, there, we've enough of that, Kate," said the Colonel, who liked to do good actions, but did not care about hearing them praised. But come I have something else to talk about. What say you to leaving your birds and flowers for a month or two, eh?"

"Leave Linden Hall!" said Kate in surprise.

"Yes, my dear, leave for Saratoga."

"For Saratoga! I would rather pass the summer here than at any fashionable watering place on earth."

"I' faith so would I, Kate, but the doctor says I must go for the benefit of my health—which you know is nothing to brag of—and so I suppose I must. You know I cannot do without you, and so you will not hesitate; besides you will see something of the world, my dear, and perhaps get a beau there—by zounds that's what I'm afraid of, for if you should fall in love—nay, you needn't blush so, my fairy, I only say if—with some fine young fellow, he might come to carry you off, and then what would I do?"

"No fear of that, papa; but if it is for your benefit I shall be delighted to go to Saratoga, or any where else."

"Spoken like a dutiful child!" exclaimed the old gentleman. "But come, we must into the house, for I hear the bell for breakfast," and supported by Kate on one side and Mrs. Liston on the other, he entered the mansion.

Chapter V.

It was the season at that most aristocratic of all aristocratic watering places—that most select of all fashionable rendezvous—Saratoga. It was the height of the season. The place was full, at least so the visiters said, though the proprietor of "Congress Hall" did not. There was an immense assembly: men of wealth, and men said to be wealthy; learned professors and college students; men of pleasure and men of leisure, doctors, lawyers, officers of the army and navy, and so forth: a vast amount of pretty women, and some not so pretty; belles with fortunes, and some sadly in want of fortunes; old maids and young maidens; some leaders of the ton, and some most essentially led by the ton; managing mothers with very marriageable and unmarriageable daughters—the last mentioned personages, by the way, in no small quantities, being more numerous than any other class of the other visiters—as is always the case at fashionable watering places.

But, as in the heavens, there is always some star more brilliant in its brightness than the surrounding constellations, so in such gatherings of le beau-monde there are invariably some distingues who are more noted than their cotemporaries. At least there were, at Saratoga, three of this class of individuals—viz: two ladies, and one gentleman. The former, dear reader, were no other than our very estimable acquaintances, of subscription-to-the-poor notoriety, Mrs. Marston and her daughter Amelia: the latter, a Mr. William Hartley, the orphan son of a distinguished southern gentleman, an heir to an almost princely fortune; in fact, by far the most "eligible candidate for matrimony" that had appeared in the great mart for wedlock in many years. He was a fine looking young man, of about three and twenty, neither too slightly, nor yet too stoutly built, with an open, intelligent countenance; large, speaking black eyes, with a modest yet brilliant expression; features not so pleasingly moulded; with a forehead, from which were brushed back rich locks as black as jet, and as soft and silky as many a fair lady's ringlets are.

Many were the manœuvres of anxious mothers and their no less anxious daughters, to catch this "gold fish" which was swimming so near them in the waters of Saratoga. And, indeed, he was worthy the patient angling which they so devotedly exercised; he was, indeed, worth catching, not so much for the wealth he was master of, or the goodly looks he exhibited, as the gentle heart and manly soul which he possessed. There were in that assemblage none more affable and condescending, none less proud than he was, and scarce a heart was there that harboured envious or malicious feelings against one who, by his popularity and wealth, was so likely to raise them in the breasts of his fellow men.

The accomplished general is not always successful; there are times when his most skillful efforts fail to gain him victory. So it was with the respective mammas. The fortress they besieged had held out for two whole weeks—(i. e. Mr. Hartley had been there that length of time)—and as yet showed no signs of capitulation. What could be the reason? There had been no lack of generalship; it had been attacked openly and covertly; all the manœuvres known in the code of onset had been resorted to, yet still with no signal of success. To be sure, he had been polite and affable to all, every thing that could be expected from a gentleman—yet there was a kind of non-committal manner about him, that defied and defeated all the intentions of designing mammas, and besieging demoiselles.

There was, however, one mother who was rather more skilful than the rest—or at least appeared to have been so. This was no other than Mrs. James Marston. For some days past, Mr. Hartley had appeared to pay more attention to Miss Amelia than to others; whether it was owing to the management of the young lady's mother, in throwing her more directly in his way, or whether to a preference for the lady herself, was yet to be determined. Be that as it may, there were already some whispers afloat as to his being regularly caught, and Mrs. M. was in great glee at the very idea, and was already inwardly congratulating herself upon her most superior generalship.

There had been but few arrivals of note within the last day or two, and this, perhaps, may have given additional interest to the skirmishing operations we have spoken of. At length, however, there came a party, destined to become of consequence, late at night, and in a very plain equipage, perhaps the most unpretending of the season.

Next day, there appeared in the parlor of Congress Hall an elderly lady and gentleman, accompanied by one of the most bewitching creatures eyes ever beheld—at all events, so said the gentlemen; but we cannot say the ladies were half so liberal in their opinions. There was no ostentation in their manners or apparel, and yet there was that quiet, unassuming air of gentility in their looks and deportment, which bespoke the gentleman and lady at once to all. The eyes of all were upon them when they entered, and in a short time inquiries were flying from mouth to mouth as to who and what they were. For a long time curiosity was held completely in suspense. There were not many gentlemen in the room, it being about the time they generally strolled out, or rode, or took their afternoon siesta. At length, however, they began to drop in pretty fast, and the spacious room soon began to fill, and the most distinguished of the visitors immediately advanced towards the old gentleman and paid him their most cordial salutations. It was now soon known who the new comers were. The reader need scarcely be told that they were our old friends of Linden Hall. Every one was eager to get an introduction to such a wealthy family as they were now known to be, and amongst the most anxious were Mrs. Marston and her daughter, notwithstanding she seemed to disrelish the beauty of the young lady, fearing, perhaps, she might spoil her plans in regard to Mr. Hartley. It was observed that Miss Liston started and seemed somewhat agitated when Mrs. Marston was presented, but whether it was the easy, nonchalant manner of that lady, or the announcement of a name so distinguished in the fashionable world, was not known.

Several days passed away, during which the Colonel applied himself to such means as his physician had instructed him to pursue. Mrs. Liston and Kate were the daily companions of his rides and rambles, and when the old lady could not accompany him, Kate alone was his devoted companion. He was an early riser, as were the rest of his family, and they had often taken a long walk before the inmates of the hotel thought of getting out of bed.—Kate was fond of these early strolls, because she loved to listen to the morning song of the birds, or watch the sun come up from his rosy bed, and because, perhaps, (I say perhaps, gentle reader,) they were sure to meet a certain young and handsome gentleman, who looked admiringly at her, and at whom she blushed so bewitchingly that the young man invariably looked again. Still it was not with the impudent gaze of the conceited coxcomb, who bethinks himself privileged to stare out of countenance every woman he meets. There was always a modest drooping of the eyelids, a respectful expression in the clear speaking eye, that bespoke feelings sensitive and refined. An emotion of pleasure—though why she knew not—seemed to pervade her bosom, as morning after morning they met in their early walks, although no words of salutation ever passed their lips, for by an inexplicable fatality an introduction had never taken place, notwithstanding they had met so often in the fashionable circle of the place. And with no one she would have more readily or willingly become acquainted. Thus said her heart, though she would have blushed to confess it with her lips. Alas, poor Kate!

At length the old gentleman passed him not by as usual, but as they met, cordially extended his hand, and warmly greeting him, presented Mr. Hartley to his "dear Kate," as he always called her. The young man politely saluted her, and Kate, with a maiden blush mantling on her cheeks, returned it with a graceful inclination. The Colonel had become acquainted with him the preceding day, and discovered in him the son of a valued friend. They proceeded on their walks, and soon fell into conversation. Need it be said to whom the walk that morning was a pleasant one?—and to whom it seemed shorter than usual?

Chapter VI.

It was the last half of the season at Saratoga, and the brilliantly lighted Saloon of Congress Hall, was crowded to excess. What words can paint how light the hearts, or how bright the eyes of those assembled?—tell of the fair and lovely forms, or number half the witcheries that bound the heart unto that scene. Our sweet, enchanting countrywomen! they shine where'er they move; at home or abroad—in cottage or in hall—within the ball room's exciting precincts, or the quiet peacefulness of the domestic circle. There are perhaps some exceptions—some Mrs. Marstons among them; but glad are we to say there number is not legion. Right charmingly they looked on the present occasion: whether moving in the giddy maizes of the dance, promenading the Saloon, or joining in the gay and witty conversation of the little knots gathered about, awaiting the next cotillion. But there was one in that assemblage that outrivalled all others: it was Kate Liston. She was now moving in the dance with Mr. Hartley, and through its intricate movements she seemed to glide like some lovely vision. How beautiful she appeared, and yet how simply dressed: a plain white robe of muslin, the boddice of which fitted, with exquisite neatness to her unrivalled bust; slippers of white satin, which were rather adorned by her pretty feet than adorning them; a simple ribband of a slight rose tint, engirdled her waist; (and she had a waist had Kate Liston, not after the modern model, to be sure, of a few inches in circumference, but one like we see in the statue of the Medician Venus; a waist [illegible] could clasp without fear of breaking—an inviting waist—a love of a waist,)and one single diamond, large and brilliant, that sparkled on her snowy forehead, were all the adornments of her person. And yet how bewitching she looked, and Mr. Hartley knew and felt it, as he beheld her, like some airy sprite, bounding to the music of the dance.

Alas! poor Mr. Hartley was in a strange way, so said the discerning mammas who had watched his evolutions since the moment he had made his appearance in the room—aye, watched very closely—for they were so anxious on his account, they had observed him waiting on Miss Liston all the evening—a thing he had never been known to do to any young lady before; they were sure she was an artful, sly thing—that she contrived to tie him to her, that she ought to be ashamed of herself to make the gentleman her attendant, when it was evident he would willingly have been released."

"Mr. Hartley seems quite smitten," remarked one mamma to another. "He has been paying very marked attention to Miss Liston, this evening."

"Humph!" was the reply, "rather say she has been paying it to him."

"Do you think so?" asked the other, with a meaning glance, which said plainly enough, "I think so too."

"Do I think so?" was the repetition—"yes, and more than that, I say she's a vulgar, forward girl—ain't she?"

This latter question was addressed to Mrs. Marston, who just then joined them.

"Forward!" exclaimed Mrs. Marston; "I guess she is. See how she laughs and talks with him, as if she had known him for years. I've been watching her all the evening. I suppose she thinks she's caught him. Only look! as I'm alive, she's inveigling him out of the room; the piazza's a beautiful place for a tete-a-tete. She'll find it interrupted though." This sentence was spoken rather to herself as she moved away. However, although it was spoken in a low voice, it reached the ears of a gentleman, an intimate friend of Hartley's, who had been standing near by, and overheard the foregoing conversation. He immediately took a pencil and card from his pocket, and inditing a few lines, give it to a servant who was passing to hand to Mr. Hartley, in the piazza. He delivered it immediately, and Mr. Hartley read the following lines:

Dear Will:—From a conversation I just overheard, I apprehend that you and Miss Liston will be interrupted in your promenade—Mrs. Marston and her daughter, will be the cause—they have designs upon you, and are jealous of Miss L. Disappoint them if you can, for they are contemptible.

Yours, &c. J.

He slipped the card into his pocket, whilst a scornful smile played upon his countenance, and turned to resume the conversation which had thus been broken.

They were standing at the north end of the piazza, her arm locked in his, looking out upon the beautiful scene before them. It was a lovely night: the moon shining brightly, and with its silver rays softening and mellowing every feature of the lovely landscape before them: the air was fragrant and soft, and touched the brow with a gentleness like the kiss of early love, whilst music strains that floated from the Saloon stole o'er the senses with a lulling effect.

"Yes, it is a beautiful night," said Kate, as if continuing the conversation, "and the last I shall spend at Saratoga for the present."

"Do you leave to-morrow, then?"

"Yes, to-morrow we bid farewell, and away to our own dear quiet Linden Hall—our own happy home."

"And do you leave Saratoga without regret? Is there none here who have made your acquaintance, and whom you care about leaving?" said Mr. Hartley.

"Oh! yes, there are some—a few—whom I am loth to part with," she answered, whilst a slight tell-tale blush overspread her face, "but there are so many cold wordly people in the mass, and I see so much vanity and selfishness that I am sick of it: I shall be delighted to get home. But when do you quit the Springs?"

"To-morrow also, and as we both journey southward, I hope to enjoy the pleasure of your company some distance on the road, if agreeable."

"Most certainly. Papa will be delighted that you journey with us, and——"

But the sentence remained unfinished, for just then the cry of "help! help!" near by, uttered in a woman's voice, startled them, and on looking round, they beheld Mrs. Marston, with apparent terror depicted in her face, supporting Amelia, who was just in the act of fainting. Mr. Hartley turned away his face as if nothing was the matter, and commenced remarking upon the beauty of the landscape, whilst those from in-doors rushed out to lend their aid. Kate looked at him enquiringly. He understood it, and answered—

"Do not think me devoid of feeling, or ungallant, Miss Liston: the young lady's swoon is not dangerous. I had notice that it would happen before it occurred: it shall be explained more fully at some future time."

She smiled, and after standing a few moments in silence, until the fainter had been removed to the parlour, they passed into the Saloon.

Next day our friends quitted Saratoga.

In the course of the ensuing spring, Mrs. Marston received the following note in an envelope, tied with white favours: enclosed was a five dollar note:

Linden Hall, May —, 18—.

Mr. and Mrs. Hartley's compliments to Mrs. Marston, and also to Miss Amelia, and hopes that the former has brought the art of manœuvring to the highest state of perfection, and the latter that of swooning to the most desirable ultimatum. Mrs. H. also hopes that the enclosed note will, in some measure, compensate for the loss Mrs. Marston sustained some years since, through the carelessness of a certain Kate Clarendon, whom she will no doubt still recollect, although she did not, perharps, recognize her in the adopted daughter of Mrs. Liston."

The chagrin of Mrs. Marston may be imagined.—We again remark there are many Mrs. Marstons; but we need not comment.

THE FAILURE:

OR, NOT NOW AN HEIRESS.

BY MISS E. H. RUSSELL WILLS.

Part First.

The last rays of the setting sun stole faintly through the rich crimson curtains which fell in heavy folds from the gilded cornices that decorated the windows of one of the most splendidly furnished apartments in Richmond, Virginia.

Near the centre of the room a seat was occupied by a young and beautiful girl. Her exquisitely shaped arm rested negligently on a table that stood near, strewed with the finest engravings and most costly annuals of the day. But she seemed regardless of the luxury by which she was surrounded, apparently absorbed in gloomy reflections, for the expression of care depicted on her fair brow, spoke evidently of a mind ill at ease. She had remained in this position for nearly half an hour, when her meditations were broken by hearing her name pronounced, and in another instant, George Livingston, her affianced lover, was at her side.

"What, Rosa, sad again?" said the youth. "I have come to bid you a short farewell, and would gladly see one of your bright smiles before my departure. The time was when my presence seemed to afford you pleasure, but there has been a strange alteration lately. Have I done any thing to offend you, dearest?"

"No, George, my affection for you is unchanged, and your society does, indeed, afford me pleasure. My spirits have, I know, been sadly depressed for some time past"—Her voice faltered, and a tear trembled in her eye.

"Why, then," said Livingston, "do you hide from me the source of your inquietude? Who," he continued, taking her small white hand within his own, "who has a better right to sympathize with you than I?"

"No one, George, and sooner or later you must know; it were as well, perhaps, you should hear it now. Do you remember a contract my father made some six months since with Mr. Marshall?"

"Yes, but how does that concern you?"

"Why," said Rosa, "to be as brief as possible, the thing did not succeed as was anticipated, and the consequence is, that all my father's property must be sacrificed to meet demands."

At any other time Rosa would have observed the change in her lover's countenance, but she was too much engrossed with the thought of her parent's difficulties, to notice his emotion. Livingston recovered instantly.

"And what," he asked, "does Mr. Ruffin purpose doing?"

"My uncle," replied Rosa, "who resides in western Virginia, has often solicited him to remove there, and now my father seriously thinks of complying with the request, and has writted to him on the subject."

"But perhaps," said Livingston, thoughtfully, "when he hears of Mr. Ruffin's misfortune, he will not desire the removal as he did in your prosperity, for you know——"

"My uncle," said Rosa, her dark eyes flashing with indignation, "is too noble-minded to abandon his friends, and particularly a brother, in the trying hour of adversity. But for myself I care not," she added, in a more softened tone; "my only anxiety is for my father and the younger children. The latter will be deprived of the advantages of education with which I have been blessed."

"You will," said Livingston, "find a vast difference between a retired home in the 'backwoods' of our state, and the variety and bustle of a city life."

"Yes," said Rosa, "but I would not feel lonely if permitted to keep my books and musical instruments. As this is, however, out of the question, I will have to invent some other mode of amusement. But, George, you spoke of leaving the city?"

"Urgent business," replied Livingston, "requires my immediate presence in Baltimore. I shall be gone but a few days, but will write you; and say, Rosa, may I expect an answer?"

"Certainly, why should I refuse?" When do you leave?"

"To-morrow."

"So soon?"

"Yes—and even now I am neglecting affairs which must be attended to this evening. But when in your sweet society I always linger; but now I must tear myself away. Farewell!" And drawing her toward him, he imprinted a kiss on her blushing cheek.

To give the reader a better knowledge of the incidents contained in our story, we must go back a little.

Among the many beauties who graced the gay circle in which she moved, none was more admired than Rosa Ruffin. Her sweetness and amiability of manner and temper, together with one of the finest forms and loveliest faces which ever adorned her sex, won the esteem and admiration of all who knew her.

She had many offers of marriage, and some the world would call splendid; but she was unwilling to give her hand unless her heart could accompany it. She had almost come to the conclusion that her heart was incapable of being touched by the "softer passion;" for, strange to say, Rosa had arrived at the age of eighteen without ever having loved even in imagination.

Before she had entirely come to the above conclusion she met George Livingston. He was a young man of talent, and one whose society was courted by all. Being both gay and handsome, he was of course a general favourite with the ladies. It is no marvel, then, that when the "admired of all admirers" knelt at the shrine of Rosa's beauty, and there confessed his adoration, that there was a strange sensation about her young heart. And when, a few months after their first introduction, he made an offer of his hand, she consented to become his bride.

Mr. Ruffin opposed an immediate union; he loved his daughter much, and would not, for the world, have caused her any unhappiness. He communicated to no one his thoughts, but determined to watch the youth narrowly, treating him in the meanwhile with friendship and cordiality. Mr. Ruffin was a man of strong penetration, and as George Livingston became a frequent visiter at his house, he had ample time and opportunity to study his character, and in that study became more and more convinced that Livingston was not a man with whom he would willingly trust his daughter's welfare. His intention was, at some convenient time, to point out to Rosa the objectionable traits in her lover's character, knowing that when once convinced, she had too much good sense not to fall in with his opinion, and thereby prevent an unhappy union.

"Sister," said little Mary Ruffin, as she entered Rosa's chamber a few days after Livingston's departure, "Mr. Harry Danforth's servant is down stairs, and says he must see you directly. He has a letter in his hand. I 'spect its from—you know who," she said, looking her sister archly in the face.

Rosa descended the stairs, and found "old Jack" (as he was familiarly termed) in the hall. He handed her a letter, the seal of which was broken. She looked at the superscription. It was directed in Livingston's hand-writing to Mr. Henry Danforth—the post-mark Baltimore.

"There must be some mistake here," she said.

"No, missus, Massa Harry make berry few mistakes. Jack nebber do."

Knowing the close intimacy existing between the young men, and fearing some accident had befallen her lover, Rosa dismissed the servant, and repairing to her own room, with a trembling hand opened the epistle and read as follows:

Dear Harry—I arrived here last Tuesday, and find the business in which I am concerned harder to manage than I had expected.

My principal object in writing to you now is this. Ruffin's sale will take place before I can possibly return. You will please purchase for me Rosa's harp and piano. I don't see how the deuce I can get off honorably without buying them, for in our last conversation she as good as asked me to do so. There is, however, one condition—do not get them if they go too high.

This is a poor business. The girl, it is true, is beautiful, but a man can't live on beauty.

Rosa and wealth would suit admirably; but Rosa and poverty!—away with the thought!

By the way, there is a Miss Rivers here, a reputed heiress; she has taken a great fancy to me; and so soon as I can rid myself of the "old love," I shall on with "the new." You understand me.

Enclosed is a letter for Rosa, which you must hand directly. Adieu! George Livingston.

Rosa could scarcely believe her senses. The idea of Livingston's inconstancy had never entered her mind. She did not think, when in the fullness of her heart, she had told him of her father's perplexities with regard to pecuniary matters, that her words could be so misconstrued. And now she saw her lover's intentions in their true light. How thankful she felt to her father for his interference, when Livingston had urged an immediate consummation of his suit. She held the letter in her hand, while scalding tears coursed each other down her cheek.

"I will not be so weak," she murmured. "He does not merit my love, and I must forget him."

It seems Danforth had gone out the morning in question on a pleasure excursion, leaving orders for his servant to deliver into Rosa's hand Livingston's letter to her. But Jack, who was not at all times a very observant personage, failed to notice particularly, and after his master left, thinking one letter as good as another, took the wrong one, as has been seen.

Danforth was as much, if not more, to blame than his servant; but being of a wild, thoughtless disposition, he generally left the management of his domestic concerns to Jack. And it is to be wondered at that the frequent "scrapes" he was thrown into by his servant's carelessness, had not caused a change of habit.

Pleasure was Danforth's forte; and being in possession of a handsome annuity, his whole time was spent in devising some new scheme whereby to enjoy himself. Sometimes (but it was very seldom) he became irritated, as was the case when he returned home and found Rosa's letter still lying on the table. He hastily rung the bell, and Jack as hastily answered the summons.

"I thought I told you to take this letter to Miss Ruffin?"

"Wall, sar."

"Don't 'wall sar' me," said Danforth, imitating him. "Carry this letter to the young lady instantly, and if you ever fail in obeying my commands again, I will reprimand you severely."

"Why, Massa Harry——"

"Silence, sir, and go directly." Saying this and throwing on his hat, Danforth left the room, to meet some young men by appointment.

"Wall, wall," said Jack, as he picked up the neatly folded epistle and started on his errand, "Wall, wall, I never did see his match. If he'd a jist a waited and listened to me a minit, I could a told him de whole sarcumstans. But no! He too strong headed. Great Scots! If my old missus could see de way he is a carryin' on, 'twould grieve her old sould. But 'taint no use a grievin' on it no how. She done dead and gone, and where's de use a grievin' over spilt milk. De 'youf' (as his aunt call him, t'other day,) will do as he please. My mammy use tell me, when I was little fellow playin' de debbil and turnin' up Jack, 'Nebber mind,' she say, 'playin' kittens make solemn old cats,' and maybe arter Massa Harry gits old as me, he'll come right. Dear! dear! he can't hope always to be bad."

By the time Jack finished his cogitations, he had arrived at Mr. Ruffin's door, and in a very little while had explained to Rosa (in his own way) the cause of the mistake. After giving her the letter intended for her, and receiving Danforth's in return, he elicited from our heroine a promise not to mention the circumstance to his master, and returned home perfectly satisfied.

Rosa read Livingston's letter, and found it contained protestations of never-failing love, together with all other etceteras usually found in such epistles.

With a heavy heart the next morning, she sought an interview with her father, and told him without reserve the events of the preceding day. As she concluded, she looked in his face, expecting to see at least a sympathizing look, but was surprised to see the face of her parent, which had for so many weeks worn an expression of sadness, now wreathed in smiles.

"Well, my dear," he said, brushing the ringlets aside, and tenderly kissing her forehead, "I am glad for your sake this thing has occurred."

"Glad!" said Rosa, "that my first fond affection should be thus trampled upon?"

"Yes, love, you may, perhaps, think my words strange, but I have long foreseen that George Livingston is not calculated to render your life one of peace. It has been my intention to speak to you of this, but the precarious state my affairs have so suddenly assumed, has drawn my mind, for some time, from the subject so dear to your happiness. I know, my child, it will be a painful task to forget and cease to love one in whom you have confided so long. I remember well the pang it cost me when I followed your mother to the grave. How difficult it was to realize her death. The trial you have to undergo is of a different cast. I trust you have pride enough to overcome all the tender interest or affection you ever cherished for one who has proved that he is unworthy your love. I advise you to write an immediate and decisive refusal of his hand. That will be for the present sufficient; I know he loved you as well as he is capable of loving any one, and sooner or later repentance will come. What he will then feel will punish more than all the reproaches I could heap upon him."

Rosa followed implicitly her father's directions, but when she despatched the letter which was to separate her for ever from the being who had won her first love, her feelings overcome her, and she wept long and bitterly.

Rosa Ruffin had loved with all the fervency of a young and trusting heart. Let it not be deemed strange that she mourned over blighted hopes. The thrice happy hours she had spent in Livingston's society—the well-remembered accents of affection so oft-repeated by him, occurred to her memory; and reflections like these, together with the knowledge that the happiness she once enjoyed had "departed never to return," for a while marred her peace of mind.

She struggled hard, but successfully, with her feelings, and gradually, but surely, she regained the natural hilarity of her spirits. And when, several years after their removal from Richmond, Livingston's marriage appeared in one of the eastern papers, she read it without emotion, and heaved not a sigh of regret.

Part Second.

"Really, you have an array of beauty here to-night," said Harrington to his friend Frank Selwyn, as they stood at one end of the ball-room, in the little town of ——, situated somewhere in western Virginia,) surveying the gay group before them.

"Yes," replied his friend, "but you have not yet seen the brightest star in our little firmament. But see, she comes! And now if you do not fall in love with her, I shall give you up for ever to hardness of heart."

As Selwyn ceased speaking, Harrington turned his eyes towards the door. An elderly gentleman entered, on whose arm leaned a female of more than ordinary beauty. Her rich hair fell in tasteful ringlets around her fair and open brow. A faint blush stole over her face, deepening, in its course, the hue of health that glowed on her cheek, and adding "new lustre" to her dark hazel eyes.—A sweet smile played around her beautiful mouth, as she returned the salutations of those around her.

"Who can she be?" muttered Harrington, half audibly.

"Ha! ha!" exclaimed Frank Selwyn, "caught at last. A pretty story indeed!—that the Honourable Sidney Harrington should fall in love at first sight."

"Not in love exactly," said Harrington, almost blushing at being detected in his admiration. "But I consider the lady very beautiful."

"Well, well," said Selwyn, gaily, "I think I must tell Miss Ruffin of her conquest."

"Ruffin!" exclaimed Harrington. "That name is a familiar one. I wonder if she is related to Edward Ruffin, who formerly lived in Richmond?"

"She is his daughter."

"Indeed! I have often heard of him, and, if I remember rightly, he failed."

"He was," said Selwyn, "as the saying is, 'smashed,' but by the aid of a brother who lives here, he was enabled to remove to this place, and his affairs are at the present time in a flourishing condition. If you could witness the content and happiness which pervade their family circle, you would not imagine that they had ever experienced a reverse of fortune."

"I remember, since you mentioned the name," said Harrington, "hearing a few years ago something about a love affair between this lady and some young lawyer, whose name I have forgotten. It was talked of by the public, but as I did not feel interested at the time, all the circumstances have escaped my recollection."

"As to that matter," replied Selwyn, "I know nothing. But if one is to judge from her sparkling eye and glowing cheek, I would never think Rosa Ruffin had been 'crossed in love.' Come, though, we are wasting time; you must be introduced."

"Have you," said a black-eyed beauty to Rosa, "seen Mr. Harrington?"

"No; pray who is he?"

"La! havn't you heard? He is a member of Congress. They say he intends spending the summer here. But, mum, he and Frank Selwyn are coming this way."

If Charles Harrington was pleased with Rosa's personal beauty, he was no less charmed to find her mind highly cultivated. As he gazed on her fine features, animated with intelligent fervour, and listened to the sweet tones of her voice, he felt that for the first time he was actually in love.

Sidney Harrington had been left, at an early age, heir to an immense estate. His high bearing and talents soon won for him a place among the great men of our nation. His residence for the last ten years of his life had been in eastern Virginia. He frequently visited the most noted of our cities, and was pretty generally known, as his acquaintance was very extensive. Many a fair lady tried to win his admiration, nay more, his love, but their "wiles and darts" fell harmless at his feet,—for never, until the night his eyes first rested on Rosa Ruffin, had he felt the power of woman's charms.

His visit to ——— became more and more protracted; and it was not until the yellow leaf of autumn made its appearance that he was aware of the length of his stay; for in the society of her he loved, all other pursuits were laid aside or forgotten. He knew that home duties demanded his attention, and ere many weeks elapsed, he must leave the spot where the sunniest hours of his life had been spent.

He determined to seek Rosa, declare his love, and make an offer of his hand and fortune, but at the same time he dreaded a refusal, for it was only at times he had dared to hope that his love was returned. Remembering the old adage that "a faint heart never won a fair lady," he repaired to Mr. Ruffin's, where he found Rosa alone.

We will pass over their conversation, as courtships are, for the most part, tiresome and disagreeable to any one beside the parties interested. It is sufficient to know that, sanctioned by her father, Rosa became the wife of Harrington.

He knew the history of her early passion, but was contented with the second best love of such a being. We say best, because Rosa's affection for Harrington was based on a rational estimation of a noble, generous mind, with personal attractions, and a highly cultivated understanding.

George Livingston did marry "Miss Rivers, the reputed heiress;" but, to his great chagrin, found the immense fortune amounted to only a few thousand dollars, which was a mere trifle when put in competition with her wants, for she was a complete devotee to fashion, and withal very extravagantly disposed.

She, too, had been deceived with regard to her husband's circumstances, and had thought him much wealthier than he was in reality.

They were married the first of March, and in about a month began to discover the mutual deception, and felt fully sensible, on the first day of April, that they were two as great "fools" as could be found in the United States.

They tried, however, to keep up appearances, and make the best of it; but the internal dissatisfaction at length broke out, and they seemed bent on making each other as miserable as possible.

To give our readers some idea of their domestic comfort, we will introduce a scene some three years subsequent to their marriage.

Mr. and Mrs. Livingston had breakfasted without speaking, or even looking at each other. When they arose from the table, Livingston, in a very sulky manner, placed himself just before the fire, sticking both feet on the fender. His countenance was so vacant, one might have supposed, as he rolled a quid of tobacco over and over in his mouth, that he was thinking about—nothing.

"I declare, Mr. Livingston, you exclude me entirely from the fire," said his wife as she tried to fix her chair in a position to catch as much of the heat as possible from a small grate, in which there was only a moderate supply of coal. "And it is so cold."

"I'm sorry to hear that awful sound again," said her husband. "I was in hopes you had lost your tongue altogether. This is the first time you have spoken to me for a fortnight."

"I've spoken as often as you have," replied his wife, seating herself, "but I'd like to see the person who could hold their tongue, living in the same house with such a thing as you are. I didn't think marrying could have altered one so."

"Neither did I, for I'll be shot if the false curls and pearl powder didn't do wonders for you. Look here, my deary, why didn't you use some this morning? I think your complexion is taken with a sallowness." And he chuckled her under the chin.

"Let me alone," she said, throwing his arm off in a passion. "I'm pretty enough and good enough for you."

"Oh, as to your goodness, we'll not dispute about that, for it is reduced to a nonentity."

"Livingston, you are the meanest man I ever saw. An angel from the third heaven couldn't live with you. One minute you complain of my looks, and the next quarrel with me for asking you for money to look well with. I want that fifty dollars I asked you for two weeks ago, and you didn't deign to give me an answer. I told you then I owed Mrs. Pine twenty dollars, and now I want a dress made, and won't send it to her because she has dunned me several times."

"Make your frock yourself."

"You know I do not know how to make a dress, and you ought not to have married a lady unless you could keep her one. And besides, I brought you three thousand dollars, and have never seen a cent of it."

"Three devils!" said Livingston; "I wish I had been three thousand miles off before I ever thought of you. But here, my little duck," he continued, taking from his pocket a newspaper he had never read. "Take this and cut a pattern. I know, after all you used to tell me about your talents before we were married, that you can make a dress. Anyhow, you are sufficiently ugly, and large in proportion, to do it."

Mrs. Livingston's eyes filled with tears as they fell upon the paper, but she had hardly glanced over it before she had uttered an exclamation of surprise.

"What's the matter now?" said Livingston.

"Who would have thought it?" said his wife. "Mr. Harrington is married. I thought he was invulnerable."

"Let me see," said Livingston.

"Indeed you shan't. If you can't take my word for it, you may do without looking."

"It is a mistake," said Livingston.

"It's no such a thing. A mistake—"

"I tell you," said her husband, "there isn't a woman in the world that Sidney Harrington could could be sorry."

"I reckon," said Mrs. L., her face glowing with anger, "I have sense enough to know any body's name when I see it."

"It is some other Harrington as sure as you are born."

"Mercy upon me! Man, I tell you it is the Hon. Sidney Harrington," said Mrs. Livingston, screaming almost at the top of her voice, "and if you don't believe it, there read," at the same time driving her finger nail through the notice with the pressure of passion.

Livingston's face, though red with too frequent use of "strong drink," became still redder as he perused the announcement, then pale—then red again.

"Well upon my word," said his wife, "one, to judge from your changing color, might guess the lady was some former flame of yours. And now I remember when we first came to Richmond, the servant girl we hired told me you used to love a Miss Ruffin, and I'll bet a sixpence this is the same one. Now I know you did love her."

"You know no such thing."

"You can't fool me," said the lady. "When a man blushes, you may be sure all is not right, and I say you did love her."

"Woman hold your tongue, or I'll——"

Livingston was interrupted by a servant, entering with an invitation to a party to be given the ensuing week at Mrs. ———'s, in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Harrington, who had arrived in the city.

The quarrel was not taken up any more, as Mrs. Livingston was too much engrossed with making preparations for the entertainment to think of any thing else.

The evening of the party arrived, and at the appointed hour Mr. and Mrs. Livingston set out for Mrs. ———'s. The principal thing which prompted Livingston's attendance was a heartfelt desire to see Rosa. She was the only woman he had ever loved, and his vanity led him to suppose that she thought of him perchance tenderly. After entering the house, he left his wife to "talk scandal" with some of her female friends, and wandering through the brilliantly lighted apartments, his eager eye sought out Rosa.

She was seated on a sofa, surrounded by old and loved associates, looking more beautiful, if possible, than when she had occupied the same place a few years before.

As Livingston pressed through the crowd to offer his congratulations on Rosa's return to Richmond, many an eye was turned upon them, for their engagement had been generally known.

Rosa did not start nor betray the slightest emotion, but returned his salutation calmly, and with a grace "peculiarly her own."

A moment after, Harrington approached. When Livingston saw the smile which illuminated her face, and witnessed the look of confidence and love with which Rosa regarded her husband, he felt that no latent spark of affection lurked in her bosom for him.

Cursing the hour when he forsook Rosa Ruffin, he turned and left the room to drown the remembrance of the past in the deep inebriating draught.

From that hour he indulged his fondness for "ardent spirits," and became one among the many victims of Intemperance.

TO THE SOUTH WIND.

From the Isles that lie in the Southern sea,
Where flowers are ever in bloom,
Thou comest, sweet wind, and thou bearest with thee
A burthen of rare perfume.
Thou com'st from the South—thou art speeding on
To the North, on thine azure wing;
And the earth grows green, and the golden sun
Looks warm from the sky of Spring.
Speed on, sweet wind, and oh, that I
Might borrow thy wings for a little space,
How swiftly northward with thee I'd fly,
And rest once more in my kin's embrace.
But vain is the wish, alone, alone
I pine on a stranger shore,
Where I see no face, where I hear no tone
I have seen or heard before.
Thou wilt see my friends, thou wilt pass the door,
Thou wilt fan the buds of the shrub and vine,
Thou wilt kiss the porch where, when day is o'er,
Cluster those hearts close knit to mine
Thou wilt find by that door at play two girls,
Two little girls with bright black eyes,
And cherub cheeks, and dark brown curls;
Pause, gentle wind, as thou passest by,
And smooth back the hair from their foreheads meek,
Softly and gently as I would do,
Kiss each forehead, and lip, and cheek;
As I, their father, would kiss them too.
And if thou seest one dearer far,
With our youngest born upon her knee;
She's dearer to me than those children are—
Bear her a message of love from me;
And whisper, then, tenderly unto her
Those gentle thoughts which I would not show
To any save her and thee; too holy they are
For other and stranger ears to know.
Tell her I think of her night and day,
And long for the rapturous hour to come,
When I shall turn from this land away,
And stand again in my Northern home.
Bear my affection to all at home,
To wife and children, and parents kind,
And brothers who gladden that sainted dome;
Bear my affection to all, sweet wind.

burg, S. C. May, 1844. E. V.

GERALDINE HOWARD.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

"How I wish I could join the royal chase," said Geraldine Howard, addressing her kinswoman, Lady Eleanor Howard, as the clear, shrill blast of a huntsman's horn came to her ear, borne on the fresh and dewy breeze of morning.

"You would be much better employed at your embroidery frame," replied the lady.

"But the air is so fresh, and so bracing, and withal so exhilerating to the spirits," said Geraldine, opening a door and stepping out upon the battlement, "that I cannot, for the present, think of taking a stitch."

This short colloquy had prevented Geraldine from hearing the clattering of horses' feet, when looking round, she beheld three horsemen almost opposite the spot where she stood. One of them, who was a little in advance of the two others, would have arrested the eye even among a multitude. His features were spirited and intelligent, and his fine, symmetrical figure was displayed to much advantage by a hunting suit of Lincoln green, embroidered with silver. This was crossed by a baldric, wrought with the gayest colors, that supported a wood-knife and the silver-mounted bugle-horn which had sounded so cheerily in the ears of Geraldine. It needed only a single glance to show her that he was the same handsome cavalier who had, a few days previous, very opportunely met her as she was taking an airing on horseback, just in time to seize the bridle-rein of her horse, that had taken fright, and thus prevent her—which must otherwise have been inevitable—from being thrown. At sight of her he drew the rein, so as to perceptibly check the speed of his horse, and raising his cap, in which waved a snowy ostrich plume, from the dark glossy curls on which it rested, he bowed with an air of respectful courtesy. Geraldine, so surprised and abashed as to scarcely know what she did, acknowledged the salutation, and then, with face and neck crimsoned with blushes, retreated into the apartment, just as the Lady Eleanor, who at that moment caught sight of the horsemen, issued her command to that effect. To hide her confusion, she now seated herself at her embroidery frame; but, after busying herself several minutes, she found that she had only marred the rose-bud she had been attempting to finish.

"You expressed a wish to join the chase," said Lady Eleanor, "how should you like to be presented at court?"

"I should like it much," replied Geraldine; "that is," added she, laughing, "if the Queen will not oblige me to wear a very wide and a very stiff ruff, for you know that I cannot bear much starch about me."

"Content yourself," replied Lady Eleanor, "for if you attire yourself as becomes a modest maiden, I think Elizabeth's attention will hardly be attracted towards you so that she will take cognizance of either the width or stiffness of your ruff."

"I know not," said Geraldine, "why a descendant of the Earl of Surrey, one of the bravest and most accomplished noblemen of the age, should be too humble to attract the notice of a Queen, great even as is Elizabeth."

"When the Earl of Surrey perished on the scaffold for high treason," replied Lady Eleanor, "it was natural that his descendants should be forgotten; and it is matter of marvel to me that the Queen should remember that any of them continue to exist. I am certain, that were she not solicitous to be the mother of her people, and to shed upon all the light of her gracious countenance, she never would have desired us to be present at the next week's entertainment."

"Whatever was the motive," said Geraldine, "I rejoice in its result; for, in good sooth, I am tired of being mewed up in this old castle, with no one to admire me except my waiting-maid, or myself, when I chance to look into the mirror."

"A chance which happens pretty often; but, if the beauties, at present, are at all comparable to those that used to give splendour to the court when I was of your age, you will put little confidence in the praises of your waiting-maid, when you come to see them, and will, perhaps, consult your mirror less frequently. Alas! there are no such beauties now as when I was young."

"And should I live to be of your age," said Geraldine, a little piqued, "I suppose I should make the same lamentation over degenerate beauty; for I find that each successive generation, according to the most veracious testimony, however it may grow wiser and wiser, is sure to grow plainer and plainer."

"Very true—very true"—said Lady Eleanor, gravely, perceiving not the sarcasm that lurked in the lively Geraldine's speech.

"What is lacking in beauty of person should be made up in becoming attire," said Geraldine, "and a week is, I think, little time enough to prepare a court dress, rich and tasteful, yet not too gay."

"I very well remember the dress in which I was presented at court," said Lady Eleanor. "It was a bloom-colored satin, lined with a delicate pearl-coloured silk, and trimmed with broad silver lace; and my hair, which was commixed to threads of gold in a poem written by a gentleman of the court of the Earl of Surrey himself touching the poetical art, was braided with"—

Just at that moment Geraldine started, changed color, and ran to the window.

"The young huntsman again," said she; "what can so soon have brought him back from the chase?"

"Peace, child—let me proceed with my description. My hair, as I was saying, was braided with rare and costly"—

"How fortunate that there is a rent in this curtain which I can peep through. How gracefully he rides I think there must be something about this old castle that suits his taste, he eyes it so keenly."

"Cannot you listen a moment, Geraldine? My hair which, as the sonnet truly said, resembled threads of gold, was braided"—

"I should take his eyes to be hazle, and truly I should think he was counting the panes of glass in the window."

"What is all this idle chattering about?" said Lady Eleanor, rising and approaching the window. "It will not be to day, nor to-morrow, I trow, that I shall again undertake to describe to you a dress of richer materials and quainter fashion than you will ever be likely to see, should you be present at forty court entertainments."

"Nay, Lady Eleanor, don't be angry, but the young hunter stared so at the window."

"A decided mark of ill-breeding; and I think I can see in his air undoubted proof of plebeian origin."

"If good horsemanship be a mark of plebeian origin," said Geraldine, "I doubt not but that he has a good share of churl's blood in his veins."

Previous to the expiration of the week, when Geraldine was to be presented at court, the young huntsman several times passed the castle on horseback, always slowly, and directing frequent glances at the window where he had caught a glimpse of her as she retreated behind the curtain. His curiosity, however, was destined to remain ungratified, the curtain containing the fortunate rent uniformly affording her shelter, whenever she perceived his approach.

The day anticipated by Geraldine with so much impatience arrived, and, notwithstanding the prediction of Lady Eleanor, there were ladies at court who could boast as many charms as those who were the companions of her own youthful days, though among them all there was no face so fair as Geraldine's.—Her natural good taste had rejected the superabundance of heavy jewelry recommended by Lady Eleanor, and except a necklace of oriental pearls, and a few strings of the same pure gems intermingled with her brown hair, that clustered in profuse curls round her snowy forehead, and half veiled her graceful neck, she was without ornament. A glance at the courtiers who had already assembled in the withdrawing-room, previous to entering the presence-chamber, showed her that the youthful cavalier who had of late shared so large a portion of her thoughts, had not yet arrived. In a few minutes after she had taken this survey, a nobleman of fine person and majestic mien entered the apartment, whose costly apparel was enriched by the different badges belonging to the Order of the Garter. Geraldine would at once have taken him for the Earl of Essex, who had recently returned from the successful expedition to the coast of Spain, where he was joint commander with Lord Howard, even had she not heard his name pronounced on every side. Imposing as was the appearance of the Earl, however, he did not long attract her attention, for he was followed closely by the youthful huntsman. He could not have been more than nineteen or twenty, and was conspicuous not only for the richness of his dress, but for his fine figure, and handsome and spirited features.

"What is the name of yon gay cavalier?" said a gentleman near Geraldine, addressing Lord Mountjoy. "If I mistake not, there is mettle beneath that embroidered doublet."

"Have you never, then, heard," replied Lord Mountjoy, "of Lionel Clifford, who served under the Earl of Essex in his late Spanish expedition, and who behaved with so much bravery as to cause the Earl to make particular mention of him in the despatches he sent to the Queen?"

"In good sooth have I; and if the countenance be a true index of the heart, we may well believe him to be honorable, as he has proved himself brave, and that he will not be likely to disgrace his noble lineage."

They now ceased speaking, for Essex and his train had advanced so near, that even the suppressed voices in which the conversation had been carried on would have reached their ears. Geraldine at that moment caught the eye of Clifford, who started with surprise and changed color, but immediately recovering himself made a low and graceful bow. She, in her turn, felt the crimson blush flash over face and neck, and turning to Lady Eleanor, addressed to her some frivolous question, to hide her embarrassment. Her thoughts, however, were soon diverted to other objects, for the door of the presence-chamber was opened, towards which she and her kinswoman were slowly borne along with the current.

She hardly knew how she deported herself when presented to the Queen, so great was her [illegible] and confusion; but her beauty and native grace were of more service to her than mere presence of mind would have been; the more so as Elizabeth was not accustomed to be displeased at any manifestation of embarrassment or awe, when occasioned by her own august presence, and the splendors appertaining to royalty. She therefore vouchsafed to Geraldine a few gracious words, which the maiden knew to be such more from the tone of voice in which they were spoken, than from her ability to understand their import. Such timidity in one of maturer years might have been set down for awkwardness and rusticity; but it sat gracefully on one so young, and amid all the fair faces and fine figures, with their rich dresses sparkling with jewels, the eye found no lovelier form than Geraldine's, robed in glistening satin of the palest blue, embroidered with seed pearls, and which, though it might have proved a severe trial to an ordinary complexion, was perfectly suited to the purity of hers.

The Earl of Essex, who, owing to his late successful enterprise, stood higher in the Queen's favour than he had ever done before, received a large share of her attention.

"Though we have made you Master-General of the Ordnance, and may have something still better in reserve for you," said the Queen, addressing the Earl, "and though we doubt not your followers will joy to bask themselves in the sunshine of your honors, yet the bravery of one of them has been so much applauded, that we deem it right to reward him with the honour of knighthood. Has fame said true, my Lord of Essex? Is there not one among them deserving of such an honor at our hand?"

"If the poor services of any of us deserve reward," replied the Earl, "no one is more worthy than Lionel Clifford, the youth to whom I apprehend your Majesty alludes."

"Step forward, Lionel Clifford," said the Queen.

Clifford obeyed with an air of some embarrassment, though he was sufficiently self-possessed to demean himself with his usual grace.

"Master Clifford," said Elizabeth, "we have heard of your conduct and bravery during the late expedition to the coast of Spain, and would confer on you some mark of our favor."

Commanding him to kneel down, the Queen, having requested a sword of a nobleman standing near, performed the prescribed ceremony.

When Clifford rose, the first eye he sought was Geraldine's. It was with an emotion of supreme delight that he found that she was intently regarding him with an appearance of interest not to be mistaken, and this feeling was not diminished when he observed the crimson blush flash over her features the moment their eyes met. Though she instantly turned away, the look and the blush were enough to assure him that he had created an interest in her bosom, which, if favored by time and opportunity, might eventually kindle into a passion, deep and fervent as his own.

The gloom of the old castle was more distasteful than ever to Geraldine, after witnessing the splendors of the court; and when, in a few days after her presentation, she was duly apprized that the Queen, who had been pleased with her modest and unassuming appearance, had appointed her to fill the place of a young lady recently married to a country Baronet, she imagined, for the moment, that she had attained the height of earthly felicity. In her new situation, she had frequent opportunities of seeing and conversing with Sir Lionel Clifford; opportunities that he, on his part, improved to such good advantage, that many weeks had not passed ere he had received her plighted faith in exchange for his own. In the meantime, Geraldine, who evidently stood high in the favor of the Queen, was regarded with envy by the other ladies at court, who did not hesitate to call her an upstart, and an invader of their rights. These feelings, which were still more exasperated by the admiration which the other sex did not fail to render to her beauty, were cherished in their utmost rancor by Lady Roxanna Adderly, to whom had been awarded the palm of beauty, till wrested from her by Geraldine. She had, moreover, on former occasions, received some notice from Clifford, of whom she had become deeply enamored; so that the pangs of jealousy were added to her feelings of mortified vanity. She, on the other hand, had inspired a young gentleman by the name of Basil Finsbury with an ardent passion, which she was now determined to make subservient to the furtherance of her own base designs. After one day listening with less apparent impatience and disdain than ordinary to the subject nearest his heart, she said to him—

"Finsbury, you are lavish of your protestations, but would, I dare say, be sparing enough of deeds."

"I would go on a pilgrimage to Palestine," he replied, "to win one kind look from you."

"What you covet may be won much more easily. Geraldine Howard will take a walk in the park by moonlight this evening—meet her there and give her this ring. Tell her that it is from a dear friend, who begs her to wear it for his sake, and who deeply regrets that an unforeseen occurrence has prevented him from meeting her according to appointment, and presenting it himself."

"Is the ring from Clifford?" said he.

Lady Roxanna smiled with an assenting look, but replied—

"I am not at liberty to tell."

"And is this all the service you require?" said he. "I wish it were ten times more difficult."

"All I ask for the present," she replied; "only be careful to implicitly obey my directions, and you shall have your reward."

The moment Geraldine was released from her attendance on the Queen, she hastened to descend a back strir-case, and passing through a postern gate, a few minutes' walk admitted her into the precincts of the park. It was a bright, moonlight evening, and entering an avenue shaded on either side by lofty trees, she pursued her way by the chequered light admitted through their branches. Clifford had earnestly requested her to meet him for a few minutes, and she did not hesitate to grant what she considered so trifling a boon to a betrothed lover, who, she knew, entertained almost chivalric sentiments as regarded her sex. As she expected him to enter the park in an opposite quarter, she walked slowly forward. It was only a few seconds, ere she beheld some one approaching, half veiled in the dim shadows of the sylvan arch-way.

"Lionel!" said she, quickening her steps.

"It is not Lionel Clifford, whom you probably expected to meet," was the reply, "but Basil Finsbury."

"And to what do I owe the honor of Basil Finsbury's presence?" said she, rather haughtily.

"I sought you," he replied, "for the purpose of presenting you this ring, sent by one who is deeply disappointed at being prevented by an unforseen accident from meeting you according to agreement."

"He might have shown more discretion in selecting a messenger," thought Geraldine, as she took the ring. "It is no sign, because I consented to meet him, a betrothed lover, that he should commission any young gallant he happened to run across to give me an account of his disappointment."

"I was likewise instructed to say," resumed Finsbury, "that the donor hopes to see you wear the ring the next time you and he meet."

"A woman—that is, if our sex are as fond of jewelry as they are said to be—would not care to suffer so beautiful a ring to be idle in her casket," replied Geraldine, holding it in such a manner that a ray of moonlight fell full upon the sapphire gem which enriched it. She then put it upon her finger, and bidding Finsbury good evening, turned to retrace her steps. As she did so, she imagined she heard a rustling in a copse near at hand. She stood still and listened, thinking that Clifford, contrary to his expectation, might have found opportunity to fulfil his appointment. With this impression, she, several times, repeated his name, but everything remaining silent, she concluded she had been mistaken, and resuming her course with accelerated speed, soon reached her chamber.

The ensuing day, though a good opportunity presented for Lionel to approach and converse with her as usual, he remained at a distance; and when she sought to read in his countenance the motive of his conduct, he returned her look with a glance of mingled anger and disdain.

"What wayward humor is this?" thought she, as she turned to answer some question addressed to her by Finsbury, who, a moment before, had left the side of Lady Roxanna Adderly, and who now, obsequiously obedient to her instructions, had joined Geraldine, for the purpose of engaging her in conversation. But Geraldine's mind, owing to what appeared to her the strange behavior of Clifford, was too ill at ease to enable her to listen with sufficient attention to give him suitable replies, who, on his part, seemed to be performing a task, rather than following the dictates of his inclination. Her disquietude was increased, when, on again looking towards Clifford, she saw him, with much apparent gayety and animation, conversing with Lady Roxanna. Several days passed away, during which Clifford studiously avoided her. When in his presence, she succeeded in assuming a forced cheerfulness, which only tended to sink her in deeper dejection when by herself. One evening, when on the way from the Queen's private apartment to her own, she was met by a man, who, with his cloak gathered up before his face, so as entirely to conceal it, thrust a billet into her hand as he passed her. On gaining her chamber, she read as follows:

"It was not Sir Lionel Clifford who sent the ring presented to you by Basil Finsbury, but a person who is basely plotting to separate you and Sir Lionel forever. Clifford was in the park the evening he had appointed to meet you, and witnessed your interview with Finsbury, who, he has been taught to believe, is a favored lover. As he so sedulously avoids you that it will be impossible for you to give him a verbal explanation, the advice of a sincere friend is, that you explain to him in writing your meeting with Finsbury in the park, which I trust will be the means of dispersing the clouds of jealousy and doubt which now hang over him."

Geraldine did not hesitate to comply with the advice of the anonymous writer, who was evidently her well-wisher, and at the expiration of half an hour she had written a letter, which she hoped would fully exculpate her in the estimation of Lionel. That letter having folded it, and bound it with a band of blue rose silk, she softly left her chamber, hoping to find a messenger by whom it would reach him before he slept. The first person she saw after descending the stairs, was a lad retained in some menial capacity in the Queen's household. Slipping a piece of silver into his hand, and giving him the letter, she enquired of him if he could immediately convey it to Sir Lionel Clifford. The boy, whose eyes glistened at sight of the silver, assured her that he could, and with a heart lighter than it had been for several days past, she regained her apartment without having seen a single person except him who had taken charge of her letter.

"Sir Lionel Clifford!" said he to himself, the moment she was out of sight. "I know no more about him than I do of the man in the moon, which is no wonder, seeing I have been here only two days. But if I had confessed my ignorance, I should not have got the shilling."

As he stood thus soliloquizing, Lady Roxanna Adderly passed the door. He followed her, and earnestly requested her to inform him where he could find Sir Lionel Clifford. Her first movement was to repulse him, but checked by a sight of the letter, she enquired what he wanted of Sir Lionel.

"I want to carry him this letter," he replied, "which a lady gave me a minute ago."

"Let me see it," said she, and after looking at it a moment, in silence, she told him that it would be difficult for him to find Sir Lionel, but that if he would let her take it she would see that he had it immediately. He joyfully assented, and with feelings of demoniac exultation, she hastened to her chamber.

When, on the ensuing day, Geraldine found that Clifford avoided her the same as before she sent him the explanatory letter, her spirits entirely forsook her, and she was unable any longer to affect cheerfulness, even in the presence of the Queen. Every day she grew paler and paler, and the light tasks assigned her were performed mechanically. The cause of this change was far from being a mystery to Elizabeth, who had from the first been aware that Clifford regarded Geraldine with affection, for he was naturally of too ardent a temperament, and too frank and open in his disposition, to think of disguising his feelings. Neither had the change in his demeanor escaped her penetrating eyes, but apprehending it to be occasioned merely by one of those love quarrels which, like a few discords skilfully introduced into a piece of music, serve only to enhance the sweetness of the succeeding notes, she doubted not that it would ultimately result in a more perfect union of hearts. For this reason she chose not to interfere. Finding, however, that a reconciliation was not likely to take place, and that the young orphan was pining beneath his frown, feelings of anger and resentment were roused against him for presuming, immediately under her eye, to indulge in a fickle and capricious humor towards one whom she had taken under her protection. In this frame of mind she saw him, as usual, enter in the train of Essex, she commanded him to step forward, as she had somewhat for his private ear.

"My Lord of Essex had better have an eye to his gay follower," said a gentleman, addressing another, who stood by his side, "for if he make such rapid advances in the favor of her Grace, it would be no wonder if he should one day supplant him."

"The Earl has little cause of apprehension on the present occasion," was the reply, "for there is a cloud on her brow and lightning in her eye, and by the tardy steps of the youth, I think he sees both the one and the other."

Clifford in truth advanced towards the Queen with a reluctant air, having detected that in her countenance and in the tones of her voice that assured him that he had excited her displeasure, though in what manner he was entirely ignorant.

"I think, Sir Lionel Clifford," said she, pronouncing his name and title with a good deal of emphasis, "that you have forgotten one particular enjoined in the formula, when you received the honor of knighthood at our hand."

"As yet," he replied, "I have had but small opportunity to fulfil any part of the duties of a true knight, though I am ignorant of having transgressed in any particular point."

"When we commanded you to be faithful," said the Queen, we understood the term in its widest sense. In a word, young man, we expected you to be not only a loyal subject, but a faithful lover."

"The compass, your Majesty will permit me to say, keeps not true to a wandering star."

"Be chary of your innuendos, sir," said Elizabeth, with difficulty repressing her rising ire, so as to maintain an appearance of calmness, "even though you thereby lose an opportunity of displaying a figure of rhetoric."

"I should consider myself not only impertinent, but beneath your Majesty's notice," he replied, "were I to presume to throw out insinuations for so idle a purpose, or indeed, any which cannot be made good. It is true, that not many weeks since Geraldine Howard received my troth-plight in exchange for her own, and it is equally true that a few days afterwards she [illegible] Basil Finsbury in the park by moon[illegible] and received from him a ring which she has since publicly worn."

"Did you mark the ring so as to be able to identify it?"

"I did, gracious Madame. It was set with a sapphire gem of rare beauty."

"Geraldine Howard," said the Queen, "we desire your presence near the throne. Nay, Sir Lionel," she added, as he made a movement to fall back, "remain where you are—we have not done with you yet."

Geraldine came forward trembling like a frightened bird, at the severe tone in which Elizabeth uttered her command, as well as at the idea of being confronted with Clifford who had treated her with so much apparent contempt.

"If it be not prying too deeply into your secrets," said the Queen, in an ironical tone, "may I ask if you have in your possession a ring with a sapphire gem?"

"I have, may it please your Majesty," she replied, deeply coloring.

"And if we are rightly informed, it is a love-token from one Basil Finsbury."

"I received it from the hand of Basil Finsbury; but it was not his gift. He gave me to understand—and I believe he himself thought so at the time—that it was a memento from Sir Lionel Clifford, who, he said, was prevented from meeting me in the park, according to promise. While deceived into the belief that it was a present from him, I wore it, but not a moment longer."

"And what prevented you from continuing to be deceived: for, if I mistake not, you have had no explanation with Sir Lionel, either by moonlight, or any other light less romantic."

"Your Majesty is not mistaken," replied Geraldine. "It has been Sir Lionel Clifford's pleasure, not to grant me the interview, which I so far humbled my maidenly pride as to seek, so that there has been no opportunity for verbal explanations. By a letter, however, which I received from an unknown hand, I have reason to believe, insignificant as I may be, that I have enemies at Court, who employed Basil Finsbury to sow dissention between Sir Lionel and me. The moment I had finished reading the anonymous letter, I wrote to Clifford a full account of all that had taken place, which I found means to send him the same evening, but he did not condescend to honor my communication with the slightest notice, and has since then, avoided me, as before."

"We are sorry," said the Queen, in a tone of irony, "that this young knight of ours is so overburthened with matters of weight and moment, that he has no time to perform even a common act of courtesy towards one whom it was our pleasure to take under our immediate protection."

"May it please you, most gracious Sovereign," said Clifford, "I have received neither letter nor message from Geraldine Howard, since the evening she received the ring from Finsbury."

"What messenger did you employ to carry the letter to Sir Lionel?" demanded the Queen.

"A lad I happened to come across, whom I have since seen among the servants, but whose name is unknown to me."

"Was there any peculiarity either in his looks or dress," said Elizabeth, "by which you can describe him?"

"I recollect nothing in particular," replied Geraldine, except that he had a remarkably sharp, keen eye, and a very ragged doublet."

"It must be the same urchin," exclaimed Clifford, with animation, "that addressed me this morning, and said he hoped I had got the letter from the young lady. I was at the time listening to some gentlemen standing near, and thinking him a bold, saucy boy, made him no reply. With your Grace's leave, I will go and seek him, and enquire into the matter."

"Do so," said the Queen, "and if you find him bring him hither, for as the plot begins to thicken, we intend to assist in disentangling it."

After an absence of ten or fifteen minutes, Clifford returned, followed by a boy, who, although his clothing was old and ragged, appeared by no means abashed at being ushered so suddenly into the presence of the Queen, and so magnificent an assemblage of lords and ladies. At sight of him, Lady Roxanna, whose conscious guilt had already led her to suspect the subject in hand, turned very pale, but soon recovering herself, she awaited the result with apparent calmness.

When they had advanced half way up the apartment, the boy pulled Clifford by the sleeve, and said in rather a loud whisper—

"Didn't you tell me to call the Queen your Majesty?"

"Yes," replied Clifford.

"And didn't you say that"—

"Be silent," said Clifford.

"Odd zooks," said the boy, "if I make a blunder, it will be your fault—not mine."

"If the boy has forgotten his lesson," said one standing by, "it is fair that his preceptor should teach it to him again."

"There is neither lesson for me to teach nor for to learn," said Clifford, somewhat nettled at the covert sneer of the bystander, as well as the pertinacity of the boy, who was about to renew his questions—"All I desire is, that he will speak the truth."

"What is your name, my pretty lad?" said the Queen, when Clifford had placed him in a convenient situation to hear and answer her questions.

"Robin Gammell, please your Majesty."

"And what do you do at Court?"

"I'm the cook's under waiter, an' please your Majesty."

"Not so high a post but that you may one day hope to rise. Did not a lady give you a letter, some few evenings since, to convey to Sir Lionel Clifford?"

"There did, an' please your Majesty."

"And did you do as she requested you?"

"No, an' please your Majesty."

"It does not please our Majesty, sirrah, to find that you disobeyed orders. What became of the letter?"

"I gave it to a lady who promised to send it to Sir Lionel Clifford, an' please your Majesty."

"What is the lady's name?"

"I don't know, an' please your Majesty."

"Point her out, if she be present," said the Queen.

"That is she, that sits yonder, with an eye that looks so sharp at me that I should think she could see all my thoughts, an' please your Majesty."

Lady Roxanna Adderly, who perceived that he had directed the attention of the Queen towards her, endeavored, with some success, to assume an air of indifference, but her face was the color of crimson, when, in a few minutes afterwards, Elizabeth commanded her to join the group near the throne.

"We understand," said the Queen, "that a few evenings since, your benevolence prompted you to relieve this lad of the trouble of conveying a letter to Sir Lionel Clifford, which he had undertaken to do, with the promise that you would yourself see that it was conveyed to him, and we can only say, that we are extremely sorry that you forgot to fulfil your promise."

"I trust your Grace will not condescend to listen to every ragged urchin about Court, that is wicked and cunning enough to coin a lie for a new shilling piece," said Lady Roxanna.

"We shall condescend to nothing unworthy of us," said Elizabeth haughtily—then turning abruptly to Geraldine, said—"Are you sure this is the boy to whom you gave the letter?"

Geraldine replied that she was.

"And why are you sure," said the Queen, directing the boy's attention to Lady Roxanna, "that this is the person who promised to send the letter to Sir Lionel Clifford?"

"I could tell her by her voice, if my eyes were shut. She spoke to me about the letter, in just the same soft, coaxing tone, that she used just now, when she wanted you to believe I had told a lie, an' please your Majesty."

The Queen sat silent and thoughtful for a few minutes, then enquired of Geraldine if she knew the name of Lady Roxanna's waiting-maid.

"Cicily Green," Geraldine said she believed.

"I have no waiting-maid by that name," said Lady Roxanna.

Without attending to her assertion, Elizabeth immediately sent a person to enquire for Cicily Green, and if to be found, to bring her to her presence. The girl soon made her appearance, and in reply, to the Queen's enquiry, informed her that she had within a few days been dismissed from the service of Lady Roxanna for an involuntary and trifling offence.

"Do you know where Lady Roxanna keeps her letters?" inquired the Queen.

"In an ivory casket, that stands"——

"No matter where it stands. Go find it if you can, together with the key, and bring them hither."

The girl was successful in finding both casket and key. The Queen ordered her to unlock the casket and then addressing Lady Roxanna—"We are sorry," said she, "to be urged to this alternative, and all we wish is to satisfy ourself whether the letter written by Geraldine Howard to Sir Lionel Clifford, is in your possession or not. You have the word of your Sovereign, that every other paper, of what description soever, shall remain secure from our examination."

Lady Roxanna made no reply, but stood with pale cheeks and compressed lips. When Cicily had unlocked the casket, she handed it to the Queen. Elizabeth raised the lid, and the first letter that met her eye, was one, round which was carelessly entwined some blue floss silk, and directed to Sir Lionel Clifford. Having satisfied herself that it was the letter she wished to find, the Queen caused the casket to be relocked and the key to be delivered to Lady Roxanna, who received it in sullen silence.

"Are you satisfied, or must we proceed to investigate the matter further, by calling Basil Finsbury?" said Elizabeth to Sir Lionel.

He replied that he was satisfied.

"We are well pleased that you are," said the Queen, being willing to spare the young man the pain of saying ought to the dishonor of one to whom he is, we have been informed, sincerely attached.—"Lady Roxanna Adderly, we give you twenty-four hours to make arrangements for quitting our service. You have had more than your share of time in the presence chamber." She then turned to Sir Lionel Clifford—"We advise you," said she, "to be less suspicious, and less hasty for the future. It will in no wise derogate from your character as a gentleman and a true knight. We propose, when, in the estimation of your lady-love, you have done penance commensurate with the magnitude of your offence, that the church-bells give a merry peal in honor of a certain bridal, which we intend shall be celebrated in our presence, with suitable pomp and solemnity."

THE MOURNER.

She stood beneath a willow's bough,
That drooping hung o'er one who slept;
The darkling curls waved o'er her brow,
As she alone in silence wept;
In beauty, Hesper's gentle ray
Was trembling on her form of love,
As brightly as the beams that play,
Around those forms that dwell above.

She stood beside the grave of him
Who won her heart while yet 'twas young,
Her soft dark eyes were strangely dim;
Her cheek on which the rose had flung
In brighter hours its softest hue,
No longer wore its lovely bloom;
For joys, which once her bosom knew,
Were buried in her lover's tomb.

And often at the twilight hour,
When silence reigns o'er earth and wave,
And tear drops gem the drooping flower,
She goes to weep beside his grave;
And o'er his cold and chilling tomb,
To offer up her evening prayer,
'Till like the flowers which o'er it bloom,
She gently fades and withers there.

A TALE OF MARION'S MEN.

BY JOSEPH J. MATTHIAS,

AUTHOR OF "THE INDIAN'S REVENGE," "THE INEBRIATE," ETC.

Chapter I.

Woe to the English soldiery
Who little dread us near,
On them shall light, at midnight,
A stronge and sudden fear:
When waking to their tents on fire,
They grasp their arms in vain,
And they who stand to face us,
Are beat to earth again;
And they who fly in terror, deem
A mighty host behind,
And hear the tramp of thousands
Upon the hollow wind.—[BRYANT.

A gloomy, threatening cloud loomed sullenly upon the darkest era in "the days that tried men's souls." The ebon pall of blasted fortune lay heavily over the long cherished hopes of the nursling liberty, and the chilling consciousness of an utter inability to revive the drooping tendril, so fiercely struggled for, and so dearly loved, appeared crushing the hitherto indomitable spirit of the American soldiery. Surrounded and menaced on every side by the insulting minions of a foreign rule, and subject to continued and overwhelming defeats, they sickened under the terrible reverse, and the loved object of their lives seemed fast digging its own grave, 'mid the accumulated wreck of freedom's shatter temple. Still, like the meteor flash along the dark horizon of a stormy night, a ray would gleam out from the dark mass, and a momentary enthusiasm would kindle in the bosoms of a few iron-nerved adherents, and send its enervating influence to the bleeding hearts of their dispirited companions, till a little host would again gather round the imperishable standard of a nation's rights, boldly resolved upon the maintenance of the immaculate will. Again from the sacred altar, the smouldering embers would burst into a bright flame, like the day-king, as he breaks through the thick sable mantle of the huge water-cloud, when midway o'er the arched canopy of Heaven, and spread its holy light, a beacon to the gathering patriots. The thunder-toned war-cry would again reverberate through trackless forests, a warning and a call to their hidden inmates, or would mount the rough-hewn mountain side to claim some lingering, yet ready soul, or pierce down into the depths of the dark abyss and rouse from lethargic listlessness the groping figure of some sorrowing adherent, or send its reiterated echoes o'er the broad river and the glassy lake, lending a new born brilliancy to their silver surfaces, while fancy curled the rippling water-drops, and bid the slumbering wave to roll in gentle inundations, as if roused to animation by the perfumed zephyrs that emanated from that soul-thrilling tone. Clad in rustic garments and with the variegated weapons which fortune gave them, these fearless hearts again would congregate amid their sacred retreats; and with wary, watchful eye, follow every movement of the enemy, till, by chance or purpose, they were decoyed, unwittingly, within the bounded precincts, and then, with the quick-limbed motion of the crouched panther, they sprung upon unsuspecting myriads of their foes, and the effect told wonderfully upon the frightened, scampering Britons, and many a time had this little band of heroes put to flight a host that might have completely annihilated them, had they for an instant turned a defensive front to their assailers. But, panic-struck, they ignominiously fled, and England's blood-stained escutcheon became of darker hue, when, added to its crimes, the cowardice of her minions stamped a shameful blot upon its over-fraught blazonry. When the odds were in their favor by thrice-trebled numbers, they would murder—for it were no correct where resistance could not avail, save in the name—but when confronted, man to man, they shrunk from the encounter, with a timidity, or absolute fear, that would have befitted a less vaunting foe than the "king's liege subjects!"

South Carolina, in the year 1780, might literally have been denominated a British province. There is no time, during the whole struggle of the Revolutionary War, when the aspect of American affairs presents a more deplorable appearance, than it did at the period to which we refer. Charleston was made their head-quarters—and at Camden a victorious army revelled in riotous excess. Georgetown and Jacksonborough were strongly garrisoned, and swarms of bloody-minded tories filled the vacancies, with not one intervening spot where liberty could have planted a resting foot. It was truly a terrible crisis, and in the end was marked with like effect to an invading foe. Secure in their ill-gotten power, as they imagined, the British put forth a show of confidence in themselves that was entirely inconsistent and which resulted in their entire discomfiture.

A calm, clear twilight succeeded a day of unusal splendor, as the tired day-god sank slowly into a cloudy bed of gold and crimson, flinging a sombre shadow of rare and exquisite beauty over the darkening landscape. The gentle motion of the tiny rivulet, as it purled on amid a pebbly host of gaudy-tinted impediments, gave forth a lulling echo to the wearied mind, and a refreshing influence to the bowed in spirit; and as the light of day waxed fainter and fainter, as the gorgeous magnificence of the setting sun sank deeper into its repose, a merry throng of glittering stars came out, cheering and bright, and the full moon rose and cast a new light of paler brilliancy around the beautiful scenery, till the whole earth glowed, and all nature appeared dancing with delight, at so rare a gala-night.

At the very base of a long hill that sloped gradually down to the margin of a beautiful stream, stood a neat, snow-white cottage, with green latticed window-shutters, and a huge oak door, full of quaintly carved grooves, and indentations, with a nicely gathered honey-suckle creeping over its top, and hanging down, till the rich red blossoms fell into the door way. A fine row of venerable looking old oaks stood in front of the cottage and spread their great arms so far out that they almost rested on the ivy covered roof, and right under was a line of the whitest palings, with a corresponding cross-barred gate exactly in the centre. The gate stood part way open, and leaning on one of the slightly elevated posts, was the most beautiful girl imaginable. Her attitude and expression were those of expectation, and you might have seen at a glance, that she was becoming anxious, if not impatient, for she began to lift her little foot, and to let it fall again very often, and sometimes she would stand on tiptoe, and look down the road, as far as she could look, and then she would sink her head on her white hand as it rested on the gate, and sigh, perhaps, as she murmured to herself, "I'll not forgive him!" But when she thought that he might not have it in his power to meet the appointment, she sighed again, and whispered, "Poor Frank, how unhappy he must be!" And then she would toss her flowing ringlets behind her, and advance a little way out into the road, but when the rustling branches above her would move, she flew quickly back to the protecting gate, like a timid fawn, and stood panting at the bare idea of her temerity.

"'Tis he! 'tis he!" at last she exclaims, and, springing out into the road with the light swiftness of the mountain deer, as a manly figure issues from the wood, at the end of the lane, and now perfectly fearless, strange to say, she flies along the green sward, and never pauses till clasped in the arms of him so long expected.

"Why, Amy, love!" said the youth, smiling, as he softly kissed the white brow that was turned upward to the full moon, "how you tremble!"

"I was so afraid, Frank!" she replied, lowly, as she nestled her face in his bosom.

"Afraid! pray of what?" said Frank, good humoredly.

"I don't know," she replied, "I am such a coward!"

"Amy!" said the youth, in tones that made the fair girl start, "the time may be near when you will have need of every energy that should spring from a fearless heart, conscious of its own innocence!"

"I will try to do better, Frank," she said, "but it is only when you are absent that I am afraid. I fear nothing now!" and her delicate fingers crept into the closed hand of the youth, as if for shelter. Frank smiled at the artless display of confidence, and gently twining his arm round her slender waist, he led her toward the cottage.

"On every side, Amy," said the youth, as they walked leisurely along, "the English hold ground.—Day after day they add insult to insult—and it was but yester-morn that one of their brutal officers offered insult to an American lady, in broad day and in the open street."

"Is it possible?" cried the startled Amy, nestling more closely to the side of the youthful patriot.

"It is, Amy—but the insult will be avenged! The spirit of the Americans is like their native oak, they may be broken down by force, but they will never bend. It were well for thee, Amy, not to leave the cottage unattended—the degrading passions of these villainous invaders admit of no bound; and did they harm thee, my fair one——"

"Nay, Frank," interrupted Amy, "I never did them harm."

"My poor innocent!" exclaimed the youth, "how little thou art versed in this wicked world! Aye! but they would harm thee, Amy, and that beyond a reparation. Thou wilt promise me not to leave the cottage?"

"Yes, willingly," she answered.

"It is well—for it may result in thy future happiness. And, now, when at night thou dost bend in prayer, forget not thy suffering, goaded country.—Though we are now oppressed, the flame of liberty is but smouldering, and when it doth burst, wo to our enemies. With weapons, forged from the ignominious chains of our bondage, we will do deeds, so desperate in their extremity, as will make our tyrants tremble for their dominion. Deeds, that for after generations, shall be the fire-side tale, the fear of the tyrant, and the eynosure of the oppressed. Go, then, Amy, forget not thy country——"

"And thee!" said the beautiful girl, looking up into his face.

The young patriot caught the blushing creature to his heart, and his full, expressive eyes beamed with unutterable tenderness and devotion.

"Yes," said he, "I, too, would have a place in thy nightly orisons—for the breathings of thy pure heart will be wafted by beings typical of thyself, to the throne of an all-munificent Being, and there find favor."

"Dear Frank——"

"But let thy first whisperings ascend for thy native land—for there rolls the fate that will control thy future destiny—to live out thy days 'mid the blest retreats of freedom's favored soil, or drag a miserable existence to a bondsman's grave. It is no visionary dream—no false god that we have raised, and for which is sacrificed the blood of martyred thousands. No! thank Heaven! it is no such grovelling incentive, that actuates the first feelings of our nature—but the boon is our great Author's gift—a gift that sprung with a redeemed world from its vast chaos—a gift that led man be free—free as the wind that sweeps yon sparkling stream—no master but his God!"

"Frank——"

"Pardon me, Amy—but the sweet nursling clings with such tenacity to my heart-strings, that for my life, I cannot drown its trumpet-voice."

"I will do anything that you wish, Frank," said Amy, as they paused in front of her cottage home; "but how could you be so cruel as to stay so long, when you knew I was waiting?" and her sweet lips formed themselves into the prettiest tiny pout, as she turned away her head, so as to try to look offended. But the effort was a very poor one—though Frank saw it not. The youth appeared perplexed, and his gaze wandered from the velvety grass up to the moss-covered roof of the cottage, where the moonbeams struggled slantingly through the thick oak leaves, and was playing countless fantastic capers upon its brilliant surface. As the shadows of the luminous orb came and went, so were the thoughts of Frank, flickering and irresolute.

"Perhaps you saw a gate open on your road," said Amy, in the slightest petulant tone. "And maybe there was somebody waiting by it—so you thought you would stop just a little while, as it wouldn't be any harm——"

"You wrong me, Amy," replied the youth, quickly, with a flushed cheek. "Your suspicion is unjust, as it is heart——"

"Heartless!" he was going to say, but his companion looked up so meekly, as if she repented her thoughtlessness, and the tears came trickling so fast through her long dark lashes, that, in his own heart he could not finish the word.

Reason and thought asserted their empire, and the forgiveness was mutual.

"I will no more endeavor to unravel the mystery that hangs around thy conduct, but trust to thine own discretion and valor for thy safety," said Amy, complacently, as if nothing had occurred to mar the sunny current of her pure feelings.

"In that assurance, thou can'st rest happy," replied Frank, "and Heaven grant that the time may speedily arrive, when every act of mine shall be laid before thee, and ask for judgment! It is no mean enterprize that my gallant comrades engage in, and it behooves them, as well for the safety of themselves, as their cause, that they preserve the utmost secrecy. If possible, I will return on to-morrow's eve—but as the moment when we shall be called to our duty is uncertain, the engagement is not positive!"

"You will remain to-night?"

"No—that is impossible. My leave of absence extends but to three short hours, and it were imprudent to overstay them."

Slowly advancing up the smoothly gravelled avenue, overshadowed by the tall trees, whose extended limbs formed a complete canopy of leaves above them, they entered the cottage.

Amy Walters and the young Frank Norton, had as the phrase goes, "been children together." The attachment, formed by constant association in early life, suffered no diminishment as years came over them, and the village gossips had said a thousand times, that they were sure to "come together."—Both were the children of parents who had been among the first settlers of the new colonies—but Frank's parents had died while he was yet in his infancy, and he had ever been guided by his own will, and acted from his own judgment. There was but one tie in the wide world, and that he clung to with all the ardent fondness of first affection. It is needless to say that this tie was centered in Amy—the only object, beside his country, that made life sweet—and the attachment lost none of its sincerity, in the amiable girl. When the blast of war echoed o'er the land, Frank was among the foremost to answer its summons—and numbering himself as one of that little band whose fame will stand while freedom's banner has a resting place—he gave his heart and hand to his suffering country, under the bright pennon of the immortal Marion.

Two short hours had taken their echoless flight, and again the lovers stood beside the road-side gate. It was the moment of parting—a few whispered words of affection to cheer the sad heart of Amy, and Frank was gone.

"God be with thee!" was borne upon the night breeze, as the fair girl stood gazing after the retreating form of the departed, until his indistinct figure became lost in the maizes of the deep forest, when, with a long-drawn sigh, she retraced her way back to the cottage.

It was midnight. The inmates of the white cottage had long retired, and a solemn stillness held absolute reign. A dense darkness was fast gathering over the earth, for the night-queen had gone down behind the hills, and huge masses of dark floating clouds came up from the south, and creeping over the starry face of Heaven, hid the gemmed night-watchers in their black pall. The heavy boughs of the old oaks began to swing to and fro as the rising wind swept through them with a shrill whistling—and the quiet waters of the little stream down at the foot of the garden began to lash its flowery banks, and dash the foamy jets up into the margin path. At short intervals, large leaded drops came dropping from their misty chalices, and lingering on the light-stemmed night-flower, bent the frail blossoms to the moistened ground. It is a strange, but thrilling music, when, in the silence of midnight, the large rain drops come pattering down upon the giant oaks, falling from leaf to leaf with a sweet, heart-stirring echo. The low mutterings of the distant thunder cloud, become louder as the gale increased, and the vivid lightning darted forth with startling brilliancy. Suddenly the watery mass came dashing to the earth, rattling among the leafy branches, and drenching the tiny flowrets till they fell from their slight stems, and covered the green sward with their rich, fragrant blossoms. And then the wind lulled, and the black clouds parted, as they floated swiftly on, leaving no traces of the sudden storm, save in the freshened earth, and the expansion of the closed blossoms, showering their perfume on the night air.

As the hidden stars came creeping forth again, the muffled forms of two men issued from the wood at the foot of the long lane. Large dark cloaks completely enveloped them, save the upper portion of the face, upon which was fixed a half-mask, running up under a low, slouched hat, so that the discernment of their countenances was impossible. With slow, cautious step, they came from behind a small clump of trees, that stood a little out from the margin of the forest, where they had been sheltered, doubtless, from the sudden shower. Moving along, closely, under a thick hedge that lined the road side, and now and then crouching down to the ground, as the quick bark of the watch dog sounded from the cottage, they arrived nearly opposite the white palings, and suddenly paused. For a moment they conversed in low whispers, the tallest of the two pointing first to the cottage and then to the rail fence a little below, by crossing which they could gain the rear of the house. Quickly darting from the thicket, they crossed the road and mounted the fence intimated, when a sudden sweep of air loosened the folds of one of their cloaks, discovering the scarlet uniform and gold trimmings of a British officer. With a low imprecation he drew the mantle closer about him, and swiftly threading the wide meadows, stood on the banks of the stream, beneath the drooping branches of a large weeping willow. Again they seemed in earnest conversation, appearing irresolute how to act. A small clearing lay between them and the rear of the cottage, but in crossing it they saw a liability of being detected, should any of the household be astir. Suddenly the lesser of the two, who seemed an inferior, gathered up the folds of his cloak, and forcing them under a stout leather belt about his waist, dropped cautiously into the water, creeping slowly under the bank, till he arrived opposite the garden-entrance to the house. Here he paused, and clambering up the bank, moved along the outside of the garden fence, till he came to a parallel with the cottage. Stooping to the ground, he dug a small round stone from the earth, and flung it toward the willow tree, where it fell rattling through the branches, a warning to his companion that, thus far his reconnoitre was successful. He then retraced his way back to the bank, and gliding around the curve, entered the garden under the shade of an arbored creeping vine, that ran the whole length of the pebbled walk. After closely scrutinizing the height of the back chamber window, and the practicability of gaining egress thereby, he returned to the garden gate, and noiselessly unclasping a small padlock that hung loosely from its connecting upright, flung it into the stream; then dropping himself into the water, in a few moments rejoined his companion beneath the willow.

"Now, Bromly," said the other, in a low voice, "can it be effected?"

"Yes, with caution," was the reply, in a whisper.

"Art sure she sleeps in the back chamber?"

"Why, Captain," replied the other, "I am sure she sleeps there, but whether it be the girl you want, I can't say."

"It must be Amy," mused the Captain, "for there is no other female about the house but her old mother, and her room is front."

"Hark!" whispered Bromly quickly, bending his ear forward, "what's that?"

"The wind sighing through the willow," replied his companion. "How is entrance to be gained to the girl's chamber?" he added, after a moment's pause.

"A ladder will be requisite," answered Bromly, "though the window is scarce six feet from the ground."

"Then she is mine!" he spoke, loudly; but instantly checking himself, he said—"it is a rare flower to bloom in this rebel wilderness, and fit for a king.—Let me once force her to the camp, and she is safe!"

"Hark!" again exclaimed Bromly, and this time he fell to the ground, and laid his ear to the damp green sward. "'Tis the tramp of horses, coming down the lane!" he said, springing to his feet, and grasping a huge pair of pistols from his belt.

"Silence, Bromly, or we are lost!" responded the tremulous captain. "Down—down to the water!" and springing to the margin of the stream, they both dropped into the water, and lay concealed behind the bank.

On came the sound of the horsemen, like the rushing of the tempest wind, and closer crouched the Englishmen behind their concealment. Louder and louder grew the noise, until the whole troop came dashing down the road with lightning speed, and disappeared beyond the forest. One solitary trooper lingered behind the body, and when opposite the cottage, he waived a silken scarf above his head, and then sprung forward.

"By Heaven!" cried Bromly, leaping from his covert, when the last horseman disappeared—"The Night-Riders!"

"The Night-Riders!" repeated his companion, tremblingly—"To the camp—quick—follow!" and drawing his cloak around him, he sprang across the meadows into the road, and keeping inside of the hedge, was soon lost to view in the mazes of the forest.

Chapter II.

"I wed thee in the battle's eye,
Amidst the mailed and stalwart throng;
And answered to thy banner cry,
As it had been a lover's song!"

The morning sun was tipping with gold the glowing edge of the Eastern horizon, and Amy Walters was at the foot of the garden, gazing into the clear water that purled at her feet. The brow of the fair girl was thoughtful, and so deep were the revellings of her imagination, that she heeded not the approach of her favourite Watch, who, gliding gently to her side, crouched down at her feet, and looked up wistfully into her face. Amy had dreamed, and in the confused mass that swelled her brain, she vainly sought to solve a meaning—but it was of him she dreamt, and it was of his safety that she pondered. She thought danger, dark and hideous, assailed her lover, and she feared for him. And yet no part of her innocent nature ever owned itself a slave to superstition,—or the darksome folds of destiny—but this one dream came with such forcible vividness to her memory, that she could not break the charm that so intensely bound her thoughts.

All day long did those dark misgivings haunt her over-fraught memory, as if some fascinating spell was lurking in a heart whose every throb was purity. In vain she essayed the lighter occupations of her daily duty—the same fearful vision rested on every thought! The green fields and the little rivulet had lost their attractions,—the sweet singing of nature's tiny choristers grated harshly on her senses,—and even her garden flowers drooped languidly beneath the scorching sun, for they missed the tender hand that daily showered the refreshing draught, and propped their tendrils. The gushing fragrance of her favourite bower was lost upon the air, and the sweet honeysuckle flung its coral blossoms into her vine-covered seat—but the delicate fingers that twined their riches into the flowery garland, had failed in their tender offices.

Alas! sweet Amy, it is to thyself the warning comes, loud but unheeded! How strange, that in the flowings of the human passions through the labyrinth of the heart, there is but one connecting link—love! Reason, thought and action sink into nothingness, at the waiving of thy mighty sceptre, thou master passion! The maiden dreams of danger, and straight the object of her solicitude is love. She sees the storm-clouds gathering, and seeks to cover him from its fury, whilst her own defenceless being is open to its fierceness—and when it bursts, lo! the stricken one smiles, with ebbing breath, as she gazes on the unscathed object of her affections!

As the evening shadows gathered after a long day of all-absorbing, yet indefinite thoughtfulness, Amy's troubled mind became lulled into a sweet calm. Her anxious mother had marked the unaccountable change in the manner of the fair girl, but to all her questioning, the replies of Amy were inconclusive or evasive. But now she resumed a part of her accustomed cheerfulness, as the night came on, and the parent imagined she had deceived herself in the conduct of her child.

"Will Frank be here to-night?" asked the mother, as they were seated together at the tea-table, by an open window, with the perfumed air gushing through from the creeping blossoms.

"Frank!" suddenly echoed Amy, looking up with a manner so perfectly abstracted, that the parent could not help smiling as she guessed her thoughts.

"Yes, Frank!" said the mother.

"What of him?" asked Amy, striving to collect her wandering thoughts.

"Will he visit us to-night?"

"Oh, yes—yes!" she answered, a smile lighting up her pale face; "he said he would—that is—if he could! Hark! there is some one at the gate!" and springing from her seat, she flew out into the garden to meet—her father.

"Why, Amy," said the old man, "what is the matter?"

"I thought it was—was—somebody trying to get the gate open!" and Amy dropped her eyes to the ground, whilst a shade of disappointment lingered pensively upon her open brow.

The evening waxed later and later, but the young patriot came not. Amy sat at the front window, that looked out upon the garden gate, her hand clasped tightly to her feverish brow, and the hot tears gushing from their flooded channels down over her flushed cheeks. More than once had her fond mother begged her to leave the window, for the night air was chill, and as it swept over her delicate frame the fair girl shuddered, all unconsciously. She reeked not of herself in the burning intensity of thought that possessed her being. At times she would start wildly from her bending posture, gaze vacantly out into the air, and then, with a sigh that seemed to rend her heart, she would sink listlessly into her seat.

Again the mother stood beside her.

"Amy," she said, in a husky voice, and with tearful eyes, "will you not retire? Come, join us in prayer, my sweet girl—'tis near midnight."

"Hush!" replied Amy, in a low, earnest tone; "he will come soon now!"

The poor old mother fell upon her knees before the daughter, and clasping both her hands in hers, implored the sorrowing girl to leave the damp window, and seek repose in her chamber. But Amy heard her not—her glassy stare still remained fixed upon the road, and her icy fingers returned not the fond pressure of her mother. Motionless as a statue, the color came and went from her still features, even at the chirping of the night cricket from without.

"Oh, Amy!" sobbed the parent, "do not look so wildly!"

The daughter slowly turned her head, 'till her gaze rested upon the kneeling form of her mother.

"Mother," she said, in a changed tone, "he will not come to-night!"

The parent gently twined her arm round the neck of her child, and led her, unresistingly to her chamber, where, after a long hour of watchfulness, she left her in slumber. Placing a small night-lamp in an alcove by the mantel, she softly stole from the room, and Amy was alone. The moonbeams streamed through the latticed window-shutters, and sometimes flickering on the pale face of the sleeper, showed that her rest was unquiet.

Scarce had the pale beams of the night orb forsaken the darkened chamber, when a slight rustling, amid the shrubbery that clambered over and around the window-frame, sounded from without, and the shutters slowly unclosed. A hand was gently thrust through the opening, and soon after raised the frame with a slight creaking noise.

"Hist!" cried the person at the window, and a muffled form glided from behind the garden-arbor, and stood at the foot of the ladder.

"Hist!" was echoed from below.

"The room is dark, Captain," said Bromly, (for it was he,) "give me the lantern—softly!"

The Captain took from beneath the folds of his cloak a darkened lantern, and advancing part way up the ladder, reached it to his companion. Bromly thrust it through the open window, and gently sliding back a small wicket, the light streamed in upon the form of the sleeping Amy. As the sudden glare fell upon her face, she moved restlessly, flinging one arm about her head, 'till it mingled in the glossy ringlets that flowed over the pillow—and then all was still again.

"She sleeps!" whispered Bromly, as he crept through the window.

"Be cautious—advance slowly!" muttered the Captain, from below.

Bromly gathered in the folds of the white drapery that curtained the window, and pushing them back on each side, fastened the loose folds to the frame, so that no impediment existed to arrest the progress of their nefarious plot. Again he stood at the window, and whispered—

"All is ready—call Borten!"

The Captain applied a small whistle to his lips, and a figure came from its concealment in the garden.

"Mount the ladder," said he, "and stand upon the second round from the top."

The man ascended the ladder as he was directed, and paused upon the spot specified.

A wild, piercing scream echoed from the chamber, as the ruffian Bromly dashed to the window with the fair Amy in his arms, and depositing her in the grasp of the man who waited at the top of the ladder, she was received by the Captain on the ground.

"Quick!" cried the Captain, "quick! Bromly, leap from the window!"

The ladder had fallen to the ground, leaving Bromly inside the chamber.

"Now, then," he shouted, as he sprang to the earth—"the horses!"

And, with bounding steps he made for the covert that concealed the horses, beyond the garden gate.—The Captain mounted, and receiving the insensible Amy in his arms, he put spurs to his steed, and dashed across the meadow, out into the lane, followed by his companions; and as they entered the thick wood, the aged parents were seen rushing out into the road, with wild, dishevelled locks, and clasped hands, screaming for their child.

"On—on—faster!" shouted the Captain, as he buried his sharp spurs deep in the sides of his fleet steed, and the animal, obeying the stinging impulse, sprang forwardswith renewed swiftness.

"By Heaven!" he suddenly cried, as he looked back, "they have fired the barn! See—the blaze will bring a whole troop upon us!"

As he spoke, a broad, lurid glare burst out from behind the white cottage, and the clouds suddenly became illuminated with a crimson hue. It was the signal for rescue—and the British officer knew it. His blanched, livid features became fearfully convulsed, and it was with difficulty he kept his seat upon the flying steed. But still on—onward he went—and brighter and broader grew the signal light, tinging the forest tops with its luridness.

"Spare us!—spare us!" cried the Captain, as they suddenly dashed in among a body of soldiers, and reigning in his horse, he leaped with his fair burden to the ground, and fell upon his knees.

A loud, mocking laugh came from the soldiery, and the Captain found that he was within his own camp. He sprang to his feet with a flush of mortification, and bid them prepare for retreat toward the main body, as the whole American force would be down upon them in an instant. The camp consisted of about two hundred armed men, with a score of prisoners, which were soon in motion on the Captain's alarm, and making rapidly for their confederate forces.

Still flashed the beacon light from the white cottage as a solitary horseman came dashing furiously and foaming down the open road, and springing from his steed at the open gate, rushed into the house.

"Amy! Amy!" cried the young patriot, pacing the wide apartments with rapid strides. "Amy! where is she?"

No answer came from within the house, and he flung open the door, and sprang into the back garden. There was the aged mother, and the decrepid father, heaping fresh piles of dry grass upon the blazing heap, with a desperate energy and supernatural strength. They saw not the approach of the lover in the intensity of excitement with which they supplied the burning signal, until his hoarse voice shouted in their ears—

"Amy! where is she?"

The old man turned at the thundering tones, and cried out—

"Lost! lost!" and fell senseless to the earth, and would have perished amid the burning cinders, had not Frank dragged him from the smoking ashes.—The mother had strength to point toward the forest, and she, too, sank exhausted.

He had heard enough—and dashing through the house, and out into the front garden, he leapt upon his steed, and sprang forward to hasten on his companions. Scarce had he spanned a mile, when his quick ear caught the loud tramp of the Night-Riders—and ere another minute he was in their midst.

"Follow! follow!" he shouted, frantically, as he joined them. "The British have robbed old Nathan Walters of his dearest treasure, and the wrongs of helpless innocence shriek for vengeance!"

A simultaneous burst of indignation came from the troopers—and the commander, advancing to Frank, said—

"Cans't trace their route, young man?"

"Ay! every foot of it. They have taken the forest path, and will cross the stream by the old ferry."

"Then lead on!" was the reply; and the whole body, thirty in number, dashed forward—and as they passed the cottage and the still smoking barn, a cry of suppressed hate came from the clenched teeth of every man.

"Faster!" cried Frank; "let not the morning sun see Amy Walters in the hands of her captors!"

The dark, long wood was passed, and they suddenly came to the spot where the British were recently encamped. The sight re-animated them, and the full heart of the young leader seemed bursting from its human tenement.

"Ho! ho!" cried he, and he laughed outright from intense excitement—"we get on bravely. Fear not, Amy; there are stout hearts abroad that can free thee, and will do so! So-ho! now, trot quick;—let not one laggard soul be found where the cause is liberty and woman. By our hopes! the day breaks, and the clouds look smilingly. Now, then, wheel left—swifter, my comrades, for Heaven's sake; even now their brutal hands may be upon her, and she shrieking for her countrymen! Look! there is the ferry—cross but the water, and we have them!"

With still accelerated swiftness the riders dashed down the road to the ferry. Opposition availed nothing—they were resolute, determined, and the persons in command of the landing were compelled reluctantly to permit their crossing. Soon as they touched the opposite shore, an advance was sent forward to reconnoitre the enemy's position, who speedily returned with information that they had halted at the first tavern, and were now in the midst of their carousing, but with a sentinel stationed on the outside.

Cautiously and in silence the little troop proceeded—but, in despite of their caution, when they arrived within fifty yards of the house, the sentinel took the alarm, and, discharging his musket, fled into the tavern. Concealment was useless.

"Forward!" shouted Marion, resuming his command—"charge on them! Quick—there—cut off their retreat by the wood!"

And ere the frightened British had time to collect their scattered senses, the Americans were upon them. With a loud shout they burst the doors from their hinges, and drove the hidden Englishmen from their concealment. Impressed with the idea that a vast force was upon them, they unhesitatingly fled, but were as instantly captured; and when the melee ended, they beheld their whole force of two hundred at the mercy of thirty men.

As young Frank rushed through the house, calling on his beloved—his Amy—he heard the sweet tones of her voice from a small apartment, and quickly clasped her to his heart—a rescued bride.

"Ah! Frank," said she, "I can guess well thy service now—it is no longer a mystery. The Night-Riders claim thee as a confederate."

The youth smiled—and, kissing her fair brow, owned the truth.

The British captain was demanded—but, strange to say, he was nowhere to be found. His escape seemed almost miraculous, for every avenue had been guarded. Finally, after a long search, the valiant officer was found snugly ensconced up the kitchen chimney,* from which he was speedily ejected—an object of mortification to his own companions, and of ridicule to his captors.

There was another brilliant gem cast into Liberty's glorious crucible—and the occasion was celebrated, ere the morning sun tipped the golden edge of the horizon, by the union of the fair Amy and her brave lover. And when the rites were over, and Frank and his blushing bride stood in the presence of South Carolina's hero, the daring Marion rose and blessed them.

* This is an historical fact.

SHOPPING.

Goods after goods were exposed to her view,
Prints, laces and silks—at her call;
Thirty patterns she took—the Lord knows for who!
When the strings of her huge ladispensable drew,
With the prices of each marked on all.

Have you any gloves? (mark the question she made;)
Those for gentlemen quickly were shown—
"Ladies', sir, if you please,"—and long whites were displayed;
"O, the short ones?"—short English before her were laid;
But "Lord, French, sir," next was the tune.

French kid, still unmoved, Bobby drew from a case,
Where they lay packed superbly together;
But soon had to wish them well back in their place,
When for "Silk" she exclaimed with a wonderful face:
"Silk—Lord bless me, you see these are leather!"

Bobby now stood aghast—twenty others the while Bore'd for goods like a barding host—
The counter was heaped to a terrible pile,
His countenance lost its accustomed smile,
And his patience now gave up the ghost.

MORAL.

Were ever poor mortals like shopkeepers curst?
Why, in Lucifer's name, could she not ask at first,
For Ladies' short, white, French silk gloves?

THE OLD CLOAK.

BY MRS. D——.

"Pray, Mr. Norton," exclaimed a lively lady to a fashionably dressed, handsome young man, who was standing beside her at an evening party, "pray, do you intend to remain an old bachelor all your days? Since your return from Europe, I have been continually expecting to hear of your marriage, but here you have been, two years, and you are still, to all appearance, 'in statu quo,' as the lawyers say."

"My dear Mrs. Hinton," replied the young gentleman, with a smile, "I will be frank, and tell you the real reason of my remaining a general admirer of the sex, instead of confining my attentions to any one 'bright particular star,' however much I may be dazzled by its brilliancy. I am actually afraid to marry."

"Afraid!" echoed the lady, opening her dark eyes to their widest extent with astonishment. "'Faint heart never won,' you know. Are you afraid to propose?"

"No, madam, afraid to marry. You will laugh at me, I dare say, when I tell you that my seat in church has a great deal to do with my solitary state, which seems so much to excite your surprise."

"Why, yes," replied Mrs. Hinton, "one is always surprised when a young man who—without meaning to flatter you—is certainly a favorite in society, (here Mr. Norton made her a polite bow,) and who has an independent fortune, still refrains from choosing one of the many fair damsels whom he meets, to superintend his establishment. But what influence your seat in church can have upon the matter, I am at a loss to imagine."

"You must know, then, that I sit just behind Miss La Mode, in Dr. Righthead's church, and the sight of her velvet cloak absolutely frightens me from the thought of marrying a wife who may some day say to me, 'My dear, I am dying for a new velvet cloak; please to give me two or three hundred dollars, and I will go to Stewart's and buy one.' How I should shudder to hear such a request."

"Really, Mr. Norton, this is too absurd for you, with your fortune, to talk in such a manner. I shall begin to think you a miser. Your wife might dress as extravagantly as she chose, and it would not injure you. And surely you do not object to a lady's wearing a velvet cloak?"

"I do not object to any thing that is consistent, but I cannot help thinking splendid velvet, such as Queen Victoria herself might be satisfied with, for a coronation robe, sadly out of place when it is made into a cloak, to be worn on almost all occasions; particularly when it is well known that Miss La Mode's father does not even pay his baker or his butcher. If I were one of his poor creditors, I should be tempted to take the cloak from the young lady, in the street, and sell it for what it would bring."

Mrs. Hinton sat silent at this speech. Her conscience reproached her, for she knew that she had, on that day, purchased an elegant new mantle, although her husband had requested her to be as economical as possible in her expenditures, as he found it difficult, in those trying times, to meet all the demands made upon his purse. She was a woman, however, of generous feelings, as yet unhardened by resisting good impulses, and she secretly resolved to take back the mantle the next day, and prevail upon the shopman to receive it, since it was not yet paid for. All this passed through her mind with the rapidity of lightning, and she turned round with a smile to address Mr. Norton, when an over-dressed young lady, who had been sitting, an interested listener in the conversation, interposed.

"If Mr. Norton wants an economical wife," she said, "I would recommend him to offer himself to Emily Harwood. I think she will suit him exactly, for she has worn an old cloak all winter, with no alteration—one that she has had two years, at least, to my knowledge."

Mr. Norton looked at the speaker, and the unamiable expression of her countenance sunk her in his estimation forever, although he had hitherto regarded her as very pretty and interesting, and had sometimes even thought it almost possible to love Caroline Howard well enough to marry her, if he could only hope to cure her of the passion for dress which she displayed. But this remark sealed her fate, as far as he was concerned, and turning to Mrs. Hinton, he asked—

"Who is Emily Harwood? Are you acquainted with her? I should really like to be introduced to a young lady who has moral courage enough to wear an unfashionable garment, after having worn it already two winters; she must possess a more than common character."

"I will introduce you with pleasure," said Mrs. Hinton. "She is a sweet girl and a great favorite of mine. I confess I have myself been surprised at the plainness of her dress, this winter, for her father is considered wealthy, and she is the only one of his daughters of an age to go into society. That is she, in the simple white frock, and that is her mother, by her side."

Mr. Norton was charmed to perceive that it was a young lady who, by her singularly modest and unpretending appearance, had attracted his attention in the early part of the evening. He had intended to inquire her name, but lost sight of her in the crowd, and supposed that she had retired. She received him with an easy, graceful air, and after a few moments passed in conversation, he thought her positively beautiful, so intelligent was the expression of her dark blue eyes, and so beaming the smile with which she listened to his lively remarks. He was also very much pleased with Mrs. Harwood, who did not leave to her daughter the whole burden of the conversation, as some mothers are apt to do, contenting themselves with being mere spectators.

When Mr. Norton laid his head upon the pillow, that night, it was long before he could compose his mind to sleep, so much was he disturbed by the vision of a pair of blue eyes which danced before him, not to mention dark ringlets and old cloaks, which mingled together in strange confusion. He began to think that he had at last found the object he had been so long seeking, and resolving that he would call the next day at Mr. Harwood's, at last resigned himself to repose.

The next morning, Mrs. Hinton, in pursuance of the wise resolution she had made, attired herself to go out, and was waiting in the parlor for her carriage. The beautiful mantle lay on the sofa by her side, and she was examining it, and making up her mind that, after all, she could do without it, and if she could that she ought to. At this moment, Caroline Howard, who was an intimate friend, entered.

"Are you going out so early?" she exclaimed, on seeing Mrs. Hinton ready dressed. "I came in the hope of seeing you at this hour, for I wished to tell you that Stewart had some of the loveliest mantles you ever saw. I was there yesterday, and looked at them. They were just opened, and the clerk assured me that they were the only ones imported, and there are but a dozen all together. I was afraid they would all be sold, yet I did not dare to buy one before asking my mother's permission, for father made such a fuss last week about my buying this splendid silk, without consulting him, that mother forbade my doing it again. I have been, all the morning, teazing her to let me have one, and have at last succeeded. So you must positively come and choose one too. But I declare," she continued, "you have one already," as her eyes fell upon the sofa, for she had talked so volubly that she had not even paused to look round her. "But you will come with me, will you not?"

Mrs. Hinton replied gravely—"I am going to Stewart's to return this mantle, and I would advise you, my dear Caroline, if you had to tease your mother for leave to buy one, to deny yourself, and gratify her by informing her that you have resolved to do without it. Fifty dollars is a great deal to spend in such an article of dress. My husband told me this morning that he was afraid he should be obliged to give up his carriage and horses, his business is so much less profitable than formerly. Now, you know it is absolutely necessary for his health that he should ride a great deal, and I resolved to spend as little as possible, that he might be able to enjoy his carriage."

Caroline sat without speaking until Mrs. Hinton had concluded, when she said, pettishly—

"But you are married, and it does not make so much difference to you how you dress; just see how becoming this is." And she turned from the glass, at which she had been arranging the mantle in graceful folds over her well-shaped figure; and Mrs. Hinton could not help acknowledging that it was very becoming indeed. Nevertheless, she still attempted to persuade her young friend to forego the purchase, for she knew that Caroline's father was very much involved in debt, and it was feared every day that he would stop payment; although, as it appeared, like many other gentlemen who keep the state of their affairs a secret from those most interested in the truth, his wife and daughter were utterly ignorant of the circumstance. But she found her arguments of no effect. Indeed, Caroline endeavored to persuade Mrs. Hinton herself to retain the velvet she was about to carry back. But she had too much strength of mind to be led away by her vanity, when she knew that her decision was right, although she could not repress a womanish feeling of regret at the thought of resigning so becoming an article of apparel. Mrs. Hinton was so much grieved and shocked at the selfishness of her young friend, that she thought she could never again feel toward her the same affection she had hitherto experienced. She made her confess that the fifty dollars her mother had given her, with which to purchase the wished-for mantle, was a sum that had been appropriated to a younger sister, that she might take lessons in drawing, an art of which she was passionately fond, and for which she had a decided genius. She could not forbear hinting to Caroline that a time might come when the talents of her sister would be put in requisition for more important purposes than those of mere amusement; but her persuasions were lost upon the mind of the thoughtless and selfish girl, and she saw her depart, with pain, to fulfil her intention.

Mrs. Hinton found no difficulty in returning the mantle, and after she had left the store she wondered how she could have been so foolish as to suffer a moment's uneasiness on such a trifling subject. The words of Mr. Norton had made a deep impression upon her, and as she looked at the multitude of poor, houseless wretches, who throng Broadway, begging for charity, she felt how sinful it was to waste in extravagance that which would bring comfort and happiness to so many sorrowful hearts. When her husband returned to dinner, she, like a true-hearted wife, made a confession to him of her folly of the day before, her repentance, and the purpose for which she had just visited Stewart's. Mr. Hinton was a man of sense and intelligence. He had often deplored his wife's fondness for display, but she was so young when he married her, and had been so petted from her childhood by a fond mother, and was withal so lovely and interesting, that he could not find it in his heart to deny her any gratification, trusting that as she grew older her tastes would change. He did not know that the passion for dress is one which increases with indulgence, like all other bad habits, and is the hardest to overcome in the female heart, particularly, as was the case with Mrs. Hinton, where there are no children to occupy the time and attention. So delighted was he with the ingenuousness of her confession, that he presented her with a sum of money for charitable purposes, telling her that he had that day unexpectedly recovered a bad debt which he had long since despaired of, and consequently no longer entertained the fears which he had mentioned to her in the morning.

Let us return to Mr. Norton. He could not avoid anticipating the calling hour a little, so impatient was he to meet again the object that had so much fascinated him the night before. As he entered the hall, he heard the sound of music, and being shown into the drawing-room, found the fair Emily evidently giving lessons on the piano to a little sister. Although attired in a simple morning dress, she did not appear less lovely than his memory had pictured, and the bright blush which his unexpected appearance called up, made her not less interesting in his eyes. She dismissed the little girl with a message to her mother, who soon appeared and received him kindly.—As he glanced around and observed the air of elegance, though not of display, that pervaded the establishment, he could not help recalling Miss Howard's words about the old cloak, and his curiosity was excited to know what could be her reason for wearing a garment unfashionable enough to attract observation. After making as long a call as he dared, upon first acquaintance, he took leave, not without being invited by Mrs. Harwood to call again; an invitation to which he cordially responded. Not many days after, as Mr. Norton was walking in Broadway, he met Miss Harwood, and joined her immediately. He had walked for some time by her side without at all regarding her dress, when Miss La Mode suddenly emerged from a shop, and passed on before them, arrayed in her superb velvet cloak, with feathers, &c., in the height of fashion. The conversation at the party instantly recurred to his thoughts, and he glanced at the cloak of his companion. It was of plain dark merino, and had evidently been much worn, though every thing about her was so scrupulously neat, and her simple white hat so becoming to her fresh complexion, that she was infinitely more attractive to an intelligent man, than the dashing Miss La Mode. To test her feelings, he remarked, carelessly, "That is a beautiful cloak of Miss La Mode's." No blush appeared on her cheek, as she quietly replied, "It is indeed very beautiful." Mr. Norton could not help seeing how superior was this conduct to that of some young ladies, who betray an uneasy feeling of consciousness when they hear praises of another's appearance, which they know to be more brilliant than their own. He continued to visit at Mr. Harwood's, and was always kindly received; but he was not one to decide too hastily on a subject of such vast importance, as he felt the character of his companion for life to be. It chanced, at length, that he had a commission from an aunt in the country, for some millinery, and although entirely unused to make such purchases, he resorted to the most fashionable establishment of the kind, for the first time to exercise his taste in that department. The milliner took him behind a curtain which separated the two rooms, in order to show him some very recherche articles, and requesting him to take a seat upon a sofa, left him to search for the important box which contained the treasures. He was beginning to grow impatient, when a sweet, well known voice sent a thrill through his heart. It was Emily Harwood's voice, apparently conversing with another young lady, so close to the curtain that he could not avoid hearing every word. He was about to dart forward and address them, when the words "old cloak" fell upon his ear.—"Now," he thought, "perhaps I shall find the solution of the mystery." "No," said Emily, "I will not buy such a gay hat as this. It would not suit at all with my old cloak." "Do, for pity's sake, my dear Emily," exclaimed her companion, "tell me why you have worn that same cloak this winter. I believe it is the third winter you have had it. We have all wondered why you did not get a new one, and that spiteful Caroline Howard has talked about it at every party this season."

"I am very sorry," replied Emily, laughing, "that Miss Howard has been at such a loss for subjects of conversation, as to find nothing more interesting than my poor cloak. However, I will tell you my motive for wearing it, and I am sure, dear Helen, that you will approve of it. But first promise me that you will tell no one else. I should not think of explaining it to any but you."

Here Mr. Norton almost resolved to show himself. He felt it a breach of honor to hear what was evidently a secret; but his interest in the fair Emily was so strong, that he excused himself on that plea, and remained silent.

Helen made the required promise, and Emily proceeded:

"You remember hearing of the death of my uncle Murray, last summer. He had failed just before, so that his family were left quite destitute. Catharine, the eldest daughter, has been at Mrs. Willard's school for the last year, and she was very desirous of remaining another term, after which Mrs. Willard would engage her as a teacher. She considers her one of her finest scholars. But it was not possible for her mother to continue such an expense, and my father said that he could not offer to do it unless we would make some retrenchment in our domestic affairs. Therefore I offered to wear my old cloak another season, and to give little Julia music lessons, instead of her having a teacher. Now do you not think that a sufficient motive? I assure you I have felt more pleasure, this winter, in wearing that old cloak, than I should have done in possessing one even more splendid than Miss La Mode's, for now my poor cousin will be able to support herself and assist her mother in educating her brothers and sisters."

"That is just like yourself, Emily," exclaimed her friend, enthusiastically. "I only wish I could tell of it. How ashamed Caroline Howard would be of all her ill-natured speeches!"

It is needless to say that there was another auditor who shared in the admiration of Helen. Mr. Norton was so delighted with the simple recital of Emily, that he longed to clasp her to his heart, and tell her that his happiness depended on her alone. He saw the young ladies take their departure, and a few moments after hastened away, forgetting his aunt and all her commissions, and leaving the milliner lost in astonishment at his abrupt departure. He reached Mr. Harwood's almost as soon as Emily herself, and astonished her by a warm declaration of his feelings. She did not bid him despair, and it was soon after announced that Mr. Norton and Emily Harwood were engaged, much to the astonishment of Miss La Mode and Caroline Howard, who could not understand why she was preferred to themselves.

Mrs. Hinton was delighted with Mr. Norton's choice, and predicted that he would have a pattern wife. She never forgot her good resolutions, but her persuasions were lost upon her former friend, Caroline, who was, however, soon forced, by the failure of her father, to renounce her extravagant habits.

We must do Mr. Norton the justice to say that he had the candor to confess to his wife, soon after their marriage, the means by which he obtained a knowledge of her motives for wearing the old cloak, which was ever after preserved as a precious relic. I can assure my readers that she did not blame him severely, and should this tale ever meet their eyes, I trust that they will both pardon the use I have made of the incidents related to me.

THE THREE LOVERS;

OR,

WHO SHALL HAVE HER?

BY MARY SPENCER PEASE.

Chapter I.

INTRODUCTORY.

Squire Malcolm's family consisted of himself, his wife, his two sons, and an orphan nephew.

He—Squire Malcolm—was a good easy man, with a good easy fortune, and a liberal education. He was considered the great man of Malcolmville—a village consisting of a tavern, a store, (where every thing, from an ox yoke to a penny whistle, was sold,) a blacksmith's shop (the blacksmith occasionally acting in the capacity of a dentist,) and twenty dwelling houses. His greatness consisted in owning the finest mansion and grounds for miles around, and in being the arbitrator of all the petty disputes in Malcolmville.

As great a man as was the squire, Mrs. Malcolm, the squire's better-half, was far the greater man, inasmuch as he, being a sort of ruler among the villagers, she ruled the ruler. Her sceptre was swayed with a despotic hand, her subject submitting like a good dutiful husband. She was a great schemer in a small way; and like many others, her god was Mammon. To be rich and of importance in the eyes of others, was the summum bonum of her desires.

The sons of the squire, one ten and the other twelve, were fine promising boys, "the pride of their fond parents." In her dreams of the future, Mrs. Malcolm saw Horace, the elder,—who she thought had much of the statesman in him,—presiding over our fair land, honored and looked up to by all. She could not decide what her younger boy, Julian, would be: a military officer, or a learned Physician—perhaps a great Divine. Of her nephew, Harry Grey, she had no dreams nor thoughts, save that he was a good boy, and gave her no trouble. She did not altogether like the idea of his being dependent for support upon her husband; but then, thought she, "he is the child of my only sister and an unprotected orphan—when he is old enough he can be put to some trade, and so be off our hands."

Chapter II.

THE LETTER: CAUSING THE SQUIRE TO SHED TEARS, AND MRS. MALCOLM SECRETLY TO REJOICE.

The family at Malcolm Hall—for by that name was the residence of the squire distinguished—were, with coffee and muffins, breaking their fast. Mrs. Malcolm after a long silence observed that the cook must be severely reprimanded, for her coffee the few last mornings had been very unpalatable."

"True," replied the squire, thinking of the President's message he was reading.

Mrs. Malcolm made several other remarks, and was on the point of thanking her husband for his politeness towards her in not having heard a word she said, as her eye glanced upon the post-boy coming down the road. That sight, happily, diverted her thoughts, and left her spouse to peruse his message in peace.

"John," said she to the waiter, "see if there are any letters for your master or for me."

"One for the squire," replied the man, returning after an absence of a few minutes, with a ship-worn letter upon his salver.

"Sealed with black!" exclaimed Mrs. Malcolm. "What can it mean? It looks as though it had come from a long distance."

The three boys looked up as the squire broke the black seal, then busied themselves again on what interested them far more than the letter—a kite they had brought into the breakfast room to make.

"Who is it from, Mr. Malcolm?"—Mrs. Malcolm always called her husband Mr. Malcolm, not conceiving it genteel or dignified to call him by any other than his surname. "Why, Mr. Malcolm, what is in the letter to disturb you so much?"

The squire had read but a few words in the letter, when he let his hand drop and bowed his head upon his bosom, not heeding or seeming to hear his wife's questioning.

Mrs. Malcolm took from his unresisting hand the object of her curiosity, and read:

"My Dear and only Brother:

My Physician has just left me. He tells me and I feel that my hours on earth are few. Before my illness I hoped soon to be with you, but Heaven has willed it otherwise. I send you, dear Julian, my only earthly treasure—the child of my departed Zillah. Take her and cherish her for my sake.—Guard well my gentle child. I know your kind nature, and leave her to you as to the only being with whom I would entrust her. The warm blood of her mother's race runs in her veins; she is all impulse, and ardour. She is impetuous and passionate, but will readily yield to kindness. She will have wealth; half the sum I leave to her would make a princely fortune. Would I had been contented with the half, then would my little Zillah have had a father to guide her growing years. I enclose you a copy of my will. You will see that I leave to you the disposal of my daughter's hand—let her not bestow it on an unworthy object—and that, in case she marries without your approval, two-thirds of her property are yours on the day of her marriage. I can write no more, dear brother. My head swims with the exertion of writing thus, and my mind refuses to fix itself on any definite object. Dear Julian, be a father to my child. Farewell,

HORACE MALCOLM."

Mrs. Malcolm read the letter, then deliberately took up and read through the will—her husband still sitting with his head bent and buried in his hands.

"He bequeaths the bulk of his vast property to his daughter, ten thousand dollars to his dear brother Julian, ten thousand to his elder nephew and namesake, Horace, and five thousand to his younger nephew Julian," soliloquized Mrs. Malcolm. "Very considerate of my brother-in-law. I can now educate my boys as I have wished them educated. Then the East Indian heiress with her million will be a nice wife for one of them. For Horace—he will be the more dashing. Yes, I must manage that Horace marries his rich cousin. Your poor brother," continued Mrs. Malcolm aloud, to her husband, "has left this world of sorrow, it seems—for a better one I hope. Poor man, but it is what we must all come to, sooner or later."

"Dear Horace! my poor brother!" and the squire wiped his moistened spectacles and again took up the letter. As he read on, one glistening tear after another flowed silently down his cheek. He thought of the many happy hours he had had with his lost brother, the many hairbreadth dangers they had escaped, the many mischiefs they had committed, and their awful fear of being found out—of their school-boy days and separation.

All passed so vividly in his mind, it was like living the past over again. And that dear brother was dead—and far from him, that he could not see his eyes closed in death—his only brother!

The three boys wondered to see the squire—the jolly squire—weeping. They learned the reason, and that a little cousin—one they had never seen—was coming among them to be one of them. They all had boyish feelings of whether they should like her—whether she would like them—how she looked. Horace knew her mother had been an East Indian;—the East Indians he knew were dark, almost black, he thought—and he wondered how black his little cousin Zillah was.

"Poor girl! she is an orphan like myself," thought Harry.

Chapter III.

THE DARK FLOWER TRANSPLANTED FROM ITS SUNNY HOME TO OUR COLD SOIL—WHERE IT DROOPS, BUT FOR A TIME.

Two weeks passed by since the arrival of the letter. The squire was daily expecting his niece or another letter from his brother.

A carriage drove up to the door of Malcolm Hall. A dark, middle-aged woman, and a little girl, clad in the deepest mourning, were handed out of it.

"My lost brother's child!" exclaimed the squire, hastening out to meet the little orphan.

Mrs. Malcolm was delighted to see her dear little niece. She most overwhelmed her with kisses; and taking her by the hand, and bidding her maid Indiana—the dark woman that came with her—follow, she conducted them into a pleasant, airy room—overlooking wood, water, and the open sky—that she herself had fitted up with no little expense and care, expressly for the young heiress.

"I shan't like to live here. I want to go home over the water again," sobbed the little heiress, after her aunt had left her alone with her maid.

Indiana tried to pacify her young mistress. She succeeded at last, after promising to take her back to India, if, after staying a week at her uncle's, she still wished to return.

A beam of sunshine once more illumining the dark, handsome face of the little East Indian, she permitted herself to be led down stairs. The squire had been called away upon some urgent law business, but she found her aunt, who received her with a gracious smile and a caress.

"Your uncle has gone to the next village, my love, but will soon return. Meantime, my dear, if you have no objections, we will pay a visit to the boys' play-room; they are very anxious to see you."

The little maiden did not object, and after passing through a long hall and several rooms—Mrs. Malcolm stopping to show her niece any thing she thought might interest her—they came to the play-room. The boys were playing leap-frog with all their strength. Horace had just cleared his first man, and was preparing for a vault over his second. All three started to their feet, blushing and looking as sheepish as boys know how to look.

"Come here, Horace. This, my dear Zillah, is your cousin Horace—the one over there with light hair is Julian—the other is my nephew, Harry Grey. Horace you will find a fine, manly boy, ready to stand between you and any danger or difficulty.—Julian is shy—too timid of his own powers to make a hero. Harry is—Harry, do stop twirling your jacket buttons; you act as though you had never been taught good manners—Harry, my love, you will find a kind, obliging boy, after he gets acquainted with you."

The boys eyed their little stranger cousin as she stood in her mourning dress. They all three thought her very pretty, and not near so dark as they had expected—not black at all. Her skin was the clearest, richest olive: her eyes the clearest, richest black, —soft and wild.

Mrs. Malcolm told her little niece she must make herself quite at home—all in the house she said would be very kind to her. She asked her many questions about her own home in Java, but the rebuke she had given Harry had brought back the maiden's ill-humor and desire to return home. No kind words that her aunt could think of would make her move from where she stood, with her head bent, her chin resting upon her hand, the fore-finger of the little hand parting her red, pouting lips, and looking out with great black open eyes on all around her.

"Do you love flowers, cousin Zillah?" asked Harry, in a soft, kind voice; and gently approaching her, and timidly stealing her tiny hand, he placed within it a rose he had gathered from a bush that grew climbing up to the window. The tone of his voice or perhaps the flower reminded her of her own sunny home, or it might have been his earnest, sympathizing look—something it was that made the big, hot tears gush to her eyes, and then she sank down on a low stool, and cried as though her young heart would break.

The boy drew back frightened.

"Harry, what have you been saying to your cousin?" demanded Mrs. Malcolm, in a sharp tone.

"Indeed, aunt, I just asked—"

"Come here, my dear;" and Mrs. Malcolm tried to draw the sobbing girl towards her. "You know, my love, boys will be rude. You must tell me when they are, and I will punish—"

"But he was not rude," said Zillah, suddenly rising up and looking earnestly through her tears at her aunt. "He only gave me a flower, but it made me think of papa and my little garden at home."

"There, there, don't cry any more. Go with the boys—they will show you the little rabbits with pink eyes, and their birds and little squirrel, and the little young calf, and the little goslins, and pigs, and Guinea chickens, and the peacock, and the hens, and ducks. You must become acquainted with them all. We have a nice gentle little pony that your uncle will teach you to ride upon."

The pink-eyed rabbits, pigs and goslins, had made the child forget pouting and crying. She answered her aunt with a soft, happy voice, and with a smiling eye, that her papa had taught her to ride on her own little white "Fairy"—that was the name, she said, of the pony her father gave her for her own.

Mrs. Malcolm patted the child's head, caressingly parting her jet black curls.

"Take her in the garden, and to the barn, and down to the brook where the ducks are. Be kind to her boys, and show her all around. We will all be kind to you here, dear Zillah. Stand back, Harry, you are over-officious. Here, Horace, do you take your cousin's hand."

Zillah felt her heart lighter when her aunt had left the room. She felt sorry for Harry, and offered him her little hand that he had been so unjustly reproved for taking a short time before.

He looked at the little ring—her mother's gift—that enclosed one of her small white fingers. From that the four cousins fell familiarly to talking. Zillah was delighted with all she saw. She chatted freely and familiarly of what she used to do at her own home in Java. She wondered at not seeing a single lizard, or scorpion, or snake in the garden; there were ever so many, she said, all over the island at home; they often came into the houses. She was afraid, she said, to go into her papa's garden without some one with her. She took great pleasure in the flowers. Here, she said, were brighter and prettier, but they were not so sweet as our roses and lilies.

Like all little girls of eight years, she forgot the past in the present, and by the time the dinner bell rang, she and her cousins were as well acquainted as though they had been together for weeks instead of a few hours.

Chapter IV.

THE DARK FLOWER THE SUBJECT OF A SCHEME WHEREBY SHE IS MEDIATELY TO BLOOM WITHIN A HEART CHOSEN FOR HER.

The little East Indian soon grew domesticated in the family of her uncle. She was loved by the whole household, she was so good, and generous, and playful. With the squire she was the greatest pet imaginable. Her seat, half the time, was upon his knee, and there, still as a mouse, she would stay curling his hair over her little fairy fingers, while he read in his great law books—or listen to the many interesting stories he would tell her. She always called him papa. Mrs. Malcolm thought that was a sure sign that———but then from the very first she had determined that her eldest boy, Horace, and her heiress niece should be made one as soon as they were old enough.

With that magnanimous resolve she worried her first-born unceasingly for not being more attentive to his cousin. She was continually reminding him of his neglect, saying—

"Here, Horace, is a new book of prints; you may look them over with your cousin Zillah." Or—

"Horace, this is a fine day for a walk. You had better all go. And mind, my son, you help Zillah over the fences, and all the bad places in the road." Or—

"Zillah is entirely alone, Horace; go talk to her and amuse her."

At table she always contrived that Horace and Zillah should sit next one another. She was ever telling him to help his cousin to the bread, or butter, or to a glass of water. In fact, she gave neither of them any peace; and Zillah instinctively avoided her presence, as much as she sought the presence of the squire.

So, short-sighted woman, she defeated her own purpose; for Horace, possessing some of his mother's dictatorial spirit, would not be driven into loving even his pretty cousin Zillah. Whenever Mrs. Malcolm sent the little folks out walking, he would start with Zillah, agreeably to his mother's command; but somehow he would always contrive to pass by a certain cottage, where dwelt a certain widow lady, the mother of a certain little Emily, about the same age as Zillah. And somehow it ever happened that the little fair-haired Emily was at her mother's door, or in the garden in front of her mother's cottage; or at the window where she could see the cousins as they passed by. Horace would always contrive to have her join them, and he it was who always claimed her little hand, leaving Harry or Julian to walk with Zillah. It generally fell to the lot of Harry, for Julian was bashful and reserved. Zillah, too, seemed to prefer Harry. He was ever gentle to her—a secret, unconscious sympathy grew up between them. They were both orphans.

But more than all did Zillah incline towards Harry, because her aunt was often harsh to him. Then she could not bear to be teased about Horace, by Mrs. Malcolm; to be called his little wife.

Before the nut-brown Zillah came among them, the boyish fancy of Horace had been struck with the soft blue eyes and fair round cheek of Emily Hay, (for little people have their love-dreams, as well as we children of a larger growth.) If left to himself, however, his cousin Zillah's brighter face and brighter wit would undoubtedly have made him forget the fair-haired Emily.

Mrs. Malcolm dreamed nothing whatever of this infantile courtship,—for children will not give confidence where it is demanded, not where it will not meet with sympathy,—so in ignorance she hugged herself in the future greatness of her first-born, dwelling on the vast property he was to possess with his beautiful cousin Zillah, for a wife. She procured the best instructors for her sons and the heiress,—having them taught in the house that they might be constantly together. And when the boys were old enough to go to college, Harry she sent with her own sons to prepare him for some profession,—a professional gentleman for a nephew was so much more respectable than a mere mechanic or one in any sort of trade; —she continued Zillah's education at home that she might be with her cousin Horace during his vacations: and that she could have no possible chance of forming an attachement elsewhere. Thus schemed the squire's better half. The little folks had their schemes also.

Chapter V.

ZILLAH NO LONGER A CHILD—THE BOYS EMERGED FROM BOYHOOD—THE STAGE COACH, IN WHICH SITS A PRETTY FANNY.

Nine years passed by since Mrs. Malcolm first took her little orphan niece into the boys' play-room.—Within that time the dark, wild flower had burst the bud of childhood and was daily unfolding some new grace, some sweet beauty. She had the most bewitching bewildering way with her imaginable. Well was it, well and considerate was it for the hearts of the young men around and about that her aunt kept her so close. Very beautiful was the Indian Zillah with her varying smiles and soft black eyes. And so Harry Grey seemed to think. And so one other thought.

During the past nine years "the boys" had grown nine years older, and, in their estimation, nine years wiser. Behold them, then, in outward appearance.

Horace,—tall and handsome, with a dashing air, with dark, blue-grey eyes and black hair.

Harry,—not so tall nor so striking in appearance as his cousin, but with a more intellectual face. Eyes brown, curly brown hair to match.

Julian,—two years younger than the other two, was a fair-faced, thoughful-looking boy, with a broad, white forehead, with mellow blue eyes, and soft girlish hair. He was beautiful: his was intellectual beauty, combined with the utmost regularity of feature. Julian was in mind as well as person as unlike his brother as possible, he was all mind, all soul; a transcendentalist, a lover of German poetry, German philosophy, and German mysticism: while his brother was a realist who would give more for a day's sport than for all the poetry that ever was made.

Nine years were gone; the two elder boys had finished their collegiate course. All three were now on their way to Malcolm hall, the life of the stage coach that rattled heavily on toward their home; in which also sat an old gentleman in a rusty black coat, with a sour, elongated visage, who kept looking at the young collegians as though he were an ogre and would demolish them. At every fresh burst of fun his face grew an inch longer. Horace took him under his especial charge and actually succeeded, before the stage stopped, in forcing a grim smile from him. Another in the stage—his exact antipodes—was a jovial, burly farmer. Then there were a gentleman, his wife, and a couple of noisy, little ones, their little dimpled hands and rosy-dimpled mouths being very busily employed with some "thugar candy." A student sat in one corner; next to him sat a prim young lady somewhat advanced in years, of no particular age,—and next to her sat her charge, a young lady, no farther advanced in years than Zillah, but apparently much farther advanced in the knowledge of the ways of the world, and the ways of winning and breaking hearts. She had a pair of wicked, black, sparkling orbs, and kept them glancing from Harry to Horace. The prim young lady called her "Fanny dear," and she called the prim young lady "Aunt Hannah." The cousins, and the student in the corner of the coach, vied with each other in making polite speeches to the pretty Fanny.

Chapter VI.

THE INTERCEPTED KISS.

"Which way, my dear?"

"Only for a short walk aunt," replied Zillah, tying the strings of her straw bonnet.

"Alone?"

"No, Indiana is going with me."

"You will not be long gone, for you know this is the afternoon your cousins are expected home."

"True, aunt; I had not forgotten it, but—how quick time steals away."

"Yes, the year they have been gone seems not much more than a month. How long is it, my love, since you heard from Horace? You have not showed me his letters lately."

"He has not written to me since before the last vacation."

"For more than a year!" Mrs. Malcolm looked surprised; thought it very strange he had not written. Bashfulness, she supposed, prevented him.

"Perhaps so," replied Zillah, in a voice of indifference.

"Has not Harry written neither?"

"Never, aunt."

Mrs. Malcolm did not notice the bright, rich blood that gushed to the temples of her niece; nor the half sigh, nor the downward glance of her soft black eye, nor the tremulous motion of her lips as she replied.

"The boys should not have been so remiss. They should have written. You know, my dear, Horace is now twenty-one. He has completed his study at College, and will now commence studying law with his father. Horace will yet, I think, become a great man."

"Yes, aunt," replied Zillah, not thinking of Horace, but for the first time wondering why it was Harry had never written to her.

"There comes the stage now!" exclaimed Mrs. Malcolm, and hastened down stairs to meet her boys.

The stage stopped, the three got out; their happy voices were heard in the hall, but Zillah remained where her aunt had left her.

"Why, cousin Zillah, how you have grown!" was the first exclamation of Horace. "You have got to be a young lady, with your hair done up in a comb; a la Grec. I hardly dare claim my usual kiss of meeting. What say you, fair cousin?"

The kiss was granted blushingly, for a year had wrought a great change in the nut brown, giddy Zillah. Her slight child-like form had grown fuller and more round; the dark of her midnight eyes had grown more tender, her voice more mellow and sweet. Zillah was now seventeen.

"I crave the same privilege cousin Horace seems to think his right. Has Zillah a kiss for me?" said Harry, in a fervent voice.

Zillah blushed and trembled.

"Here a moment, Harry!" The kind wind had come to Mrs. Malcolm's help and had overthrown one of her geraniums. Harry must assist her in picking it up. And then she kept him conversing on botany, and asking him innumerable questions about his journey and studies, and then it was tea time.

Chapter VII.

LOVE-MAKING.

"The boys" had been home a fortnight. They had had a merry time of it; and, on this morning all were going on a fishing excursion—Zillah, "the boys," and a few of the young villagers.

"Horace," said Mrs. Malcolm, as he came to his mother to get some thread to mend his fishing rod; "my son, how do you and your cousin Zillah get along?"

"Charmingly, I believe."

"Have you come to any understanding, yet?"

"Understanding?"

"Yes—I mean have you fixed upon the wedding day?"

"Wedding day, mother?"

"Yes, my son. Why how stupid you are. I allude to the day you and she are to be married."

Horace affected as much astonishment at his mother's words as though he had not been conscious all along of her scheme.

"Zillah and I!—Why, mother, I didn't know we were going to be married."

"Well, I can tell you you are."

"I 'fags, mother!"

"Why, Horace! Where did you learn that horrid word?"

"I beg pardon, mother. But, really, mother, I think, prior to marriage, there ought to exist some love between"—

"Love! nonsense."

"Be that as it may, mother. I am just nonsensical enough not to wish a woman to marry me unless she loves me. Now Zillah, I know, does not."

"She does—she shall."

"And then, mother," continued Horace, with the utmost coolness, "mutual love I have always thought"—

"Mutual fiddlestick!"

"Why, mother! Where did you learn that horrid word? But, as I was saying, I conceive mutual love necessary to form happiness in the married life; and, unfortunately, I do not love my cousin."

"Not love Zillah!—your beautiful cousin Zillah! Why, Horace!"

"Beautiful she is: but the truth is, mother, you have striven too hard from the first to compel me to love her, and by that means frightened her heart away from me, and drove me from seeing her beauties. Have you never heard that you can lead a horse to the water, but that you can not force him to drink?"

"You are full of vulgarities, this morning. I am ashamed of you."

"I beg pardon, moth"—

"Never mind. But, my son, you must love Zillah. Have you never thought upon her princely fortune? You must love her and marry her. I have had my heart set upon it ever since she came among us."

"But, mother"—

"Horace—if you love me"—

"Well, mother, what shall I do?"

"Why, woo your cousin, and win her; such a golden bird is not to be thrown away. Love will come after marriage."

"Now, mother"—

"Horace, do you wish to provoke me to anger?—I command you to ask your cousin in marriage. Will you obey?"

"Certainly, mother, if such is your wish. But don't you know it is a tremendous undertaking for a diffident young man to ask a maiden to marry him? What shall I say?"

"How ridiculous! If you truly desired her for a wife, you would find no lack of words."

"Well, mother."

"You will?"

"Assuredly, mother."

"That's my son."

Horace sought Zillah. She was alone in the summer-house, fastening some colored feathers on Harry's fly hooks.

"Zillah," said he, taking a seat by her, "do you love me?"

Zillah's great oriental eyes opened wide, and rested in astonishment on her cousin.

"You have beautiful eyes, cousin Zillah. Do you love me?"

"Why, Horace, what a question!"

"Never mind, answer it. Do you love me?"

"In frankness, then—no."

"I am glad of it, Zillah. You would not marry me if I were to ask you?"

"No—no."

"Mother would have it you were in love with me. She made me promise to love you and marry you." Horace gave his cousin a quizzical look.

"For shame, Horace—you shall not ridicule your mother. She has always been a kind, good mother to you."

"You are right, Zillah. She has, and I love her, and can, without liking all she says. I am so addicted to quizzing"—

"Too much so entirely."

And here the cousins held a controversy, for Zillah was a warm advocate for entire reverence and obedience to parents. Horace made an end of the discussion by asking her if she were quite sure she could not love him.

"Quite," was the reply.

"And will not marry me?"

"Certainly not."

"I vow, cousin Zillah, I really believe I do love you; for your determined "NO" has sent such a pain to my heart as I never before had."

"Nothing but wounded vanity, I do assure you."

"Upon my soul, Zillah, I do love you. You never looked half so beautiful."

"Cousin Horace!"

"There, don't be angry—but you look all the prettier for a little richer color in your cheeks and a brighter sparkle in your big black eyes. In sober earnest, Zillah, won't you love me? Confound so much obstinacy as I have. If mother had not insisted, I should have seen sooner how very lovely you are; and then, a nearer tie than cousin would have bound us. But"—

"Just hear him. I think my excellent cousin's self-esteem fully equal in size to his obstinacy. You forget that I might not have loved you."

"True—and by Juno, I had nearly forgotten, too, that I am over head and ears in love with Emily Hay. You remember little Emily Hay?"

"What a rattle-brained mad-cap you are. Yes, I see her almost every day, and love her like a sister. But, Horace, your mother will never accept her as a daughter."

"Deuce take it, no."

"She is a sweet girl, and will make a good wife. Shall I intercede for you?"

"Do."

"You have been frank with me, cousin; I will be the same with you. Harry has a decided talent for arguing. He is to be a lawyer, you know, as well as yourself. At the termination of some half dozen of years, he hopes to have a good practice. And"—

"Don't blush so beautifully, cousin Zillah, I know all about it."

"Has Harry told you?"

"Nothing. I happen to have a pair of eyes in my head. Harry has his head brimful of notions of independence, and would not marry a queen until he could support himself. Yes, Harry loves you. I am glad of it—he is a fine fellow. But, Zillah, my poor brother!—"

"What of him?"

"You have been too much engrossed in your love to note how entirely his heart is yours. If you come suddenly in the room where he is, he trembles all over; his cheek pales and flushes, and his eye grows bright. He loves you Zillah. He is a dreamy boy, and you are his dream by night and by day. He [illegible] upon in his sleep."

"Poor Julian. But he is young, Horace; in time he will learn to love another—one that can return his love."

"I fear he will never love but one. His whole nature is ardent and tenacious. What he loves once, he loves and clings to always. Few know Julian, or of what he is capable. He appears a shy, imaginative boy; but in the back ground of that shyness he has heart, intellect—a soul. I see in him dawnings of a great mind—a mind the fates have denied me. I am a lazy, good sort of a fellow, with wit enough not to be a fool—to see more than I know—to appreciate genius:—but I am not a genius—Julian is—and time will prove him one."

"I never thought—in fact, I never thought much about him."

"I know it, coz, and Julian knows it, and—but speaking of hearts, it wants but just half an hour of our time fixed to start. I must see my mother. Adieu."

Chapter VIII.

REBELLION AND A WEDDING.

Mrs. Malcolm was very much excited at what she called her son's obstinacy; she could not brook to have her favorite scheme thwarted. She persisted that it should be as she said; and she lectured Horace so perseveringly on the subject, that his good nature gave way under what he felt to be an overbearing interference in what was inevitable, and that very day he prevailed, by his passionate pleading, upon Emily Hay to become his bride. The fishing party, much to the surprise of his young friends, was, at its close, turned into a wedding party.

At this unheard of act Mrs. Malcolm was enraged beyond all bounds. It was bad enough that her son should refuse to marry one she had chosen for him, but——it was too bad: and she would not receive her new daughter, and would never forgive her son. Her husband must do the same. He, good easy man, rather than face the fury of the storm, bowed his head and let the tempest sweep over it, thinking that at any time it lay in his power to forgive his son.

That son, however, chose to think for himself. When he found he was denied his father's house, he, with a spice of his mother's spirit, took his young bride and left the village.

Chapter IX.

A SECRET DISCOVERED.—THE DECISION OF THE SQUIRE.

Two years were away without revealing to the squire or his spouse the whereabouts of his lost son. Bitterly had both repented their conduct towards him—for if Mrs. Malcolm loved any thing, it was her first-born, Horace.

Julian was still at College, having nearly completed his studies there. Harry was pursuing the law with the squire.

Zillah, beautiful and blooming, was happy in his presence; happy, when, after his studies were over for the day, he would wander with her over hill and dale, by rock, and flowing water.

Harry and Zillah had just returned from a ramble, Mr. Malcolm was in his study;—his wife entered hastily.

"What is it, Harriet?" said he, looking up and noting the expression upon his wife's face.

"I shall send immediately for Julian—the impudence of the fellow. I overheard just now,—they did not know they had a listener to their secret. I could hardly credit my senses."

"What secret is it you have discovered?"

"Oh! nothing, but that Harry and Zillah have agreed to be married. Did you ever know such ingratitude?"

"In whom, Harriet? I see no ingratitude if they love one another."

"You do not think Harry ungrateful to secure for himself what I intended for my own son; after having provided for him and educated him as we have. And you are willing he should marry her?"

"When did you overhear the important secret?"

"Just now. They were in the summer-house. She, the simpleton, blushing, and he—my patience, how angry I am. They have been engaged to each other for more than two years, it seems, from what I could gather from the love nonsense they were talking."

"Well, my dear, I see no objection to their being united. Harry is a good, industrious"—

"Well, my dear, I see a great objection, and that is because Julian and she are to be man and wife."

"Julian! When did the young people decide upon it? This is the first I have heard of it."

"Why, the truth is, I believe, the young people, as you call them, Julian and Zillah, have not decided any thing about it—but I have, which is the same thing."

"Why, wife!"

"You need not look so amused, nor surprised. My children shall obey me."

"But surely you have no right to force your niece to marry against her will."

"But I have. And you must forbid her to marry Harry; and if she persist, you must claim the two-thirds of her property, that her father willed to you, in case she married against your consent."

"Wife, I shall do no such thing."

Mrs. Malcolm stared in mute astonishment to think that he should rebel.

"I shall do nothing so dishonest, Harriet. If Zillah chooses to marry her cousin Harry, she does not marry without my consent."

Mrs. Malcolm saw there was immovable determination in his look and voice; so all that was left for her to do, was to walk very slowly, and with much dignity, out of the room.

Chapter X.

FIRST LOVE IS OFTEN MOONSHINE.

Julian was sent for as his mother had threatened, and when he arrived home, an unaccountable desire for travelling came over Mrs. Malcolm. She must go to Washington, and no one but Harry Grey must go with her. Accordingly Harry Grey and his aunt departed.

Mrs. Malcolm was wise in leaving Julian alone with Zillah. It is, however, altogether uncertain whether or not her plan would have succeeded, had Julian Malcolm been Harry Grey, and Harry Grey Julian Malcolm.

For we may love, and think we love entirely, and still find another our hearts cling unto more strongly; and mingle with as though each were but the half, and wanted the other half to make a complete and harmonious whole. We may love with but a part of our nature and remain satisfied, (for the heart must love something,) until we chance upon a being our ever nature sympathizes with: one that will awaken new faculties to love with, one that we can love with all the love we gave the first, and still more add—a being, in short, made for us, and for us alone. Happy are they who find this being before wedlog one they think they love.

Juan Malcolm was a very different being from the Juan Zillah had always known. He had grown from be dreamy boy into the eloquent, impassioned man. He was alone with his cousin, and was happy. He ro with her, walked with her, read poetry to her, sg to her, and looked at her,—with his fervent, soul-lming eyes.

Zill did not intend to be false to Harry; she did not dm that she was: but somehow, when he and her at returned, she gradually discovered how much ore happy she was with Julian than with her cousinarry.

Zill had that in her that would not be satisfied short intellect the most refined. The transcendental Jun had opened a new light to her,—the life of thoind. She followed him, fascinated, through all thmazes of the mystic lore he delighted in;—look back with sorrow that she could no longer listewith the same pleasure she formerly did, to the morcommon-place Harry.

The Conclusion.

THE PRETTY FANNY ONCE MORE.

After all," thought Mrs. Malcolm, upon the morning her son Julian and Zillah stood at the bridal altar, "there is nothing like a little management to accomplish an end."

And Harry?—Horace once said, (Horace and his pretty wife were again on good terms with his family; Zillah, knowing his retreat, effected the reconciliation.) Horace once said that "Julian might, but that Harry never would die of a broken heart. That Julian never could, but that Harry might love more than once."

So the event proved; for Harry is now the happy groom to the pretty Fanny ———, his quondam stage companion: and but a short time ago it was, his heart beat for Zillah alone.

THE MISSES CUMMING.

Sweet warblers of the mountain land,
You've crossed the raging sea;
And left Old Scotia's rugged strand,
Our "Souvenirs" to be.
And many feelings long forgot,
Shall be recalled by thee;
Awakened by thy ev'ry note,
Of sweetest minstrelsy.

Our own, our simple, native song,
Is sweeter far to hear,
Than all the modern, motley throng,
That fall upon the ear.
Then sing once more Old Scotia's lays,
Renew the epic strain;—
Recall anew our by-gone days,
And lead us home again.

Yes, lead us to our home once more,
Where many thoughts may be,
(Though parted by the billow's roar)
Long'ring 'neath the "Rowan Tree."
Still let thy notes harmonious flow;
"In unison entwine;"
Still make our warmest feelings glow,
With thoughts of "Auld Lang Syne."

THOMAS YOUNG.

The Fortunes of a Country Girl.

BY MRS. EMMA C. EMBURY.

"Oh, thou art the lad of my heart, Willie,
For litule I hoped to see,
That the lad who won the lasses a'
Would ever been woo by me."

Chapter I.

It was the fortune of Annie Morrison to be born in a family where kindred love was diffused into so many channels, that the fountain, which was none of the fullest, could afford but a scanty supply to each. In plain parlance, there were so many children that the busy and care-worn mother felt it rather as a relief than a privation, when called upon to dispense with the presence of some; and when a venerable relative, who lived in a remote village in the interior of New Hampshire, sent for one of Mrs. Morrison's daughters, to be the companion of her lonely old age, the little Annie was chosen to answer the demand. Annie was one of those quiet, patient children, who are invariably imposed upon by their playmates, and disregarded by their elders. She never flew in a rage, nor fell into an exstasy, and though her eyes filled with tears when she met with unjust reproach, or sparkled with grateful joy at some unexpected pleasure, yet her emotions were so faintly expressed that the obtuse perceptions of her immediate companions never discovered them. Indeed, she was precisely the kind of companion whom her grandmother would have desired, for she exercised the old lady's affections without trying her patience, and, by her docility and gentleness, afforded a most excellent subject for that utilitarian system which has now become so obselete. "Reading, writing, and cyphering," comprised the whole amount of Annie's literary attainments, but then she was early initiated in all the mysteries of baking, boiling, roasting, and stewing—no one was better instructed in the difficulties of preserving and pickling—while it was quite impossible to find another child of her age who was such a proficient in hemming, over-banding, side-stitching, and darning. So Annie grew up a quiet, obedient, formal little creature, fulfilling her round of duties so patiently, that no one thought of noticing in her the total absence of all the glee and joyousness of childhood.

For several years Annie was in the habit of paying a Christmas visit to her parents, but as she grew older these visits became less and less pleasant to her. The playmates of her childhood gradually lost the memory of early associations, and, as the elder brothers and sisters grew up, Annie felt herself like a stranger among them. Her last visit was made on the occasion of the marriage of her second sister, and the various mortifications which she then received, seemed to connect her remembrances of home with a feeling of discomfort which she could not banish.—She was about eleven years of age—a period in a girl's life when she is always unformed in mind and manners and person, and when the changes which nature is then making in her mental and physical structure, render both awkward and ugly. Annie's sisters had all passed this turning point in early life, and were tall, stately girls, with flashing black eyes and raven locks; while the poor, country-bred child, with her dax-colored hair, her great blue eyes, her insignificant features, or "snub face," as her mother called it, formed a very strong contrast to their extreme beauty. Then her style of dress was so odd, and with her long-waisted calico frocks, her large white vandykes, (now designated by the less expressive name of "capes;") and her close-cut hair combed smoothly over her high forehead, she looked so queer and old-fashioned, while her manners were so grave and formal that her sisters bestowed on her the appellation of the "little old maid." But beneath her calm exterior Annie concealed a great deal of undeveloped sensibility, and the pain which the ridicule and indifference of her family occasioned, made her shrink from her accustomed visits. Year after year was allowed to glide on without bringing her in contact with those who had banished her from their social circle; and as her family found little inducement to visit her in her distant and secluded home, she grew up to woman's estate, a stranger to her nearest of kin.

Time passed on; her sisters married, her brothers went out into the world to win fortunes, her parents died; yet Annie was left undisturbed, almost forgotten in her remoteness. Devoted to the care of her grandmother, who remained for years a bed-ridden invalid, Annie had little thought to bestow on those who felt no care for her. Content in the fulfilment of her immediate duties, humble-minded, and self-forgetting, she passed her quiet existence amid the pleasant influences of nature, while both her mind and person were developing in a degree, of which she was totally unconscious. But a change came over the current of her life. Her grandmother died, and with her expired the small income which had barely sufficed for her support. A few hundred dollars, the fruits of her economy during many years, were all bequeathed to her affectionate companion, and Annie found herself now in want of a permanent home.

Mrs. Lawton, Annie's eldest sister, was a woman whose sense of propriety served her in the stead of fixed principles and sensitive feelings. Yet she would have been greatly shocked at the charge of insensibility and want of principle, for Mrs. Lawton was a perfect model of virtue and decorum, and no one uttered more graceful sentiments of charity and kindness. She was quite unconscious how much the opinions of the world influenced her ideas of right and wrong, and how fortunate she was in having been placed in a moral and religious community, since her perceptions only enabled her to view truth through the medium of other people's minds. Mrs. Law—, decided that her house was the most proper home for her long absent sister. "Annie is an old maid," she argued, "and it is too late now for me to expect that she may attract by youthfulness instead of beauty; so, as there will be no hope of marrying her off, I will endeavor to make her useful. At any rate, the respectability of the family requires that she should be taken care of by some of us." In consequence of this reasoning, a letter, worded in the most kind and proper manner, was despatched to Annie, and she, glanly welcoming anything like sympathy in the forlornness of her feelings, immediately accepted her sister's invitation.

Chapter II.

"I declare, Aunt Annie is one of the prettiest women I ever saw; and how young she looks! why I expected, from your description, to see a little, ugly, prim old maid," said Isabel Lawton to her mother, the morning after Annie's arrival in town.

"She certainly does look remarkably well," was Mrs. Lawton's reply, "but it is nearly sixteen years since I last saw her, for she has not been among us since the marriage of your Aunt Lizzie; I remember her then as a little fright, with white hair, a pug nose, and blue eyes staring between pink eyelids."

"I should be quite willing to be a little fright in the nursery if I could possess such a fresh sweet face at seven and twenty."

"You have certainly no reason to complain of your personal appearance," said Mrs. Lawton, bridling.

"Oh, no, mamma," was the laughing response, "I am too much like my handsome mother not to have some claim to good looks; but I would rather possess that softness of outline—that youthful expression, and that freshness of complexion, which characterize Aunt Annie's face, than all the symmetry of feature that ever charmed a sculptor."

"Yet your face is much the most brilliant, Isabel, and infinitely more expressive."

"Ay, but brilliancy fades, and expression wears out the traces of youthfulness. These expressive faces become dreadfully wrinkled from their very mobility; but such a calm, sweet, gentle countenance as Aunt Annie's goes with one to the grave," and Isabel glanced, as she spoke, at the sharpened features of her mother, who had once been as lovely as herself.

"Annie does not show her age as much as I should have expected," said Mrs. Lawton; "indeed, she would look even younger than she does, if she did not wear such close dresses and prim little caps."

At this moment the entrance of Aunt Annie, looking young and pretty in spite of her old-fashioned dress and cottage cap, cut short all further criticism; and Isabel could not help but look with the eye of an artist on the contrast between the placid countenance of the one sister, and the earnest, troubled, care-worn look, habitual to the other.

Isabel Lawton was a girl of decided genius.—Beautiful and brilliant beyond compare, with a figure of exceeding grace, and manners at the same time dignified and gentle, she was certainly possessed of every requisite to command admiration. But she was formed for something better than mere success in society. Gifted with that fervid temperament, which is ever the attendant on genius, full of enthusiasm and imagination, she lacked only the creative power which would enrol her among earth's gifted ones.—She stood on the threshold of the temple, but she had no power to enter in. But the necessity of utterance led her to find voice in music, and the fulness of her overwrought soul sought expression in sweet sounds. She became a superb musician, and though even in this the creative faculty was still wanting, yet she could sympathise in the deep feelings and passions which had inspired the great masters in this school of art. She felt that Mozart would have been a Shakspeare, and Beethoven a Milton, if words instead of sounds had been given as the utterance of their souls, and she was content to find in them the voice she sought.

Isabel's kindness of heart led her to take a strong interest in Aunt Annie, from the time she first became an inmate of the family; but when she came to know her better, she admired the quiet self-possession, the disinterested kindness, the active considerateness of her rustic relative. Annie never seemed to think of herself; the wishes, even the very whims of every one, were of more consequence to her than her own inclinations. Indeed, she gave too little importance to the individual "I," for Annie had never looked into her own nature,—never studied its capacities and its tendencies, simply because she had never considered the subject worthy of examination: and thus she had gone so far through life, fulfilling every duty that came in her way, but never suspecting that she was capable of any higher mission. How often, when Isabel's restless mind had led her into the labyrinth of thought, and her impulsive heart had bewildered her in the mazes of sentiment, how often did she envy good quiet Aunt Annie, who indulged in no speculations, and apparently suffered from no undefined emotions.

Among the many admirers whom the beauty and brilliancy of Isabel attracted, were some of distinguished talent and reputation. The absence of all coquetry in the lofty character of Isabel, and the noble frankness of her manners, soon converted admirers and friends, without subjecting them to disappointment as lovers, and few ladies could boast of a more select circle of habitual visitors. But there were two men among them, who, as being especially interesting in the development of this veritable history, demand a more individual description.

Frederick H—— was one of those noble, unselfish beings, who are looked upon by the multitude with wonder, and the few with veneration. After having acquired the most complete education that the institutions of learning could bestow, he had devoted all the energies of his gifted mind to the service of Heaven, and abandoning all the advantages which his talents and fortune ensured him, he had gone out among the savages of the South Seas, as an humble Missionary. There all his early years had been passed, and to that dreary home he had borne the fair and delicate young creature who was the bride of his youth. She lived only long enough to make him feel the bitter sting of remorse for the selfish love which had subjected its object to hardship and death, and the repentant, bereaved husband, continued to wear away his life in the pursuit of duty, until his failing health warned him to leave the field to some efficient laborers. His native air, and the judicious use of those indulgences which his wealth could command, had quite restored him; but he had now learned to believe that men often overpass the narrow bounds of real usefulness in their attempt to climb the misty mountain whence they hope to behold a wider field of service. He had now determined to stay at home; and his kindliness of heart, his fervor of feeling, his deep sense of truth, and his noble integrity of character, commanded the respect and love of all who knew him. He was now fast verging toward middle age, but his finely developed figure and noble face, made one feel that if youth is the fairest, manhood is the grandest period of life. There was a quietude in his manners, too, a deep-settled calm, which, when it does not proceed from unsympathizing selfishness, is most powerful in its influence upon others. The essential element of sublimity is repose; and few are insensible to the effect of that calm earnestness which is the result of concentration of mind or heart.

The other, to whom allusion has been made, was the very antipodes of his clerical friend. Harry Trevor was one of those agreeable men, whose lighter graces impair the value of their nobler gifts, since they early become such favorites with society, that they are not suffered to withdraw from daily homage long enough to secure lasting fame. Possessed of splendid talents, he had used them only as the ornaments of life; and by his fine general qualities had disarmed the envy of those who can rarely forgive success in society. He had a peculiar tact for discovering good in every one,—a temper which, like the bee-bird of the wilderness, can always detect the honey when hidden beneath the rough bark of a sapless tree. A fine scholar, an admirable conversationist, and gifted with the richest elements of poetry, he had but to put forth his hand to secure the laurel. But he despised all fame which was beneath the very highest; and as he despaired of this, he refused to pluck a single leaf from the poet's crown. Much of this inertness of spirit might be traced, perhaps, to a early disappointment of the affections. He had been betrayed and deceived in the object of his boyish love; and though he recovered from the shock, yet he was as a man who is reened from a fatal malady by the use of remedial poisons: the disease may be subdued, but the paralyzing effect of the envenomed medicine ends but with life.

He had gone out into the world, the gay and graceful gallant, and the sentiments which fell persuasively from his lips, seemed to disclose his whole nature. But never again did he unlock the treasury of his heart's affections. Many a woman, misled by his tone of earnestness, and his voice of tenderness, learned to love him. Many a fair girl mistook his speculative fancies for vague revealings of his secret feelings. They knew not that his thrilling tones were but the echoes of that voice which was ever calling through the desolate chambers of his heart.—He had no confidence in woman, no reliance on the permanence of her emotions. The "pearl of price," the faith which was his birth-right, had been dissolved in the cup which passion mingled.

Chapter III.

"Will you answer one question frankly, Harry?" said his friend.

"A dozen, if you like—what is it?"

"Are you in love with Isabel Lawton?"

"Most assuredly not," was Trevor's reply; "I should as soon think of falling in love with a volume of Madame de Stael, or yonder statue of Pysche."

"Yet you are ever beside her, like her shadow."

"That is precisely the reason, my dear fellow, why I shall never be in love with her. A man does not choose to be always cast into the shade by the superiority of his ladye-love. Isabel is one of the most brilliant women I ever knew, and I delight in her conversation."

"Yet you do not anticipate any danger to your heart."

"No; Isabel is quite too intellectual to be loved."

"Do you mean to say she is incapable of feeling or inspiring affection?"

"Far from it; she seems to me as warm-hearted as she is gifted."

"Then I cannot understand your objections to her."

"Why, my dear friend, don't you know that a woman never truly loves a man whom she is compelled to look down upon, or even to regard as an equal.—Madame de Stael says no woman loves without feeling a degree of reverence almost approaching to fear for the object of her affection; and I believe she is right. Women must look up, to love, and I mean no irreverence of the sex, when I say that in seeking an object of affection, man must look down. The grand and noble qualities which make a woman so charming a companion for our intellect, assimilate her too much to our nature. We reverence, we esteem, we value them, but they are creatures to be watched over, and cherished and loved. In all superior women, there is a certain massiveness of character which inspires our respect, but at the same time overpowers our tenderness."

"But this is surely not the case when the womanly qualities are in fair proportion to the mental grandeur."

"Perhaps not to the same extent, but while a woman's tenderness might lead her to seek for affection, would not her clear mental perceptions make her so vividly alive to weakness and error in the object of her choice, that her love would not endure the test of time and circumstance? I can imagine no more horrible condition in married life, than that in which the wife has gradually learned her immeasurable superiority over her husband."

"I do not think she would ever make such a discovery, if her husband had decided strength of character, and strong moral force, combined with tender and cherishing affection for her. She would feel his superiority in those qualities where her feminine nature was most deficient, and a grateful sense of his protection and love would guard her from making any comparison regarding mere mental power."

"Well, I should not like to risk such a thing as domestic happiness. I am conscious of too many weak points, to be willing to take my chance in this way. Why, the very presence of such a noble, high-souled, magnanimous creature as Isabel Lawton, would be a constant reproach to such a petulent, wilful, wayward fellow as myself. No, I shall never marry; I require a combination of qualities so utterly incongruous, that I neither hope to find it, nor do I feel that I deserve to do so."

"I should like to hear your description of this ideal wife."

"In the first place, she must be pretty; a quiet, gentle, unobtrusive beauty, which wins rather than dazzles. Then she must be good-tempered, without a shade of envy or jealousy, self-forgetting, kind, considerate in small affairs of others, but superior to all petty emotions or desires in herself. She must have sufficient knowledge of the world to satisfy my pride, so that in placing my honor and respectability in her power, I need not fear that her indiscretion in any trivial matter would compromise me. She must have the strongest moral sense, the most refined delicacy of perception, the purest freshness of feeling, and her heart must have been kept intact within her bosom. Indeed, I would rather she should possess a mine of undeveloped and unconscious sensibility, where I alone could draw forth treasures."

"And with all this, she must be young, pretty, and intellectual? Oh, thou most unreasonable of men!"

"I don't care about the intellectual,—let her love me, and I am satisfied; I can indulge my mental cravings in society; but in the fireside enjoyment of domestic happiness, only my sentiment needs to be gratified."

"But she must be young and pretty?"

"Pretty, certainly; and, yes, young too. Youthfulness depends on feeling, not on time. I think I have had chance glimpses of my ideal wife, as you call her, but never do I expect to meet her face to face. Yet set your mind at rest on one point, most grave and reverend seignior. I am not in love with Isabel Lawton."

Chapter IV.

"Aunt Annie, I have a favor to ask."

"It is already granted, Isabel, if you ask it."

"Oh, thank you, thank you," exclaimed Isabel, clapping her hands in childish glee. "I want you to take off that ugly cap, and let Annette arrange your hair to-morrow night; and you must wear your new white crape dress, without any mufflings upon your neck."

"Oh, Isabel, you will make me look like an old simpleton."

"Judge for yourself, Aunt Annie," said Isabel, turning her suddenly round towards a mirror, and twitching off her cap, while a mass of radiant hair, of that exquisite tint which is "brown in the shadow and gold in the sun," fell over Annie's brow and bosom. "Come, dear aunt Annie, it is my birth-day, you know, and I have a very particular reason for wishing you to look remarkably pretty. I want to have an entirely new star in my horizon."

"But I have so long worn my head covered"—

"Yes, and you have so closely hidden your white arms, and your beautiful neck, and your pretty feet; fie, for shame, Aunt Annie; I really believe you are a prude; I shan't allow you to do so any longer.—Come, will you promise?"

"I should like to gratify you, Isabel, but really"—

"I won't hear any objections."

"But Isabel, what will people say? what will"—and a deep blush suffused Annie's face—"what will our friends think—what will Mr. Hereford say?"

Isabel's brow grew dark, and the blood rushed to her cheek, as she fixed a keen gaze on her Aunt's countenance. "Are you afraid of losing his good opinion?" she asked.

"No," was the gentle reply, "for his esteem would be of little value, if so trifling a circumstance as a change of dress could affect it; but I was thinking"—

"That his discreet taste would be disturbed by your apparent levity?"

"I don't suppose either he or any one else will notice it," said Annie, with a half sigh.

"Then you will do as I wish?" asked Isabel, a little impatiently.

"Yes, provided you never ask me to repeat the folly."

"Agreed;" and Isabel left the room.

Poor Annie! how little she understood her own feelings. She had enjoyed society the most refined and intellectual, until it had developed faculties before dormant, and she had lived in the daily exercise of social sympathies until she began to experience those individual attractions and repulsions which are only felt by awakened sensibilities. She was so meek and humble, that she would have been startled and ashamed if her own heart had been revealed to her, for she was utterly unconscious of the true nature of the emotion which filled her when listening to the beautiful sentiments that fell from the lips of one whose attentions were so equally divided between aunt and niece, that it would have been difficult to decide where his fancy was most likely to fix.—Mrs. Lawton had already decided that the widowed clergyman would make an admirable match for Annie, while the brilliant and wealthy Trevor she had long since appropriated to Isabel. But Annie was too humble, and Isabel too proud, to be subjected to any system of manœuvering, and she was therefore obliged to let events take their own course, notwithstanding her private wishes.

"How happy you looked this evening," said Annie to Isabel, as they sat together in Annie's apartments, after the gay company had departed, on the night of the ball.

"And you, Aunt Annie, how beautiful you were with those rich curls falling on your white neck; I never saw any thing lovelier than your face when Trevor was sitting beside you in the recess of the window."

"We were talking of you, Isabel; he admires you very much."

"I am glad of it," said Isabel, earnestly, "he is certainly one of the noblest beings I ever imagined. What a happy woman his wife will be;" and the smiling girl looked inquiringly in the face of her companion, as she spoke. A quick blush rose to Annie's cheek, and her face was suddenly averted.

"You are tired and sleepy, Aunt Annie, so I will not tell you the secret of my happy looks to-night; good night, and may your dreams be as pleasant as mine are;" and with these words Isabel gayly kissed Annie's cheek and left the room.

Strange that the events of a single evening should have so disturbed the quiet current of Annie's feelings; but there she sat, with her small hands locked in each other, her hair falling half unbraided upon her bosom, her delicate form crouched down in an attitude of utter abandonment to misery, while tears fell like rain from her soft and beautiful eyes. She had discovered the treachery of her own heart—she had entered the sanctuary of her own soul, and had beheld the image which was there enshrined. She had discovered that she loved Harry Trevor. Shame, bitter humiliation of spirit, was mingled with her sense of suffering, and she almost loathed herself for the presumption, while she pitied herself for the pain. There is no such agonizing feeling in woman's whole range of capacity for suffering, as the first emotion of self-pity. It is quite unlike any mean regard for one's own feelings. It can only come to the unselfish; and to them the first anguished emotion of compassion for their own wretchedness is most bitter.

'Till the grey dawn of morning did Annie sit in stirless agony, breathing silently but fearfully with her own heart. But when the light of day broke upon her dim eye, she aroused herself, and calmly disarraying herself of the festive garb which she still wore, she knelt down and prayed for strength to suffer. She arose calm and quiet, but those skilled in that strange book, the human face, might have seen in her countenance the lofty expression of resignation, rather than the torpor of an unawakened heart.

The following morning Annie was sitting alone in the drawing-room, having pleaded a violent headache, to avoid accompanying Isabel in her usual walk, when the door opened and admitted Trevor. Annie trembled, but her voice was calm, as she offered him the cordial greeting of friendship. For a while they managed to keep up a frivolous discussion on the gayety of the preceding night, but by degrees each became abstracted and silent. At length, turning suddenly to his companion, whose cheek was now very pale, Trevor said—

"I have been often tempted to address you on a subject of interest to both of us, Miss Morrison, and the present occasion offers an opportunity I cannot resist. Isabel Lawton is trifling with a true heart, and inflicting pain on one who would die to serve her; will you not exert the influence of your gentle and truthful nature in behalf of one who certainly deserves some consideration?"

Annie trembled violently, as she replied—

"Certainly, sir, if my humble efforts can be of service to either, I shall be most happy; but I cannot but believe that you wrong Isabel; she is incapable of playing the coquette."

"I believe you—but she may inflict much sorrow by wilfully misinterpreting the expression of genuine feeling. The love which has been offered to her is such as any woman might prize; I speak not of the mental or personal qualities of him who proffers it; I allude only to the truth, the earnestness, the devotion of the heart which worships her."

Annie could not answer; she felt unutterably wretched, and a sentiment of bitter self-reproach mingled with her sorrow.

"Miss Morrison, you are pale, you look ill—the fatigue of last night has been too much for you."

Annie rose, but her strength failed, and she could only stand cold and motionless as marble.

"Annie, dearest, you are ill!"

The words were startling, and the tone of earnest tenderness in which they were uttered, thrilled poor Annie's heart. She turned a timid and anxious glance upon her companion, and met the impassioned gaze fixed upon her, while at the same moment a voice to which suppressed emotion had given new softness, uttered in her ear those words which woman never hears unmoved.

"Slowly and gradually has this tenderness grown up in my heart, Annie; it is not the fancy of an idle hour; I love you as the realization of my life-long dream—as the impersonation of my soul's ideal."

Bewildered with excess of happiness, Annie burst into a flood of tears; and at this instant Isabel entered, leaning on the arm of Hereford, whose usually quiet face was now lighted up with unwonted joy.—It was very evident that the whole affair was settled. Annie's humility had made her totally blind to that which Isabel knew long before, and the meekness which had won her a lover, kept her ignorant of her happiness.

* * * * * *

Ten years have passed since the double wedding of the aunt and niece. The brilliant and sparkling Isabel is the wife of a country clergyman, and in the humble but useful duties which her position enjoins, she finds exercise for far higher qualities than had ever been called forth in gay society. Annie, the gentle, kind, country-bred, self-distrusting Annie, is the still lovely wife of our ambassador to the Court of ———, receiving the attentions of royalty, and filling a station of honor with dignity and grace. So much for early prognostics of character, and friendly prophecies of destiny.

TO A DEPATRED ONE.

BY EMELINE H. BROWN.

Numberless flowers in wood and dell are springing,
And love-voiced melodies are in the air,
Through its pure sky the wild-bird notes are ringing,
Music and mirth upon the green earth flinging,
Winning from every heart each thought of care,
And bright eyes beam with gladness everywhere.

Flashing and bright, the dancing rills are rushing,
Murmuring like dream-tones through the shadowy dell,
Deep in the soul wild memories are gushing,
And a sweet mournful voice of music hushing,
With a sad cadence, and a holy spell,
The joyance of the spirit's bounding swell.

We miss thee ever, thou the dreamy-hearted,
With those red lips forever silent now,
It seems but yesterday since last we parted,
Yet on thine early grave the flowers have started,
A monument 'twere meet for such as thou,
Thou, with the lustrous eye and pale white brow!

O, thou wert fair! the lily in its brightness,
Whilst the fresh dew within its bosom lies,
Alone could match thy brow's transparent whiteness,
And thy low voice would hush the spirit's lightness,
While thoughts that stole their coloring from the skies,
Dwelt in the radiance of those deep, dark eyes.

Thine was a heart, whose every hidden spring
Awoke to passion, ever ever burning,
Pouring its wealth on idols, that could bring
Nought that would reach its wild imagining,
Which all the joy that earth could offer, spurning,
Found never aught to quench its ceaseless yearning.

Thou wert unfit for earth, that dreamy spirit
Was filled with longings, deep, and strange, and wild,
That burning thirst, which higher souls inherit,
For purer bliss than sin-bound mortals merit,
A something high, and pure, and undefiled,
That like a passion-fire thy spirit wiled,
'Till life itself was from that heart beguiled!

And thus with aspirations high and deep,
Swelling thy spirit in its daily dreaming,
We marvel not, thy soul no more could keep
A place where all like thee are doomed to weep
Per withered hopes, which once so brightly beaming,
Soon proved the love of earth a hollow seeming.

When the white moon beam on the floweret sleepeth,
And the still stars glance sadness in the soul,
When the low wind in spirit-whispers creepeth,
And love-fraught spell its dreaming senses steepeth,
Then thoughts of thee, that will not bear control,
Mournfully sweet to my young heart have stole.

I've gazed through yon infinity of azure,
Where countless glory lights beam tremblingly,
Lighting up realms whose regions have no measure,
Until my dreaming soul was drunk with pleasure,
And I have met thine eye's dark radiancy,
Beaming with heaven, and love's intensity!

O, if it be that to the blest is given,
To watch o'er those who shared their earthly love,
From which by death alone their hearts were riven:
Bend down sweet spirit, bend from that bright heaven;
And with that guardian power our hearts to move,
That we may turn our wandering thoughts above!

THE UNLUCKY MISTAKE.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

"I'll say as they say."—Comedy of Errors.

Mrs. Sinclair, though amiable and handsome, remained single till she was near forty, when she received and accepted the offer of marriage from Mr. Sinclair, a bachelor of about her own age. Soon afterwards, she unexpectedly came into possession of a large property, bequeathed by a distant relative.—This good fortune was speedily followed by a severe affliction. Her husband, in every respect an estimable man, was taken suddenly ill and died. Having no near relations of her own, and those distant being already sufficiently affluent, she came to the determination to adopt one of the nieces of her late husband, should either of them please her. She had as yet seen none of his relatives, all of them residing in distant towns. She had, however, heard him express a great regard for his half-brother, whose name was Harden, which made her desirous to obtain some information relative to his family. As she was revolving the subject in her mind, she recollected that Mr. Sinclair had told her that a poor widow by the name of Mansfield, who procured a livelihood by sewing, was a sister to Mr. Harden's first wife, and on her she resolved to call in the hope of obtaining the information she desired. She put on her bonnet and shawl, and a few minutes' walk brought her to the door of Mrs. Mansfield's humble dwelling. The widow answered her knock, and conducted her into a small but neat apartment.

"I am afraid," said Mrs. Mansfield, in answer to Mrs. Sinclair's inquiries, "that I can give you no satisfactory information concerning them. My sister, who was Mr. Harden's first wife, died in a little more than a year after her marriage, leaving an infant daughter a few weeks old, and I have never visited them since. His second wife has likewise a daughter, but as to the merits of either I am wholly in the dark."

At this moment a little girl, belonging to a family that occupied a part of the same house, entered with a letter in her hand.

"I have just been at the post-office for Mrs. Norris," said she, "and the post-master asked me to bring this letter to you. He said the postage was paid."

"This must be from one of the Hardens," said Mrs. Mansfield, "by the post-mark. After neglecting me eighteen years, I don't know why they should notice me now."

"I hope it is from one of the young ladies," said Mrs. Sinclair, "for some people say that you can judge of a woman's character by her letters."

"Yes, it is from Florence, my niece," said Mrs. Mansfield, looking at the signature, and she was then going to lay the letter aside, but Mrs. Sinclair requested her to read it.

Her niece informed her that the perusal of some letters which she wrote to her mother about the time of her marriage, which she had recently found while overlooking some old papers, had awakened in her so strong a desire to see her, that she had, with her father's concurrence, written to her for the purpose of inviting her to spend several weeks with them.

"You must certainly accept the invitation," said Mrs. Sinclair; "it will afford you such an excellent opportunity to judge of the young ladies."

"I am afraid I shall be biassed in favor of Florence," she replied, "especially if she should resemble her mother. I confess, however, that I have some inclination to make the visit, though Florence does not intimate that her mother-in-law joins in the invitation."

Before Mrs. Sinclair took leave, Mrs. Mansfield had decided to write, in answer to her niece's letter, that she might expect her in two weeks, for having some sewing on hand which she was obliged to finish, it would be impossible for her to go sooner.

Two days before the one Mrs. Mansfield had set for her journey, Mrs. Sinclair again called on her.—"I have been thinking," said she, "that I should like to accompany you on your visit to the Hardens, if it will be agreeable to you."

"It certainly will be," replied Mrs. Mansfield; "but should they not be apprized of your intended visit?"

"It would have been proper, but if I go with you, it is now too late; and as they are people of wealth and fashion, it can certainly be no inconvenience to them to receive two visitors instead of one."

It was finally arranged, that as Mrs. Mansfield lived entirely alone, and would have no one to prepare her breakfast, that she should spend the night previous to their departure, with Mrs. Sinclair.—Her trunk was therefore conveyed to the splendid mansion of the rich widow, and placed in the hall, and after carefully extinguishing the fire and locking the door, she followed herself. The next morning they had just risen from the breakfast table, when Mrs. Mansfield, in running up stairs to procure something she had left in her chamber, slipped and sprained her ankle. At first, the injury appeared to be slight, but the ankle soon become so swollen, and grew so painful, that she found she must give up all idea of undertaking the proposed journey. Mrs. Sinclair said that she would likewise remain, but against this Mrs. Mansfield urged so many objections, that she concluded to go, provided she would promise to remain at her house, where she could receive every necessary attention, till she had entirely recovered from the effects of the accident. This point was scarcely settled, when the stage-coach drove up before the house. In the hurry and bustle of the moment, Mrs. Sinclair did not observe that Mrs. Mansfield's trunk, in the room of her own, was transferred from the hall to the back of the coach. It was not until they had arrived at the hotel, where she was going to stop for the night, that she discovered the mistake, and she then concluded not to return it, as Mrs. Mansfield might possibly be able to come herself in the course of a few days. It was about an hour before sunset on the following day, that the driver, stopping his horses in front of a large white house, half embowered amidst shrubbery and trees, opened the coach door, and said, "This is where Mr. Harden lives." As soon as Mrs. Sinclair had alighted, she saw a beautiful girl hastening down the gravel walk to welcome her.

"My dear aunt Mansfield," said she, holding out her hand, "how glad I am that you have not disappointed me!"

"Shall I set your trunk just inside the gate, ma'am?" said the driver, before she had time to inform Florence that her name was Sinclair.

"If you please," she replied in answer to the driver, and again turning to Florence, was about to make an explanation, but at the moment she was going to commence, Florence again addressed her as aunt Mansfield, and expressed her regret that her father had been obliged to leave town a few days previous, on account of business, and would probably be detained several weeks. The information suddenly suggested the plan of suffering the family to take her for Mrs. Mansfield, as from her they had nothing to hope, she imagined they would not be likely to assume virtues which they did not possess. She did not repent the plan she had decided upon, when she entered the parlor; she received a very cool welcome from Mrs. Harden and her daughter, Melissa.

"Have you dined to-day, aunt?" said Florence, finding that her mother did not seem likely to make any inquiry of the kind.

"I have not," she replied. "On account of being overloaded, we arrived so late at the hotel where the passengers usually dine, that it gave us so little time, only a few attempted to eat anything."

"As aunt Mansfield has not dined," said Florence to her mother, in a low voice, "had I not better put a slice of ham upon the table?"

"Certainly, if your aunt wishes it," she replied, in a voice which she took little pains to suppress—"but we are not in the habit of placing ham upon the tea-

"I would not have you depart from your usual custom on my account," said Mrs. Sinclair; "I don't wish a better meal than I can make on bread and butter and tea."

"Melissa and I," said Mrs. Harden, "make a point of keeping a very plain table when Mr. Harden is absent, and what we save in that way we appropriate to charitable purposes. Perhaps, however, you are one of those who do not think it proper to give to the poor lest it should encourage pauperism?"

"A widow," she replied, "who has nothing but what she earns with her own hands, may oftener possess the will than the means of relieving the destitute. I have, however, sometimes in an humble way, been able to impart relief so as to leave smiles on those faces which I found dimmed with tears."

A girl now appeared at the door, and requested Mrs. Harden to step into the adjoining apartment, as she wished to speak with her.

"Well, speak," said her mistress; "I am ready to hear what you have to say."

The girl blushed and hesitated, and then approaching her, addressed her in a low voice.

"I suppose," said she, "as you have got company, I must put the tea urn and the gilt china upon the table."

"And I suppose you must do no such thing," said Mrs. Harden, in a petulant tone of voice, though so low she imagined it could not reach the ears of her unwelcome guest. "Let one piece be broken, and the set is spoilt."

"Well, I don't know what to make of your mother, she is so full of whims," said the girl to Florence, who was assisting her; "she told me, the other day, to put the gilt china on the table whenever any real ladies and gentlemen were here, and if that aunt of yours isn't a real lady, I am no judge."

When they were seated at the table, Mrs. Harden filled a white china cup with a broken handle, resting in a blue and white saucer, with tea, and handed it to Mrs. Sinclair. The other cups and saucers were of a similar description, being evidently the relics of several demolished tea-sets.

Mrs. Sinclair requested Florence, who accompanied her to her bed-chamber, to furnish her with writing materials, and before she retired to rest, she wrote an explanatory note to Mrs. Mansfield, to prevent her from forwarding her baggage, and to request her leave to make use of any articles of clothing contained in her trunk, which she might need.

Mrs. Sinclair had been in her room only a few minutes, when Mrs. Howell, who lived exactly opposite the "Eagle Hotel," was seen approaching the house. Melissa ran and met her at the gate.

"You cannot think how glad mother and I were, when we saw you coming," said she, "for soon after ten, we saw a splendid carriage and a pair of elegant chesnut horses drive by, and as we expect they went to the hotel, we thought that you might possibly know something about them."

"Yes, I have gathered a few particulars," she replied; "which I have come on purpose to tell you."

Mrs. Harden now appeared at the door, and welcomed Mrs. Howell with great cordiality.

"Mrs. Howell does know something about the people who passed by in that superb carriage," said Melissa.

"I knew so," said Mrs. Harden. "What is their name?"

"Evering."

"A family party, I suppose," said Mrs. Harden.

"Yes, and consisting of Mr. Evering and his wife, and their son and daughter."

"Is Mr. Evering rich?" inquired Melissa.

"As a nabob, and the son, whose name is Willard, and Eliza, the daughter, will probably have, at least, a million of dollars each."

"Where do they belong?" said Mrs. Harden.

"Ah, that is the very thing I came to tell you.—They reside in H———, the very town where Melissa's rich aunt, Mrs. Sinclair, lives."

"As likely as not they are well acquainted with her," said Mrs. Harden.

"That is what I think," replied Mrs. Howell, "and this probability will, in my opinion, afford a plausible plea for your making some advances towards cultivating an acquaintance with them."

"But are they going to remain here long enough for such a step?" inquired Mrs. Harden.

"Oh, yes—I am told they intend to remain ten or twelve days."

"I have just hit upon a nice plan," said Melissa.

"What is it?" inquired her mother, and Mrs. Howell, both at once.

"Why, if they should spend the Sabbath in town, they will of course like to attend church, and they will undoubtedly receive it as a very polite mark of attention, should we offer them seats in our pew."

"A better plan could not be thought of," said Mrs. Howell. "It will naturally open the way to a better acquaintance."

"It would be as you say, an excellent plan," said Mrs. Harden, "were it not for one thing."

"What can that be?" inquired Mrs. Howell.

"Why, Florence's evil genius that is always at her elbow, I believe, must put it into her head that it would be exceedingly amiable in her to invite her aunt Mansfield to make us a visit. She accordingly importuned her father till she obtained his leave to send for her."

"Her aunt Mansfield? Why that must be the poor widow I have heard you speak about, who obtains a living by sewing."

"The very same, and would you believe it? she lives in H———, and I should not be surprised if the Everings knew her by sight, or as far as I know to the contrary, they may be among her employers."

"Has she arrived yet?"

"Yes, she came this afternoon in the stage," replied Mrs. Harden. "You will see at once, that it will be impossible to invite the Everings to sit in the same pew with a person of her standing."

"But you forget that we have two pews," said Melissa.

"So we have," replied her mother. "You recollect the pew, Mrs. Howell, where Phebe and Matty and Patrick sit. Mr. Harden purchased it on purpose for our hired help, and Florence and her aunt can sit there for once. Can you see any impropriety in such an arrangement, Mrs. Howell?"

"Not the least in the world."

"Nor I," said Melissa. "It is true the pew is rather near the door, which would, as I should imagine, make it rather agreeable this warm weather, on account of the air. The only difference beside, is, that it is not carpeted and cushioned and lined with crimson velvet, like the one where we sit."

"Which this troublesome aunt Mansfield, not being accustomed to, will probably not even notice," said Mrs. Howell. "But sometimes people who have no luxuries at home, are the most exacting and consequential of any in the world, when they are abroad."

"Luckily this is not the case with her. She appears to be sensible of the inferiority of her station, and is very meek and accommodating."

"That will make her a little more endurable, then," said Mrs. Howell. "But I have been thinking that Florence might possibly object to sitting in the pew with the 'help.'"

"No, I don't think she will. Were her father at home she might, but now, as she has no one to appeal to, I think she will fall in with the arrangement without saying a word."

"Come, let us say no more about 'the aunt Mansfield' now," said Melissa. "I want to inquire if this Miss Eliza Evering is an elegant looking girl."

"Very, as nearly as I could judge by the slight opportunity I had of observing her; and her brother —so I have been told—ranks among the most graceful and fascinating young men in the United States. I think that he would be a fine match for you, Melissa."

"Thank you—but he is probably engaged."

"Report says to the contrary, and really I know of no young lady who would, in my opinion, stand a better chance to make a favourable impression on him, than you. But it is growing late, and I must bid you good night."

"I believe, on reflection," said Mrs. Harden to her daughter, after Mrs. Howell had gone, "that I shall sound Mrs. Mansfield to-morrow, and ascertain if she has any knowledge of the Everings, and if she has not, perhaps she may as well sit in the pew with us, if she chooses to attend church."

According to this determination, she said to Mrs. Mansfield, the next morning, at the breakfast-table—

"I understand that one of the richest men in the State, resides in the town where you belong."

"You allude to Mr. Evering, I suspect."

"Yes."

"Do pray tell us what you know about the family, and whether you ever happened to see any of them?" said Melissa.

"I have seen them," was the reply, "and they have the reputation of being very intelligent and amiable."

"Have they ever employed you to do their sewing?" said Mrs. Harden.

"They never have."

"Phebe told me this morning," said Florence, "that the name of the family that arrived at the hotel, last evening, was———"

She had proceeded thus far, when an expressive frown from her mother silenced her.

"Now I have commenced asking questions," said Mrs. Harden, "I should like to inquire if you know anything about the rich Mrs. Sinclair, who resides in H———, who is my sister-in-law?"

"I am somewhat acquainted with her, though not so thoroughly in every respect, perhaps, as I ought to be."

"I have heard that she is very handsome and very lady-like," said Melissa.

"Is she, aunt?" inquired Florence.

"Some have thought so; the opinion of others may be different."

"We must always expect," said Mrs. Harden, "to find those among the lower classes who can never see anything in persons whom fortune has exalted above them, either to love or to admire."

"You never saw anything so elegant as a collar aunt is working for Mrs. Sinclair," said Florence.

"Then she employs you, if the Everings do not," said Mrs. Harden.

"Yes, I have done a great deal, first and last, for her."

"Does she move in the same circle as the Everings," said Melissa.

"I believe she does—or rather I am certain she does."

"How sorry I am that we did not send for aunt Sinclair, as we talked of," said Melissa.

"We must expect our plans to yield to those of your father and Florence," said her mother.

"I am sure father said that you might send for her if you thought best," said Florence.

"But it so happened that I did not think best. I thank my stars I have a little sense of propriety, and am not like him so immersed in business, as not to consider that a seamstress or washerwoman would feel ill at ease in the company of the wealthy and the refined."

Tears started to the eyes of Florence, and the color in her cheeks deepened to crimson. Even Mrs. Harden thought she might have gone too far, and stole a glance at her guest that she might observe the effect of her speech, who, far from appearing to resent it, was, at the moment, sipping her coffee with an air of perfect composure.

"I have no cause for alarm," thought she—"arrows cannot penetrate marble." And from that moment she ceased to have any misgivings respecting the arrangement they had made for the Sabbath.

It was Saturday evening, and Mrs. Sinclair had been in her chamber about fifteen minutes, when Florence, having rapped for admission, entered with a flushed and excited countenance.

"Aunt Mansfield," said she, "I wish I had never sent for you, and had I known father was going to be absent, I never should. Your feelings must have been daily, almost hourly wounded, and now my mother and sister have a plan in agitation which is worse than anything they have said or done."

"For certain reasons, my feelings may have been less injured than you imagine; so, my dear Florence, give yourself no uneasiness. But what is the plan you allude to?"

Florence, in reply, informed her that Mr. Evering and his wife, and their son and daughter, were at the hotel, and that her mother had just told her that she had sent an invitation to them to take seats in their pew, should they wish to attend church, which they had accepted; and that in consequence of which, her aunt and she would be obliged to remain at home, or sit with the "help."

"Don't let that disturb you," said Mrs. Sinclair, with a smile—"I mean on my account. I can receive just as much benefit from the religious services in a plain, humble pew, as in one ever so splendid."

"But I consider it an insult to you, and I would not bear it."

"I am so fond of reading the characters of people, that I have received more pleasure than pain from those little occurrences which have occasioned you so much annoyance. Upon the whole," said she, as she selected from Mrs. Mansfield's wardrobe her best dress, which was a black silk, a little rusty—"as my garments are rather homely, I should, as the saying is, appear like a speckled bird beside your mother and sister, and the Everings; I think, therefore, that the plan of assigning me a seat with the servants, is rather a judicious one."

Mrs. Sinclair, as has already been observed, was a handsome woman—and the next morning, when all were ready for church, it is probable that a stranger would have discerned glimpses of the lady through her humble apparel, as readily as through the sumptuous garments of Mrs. Harden. As for Melissa, she had decorated her person as elaborately as if she had been going to appear in a ball-room. Florence, partly from the influence of a just taste, which made ornaments appear to her out of place in a temple dedicated to the Most High, and partly on account of the humble garb of her companion, appeared in a plainer dress. She and her aunt had been quietly seated in the pew assigned them, about fifteen minutes, when her mother and Melissa, accompanied by the Everings, swept up the broad aisle. She had predetermined not to like them, not excepting even Willard, though his good qualities, in a particular manner, had been the almost constant theme of Melissa's conversation whenever they had been alone; being influenced, no doubt, by the humiliation and grief which they had innocently caused her to suffer. The benevolent and dignified countenance of Mr. Evering, however, and the still finer one of the son, at once gave wing to those prejudices which she had been nursing with all diligence. She did not obtain a sight of Mrs. Evering's face, but the daughter's she thought one of the sweetest she had ever seen. When the services were over, Mrs. Evering, just as she was leaving church, happened to notice Mrs. Sinclair. She pointed her out to her husband, and hastening forward, they greeted her with a warmth equal to the surprise they felt at meeting her.

"Only see," said Mrs. Harden to Melissa, with a scornful toss of the head, "how sociable Mr. Evering and his wife are with Florence's aunt. If they had seen her in their own town, they would not have thought of speaking to her, unless they had wished have happened to meet with her a hundred miles from home, a person would think she was the governor's lady by their appearance."

"I must certainly introduce you to Mrs. Harden and her daughter," said Mrs. Evering to Mrs. Sinclair. "They were very polite in inviting us to take seats in their pew. We did not expect to receive so much attention from strangers."

"Excuse me now, if you please," said Mrs. Sinclair, who did not feel quite ready for the denouement which the proposed introduction would occasion. "I will give you my reasons some other time, and instead, take the present opportunity to introduce to you my young friend, Miss Florence Harden."

Florence went through the introduction like one in a dream, for she was completely bewildered by hearing her aunt, as she supposed her to be, addressed as Mrs. Sinclair.

When, on their return home, Mrs. Sinclair made no allusion to the manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Evering had addressed her, she began to imagine that they might inadvertently miscalled her name, and soon dismissed the subject from her thoughts.

Monday morning found Mrs. Harden and Melissa closeted together, endeavoring to decide whether it would be best to invite the Everings to tea, together with two or three families of the first class, or to muster all their forces, and make a tremendous effort for an entertainment on a grand scale, and invite all the elite of the town and its environs. Finally, so vascillating were their minds respecting it, that they summoned Phebe, a very staid and worthy person, that they might receive the benefit of her opinion.

"What is done in a hurry, is seldom done well," said she, in winding up her remarks, and this sage maxim, introduced in so timely a manner, turned the scale in favor of a small, select party. But what was to be done with "Aunt Mansfield," was a question more difficult to settle than the one relative to the seats in the church. She might, it was true, if she only thought so, remain quietly in her own chamber, or stay in the kitchen with Phebe, and Matty and Patrick, and render them some assistance, as there would be plenty to do; but they did not like to propose to her either of those methods of spending the evening. As to the cordial manner in which Mr. and Mrs. Evering greeted her, it was, Mrs. Harden said, nothing at all, and she doubted not but that they would be highly offended, should they find her enjoying all the privileges of a guest at a party made expressly in honor of themselves. Accordingly, at the dinner-table, by way of experiment, the subject of the party was introduced, and the impropriety of persons in the humbler walks of life seeking to thrust themselves into the society of those above them, was dwelt upon at large. The understanding of their guest, however, appeared to be uncommonly obtuse, and their minds remained unrelieved by any intimation on her part, that she should prefer to remain in her own room, or make herself useful by assisting Phebe and Matty.

The evening appointed for the party arrived. At an early hour, before any of the guests began to assemble, Mrs. Sinclair entered the drawing-room, and took a seat in the most obscure corner. Her black silk dress looked very well by candle-light, and her dark, glossy hair, smoothly parted on her forehead, corresponded admirably with her style of beauty.—Mrs. Harden bit her lips, and exchanged a meaning glance with Melissa; but they felt constrained to bear the intrusion, as they considered it, in silence.

"I hope, for your sake," said Eliza Evering to her brother, as they were on their way to Mrs. Harden's, "that the 'maid of the raven lock,' we met yesterday, will be at the party."

"I hope she will," he replied; "I thought her the most beautiful girl I ever saw."

"Mother thinks, by the description I gave of her, that she must be the young lady she saw with Mrs. Sinclair, whom she introduced as Miss Florence Harden. If so, she is doubtless a connection of Mrs. Harden's, and we shall probably see her this evening."

Florence, who had been required by her mother to superintend a variety of arrangements, had not time to complete her toilette till most of the company had assembled. Mrs. Sinclair continued to retain her station in the obscure corner, which Melissa had very adroitly contrive to screen, by placing before it a luxurious chair for an exceedingly corpulent gentleman, who, moreover, being afflicted with the gout, would not be likely to speedily change his position. The screen, both the inanimate and animate part, was adjusted just in time, the Everings being immediately announced. The bustle occasioned by their arrival, had pretty well subsided, when Florence, simply, yet elegantly attired, entered the apartment. The expedition she had been obliged to use in arranging her dress, had given a fine glow to her cheeks, and made her dark eyes appear more lustrous. "How beautiful!" was the involuntary exclamation of Edward Evering. Having exchanged salutations with those near her, she contrived to accomplish the somewhat difficult passage between the chair of the corpulent gentleman and the wainscot, and took a seat beside the neglected guest. The eyes of Willard Evering and his sister followed her, and they then perceived Mrs. Sinclair. Mrs. Harden, who perceived that Melissa's care had been in vain, approached Eliza Evering for the purpose of apologizing.

"I can assure you," said she, "that I never had any thing to occasion me more mortification and chagrin, than being obliged to permit a person of her standing to mingle upon terms of equality with persons whose presence I esteem an honor."

"Do you allude to that beautiful girl?" said Miss Evering, looking at Florence.

"I allude to the Widow Mansfield," she replied, "who lives in H——, and whom Mrs. Sinclair, whose late husband was Mr. Harden's half brother, employs as her sempstress."

"I know Mrs. Mansfield perfectly well, and should feel gratified to meet her on the present occasion.—You must pardon me, however, at being unable to discover her among your guests."

"But you can certainly see the woman who sits behind Mr. Quimby, that large gentleman."

"Yes, I can partly see her."

"Well, then, you see the Widow Mansfield, do you not?"

"No, indeed, it is Mrs. Sinclair, the same lady my father and mother met with, last Sabbath, soon after leaving church. Had you been so familiarly acquainted with her as I am, you could not have mistaken her for Mrs. Mansfield."

"What you say is impossible!" said Mrs. Harden, turning pale.

"By no means; and to convince you that I am not laboring under a hallucination, we will appeal to my mother, who, very opportunely, is coming this way. Is not that Mrs. Sinclair, mother, whose face is just perceptible above the shoulder of yonder fat gentleman?"

"Certainly, do you doubt the evidence of your own eyes? I am on my way to speak to her, to persuade her and that charming Miss Harden—who is, I presume, a connexion of yours, Miss Harden—to emerge from that obscure corner, where it appears as if they had gone on purpose to hide themselves."

Mrs. Harden waited to hear no more, but going up to Melissa, and taking her by the arm, they left the apartment together. In a few minutes a note was handed to Mrs. Sinclair, from Mrs. Harden, requesting an interview.

"Excuse me for a short time," said she to Mrs. Evering, "and if you please, introduce my young friend to your son and daughter, who are coming this way, I dare say, to request the favor of me."

It would require too much space to relate all the conversation that passed between her and Mrs. Harden and Melissa. She, however, voluntarily promised not to expose the manner in which they had treated her to the Everings.

"I have accomplished my object," said she, "and I have no feelings of revenge to gratify. You have all of you appeared in your true characters, and I am so well pleased with that of Florence, that, with the concurrence of her father, I shall adopt her as my daughter. You, perhaps, may have learnt a lesson, which will profit you more than wealth. On your account, more than on my own, we will now, if you please, rejoin the company."

As may be imagined, the desire of Mrs. Sinclair to adopt Florence as her daughter, was readily conceded by her father. Florence accompanied her when she returned to H——, when they found Mrs. Mansfield entirely recovered from the effects of her accident. It was Mrs. Sinclair's first care to settle upon her an income which would make her easy for life.

Willard Evering did not fail to cultivate the acquaintance with Florence already commenced, and finding her as rich in moral and mental endowments, as in personal beauty, soon yielded to her his heart, which was speedily followed by the offer of his hand.

The splendid bridal celebrated a few months afterwards, at the mansion of Mrs. Sinclair, showed that the offer was not rejected.

THINK OF ME, DEAREST.

Think of me, dearest, when day is breaking
Away from the sable chains of night,
When the sun, his ocean-coach forsaking,
Like a giant first in his strength awaking,
Is flinging abroad his limbs of light;
As the breeze that first travels with morning forth,
Giving life to her steps o'er the quickening earth—
As the dream that has cheated my soul through the night,
Let me in thy thoughts come fresh with the light.

Think of me, dearest, when the day is sinking
In the soft embrace of twilight gray,
When the starry eyes of heaven are winking,
And the weary flowers their tears are drinking,
As they start like gems on the moon-touch'd spray.
Let me come warm in thy thoughts at eve,
As the glowing track which thy sunbeams leave,
When they, blushing, tremble along the deep,
While streaming away to their place of sleep.

Think of me, dearest, when round me smiling
Are eyes that melt while they gaze on thee:
When words are winning, and looks are willing,
And those words and looks, of others, beguiling
Thy fluttering heart from love and me.
Let me come true in thy thoughts at that hour;
Let my trust and my faith—my devotion—have power,
When all that can lure to thy young soul is nearest,
To summon each truant thought back to me, dearest.

THE LAST GOOD-BYE.

BY ELIZA COOK.

Farewell! farewell! is often heard
From the lips of those who part;
'Tis a whisper'd tone, 'tis a gentle word,
But it springs not from the heart.
It may serve for the lover's closing lay,
To be sung 'neath a summer sky;
But give to me the lips that say
The honest words, "Good-bye!"

Adieu! adieu! may greet the ear
In the guise of courtly speech;
But when we leave the kind and dear,
'Tis not what the soul would teach.
Where'er we grasp the hands of those
We would have forever nigh,
The flame of friendship bursts and glows
In the warm, frank words, "Good-bye!"

The mother sending forth her child
To meet with cares and strife,
Breathes through her tears her doubts and fears
For the loved one's future life.
No cold "adieu," no "farewell" lives
Within her choking sigh;
But the deepest sob of anguish gives
"God bless thee, boy! good-bye!"

Go, watch the pale and dying one,
When the glance has lost its beam—
When the brow is cold as the marble stone,
And the world a passing dream.
And the latest pressure of the hand,
The look of the closing eye,
Yield what the heart must understand,
A long, a last "Good-bye!"

HOME, FAREWELL!

Sweet home, farewell! I leave thee now—
I leave my childhood's hearth,
Where sisters wept when sorrow came,
And laughed in guileless mirth.
Home, farewell—there are ties that bind,
And break the heart to sever,
And memories gushing from the heart,
That linger there forever!

Home, farewell! I am weeping now,
My mother calls my name,
And none like her can say that word,
Can call me so again.
What voice can speak more tenderly,
Or come more near my heart?
We two have been so long like one,
And now we two must part!

Farewell! farewell! each path we've lov'd,
In sunshine and in shade;
The climbing vine, where clusters bend,
And the deep woods' silent glade.
Farewell, sweet flowers, whose birth I've watch'd,
Thou'lt brightly bloom each day,
While I am weeping lone and sad,
From home and ye away.

Father! brothers! fare ye well—
I leave my childhood's hearth,
And may those dear walks echo still
With merry sounds of mirth.
But sisters! when your laughter rings
Upon the balmy air,
Remember, in your happiness,
That one is missing there.

One who has love for all of ye,
And leaves her home to-day;
Oh! farewell! mother, sisters, all,
I tear myself away.
Thoughts of things past—forever gone—
Shadows dark and deep,
Those that have so loved me—I leave—
Then dear ones! let me weep!

SAD MOMENTS.

There are moments in life, when bending with sadness,
There seems in our pathway no gleaming of gladness;
Not a ray to enliven, a bright hope to cheer;
The past appears dark, and the future more drear.

When the links of past friendship are covered with rust,
And our kindred affections lie low in the dust;
When fancy's dominion, so specious of yore,
Has vanished and faded, deceiving no more;

When we've drain'd to the lees the bright chalice of pleasure,
And trod at her glancing each wild floating measure,
Have plucked her gay roses in life's early morn,
And found bitter pearl-drops distill'd from each thorn;

Then, heart-sore and weary, we sit down and sigh,
Little caring how swiftly our life passes by;
With its sunshine, its glitter, its prism-dy'd bubbles,
Its nights fraught with care, and its days full of troubles.

In moments like these, there's a lesson we gain,
Though studied in sorrow, and garner'd in pain;
That in trusting alone to the pleasures of life,
We oft find but bitterness, sorrow and strife.

SONG.

As the breath from off the mirror,
As the foam from off the sea,
So faded from thy fickle heart,
The memory of me;
Like leaves before the Autumn gale,
My hopes went down the blast,
And left me in my misery
A blighted one at last.

But when the old time creepest
Like a mist along thy mind,
And the whispers of old memories,
Are rippling on the wind;
Thy cheeks will pale, thine eyes grow dim,
Thy pleasure fade away
Before the ghosts of buried hopes,
Thy falsehood made decay.

ANNA M. HIRST.

MY MOTHER'S GRAVE.

Sweet is the place where thou art laid,
Beneath the weeping willow's shade;
Whose graceful foliage hid among.
The robin sweetly chaunts his song.
Around thy ivy cover'd tomb,
Roses in rich profusion bloom:
While modest lilys, fair as snow,
In silent grief their branches bow.

At early morn's inviting hour,
When on each blade of grass and flow'r,
The crystal dew-drops brightly shine,
Like diamonds from Golconda's mine;
And sweetly murm'ring through the trees,
Comes laden with perfume the breeze;
I go, my heart by grief oppressed,
To where thou'rt sweetly couch'd to rest.

And when the sun's last glimering ray,
Has faded from the scene away,
When flowers their petals gently close,
And birds are nestling to repose.
Again, I wander to the place,
Where earth holds thee in cold embrace;
To sigh, and shed the silent tear,
For thee, for thee, my mother dear.

Yet, though I deeply, deeply mourn,
That thou from me so soon wast torn;
I would not call thee back again,
Into this world of sin and pain;
For now thy sufferings all are o'er,
And sorrow ne'er shall pain thee more;
A heavenly bliss, pure, without alloy,
Thou dost, and ever wilt enjoy.

Parents are o'erseen
When with too strict a rein they do hold in
Their child's affections; and control that love
Which the Powers Divine instruct them with.
When, in their shallow judgments they may know,
Affection cross'd brings misery and wo.

PARENTAL ERRORS.

A Story of the Village Inn.

BY H. N. MOORE.

"What is this secret sin, this untold tale,
That art cannot extract, nor penance cleanse?"

[WALPOLE.

The village of Buckshuting is an old and unimproved cluster of buildings situated upon the steep bank of a dark-watered creek, in Cumberland county, New Jersey. At the entrance of this village is a mill-pond, crossed by a bridge. This mill-pond is both wide and deep—it is formed by a dam across the creek, erected longer than a century since, to supply a race by which the wheel of a grist-mill is turned. The mill stands upon the edge of the creek; it is a stone building, surmounted by a rude sort of steeple, and, viewed from a distance, has a picturesque effect. The bridge is a simple structure of beams and planks, with a rail of coarse lattice-work on each side. The arc of this bridge spans the creek immediately over the dam. The stream plunges over the dam with a cataract-like roar, dashing upon the rocks below, and pursues its way, winding through pine forests and wilderness-like scenery, until it empties into waters to which it is tributary.

Upon a gloomy night in December, a solitary horseman approached the village. Snow was falling thick and fast, and beating directly in his face. He urged his horse with the spur, anxious to reach the village and the comforts of a fireside. The horse, jaded with a long journey, was ready to drop from fatigue, at the foot of the bridge. As his hoofs resounded hollowly upon the planks, his rider checked the rein and paused. Recollections of an awful interest thronged upon the memory of that man! Years—years had passed since he had trodden upon the spot where he now stood! His thoughts reverted to that time, and deeply—deeply was he agitated!

As if to escape from his thoughts, he spurred forward. The various lights, streaming from houses in the village, rendered objects slightly visible, and on the brow of the hill before him, he recognized a swinging sign of General Washington—such at least was the painting that he had seen there forty years previous. As he reached the other end of the bridge, he again paused. Other retrospections for a moment filled his mind. Days long past, arose before his memory. That scene, now shrouded in darkness, and locked in winter, took the aspect as in summer-time it wore, when, an idle boy, he loitered upon the banks of that pond, gazing listlessly into the depths of its clear, though dark waters: when he dreamed away time in the luxury of youth and summer indolence. Memory recalled the scenes as then arrayed in foliage, shadow, sunshine, and floral luxuriance. In imagination, wild flowers of innumerable dyes, fringed the edge of the pond; he saw the deep shadow of forest trees upon the water, the blue sky above—in brief, he was for the moment, surrounded with the scene: the home of his boyhood!

Arousing from these reflections, he pursued his way into the village, and rode up to the door of the only inn in the place. The hinges of the old sing creaked as the wind swung it to and fro, and the traveller conjectured as to the probability of Washington, or rather the painting of him, being still there. He distinctly remembered when the sign was put up. It was in the year that Washington was elevated to the Presidency. All the village turned out upon the occasion, and made a holiday of it. Jonas Rocap, the landlord, had served in the armies, under the General, throughout the war, and there was not a more popular man in Cumberland county. These matters were fresh upon the traveller's memory, and through a vista of forty years he distinctly beheld the actors who then occupied the scene. But where were those actors now? Over how many had the grave closed? Was the good-natured, corpulent Jonas still living? There was every probability to the contrary, for, as far back as that period, Jonas was past the meridian of life.

Silently dismounting from his wearied horse, the traveller approached a window, through the panes of which flickered the light of a hearth-fire. In the bar-room he saw but one person, whom he supposed to be the landlord, and in whose features he thought he traced a resemblance to the merry-hearted Jonas of yore. The person in question was nodding near the fire, in a capacious arm-chair, the dimensions of which but just accommodated the dimensions of his "fair, round corporation." A candle, almost consumed, was dimly burning on a table at his elbow.

Lifting the latch, our traveller entered, stamped the snow from his boots and shook it from his clothes. The noise awakened the landlord from his nap. He was instantly on his feet, and ready to receive orders.

"A stormy night, sir," he remarked, assuming his most affable tones.

"Yes," was the assent of the traveller, throwing off his overcoat, white with snow. "I feel chilled from the effects of it. Have my horse taken care of, will you?"

"Yes, sir. Where are you, Josh?" called the landlord, sending his voice into an adjoining room.

At the call, a sleepy-looking ostler, rubbing his eyes, blundered in. The landlord, full of indignation, emphatically exclaimed—

"Josh Robins, if you don't stir yourself quicker, I'll discharge you! You are always asleep! Wake up, you scoundrel, and take this gentleman's horse to the stable—rub down—four quarts of oats—fresh straw in stall!"

Thus imperatively did the landlord command, and sleepy Josh slowly obeyed,

"A lazy dog! he isn't worth his salt!"

The traveller had divested himself of his wet clothes, and taken a seat at the fire. A fresh candle was lighted by the landlord: he stirred up the coals, threw on two heavy gum logs, and bustled about, corpulent as he was, with an alacrity that was greatly in contrast to the snail-like movements of the ostler. The traveller intimated his desire to have supper. This the landlord communicated to a buxom daughter of his, by whom the cloth was quickly spread in the adjoining room, and, in less than half an hour, coffee was served up with good and inviting country fare. The traveller ate but little. He seemed dispirited. The landlord thought him the most uncommunicative guest he ever had entertained. A half-pint of brandy that he ordered, was barely tasted. As he sate by the fire after his light repast, he remarked that he felt unwell. Referring to his watch—

"It is after ten," he observed. "Has the fire been lighted in my room?"

"Your chamber is ready, sir."

"Bring me a light. I'll retire."

"This way, sir, if you please," and the landlord conducted his guest to a chamber. A fire blazed brightly upon the hearth, and the apartment wore a comfortable aspect. The storm was still beating against the casement; sill and sash were completely clogged with snow.

The storm ceased sometime during the night, for when the traveller awoke in the morning, he found the sun shining into his window, with bright, but powerless rays. The fire upon the hearth was out, and so cold was the atmosphere, that it congealed his breath. The rays of the sun effected not the slightest impression upon the snow that adhered to the window. It was one of those transparently clear and intensely cold mornings, with every object far and near covered with snow; such as the reader may readily picture to himself. The traveller, hastily dressing himself, advanced to the window.

How still and white was the scene on which his eye rested! Calm was the air; and the sign, which had creaked so dismally in the storm, hung perfectly motionless. He now recognized it to be the same which had been put up in the days of his boyhood, but the face of Washington was so defaced that not a vestige remained; at most, he could merely perceive the outline of a head; the rains of forty years had entirely washed out the blue and buff of the general's coat and vest. Washington was obliterated, but the name of Jonas Rocap, in obscure letters, underneath, and the date, 1789, in equally imperfect figures, above, might still be traced.

He descended to the bar-room, where the landlord, assuming his most winning manners, (having just bestowed a hearty box upon the ears of his daughter and a sturdy thwack with a stick upon the shoulders of Josh Robins,) presented a chair, glanced at an old-fashioned, upright clock in the corner, and announced that breakfast would be ready "in ten minutes—at eight, exactly." To which he added, "The beef-steak is on the fire—milk toast done—coffee made—and I'll step into the kitchen to frizzle the eggs myself.

His guest took up an old newspaper, drew a chair to the fire, and occupied himself till the ten minutes had elapsed, and the clock chimed eight. The landlord reappeared instanter. "Breakfast is ready, sir." They were presently seated at a table overloaded with edibles, and the landlord was evidently quite vain of the display, but it was lost upon the traveller; he made no comment.

"Nell, pour out the coffee—sugar and cream in yours, sir? Shall I cut you a piece of this steak, sir? or will you have toast first, sir? I can recommend this dish, sir; I frizzled the eggs myself."

The landlord was disposed to be quite voluble, but the indifference of his guest dampened his efforts, and for a moment or two, with a blank expression on his face, he ceased his tongue. Rousing himself, however, "Did you sleep well, sir, last night?" he briskly inquired.

To this the traveller merely expressed an affirmative, without offering further conversation. He ate in silence, replying with as much brevity as possible to one or two other interrogations of the landlord, upon whose lively curiosity this determined taciturnity acted with chilling effect. Never in his life had he been, for the moment, more disappointed. "Queer old fellow, that," he remarked to his daughter, after the guest had left the table and was out of hearing distance. "Grum—sulky—disagreeable, like a cross dog—looks mad enough to bite one. I shouldn't wonder if—hum!—I don't altogether like his looks. You didn't over feed his horse, Josh, did you?"

Josh, with his mouth full of breakfast, grunted a negative.

"You didn't give him any oats, did you?"

Another negative grunted.

Nor put fresh straw in the stall, did you?"

A third grunt of negation.

"That's right, Josh. If hay and hard floor ain't good enough for any traveller's beast, why he must travel farther and get better—eh, Josh?"

"Um," grunted Josh.

"I wonder what his name is?" was the remark of Nell.

Here was a fresh item of curiosity. "That's well thought of, Nell; I should like to know myself.—You're are not so big a fool as some people think.—I boxed your ears this morning, but you're used to that. I wonder what his name is. Josh Robins, what do you think it is?"

"Don't know."

"You're a stupid fool, you know nothing."

"Um!"

"Let me see—let me think. What can it be, Nell? He carried a small trunk up to bed last night—run up stairs, Nell, and see if there's a name on it, or any letters."

"There isn't I know, father, for I slipped up a few minutes ago to see."

"Nothing at all on it?"

"Not a letter—no mark of any kind. It's an old black leather kind of a thing that looks as if he had travelled about with it all his life."

"Was it open, Nell?"

"Strapped down tight and fastened with a brass padlock."

"A strange old fellow! something mysterious! something—um! Josh Robins, will you never be done eating? I wonder you ain't ashamed, so lubberly and so lazy, to eat so much! What, another cup, Nell? How many have you drank since you came to the table? How often have I told you that strong coffee isn't good for your health, and that you mustn't drink more than two cups at a meal? Clear away the table at once. Josh, fetch in some gum logs for the bar-room fire."

Leaving these orders behind him, he bustled into the bar-room, where he found the stranger putting on his over-coat and muffling up his face, preparatory to going out. "Forty years ago," remarked the stranger, "this house was kept by one Jonas Rocap—a soldier of the Revolution; he served through all the war; when peace was established he settled here—is he dead?"

"Long since, sir. Let me see. It is seventeen years ago this winter since his death, if I mistake not. But it's down in our old Bible, sir, where you may satisfy yourself as to the very year, month and day. I'll fetch it."

"No—never mind. He had three sons, I remember; John, William, and Jonas were their names, I think?"

"You're correct, sir. John was oldest, William next, Jonas youngest."

"Are all living?"

"But one, sir. William died a year before the old man; it was the small-pox that carried him off. John fell from the top of a load of hay, this summer was eight years since, and broke his neck. Jonas, who was a boy forty years ago, now stands before you, with hair almost as white as your own, sir."

At this announcement, the eyes of the stranger fe

a moment scanned the features before him. "As I thought," he muttered. "I took you to be a son of old Jonas—you look much as he did forty years ago. Have you kept here from his death till this time?"

"Ever since, sir."

"What is your dinner-hour?"

"Twelve o'clock, sir. You shall have as fine a pair of chickens to-day as ever was eaten."

"That matters not." And, turning upon his heel, the stranger left the house.

The curiosity of Jonas Rocap was again disappointed by this abrupt termination of their converse. He sprang to a window and watched the stranger, who waded knee-deep through the snow, taking a direction towards the bridge. "Matters not!" that's queer! I think it matters much what a man has for dinner. He treats a pair of chickens as if a pair was nothing. He shall pay for them, though. Where can he be going to, up to his thighs in snow? Who can he be? What can he have on hand that urges him to trudge in the cold through the snow?"

Thus was Jonas full of conjecture, and not a little puzzled at the mention of his father and brothers by the stranger, and the knowledge that he possessed of a date so far back as forty years. "Who could he be? Why was he in Buckshuting?"?

With these cravings of curiosity perplexed, he went behind the bar and helped himself to a glass of stimulus. His ostler, a man of all work, Josh Robins, with a big gum log on his shoulder, and propelling another with his foot, entered just as he was gulping down the liquor. Now, of all things in the world that Jonas disliked, nothing more vexed him than that Josh should see him in the act of drinking behind his bar. He always felt like a thief detected in a larceny. Whether it was the singular twinkle of Josh's eye, or smirk of his countenance, upon such occasions, that he dreaded, or what, we cannot take upon us to decide. "Some men there are love not a gaping pig," and "some are mad if they behold a cat," says Shylock, and yet can they give no reason for it, other than some peculiar, undefinable sensation which masters them. So must it have been with Jonas: he could assign to himself no specific motive for this dislike, yet it swayed his feelings beyond his control. Upon such occasions he invariably flew into a passion.

"Josh, what are you about there? Can't you roll that log without all that noise? Make up that fire—quick! You're a snail!—a lazier scoundrel never breathed!"

Having bestowed this upon his ostler, he flung into the kitchen and assailed his daughter.

"Nell, what do you mean? Dishes not yet washed! What's the matter? Dreaming? Wash 'em up, and then make the beds, you idle trollop, you! Don't dare to speak back—don't dare to look sour at me! As sure as you do, I'll box your ears!"

Rustling back to the bar-room—

"Josh, have you made up that fire?"

"Um!"

"Get a shovel—clear the snow away from the porch. Be quick about it! Do you grumble? I'll cowhide you if you say a word! I've determined to turn over a new leaf. I'll have no more idle bread eaten in this house! Ah, good morning, Sharp, how are you?" he said to a neighbour, who at this moment entered.

"A sharp morning, this," said Sharp, stamping the snow from his clumsy boots.

"Stinging!" answered Jonas, as he shuffled behind the enclosure of one of your corner-cupboard kind of constructions, so common to the taverns of towns and villages throughout the United States, called the bar.

"I'll take a little old rye," said Sharp, and Jonas handed out glass and whiskey-bottle.

Sharp poured out, and, according to custom, swallowed half a glass of raw whiskey, drinking water after. By this transaction three cents were transferred from the trousers-pocket of Sharp to the till of the landlord's bar.

"Any lodgers last night, Jonas?"

"One."

"Name?"

"Didn't tell."

"Where from?"

"Didn't say."

"How did he come?"

"Hos-back."

Here, from a deep pocket of his ample trousers, Sharp drew forth a snake-like longitude of chewing tobacco, and amputated with his teeth a large quid therefrom.

"I say, Jonas!"—and he then went on to say that he had seen a stranger down on the bridge.

"On the bridge?"

"Standing up to his knees in the snow, and gazing over the dam, for all the world as if in a dream."

"Looking over the bridge, hey? Did he see you, Sharp?"

"Guess not. I had an errand down at Enoch Smith's store, and as I passed round by the mill I spied the stranger standing on the bridge. I wondered what he could be doing there."

"Did you keep your eye on him?"

"Yes, and he stood fifteen minutes in one spot."

"All the time looking over the dam, hey?"

"Yes, now and then stretching over the rail in this way"—exemplifying it over a chair-back—"as if he wanted to see something under the bridge. He afterwards went round, and walked on the ice across the pond."

"Which way did he go?" eagerly asked Jonas.

"He went up into the woods, and I lost sight of him."

"Um–m–m!" muttered Jonas, with significant twitches of his burly countenance—um! something wrong about that man! I shouldn't wonder—um–m–m!—Ah, good morning, colonel—cold morning, colonel," to a big, raw-boned man, who now entered, he addressed himself. This new comer was known in the village by the name and prefix of Colonel Ichabod Wriggins.

The colonel also called for old rye, a dram of which he swallowed, and three more coppers were added to the landlord's till. Seth Sharp and the landlord, with mysterious looks, and in suppressed accents, related to the colonel, with additions, embellishments and exaggerations, the arrival of the stranger, his odd movements since, and his taciturnity.—Colonel Wriggins said it was "queer!" and canted his head on one side in a position of profound thought; but he conjectured in vain—he could make nothing of it.

"Good morning to you, squire," said the landlord to another who now entered. This was no less a person than Jonathan Stratton, a Justice of the Peace for the township of Downe, Cumberland county. He was a man of many acres; he had served the people many years as a member of the State Legislature, and had also been twice elected to the Congress of the United States. Full of these political honors, he had retired from public life, and was now living in private, enjoying merely the local dignity of a squire. He was a man much looked up to in Buckshuting.

The squire asked for apple-jack, but upon second thought said he would take old rye, having imbibed a portion of which, and gulphed down a glass of water upon it, he took a chair in front of the fire, along with Sharp and Colonel Wriggins. Jonas Rocap deposited his portly body in his arm-chair. Seth and the Colonel looked big with importance, and the mystery of the stranger-guest was promptly detailed to the squire. The squire was puzzled; there was a comical profundity of expression in his face; he turned the matter over and over in his mind; but, like the colonel, he could make nothing of it.

Jonas Rocap made the affair more and more mysterious each time he rehearsed it. Each person who entered the bar-room was made a confident in the mystery; and long before noon all the men, women and children in Buckshuting were important with something—they did not know what; but a mystery of some kind was pending, and anxiously they awaited the development.

At noon the stranger returned to the inn, where half a dozen villagers had by this time assembled, and, with the landlord, were forming various conjectures in regard to him. Glasses upon glasses of old rye, and occasionally of apple-jack, were swallowed; three cents upon three cents were rapidly added to the till; and the landlord himself had by this time admitted such a mixture of old rye and apple-jack into his stomach, as to be scarcely able to keep himself perpendicular. Josh Robins had piled several gum logs upon the hearth, and the fire blazed high. Seth Sharp, Colonel Wriggins and Squire Stratton, warmed with sundry potations from the bar, were in a high strain of talk and contradiction, when the door opened and in walked the stranger. There was sudden silence. The stranger saw that all eyes were bent upon him, but he seemed to disregard the scrutiny. He leisurely took off his over-coat and seated himself at the fire-side, extending his feet near the flame to warm them and dry his boots. His face was quite pale; he wore a sickly, dejected look. The squire, who was the nearest seated to him, with much self-consequence in his manner, spoke.

"I reckon you found it cold out in the woods, sir?"

"Quite so."

"Deep snow, sir?"

"Yes."

The brevity of these answers cooled the assurance of the squire, and his face colored with confusion. The attempt was a failure, and he felt cheap that Seth and the colonel should see him thus "put down." At this moment, much to his relief, the clock in the corner chimed twelve—the dinner hour of the village—and the bar-room was speedily emptied of all except the stranger and Jonas. Jonas drunkenly blustered about, spluttered into the kitchen, (leaving the door between that and the bar-room open,) and rated his daughter in high tones for not having dinner ready at twelve to a minute. Of his movements the stranger took no notice, but remained with eyes fixed upon the fire, absorbed in the silence of thought. He appeared more haggard than he otherwise would by the length of his beard, which evidently had been several days without the application of a razor, and there was a vacant glare from his eyes, like the look of one bereft of hope, not desperate, but resigned.

At dinner he ate, what little he did eat, in silence. The landlord was in a loquacious mood and talked at random—but, finding his efforts to draw the stranger into conversation unavailing, he commenced bickering with his daughter.

The stranger soon left the table, and returned to his seat at the bar-room fire, where, closing his eyes, he sunk into a reverie. The frequenters of the bar-room, who had that morning talked over the mystery, one by one re-assembled and collected about the bar, renewing their thirsty demands upon the bottles of old-rye and apple-jack, and continuing to disburthen their pockets of coppers.

The sun, which had shone out so brightly in the fore part of the day, was now obscured; the atmosphere was much less severe, having moderated from extreme cold to that raw and chilly degree which is precursory of storm and snow. Notwithstanding the slow but sure labour of Josh Robins in rolling in gum logs and heaping them upon the fire—and never did chimney-fire blaze brighter—the aspect of the bar-room was deplorably gloomy. The floor, which had been half a century in use, and all that time had been exposed daily to the friction of sand and sole-leather, was worn into many little valleys; it was now, with sand and the quantity of snow that had melted from the boots of the landlord's customers, miry. His bar-room was a wide, long, spacious apartment—the ceiling low and dark with the smoke of many years. The glass of the windows was thick and greenish, as we find it in old houses. The chimney was a huge place, wide, and reaching almost to the ceiling. Against each jamb was a stationary bench, calculated to accommodate sitters. The light of the fire shone strongly on objects directly opposite it, but failed to reach the remote angles and recesses.

It was already growing dark, and Josh Robins was bringing in candles, as the old clock from its corner struck the hour of five. The frequenters of the place gathered nearer the huge heap of burning logs, Seth Sharp, the colonel, and the squire, formed a group in the chimney corner, sitting close to the stranger, while two others commenced a game of dominoes, and Jonas and one of his guests sat down to draughts. Around the domino players a group of lookers-on collected; the same around the draught players. Josh rolled in more gum logs. Liquor was called for, and old-rye, the favorite drink of all, (with an occasional exception in favor of apple-jack,) was placed before them. Dominoes and draughts were proceeded with, and to each group the game afforded ample interest for awhile. The colonel, squire, and Seth Sharp, chatted upon local politics—but, the subject becoming exhausted, they found themselves partly weary of each other, and were uneasy in their chairs for the want of matter to gossip about. The stranger had not opened his lips or eyes; his left elbow rested upon an arm of his chair, and his hand supported his head; he appeared to be sleeping.

Six was announced by the clock from its dark corner. Conversation upon the part of Seth, the colonel, and Squire Stratton, had entirely subsided.—Each leaned back, drowsily basking in the warmth of the fire, the flame of which cheerfully played up the spacious chimney. The domino players, and the landlord and his antagonist at draughts, continued their respective games. Jonas being occupied, Josh was in demand; the duties of the bar devolved entirely upon him, and he was not idle in answering the calls that were kept up during the evening;—here a cigar was wanted—there a glass to be replenished with old-rye—the fire to be looked to, and various other matters. One by one the lookers-on dropped away from the games, and either sunk into chairs for a snooze, or buttoned their coats and left for their homes.

The stranger remained in his seat. The squire, colonel, and Seth Sharp, were dozing before the chimney, occasionally pushing their chairs a little back as the heat was too strongly felt. Sharp, who was heated inside with old-rye, and outside by the fire, had become drowsiest of all. He had now moved his chair out into the centre of the room nearly, and was leaning back with his head hanging sleepily upon his breast. The colonel, neither asleep nor awake, had his legs extended upon a chair before him; he was blinking at the fire, and kept his jaws in constant exercise upon a huge mouthful of tobacco, which he seemed to craunch with extreme relish.—The squire had propped both elbows on a table, and, resting his chin in his hands, was oscillating his head to and fro in most luxurious ebriety. Sharp, however, was so far gone as to snore.

Such was the scene, such the state of the tipplers in the bar-room, and all was quiet except the heavy breathing of Sharp, the clattering of dominoes, and now and then a remark. This silence was suddenly disturbed—a fall! a crash!—all were roused—the colonel and squire each started up, and the landlord ejaculated an oath. What had happened? Seth Sharp had merely leaned so far back as to lose his equilibrium—had fallen, broken the chair-back, and bruised his head. He was quickly upon his feet again, and joined in the loud laugh that succeeded.

"Josh, snuff the candles. What are you about there? Bring a glass of old-rye!" called out the landlord.

This call for old-rye was repeated by every one present, and the stir and hubbub that now ensued—calls for Josh to bring old-rye, shuffling of feet, moving of chairs, expectorating, et cetera—were in strong contrast to the sluggish, listless, stupid kind of calm that had previously reigned.

Having roused up and shaken themselves, (like dogs from a hearth-rug as it were,) the colonel, squire, and Sharp, resumed their chat. The stranger changed his position no farther than to shift from his left elbow to his right. Jonas and his antagonist returned to the checker-board, and the clattering of dominoes was renewed.

"Come, squire," said the colonel, "give us a story—one of your old-fashioned ones, that make the flesh creep and the hair stand."

Seth joined in the request—and after farther coaxing and prevailing, the squire complied. In fact, he could tell stories better than he could make congressional speeches. Of the latter he had manufactured several long-winded ones, and altered them on the floor of the House; but he was more at home in tale-telling.

"I'll tell you," said he, "one that I heard Jonas—not this Jonas, but his father, old Jonas Rocap, repeat twenty years ago. Ah, he was a merry-hearted fellow! I think I can see him now, as he used to sit in this room, shaking his fat sides with laughter in the very chair that now holds me. Brimful of fun and anecdote was old Jonas—fun was his nature; he enjoyed a good joke above all things in this world; but when called upon for a story, he would sometimes surprise us with a tale quite contrary to what we would expect. Of this kind is the one I am about to repeat. It is a true story. Much of it occurred in this village, and old Jonas was an actor in it."

After some preliminary hems the squire commenced. We give the substance of the story as told by him, but have clothed it in language of our own, omitting the interruptive remarks, interrogations, answers, etc., that, as the reader must be aware, could not fail to be incident to a tale in a bar-room.

"At about the time the Federal government of the United States was established, and Washington was elected to the Presidency of the Union, there lived in this village of Buckshuting, a respectable old man, Benjamin Loper by name. He was the owner of the mill, and among his fellow-villagers reputed rich.—He had married late in life, and his only child, a boy, was worshipped by him with all that excess and folly into which the parental affection of old age is almost sure to run. This boy, (Auley by name,) who was in every thing indulged, grew up an idle young man—idle, but good-natured. His habits were of that indolently dreamy nature, in which the mind unfits the body for pursuits of activity, and it is the joy of the dreamer to pass away time in a kind of desultory loneliness, remote from the customs of domestic life. These sequestered habits were early natural to him. Even at the age of seven he would saunter into lone places—quiet retreats, 'o'er-canopied with luscious woodbine,'—where, utterly regardless of time, he would indulge in his waking dreams. Every nook, by-place, and haunt of the mill-pond and creek, were familiar to Auley. The banks of the stream are, at intervals, diversified with precipitous risings of earth, overgrown with wild-wood; these ascents he would climb, and creep into the unexplored recesses that nature had covered with briar and brush, and from which the light of day was almost totally excluded. Here he would be hidden, absorbed in his fancies, for hours upon hours of the day, nor be conscious of his situation till he heard the far halloo of his old father, or of some one sent in quest of him. The shores of the creek teem with echoes, and a halloo would penetrate the depths of these recesses in musical reverberations that pleased the ear of the imaginative boy. He would remain in his hiding-place listening, and not till the call had receded beyond his hearing would he emerge. Twilight was generally deepening the shadows of the dark creek as he came forth, he having wandered since morning; and he would wind his way home through tangled paths, pushing the branches aside, and disturbing the birds that had already retired to rest amid the over-hanging foliage.

"Much anxiety did these habits of his son occasion old Benjamin. Desirous that the boy should be well educated, he sent him early to an establishment far from home. At each summer vacation Auley returned to his native village, and, resuming his habits, wandered upon the margin of the pond, bathed in its dark but clear waters, following far into the forest the course of the creek, and absenting himself from his father's roof with the same unconsciousness of the fleeting hours as formerly. Old Benjamin had hoped that these habits would be corrected; that absence from his familiar haunts, and the necessary practical duties of scholastic exercises would wean him from them. Not so. The boy endured the restraints of education, was docile to his teachers, and went through the routine of his duties obediently, but with little interest therein. Having completed his course, with eager delight he returned to Buckshuting.—Though eighteen years of age, his predilections had not in the least abated. His mind leaped and danced, it might almost be said, in the thought that he was returning to a long holiday, not to be broken in upon—his roving pleasures not to be disturbed by the dread of a return to the study of books. Books, it seems reasonable to suppose, would have been the choice of one so much given to solitude and meditation, but it was not so; and we have it as an instance of what contrary feelings and tastes a mind may be constituted.

"Pond, creek, forest, were again the daily range of Auley—fishing, bathing, strolling, lying at length upon the sward—alone—dreaming. From morning till night, notwithstanding the persuasions of his old father, he was ever out-doors, ever pursuing his peculiar pastime. Often would the old man mildly remonstrate. 'Stay at home to-day, Auley, do,' he would urge, as in the morning his son would be preparing to start; 'do stay at home; study as other young men do—why be always in the woods?'—Auley would reply with some good-humored excuse, good-natured smiles would suffuse his countenance, and thus he avoided his parent's injunction. But Benjamin's neighbors saw the ruinous course he was pursuing in regard to the welfare of his son; they saw how loose a rein he held upon the lad's inclinations. They represented to him the danger of permitting Auley to follow his will thus unrestrained, by which he was irretrievably wasting time, and habituating himself to a desultory existence that would, in the end, entirely unfit him for the social duties of life.

"Thus urged, old Benjamin bestrode the back of a quiet old horse of his early one morning, and jogged along a sandy road, looking with the eye of a farmer upon corn-fields, orchards and fences as he went, till he arrived at the ferry opposite a quiet town called Port Elizabeth, distant from Buckshuting between two and three miles. At the ferry was a scow, into which he and his horse entrusted themselves, and were conveyed across the river. He jogged into the town, knocked at the door of a quiet-looking no——, which was the residence of a practitioner of medicine, and, after an interview of an hour with the physician, he re-mounted, re-crossed the ferry, and jogged home in time for dinner. At breakfast, upon the following day, he informed his son of this, and that he had arranged it with Doctor F. that he (Auley) should reside in the house of the Doctor and study medicine. Auley objected—the father urged—strongly at the start, but the persuasions of the son softened his determinations, and delays were the consequence; the weak fondness of the old man incapacitated him from enforcing the matter, and so it remained until Auley had reached his majority. Again and again, as convictions of misplaced forbearance were forced upon his mind, would the old man urge his son to commence; but again and again Auley procrastinated. The old man could not find it in his heart to be harsh, and day after day Auley continued to loiter along the banks of the mill-pond, and up the creek, with rod and line over his shoulder and little basket on his arm. He had many choice spots, cool retreats from the fervor of mid-day warmth, to which he resorted. Choosing one of these, he would recline upon the edge of the stream, with outstretched angle, placidly luxuriating in his indolent musings.

"In day-dreams he revelled. And in relation to this habit, angling was to him the same as any pursuit which any one might ostensibly assume whilst engaged in another under cover of it.—Success in angling he little regarded; it was but an excuse for his dreaming propensity; and he turned his steps homeward in the evening more frequently without a fish in his basket than with. His basket was of most use as a means by which he carried with him his daily food. Did the fish bite or not, it was all the same to Auley—he could dream while he waited for them. If they but nibbled about his hooks, carrying off the bait, he was not, as many an angler would be, provoked, but baited and rebaited with imperturbable patience. If weary of holding the rod he would lay it down; but his dreams went on; and stretched at length upon the green earth, with his imagination fully at play, he would resign himself to the wildest speculations of fancy.

"Such was Auley Loper! Ever immersed in thought, it was his delight to seek the solitude of pathless woods and sylvan retreats, to spread his limbs upon the margin of the creek, and dream away time. He lived in his dreams! his dreams constituted his happiness! It appeared to be his pleasure, his aim, to live untrammelled by system; to pass away life remote from the customs of his fellow beings.

"But this life was suddenly broken in upon by a new feeling that was stirred in his breast. He was smitten by the charms of Edith Compton, a maiden of sixteen, who was a native of the village, but had been several years absent. Edith was an only child. Her father had perished while she was yet an infant. He was part owner of a sloop, called the Ann Jane, that carried wood out of Maurice river to the city of Philadelphia; in those days a lucrative trade. It was upon a stormy night, the Ann Jane had left the mouth of the river—the tide was too low to cross the shoals on the coast of Egg Island, and the sloop stretched out into the bay to go round. Though stormy, no apprehensions were entertained by those in the Ann Jane, and, muffled in their pea-jackets and weather-defying gear, Compton, who commanded, had the helm and whistled merrily as the sloop sped at a rapid rate over the billows; two of his "hands" danced and capered about the quarter-deck, whilst the third, who was forward "tending jib," shouted aloud his gay song, with the spray dashing over him and the cold benumbing his fingers. Struck by a flaw, the sail suddenly jibed; the two hands dodged quick enough to escape the danger, but the blow of the boom knocked the unfortunate parent of Edith from the quarter-deck into the waves. His cry for help was heard. Another flaw struck the sail; the sloop was capsized. The three hands clung to the sides of the sloop and lived through the cold and gloom of the night, driven about at the mercy of the waves and wind. On the following day they were discovered, and rescued from their perilous situation. Compton was heard of no more. The sad news was conveyed to his young wife, who soon after, with her child, left Buckshuting to reside with her relatives in the northern part of the State, and at Springfield, in Essex county, she resided two years. She sorrowed much—deep was her anguish. After two years, she returned to her little property in Buckshuting, making annual visits to her relations. Edith, at the age of twelve, was left by her mother at a boarding-school in Springfield.

"At the time here treated of, Edith, having completed her course at school, had returned to live with her mother. Auley Loper, as stated, was struck with her beauty. He dropped his wandering pursuits and roused his energies to effect an impression in his favor upon the heart of the maiden. He succeeded. The youthful affections of Edith were not difficult to win by the wooing of a suitor so ardent and devoted as Auley now proved himself. Her mother looked on with an approving eye, and it was a matter of general belief in the village that Edith and Auley were shortly to be united. But an obstacle presented itself in the opposition of old Benjamin, who forbade the marriage in positive words, and was obstinately deaf to all intercession. The old man had heretofore been indulgent where he should have been imperative; now he was as contrarily the reverse—utterly refusing his son present support if he married, and threatening to disinherit him. In the face of this, how could Auley think of espousing Edith? Were he to wed her, from what should he derive a support? And now how poignantly he felt the sense of his dependence—how he regretted his folly in refusing to study when urged to it by his father.

"A change in the mother took place; she no longer encouraged the visits of Auley. Why was this?—Her little property was mortgaged; old Benjamin was the bond-holder; she was in arrears, he threatened her with his power if she did not assist him in breaking off the match. She was a timid woman, and what could she do? If she braved the old man he would sell her little property, and (to her, who had surrounded herself with a few articles of luxury as well as indoor comforts, and had established for herself in the village a gratifying character of gentility) how inconvenient would it be, how wretchedly uncomfortable it would render her. If her daughter married Auley, what prospect of support had he?—From his father, none! From whom, what, or where else? Considered in any light, in frowning him from her house, was she not adopting the most prudent step?—a step that would prevent her child from incurring innumerable hardships, and save herself the necessity of leaving her present home?

"In fine, she forbade Auley her house. Here was despair for the lovers! The dark eyes of Auley gleamed fire as he walked from the door on the morning that he received from Mrs. Compton his denial. But, at the window he saw the streaming eyes of Edith looking after him. 'She shall yet be mine,' he resolved. Where there is a will there is a way, says the proverb, and, regardless of the interdictory commands of her mother, Edith yielded to the solicitations of her lover, and contrived to meet him. Old Benjamin stormed, supposing at first that it was by some collusory arrangement upon the part of the mother that these interviews were effected; but she convinced him to the contrary, and represented to him the impossibility of preventing them; she pleaded, also, how hard it would be if, in consequence of a matter that was utterly beyond her control, she should be distressed and necessitated to vacate her house. 'Well, let them marry, and if you do not harbour them, Mrs. Compton, I shall not disturb you,' said the old man. To this stipulation she readily acceded.

"Auley sought several occasions in which to make appeals to his father, but the old man remained obdurate. 'I'll see him again to-night.' It was an afternoon of summer beauty, and the lovers stood side by side beneath the shade of that forest where so much of the young man's life had been loitered. They were gazing forth upon the sun-set gilded waters of the pond, and the sad feelings of each breast shone in the sad expression of each countenance. 'I'll see him again to-night'—but the tone in which it was uttered was little calculated to raise a hope that the intended application to the father would be more successful.

than heretofore. Edith was weeping. She had imparted to Auley the misery of mind she was subjected to by the upbraidings of her mother. The sun was down—they left the forest—and, 'I'll see him again to-night,' he reiterated; as he parted from her at her mother's door.

"'Father, you are about to lease the mill—hire it to me. I will be industrious, I promise you; and why cannot I then support a wife?'

"The old man sneered—gave a flat denial—taunted—contemptuously bade him marry Edith Compton. 'Marry her, and live on air!'

"The heart of Auley was ready to burst. 'Father!' he supplicated.

"'You—you with a wife!' sneered the old man. 'Why didn't you learn a profession when I wished you to?' he taunted.

"'But, father!' pleaded the son.

"'Once for all, Auley Loper,' said the old man, sternly, 'my consent to this marriage you shall never have. If you marry her, my doors are closed upon you forever!' And he abruptly retired, leaving his son bewildered with despair.

"It was the next day known in the village that Edith and Auley had wedded; and that they had left Buckshuting, (the door of his father and of her mother being closed against them), and were on the road to Philadelphia. It was subsequently known that they were living very poorly in an obscure part of the city; but in time the village gossip was rife with the astounding news that they had removed to a large house, and some of the villagers calling to visit them were entertained in apartments, furnished with a degree of splendor that caused them to stare. Edith and Auley dressed in the costliest that could be procured, they had servants to obey their slightest wishes, and their table was daily supplied with the most expensive edibles. How Auley managed to support this, engaged in no ostensible business as he was, created not a little wonder and conjecture.

Five years passed. Auley and Edith were understood to be going down in the world as rapidly as they had got up. Auley came to Buckshuting and applied to his father for a loan. The old man denied him. Soon after this, news came that his furniture was seized for rent. It was presently understood that he was in much distress—in the midst of which his wife gave birth to her first child. Auley again visited the village to get relief from his father; but as unsuccessfully as heretofore. The old gentleman, instead of softening as he grew older, became more indurated. At neither visit did Auley tax the hospitality of his father, but put up at the inn.

"It was the custom of old Benjamin to make semi-annual journeys to Philadelphia, travelling the distance on horseback, progressing from Buckshuting to the Pole Tavern the first day, and from there on to the city, the next; returning by the same road, after an absence of a week. He invariably started from home of a Friday morning, so as to reach Philadelphia at his leisure, during the next day; nor did he ever fail on the Friday following, to set out upon his return. It was in the spring of the year 179–, that he made his last journey. Having effected his purchases, and attended to his own errands, as well as the various ones entrusted to him by his neighbors, he left the city on Thursday night, crossing the river from the foot of Market street, sleeping that night in Camden, and setting out on his way home early next morning. Contrary to his custom, he did not put up at the Pole Tavern, where he dined, at about two o'clock that day. To the landlord's inquiries why he did not stay for the night, he said that as he got into his saddle at Camden, to start, the bar-keeper at the tavern put a letter into his hands. This letter was of so strange a nature that he had determined to push on and reach Buckshuting some time that night.

"He was seen passing through the villages on the road, and a resident of Millville saw him as late as eleven o'clock, urging his wearied horse over the bridge that crosses Maurice's river at that place.—This man had been out at a "jollification" at a place called Silver Run, a mile below; he was returning home, and on the bridge he met old Benjamin; they spoke as they passed each other. The man remarked that a storm was coming on—to which the other said he feared he should not get home time enough to escape it.

"A great storm passed over the village of Buckshuting that night. It was after eleven as old Jonas Rocap, landlord of the Washington, was closing his door. A loud clap of thunder and a vivid flash of lightning, both so fearfully instantaneous that he was startled as if struck, caused him to pause with his door open while he collected himself from his fright. At that instant a woman's shriek—but a smothered one—reached his ears. It seemed to come from the house of Benjamin Loper, whom he knew to be absent. He knew too that there was no one about the house but Rachel Avis, house-keeper for the old man. At that moment too he saw a light flit by one of the windows in the second story of the miller's dwelling. It seemed to him as if the light of a dark-lantern had suddenly been permitted to appear and then as suddenly shut up.

"Upon the impulse of the moment, Jonas pulled to his door, and hastened (not thinking of his hat) down the hill towards the miller's house. The rain was now pouring in a torrent, but unheeding the weather, he reached the house. His listened at the door—all was silent; he tried it—it was fast. The shriek was all in his fancy he now thought, and he had better escape from the rain. He had just concluded to turn away, when he heard—he could not be deceived now—the tread of feet, as if upon the floor of a chamber, in the back part of the house. The tread was heavy, and could not be that of Rachel Avis. He went round back of the house, to see if any light was perceptible there. All was dark. He tried the latch of the yard gate: it yielded to his touch. He entered—tried the back-door: it was unfastened; and in a moment he stood in the dark entry of the house. Again he heard the tread above, and a groan, deep and long, that so startlingly shuddered his feelings, as to check for an instant the circulation of his blood. There he stood in that dark passage—alone—a murder, perhaps, was being committed in the chamber above. His first thought was to cry out, but a sensation, like that attending the nightmare, when in our dreams we endeavour to act and speak, choked the words in his throat. The room in which he saw, from his door, the flash of light, he knew to be the sleeping apartment of old Benjamin. The old man was known to be rich, and a chest in his bed-room was reported to contain a large amount of money. Might not some one, incited by reports of this kind, have attempted to rob the house?

"He noiselessly groped his way to the stairs, and cautiously began to ascend; three or four steps had he made when he heard a door open above, he cowered down, and listened in breathless silence; footsteps passed from one of the back chambers to one in front—from the room of the house-keeper to that of old Benjamin, as he judged by the sound. Urged by a feeling of interest that overpowered his sense of danger, he now crept up the stairs, and placed his eyes to the keyhole of the old man's chamber. Over a chest at the side of the old man's vacant bed, two men were stooping and rifling it of its hoard, by the light of a lantern. It was but a momentary glance that he obtained before the light was put out. He heard the steps of the men coming to the door. He retreated down the stairs, intending to rush out of the house and rouse the village by cries of 'murder!' But in the darkness, he stumbled as he reached the bottom of the stairs, and fell forward with his head so heavily upon the floor, that he lay prostrate and half-insensible. The light of a lantern was in a moment thrown upon his face, and two figures in masks bent over him.

"'Is he much hurt?' asked one.

"'Stunned only,'—said the other.

"'Who is he?' inquired the first.

"'Jonas Rocap, the landlord of the Washington,' answered the second.

"'He has been watching our movements,' said the first. 'As soon as he recovers, he will give the alarm. Let us be off. We must hasten from this neighbourhood.'

"The robbers then left the house.

"The landlord, though severely stunned, heard and remembered what the housebreakers said, and was conscious of their movements. The storm still raged without, and as they opened the door to make their egress, the rush of cold air in the passage had the effect of reviving him. Again he heard a groan from one of the chambers above. Rachel was yet alive then. He raised himself from the floor and crawled up the stairs again. Opening the door of the house-keeper's apartment, he called her by name and groped his way towards her bed. She spoke not, but groaned heavily. In utter darkness, without the means of producing a light at hand, and at the bedside of a woman who could not speak, what was he to do? The woman was dying too, perhaps! The lightning, which had attended the commencement of the storm, in vivid flashes, now only glimmered in sheets, though the deep rolling of thunder and heavy dashing of rain continued.

"But one course was left him. He groped in the dark to the stairs again, descended them, left the house, and found his way to his own tenement. He roused his ostler and his sleepy-headed sons—roused all the village from its slumbers—collected a force of ten or twelve strong, and conducted them to the miller's. By the lanterns with which they came prepared, it was now seen that Rachel was not wounded, but gagged and tied down to her bed. Whilst they were unbinding the cord that fastened her, and relieving her mouth from the gag, a thunderbolt struck the house, jarring it to its foundations. Every one—Rachel among them—precipitately hurried from beneath a roof which was instantly enveloped in flames.

"At this crisis was heard the cry of one in jeopardy. The violence of the winds drowned the voice in a measure, but the snatches of it that reached the ears of the villagers indicated distress. Rachel being placed in a neighbour's house, the men who had collected, one and all, made haste, with the landlord at their head, in the direction from which the cry came. Bearing lanterns, and each armed with a cane or club, [illegible] had the hill to the creek, in face of the driving storm. The burning house of the miller, which was now in a mass of flame, cast a bright glare far over the scene, penetrating the foliage of the forest, gleaming across the foaming waves of the dark pond, and sparkling with brilliant hues amid the spray and bubbles upon the rocks below the dam. 'Help! help!' was the feeble appeal which struggled above the rage of winds, whilst the destructive flame discovered to the astonished villagers, as they stood on the shore, a man and horse in the midst of the creek, unavailingly contending against the fury of the elements. Man and horse both perished!

"This calamitous storm subsided before morning. Upon the day following, which was one of sunshine and mildness, it was discovered that several planks of the bridge had been taken up, leaving a gap of eight feet in width. The removal of these planks was evidently the work of design, and a dire result had followed it, for it was but too certain that through this gap the horse and rider had fallen, and been carried over the dam, perishing in the waves below. The house of the miller was burnt to the ground. The old man's arrival from Philadelphia was not to be looked for till four or five o'clock in the afternoon. But about mid-day it was known in Buckshuting that he had been seen the night before crossing the bridge at Millville. It was Benjamin Loper, then, that they had seen perish in the creek! Unfortunate old man! He must have seen his house in flames, too!

"The planks of the bridge had been torn up by the robbers to prevent, or at least retard pursuit, in case the village should be alarmed; at least, such was the most probable conjecture that occurred to the villagers. That the robbery was committed by two persons, the evidence both of Rachel Avis and the landlord of the Washington proved. Rachel said that she went to bed early, intending to rise before day-break, as she expected Mr. Loper home next day, as usual, and wished to have her Saturday's work done betimes. She was awakened by a crash in Mr. Loper's chamber, and she at once thought of the money-chest and robbers. She shrieked, and was in the act of springing from her bed, when she was seized by a man who held her down, and prevented her from crying out by forcing his hand upon her mouth. She struggled with him, and so stout were her exertions he called to his confederate for assistance. 'Jim, come help—quick! she must be gagged!' were his words. The confederate came from Mr. Loper's chamber, and by their joint efforts they succeeded in gagging her with a handkerchief, and tied her with a cord so as to hinder her from rising. In this situation they left her, and she could hear them both at the chest in the adjoining room. She heard them leave the chamber, and almost immediately after a heavy fall. Articulate she could not; to groan was the utmost in her power. Five minutes or so after the noise of the fall, the door of her room was again opened, her name called, and she recognized the voice of Jonas Rocap, but it was impossible for her to utter a word, and the darkness prevented him from seeing her condition.

"Who were the robbers? Where from? Two horsemen had dashed along the road with arrowy speed by the place called Silver Run. It was near midnight, and their course was from the direction of Buckshuting. The man and wife who resided in one of the only two houses that stand there, and in whose house the "jollification" had taken place, were just retiring to bed. Happening to cast their eyes through a window to the road as a sheet of lightning illuminated earth and heaven, they saw the two horsemen breasting the storm and riding as if for life.—Suspicion at once, though not very strong, singled out Auley Loper as one of these. He was known to be in distressed circumstances. He was said to be the associate of low gamblers, and the intimate companion of a man well known to the police of Philadelphia, by the name of Ned Hines. But, according to the housekeeper, 'Jim' was the only name mentioned, which, unless a name had been preconcerted, went to prove that neither Ned nor Auley were engaged in the robbery. In the struggle and hurry of the moment, it is most probable that the man who held Rachel, would have called out to his accomplice by the appellation most familiar. So reasoned a majority of the villagers. According to this view of it, if she were held by Auley, he would not have called to Ned Hines by the name of Jim; and, if Hines had held her, 'Lope,' by which name he was in the habit of addressing his companion, would have been the call. Mr. *, who administered to the estate of the deceased, despatched a messenger to Philadelphia, however, with directions to apprize the young man of his father's death, to observe him narrowly, and ascertain if he had been absent from the city upon the night of the robbery.

"That it was the intention of Mr. Loper to draw up a will, disinheriting his son, was well known; but, now that he had perished intestate, Auley was heir to all. At the tidings of his father's death, the young man wept freely, and exhibited poignant regret that no reconciliation had taken place between them. He also evinced a deep interest in bringing the robbers to punishment, and an anxiety to have the matter sifted to the bottom of its mystery. In his circumstances he appeared to be quite embarrassed, borrowing from the messenger money to defray his stage-hire from the city down to the village. The report of the messenger, who was a man of neither penetration nor tact, perhaps, was, that he had detected nothing upon which to build a suspicion.

"The body of the drowned man was as yet unfound. Auley exerted himself with praiseworthy assiduity until the corpse of his parent was got from the bed of the creek. In the pockets of the corpse, money, bills, receipts, and a letter were found. The letter was an anonymous communication, warning him that his house would be robbed. This was the letter that he had spoken of to the landlord of the Pole Tavern, and the warning that it contained had induced him to push through the journey in one day. He told the landlord that it had been put into his hands by the barkeeper of the inn at Camden, where he slept on Thursday night. Of this barkeeper inquiries were made, but he could throw no light upon it. The letter had been dropped into a box, kept at the side of the bar, for the accommodation of persons putting up at that house. He could say nothing more.

"The corpse of the deceased was followed in funeral procession by a great number of people, and buried in the oak-shaded graveyard of the old Baptist congregation at Dividing Creek. Young Loper exhibited so much feeling at the grave, and throughout the sad occasion, that he won for himself the sympathy of the villagers generally. So mild, so becoming was his deportment, that many expressed to each other their regret that they had ever permitted themselves to entertain opinions of him contrary to that with which they were now impressed; for they were now convinced that though he might have been often indiscreet in his intercourse with the world, he could never have been guilty of crime; and that all the evil reports of him that had reached the village, were but calumnious inventions of some secret enemy, and as such they would hereafter regard them. There were a few, however, that were not thus readily reconciled to his character.

"Mr. *, who administered to the estate of the deceased, was a man of unimpeachable probity, and proverbial for the despatch with which he transacted business. Auley was soon put into possession of the property, and became a rich man in the eyes of the villagers. His first movement was to present his wife's mother with the debt she owed the estate; he subsequently befriended several poor families in the vicinity; and, in fact, to judge from his actions, a better-hearted man never lived. Instead of taking up his residence at Buckshuting, as many expressed their wishes that he would, he announced his intention of continuing to dwell in Philadelphia, and advertised his property for sale. It was but a short time before he effected an advantageous disposal of the property.

"It was supposed that his objection to taking up his abode at Buckshuting, was in consequence of his having made friends and acquaintances in the city, to whom he had become so attached that he chose to be among them in future. But, as they afterwards perceived, such could not have been his object, for suddenly, without apprising any of his relatives, he left Philadelphia; and, notwithstanding the indefatigable inquiries of Mrs. Compton as to the fate of her daughter, year after year rolled away without her obtaining the slightest intelligence. In the meantime, the reward offered by the Governor of the State for the apprehension of the robbers, failed to bring the culprits to justice. The few who from the first had entertained certain suspicions, were now strengthened in their opinions, though with the majority of the villagers it was regarded only as a singular matter, nor did they for a moment in their thoughts connect Auley Loper with the guilt of the affair. Of the few who suspected Auley, the landlord of the Washington was one. He could not say upon his oath that Auley was one of the two seen by him bending over the money-chest upon the night of the robbery, but the resemblance of his figure to that of one of them, was very strong.

"Six years had elapsed, when the death-bed confessions of a man dying at New Orleans, were published in the newspapers throughout the Union, creating not a little sensation in the village of Buckshuting. This man confessed, among other crimes, that he had assisted in robbing the house of Benjamin Loper, and that his confederate was the son of the person robbed. Auley and he got acquainted at a gaming house in Philadelphia, and, both being necessitous, they were much together, and in the course of their intimacy, Auley related to him the incidents of his life, and dwelt with bitter feelings upon the paternal persecution he had met with in the affair of his courtship and marriage. Upon this hint he urged Auley to revenge himself by plundering his father's money-chest. At first Auley objected, but his compunctions were allayed by the specious arguments that his companion advanced in support of the undertaking. The spring visit of the old man to the city, which was near at hand, would be an opportunity to put into execution the plan they finally agreed upon. Auley kept a look out at the Ferry Hotel, at the foot of Market street, where he knew his father was in the habit of putting up, and it was not long before he announced to his confederate the arrival of the old man. They were upon the point of starting immediately, but the better spirit of Auley prevailed, and he refused to go. Two or three days went by, and the persuasions of his companion were ineffectual. But his wife—sick, abed, with a wailing infant—and without many of the delicacies that money will furnish to relieve the extremity of sickness—determined him. And on the Thursday night following the old man's arrival in the city, Auley and his confederate, having provided themselves with a dark lantern, a cord and certain burglarious implements, set out upon horses hired for the occasion. Auley's knowledge of the country through which they travelled, was such that, permitting his companion to follow leisurely by the main road, he would branch off himself into by-ways, reaching a designated spot by a circuitous route. At each meeting-place Auley would give directions where next to meet, and in this way they progressed without once being seen in the company of each other. By travelling all that night they were enabled to reach the forest in the vicinity of Buckshuting on the following afternoon before dark.

"This was the forest that had been the haunt of Auley in his years of dreaming; every spot of it was known to him; he led the way into a sequested hollow, where he and his companion threw themselves upon the turf to rest, and permitted their tired horses to graze. After dark they removed themselves and horses to the edge of the forest, where they lay in concealment, awaiting to see the lights in the windows disappear, as the inhabitants of the village retired to their pillows. Time seemed to move on leaden wings, and they grew impatient. The light in the miller's house was early extinguished, but not in other houses. Not more than three lights were put out before ten o'clock, and that of Jonas Rocap, and four others, were burning as late as eleven. Directly after eleven all were out but that of the inn. The wind had now risen, and was howling through the forest, whilst the star-lit sky became suddenly overcast and pitchy dark. Auley became strangely agitated. He was for committing the robbery at once, or giving it up and returning. They then tied their horses each to a tree, crossed the bridge and entered the village. Auley led the way, and they clambered into the yard back of his father's house; his confederate, by the application of a skeleton key to the lock, noiselessly opened the back door, and they entered the house. In the hall they paused a moment, and, by a chemical preparation that the confederate had with him, a light was produced and communicated to the candle in the small lantern that they carried. They then stealthily crept up stairs, and with the skeleton key opened the chamber where the chest was. They consulted in whispers, and it was agreed that Auley should enter the housekeeper's chamber and stand by her bed, ready to prevent her from creating an alarm, if the forcing open of the chest should waken her, and that if he required assistance he should call out 'Jim.' At this moment the impending storm burst.

"The particulars of the robbery having already been told, it is only necessary to refer to that part of the man's confession which explains what followed the departure of the robbers from old Benjamin's house. As they recrossed the bridge, Auley trod upon a loose plank, and the confederate proposed to tear up several of them, by which pursuit, in case it should be attempted, would be retarded so as to allow them time to escape. It was speedily done. They then hastened to the forest, and whilst unfastening their horses they heard the tread of a horse rapidly advancing. At that moment, the house which they had just robbed was struck by a thunderbolt and flames burst forth. Standing in the gloom of the forest, they paused a moment to view the conflagration, when it occurred to Auley that they had left the housekeeper tied down to her bed and gagged.—With a sudden impulse, he leaped from the forest into the road. At that instant a figure on horseback passed, urging a jaded horse to its utmost exertions. The flames of the burning house showed every object distinctly, and Auley recognized his father.—'Stop, father, stop!' he called, with a thrilling sense of the danger upon which the old man was rushing—But it was too late. Horse and rider plunged into the dark chasm beneath the bridge and were swept over the dam. The man who made this confession was the notorious Ned Hines.

"This confession fixed the crime upon Auley Loper, and efforts were promptly made to find him out and bring him to trial. Descriptions of his person and of his wife were circulated throughout the United States; a large reward was offered by the legal authorities of New Jersey; in fact, nothing was left undone that could be considered likely to trace him to his hiding-place. But no clue to the discovery of him could be obtained.

"And it was now between seven and eight years since the robbery, when one summer afternoon the four horses of a mail-coach spanked across the bridge and ascended the hill of Buckshuting, stopping at the door of the Widow Compton until a woman and child got out, then starting and hurrying on at its usual speed. The peeping neighbors saw that the woman was sick and feeble, and that the boy was pale, thin, and in but little better health than his mother, for [illegible] son. It was presently known in the village that Edith Loper, who for more than seven years had not been heard of, was again beneath her mother's roof. During the following week, courtesy obliged Mrs. Compton to receive a host of visiters; and that Edith was beset with inquiries will be readily understood. Her story was an unvarnished one. 'It was from motives purely of love that I wedded Auley Loper,' she said, and she went on to detail the poverty with which she and her husband contended at first in Philadelphia, and the summer-day delight with which her heart fluttered at her sudden transition from the struggles of indigence to the ease of wealth, or, rather, the handling of money merely, as she since knew it to have been. 'We were very poor, Auley had scarcely shoes to his feet; we were daily in want of the necessaries of life, and my heart was sinking with despair, when he all at once absented himself much from home, being as long as three days at a time away from me, but showering gold into my lap upon his return. I was young and giddy, and never considered for a moment how he became possessed of it, but entered eagerly into his proposition to rent a commodious house and furnish it luxuriously. Costly dresses and jewels were extravagantly bestowed upon me, and I was but too pleased to triumph in this way over those who had sneered at my marriage with the "pennyless do-nothing." Four years went by in a thoughtless career of pleasure. Finding our family increasing, I at the same time became conscious that my husband was embarrassed in his circumstances. Creditors became clamorous—a sale of furniture—Auley barely escaped imprisonment. We then, deeply humbled, retreated into obscurity again.'

"Edith now found that Auley, who, in the earlier days of their marriage, was so impassioned a lover, grew gradually less and less affectionate. Though habitually kind, he ceased to be fondling; his countenance wore a worn and discontented expression, and his manner, compared with the joyous gayety with which formerly he would clasp her in his arms and suffuse her with caresses, was chillingly distant. Why was this? and why were they lodging in two rooms upon the second floor, as destitute almost as when they first came to the city? Why should her husband's influx of wealth not continue, if acquired by honest means? why were not those means still practicable? These were the thoughts forced upon her by the aspect that matters wore; and she who, confident through love, implicitly relied upon one with whom she was ready to share the extremest of toil and suffering, grew distrustful, shrinking from the possibility of being connected with crime as if from the contact of a venomous reptile. 'Auley's slumbers were restless too,' she said. As she lay by his side, she would be awakened in the night by his struggles and mutterings. He seemed to be contending, as if in personal and desperate conflict with some one. It was evident by the same dream repeated from time to time, and was most probably a subject indesinent to his waking thoughts.

"'At this time,' she continued, 'he was much in the company of a man that he addressed by the name of Hines. The look of this man I did not like.—Auley frequently brought him to our lodgings at very late hours of the night, and held with him many protracted interviews in the chamber adjoining where I lay.'

"Whilst lying upon the bed of sickness, she awoke one night from her fitful slumbers and overheard her husband and Hines talking in the next room. The partition was thin—her bed was close to it—she could not help hearing what was spoken, for the speakers, forgetting that they might be listened to, or trusting to the probability of her and the nurse being sound asleep, did not whisper. She overheard them concoct a plan for the robbery of Benjamin Loper's money-chest, which Hines said could be easily accomplished, the old man being absent and no one but his housekeeper to contend with. 'We had better start at once,' urged Hines. 'But I must tell my wife that I shall be absent a day or two,' said Auley. 'No need of waking her to do that,' Hines said; 'there is a pencil and paper; write a line or two and leave it on the table by her bed.' To this Auley consented, and presently Edith saw him enter her chamber, with a quiet tread, and place a slip of writing within her reach. Directly after this she heard Hines and him leave the house.

"Why, when he entered her chamber, did she not speak? why not let him know that she was aware of the plot? She wished to—tried—but could not—her tongue clove to the roof of her mouth. An overwhelming sensation of horror rendered her dumb.—The conviction, to which this discovery led, startled her mind for the moment beyond control. She shuddered as the probability forced itself upon her thoughts that through robbery had the means been obtained by which Auley had supported the expense at which they had awhile flourished. Her heart sickened—a kind of delirium took place—and she lay in a state of mind bordering on distraction.

"Dawn was peeping through the bowed window-shutters as she recovered from this mental vertigo. Acting upon the impulse of what she conceived to be her duty, she wakened the nurse, who got together pen, ink and paper, and placed them on the table by the bed. Edith leaned over and indited a few lines of warning to the father of her husband, and despatched it at daylight by the nurse, who crossed the Delaware by one of the earliest ferry-boats, and disposed of the letter according to directions, by dropping it into a letter-box in the bar-room of the inn, at which Edith knew the old man lodged in Camden. This she thought might possibly prevent the robbery—it might incite the old man to speed forward and reach home in time to protect his property. But a minute or two after the nurse was gone, other considerations occurred. Should old Benjamin, in consequence of her letter, be timely enough at Buckshuting to guard his property, would he not also concert with his neighbors for the capture of the thieves, and would not the detection of Auley ensue? This she had overlooked. The more she considered it, the more was she convinced that she was jeopardizing her husband. Oh, if she could but recall the nurse!

"In two hours the nurse returned; Edith, full of anxiety and alarm, sent her back to get the letter if it was not yet delivered into the hands of old Mr. Loper. But too late; the bar-keeper had given it to the old man an hour previously; he had set out upon his journey.

"Laboring under the most intense feelings; in the utmost dread lest her letter might prove the detection of Auley, for the wife yet swayed the sceptre of her heart, Edith lay feverish upon her bed. At dusk on the afternoon of Saturday her husband returned, and her mind was relieved of its dread on that score.—The messenger, bearing the tidings of the robbery, the burning of the house by lightning, and the death of old Mr. Loper, followed on Sunday. Of Auley's consummate deception during the investigation that followed she was an eye-witness, and, now knowing him to be at least a robber, her heart sunk despairingly low at the gloomy prospect before her—the husband of her heart, the father of her babe, a villain! Should she denounce him to justice? She could not reconcile such a course with the feelings of her heart. But to live with him in future was equally irreconcileable with her thoughts. What should she do?—To separate from him as soon as practicable and go home to reside with her mother, she resolved.

"After the estate was settled, the property sold and payment received, Edith became aware of frequent altercations between her husband and Hines, and it was her opinion, reasonably established, that half of the proceeds arising from the sale were exacted by the latter as the price of his secrecy in regard to the robbery. Auley became fitful and morose, and suddenly expressed his intention of removing to the West. Edith objected, but he peremptorily—it was the first that he had ever spoken harshly to her—bade her make ready, and, without allowing her time to receive a visit from her mother to whom she wrote upon the subject, hurried her and her child away, journeying towards Pittsburg in one of those huge wagons, used for transporting merchandise over and far beyond the Allegheny mountains.

"Travelling in those days was a laborious and difficult matter to what it now is, and after a tedious journey of three weeks they arrived at Pittsburg, where Auley purchased a horse and vehicle to carry them farther. Leaving that place, another three weeks, more irksome than the first, was passed in penetrating the wildernesses of Ohio. Pitching his tent not far from a new 'settlement,' Auley reared with his own hands a log-hut, cleared a small plot of ground for gardening purposes, disposed of the horse and vehicle to a trader at the settlement, and resorted to fishing and hunting for a livelihood. Deer and the feathered tribes were plenty in the forest; the neighboring streams abounded with fish; and seldom did he shoulder his gun or angle in the morning and go forth, without returning laden with game or fish. But his mind knew no rest. His dark eyes were ever restless, and glaring wildly around, as if he dreaded the presence of some one. A shadow would startle him. His dreaming struggles and murmurs continued, and he would frequently start up from his slumbers with a cry of unearthly tone. His manner towards his wife grew austere—like that of one who is conscious that another knows a secret, and is fearful of being betrayed. He was watchfully careful to keep writing materials beyond her reach, lest she should, by some chance, send a letter that might communicate to the world where he had hidden himself. 'We have come to the wilderness—the wilderness is our home, Edith—here we must live, here die!'

"The spot where Auley had built his cabin, was a secluded hollow, surrounded by lofty hills, and in the midst of a primeval forest. The 'settlement' was two miles distant. There once a week Auley went to make small purchases at the store, and peruse such journals as found their way into that remote place. With the store-keeper he was in the habit of exchanging a few words, but to every one else he was sullen; and persons from the settlement, going through the hollow in quest of game, passed the hut without pretending to stop and talk with the wife and child of a man they suspected and feared. His dark brow and stern manner repulsed all approaches, and for months at a time Edith would see only her sickly boy moping about the door of the hut during the day, and her gloomy husband at night, upon his return from hunting.

"Years passed. Edith had expected some day to escape with her child from the power of this guilt-troubled man, who swayed over her such a supremacy that she cowered to him as the dog to his master; but hope deferred crushed her spirits—all for her was hopelessness in this world, and she now looked only forward to death as a release; and that release was not far distant, she judged; for anxiety and solitude had cankered the root of her health. But her boy—her poor boy!—she did not wish to die before she saw him laid at rest beneath the green earth of that sequestered spot. Farther down in the hollow there was an opening between two hills, through which the sun shone brightly; and though the axe of the forester had never resounded there, yet the place looked as if the hand of man had pruned nature of its overgrowth, so divested of brush-wood was it, so equi-distant and grove-like its trees. To this grove, leading her boy by the hand, would Edith frequently repair, and at the foot of a tree, the branches of which threw a wider shade than the others of the grove, she would sit and clasp her boy to her breast. Beneath the green turf, shadowed by this tree, did Edith wish the bones of herself and her boy to repose. With tears streaming from her eyes, as she bent over her child's pale face, while his feeble arms clung to her neck, she would sit and lament the sad fate to which she was doomed. Her maiden home, her mother, and scenes of earlier years, would rise with the vividness of a picture before her, and upon her memory retrospections would crowd! Oh if she could but return to the scene of childhood—there, in the arms of her mother, linger out the sad remnant of her life—there die! But hopeless the wish—here must she linger—here breathe her last!

"'Under an assumed name,' continued Edith, 'we had thus been buried in the seclusion of the Ohio wilderness for years, when one cold day that Auley was at home, the man who kept the store at the settlement, passing through the hollow, with his gun and dogs, in pursuit of game, stopped at the door, handed in a newspaper, and passed on. He knew how anxious Auley was to read the journals of the day, and he had, upon several occasions, (receiving the paper early in the week, and knowing that Auley would not be at the store before Saturday,) extended to him this compliment, either bringing it himself or sending it by his son.' Auley began to read the paper. Edith presently saw it shake in his hands, whilst his whole frame was agitated as if from an attack of ague, and his eyes were staring wildly at a part that he was reading with intense emotion. He suddenly seemed to be choked, as if with asthmatical suffocation, and, with an effort, sprung up from his seat and rushed out into the open air.

"'The paper dropped upon the floor. Used as I had become to his whimsical fits of gloom,' said Edith, 'I was unprepared for this, and as I saw him stride through the hollow and disappear beyond a craggy eminence at a distance, I could but wonder what in the paper had thus agitated him.' Taking up the paper, she at once discovered the cause.—There, in large type, was a description of Auley's person, and a large reward offered for his detection, together with a circumstantial account of the robbery at Buckshuting, and the recent dying declarations of Ned Hines. Whilst she was reading, Auley re-entered; he eyed her with a glance of fury, snatched the paper from her hands, and threw it into the flames upon the hearth. He then unlocked a trunk in which was kept the gold that the sale of the Buckshuting estate produced, or rather that part of it left from the extortion of Hines. Of his treasure he was parsimoniously churlish, and it was with the extremest reluctance that he parted with the little of it that each week had to be paid at the store for necessaries. 'I am going to the settlement; I shall be back presently,' he said, and left the cabin. He soon returned with a horse and wagon that he had purchased in the interim at the settlement. 'Stir, Edith, stir—make ready—we must leave this,' he commanded; and trunks, bed, and the few household articles of the cabin were loaded into the wagon, and that night was commenced a journey, which, after weeks of wandering, was terminated in the depths of a forest, far—far remote from the habitation of man.

"In a mountainous region, almost inaccessible to human feet, a hovel was again erected by Auley, and he resumed his solitary quest of game and fish amid the wilds and streams of a vast forest—a pathless wilderness, roamed only by himself and beasts of prey. The distance from this cabin to any settlement Edith knew to be great, for Auley invariably was more than two days absent upon the errand when he departed to procure necessaries.

"'As time passed,' continued Edith, 'he grew more and more repulsive in his deportment to me; my child cowered from the dark gaze of a parent who never extended to him a word of kindness; and my situation was so awful, that death, even from the hand of a husband, which I was often led to expect, would at any moment have been welcomed, if my boy were only at rest. Terrible, terrible were the tortures of mind with which he was now visited, and I became convinced that a crime of deeper dye than the Buckshuting robbery weighed upon his soul.—Often, in these moments of bitterness and gall, he would prostrate himself upon the floor of our cabin, and write and groan under the goadings and lashings of guilt. It was the agony of guilt without the power of repentance. Prayer he would try—but he could not pray—and he would rise from his knees with the look of an infuriated demon—curse—rage—and defy God with the most horrid blasphemies.'

"His rovings into the forest were now lengthened to an absence of several days at a time, she said, and he would seldom sleep at the cabin more than two nights in a week. Night after night she would lay awake, with her boy nestled to her bosom, during tedious hours of sleeplessness, listening to the moan of a desolate-like wind, as it swept through the dark forest, leaving pauses of silence to be startled by the cry of some prowling wolf, perhaps, or the more awful sound (as she would not unfrequently imagine) of an Indian war-whoop; and she would remain shuddering in the momentary expectation of an attack from a party of ruthless savages, whose depredatory incursions, in those days, were not uncommon in that part of the West.

"Thus had she lain one night,—it was boisterously windy without, but neither rainy nor severely cold, and Auley was absent,—watching the flames upon the hearth, kept awake by the elemental roar through the surrounding forest, till sleep closed her weary eye-lids, and she was happy in dreams of other scenes and other years. She was awakened by a strong glare of light and heat. Her first fear was of being surrounded by Indians, but a second thought convinced her that a gust of wind had whirled down the chimney and fanned the flame out so far as to set fire to the cabin. She leaped from the bed, with her shrieking boy in her arms, snatched up a few garments, and escaped uninjured through the door. Where should she find shelter?

"'I knew that in a few minutes the hut would be consumed to ashes,' said she, 'and, in desperation, I fled from the blaze, starting in the direction usually taken by my husband when he set out upon his errands to purchase necessaries. As I fled, as the distance between me and the cabin increased, hope once more animated my bosom; my frame seemed to be supported by a supernatural strength, and when my child tired I would catch him up and carry him, till he could again resume his feet. Oh, if I could but escape! That was the prayer of my heart! All that night and the next day, with this hope, I urged my way through the forest, and I would have toiled on during the following night, but my arms could no longer bear the weight of my child, and, sinking at the foot of a tree, I sheltered him as closely as possible to my bosom, and slept until the beams of the morning sun awakened me. Rising, I resumed my course. Though I did not myself experience sensations of hunger, the complainings of my little boy for bread, grew more and more painful to hear. On—on I pressed. But night was again approaching—my spirits drooped—the sad thought occurred to me that we should perish of hunger and fatigue. Where I was I knew not. For all that I knew, I might be as distant from any habitation then, as when I started from the burning cabin. Night now closed around me. My boy had cried himself asleep on my breast, and I was preparing to pass another night in the forest, when—oh, what a relief to my mind! what a gush of gladness to my heart!—I saw a light glimmering through the trees, and at no great distance. I hastened towards it—gained the door of a cottage—I paused not to knock, but lifted the latch, entered, and sunk with my sleeping burthen upon the floor. I was in the midst of a forester's family. The good man, his wife and children, gathered round me; with heartfelt expressions of sympathy, they assisted me and my child to a bed; nourishment was promptly supplied, and that night my boy and I rested our wearied limbs in a situation of comfort.'

"From this cottage, after she had enjoyed a day of rest, the kind forester conducted Edith to the nearest settlement, four miles off. Here she unreservedly related the story of her woes, and found herself among compassionate friends, who exerted themselves in her favor. Matters were put into such a train by them that she was enabled to commence her pilgrimage homeward with inspiriting hopes, and to pursue it with a degree of facility and respect that else would not have been her lot. And now, after weeks—many weeks of travel, she was once more in her native village, and beneath her mother's roof.

"Such was the story of Edith," continued the squire. "She and her boy grew worse and worse in health, and it was but a year and a month or two after this, that, ceasing to breath within a few hours of each other, they expired upon one bed, and were buried in one grave. Mrs. Compton did not long survive her daughter."

"Was nothing more ever heard of Auley Loper?" asked Seth.

"Just what I was going to inquire—you took the words out of my mouth, Sharp," said the Colonel.

"Forty years have passed since he left the village," answered the squire, "but nothing more has been heard of him. After the return of Edith to Buckshuting, active means were taken to discover him, for in the meantime circumstantial evidence had come to light, throwing a strong suspicion on him of being the murderer of a man by the name of McA*ll, and that part of her narrative describing his struggles with a guilty conscience corroborated the suspicion, and, in the minds of many, fixed the crime upon him beyond a doubt. This McA*ll," continued the squire, "was a miser, living alone in a house in Water street, Philadelphia. His neighbors were used to seeing his house shut up at times, aware as they were that he made journeys into the country to collect rents. But in the year 179– they were surprised to observe it closed for an unusual duration—five days—and suspicion of something dreadful was aroused by the foul stench that proceeded from the house. The door was burst open—a crowd entered—and there was the horrid spectacle of the miser's bloated corpse, with a hatchet buried in his skull. His chests and trunks were found open, each rifled of its contents, and ——"

"Yes, having murdered him, I took from him his keys, opened his strong boxes and plundered them of his gold!" cried the stranger, who now wildly started up from his seat, and confronted the narrator with a spectral glare. He spoke in a guttural and discordant tone, as if his feeble energies were strained to their utmost to gasp out the words. His sunken cheeks, cadaverous complexion, and ghastly eyes, imparted an unearthly look to him, and the landlord, Josh Robins, and all present, besides Nell from the kitchen, as they crowded round the man of mystery, were awed into mute terror by his frightful aspect. "Banished from home," continued the stranger, "with a young wife, in a strange city, and in a state of beggary almost—tempted by the gold of the miser and his lonely situation, I stole into his house and murdered him while he slept. Gold! gold! accursed gold! I lavished it upon my unsuspicious wife—in a few years it was gone—poverty again stared me in the face—I was the associate of a depraved man—the robbery of my father ensued—you know the rest—and after years of remorse and wanderings I have returned, a grey-haired man, to die in the village where I was born."

His voice ceased, his eyes closed, his frame shook with a convulsive throe, and he sunk to the floor.—Seth Sharp and the colonel quickly raised him and placed him in his seat—he attempted to speak, but failed—clasping his lean hand upon his breast, his head fell back, his limbs stiffened, and those who looked on were aware that he was dying. A moment—but a moment—and the soul of Auley Loper had left its clay tenement for another world!

On the third day following this, a group was collected around a grave that had been dug in an appropriate spot upon the border of the pond. The corpse of Auley Loper had been lowered into its resting-place, and the villagers were busily shovelling the earth upon his coffin-lid. A sum of money sufficient to defray the expense of grave-clothes, coffin, and respectable burial was found upon his person. His small trunk, or portmanteau, was found to contain merely a few articles of apparel—no papers. After the burial, his horse—an old and worn-out creature—was turned from the stable of Jonas into the forest, where, after a few weeks, he died within a few paces of the new-made grave.

Thus were the miseries incident to parental indecision—its consequences to both parent and child—exemplified in the fate of Benjamin Loper and his son. Not alone fatal to them did it prove, but engulphed in its catastrophe the innocent wife and offspring of the latter. How frequently in our intercourse with the world do we find a doting parent thus indiscreet—weak where he should be rigid, and inconsistently obstinate where another course would be preventive of much misery. Remorse, too—as we see in the fate of the son—never forsakes the guilty. It is a staunch blood-hound that tracks his steps from the moment of crime to the last breath of existence.

* * * * *

Years have gone by since the events of that night in the village bar-room. The traveller who now enters Buckshuting will rest his eyes upon a fresh-painted sign of Washington, swinging before the inn, and, instead of the name of Jonas Rocap, he will read that of Joshua Robins. Jonas died from his intemperate habits. His daughter Nell took the ostler for a husband, and they are now landlord and landlady. Perhaps it was with a shrewd surmise that this crisis was near at hand that Josh used to leer when he saw Jonas gulphing down old-rye and apple-jack. Squire Stratton, Colonel Wriggins and Seth Sharp still frequent the bar-room. The squire still tells this story—not ending it, however, as he did before the denouement of the night in question, but continuing it with the appearance of the mysterious stranger at the inn, and the discovery in him of Auley Loper.

WHERE THERE'S A WILL, THERE'S A WAY.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"James," said a master workman to a young man, a journeyman in his shop, "business has become so dull that I must reduce the number of my men. As you came in last, you will have to go among the first. I am sorry for this, but cannot help it. To continue my present force would be to ruin me."

James Harker, that was the journeyman's name, looked surprised and pained for a moment or two.—But he had a confident spirit within him, and soon recovered his self-control.

"I am sorry, too," he replied. "But I know business is very bad, and that you are perfectly right in reducing your expenses. I shall get along some how, no doubt."

"Yes, James, I have no doubt of that. Where there is a will, there is a way."

"The truth of that saying I have proved more than once in my life," the young man returned. "And I shall prove it again."

"I am sure of that," the master workman said.—"Such a spirit as yours always makes success."

At the end of the week, Harker, with three other journeymen, received their wages, and were discharged. Among these, Harker was the only married man. He had three children. One of the journeymen thrown out of work, was named Wilson. He lived near Harker, and the two walked homeward together. Wilson was a young man of good mind, some education, and excellent moral character. He had a widowed mother with whom he lived, and towards whose support he contributed as much as was needful. In doing this, he was taxed but lightly, for old Mrs. Wilson had an independent mind, and was habitually industrious. She always would be doing something.

"This is rather a bad business, Wilson," James Harker said, as the two left the shop, each with a week's wages in his pocket. He did not speak in a desponding, but, rather, in a cheerful voice.

"I don't see what we are to do," was gloomily replied. There's no work to be had in the city, and won't be for months to come."

"I shouldn't like to say that. There must be work somewhere: and if there is, I, for one, will find it," Harker said, confidently.

"You can try, if you choose; but you'll have all your trouble for nothing."

"We will see. I have never given up yet, and never intend giving up while there is any thing left of me. It is the worst thing in the world to despond. Despondency is almost sure to produce failure, while confidence guarantees success. Where there is a will there is a way, that is my motto. It has helped me through narrower places than this."

"It has never helped me, then; and I'm sure I have a good enough will."

"Perhaps it is a passive and not an active will. It may be that you call upon Jupiter without putting you shoulder to the wheel."

"You may think so, but I don't," was returned a little impatiently.

Harker, seeing that his fellow workman would not bear plain talk, said no more on the subject. On returning home, James saw that the face of his wife was troubled. She looked at him earnestly, while the tears stood in her eyes: but she said nothing.—His countenance wore its usual cheerful air. This was, in part, assumed; to strengthen the heart of his wife, who was more inclined than himself to look at the dark side of things. After the children were all in bed, and his wife had taken her seat by a little work-table, with her sewing in her hand, James said to her—

"Don't look so troubled, Lucy. All will come out right in the end. I shall get work some where."

"I don't know, James. Times, you have said all along, were very dull. I'm afraid you will lie out of work all summer. And if that should happen, I don't know what we shall do. Mr. Eckhart hasn't had a stroke of work these four months, and can't get it any where. His family is in a distressed condition."

"Eckhart don't try to get work as he ought to try. He's above doing many things that he might do. I know all about him."

"His family is greatly in want of every thing."

"And he is walking about like a gentleman. Don't think, for an instant, Lucy, that I will ever see you and the children want, while I have health and strength. If I can't get work at my trade, I can get it at something else. Work I will. If I can't make ten dollars a week, I will make five. Half a loaf is better than no bread. Not so Eckhart. He must have just such kind of work, and just such prices. He can't do this, that, nor the other."

"But where is work to be had? There are a large number of persons idle."

"Where there is a will there is a way, Lucy.—That is my sheet anchor."

"Suppose every body has this will?"

"Then for every body there would be a way. Not, of course, exactly the way most agreeable to every body; but, still, a way in which service might be rendered to others, and an equivalent for that service obtained."

The confident tone of her husband encouraged Lucy. The feeling of despondency that had weighed upon her spirits for many hours, gradually passed off. This was succeeded by a more cheerful state of mind.

Early on Monday morning, Harker started out to put his first resolution into practice, which was to visit every establishment in New York, carrying on the branch of business at which he worked. As he had not calculated on getting work at the first, second, nor third application, he was not discouraged even when dinner time found him unsuccessful. To his wife's anxious questions he replied cheerfully. After dinner he went out again.

"How is business?" he asked for the fiftieth time, as he entered a shop near the close of the day."

"Dull enough," was the reply.

"Don't you think you could make room for a hand?"

Before a reply to this could be made, a man entered the shop, and asked if a certain number of articles, such as were manufactured there, could be delivered to him in ten days. The master workman agreed to furnish what was wanted in the stipulated time, and at once engaged the services of James Harker to enable him to fulfil his contract.

As Harker was returning home towards night-fall he met Wilson.

"Have you found any work yet?" asked the former.

"I hav'nt tried. It's no use. The business is killed up. I may look about a little during the week. But I don't expect any good to come from it.

"Nor will any good come from it, I am, myself, inclined to think. Efforts made in such a spirit are rarely successful. I started out this morning confident that some good would come of my efforts. And I am pleased to say that I have not been disappointed.

After going from shop to shop, until I had gone nearly over the whole city, I at last hit the very moment when a dealer was making a large and hurried order, and obtained work for ten days."

"Ten days! What is that?"

"It is ten days work. Which is much better than ten days lost. Something favorable will turn up after that."

"Maybe so. But you'll find, in the end, that you are too sanguine."

"Think so?"

"Yes, I do."

"We'll see."

"Good day!" And Wilson passed on, feeling chagrined at Harker's good fortune, which was a rebuke of his own want of confidence and activity.

The cheerful smile that lit up the face of Lucy, when Harker mentioned his success, more than repaid him doubly for the efforts of the day.

The job lasted for the time specified. By working early and late, he was able to make just twenty dollars in ten days.

"Well, are you through with your job yet?" asked Wilson, meeting him the day after he had finished.

"Yes, I got through yesterday."

"What are you going to do now?"

"I'm going to try for work somewhere else."

"Do you think you will get it?"

"I do. Something will offer I am sure."

"You'll be a luckier dog than are some ten or a dozen I know, if it does. I've been trying ever since we quit work at L——'s, but it's no use. Not a hand's turn can I find to do. I went this morning to two shops, but no journeymen were wanted."

"Where there's a will there's a way," Harker said to himself as he walked slowly and thoughtfully along, after parting with Wilson. "He's not earnest enough about it. Two shops this morning! Why, I've been to ten, and was only too late by a quarter of an hour at one of them to secure a permanent situation. He's got a mother to fall back upon; while I've got a wife and children to fall back upon me. That makes a wonderful difference."

Wilson, on parting with Harker, returned home.

"It's no use trying," he said. "I don't believe I shall get any thing to do for months to come. I called at two or three shops this morning: every thing is perfectly flat. I know at least a dozen journeymen, with families to support, who have not had a stroke of work for weeks."

The mother spoke words of encouragement to her son. Told him not to let his mind be disturbed.—That she could easily keep up the family for six months to come, when work would be brisk again.

Assurances of this kind tended to make Wilson less anxious about employment, and, of course, less likely to secure it. It was not pleasant to his feelings, to be going from shop to shop, seeking work, and so he quit doing so. Many hours were spent in reading, but many more in wandering aimlessly about, waiting until business should revive.

"It's dreadful dull," was his oft repeated remark, to fellow workmen, who, like himself, could find nothing better to do than walking about the streets.—Occasionally he would fall in with Harker, who, some how or other, managed never to be idle over a day or two at a time. He kept always in the way of employment, because he was anxious to obtain it, and in consequence picked up many little jobs that would otherwise have been missed.

"I don't know how it is," Wilson would sometimes say to him, "that you manage always to keep at something. I can't meet with any thing to do.—And I'm sure I am as willing to work as you are."

"You don't keep all the while trying, as I do, I suppose. These are times when work has to be looked up. It doesn't come after people as it did a year ago."

Wilson didn't relish plain talk like this, because it reflected upon him unfavorably. He evinced his true feelings in his reply, that was not spoken in a calm, mild tone. The effect, however, was to cause him to go among the shops on the next day, when he was fortunate enough to secure a job that lasted a few weeks.

"Nothing like trying," remarked Harker to him sententiously, the next time they met. "It possesses a wonderful virtue."

But, even with trying, Harker found, after awhile, that he could not get enough to do to meet the wants of his family. Times seemed to grow harder. His mind, constantly active, and constantly seeking after the means for earning money, devised many schemes, and was aided by many suggestions awakened therein, that would never have presented themselves, had not his will been constantly stimulating his thoughts. The result of almost every day was, to him, an illustration of his favorite adage—where there is a will there is a way. He knew that the will was creative, and made to itself the means for gaining its ends. It was the consciousness of this that gave him courage to hope even in the hour of deepest darkness.

Some time had elapsed since he was thrown out of regular employment, and even he had been made to fear often amid his hard struggles. At length, try as he would, he could find nothing to do.

One morning, after having been idle for a week, he found himself with only a single dollar left, and no kind of prospect in regard to work. For the first time he could not relish his food. For the first time his confidence forsook him, and, instead of cheerful words for the ear of his wife, he was silent, depressed and thoughtful. To see her husband, always before, in every trying situation, so assured and cheerful, thus distressed about their prospects, at once dashed the spirit of Lucy to the earth. When she did venture to speak in her husband's presence, her voice was tremulous,—when she looked him in the face, he could see that her eyes were just ready to run over with tears. He could not bear this. It caused him the most poignant affliction of mind. Early after the scarcely-tasted morning meal, he went out with a kind of desperate determination to get something to do at all hazzards.

"There is, there must be work for him that is willing to do it, somewhere," he said, half aloud, as he strode away from his door.

He had not gone far when he met his old fellow workman, Wilson. The latter looked quite contented. Since his last job, he had made a few feeble efforts to get something to do, but, failing of success, was now contented to eat his bread quietly, and wait patiently until times grew better. The statement from every one he met, that business was worse than ever, and that it was no use to look for work, satisfied his mind.

"Ah, good morning, Harker," he said, with some thing of triumph in his voice—"even your will can't always find a way, it seems. So you are idle still?"

"Yes. I have not been able to get any thing to do for a week."

"And won't for a week to come—perhaps a year."

"I'll get something to do before this day is over," was the half-desperate reply.

"At street sweeping, then."

"Very well. Let it be street sweeping, or any other honest calling that I can find. Work I must and will have."

"I want work as much as any one, but I am not quite prepared for street sweeping, sawing wood, or turning carman."

"If you had a wife and three or four children to call for, you might be thankful for the chance of turning a penny in either of the occupations you have named."

"But I hav'nt, thank fortune!"

"I have, then; and I am willing to work at any honest calling."

By this time the friends, who had been walking down Washington street, had nearly reached the Battery. Harker paused at a corner of a street, and said he was going to cross to the other side of Broadway, and look about among the stores in Pearl and other business streets, to see if he couldn't get work as a laborer, or a light porter.

"You are not in earnest, surely?" Wilson said. "A laborer, or porter!"

"I am in earnest," Harker replied. "Why not? Will it not be much better for me to work in a warehouse, or carry small parcels, or do the errands in a store, than to sit down, or walk idly about, while my family is suffering? I think so."

"Come, walk down upon the Battery with me, at any rate. Perhaps something will offer there. Who knows but that you may find small boating worth the trial. There are one American and two foreign ships of war lying off in the stream."

This was said lightly, but it made the heart of James Harker bound. The suggestion, he saw, at a glance was a good one. He did not hesitate a moment, but walked with a quickened pace to the Battery, and down towards Castle Garden. Several small boats were there, in each of which was an active oarsman.

"What will you charge to take me off to the Constellation?" a man with a lady on his arm, asked of a boatman, just as Harker and his friend came up.

"Two shillings a piece to go, and the same to return," was the reply.

"That is a dollar to take us there and back again?"

"Yes, sir."

The gentleman and lady entered the boat and were rowed off.

"Just the thing!" ejaculated Harker, as the boat bounded away. "Thank you a hundred times for your suggestion, Wilson."

"But you are not in earnest?"

"I am." His brightening face spoke more unequivocally than his words.

"Nonsense! But where will you get a boat?"

"Hire one."

"You can't."

"I can try. And where there's a will, there's a way." And so saying, Harker turned away, and took a direct course to the lower end of the Battery, where he soon succeeded in getting a boat from a man with whom he was acquainted. In this he rowed around to Castle Garden. Wilson, curious to see where all this would end, had remained standing by the railing of the Battery. He could hardly believe his own eyes, when he saw Harker come rowing, close under where he stood, and ask, jocosely, if he did not wish to go out to the Constellation. But a word or two had passed between them, when half a dozen men came up and asked if he would take them out to a French brig that lay off in the harbor, and return with them in an hour. A bargain was at once made with them, they agreed to pay him two dollars for the job, or a little over two shillings apiece.

"Where there's a will there's a way, Wilson," Harker cried out to his friend, in a confident voice, as he pulled off with his freight from the shore.

"I wouldn't do that for any one," muttered Wilson, in a dissatisfied tone, as he turned away and left the Battery.

At dinner time, Harker did not come home. A frugal meal had been prepared by his wife at the regular hour, but he did not return as usual. This made her feel uneasy. She could not remember when he had been away so long before. All the afternoon she waited for him, expecting him to come in every minute, but she waited in vain. Many thoughts troubled her. She had permitted herself to become gloomy and desponding while she had her husband to depend upon. Suppose some accident should have happened to him! Suppose he were dead!

This thought startled her so that she rose up from the chair she had drawn close to the window, in order to see her work more distinctly in the deepening twilight. At this moment the door opened, and her husband entered.

"O, James! where have you been all day?" she asked, eagerly.

"Hard at work, Lucy, and here are my nett gains," holding out in his hand seven hard dollars. "I hired a boat for a dollar, and have made eight dollars by rowing people out to the ships of war in the harbor. I've been hard at work all day, and now feel as happy as a young kitten, and as hungry as a bear."

Six months from that day, Harker, who continued "small boating," owned three boats, one of which he daily plied himself between the shore and the shipping, and the others he hired out. He had three hundred dollars in the Savings' Bank, and was as happy, to use his own words, as the day was long. As for Wilson, he walked about for nearly the whole of that time, doing nothing to benefit others, and living a burden to himself. Harker had several times tried to induce him to take a boat and try his luck, but the proposition always made him half angry. To his false pride there was something degrading in the occupation. He did not reflect, that idleness, or dependence upon others, was more really degrading than any occupation that was strictly honest. He had not studied to a good purpose that noble couplet of Pope's:—

"Honor and shame from no condition rise, Act well your part—there all the honor lies."

Instead of looking at his duty—instead of only asking "Is this right?"—he let himself be governed by what he supposed people would think or say of him. Alas! that there should be so many in the world like Wilson. Men, from whose intelligence, and professed independence of character, more, much more ought to be expected.

When trade again revived, James Harker sold off his boats, took his money out of the Savings' Bank, and set up for himself. He is now doing a good business; lives in a large, comfortable house, and, it is hardly necessary to say, is esteemed and respected by all who know him. Six years have passed since he and Wilson parted on the Battery—one to row a party of men to a ship lying in the harbor, and the other to saunter listlessly about the streets. Harker is worth some ten thousand dollars, and Wilson is one of his journeymen.

THE PET OF THE FORECASTLE.

BY E. F. WELD.

The tale I lay before you is no romance—the facts having actually occurred some ten years since, on board of a Boston Indiaman. I was then young to the life of a sailor, and each scene at that time witnessed is easier brought to mind than the occurrence of "the last voyage." Never, in the eyes of her crew, was there a craft that could compete with her, though so rapid and many have been the improvements since, that, in sober truth, could she be placed side by side with a ship of the present day, our opinions would be overruled. Of her master, never better man broke bread or trod shoe leather; one of the old school, he was both sailor and gentleman; neither were her officers wanting in those qualities which endeared them to those under their command—and there were sterling old tars in her forecastle, who, in the very sense of the word, belonged to her; voyage after voyage, found them still in the same ship, at the same station, growling, sailor-like, for the same imagined cause, and denouncing in round terms some fixture, which, for half a dozen years, they daily had pronounced worthy a situation in tophet. Don't imagine these warm wishes resulted in any ill feeling; 'twas but a sailor's characteristic—for did the new comer dare to look ugly at what they condemned, the old salts would raise a breeze directly. Well manned, beside her compliment were to be found the carpenter and sail-maker, whom Jack rated together with cook and steward, as petty officers, that always gave rise to a discussion never as yet settled, which party, white or black, should be considered in the ascendant. In those days, and in that trade, there were articles to be found in the inventory, and considered as an essential part of the materials, now seldom carried by the Merchantman. These were big guns and small arms, boarding pikes and nettings, arm chests in the tops; and in short, on a small scale, the "tout ensemble" of the man-of-war.

Every Saturday, the weather permitting, we went through a species of manual exercise, working our guns, repelling boarders, extinguishing fires, slinging yards, ducking "chips," as he, in the mock combat, was lowered over the side to plug a shot hole, and doing up a nautical engagement surpassing any one of Cooper's. Guns again run in and secured, rammers and sponges becketed, the shot laid in the rack, and all things arranged, then followed an early supper; and, then, for a time, discipline was waived, and fun and frolic ruled the hour. The Saturday night of other days at sea—ay! where is the sailor who can look back on his past life, and not wish for an hour's enjoyment, or the seeming happiness of that short time devoted weekly to sweethearts and wives; the grog and the toast; home and friends recalled; the pledge to the absent wife, or dearly loved girl; the old song sung upon the occasion, the chorus of which all hands joined in, till space rang again.

"But the standing toast, which pleased the most,
Was the wind that blows, the ship that goes,
And the lass that would wed with a sailor."

The premonitory squeak of the fiddle banished sentiment, and the lively strains of some hornpipe, put music into our very heels, as we shuffled, broke down, and changed in our "fore and afters." When the ship's bell proclaimed eight o'clock, the fiddler come up with his screws, the dancer laid by his pumps, and every man returned to his place and duty without a word.

Our happy routine, like all earthly enjoyments, was at times interrupted. One Saturday, while repelling boarders, a mere lad, a son of the Captain, in the melee fell overboard. We were going some six knots. As quick as thought, another boy, the pet of the forecastle, threw himself into the sea to save him.

The father did not forget he was master of a ship, and with the coolness of a hero he hove her too, and pursued the usual steps. His example inspired others, and both lads were soon safe again, and the pet of the forecastle had his ears boxed by the skipper, whose son's life he had saved, for cursing the luck because he had wet his tobacco. Cuffed as the pet was, it was evident that his bravery was appreciated, and this step raised him in the estimation of all. There was less of noise, more of grog, and as much enjoyment that evening as on any one previous.

Months had passed—the "pet's" popularity still continued, and from being rated a boy, he was now classed "ordinary seaman." More, he was appointed captain of a gun, the crew of which rejoiced in the sobriquet of the "awkward squad." Where is there an instance of the rise of any one, unattended by the creation of enemies? Our "pet" found one in the cook, who was the awkwardest of the awkward, and reproof from the young gunner, to him was doubly harsh.

We were now upon our return home. The fair weather face of the Captain had become stern and forbidding; the mandates of the officers were issued in tones harsh and petulant; while the crew, catching the contagion, obeyed because they had to. A Saturday night had passed without the usual jollity, and the former aspect of [illegible] changed. [illegible] fair

Prior to this, all hands had been summoned upon the quarter-deck, and in brief terms told that a theft had been committed. The supercargo's state-room had been entered, and the pockets of a pair of pantaloons rifled of a small sum in gold. The steward and his premises had been searched, and nothing discovered to confirm suspicion. As the steerage communicated with the cabin, and as all indiscriminately had free ingress and egress to the former place, all were liable to suspicion, and each must consent to the searching of his chest and clothing. All were indignant at the suspicion, and eagerly demanded the search. The "pet" was at the helm when the search was instituted, and as each individual "kit" was overhauled, without affording a clue to the theft or robber, the faces of officers and men brightened. Imagine the feelings of all, when, in the chest of the favorite, wrapped in a colored rag, was found the lost gold.

If ever men seemed prone to doubt their senses, here was an instance. Nothing short of proof like this could have raised a suspicion even as to the honesty of him, who now, in the minds of all, stood convicted. Poor lad—unconscious of the deed he was in a certain measure found guilty of, as he pursued his task his mind was freer from care than any of his companions. He was ordered to relinquish the helm to the hand of another, and arraigned upon the quarter-deck, in presence of all on board, accused of theft; and the light-hearted and happy boy of the moment previous, was now ordered to solitary confinement in the sail-room abaft, and judged guilty to await punishment. He protested his innocence with sobs and tears, but there was nothing he could advance to refute the testimony against him. The flushed cheek and confused manner arising from shame, were imputed to guilt; and the only kind word addressed him by his judges, was the promise of a mitigation of punishment if he would confess his guilt. His response of innocence was unbelieved, and considered as one hardened in sin, he was hurried below.

Heavy at heart were the worthy foremast hands, but there was one still heavier; the pallid cheek and settled frown of the master, together with his hurried walk, told of the feelings of the inner man.

Two or three days had elapsed, and still the crew had been spared witnessing the degrading punishment they felt it would be the lot of the lad to receive; and hopes were arising in the bosoms of most that they would be spared the sight of the application of the lash,—and that confinement and a civil process at the end of the voyage would be allowed to supersede the barbarous custom.

But these hopes were dissipated by their being addressed by the Captain, to the effect that "he even had entertained a delusive feeling that something might occur, or some hidden fact be brought to light to weaken the proof against the boy. Never, since I have been master of a vessel, have I been placed in such a trying situation;—were he a son of mine, my feelings could not be more poignant. We will wait longer yet with the same hopes, but if at the end of this week no new light is gained, were he ten times my son he must be flogged!"

The dreaded day came, and as the men turned their dogged looks to the clear blue sky, it seemed as though they would rebuke nature for wearing an aspect so illy according with their feelings. Silently and sadly lengthened did the hours drag. 'Twas now late in the afternoon when the suppressed voice of the mate summoned all hands to witness the punishment. As they assembled, they wore more the look of culprits than many bona fide criminals could assume. The rough manner and hardy bearing of the sailor had become lost in the ascendancy of their finer feelings as men. Men, apparently callous to grief, who would have suffered the amputation of a limb without a groan, or looked death on a lea-shore in the face without a shudder, forgot they ever assumed the bearing of the stoic and were congregated in tears.

"I could have sewed that lad up in his hammock, ay, or tipped the plank that launched his corpse to Davy without blubbering; but as to this here, I say, shiver the man that can see it with a dry eye."

All felt with the speaker, and the example of an older man gave a free license to tears, to which the bronzed faces of the mass were unwonted. Unresisting stood, or rather was supported, the boy, his extended arms secured by siezings to the shrouds, his weakened frame, swollen eye, pallid cheek, and throbbing breast, told of his sufferings, past and present. A word or look only, and he would be levelled with the degraded brute.

"Say that you are guilty," exclaimed the master, "and the lash shall not touch your back! Own it, and you shall be forgiven!"

"I cannot. Before God and man I am innocent!"

"The Captain turned his head, and buried his face in his handkerchief. At his feet was his son, grasping his knees, and exclaiming, "Oh, father, believe him, forgive him, he is innocent! indeed he is!"

"Take away this boy!—take him below,—he may be spared what it is my duty to witness."

The cook stepped forward to execute his bidding. The boy refused to loosen his grasp; and while the cook was struggling in vain endeavors to remove him, he was suddenly siezed by the captain and thrown to the deck, with a stunning violence.

"Sieze this black villain! Sieze him, I say!" as with the countenance of a madman he regarded the prostrate negro. Ere other hands could execute his bidding, the cook writhed beneath his muscular grasp. "Wretch, I have caught you at last!—don't appeal for mercy—don't dare to turn a suppliant look! I knew it! I felt confident of it," and shouting, "cut down the boy!" he fell fainting into the arms of the men.

'Twas, however, but a momentary weakness; recovering, he called for the boy, and, embracing him, said—

"But a moment ago, I declared were you my son I must do what I conceived my duty. I now say before all, forgive my unjust suspicions, and I will be a father to you indeed. 'Twas the hand of Providence, that intervened to save the boy. You see this rag, men; it is what the gold was found wrapped in. It was to see who had a shirt like it that I caused the second search to be made; not even a similar shred was to be found. But now, my eyes detected a patch on the cook's clothing to correspond. He is the thief!—I give him up to you to punish. No appeal shall cause my interference for mercy, only do not forget, villain as he is, that he has a claim to humanity."

On the spur of the moment three hearty cheers were given for the captain, and three more for the boy. The master withdrew below, the negro was dragged forward, after confessing his crime, and summary proceedings instituted against him. A running bowline was clapped round his neck, the rope rove through a hole in the windlass end, and the united strength of a few men brought his breast in contact with it. Cobbing was decided upon, and custom has made this place the whipping post. The height of the windlass being three feet, a person "brought to," assumes the position of a bow, a handsaw takes the place of the lash, the flat being used. This degrading punishment is now nearly obsolete, and never resorted to, save for some appalling crime. All hands unite in the flagellation, a blow or two being dealt by each person in turn, according to the amount to be received.

All preparations complete, there was an adjournment, on the part of the men, to the forecastle to decide as to the number of blows to be administered. Long was their consultation. The captain, now cool, repented of the power he had put in the men's hands, and wished the ceremony, painful in its mildest sense, through with. His solitude was broken by the presence of the oldest tar in the ship, who stood, hat in hand, in the cabin door.

"Well, Jack, what is it?"

"Well, you see, sir, the boy is begging hard for the cook; and you know, sir, we never had a hand licked in your ship,—and seeing he's such a thundering rascal, we want to know if 'twouldn't be better to put the nigger in irons and give him up to the lawyer land-sharks at the end of the voyage."

"Upon my word, Jack, the best plan in the world."

Let it suffice to say that the cook met with his deserts and the boy with his reward; the latter now commands one of the finest ships out of a neighboring city. With him sails a superannuated tar, who takes great liberties, and who boasts of sailing with him ever since he was the "pet of the forecastle."

WASHINGTON'S SWORD

AT THE CAPITOL.

BY MISS H. F. GOULD.

The Sword worn by General Washington during the Revolutionary War, was, at the request of his representatives, recently presented to Congress. It is substantial, but of the plainest workmanship—its embellishments of pure and simple beauty, consisting alone in the name, WASHINGTON, inscribed on the blade.

Behold, there cometh to the Capitol
A mighty speaker, such as ne'er before
Entered, commanding, of the Congress hall,
With eloquence sublime, to take the floor!

Peace! party strife—be still, each warring word;
Let self and discord from the scene depart!
Sons of Columbia, 'tis your father's sword,
Pointing a precept high to every heart.

See, on its blade his hallowed name it bears,
Whence must a glory radiant like the sun,
Shine forth to all who should, as rightful heirs,
Share the dear heritage his valour won.

Look on it, all! the moving sight shall be True as a touchstone, proving every breast—
Which of a spirit worthy to be free,
Or to be subject, only is possessed.

For, the cold soul by selfish purposes swayed,
Wrapped in a cloak to hide an under aim,
Must feel no reverence for this peerless blade—
Can see no lustre in the Patriot's name.

Rome's keenest sword spake not with power like this;
When Cæsar's eye fell quenched beneath its lid!
Who'd here betray his country with a kiss?
Sooner go perish as Iscariot did!

Who here would sell his birthright at the price
Blind Isaac's hairy son caused his to bring;
Or to the deed some hungry slave entice?
Each may have food where fed Chaldea's king.

And, who's offended by my descant free,
Made o'er this relic stainless and unique?
"If any, speak," and let the witness be
Shame's honest blush on every patriot cheek.

Once, in the cause of Liberty unsheathed,
High gleamed this arm, a terror to her foes;
Now doth it come, with bay and olive wreathed,
'Home to her Temple, for a long repose.

'Twas her good angel in a form of clay,
Who held it fast, with pure, unerring hand,
And like a flaming sword turned every way,
Round her young tree just planted in our land.

Then, when he saw the roots were firm and deep—
Saw the dove nestled 'mid the spicy bloom,
Yonder he left his sacred dust to sleep,
Where old Potomac sings beside his tomb.

While the blue waters, passing, bless the scene,
Bright'ning the banks' soft verdure as they flow,
Doth calm Mount Vernon, with its cypress green,
Earth's richest, proudest mausoleum show.

There doth our chieftain on his laurels rest;
Where no vain offerings to his worth appear.
Nature has clasped to her maternal breast
Him to whom Art no monument could rear.

Ye who, a priesthood to this temple come,
Guard well the ark from every touch profane!
Where Right and Freedom claim a father-home,
Let not the federal scutcheon take a stain.

With you, in image, stands our WASHINGTON
In marble beauty, while his dust is near;
Ye have his counsel, and the rights he won;
See that his virtue be not wanting here!

Arm of my country, if a private thought
O'er thee be nascent, or a tear betrayed,
'Tis that my father's sword by thee was taught—
His oracle, thy wearer, long obeyed.

Go to thy glorious rest! the true, the brave
To theirs are gone, who knew thee in the strife;
Rest with the archives of a land that gave
The world a WASHINGTON—our nation life.

The Daughters of La Roche.

A Story of the Affections.

BY ROBERT MORRIS.

Author of 'The Angel and the Demon,' 'The Hasty Marriage,' &c.

"They grew in beauty side by side."

Who that has attended the death-bed of the loved and cherished, can ever forget its touching and painful scenes? The sands of life passing rapidly away—the pulse becoming feebler and fainter—the voice lower and weaker—the light fading from the glassy and spiritual eyes—the mingled expression of love, hope and agony, resting upon the thin, pale features. And, when at last the lamp goes out—the hands fall cold upon the motionless bosom—the limbs become rigid, and the spirit wings its flight to another world, who can forget the heart-screams of the doating mourners—the grief long suppressed, but now bursting forth as a torrent—the tears, the cries, and the exclamations, half in love and half in madness!

I once was present at the death-bed of a mother—a true and martyr-like woman—who had hurried herself to a premature grave, in an effort to provide for the comforts of two young and lovely daughters;—and were I to live a thousand years, the memory of that hour would still linger vividly in my mind. She died, too, in the full faith of a blessed hereafter—conscious of the purity of her life, and cherishing, as t jewels of the soul, the sublime truths of the Christ religion. But her daughters—her young and unprotected daughters! She left them to the tender mercies of a hollow world, and thus, with the unabated fondness of a mother's heart, fixed her straining look upon their sad but beauteous features, even after the soul parted from the body, and the faith of a brest religion brightened the pathway to a clime of

They had never known any [illegible] care, for he had been taken from them in proper [illegible] childhood, before they were capable of the [illegible] his value. Their mother had been the [illegible] to them; she had watched them in their [illegible] ness—had prayed for them, and [illegible] pointed out the paths of danger in the [illegible] had indulged them beyond her means—he [illegible] herself of many a luxury, ay, many [illegible] order to administer to their comfort [illegible] ment—and now, as they looked upon [illegible] form, cold and still in the icy embrace [illegible] God, how wretched and lonely see [illegible] tion! In vain their few friends end [illegible] their sorrow—to soften the anguish [illegible] Tears, and tears alone, seemed to [illegible] and they wept in very bitterness [illegible]

Mrs La Roche was a French [illegible] with her husband and her young [illegible] this country during the troubles [illegible] revolution.

Compelled to abandon his nati [illegible] hours' notice, the father was [illegible]

small sum of money to assist his family in the country of their exile. He survived his arrival in the United States only two years—merely long enough to acquire a knowledge of the English language, and, with his lady, to attempt the establishment of a school of instruction in the French. The daughters were, at this time, too young to assist, but the mother, though utterly unused to a life of toil, saw and appreciated her position, and roused all her energies to the undertaking. She continued the school, and with partial success, after the decease of her husband. Compelled to economize in every possible way, she looked forward to the period when her children would be able to assist her, and thus her task would be greatly lightened. Increasing, as they hourly did, in beauty and intelligence, and manifesting, in every possible way, their appreciation of her love, and her untiring exertions spent in their behalf, her heart warmed toward them with every breath which they drew, and she would freely have laid down her life to ensure their welfare. But what will not a mother do for the beings of her affection? What will she not sacrifice—what trials and sufferings will she not submit to? Well and touchingly was it remarked by a Venetian lady, with regard to Abraham and Isaac, that "God would never have commanded such a sacrifice of a mother."

Mrs. La Roche had thus, with difficulty, but still in a spirit of great cheerfulness, conducted her little school for four years after the decease of her husband. But her health now began to fail. She had overtasked her powers. Her constitution, which was naturally feeble, gave way. Still she struggled on, in the most heroic manner. "A few years longer," she flattered herself, "and I may abate my labors. Then my children will be able greatly to assist me, if not wholly to take my place." She saw them ripening in beauty—and the natural dream of a mother's heart raised up suitors in abundance. So lovely—so correct—so imbued with the pure principles of religion—so accomplished! The heart of the widow rejoiced in the anticipated triumph of her offspring. Alas! even then the seeds of death were doing their work, stealthily and in silence. A little longer, and the body refused to administer to the wishes of the mind. Mrs. La Roche was prostrated on her death-bed, and her children, as already described, were orphans, in the fullest and most painful sense of the term.

Amy La Roche, the younger sister, at the period of which we write, was thirteen; Clotilde, the elder, was sixteen years of age. A lovelier pair never mingled their tears together by the cold corpse of a parent. Taught to regard her as the soul and centre of their social world—as the being to whom they must look for counsel and advice next to the Almighty—they clung to each other in their desolation, each striving to soothe the other, and each unconsciously adding to the poignancy of the other's grief. Clotilde wept wildly, but the sorrow of the younger seemed more heart-felt. The one was all feeling and impulse, and her agony of grief was relieved, in some measure, by the violence of the paroxysms—the fury of her despair. The younger was naturally of a thoughtful and melancholy nature, and her mild, blue eyes seemed to mirror, in their gentle lustre, the very depths of her soul. She was too young, moreover, to have a thought of fondness for another being on the earth beyond her mother. No other passion of her nature had been called even into fancied existence, and thus the poor girl pined, day by day, until she became thin and pale, and the elder found it necessary to conceal her own sorrow, in order to bring back the spirit of girlhood and joy to the fair features of her dearest Amy.

Throughout the crisis of their bereavement, they were visited assiduously and constantly but by one individual. Pierre Martien, or neighbor Pierre, as they called him, was intimate with their father in the more prosperous portion of his life, and had, like him, sought this country as a place of refuge during the perils of the revolution—perils which destroyed his family, and left him lone and wretched. He had, nevertheless, accumulated a considerable fortune in the United States, and, at the period of the widow's decease, was on the eve of returning to France.—Touched, however, by the sad condition of the sisters, he delayed his departure, and called day after day in the noble duty of watching over two fair beings, so entirely helpless and unprotected, and of administering every comfort and assistance in his power. This faithful friend was now in his sixtieth year—still, manly and gentlemanly in his appearance, and exhibiting but little of the weakness or infirmity of age. Week after week he postponed the day of his leave-taking, and yet he steadily persisted in his determination to return, at the same time condoling with the orphans, assisting them as delicately as possible, and hinting a fear that his departure would expose them to annoyance and misfortune. Clotilde saw and admitted all this, but what could she do? She still continued to keep up the little school, which her mother had bequeathed to her as an inheritance, but her inexperience and youth unfitted her, in a great measure, to exercise sufficient authority over the pupils, and thus, while she found them constantly diminishing in number, she discovered, with horror, that the health of her young sister was rapidly sinking. The color was fading from her cheeks—the bright light from her eyes.—Her existence seemed to have lost its spring and fountain on the decease of Mrs. La Roche, and, although the sweet girl struggled earnestly to assume a degree of cheerfulness and an air of satisfaction, she could not conceal from the penetrating eyes of Clotilde that there was a canker within.

Neighbor Pierre, also, noticed the change, and his heart melted within him at this new source of anxiety and distress. He sent for and consulted one of the ablest physicians of the city—for his nature warmed strangely and unconsciously toward the orphans, since he had visited them so frequently—and he was told that a change of air would alone save the life of the fading beauty. He pondered long upon this painful intelligence; at first unwilling to communicate it to the elder sister, for he knew that it would strike like an arrow through her soul. What could be done?—what was his duty under the circumstances? He pressed his hand upon his forehead, and mused painfully for hours. A thought darted to his brain. But no—he repelled it as unworthy—as unmanly—as treacherous to the friendship he had felt and professed for the dead father of the sisters. And yet it returned again, and grew stronger and stronger, until he had no power to resist its influence.

Accuse him not harshly, gentle reader—pronounce not against him rashly. He was alone in the world, and they were without friends and protectors. He was compelled by circumstances to revisit France, and yet he felt a voice within him assert that he had a duty to perform to the children of his deceased countryman. How could he best perform that duty? To subject two young, inexperienced and beautiful girls to the snares of the vicious and the reckless—to desert them in the hour of greatest need—to abandon them to the charities of a cold world—or worse, to the accursed arts of the profligate and libertine—the thought was full of anguish. Again he paused. He ascended to his chamber, and there, kneeling in prayer, he sought advice and counsel from the Searcher of all hearts. He rose from his knees refreshed in spirit, and comparatively calm and resolved. The next hour found him at the dwelling of the sisters. The younger was evidently weaker than on the day before, while the countenance of Clotilde wore a still more melancholy aspect. For a long time the visiter hesitated. He looked steadily into the beautiful features of Clotilde, where all was yet life, and hope, and youthful splendor, only mellowed and spiritualized by the tender anxiety of a sacred love, and his heart again misgave him. But he rallied his courage and drew her aside. He announced to her, in as kindly terms as possible, the opinion of the physician; and, as he saw the big tear start to her eyes at the consciousness of her inability to accompany Amy to a milder climate—softer and sunnier skies—he took her hand, and offered to become her husband. "Then," he added, "dear Clotilde, I will obtain a right to protect you. Then may we immediately sail for France, and, with the blessing of Heaven, a hope may be indulged of the restoration of our lovely Amy." He alluded to his disparity of years, and his reluctance to venture such a proposition—but he implored her, no matter what her determination, to judge his motives generously. As he lived, and had faith in the Divinity, he believed that he was influenced purely, justly and virtuously.

Clotilde covered her face with her hands. She had unbounded confidence in the principles of her father's friend—for he had ever conducted himself with the most scrupulous delicacy. She saw, too, the position of her sister, and she felt that the life of that sweet and affectionate girl was as dear to her as her own; and yet she knew not what to do or say. One only thought—one only dream, interfered with the course she believed to be dictated by duty. The path of her young life, chequered and darkened as it had been, had not been all shadow. A momentary rainbow had flashed its glories above. A youthful form sometimes mingled with her dreams. A voice, deeper and sweeter than those of the every-day world, sometimes rose to her memory, and whispered to the listening spirit of her soul. She was now nineteen years of age—a full and perfect woman—and how seldom is it in our land that the fair and the beautiful, the enthusiastic and the warm-hearted, pass through so many summers without discovering some being in the crowd purer and holier than the rest—some kindred spirit—some sympathetic soul! A look—a word—a pressure of the hand, will sometimes give tone to the story of a life.

Clotilde La Roche and Arthur Morville had met when "Life seemed bathed in Hope's romantic hues."

She was but seventeen, and he twenty-two. But a few months passed, and the ocean divided them. He was the son of a bankrupt merchant, utterly penniless and prospectless, and thus, when an opportunity presented of a voyage to China, as the agent of an extensive commercial house, he was compelled by the force of circumstances to embrace it, even at the risk of an absence of five years. Thus they parted. "He never told his love" in words, but the heart must be cold and insensible, that requires such formal interpretation. The spirit of Clotilde wandered with, and lingered around him. Her name was mingled with his prayers, and her image haunted his sleep—the brightest, sunniest angel of his dreams. And he was not forgotten. She did not strive to forget, and if the effort had been made, it would have been a vain one.

Two years had now gone by, and Arthur was yet abroad. Foolish and timid as they were, no correspondence had been agreed upon, and he, unconscious of the interest he had excited, was afraid to write. He was poor—little better than a beggar—when he left his kindred and his home. He had no claim upon one so beautiful and lovely, and the pen was dashed to the earth in despair whenever he ventured a letter.

But the offer of Pierre Martien! It revived the early dream in the bosom of Clotilde fully and vividly. Yet her sister was dying! She saw her fading every hour. The delay of a single week might prove fatal. God of the orphan, advise and counsel her in this her hour of trial!

She sent for the friend of her father and told him all. If he would take her for his wife under these circumstances, she would freely accord her consent. Nay, she believed his motives to be generous and noble, and she honored him therefor.

More touched than ever—seeing the evident sacrifice she was about to make as a tribute to duty and her love for her sister, the old man hesitated. Again he meditated upon the subject, questioned his own heart closely, and endeavored to penetrate his motives.

It was finally agreed that they should immediately sail for France—that the engagement should be announced before their departure—and the marriage should take place immediately after their arrival.

But why prolong the story? The God of the orphan watched over and protected the sweet sisters.—The voyage was pleasant beyond their most sanguine expectations. Amy gained health and strength with every favoring breeze, and when they landed at Havre, her eyes again sparkled with the fire of youth and joy, and her cheeks glowed with the hues of beauty. Clotilde, too, seemed more lovely than ever, the sea-air had greatly improved her. Her spirits mounted—her soul again rejoiced—and even the apprehension which occasionally crept into her breast, in connection with the coming marriage, gave her less anxiety than she could have believed a few weeks before.

They landed on a bright Spring morning. The arrival of a foreign ship had collected a group around the place of debarkation. Among them were several Americans—they could have been singled out in a world of foreigners. And see! whose form is that pressing forward so eagerly? It is—it is—much changed—but not enough to escape the quick eyes of youth and the mind or love-fraught memory. Yes, Arthur Morville rushes forward—the wanderer from the far East! What a meeting! How joyous—how unexpected! Even the presence of strangers is forgotten. Eyes sparkle—cheeks glow—breasts heave—and hearts respond. The old man looks on, first in surprise, and then with a quiet and benevolent smile, mellowing his features, advancing to Clotilde, he whispers, "Be not ashamed—your joy is my joy—and all will yet be well."

* * * * *

A few weeks thereafter, and Clotilde La Roche became the wife of Arthur Morville. Pierre Martien gave the bride away, at the same time publicly recognizing the young couple and their beautiful Amy as his adopted children!

Heaven, say we, soften the pillow and hallow the dreams of the friends of the fatherless.

JOSEPHINE LOPIERE;
OR, THE DUEL.

BY W. J. JACKSON.

What is honour? A word. What is that word, honour? Air. A trim reckoning! Who hath it? He that died o' Wednesday. Doth he feel it? No. Doth he hear it? No. Is it insensible then? Yes, to the dead. But will it not live with the living? No. Why? Detraction will not suffer it;—therefore I'll none of it: Honour is a mere scutcheon, and so ends my catechism. [SHAKSPEARE.

Early friendship, when uninfluenced by any selfish motive, when it is the spontaneous production of a kind and generous heart, and is of spotless purity, how beautiful, how divine! Possessing, with all the warmth and sincerity of affection, the artlessness and innocence of budding youth.

Of such a nature was the friendship that existed between William Norwald and James Manford; they were bound together by its gentle bonds in closest union and love. Both were in the same class at school, and studied together the same tasks. They would mingle and be friendly with the other schoolboys, and take part in their games and amusements, but at their conclusion, would again join together with emotions of the most ardent affection. They would delight to roam far away from their schoolmates—and with nature's fairest scenes around them, to inspire them with pure and ennobling emotions, would paint brightest pictures of future joy and happiness. Now gazing upon the beautiful sky, without a cloud or speck upon its clear bright surface—fair emblem of their own innocence, and of their tranquil and unruffled minds; or observing the plants and lovely flowers of every varied hue, sending forth their refreshing perfume on the light wing of the gentle breeze; and now listening with gladdened ear, to the birds pouring forth their many different songs, making the woods and forests resound with their enlivening strains of melody, and almost charming the very breeze to attentive silence. Amid such lovely scenes, each would tell his dream of hope, and the bright prospects which fancy beheld in the dark and unknown future. Deceiving themselves with visions of halcyon happiness and delightful promise, which too soon the world and its stern reality would inform them, were idle chimeras of the buoyant and excited mind of youth.

Rapidly passed away their school-boy days, in innocence and joy. Oh! who does not love to wander back to his sunny childhood? How sweet, and yet how sad to linger among their remembrances, enjoying the various emotions which those recollections excite! Happy days, when we could indulge in the delusive dreams of fancy undisturbed, and know not of the angry storms which were raging without, in the busy and too unfeeling world, or of the dark disasters which a mysterious fate may have in store for us. We deemed the desires of the heart easily attained, requiring us merely to put forth our hands and seize hold of them. In our journey through this world, where ills and sorrows come crowding on our path at every step, it refreshes the soul and cheers the heart to recall those golden days of innocent delight.

At length the joyous school-boy days were terminated, and the happy friends were compelled to separate; each choosing a different pursuit on the world's wide stage.

James was placed in the army, and William concluded to try his fortunes on the perilous wave.

Deep was the anguish of their bosoms at parting, but cheering Hope stood by with lovely countenance, and honied words of consolation and joy, drying their tears, hushing their anguish, and pointing out to their admiring gaze smiling prospects of fortune and honour.

* * * * *

Years had passed away, leaving behind their painful and pleasing remembrances. James Manford had seen considerable service, and had been promoted to the rank of a Captain in the army. It was almost ten years since he had heard of his early companion and school-mate, who at that time had sailed as first officer on board of a vessel bound for Canton.—The vessel was never heard of after leaving port, and it was generally supposed that she was lost, and that all on board perished.

James had become acquainted with Josephine Lopiere, a most accomplished young lady, and it was reported that she was heiress of much wealth.—She was also exceedingly pretty, her dark blue eyes beaming with beauty, and wearing a most beguiling and bewitching expression, with a delicately formed mouth of tempting appearance, which could put on at pleasure a smile of most winning sweetness; too exceedingly dangerous weapons when possessed by one skilled in their use, to carry confusion and conquest to the heart that her mind might wish to subdue.

James had experienced the magic influence of her smile, and his proud heart was compelled to acknowledge Josephine its conqueror.

What a strange power lies in the smile of woman! How subduing, and yet how full of encouragement is the bright glance of beauty! As the sun's bright beams dries up the foul vapors of the earth, and dispels the mist and fog which hides the bright heavens rom our view, so the guileless smile of woman quiets the wild passions of man's nature, and dissipates the gloomy clouds of sadness which heavily oppress his mind.

A grand ball was to be given in Philadelphia, and James had obtained Josephine's assent to be present at it with him.

The evening arrived, and Josephine looked more lovely than ever, her handsome figure and beautiful face appearing to the best possible advantage.—There was a gay and brilliant company assembled, and the scene was truly impressive and gorgeous, almost dazzling the eye to gaze upon it. Numerous were the sylph-like forms and bright beaming eyes present,—beauty was there in all its various diversity. But there were few that could compare in loveliness to Josephine Lopiere, who glided through the dance with all the ease and gentleness of a heaving wave.

There was a handsome young stranger present whose acquaintance was eagerly sought by the ladies. He was of fine form, and his face appeared much tanned by the sun, indicating that he had been a resident of some Southern clime. His eye was bright and his face pleasant and agreeable, his deportment and appearance such as could not fail to win the regard and admiration of the fair. He, however, appeared rather indifferent to all their attentions, and seemed most desirous of pleasing Josephine Lopiere, who also manifested her pleasure at his regard, and encouraged his addresses. She hesitated not to slight Manford, whose soul was on fire with feelings of jealousy of his successful rival.

James Manford was a handsome and agreeable man, with a graceful and commanding form, and easy and winning manners; but there seemed something peculiarly fascinating in the stranger's appearance. Josephine was gratified, perhaps, at an opportunity of showing her power, by securing the attentions of the man others were so anxious to become acquainted with. Vanity is too often joined with beauty, and was perhaps no small ingredient of her nature. She felt vain of his particular attention to her.

Manford looked on with a frowning brow and agitated mind, and as he saw the stranger taking all the freedom with Josephine of one well acqusinted, his heart seemed to rise in his throat, almost choking him with anger.

Josephine and the stranger were seated together—her delicate white hand pressed tightly by his—and she was now laughing merrily at a jest he had just perpetrated. The bugle sounded, inviting those who were to dance to take their places on the floor. The stranger had danced the three previous sets with Josephine, and she had promised Manford to dance this cotillion with him. Repressing with painful exertions the torturing emotions of his bosom, he left the company he had been with, and walked towards her, to request the fulfilment of her promise.

"Josephine," he said, in a somewhat smothered voice, "I believe you are engaged as my partner in this cotillion?"

The stranger, holding one of her hands in his, bowed rather stiffly—

"Sir, Miss Lopiere has signified her willingness to grant me the pleasure of being her partner in this dance, and you cannot suppose that she will retract her promise?"

"No, sir, I do not expect that she will retract her promise, the promise which she made previously to me, and which I hope, sir, if you are a gentleman, you will not interfere with."

"I believe, sir, that I have some claim to that title, and as a gentleman take a lady's word. Miss Lopiere said that she was not engaged for this set, and promised me this pleasure, which I feel no disposition to yield to another."

"I do not believe it, sir; you do not speak the truth, and I appeal to you, Josephine, did you not promise me previously?"

"Indeed, I have no distinct recollection of it, Mr. Manford, but yet it may have been so. I know that what has been told you is perfectly correct; I engaged this set with Mr. Lanardon."

"Now, sir, who has spoken the truth?" exclaimed the stranger, rather warmly. "I feel no inclination to parley or quarrel with you, sir, but I am willing elsewhere to give you any satisfaction you may desire, but remember at present the respect due a lady's presence, and which would be paid, by a gentleman, to one, who is in every way entitled to it. But come, Miss Lopiere, they are waiting for us;" and he led her to join the dancers.

"Contemptible slanderer, you shall answer for that," retorted Manford, as, in a fearful passion, he hastily walked towards the door of the ball-room.

"Why, Manford, how troubled you look,—you shouldn't mind being cut out, it's nothing at all, particularly when you get used to it," exclaimed Frank Anson, as Manford was hastily passing out of the room. He was also in the army, and a wild, hair-brained fellow, ever ready for fun and mischief, delighting in such a thing as a row or duel, as the very best of sport.

"Frank, I am glad to see you, will you do me a favor?"

"Anything in the world you may ask."

"Come along with me, then," and, conducting him to the Merchants' Hotel, he wrote a challenge.—"Here, deliver this to the person you saw dancing with Miss Lopiere; his name is Lanardon: of course, you have no objections to serve as my friend?"

"None whatever, Manford; I observed the fellow you mean, and let me assure you that I am really happy to have this opportunity of serving you. Let me see—five o'clock in the morning—back of Gloucester—no apology—&c., &c. That's the ticket, Manford, and if he does not draw out he is as good as dead mutton, and no mistake.

The challenge was delivered and accepted. The stranger having the choice of weapons, chose pistols, an unfortunate choice, for Manford was an excellent shot, unequalled in the handling of a pistol. He promised to be on the spot at the time designated.

He accompanied Josephine home from the ball.—She knew Manford was displeased, but, poor girl, she had no idea of the mischief she had done. Reclining upon her pillow, she reproved herself for having treated Manford so unkindly. Removed from the dazzling scenes of gayety and fashion, and from the strangely fascinating presence of the stranger, reason, resuming its proper sway, told her, with its self-convicting voice, that Manford had been deeply wronged by her improper conduct. She slept uneasily; the painful remembrance of all that had transpired during the evening would continually steal through her mind, disturbing its tranquil serenity.

Punctual to the moment all parties were on the ground selected for the settling of affairs according to the principles of honor. The morning was quite cold and not a spot of blue sky was visible. The ground was plentifully covered with snow which had fallen during the night. The spot which they had chosen was dreary and lonely, and appeared the very place for such "bloody business" as theirs. Occasionally the wind would disturb the silence as in gusts it swept by, seeming to sigh most mournfully. They had taken their stations, and stood gazing at each other in painful silence. The stranger appeared perfectly calm, yet on close observation one could perceive something like a shade of sadness overclouding his handsome and usually cheerful countenance.

He stood there compelled to be either a victim or an executioner, for the dreadful crime of having received the smiles and kind words of a a pretty woman and having reciprocated them. For that offence he must yield up all the delights and pleasures the world could afford, banish all thoughts of following those pursuits he loved, or of mingling again with those friends he so fondly cherished, and offer himself a sacrifice on the altar of honor. An altar like that of the heathen Deity, crimsoned with the blood of many innocent and brave, but strangely infatuated men. Or he must banish soothing and gentle peace forever from his bosom, and stain his soul with fearful guilt, by sending his adversary with all his sins upon his head, in the very act of disobeying the divine and emphatic injunction, "thou shalt not kill," before the judgment bar of God.

Manford was cool and collected, and surveyed his antagonist with no feelings of lenity. He felt that he had been deeply injured by the stranger endeavoring to share the affection and regard of her to whose love he deemed himself alone entitled.

The word was given to fire, and both of their pistols were simultaneously discharged, but neither of the parties were injured.

"Come, gentlemen," interrupted the seconds, "you have proved yourselves men of honour; let us return to our homes."

"No," spoke Manford, "this is no child's sport; I came here to fight, to draw blood or have it drawn; nothing else can wash out the foul stain cast upon my honour. I demand another shot."

It was useless to talk—he insisted on having another shot. The stranger smiled sadly, but spoke not; except the look of tender pity he cast on Manford, which spoke eloquently how great was his compassion for him. Not a muscle moved but with calmness and order; his countenance betrayed no sign of fear. A heart like his, so pure and noble, could not fear for himself.

They again took their stations, and once more the word was given to "fire;" when the stranger, discharging his pistol in the air, fell.

On examining his wound, it was pronounced mortal; and the warm current of life was fast ebbing. He requested Manford to approach him.

"James Manford, for the deep wrong I have done you, I crave your pardon; for the injury you have done me, I freely forgive you. There is much that I wish to tell you, but my time is too brief, and I feel that death is rapidly approaching. But this I tell you, Manford, not to excite any compassion or to give you pain, but to satisfy you who I am. My name is William Norwald."

"Norwald! Oh, God! can it be? Yes, I see it all too clearly. I have murdered the companion of my youth—my only true friend. Oh, why did you not spare my soul this blighting anguish, and speak that name before? I would have been branded with all the vilest epithets of earth, rather than have fought with you."

"For these reasons, Manford, I concealed my name from you and others. I, by my conduct, innocently injured your feelings; I made myself intimate with one who, unknowingly to me, but as I have since learned, you fondly loved, and with whose exceeding beauty I was captivated. You felt irritated at my refusal to yield her up to you, when I thought myself entitled to her, and I felt rather indignant at your rude manner, as I thought it, of claiming her as your partner. My hasty and perhaps uncivil language offended you, and you sent me a challenge, which I accepted. After having accepted it, I inquired particularly concerning you, and judge my feelings when I discovered that you were my early friend and school-mate—the associate and sharer of my youthful joys and pleasures. At first I thought it monstrous to think of fighting with you, and determined to make myself known; but, alas! my coward heart would not let me—I had not the courage.—Many might say I was afraid to fight, and for that reason made myself known. You might disown me, and call it a sham to escape your displeasure. I resolved, whatever might be the consequences, to give you the satisfaction you required, and have done so. To tell you where I have been these many years, would occupy much time, and require more breath than I possess. I have left an account of it among my papers, which, if you feel disposed, you may peruse. My wealth I have disposed of, and I have few relatives and friends to mourn my death. I am nigh the end of my earthly career—God bless and you, Alantore—farewell!" And with perfect calmness, a soft smile playing upon his handsome countenance, the victim of honour expired.

James Manford was a changed man; his kind and noble nature had experienced a shock which it was unable to withstand. His spirit was crushed and broken—life had lost its charms, and he never prospered afterwards.

Thus were two generous souls, in the bright season of hope, in the vigor and pride of manhood, destroyed by that most barbarous and shameful usage of duelling, which generally brings its votaries suddenly to the grave, or robs them of those most desirable and valuable of all earthly treasures, more to be prized than life itself, a good conscience and a peaceful mind.

How deeply is to be deplored that fatal error among what are styled by many, men of "honour" and "spirit," which deems it a test of courage to stubbornly persist in a wrong, when the proof of it is plain and palpable, to entitle one to the very enviable appellation of "a man of honour!" How much to be regretted is that false estimate of character which leads a man to offer himself a victim to certain death, or to wickedly sacrifice the life of his fellow man, rather than frankly and fearlessly acknowledge the wrong done, expressing regret for it, and asking pardon—certainly the most honourable course to pursue, and far the best test of courage and correct principles. Man never approaches nigher the character of his Maker, than when he candidly confesses his error, and asks forgiveness for the harm done; and he sinks far below himself, when he recklessly continues to assert what he knows to be untrue, for fear the world should not think him possessed of honour or courage, or should doubt the unblemished purity of his character. Oh! that we would be less influenced and governed by what others think and say, and would attend more strictly to what justice and the principles of Christianity teach us, and be governed more by them and our calm sober reason!

CAROLINE MERTON;

OR,

THE BOARDING SCHOOL.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LAFITTE," "BURTON, OR THE SIEGES," &c.

> When gratitude o'erflows the swelling heart,
> And breathes in free and uncorrupted praise,
> For benefits received; propitious heaven
> Takes such acknowledgments as fragrant incense,
> And doubles all its blessings.—[Anon.

Among the young ladies who were pupils at one of the best boarding schools in our country, was little Miss Caroline Merton. She was about thirteen years of age, and one of the youngest of the pupils. Her parents resided in the metropolis, and were highly respectable and wealthy. She was the eldest of several brothers and sisters; and being naturally intelligent and apt to learn, she had been taken from one of those excellent schools, that do such credit to the city, at a much earlier age than usual, and sent to boarding-school, to enter upon higher and more ornamental branches of female education.

She had not been at her new school but a few days, before, though far from being handsome, she made friends of the teachers, and became very popular with her school-mates. She was not pretty, though she had soft brown hair, and fine, sparkling black eyes, and was quite graceful. Her mouth was homely, and her forehead too low and rounded; besides, she had a decidedly bad nose. But when she spoke and smiled, these features were not noticed, her voice was so cheerful, her smile so like sunshine. A beauty from the heart shone and expressed itself in her face so strikingly, that those who had seen her only when her face was in repose, wondered they should have ever thought her homely. This was true beauty. It takes the observer by surprise, and is, therefore, the more pleasing. It never wearies by monotony, and it is the most lasting. We should never judge of a face by its features alone. We should wait till it is illuminated with the beauty of the heart and mind. Few persons are really homely. Few are wholly unlovely. There is always in the plainest face some feature of beauty; some charm, of which the heart holds the key, which will please and win. We should never judge by first appearances. We should always take it for granted that the most forbidding face may conceal the most amiable qualities; and so we should take it for granted and judge them with a kindly and generous qualification. There is something to admire and to love in every body around us, if we were only thrown together with them under circumstances that would draw them out.

Thus some very beautiful young Misses, who, on seeing that Caroline was plain, turned their heads, and thought her not worthy their attention, on seeing more of her, began to love her. Thus Caroline soon found her situation very pleasant, and, as she zealously tried to do her duty to all, by yielding obedience to her teachers, and looking upon all her school-mates with a loving heart, she was very happy. There was, however, one error in Caroline's mind, which was the result of false impressions, doubtless made in early childhood, and inculcated by a weak and aspiring mother. She was very aristocratic.—With all her gentleness and generosity of character, she was proud of her elevated position in society. She came to B——— with these false notions, and her observing teachers were not long in discovering them. She had been at the boarding-school a fortnight, when a young girl, very modest and very pretty, who was an orphan, came to her and asked her to explain a difficulty in her Chemistry. Always ready to oblige, Caroline took the book and very kindly did her the service she required. The young girl thanked her very warmly, and went away. It was the first time she had spoken with her, though she had noticed her before, as sitting much alone.—The same evening, as she was walking on the lawn, she saw her again, seated beneath a tree on the banks of the river, alone, and looking very pensive, while her school-fellows were enjoying themselves not far from her. Interested in her in the morning, her interest was increased, and going up to her she asked her to walk. She was answered by a sweet, grateful smile, and together they strolled along the banks, admiring the bright river, and the boats and vessels that were gliding past. Suddenly, while the young stranger was very eloquently describing a scene she had one day witnessed opposite to them on the water, by a sloop upsetting in a squall, Caroline heard her name called. On looking round, she saw that it was Miss Ann Norman, a very beautiful, aristocratic girl, who had made herself very intimate with Caroline, because she knew her father was not only rich but was a member of Congress.

"Come here a moment, Miss Merton," she called. "I want to speak to you a moment."

"Excuse me," said Caroline; "I will be right back; I am so much interested in your account."

And away went Caroline tripping lightly and gracefully to the spot where her friend stood, surrounded by several other young Misses.

"Do you know who that was you were walking with and appeared to be intimate with?" asked Miss Norman, with a sneer.

"It was a Miss Hopkins. I like her very much."

"You can't know who she is, then!"

"Who is she? I never enquired. She seemed very lonely and sad, and I felt for her!"

"She has no business to be otherwise! She well knows she oughtn't to associate with us! I know you will be mortified when I tell you!"

"Do tell me what and who she is, then!" said Caroline, her pride taking the alarm.

"Her father was a low mechanic and her mother was a seamstress!" said Miss Norman, with a tone and look as if Miss Hopkins had been caught in some great crime, which had been just discovered.

"Can it be possible!" exclaimed Caroline Merton, coloring. "I didn't know it; I only knew she was an orphan!"

"I know you well enough to know you could not but have been ignorant of it, and so I called to you."

"It is shameful that such girls should be admitted here! One don't know who to associate with!" said Caroline, vexed, because she felt she had lowered herself in the eyes of her aristocratic friends who were present; and perplexed to know how she should break off their untoward intimacy without hurting Miss Hopkins' feelings; for though aristocratic, Caroline was generous and kind-hearted. To be proud and even haughty is not altogether incompatable with a good heart; though it makes a person appear unfeeling and cruel. A certain pride of character is needful for all who would be consistent. If Miss Hopkins had been represented to her as a vicious and dishonest girl, then her pride of character would have properly led her to withdraw at once from her society; but when her fault was only poverty and humbleness of birth, then pride became guilty folly. There must, however, be some allowance made for Caroline. Her mother had early taught her, with great pains, that she was born in "the first society," and that she should never step below it. She had been forbidden to form acquaintance with any children out of her "own circle," and to regard those whose parents were in a less elevated station in society as inferior and unworthy her notice. If a poor girl spoke to her and said "good morning," when she came to school, she would toss her head and pout her lip and make no reply but feel very much offended at such a liberty! She learned to judge of and to choose her school-mates by their apparel and to regard with contempt those less elegantly dressed than herself.

This was the fruit of her mother's weakness. To observe these laws laid down by her mother was in the child's mind a virtue. Such an error of education would have destroyed the heart of most children; and rendered them insufferably unamiable. But Caroline was naturally lively and benevolent; and was always ready to do kindnesses to poor children, so that they did not presume upon acquaintance with her. But if any one whom she had served should afterwards speak to her, especially before her associates, she would blush with mortification and be very angry and have nothing to say to them afterwards. Among her little friends in her "own circle," where there was no danger of her pride being wounded, she was one of the best, kindest, good-natured children in the world, loving and beloved by all around her. This feeling of aristocratic superiority, therefore, was only like a flaw in a vase which disfigures its beauty, but does not impair its usefulness.

"Yes, it is shameful," answered Miss Norman, in reply to Caroline's words. "But it can't be helped."

"How did she come here?" asked Caroline, stealing a look aside in the direction where she had left Miss Hopkins, whom she saw slowly walking on as if not expecting her to rejoin her. Poor girl! she suspected the cause of her being called by Miss Norman who never let any opportunity escape of showing her her superiority.

"She has been sent here by a gentleman who took pity on her and is educating her," was the reply of the young lady, with a contemptuous movement of the lip. "She has no business here, and we respectable girls (Miss Norman laid quite an emphasis on the word "respectable,") have all resolved together not to take the least notice of her."

Miss Norman's assertion was true. Miss Hopkins, who was a truly sweet and amiable girl, and decidedly the best scholar in her class, was "cut" to make use of an expressive term, by the more fashionable Misses; and when she sought friends among those whose standing was less aristocratic, she was "cut" by these also; for these aped the others, and feared to associate with one whom the "aristocrats" had discarded. Thus poor Maria Hopkins was without friends and associates; and sad and lonely was her life. There was no sympathizing heart to throb in unison with her own; no friendly ear to listen to her thoughts; no confidential companion in her studies and walks. There is no wonder that her sad, sweet face interested Caroline. But Caroline was most to be pitied; for no one can be happy who feels unkindly towards any one.

"I promised her I would return to her and she will expect me," said Caroline, perplexed.

Miss Norman laughed and said—

"Let her expect! I would not speak to her again if she had to wait all night."

"But I promised," said Caroline.

"What is a promise to such a thing as she?" said Miss Norman, proudly.

"The promise, if broken, affects not her, but myself," answered Caroline, with propriety. "I will go and speak to her, and excuse myself."

"You are a simpleton if you do," said Miss Norman, with a sneer. "But don't you tell her what I have told you!" she added as she saw she would return.

"No, indeed, I won't," said Caroline, hastening after Miss Hopkins, with whom she soon came up.

"Miss Hopkins," said Caroline, in rather a formal manner, "I am sorry I can't walk with you longer. I will therefore leave you to finish your walk alone. Good evening."

"Good evening," responded the orphan, speaking in a gentle tone and blushing at the same time very deeply; for she could not but discern and understand the change in Caroline's manner.

"I see I am fated to be loved by, and to love no one," she said, following the retiring form of Caroline as she hastened to rejoin the group she had left; "this dear girl who was so kind and towards whom my heart opened so freely, has been taught to despise me!"

At this moment the benevolent superintendent and one of the teachers approached, and both addressing her with kind interest, joined her in her walk in the sight of the observing group.

"She will be spoiled after this, and too proud to speak to us, by and by," observed one of the girls, with a toss of her ringlets.

"If the superintendent can walk with her, I am sure we can," said Caroline.

"You had best go and take her arm, then, Miss Merton," said Miss Norman. "But if you do, you will find no friends here!" This young lady spoke with great bitterness, the secret of which was principally envy: both of the beauty of Miss Hopkins (for Miss Norman passed for a belle) and her cleverness in study, (for Miss Norman was no scholar); and her pride was daily mortified by the superiority of Miss Hopkins contrasted with her own dullness.

Several days passed on, during which Caroline, on meeting Miss Hopkins, returned her gentle bow and smile only by a cold stare of surprise accompanied by a half nod. But each time she condemned herself for her manner, and felt in her heart that as an orphan and friendless, Miss Hopkins merited her kindness rather than deserved her disdain. She had had an opportunity during the hours of study and recitation to see developed the beauty of her character, in which daily were manifested some new and amiable traits.

"Oh, how I should love to have Miss Hopkins my friend, were she respectable!" she said to herself one day, when she discovered some new excellency in her character. We have italicized the word "respectable," because she gave it a peculiar emphasis. Caroline attached the usual vulgar meaning to the word. But in our opinion and idea of the word, there was not a more respectable young person at school than Miss Hopkins, notwithstanding the humble condition of her parents, and the fact that she was educated by charity.

"Oh, how I do hate that Miss Hopkins," said Miss Norman to herself, at the very same time that Caroline uttered the above. "She affects to be so modest and recites so well, and blushes so courteously, that she makes every body else look homely and bold and appear ignorant!"

In a few days afterwards, Miss Norman, who was Caroline's room-mate, was taken ill with typus fever. This is known to be contagious, and there was, upon its announcement, a general panic among the pupils, Caroline, though alarmed, did not desert her, though all the other pupils did; but remained by her to assist in nursing her. The day following she also was taken with the same fever, and in the same room. The announcement of this new case, increased the terror of the pupils who came not nigh them, leaving them to their fate. There was, however, one exception. Miss Hopkins no sooner learned the illness of both than she offered her services to assist the nurse. She was warned of her danger; but firm in her purpose of doing good, she persevered till she was admitted to their chamber. Here shone forth the intrinsic brightness of her character. Her presence was as that of an angel, through the weary days and nights of suffering which the two young ladies passed. She watched by their pillows alternately, anticipating every wish, granting every wayward desire. At length she became so necessary to their comfort and happiness, that they would not permit her to leave them; nor would they receive medicines from any hand but hers.

"Oh, how could I treat you and hate you as I have done," said Miss Norman, as she was getting better, while Miss Hopkins was arranging her pillow for her to sit up in bed. "Forgive me!" and the tears gushed from her eyes.

Miss Hopkins smiled affectionately; and hearing Caroline's voice, she hastened to her where she was seated by the window in an arm-chair, looking very pale.

"Maria," said she, faintly smiling, "will you be so kind as to get the last magazine and read something to me. I like to hear you read, your voice is so musical!"

Miss Hopkins sat upon the cricket upon which she rested her feet, and read for some minutes; when Caroline placed her hand upon her head, and said with feeling—

"Stop Maria; I have not been listening! I have been thinking how good you are, and how silly and wicked my conduct has been towards you. From this time let us love each other and be friends. It shall by my part, if I get well, to make you happy."

The tears came into the lovely orphan's eyes, and she was so much moved that she could not have read another word if she had been desired to do so. She felt overjoyed in her heart; for she loved Caroline, and was only ambitious to be suffered to look upon her as a dear friend. Her wish was gratified; and thus had her good deeds been followed by the reward which always accompanies good acts.

In a month after their attack, the young ladies recovered nearly about the same time. Both had been taught a lesson of the heart; and they felt they could never show their gratitude sufficiently to Miss Hopkins. They became her intimate friends; and their example being imitated by the other pupils, Miss Hopkins, instead of being the most neglected girl in the school, became the most courted and loved. The lesson Caroline had learned was lasting. She had been corrected of her only fault, and now was wholly amiable and just in conduct and character; and when she reflected upon the past, she wondered that she could ever have been so foolish as to cherish prejudices against any one on account of the accident of birth or condition. Poverty and humbleness of life, on the contrary, presented, in view of her generous and well-judging mind, claims to her kindness and regard, of a most sacred character.

LINES,

ADDRESSED TO MARY *******.

BY ELIZA COOK.

"A thought ungentle canna be
The thought of Mary Morrison."—[BURNS.

If there's a heart where peace and love
May emulate the hallowed dove
That bears the olive branch above,
'Tis thine, my Mary Morrison.

When Pleasure's pinions lightly fly,
And gaudy blossoms round us lie,
Perchance there's many another eye,
May shine like Mary Morrison's.

But when the cypress-wreathings bind,
Oh, where shall then the spirit find
A hand so gentle, voice so kind,
As those of Mary Morrison?

The stranger one who meets thy smile,
Need never doubt thy truth the while,
For Falsehood, with its serpent guile,
Dwells not in Mary Morrison.

The one who claims thy bosom's care,
Should deem the blessing "rich and rare,"
Possessing who would not be proud to wear
A friend like Mary Morrison?

I would not ask that thou should'st have
A blazon'd record o'er thy grave;
Where wild-flowers spring and yew trees wave,
Will best suit Mary Morrison.

Sleep where thou wilt, there'll be no need
Of sculptured praise thy worth to plead,
'Twill be enough to know and read
The name of Mary Morrison.

Then let the sacred pledge-cup flow,
And heart and lip together go,
For God above and all below,
Must cherish Mary Morrison.

THE CHOICE.

BY EDWARD POLLOCK.

How beats the heart with wild delight,
When on the soul the spells arise,
That gladly gush from wine so bright,
And fondly beam from starry eyes;
How melt the clouds of care away,
When sun'd in beauty's roseate sheen,
And life, how like a cloudless day,
If star-eyed pleasure reigns the queen;
O! then no magic so divine,
As woman's love, and sparkling wine!

But, ah! the pow'r of light gone by,
The whirl of passion's tempest o'er,
The cares that clouded life's bleak sky,
Seem darker, heavier than before;
And faint, and cold, the spirit turns
From cloud-built halls to earth again,
And the sad soul in darkness mourns
Earth's weariness and toil and pain;
So pleasure's fairy-dreams depart,
And leave behind an aching heart.

Then let me shun the fading glow
Of beauty's bright but meteor gleam,
And let my only light below
Be reason and religion's beam;—
So shall my path, though storms sweep by,
On warring winds, by fury driven,
Be all beneath a cloudless sky,
'Till lost at last in light and Heaven,
Where shines o'er blissful climes above,
The sunlight of eternal love.

IS IT WELL WITH THEE?

BY EDWARD YOUNG.

Mother, sorrowing o'er thy child,
Taken back as soon as given:
Wife, whose widow'd heart 's made wild,
By the dear bond rudely riven;
Parents, wailing for a son,
Who was all your pride and stay:
Friend, who mourn'd a dear friend gone,
Or a brother called away:
Husband, weeping o'er thy mate,
Dearer than thyself to thee;
All by Death left desolate,
Tell me, is it well with ye?

Yes, 'tis well. The loved and lost
Are not lost to us for ever;
They but for awhile have cross'd
O'er the deep and shadowy river,
That divideth the two worlds
Of Eternity and Time;
And they often come from thence,
Bringing to us bliss sublime.
Spirits whispering to our spirits,
Thoughts too subtile far to tell,
In the world that Flesh inherits;—
Yes, with us 'tis well; 'tis well.

They're more ours than when in life;
Then, they were not always nigh;
Now, where'er we wander, they,
Guardian spirits, round us fly.
Yes, they're with us every where,
Treading every path we tread;
Guarding us with pious care,
From the snares around us spread.
Time was that our hearts were prone
Too much to rely on earth;
Ne'er bestowing a thought upon
That world which gave our spirits birth;
But since those we loved have gone
Thither, Heaven seems more near;
And our thoughts oft upward fly,
For we have an int'rest there.

NEW YEAR'S EVENING.

BY W. F. S., OF THE U. S. N.

The New Year's evening from the Western sea,
Is o'er the golden clouds its influence blending,
And ocean-birds recite their minstrelsy,
As to repose the sun is slow descending;
All heaven is gleaming with a ruddy glare;
Bright waves spring up to melt with rainbow hue;
And many a scene of fairy land is there,
As varied shadows their enchantment strew.

Our sails are teeming with the perfumed breeze,
From rarest flowers of the glowing earth;
The mountain herbs, the palm and lemon trees,
That hidden spring uncultured into birth;
And now the stars half timidly appear,
Their far-off beauty in the blue sky seeming
As happy smiles from that ethereal sphere,
To consecrate the wanderer's blisstul dreaming.

I have been musing, and mine eager soul [ling,
Has conjured thoughts which in their warm reveal-
Stream o'er my memory with a sweet control,
And wake the sleep of many a mingled feeling;
The cherished smiles of tenderness once more
Around me seem their sweetness to impart;
And glowing lips their tender accents pour
To soothe the murmurs of my sighing heart.

Oh, many a spirit in its wild career
Thrills fondly now within its warm recess,
And fervent off'rings for the new-born year,
Ascend to God in prayers of thankfulness;
Peace lingers there, and opes her dear blue eye,
As rapture weeps the story of her soul,
And some warm heart the wanderer's name may sigh,
As memory yields to thought her dear control.

SELECTED POETRY.

TO MY DAUGHTER

ON HER BIRTH-DAY.

MELOE, my daughter, dear,
This is thy natal day,
And fears that oft oppressed me
At length have passed away;
Thy cheeks with health are blooming now,
They were not always so,
And the sufferings of thy little life
None but thy parents know.

I see thee as thou wert,
A weak and helpless child,
With fever parched, until thy brain
And feeble pulse ran wild;
I hear thy soft, imploring tones,
Beseeching us in vain,
To alleviate thy suffering,
And ease thee of thy pain.

I see thy mother dear,
Press thee fondly to her breast,
And, in the fulness of her love,
Call thee her angel guest.
I hear her on a bended knee,
In the stillness of the night,
Give up her only child to God,
And say that "all is right."

I see thee on the ocean waves,
When they run mountain high—
And where the noble sycamore
Throws its branches to the sky;
Where Afric's sable children
Toil beneath a burning sun
In slavery and wretchedness,
Until their sands are run.

Where the Mississippi rolls
Its torrents, wild and free—
And the Alabama pours its floods
Into the open sea
Near Withlacoocha's bloody stream,
Where the savage in his lair,
Still lurks with ready rifle—
Oh, I often see thee there.

And I see thee, too, in northern climes,
When Aurora throws her light
In flashes bright and beautiful,
Throughout the summer's night.
Where now, like cold ingratitude,
The air is sharp and keen,
And the fields are drear and desolate,
As my heart hath often been.

'Tis thus I see thee, daughter dear,
Though blinded now with tears,
And a little age it seems to me,
Though but ten little years
Have passed away, since I first clasp'd
My darling to my breast,
And on the tablet of my heart
Thy lineaments impress'd.

Oh! what thy future lot may be,
I may not wish to know;
But should thy path be strewed with flowers,
Or with the thorns of wo,
Alike, lean on thy mother's faith,
Let her counsels be thy guide,
And walk in wisdom's pleasant ways,
With thy Saviour for thy guide.

For I would—at least I think I would—
Much rather see thee lie
In the cold and silent churchyard,
Than from his fold to stray,
Or be less pure than thou art now
On this thy natal day.

THE FATAL MARRIAGE.

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

The bell in the steeple of the old "German Reformed Church," in the town of ——, was ringing its solemn peal, one Sabbath morning, in the summer of 1827, and numbers of the congregation, with faces more smiling than usual, were wending their way up the side of the hill upon which the time-honored place of worship stood. A new pastor was to grace its pulpit that morning, and the eagerness with which they approached, betokened that high expectations were entertained of his introductory sermon. His name, and guesses as to his talent and Christian zeal, and the benefits that were anticipated from his ministerial labors, were rife upon every lip until they reached the door of the sanctuary.—There, of course, speculation ceased, and group after group entering, took their seats, and waited in silent expectation for the beginning of the services. At length the new minister arose, and presented himself to their impatient eyes. However grave and not "given to wordly things," churchmen may be, personal appearance forms no small item in their estimation of a debutante on such occasions, and in this respect, the young clergyman possessed no slight advantage. His features were not only handsome, but noble, and there was a combination of suavity and dignity in his manner which at once engaged respect and admiration. When he entered upon his discourse his hearers were not disappointed in their anticipations, and as he proceeded their first good impression was strengthened. His style was simple, clear and forcible. Handsome, eloquent, and withal distinguished—for, though young, he had attained so eminence as well in the scientific and literary world, as in the church—it will not be wondered that his new charge were delighted with him. When the services were concluded, the fathers of the little flock pressed forward to shake him cordially by the hand, and proffer their congratulations. Among the rest, as he moved down the aisle, a tall, sinewy man, with bushy grey eye-brows, and a face corrugated by age, and perhaps cares, reached over the door of the pew in which, with his family, he was standing, and grasping his hand with warmth, said—

"Brother De Coursey, allow me to express my joy of your coming among us, and the pleasure your sermon has given me; it has been long since I have heard one which gratified me more. May your sojourn here be to the profit of our souls!"

This old man was Ephraim Weston, an elder of the church, and the most wealthy citizen of ——. The portion of the family who were with him, consisted of a wife and two daughters. Of the latter, the eldest was a young woman of surpassing loveliness, and the eyes of the pastor, as he conversed with her father, very often wandered involuntarily to her face. His earnest glances caused her to cast down her eyes with a manner of modest simplicity—the effect of which was truly charming. De Coursey tarried a few moments with the old man, and then abruptly bidding him adieu, passed on hurriedly: for he felt that the thoughts which that blushing young face called up, were not consonant with the time or place.

Weeks passed, and the minister daily grew in favor with the members of his little congregation. By the influential among them, he was courted and caressed, and the more humble soon learned to regard his condescension to grace their family circle as the greatest of honors. Every attention which could be thought acceptable, was lavished upon him, and sufficient adulation greeted his ears to excite his vanity, if he possessed any, to its utmost. Among them all, no one was more wrapt up in him than Ephriam Weston, who had conceived a sudden and warm attachment to him, and, to the wonder of all who knew his unsocial disposition, eagerly sought his society, and repeatedly solicited his visits to his house. In fact, De Coursey soon became a regular evening guest at the old elder's mansion, and was frequently to be seen arm-in-arm with him upon the street.—This intimacy did not fail to attract the notice of the envious; it became the daily theme of their gossip, and the old adage, "too thick to thrive," was more than once repeated. The intimacy continued, notwithstanding, until at length it ceased to be a subject of remark

The young minister's cheerful demeanor and brilliant powers of conversation, made him a general favorite with the members of the old churchman's family, and perhaps more than a favorite with the eldest daughter, for whose ear he had a whispered eloquence, very different from that which marked his intercourse with others. From the first time he had seen her, he had been impressed with her beauty, and on subsequent acquaintance had discovered in her lively, but unsophisticated mind, a rich fancy, and a confiding disposition, which completely enlisted his affections.

Julia was just twenty—the age at which woman's character begins to be fully developed, and her charms to be matured. And her character had in it all that is admirable or lovely in a female. Gentle, modest, amiable, generous: possessing vivacity without frowardness—beautiful without vanity; accomplished, intelligent, and the child of affluence, yet free from the usual concommitants of these qualities, pride and affectation—none who knew her could fail to esteem and love her. She was one of those rare instances in which we behold a combination of all the virtues with but few of the foibles of the sex.—One feature of her mind, though it added to her endowments, was not calculated always to promote her happiness in life. It was too much confidence—a proneness to place too much reliance in the sincerity of the world. She lacked that discernment of human character, which is seldom acquired but with bitter experience. Pure-minded and innocent herself, she judged others by her own heart, and in so doing, she prepared for herself disappointments that were to cost her tears of anguish in after life.

There was much romantic enthusiasm in Julia's disposition, tinged too with a fervour of religion. It was not strange, therefore, that to her, who beheld but the bright side of every thing, the new pastor should appear the hero of a thousand. So young, and yet so eminent for his talents and his Christian virtues—his praise in every mouth—his judgment looked up to; and his opinions regarded with deference, even by heads silvered with the honourable hue of age; in short, almost worshipped by the little society over which he presided, not to speak of those other qualities of so much appreciation in a woman's eye, he seemed to her a being of a higher order than those around him; a man with the endowments of a nobler sphere than that in which he moved—and when he sought her in the character of a lover, he found her heart already prepared to his will. Her affections were deep, strong, and unchanging—they were entirely his own.

The moment was one fraught with emotion to Julia, when he first made an avowal of his feelings and solicited her hand. They had been strolling in the garden attached to her father's mansion, and had paused to watch the grandeur of an autumn sunset.—They stood silently contemplating the scene, until the last crimson hues faded from the western sky, and the pale lustre of the moon began to fall upon the objects around them. De Coursey turned and directed her attention to the brightening planet.

"See," said he; "when the sun is absent with his rays, yon mild orb cheers the earth with its borrowed light. Do you not see in this an emblem of man's lot? While he tarries here deprived of the glory of his Maker's presence, he is cheered by the sweet smiles of woman, whom He hath given for a helpmate. The love of your sex, when it is pure, is a reflection of that higher love, as the moon's light is a reflection of the sun's."

She did not reply, but her mind was busy with thoughts which his words called up. After some moments of silence, De Coursey again spoke—

"Have you ever loved, Julia?"

She raised her eyes archly to his face, as if to see if he had asked the question seriously, and encountering his glance of earnest tenderness, her sweet face coloured as she replied,

"Never—that is—I mean"—

"I thank you for that pretty blush," exclaimed De Coursey; "it tells me what you mean. Are not our hearts one? Dear Julia, can you trust to me your future hopes?"

She placed her hand silently in his, and he continued—

"Now my happiness is complete—I crave no more: for your gentle love supplies all I wish for of this world."

Julia's happiness, too, was complete. Henceforth her thoughts and feelings were centered in but one object—the noble, the pure-minded being who had gained her heart's first, warmest affections.

De Coursey disclosed his attachment to the father. Weston did not for an instant withhold his approbation—he had from the first witnessed the intimacy between his daughter and the young pastor, with inward satisfaction, and now was but too proud at the prospect of having the man he so highly esteemed for his son-in-law.

"Take her," said he, "and may God bless your union, and keep you happy."

A period of six months distant from the day of the minister's proposal, was appointed for the nuptials. Ere half that time had elapsed, a dissension sprung up which threatened to blast his hopes. He advanced, from the pulpit, doctrines which to his congregation were new and strange. The old elder was bigotted, and his pride of opinion sprung up at the first innovation upon his old tenets. He expostulated and reasoned with De Coursey, and finally, in anger, denounced him as no Christian. The latter, perhaps more than became his holy office, was proud and sensitive. The old man's words touched him to the quick, and he replied with haughtiness, that the opinions he promulgated sprang from honest conviction—he wished to enforce them upon no one, but so long as he believed them to be correct, he should maintain them.

"They are the sentiments of an upstart," returned the elder, with a flush of excitement that ill accorded with his professions as a follower of the Cross; "they are contrary to the Bible and religion, and so long as you continue to entertain them there must be a cessation of intercourse between us, and I desire that you discontinue your visits to my family."

De Coursey, of course, was no more a guest at the house of the elder, but he met Julia elsewhere. Her love for him, which had grown beneath her father's eye, we might say, was even fostered by his approving smile, had obtained too deep root to be shaken by the storm that was now gathering. In heart she was already wedded to him, and his she owned herself whatever should befal. Her father forbade her intercourse with him, and to prevent it effectually, kept her confined to the house and narrowly watched; but this opposition only strengthened her attachment. Debarred of his presence, in the solitude of her chamber, her thoughts were with him. She thought of the anguish he must endure for her sake. She well knew the rancour of her father's feelings, and wept for the persecutions that must ensue to him who was now a thousandfold dearer to her than ought else in the world. She dwelt, in memory, upon the praise which every lip had bestowed upon him, his pure character, his holy office, his Christian virtues; and her fertile imagination invested him with many excellencies, which he, nor indeed any man, had ever possessed.

Meanwhile, Ephraim Weston began to reflect and repent of his haste, and to long for a reconciliation; but these amicable feelings were soon dissipated by more cause for exasperation. The young minister, now freed from the slight restaint which respect for the old man's opinions had before imposed upon him, came out fully and freely with his new doctrines; and so startling were they, that the greater portion of his congregation rose openly against him. The opposition at length became so decided that he was forced to resign his charge. He now deemed it prudent leave the place, at least until the excitement of the affair should have subsided. Accordingly he prepared for his departure, although the few of the congregation who remained his firm friends urgently pressed him to stay and endeavour to establish a new church. Ere he left, all his efforts to obtain an interview with Julia were frustrated by the watchfulness of her father, whose enmity towards him had by this time become as bitter as his friendship before had been sincere.

After the minister's departure, Julia was restored to her former freedom. It was not long before she found an opportunity of conversing upon the subject which absorbed her thoughts, with one of the banished pastor's staunchest adherents, a gentleman with whose family she had been intimate. This person detailed to her the history of his own clandestine marriage, and subsequent happy reconciliation with his father-in-law. He used many persuasive arguments to convince her that a similar act upon her part would be attended with the same result, and so palpable was his reasoning to her unskilful mind that she easily consented. Through his agency a secret correspondence was carried on between the unfortunate pair, and a plan matured. Her purpose fixed, Julia learned so well to dissemble her feelings that her father perceived with delight, as he thought, the alienation of her heart from its first love; and when, a few months afterwards, De Coursey returned to ——, believing that her attachment had entirely ceased, he scarcely deemed precaution necessary to prevent its renewal.

The winter had now past, and a mild spring was beginning to clothe the earth in a garb of freshness and beauty. It was upon a delightful evening in April, that a lively party had collected at the mansion of one of the most respectable citizens of ——. Among the many guests who participated in the convivialities of the occasion, were Ephraim Weston and his lovely daughter. The old gentleman seemed to be alive to nothing but enjoyment. He mingled with the younger portion of the assembly, and laughed and joked with a countenance whose furrows of three score years appeared disposed to slide into the smoothness of manly prime. What had contributed no little to his unusual flow of spirits, was Julia's conduct toward the young pastor, who was present.—She had passed him as a stranger, with a cold eye and a motionless lip. A load was removed from the old man's heart when he saw this, and a glow of satisfaction overspread his features;—he little knew what guile had crept into the heart of his beautiful and hitherto artless child.

The evening wore on, and at about ten o'clock, Weston discovered that in the group of smiling faces gathered immediately around him, Julia's was wanting. His eye wandered over the room in search of her, but she was not there. Many of the company were promenading in the hall, and, supposing she was there, he again joined in the light remarks of those about him. A short while afterwards, strange murmurs in the hall caused the lively hum of conversation which prevailed throughout the room to cease, and all eyes were turned in the direction of the sound. Some of the guests who were standing in and about the door, now fell back, and De Coursey, with Julia hanging timidly to his arm, entered. Weston stood as if paralysed, and the rest of the company were mute and motionless as statues with astonishment, as the minister advanced, with a proud step and an eye gleaming with triumph, and presented the trembling girl to them as Mrs. De Coursey. The father's deep groan of anguish was the first sound which broke the silence, and the old man, closing his eyes as if to shut out the sight, clasped his hands convulsively upon his breast.

"Father, forgive me," faltered the young bride, springing forward and kneeling at his feet.

"Hence, wretched girl!" exclaimed Weston, in a voice which trembled with passion. "From this hour I disown you—and may God, in his justice, visit this disobedience upon your head and on his who has robbed a father of his child!"

He turned away from her. She rose and would have clung to his arm, but he dashed her from him, fainting, into the arms of her husband, and strode sternly from the room.

De Coursey bent over his young wife, with a countenance in which solicitude and anger were blended, and chafed her fair temples, until she returned to consciousness. Inwardly and bitterly did he denounce the unfeeling father, and, perhaps, too, a thought of revenge crossed his mind, for he had not yet learned wholly to suppress the evil passions of his nature. Alas! that we should say it, he had not that religion of the heart which becomes one filling the high office of a Chistian minister—his religion was rather of forms and outward observances. He had entered the pulpit to point out the mote in his fellowbaings' eyes, ere he had plucked the beam from his own.

Poor Julia! hers was a melancholy bridal. When she returned to herself, there were but few around her. The unhappy scene had ended the amusements of the evening, and thrown a chill upon every heart. One by one the guests had left, until they were almost alone. And, now that the was fully restored, those remaining offered their feeble congratulations with an embarrassed manner, and a constrained smile; De Coursey shortly after led her weeping to the home he had prepared for her. But how different had been the result from what she had anticipated! She had been taught to expect a few chiding words and then a happy reconciliation; but she was deceived. Her father had spurned her from him, with a look of deep agony and a malediction that fell like lightning on her heart.

There is an old adage that "no good comes of clandestine marriages;" and Julia's is but another of the many instances which have furnished evidence of its truth. A few weeks passed away. Weston repulsed the intercessions of his friends, and resolutely refused to see, or become reconciled to, his daughter; and De Coursey now left ———, with his young wife, to take up his residence in the city. He quit the pulpit and betook himself to literary pursuits. He was ambitious, and so much did he become engrossed with thirst for "the bubble reputation," that he began to neglect the beautiful young being, who had given up father, friends, early home and all, for him. In fact, Julia's mind was not formed for unity with his. He had not mistaken her character, but he had deceived her with regard to his own. He knew that there would be little sympathy between his cold, proud, aspiring mind, and her warm, gentle, and confiding heart. But he had looked upon her, in her innocence and beauty, and he could not resist the feelings which her sweet smile and guileless words inspired. He had assumed language and manners foreign to his real character, and won her.

The change in her husband's manner, and the memory of her father's curse, preyed upon Julia's mind. She became sad and dejected. She had no relish for the gay society of the city. She loved De Coursey tenderly and devotedly, and in proportion as his tenderness decreased, the sadness which hung upon her spirit deepened, until at length it settled into an habitual melancholy. De Coursey grew weary of her sickly smile and tearful eye, and sought, in the excitement of his daily pursuits, a compensation for that pleasure which home did not afford him. When they were together, there was no longer sympathy between them. His visions of fame and schemes for wealth, so different from the purer and holier thoughts he had once poured into her ear—those whisperings of higher than earthly things which in former days he was wont to link with his dreams of love—struck no answering chord in her bosom; and the repinings of her grief-laden heart, were to him a joyless substitute for her former radiant smile and silvery-toned laugh. With each day his feelings became more estranged.

Four years after marriage, Julia sat weeping in her chamber, a heart-broken mother. The pledge of her blighted love, an idiot boy, was a poor solace for her sorrows. De Coursey had become a dabbler in politics, and was now absent in the service of the government, a bearer of despatches to a foreign court, and Julia had just received a letter from him. It was not the warm greeting of a fond husband, impatient to return and clasp to his bosom a dear-loved wife, but a cold, unsatisfactory, duty-constrained epistle, and the young wife's tears fell thick and fast upon the hastily-scribbled characters. She laid aside the letter with a sigh, and turned to the simple face of her sleeping changeling. It was a sad object upon which to pour out the full feelings of a mother's heart, and while she gazed sorrowing upon its features, her mind wandered back through the dark past, to the scenes of her childhood—to those days, ere her eyes were dimmed with tears, when her soul was unwrung with grief, and her pure spirit was buoyant with a thousand sweet hopes. How painfully faithful was her memory! All the happy visions of her early home—the familiar faces of the companions and sharers of her youthful pleasures—the warm caresses of fond parents—the countless joyous hours of girlhood—all crowded back upon her mind, a melancholy host, to mock her woe. Her thoughts overcame her, and she wept afresh. At length, as if she had formed a sudden resolution, she rose, wiped her eyes, and proceeding to a table upon which were her writing materials, she sat down calmly to write, for the first time since her marriage, to her father. She plead to him for forgiveness, and told him of her deep misery and sufferings. She longed to return with her broken heart to that home she had too rashly left—to hear him recall the malediction he had invoked, and bless again his repentant child. This letter, when finished, was despatched; but she looked in vain for the answer—none came.

Three months elapsed since the departure of De Coursey, and he did not return. Poor Julia began to feel that she was sinking to an early grave. Her cheek had grown wan, and the impress of death was but too plain upon her pale brow. But her sad features were still beautiful, though she was drooping like a fading flower. As she felt her spirit nearing "that bourne whence none return," her desire to close her eyes upon the dear spot which gave her [illegible] stronger, and she determined to go back to her stern father. His curse was fulfilled—her sin was expiated—he could not cast her from him in the hour of death. She wrote a last affecting adieu to her husband, and started, with her idiot child, for ——. She was met upon the way by a friend, whom her relenting parent had sent to bring her to his home.

Deeply affecting was the meeting between the parent and his child. The old man had truly and bitterly repented his harshness, and after forgiving her, he turned to Heaven for his own forgiveness. Julia lingered but a few weeks after her return to his roof. It was near twilight one mild evening, that her feeble form reclined upon a couch by a window, which overlooked the garden, and her father sat sorrowing by her side. She felt something revived by the pure air which fanned her brow, and at her request her father assisted her from her couch to a chair. She looked forth upon the garden. Just such an evening, upon that spot, De Coursey had first told her of his love. Her mind wandered back to that hour, and as she thought of all that had happened since then, her eyes filled, and the large tear drops coursed one after another over her pale cheek. Her father watched her sad, changing features, and a film covered his own eyes.

"Oh, my child! my poor child!" he murmured in a voice trembling with age, and broken with emotion, "let us raise our hearts in prayer."

She bowed her head upon his bosom, and he prayed aloud. When the old man ceased, he felt her head heavy upon his breast—his fingers wandered to her temples—they were cold. Her spirit had flown to bear his petition to the throne of mercy!

Ephraim Weston's gray hairs soon followed his daughter down in sorrow to the tomb. De Coursey returned from his mission abroad; wore crape on his hat a twelvemonth, and married again. How much truth is there in the words of the inspired one of Avon.

> ——— However men do praise themselves,
> Their fancies are more glorious than true,
> More longing, wavering, sooner lost and won,
> Than women's are."

ODE FOR THANKSGIVING.

This beautiful Ode was brought out by the recent celebration of Thanksgiving Day, in our City of Brotherly Love.

THE HEART OF NEW ENGLAND.

BY THOMAS G. SPEAR.

The Heart of New England! How warmly and true,
It beats to the triumphs of order and law—
How lores it the precepts the Forefathers drew,
When the land of their rest from the ocean they saw;
When the bleak barren rock, where the Mayflower came,
Alone was the refuge the wanderers found,
But whose fires there kindled have lit with their flame,
The nations they left from the desert around.
Then, Sons of New England! wherever ye stray,
Forget not the precepts of order and law,
But wide as the world the example display,
Your Puritan sires were foremost to draw.

There Liberty walks in her beauty, and smiles
On the village-schools and the citizen's care,
And with sweet Contentment she daily beguiles
The yeomen that drink in her fresh mountain air:
There soundeth aloud, from her valleys and hills,
The music of wheels where the bright waters flow,
And her ploughs and her wheels, and her axe-while mills,
Have made her in greatness to flourish and grow.

Oh! Heart of New England! How sweet to recall,
In the land of the stranger, the pleasures of home,
Where the songs of the Pilgrims still sound in each hall,
The feet of their children deserted to roam,
How dear are the scenes where in childhood they played,
The neat country dwelling, the fair spreading town,
Midst the bustle of toil, and the converse of trade,
By the school-house where boyhood began its renown.

The sports of the field, when the studies were o'er,
That waken'd the soul into emulous pride—
The rambles of school-mates by forest and shore,
The whoop in the woods, and the leap in the tide,
With all the wild pleasures that gladden'd the time,
Around the neat cottage or snug-looking farm,
Still live in the thoughts of that bright northern clime,
That Virtue has fill'd with a perishless charm

Brave Heart of New England, whose strength has been tried,
Where Freedom demanded a word or a blow—
Whose wisest and bravest have struggled and died,
In battles that marshall'd the mightiest foe;
Still, in peace or in war, for the cause that is true,
Thou hast ever a voice, and a blade to defend,
As valiant as when thy protectors were few,
The right to declare, and the weak to befriend.

Free Heart of New England! Thy throb as the same,
To Truth and to Duty, in every sky,
And we love to remember thy fame-honor'd name,
Too bright in its deeds for the world to decry;
And hail thee, invoking, oh! land of the true!
Too free to oppress, and too brave to appal,
The Error may never that Freedom undo,
Which Nature intended for thee and for all.

TWICE MARRIED.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

A happy bridal party was assembled at the house of Mr. Elwood Graham, on a pleasant evening in May, some ten or twelve years ago, to witness the rites that were to make an only daughter the bride of one of the most promising young lawyers in the State. Alice Graham, in mind and heart, as well as in external beauty and grace, was worthy the hand of Edward Delaney. No one who witnessed their union, failed to congratulate Mr. Graham upon the excellent choice his daughter had made from among the many who had sought her favor.

"If happiness ever attends the marriage union," remarked one of the nuptial guests to another, "it will be the smiling companion of Edward Delaney and his lovely wife."

"Yes. They will be happy, no doubt," returned the individual addressed, a widow well advanced in [illegible] and in the tone of the speaker's voice as she said this, that caused the individual who had addressed her to say—

"You seemed to speak equivocally, Mrs. Clement. Or, did my ear deceive me?"

"Did I?" Mrs. Clement returned, smiling. "A bad habit with me, no doubt, this propensity I have to distrust life's young promise. I have seen so many bright skies overclouded—so many blossoms touched with the frost, that I am afraid to trust myself to hope all the good things my heart desires for those who are entering life's devious ways, strewn at first with so many beautiful and sweet scented flowers. But, doubtless, Edward and his bride will be very happy. Surely, upon their way the blossoms will linger long after they have faded from the paths of many around them. This it is but fair to hope. He, with talent, energy, and high moral worth—she, with beauty, accomplishments, and a pure heart loving deeply the object of its young devotion—would it not be strange, indeed, if they were not blessed even above the common lot? True—there may come loss of health, loss of children—a trial none but a mother's heart can fully estimate—loss of wealth;—But, none of these can take away integrity of purpose, nor the pure love they bear each other."

"Which pure love," remarked the first speaker, "has in it a compensating virtue; for, as life's ills close darkly around, it burns with a brighter and steadier light. The closing of the doors and windows that through life's day of prosperity let in the sunlight of fortune and the world's favor, does not make all gloomy within. A lamp burns brightly in an inner chamber—and a cheerful fire blazes warmly upon the hearth. Is it not so?"

"Yes—yes. It is only the putting out of that lamp—only the darkening of that hearth that brings night indeed."

"But this night cannot come to them."

"I think not—unless death extinguishes the lamp and the fire." Mrs. Clement said this with something of sadness in her voice. Death had, years before, extinguished her hearth-fire and heart-lamp, leaving her in darkness and desolation of soul.

"Death comes to all, early or late in life," returned the friend. "But his visits we will except. It is not well to associate the altar and the tomb together."

"Perhaps not. Though it is difficult to keep our thoughts from being stirred by memories of the past, —especially when circumstances awaken vividly those memories.

The presence of others who could hear their words checked this serious conversation between the friends. Mrs. Clement in a little while forgot the past in the pleasantness of the passing hour.

The first two years that succeeded this marriage, were truly blessed years. Mr. Delaney's reputation at the Bar, had steadily increased, and he stood, at the end of this period, among the first in his county for talents, legal abilities, and strict probity. Alice was very proud of her husband's reputation—and very happy in being the wife of a man whose character made up such a whole of excellence.

One day he came home evidently much elated in mind, as his wife, whose practised eyes could read his face as if it were a book, plainly perceived. He said nothing, for some time, about the matter that pleased him, until Alice, who did not like the suspense, remarked—

"Something has happened to please you, dear."

"How should you know that?" returned Delaney, smiling.

"Your face cannot keep a secret."

"Can't it? A true face, then, is it not?"

"It is no hypocrite—and for that I like it. But tell me what has given you so peculiar a gratification? I must be a sharer of all that stirs pleasant thoughts in your bosom."

"I am not so sure, Alice, that it will give you the same pleasure that it has given me."

"Let me hear, and then I can tell."

"You shall hear. I have been waited upon to know whether I will become a candidate for the Legislature."

"You have!" The face of his wife became graver.

"Yes, dear. But why do you look so serious?"

"I don't want you to become a candidate for office."

"Why not?"

Tears came into the eyes of the young wife—but she did not reply.

"You must have a reason, Alice," continued Delaney. "Speak out; and if it is a good one, I will be governed by it."

Still the wife was silent.

"Ah! dear, I'm afraid your's is only a woman's reason," he said, patting her cheek, playfully. "A simple 'because you don't want me to become a candidate.'"

"But does it not frequently happen, that a woman's intuition in a matter is better than a man's reason?" Alice said.

"It may so happen, in rare instances. But reason is the only safe guide; and I can acknowledge no other. So, you must bring reasons if you expect to influence me. I see reasons why I should accept the nomination. These must influence me, unless rendered nugatory by counter reasons. So, my pretty pleader, let us hear your reasons."

This playfulness of manner did not make Alice the less serious. Leaning her head against him, and turning up her eyes to his face, she replied, hesitatingly, as if she felt that her reasons would not have much weight.

"I cannot bear that you should be the subject of the vile slanders—of the cruel attacks upon character, that every man who now presents himself for office has to meet."

"But, to shun these, Alice, would be moral cowardice. Shall honest men leave the field to political rogues, in fear of trumped up slanders that no sensible man believes? Certainly not! Where would our vessel of State float, if competent pilots refused to take the helm, because incompetent ones, in their struggle for place, heaped false accusations upon their heads. No! no! dear. Our duty to a common country, should make us willing not only to suffer, but to die for her. We must be true patriots."

"But no dangerous strait now exists. And there are plenty who are fully competent to fill this office, who are willing enough to accept of it."

"If no dangerous exigency did really exist, your argument would not be sound. The first call has been made upon me to perform a public service.—With what propriety can I disregard my country's appeal, when there is no weightier reason for doing so, than a weak timidity—a fear to meet falsehood and vituperation, which will be poured out, no matter who comes forward? Every one could as legitimately make the same plea, and then there would be none to serve. But a dangerous strait does exist. The opposition is strong, and, if it succeeds, will carry measures in the Assembly highly detrimental to the interests of the Commonwealth. The candidate of our party must be a man invulnerable at almost every point. Such a man I, no matter how really unworthy in my own eyes, have been deemed, and as such, chosen for the candidate. It would be treacherous in me to desert my country in her need; and I cannot do it."

Silenced, but not satisfied, Mrs. Delaney found herself compelled to acquiesce; but it was with an instinctive fear of consequences, whose nature she could not define. The necessary frequent absence of her husband, who would be called away to different parts of the county to attend political meetings—the absorbing nature of a canvass—and the unnatural excitement of mind which she had observed it to produce upon others, were muttered objections that oppressed her heart—and which often prompted her to plead with tears and love's eloquent persuasions, for him to give up his intentions. But she knew his firm character well enough to be satisfied that all these would be fruitless, and therefore forced herself to keep silence.

Delaney was an ambitious man. Not so much, really, from the love of serving his country, was he influenced in determining to accept the nomination that had been tendered him, as from the impulses of a desire to attain a place where all eyes would be upon him, and where he could so acquit himself, as to receive distinguished honors. His real aim, so far as attainment of place was concerned, was the Senate of the United States. An election to the Assembly was the first stepping-stone. Eagerly did he avail himself of the opportunity offered for becoming the candidate of a strong party.

To a man whose sole end is the glory attached to high places, nothing can be so dangerous as both the struggle and the ultimate success—especially in a country like ours, where the mass of the people declare who shall, or who shall not, be thus honored—and where the mass of the people must be gained over, or a man's ambition remain like a smouldering fire in his bosom. The merely ambitious man—that is, the man ambitious only of honors, and not of serving his country for his country's good, is exposed to a flood of temptations, not the least of which is the temptation to indulge excessively in wine. How this is so, need not be stated. Every one knows that during electioneering campaigns, wine and brandy are poured out like water, and that a candidate, if not a very firm, temperate, self-denying man, is in imminent danger. The true lover of his country—he who looks to the good of that country, instead of his own honor, is not thus in danger. The purity and elevation of his aim, keep his mind calm and well balanced. He does not become mentally intoxicated, and is not, therefore, in the same danger of bodily intoxication. To serve well his country, he knows, is not to procure votes by rendering men unfit to vote—for a bad cause as well as a good one can gain accessories by such a mode. He, rather, keeps his own mind clear, that he may elevate men into a region of mental discrimination, from which they may rationally see who is really the best man to serve his country faithfully. Instead of going down to brutalize himself and his constituents, he lifts both himself and them up, and acts and leads them to act like men standing upon their feet. Thus he is safe from the peculiar temptations attending electioneering canvass. Men who cannot think for themselves, or who are really too indolent so to do, can be elevated to see rational truth in the light of other men's minds, and thus be led to do the truth in a right cause. And for this reason, men can as readily be led to vote right, from seeing the truth, as from mere blind prejudice, or brutal infatuation.

Delaney, otherwise clear minded, was so eager to succeed, that he did not see this. Too readily he was led to the vicious practice of being all things to all men. Of flattering the weak, and drinking with the lover of drink—the latter class a very numerous one. Alas! more than once did he so far indulge this habit, as to become unconscious of any thing.

Alice, who was watching the progress of the canvass with an eager heart, that bled with every sneer, every false accusation made in the opposition papers against her husband, found a new cause of anxiety in his changed appearance and manner when he was at home, which was now too rarely, as he was most of his time engaged in electioneering through the county. The real nature of this change, even her quick perception had not made out, when her attention was arrested one morning by the words in an opposition paper—"The Drunken Candidate."—Quickly letting her eye run over the paragraph they headed, she read as follows:—

"We are told that the great mass meeting so much bragged about at the 'Cross Keys,' was a signal failure. Delaney was so drunk that his friends had to take him from the stand, amid hisses and groans.—This is the third time he has been so much intoxicated during the canvass, as to be unable to speak. We are sorry for him. But we told some of his best friends, when they proposed to bring him out, that he was a weak man, and would disgrace himself and them in some way. He has done it, now, effectually. Both he and his party are dead. We shall carry the election by an overwhelming majority!"

The newspaper dropped from the poor wife's hand, and she sat for a long time motionless and tearless. The shock paralized at first both mind and body. When perfect consciousness again came back, Alice had a keener heart-ache than she had ever felt. The peculiarity in her husband's appearance, that had troubled her, was all explained. "Intoxicated!"—Could it be possible? Was she really awake or dreaming?, While such thoughts were passing through her mind, her husband came in, unexpectedly. He had been away for a week, and she did not look for his return for two or three days. He greeted her affectionately, yet with something of embarrassment in his manner, while his eye glanced about with an anxious expression.

"A cursed, lying wretch!" he muttered between his teeth, his brow darkening into an angry scowl, as he perceived the newspaper which had fallen from his wife's hand upon the floor, and knew it to be the one in which a scandalous paragraph about himself had been inserted.

"Don't talk so, husband," Alice said, in a deprecating tone, her face becoming still paler than it was when Delaney came in.

"Why should I not?" he returned, much excited. "Am I made of iron or brass? Can I bear to see such scandalous lies published about me, and not be roused into indignation? I would not care so much for myself," he added, in a more subdued tone—"but such allegations go beyond me. Such arrows lodge in another bosom—in your bosom, in fact, Alice. I saw the paragraph last evening, and at once returned home, to assure you, if that were necessary, that it was a base falsehood. As to the election going against me—that is all nonsense. Our party was never so sure of success. I shall go in by an overwhelming majority!"

As Delaney uttered the closing sentence, he elevated his voice, while he assumed the attitude of a speaker, and gave it with true stump-oratorical effect. Alice looked at him for an instant or two with painful surprise, until she was made fully certain that he was even then strongly excited by drink. This broke down her spirits completely. Tears gushed from her eyes, and she buried her face in her hands and moaned sadly.

It is not our intention to follow the candidate step by step, up to the time when the voice of the people proclaimed him their representative in the General Assembly of his State. Enough that he gained the election,—but at a great sacrifice; the loss of domestic felicity—the sacrifice of his wife's peace. He gained the election—but in the struggle he lost those high-toned feelings that Alice had loved. And worse than all, he acquired habits, and formed associations, that made home less attractive. Four months at the Capital of the State, his thoughts during the whole time excited, from various causes, tended rather to wean his affections from his wife, than to bind him closer to so fine-minded a being. She resided with him at H——, during the session of the Legislature, and noted with feelings that it would be hard to imagine, his gradual declension from the elevated, honest manliness of character, for which she had at first loved him. He had become an ambitious politician, eager for distinction, and too regardless of the means whereby that distinction was gained.

At the next election, he was again the party's candidate, and notwithstanding the most vigorous efforts against him, was chosen to represent the people.

Three years from that time, he was placed on the ticket for Congress. During the period that elapsed, he had changed greatly for the worse. His habits had become very irregular, and his temper soured towards his wife, whose pale, sad, heart-broken look, ever reproved him when in her presence. They had two children, a boy and a girl, the eldest four, and the youngest two years old. Lovely children they were, but their loveliness could not win him from his ambitious schemes. He had fixed his eyes upon the Senate chamber in the National Legislature, and no charm could win him to turn to the right or left, or to linger by the way. Unfortunately, he had not felt the danger he was in from a too free use of intoxicating drinks. But his wife saw it, and ventured to give him a gentle warning. She met a cruel and angry repulse!

In the struggle for a seat in Congress, he descended to still lower depths than any into which he had before degraded himself. He drank almost to intoxication every day. His wife and children were scarcely thought of, and not seen, sometimes, for weeks together.

On the day he was declared the successful candidate, his wife returned, with her children, to her father's house, and sought the protection of her own family. All his former tender love for her had faded from his mind. He regarded her coldly, and sometimes with positive unkindness. And he was, moreover, so abandoned in his habits, that such a woman as Alice could not live with him. A feeble remonstrance was made against her precipitate course of action, followed by a threat to take the children from their mother, and then the heart-stricken wife was left in the asylum she had sought.

A year afterwards, owing to the gross abandonment of himself to vile and evil courses of conduct, his wife, urged on by her friends, applied for and obtained a divorce from Delaney. He went to Congress for a second term, and was then dropped by the party, as unfit to represent them. He had become little better than a common drunkard. Thus disgraced, he left the county, and went no one knew whither.

Three years passed, during all of which time Alice, who continued to live with her father, heard nothing of him who had once been her husband. Gradually her feelings were beginning to rise from the shock they had received. Her children were unfolding before her like plants that were pleasant to look upon, and the fragrance of whose leaves affected the sense of delight. About this time, she went to visit a friend who had married and moved away to a neighboring State. It was about the time when the Washingtonian excitement was at its height. Every village, town, and city, gave forth its crowded audiences to listen with intense interest to the thrilling experience of men who had arisen into life as from the dead.—The wonder was in every thought and upon every lip. People looked at the new phenomenon with a bewildered astonishment.

In the evening of the day on which Alice arrived at S——, a great experience meeting was to be held in one of the churches. Her friend, who had became enthusiastic in the cause, urged her to go to this meeting, which Alice did, although with a feeling of reluctance. The house was crowded above and below. A broad platform had been laid upon the railing of the altar, upon which sat the president of the society, the secretary, ministers of various denominations, and several reformed men, who were to be the principal speakers. The preliminaries usually appertaining to such meetings having been arranged, a brief opening address was made by one of the ministers. A reformed man then related his experience with great effect. After he had finished, there was a pause of nearly a minute. At length a man, who had been seated far back, with his face partly turned from the audience, arose slowly, and moved to the front of the stage.

A half suppressed exclamation escaped Alice as her eyes caught the well-known features of him who had been her husband, while a quick thrill ran through her. Then her whole frame trembled in accord with her fluttering heart. The face of Mr. Delaney was greatly changed since she had last looked upon it.—Its calm, dignified elevation had been restored, but with this difference—what before was cheerful, was now sad—very sad.

"Mr. President," he began, in a subdued voice, "although I had consented, at your urgent solicitation, to address this large assembly to-night, yet I have felt so strong a reluctance to doing so, that it has been with the utmost difficulty, I could drag myself forward.—But I had passed my word, I could not violate it. As to relating my experience—that I do not think I can venture upon. The past I dare not re-call.—Would to Heaven that the memory of just ten years of my life were blotted out."

The speaker paused a moment, already much affected. He, resuming in a firmer voice, said—

"But something must be said of my own case, or I shall fail to make that impression on your minds that I wish to produce. Pictures of real life touch the heart with power, while abstract presentations of truth glitter coldly in the intellectual regions of the mind, and then fade from the perceptions like dissolving figures in the diorama.

"Your speaker once stood among the first members of the bar, in a neighboring State. Nay, more than that—he represented his county for three years in the Assembly of the Commonwealth. And more than that, still—occupied a seat in Congress for two Congressional periods."

At this announcement, the stillness of death pervaded the crowded assembly.

"And yet, more than all that," he continued, his voice sinking into a low, thrilling tone—"he once had a tenderly loved wife and two sweet children.—But all these honors, all these blessings have departed from him," he continued, his voice growing louder and deeper in his effort to control himself. "He was unworthy to retain them! His constituents threw him off, because he had debased himself, and disgraced them. And worse than all—she, who had loved him devotedly—she, who had borne him two dear babes, was forced to abandon him, and seek an asylum in her father's house. And why? Could I become so changed in a few short years? What power was there so to debase me that my fellow beings spurned, and even the wife of my bosom turned away, heart-stricken from me? Alas! my friends—it was a mad indulgence in strong drink. Strong drink! aye, is it not a mocker? A very demon—a Circe, changing the human into the bestial. But for this, and I were now an honorable and useful representative in Congress, pursuing after my country's good, and blessed in the home circle with wife and children. But I have not told you all. After my wife separated herself from me, I sunk rapidly. A state of perfect sobriety brought too many terrible thoughts. I therefore drank more freely, and was rarely, if ever, from under the bewildering effects of partial intoxication. I remained in the same village for some years, but never once saw her during that time—nor even a glimpse of my children. At last I became so abandoned in my life, that, urged on by her friends, no doubt, she filed an application for a divorce, and as cause could readily be shown why it should be granted, a separation was legally declared. To complete my disgrace, at the next Congressional canvass, I was left off of the ticket, as unfit to represent the district. I then left the county and state where I had lived from boyhood up.

"Three years have passed since then. For two years of that period I abandoned myself to the fearful impulses of the appetite I had acquired. Then I heard of this new movement—this great temperance cause. At first I sneered, then wondered, listened at last, and finally threw myself upon the great wave that was sweeping onward, in the hope of being carried by it far out of the reach of danger. I did not hope with a vain hope. It did for me all and more than I could have dreamed. It set me once more upon my feet—once more made a man of me. A year of sobriety, earnest devotion to my profession, and fervent prayer to Him who alone gives strength in every good resolution, has restored to me much that I have lost—but not all—not the richest treasure that I proved myself unworthy to retain—not my wife and children. Ah! between myself and these the law has laid its stern, impassable interdictions. I have no longer a wife—no longer children—though my heart goes out towards those dearly beloved ones with the tenderest yearnings. Pictures of our early days of wedded love are ever lingering in my imagination. I dream of the sweet fire-side circle—I see ever before me the once placid face of my Alice, as her eyes looked into my own with intelligent confidence. I feel her arms twine about my neck—the music of her voice is ever sounding in my ears."

Here the speaker's emotion overcame him. His utterance was choked, and he stood silent with bowed head and trembling limbs. The dense mass of people were hushed into an oppressive stillness, that was broken here and there by half-stifled sobs. At this moment there was a movement in the crowd.—A single female figure, before whom every one appeared instinctively to give way, was seen passing up the aisle. This was not observed by Delaney, until she had come nearly in front of the platform on which he stood. Then the movement caught his ear, and lifting his eyes, that instantly fell upon Alice—for it was she that was pressing onward—he bent forward towards her, with suddenly lifted hands and eager eyes, and stood like a statue until she had gained the stand, and advanced quickly to his side. For a moment the two stood thus, the whole audience thrilled with the scene, upon their feet, and bending forward. Then Delancy opened his arms, and Alice threw herself upon his bosom with a quick, wild gesture. Thus for the full space of a minute they stood—every one fully, as by a singular intuition, understanding the scene. One of the ministers then came forward, and gently separated them.

"No—no," said Delaney, "you must not, you cannot take her away from me."

"Heaven forbid that I should do that!" replied the Minister. "But, by your own confession, she is not your wife."

"I am not," returned Delaney, mournfully.

"But ready to take up her vows again," Alice said, smiling through tears that now shined over her face.

Before that large assemblage, all standing, and few with dry eyes, was said, in a broken voice, the marriage ceremony that gave Delaney and Alice again to each other. As the Minister, an aged man, with thin white locks, finished the rite, he laid his hands upon the heads of the two he had joined in holy bands, and lifting up his aged eyes, that streamed with drops of gladness, he said, in a solemn voice—

"What God hath joined together, let not man put asunder!"

"Amen!" was uttered by the whole assembly, as with a single voice.

THE HAPPY MIND.

BY MISS ELIZA COOK.

Out upon the calf, I say,
Who turns his grumbling head away,
And quarrels with his feed of hay,
Because it is not clover.
Give to me the happy mind,
That will ever seek and find
Something fair and something kind,
All the wide world over.

'Tis passing good to have an eye,
That always manages to spy
Some star to bear it company,
Though planets may be ridden;
And Mrs. Eve was foolish, very,
Not to be well content and merry,
With peach, plum, melon, grape and cherry,
When apples were forbidden.

We love rare flowers, but suppose
We're far from Italy's rich rose,
Must we then turn up our nose
At lilies of the valley?
Can't we snuff at something sweet,
In the "bough pots" that we meet,
Cried and sold in the city street,
By "Sally in our alley?"

Give me the heart that spreads its wings,
Like the free bird that soars and sings,
And sees the bright sides of all things,
From Behring's Straits to Dover.
It is a bank that never breaks,
It is a store thief never takes,
It is a rock that never shakes,
All the wide world over.

We like to give old Care the slip,
And listen to the "crank and quip,"
At social board from fluent lip,—
No fellowship is better:
But he must lack the gentle grace,
That marks the best of human race,
Who cannot see a friendly face,
In mastiff, hound, or setter.

Our hungry eyes may fondly wish
To revel amid flesh and fish,
And gloat upon the silver dish,
That holds a golden plover.
Yet, if our table be but spread,
With savory, cheese, and oaten bread,
Be thankful if we're always fed,
As well as the wide world over.

We may prefer Italian notes,
Or chose the melody that floats,
About the gay Venitian boats,
Half wild in our extolling;
But surely music may be found,
When some rough native harp unbound,
Strikes up like cherries "round and sound,"
With English "fol-de-rolling."

We may be poor—but then, I guess,
Our trouble with pomp is less,
For they who wear a russet dress,
May never fear the rumpling.
And though champagne froth never hums
Between our fingers and our thumbs,
Red apoplexy rarely comes,
To dine with plain stone dumpling.

Then out upon the calf, I say,
Who turns his grumbling head away,
And quarrels with his feed of hay,
Because it is not clover.
Give to me the happy mind,
That will ever seek and find
Something good and something kind,
All the wide world over.

SCÆVOLA;

A TALE OF THE EARLY DAYS OF ROME.

BY H. W. HERBERT,

AUTHOR OF "CROMWELL," "MARMADUKE WYVIL," ETC. ETC.

Never had Rome been in such peril, since from the long steep slope of Alba the little colony was removed to the Quirinal Hill, hard by the yellow Tiber, under the guidance of the two bold brethren, sons of the great Quirinus; a mighty Tuscan host, under Lars Porsena, of Clusium, had buckle[red] the fallen fortunes of the Tarquins, those Latin Kings of Rome, and with the Roman exiles, and many a Latian lucumo, lay just beyond the Tiber. They had already taken the Janiculum, and would have carried Rome itself but for the desperate valour of Horatius Cocles, who made good the Sublician bridge against unnumbered odds, until the rafters were broken down behind him, and the advance of the enemy utterly frustrated. Now opposite the guarded walls, the narrow river alone interposed between them; upon the gentle slope lay the entrenched and rampired camp of the Tuscans, itself a rival city. The large square space enclosed within its trench and palisade, crowded with streets of neat white tents, and having the Pretorium of the monarch, a proud pavilion glittering with gilded ornaments and many a waving banner, in the centre, was in full view of the Roman sentinels, who, pinched by the famine that had begun already to assail the beleaguered town, and dispirited by the absolute prohibition to sally forth or skirmish, gazed even enviously on the bright blazing fires of the enemy, about which they might see the busy cooks, sweating and toiling all day long, and on the shambles crowded with cattle, driven off from their own plundered farms and devastated pastures. On every side the outposts of the foe narrowed them in and straightened them. On the hills westward of the city, every crag bristled with the javelins of a detachment, watching like some fierce bird of prey from its steep eyrie, to pounce upon whatever convoy might dare approach the walls—every brake, dingle, or ravine, concealed a cloud of archers. While on the level meadows, by Tiber's side, gay squadrons of the Latin horse, and the proud Roman exiles, with Sextus the accursed—the vile polluter of fair and chaste Lucretia—the worst and the eldest of the Tarquins, or Aruns, youngest and bravest of that bad race, at their head, might be seen wheeling to and fro, like falcons on the wing, ready to stoop upon their foes on the slightest opportunity. Despondency sat on the brows of the noblest and the boldest of Rome's Patrician warriors—the Consuls, as they went around the walls all armed, and glittering in their brazen panoply, with their twelve lictors at their backs, had not a word of cheering import to utter to their spiritless and faltering soldiery. The orders not to fight had cast a gloom over the fiercest and most fiery, and those who would have rushed upon certain death undaunted and even cheerful, now pined, although secure from present peril. It was the afternoon of a hot summer day, and the dews were already beginning to fall over the withered grass and leafy woods—the deep green meadows on either side of the bright Tiber, lay broad and fair in the rich yellow sunlight, with many a reach and winding of the tranquil river, flashing out to the sunbeams like sheets of polished silver, and all the grand and massive woods, which covered the horizon toward the sea, steeped in calm purple shadows.—Few of the soldiery were visible upon the walls of Rome, for only a centurion's guard were posted on the river's bank, beside the ruins of the Sublician bridge, with a light crimson banner pitched in the green sward, and a hundred lances standing erect beside it, with their long steel heads gleaming merrily. Several fine horses, with handsome trappings, were tethered here and there beside them, but the men were outstretched on the grass, in the shadows of some scattered willow bushes. A solitary sentinel stood on the summit of the Capitoline stairs, and though the distance was considerable, the plumage on his helmet, the folds of his drapery, and all his glittering accoutrements, could be distinctly seen. None of the skirmishers of the enemy were visible, though several threads of smoke rising up from among the bushes on the hill sides, indicated the spots where they were posted, ready to show themselves, and make themselves felt at a moment's notice. One horseman only was in view, galloping rapidly from the woods in the rear of the Tuscan camp, bearing despatches, probably, and he too was thrown out in bold relief, as he crossed the summits of ridge after ridge, cutting clear against the blue sky, and then for a moment disappearing in the alternate hollows. Within the camp all was at rest and peaceful, the idle soldiery loitering about in scattered groups, lounging upon the benches in the shade of the pavilions, drinking and jesting one with another, or playing at games of chance, with dice, upon the heads of some empty wine casks. There was not a breath of air to waive one of the many banners which decked the lines of that confederated host; and all their glittering folds hung lazily around the flag staff[s], adding to the appearance of quiet and lassitude which seemed to pervade every thing—the very sentin[els] slumbered upon their posts, and the only things wh[ich] were at all in motion, the smoke wreaths near[ly], which went up here and there from the cooking fir[es], curled lazily to and fro, as if reluctant to leave [the] earth, and blend themselves in the cool transpa[rent] skies. On a high platform, with three steps le[ading] up to it, in front of the great pretorium, or royal [tent] were placed two curule chairs, something lighter [than] dern camp stools, except that they had low a[rch]backs, made of carved ivory, beautifully [wrought] and inlaid with gold, and near one of them [was a] small circular table, with writing implements [and] parchment, but no one occupied the [chairs], now had as yet even ascended the platform. [From] the aspect of the camp and city, at the mo[ment] the horseman, mentioned above, arrived [at full] in the rear of the ramparts, and after some [delay] ley was admitted by the sentinels on [the Insti] his horse without, fastened to one of [the] After dismounting, and thus gaining [admittance] new comer sauntered slowly up the [street], the central pavilion, passing from time [to time] change a brief question and answer [with the bus] passer by, but not attempting to [have] communication with any one. H[e appeared] admirably formed youth, not, it [seemed] above the ordinary height of men, but extraordinarily strong and muscular. His shoulders were very broad, and his chest full and rounded. His arms were above the due length which would have been in strict proportion to his size, and extremely sinewy; his legs were well shaped, and gave the idea not only of great strength, but of unusual agility. He was dressed in a somewhat singular style, though one not unfrequently seen among the peasantry or hunters of the Appennines, and was perhaps more remarkable from its contrast to his face, and the peculiar expression of his high and patrician features. He wore a low crested cap, of that form which the Romans called galeras, made of the skin stripped from the head of a wolf, with the jaws and teeth still attached to it, and seeming to grin savagely over his broad and massive brow. A part of the bushy tail of the same fierce beast of prey had been sewn in the guise of a rude crest feather, across the top of this uncouth head-piece, and a thong of the skin held it tight under the wearer's chin. His neck, and the upper part of his breast, and all his sinewy arms, were bare to the shoulder, except that he had on a pair of armlets, if they might so be termed, of the same brindled hide, guarding his wrists, where the vulnerable veins and sinews would otherwise have been left exposed dangerously, nearly extending to the elbows, like the top of modern gauntlets, but leaving the hands at liberty.

His dress was a loose tunic of some coarse linen stoff, exceedingly thick and heavy, confined at the waist by a belt of wolf-skin, in which were seen two knives, one a common straight two-edged dagger, with a black leather scabbard and a brazen hilt, the other a long, heavy-bladed, crooked weapon, not very much unlike a modern billhook, made sharp at the inner edge, and carried in a clumsy carved sheath, which, with the hilt, was made of the wood of the Italian maple. His feet were covered by rude shoes of ill-tanned leather, and his legs were defended upward to the knee by a species of complicated network of leather thongs. He carried in his hand a long light javelin, with a broad head of polished steel, with a long cord, or amentum, as it was termed, attached to the handle, and wound into a loose coil, which would easily unclew itself and run out when the weapon was hurled by the javelineer. A short cloak of goat-skin, with the hair on, hung from his left shoulder, and had its other corner looped into the back of his girdle, at the right side.

Many eyes were fixed with a curious scrutiny upon him as he strolled carelessly along, but they were not perhaps so much attracted even by the singularity of his attire, as they were by the fine union of strength with activity and grace which all his limbs presented to the eye, by the resolute and bold determination expressed by his firm, [illegible] and above all, by the eminent beauty of his whole countenance, and of each several feature. His hair, black as the wing of the wild raven, and no less lustrous, clustered in thick and curly masses over his head, but was cut short on the neck behind, and parted carefully in front under the grizzly head-piece. His eye was keen as the eagle's, piercingly penetrative, yet at the same time calm; it might almost have been termed cold, and very steady. His nose was thin, and highly Roman, his mouth well cut, though there was a habit of compression in the lips, and a trick of clinching the teeth rigidly together, which spoke plainly of unwavering resolution, as did the sharp, clear eye of fiery valor. The face and chin were clean shaved, as if to show the massive outlines of a jaw and chin compact and hard, and solid as if they had been cast in bronze.

That young man could not certainly have passed his twenty-third or twenty-fourth year, an age in which the mind is for the most part more or less under the rules of impulses and passions, than of determinate and steady principles. In him, however, there was nothing that would indicate that his mind had ever wavered, or that he had once hedged aside from his purpose. A physiognomist would have warned you to do no wrong to such a man, or having wronged him, to lose no time in placing seas between yourself and his certain vengeance. He would have told you that the soaring falcon was not more certain of his swoop on the trembling dove, than he to wreak a tenfold vengeance on the head of his foeman. He would have told you that the bloodhound would not hang closer on the traces of the hurt deer, than he upon the scent of injuries—that the sagacious elephant would be more likely to forget, than he, the least wrong done to him—the merciless tiger be more likely to forgive and spare his prostrate victim. He would have told you that to him peril would but be an incentive to exertion—that pleasure would not woo him from his course, nor luxury melt in the least his iron energies. He was indeed made of the stuff from which were modelled the mightiest heroes of that race, the most wonderful, perhaps, that ever trod the earth—indomitable, stern, fierce, even pitiless, in the prosecution of their everlasting and insatiate ambition—hard, resolute and fearless—the old Roman, in the days of the Republic. That man a peasant or a hunter of the Appenines!—that man a [illegible] and senseless Sabine, or a wild Dannian, from the forests of Peucetia!—as well might you mistake him for the shrewd supple, polished Greek—or for the dark-hued Mauritanian! A [illegible] inch of him!—a Roman!—a Patrician!—born, doubtless, on the sumptuous Quirinal—trained from his infancy to run, and leap, and wrestle, to hurl the ponderous bar, and launch the massive discus, to swim the rapids of the Tiber, to bear the heaviest toils of manhood while yet a very stripling on the wide Field of Mars—a soldier from his cradle, inured to all extremes of cold or heat, to thirst, and hunger, and fatigue, and pain, by that iron discipline which made the Roman legionary the most perfect soldier that the world ever witnessed. A Roman who has drawn in, with the very sustenance from the maternal breast, that deathless amor patria in which no people ever yet surpassed them—that furious wish for national renown, and national glory, which in them stood in the place of all milder virtues, in which the love of parents towards their children, children towards their parents, maids towards the chosen of their hearts, was merged and obliterated altogether—that fixed and resolute ambition that made them devote themselves, really prodigal of life, to certain fate, if by their dying they could do aught for Rome's aggrandizement or safety. A Roman, by every glance of his eye, every curl of his lip, every strong footstep printed on the earth, each one of which might be interpreted to say, "Onward and forward, but back, never—not for life itself!" And yet the dull Etruscans gaze on his princely port, and martial tread, and fancy him a mere boor from the hills!

Lo! there is now a bustle in the camp, and round about the king's pavilion. Forth come the lictors, two and two, with their bright axes bound about with rods, and twenty-four in number ranged themselves round about the platform. Emblems of magistracy and of rule, which the Roman State, ever prompt to borrow whatever it deemed good in the policy of other nations, had itself borrowed from Etrusia—and after them a slave, bearing a brazen tripod, which he set down in front of the platform, before the curule. It was filled with some fuel of an exceedingly combustible nature, and burned with a fierce, vivid flame, upon which the slave scattered frankincense from time to time, diffusing pleasant odors, and filling the whole atmosphere with spicy perfume. Immediately after the lictors had taken up their stations, two persons, both habited in crimson tunics, with white robes above them, came forth from the tent, and ascending the steps of the platform, seated themselves on the curule chairs in silence. There was a simplicity both in the dress and manners of those eras that mocked the statelieness of modern times, scorned the servility of modern homage. Those persons were Lars Porsena, the King, the mightiest king of Etrusca—perhaps of Italy—and his chief secretary. Yet was there no distinction in their garb—no crown upon the head of Porsena—no sceptre in his hand—only an ivory footstool, sole token of the king's higher rank. The soldiers neither bowed, nor shouted, but fell into their ranks quietly, and stood to their arms in silence.—Meanwhile, the disguised Roman, or Dannian hunter, as he wished to seem, advanced to the esplanade below the platform, and stood there leaning upon his javelin, and gazing with apparent indifference, but really with intense eagerness and curiosity upon all that was passing before his eyes.

Meanwhile, a trumpet sounded, and one of the lictors forthwith made proclamation that the soldiers should advance one by one, in turn, to the king and receive their pay. The officers broke up their companies and the men ran forward with a great shout and crowded round the platform, which they ascended each after each, and received coin from the secretary, who sat by the circular table, examining the tickets of the men, and noting down the sums which he disbursed. For a little space the young Roman stood motionless gazing as if in much curiosity at the soldiers and chief personages, whom he was, in truth, examining anxiously, endeavoring to distinguish between the two—for he dared not inquire lest he should create suspicion by the question—by and bye, however, he made up his mind, as it seemed, and leaving his javelin leaning against the canvass wall of one of the tents, sauntered slowly forward among the soldiers, as if curious to come nearer, endeavoring, not without a certain degree of success, to feign a stupid stare, as of an ignorant male boor. He stopped at times and stared about him; then sauntered on a pace or two; then stood again quite quiet; until at length he won his way without exciting any surmise as the object of his motions up to the foot of the platform—then he stood waiting calmly for an opportunity, when no one should be interposed between himself and the person whom he took to be the king. At last the occasion came; then, with one vigorous bound, he cleared the three steps at once, unsheathing the straight dagger as he did so, and, before any one could interrupt him, and, in fact, before any one suspected what he was about, reached the side of the secretary, oversetting the table by his impetuous speed. Another instant, in which the dagger flashed in the sunny air with the violence and certainty of the electric fluid—it pierced the crimson tunic—it pierced the broad breast of the secretary—and stood hilt-deep, fixed in his very heart. "This to thy heart, Lars Porsena," he shouted; "so perish all Rome's foes!" And ere the secretary fell, which he did instantly, deluging the whole platform with his lifeblood, Mutius darted off, whirling the heavy billhook from its wooden scabbard, and cleaving, by two heavy, downright blows, two of the lictors, who sprang forward to intercept it, to the teeth; and almost escaping, but as he leaped down from the back of the platform, dodging the blows made at him by the heavy axes of the lictors, and bounded off at a speed that would have set pursuit at defiance, he was met by a large body of soldiery rushing toward the spot, alarmed by what had passed, and after a violent resistance, by which three more of his assailants were either killed or desperately wounded, was seized and dragged back to the scene of his late daring exploit.

Lars Porsena arose, and, standing up, majestically waved his arm abroad, and cried aloud to his soldiers—

"Lo! I am here, my children! The base assassin's blow has failed. Bring him before me!"—Then as the dauntless Roman stood, all calm and collected, at his foot-stool—"Who art thou?" cried the king.

"Mutius, a Roman, and a noble!"

"And whence this villainous outrage?"

"Know, king," replied the youth, "that neither arms nor valor, prudence nor daring, sentinels nor guards shall save thee from the certain death which awaits thee—awaits all the foes of Rome! On thy throne, at thy festive board, on thy nightly couch, daggers shall be about thee. Death under the royal robe—death in the brimming cup—death in the pleasant sleep. Three hundred Romans have conspired—have sworn together—that, since the sword may not reach thee, the dagger shall find out thy life.—Three hundred, whom neither death nor torture shall deter!—who will not fail, as I have failed, nor falter more than I."

"Bold words, young Roman!" answered Porsena; "let us see now if thy deeds match them, or if they be words only! Ho, lictors, summon the torturers, summon the headsman, with the axe and block—and, ye, unbind your scourges!"

"See king," replied the other, "see what a Roman can endure, when it is for Rome he suffers."—And, with the words, shaking off the grasp of his guards he walked slowly to the tripod and thrust his left hand into the midst of that fierce flame—he held it there immoveable and calm, not a frown on his dark high brow, not a contortion on his noble features! He held it there amid the unrepressed amazement, and undisguised admiration of all who witnessed his heroic constancy, until the member shrivelled, and cracked, and the black gore oozed out, and the hand fell a heap of ashes upon the glowing embers.—"Judge now," he said; "judge now!" with an exulting smile—"what terror death has for a Roman, who can bear fire unterrified."

Lars Porsena sprang forward, and seized him by the left hand—"Brave Roman!" he exclaimed, "be my friend, as I will be a true friend henceforth to Rome and Romans!—Thy valor has preserved thy country. Go—thou art as free as air. Go with him, lictors—carry the richest presents—say Porsena sends peace to Rome for love of Mutius the left-handed."

Thus Rome won peace and honor—hence her bold champion bore the name, and his sons after him, forever—the proud surname of Scævola, or the left-handed.

THE BRIDAL VISIT.

BY MRS. ABDY.

Three weeks have elapsed since the marriage
Of the pretty demure Anne Grey;
So on Monday we ordered a carriage,
Our formal first visit to pay:
I shall fully describe its progression,
And then, if you happen to call
On a dozen young pairs in succession,
My sketch will do well for them all.

The bride, in robes gracefully waving,
Sat looking as gentle and good
As a bride in an Annual engraving—
All satin, white ribbons, and blonde;
And her words were so soft, so bewitching,
That she seemed like the fairy's pet girl,
Who, whenever she spoke, kept enriching
Her friends with a flower or a pearl!

The bridesmaid, the blue-eyed Kate Harris,
Looked simpering, rosy, and neat,
Not at all like the "Bridesmaid by Parris,"
With her wreath of white flowers at her feet!
And I thought, as with arch emulation
Her "principal's" movements she eyed,
She might soon, on a short preparation,
Succeed in the part of a bride.

The bridegroom looked joyous and pleasant,
Yet, somehow, I felt for his doom
Not a lord of creation was present,
Twelve ladies were ranged round the room:
Their fathers, their husbands, their brothers,
Sent cards (such I find is the rule),
And the happiest man of all others
Mounted guard as "le cavalier seul!"

All poured in his ear the perfections
Of his fair one, the wonder of earth,—
Such a mind! such a soul! such affections!
Such meekness, discretion, and worth!

Then such talent—time only could show it—
It would make life so joyously glide,
As to prove the sweet words of the poet,
"That "the wife is more dear than the bride."

And the lady, meanwhile, was delighted
By the whispers of many a voice;
All merits, they vowed, were united
In the fortunate man of her choice;
"Such eyes! such a sound understanding!"—
Then they praised her new harp, and worked chairs,
The time-piece that stood on the landing,
And the green-house half way down the stairs,

None breathed forth a doubt or a stricture—
Alas! can it be, that, ere long,
Care shall darken this honey-moon picture,
And change its right side to its wrong?
Must these lovers have seasons and weathers,—
Must they ever the region forsake
Of smiles, morning visits, white feathers,
Blonde veils, Lisbon wine, and plum-cake?

Can that furniture ever grow faded?
Can that bride muse on house-keeping ills?
Can the brows of her loved one be shaded
While turning o'er tradesmen's long bills?
Can friends blame their silly enthralment,
And pass them with looks cold as ice,
Or give them a daily instalment
From a great joint-stock bank of advice?

Yes, the roses desert Hymen's fetter,
When sovereigns grow scarce in the purse,
And the cheering "I take thee for better,"
Gives place to "I find thee the worse;"
Hearts, once pain and danger defying,
Then shrink from the world's slightest rub,
And the lady grows nervous and sighing,
And the gentleman pines for his club.

Yet let me not cloud with prediction
A bright sunny season like this—
Eldorado is not quite a fiction,
We may now and then peep at its bliss;
And would you its wonders discover,
And breathe for a time its pure air,
Just go, ere the honey-moon's over,
And call on a new married pair!

A RACE FOR A WIFE;

OR,

Peggy Magrath, the Irish Coquette.

A True Story.

BY MRS. S. C. HALL.

Andrew Kennedy and Mike Barry were suitors for the hand of Peggy Magrath. The power which Irish fathers exercise over their children, is often any thing but gentle; they dispose of them in marriage frequently to those they consider the best bidders; and it is no small compliment to Irish women to say that, even in instances where they have loved others, they very generally succeed in withdrawing their affections, and making true and devoted wives, and affectionate mothers. In the case of Peggy Magrath, however, one candidate stood about as well with her father as the other. Both were fine stout fellows, able to work, when they could get work to do, with a cabin and a potatoe garden, "waiting for furniture," and both anxious to possess the land, heart, and little fortune of Peggy Magrath. There are two ways of winning a woman's favour, the right and the wrong. Andrew Kennedy had chosen the right, Mike Barry the wrong. Andrew in the first instance made sure of the girl—Mike of the father. And if Andrew had been a whit worse off in the world—if his cow had not been as good—his feather bed as heavy, or his pig as weighty as those of his rival, might would have overcome right, and Andrew would have had no chance. But as it was, the father finding that one "boy" was as well to do as the other, and that moreover the "faction" of the rejected would be too strong for him, though they would yield to the lady, declared, as he was walking home from "early mass," that he would leave it "'twixt the Almighty and his daughter;" let her settle it in God's name, and he'd wash his hands of it altogether; only she must settle on one or the other that week, for he could not be having his peace of mind destroyed with her and her sweethearts, any longer—his house was like a fair or a station with them, for boys, "that could not let the girl alone;" and sure it was well for him and his "ould woman," they had but one daughter; for if they had more, they'd quit the country sooner than be bothered entirely the way he had with them—for bachelors!

Now Peggy was as arrant a coquette as ever flirted a fan in a ball room; one of those who are born with an intense desire to continue the "slave trade;" who delighted in tormenting; and who, whether she cared or not for a man, would enjoy teazing him; indeed, the better she loved, the greater her pleasure in tantalizing the object of her affections. As long as her father wavered between Andrew and Mike, the true affection she bore the former made her dread losing him so much, that she was far more affectionate to him than she had ever been to any one else; and once when her father said something that led her to believe he decidedly favoured Mike, she burst into a flood of tears, and declared she would "die" sooner than marry him. Now when her father, accompanied by both suitors, entered the house, and he told her there were her bachelors, and she must make up her mind which of the two should be her husband, for he (her father,) had no mind to keeping an old maid in his house. She blushed [illegible] looked to [illegible] the long lashes of her eyes without once raising the lids, and to the utter astonishment of both her father and Andrew, accepted Mike's offer to dance the first jig with her that evening—completely turning her back on her former favorite.—Mike having got her consent to the dance, eager to show himself off to the best advantage, bethought that his "brogans" would look bad "on the floor," and, like a fool, left the field open to Andrew, while he set out to borrow his brother's "pumps." This opportunity was not lost upon Andrew, who renewed his suit, but became thoroughly perplexed by the waywardness of woman's nature—he could make nothing of her.

"Indeed," she said, "she would as soon—as her father was so hard upon her—marry one as the other. May be she showed more favour one time to Andrew than to Mike, and may be at another time she'd show more favour to Mike than to Andrew; may be she'd just toss up for them—call Mike the Head, and Andrew the Harp, and so get her luck."

Andrew, poor fellow! was half mad with vexation,—and yet, what could he do? He entertained serious thoughts of an abduction, but where was the good of it? Sure, if she was that changeable "craythur" she wasn't worth the having.

He offered to fight Mike for her, but this her father negatived at once; he would have no fighting for a child of his. "But I'll tell you what, brave boys!" exclaimed the old man; "I'll tell you what—do as I did for my good wife, and what no Irishman was ever ashamed to do—run for her! Every boy in the place is free-footed—run for her, and let the fleet foot win her!"

This was agreed upon. Both the young men were remarkable for activity—both anxious to win a bride; and, despite Peggy Magrath's coquetry, when she took her stand upon the rising ground that commanded a view of the "race course," all agreed that she was worth ten times the trouble.

"I'll tell you what it is, Peggy," said one of her companions, "I'll bet my bran new handkercher that never crossed my neck, barring this day, that Mike will be the hero; he's longer in the legs—and oh, my! but he's the active boy intirely."

"Well, whoever wins, Peg's luck will be happy; that's all I say. Suppose they should both win!" added another. "What will you do then, Peggy dear?—toss up for them?"

"There they go!" exclaimed a third—while Peggy's heart beat stout reproaches at her unfaithfulness; "there they go—it's cruel hard, so it is, to make them end such a race by coming up even this bit of a hill at the long run. Mary Grady, do you mind the day Aby Flynn, running the race for his wife, fell and cut his head, so that the grave was his wedding-bed—poor fellow!"

"I'd rather they'd give it up at once," exclaimed Peggy, following the contending parties with her eyes, and trembling from head to foot at the advantage which Mike had evidently obtained over Andrew—"I'd rather they'd give it up. Well, I don't care who wins or who loses—I'll marry which I like," she continued, bursting into tears, and covering her face with her hands.

"Oh honour, Peggy," they exclaimed; "surely, you would not be guilty of such a falsity as that?"

"Tell me," she answered, all her coquetry forgotten in her anxiety for him she really loved, so that she dared not look upon the race; "tell me, for the love of mercy, how is't going with him?"

"With him!" repeated as arrant a coquette as herself—"Which of the hims?"

"Andrew!" she breathlessly replied.

"Oh, be the dads! I don't know," she answered, winking her merry eyes at her companion, while Peggy pressed her hands more tightly than ever over hers; "I don't know at all—what do you think, Mary Mogle?"

"Oh!" said mischievous Mary, "I can't tell; I'm sure now it was six to one, and half a dozen to the other—but now—oh my! but Mike has the legs, to be sure—maybe he can't use them—thath! well that last spring he gave bates all. Oh, then, it's Mike that will make the fine husband, and no mistake—take yer hands from your eyes, Peggy, woman—there's money bid for you!"

"Open yer eyes, jewel avourneen!" said another; "here, they're coming up the hill—that's right, shout, boys. Oh, then, Mrs Mike, maybe I won't shake a foot at your wedding; take down your hands, and look for yerself—Mike, yer a rale hero!"

The young men were, as she said, running up to where they stood, but not in the degree Mary so mischievously intimated. Peggy was literally without the power to withdraw her hands; her feelings entirely overcame her.

"Take her, Mike; you well deserve her, exclaimed the tantalizing girls, as Andrew, panting and gasping, ascended considerably in advance of his rival.

But Peggy heard them not; subdued by her emotions, she had fainted on the sward. Such is the overpowering nature of woman's coquetry, that after she recovered, and was well assured of Andrew's victory, she would have played fair lady Disdain, if she dared—but her father interposed, and she is now

THE REVERSE.

A TALE OF REAL LIFE.

In the month of August, the following marriage might be found in a column of our daily papers:—"On the 18th inst., by the Rev. Philip M——, D. D., William Gordon to Maria Sheldon." Maria had made what the world would call a good match. Her husband was an honest, industrious tradesman, was engaged in a lucrative business, and had means enough to support her respectably. A neat house was furnished for their reception, and they took possession with feelings understood alone by those who marry from pure, disinterested affection.

Affairs glided on smoothly; he was attentive to his business, and she did all in her power to make his house a cheerful one. After some time, one night at ten o'clock found her waiting his return; this was unusual. For the first time since her marriage, was he out at that hour. She tried to while away the tedious moments in numerous ways, hoping that every one would be the last spent in solitude. At length he came; a political meeting, he said, detained him longer than he expected, as a number of addresses had been delivered by eminent men, and he had become interested, and had forgotten how slowly the hours passed to her, with whom he had been in the habit of passing all his leisure moments. Excusing him with a smile, she answered—

"I should not have complained of feeling weary on this your first absence; but you have been so much with me, that I have become selfish. Dear William, you must blame your previous attentions for my fault."

"Do not call it a fault, Maria; it does not need even as much as you have said; you have uttered no complaint; it is from those tell-tale eyes that I have learned how lonely you have been."

As he spoke, he fondly gazed upon the beautiful features of his wife, that upon his entrance had lost their heaviness, and sparkled with double brilliancy. He loved her with as much truth and fervour as ever warmed the heart of the fondest husband, and he resolved that excepting those hours devoted to business, none should be passed from her side. But, alas! for man's resolution! the first step had been taken; the second was not difficult.

At that time there was a great political excitement, and the meetings, as is generally the case, were held in taverns. William, though not a warm politician, was young, and like even older persons, believing his candidate the one above all capable of filling the office sought, with credit to the State. He imbibed the views of his associates, and if not as conspicuous, was as anxiously watched as those who had been foremost in the ranks. Ten o'clock now found him at home as seldom as formerly away from it—Maria attributed it all to the meetings, that she knew he was constantly attending, and therefore uttered no murmur.

It grieved her to see him return sometimes with a flushed cheek, and unsteady step; she did not give vent to her uneasiness, and only trusted when the election was over, he would forsake all that had grieved her so much, and return again to his former conduct. She was willing, as ever woman is, to look forward to a bright and beautiful future. She knew that all who live have clouds as well as sunshine to encounter, and thought the present one would soon pass away, and leave her a horizon as serene and calm as the day she looked back upon as her morning light. At the meeting where William might always be found, there was a party of young men near his own age, possessing pleasing address and manners; they made it a business to attach themselves to all new comers by inviting them to drink to their better acquaintance, and thus gently lead them into the worst of vices. They knew that William was in good business, and to him they professed the warmest friendship. They made up various kinds of excursions and pleasure parties, to all of which he was invited—and, of course, had to bear a part, if not the whole of the expense. For a man in his moderate circumstances, this could not long continue; his business was neglected—his customers finding him inattentive, sought more punctual men. When his friends found his means exhausted, they saw in him many faults that had not presented themselves before. The foremost, and most to be despised, an empty purse; that was a bugbear from which his associates shrunk with terror. He was now the father of two children, no money, no business, a ruined reputation—what was to become of him? The thought almost made him mad, and he had recourse to the bottle; with this he banished all thoughts of his condition, his home, his wife, and his children. How he succeeded we shall see.

Four years had elapsed since the conclusion of the first part of my narrative. In a room in one of the small houses that are situated in the northern part of the city, sat an interesting woman. The room was small, but very clean, and had an air of comfort that cleanliness always gives. The furniture was all for use—not a piece for ornament. In one corner stood a cradle, in which a babe was sleeping; beside it sat an elderly woman, with her foot upon the rocker; upon the hours of study. The bell rang unheeded, and when we came into school, we were, as we deserved, to be, reprimanded by our good and indulgent preceptor; and many of our number, ashamed of their behaviour, refused to offend in like manner again. It was not so with us all.

One day, a part of our number having staid out upon the river more than a quarter of an hour after the bell had done ringing, one of the boys was sent for us; but we soon forgot that we had been called, and continued our game. Shortly, we saw the preceptor, himself, coming down to the river. We were then alarmed; and all, but myself and Nathaniel Beecher, ran, by a round-about way, to the shore and to school. We resolved to stay the whole afternoon. The preceptor came out upon the wharf, and called to us to come to him. Fearing that we should be taken back to school and punished, we resolved not to answer, and pretended not to hear him. After repeatedly calling us, and receiving no answer, he came upon the ice; but when he had walked a short distance from the shore, we saw that we were in no danger of his catching us, as the ice was very smooth. At length, in an attempt to catch me, the preceptor slipped and fell heavily upon the ice. I stood still, and dared not go near, for fear he would punish me; but I was now very sorry for what we had done.—Our preceptor had always been kind and good to us, and my feelings were hurt to think I had been so ungrateful. Meantime he had got up, and with a painful effort walked to the shore. I followed him, and Nat went off to the other side of the river. As I approached the shore, I turned to see where he was going, continuing to skate backwards as I looked. Suddenly I found myself in the water. I had fallen into a hole which had been cut for fishing. As I dropped I threw out my arms, and thus saved myself from going under; but the current was very strong, and it was with the utmost difficulty that I could hold myself above the water. I felt as though some evil spirit beneath the water was dragging me under, and my heart sunk within me. At length I was drawn out of the water by my preceptor. He spoke kindly to me, and said he would take me home, that I might change my clothes. I was very much affected. I had prepared to bear my well-merited punishment; but when I heard his kind and gentle tones, and saw that he was not angry, I burst into a passionate flood of tears, and, dropping on my knees, begged his pardon for my bad behavior. He took me up at once, and told me never to kneel but to the Lord, that he would forgive me. We had nearly reached the shore, when I looked round for Nat. He was looking towards us, and skating along with his arms folded, and all at once dropped beneath the ice and disappeared. He had, while looking at us, skated into an air-hole. I involuntarily screamed, and started with all speed for the place. The preceptor followed, having guessed the cause of my exclamation.

The accident had been seen from the shore, and many persons came hurrying to the spot, and among them the father of the boy. He was told, on shore, that it was his oldest son; and rushing to the spot, and putting his head down in the hole, held it there a long time, looking, but all was in vain. The rapid tide had borne him far down the river, and his body was never more seen.

The events of this day taught me the lesson of obedience. It stamped upon my mind the truth, that the first great duty, next to our devotion to our Maker, is respect and obedience to those who are placed in authority over us. I never again played truant.

WASHINGTON.

We have need to remind no American reader that the day on which this paper is dated is the anniversary of the birth of GEORGE WASHINGTON. While nothing which we can say can add a leaf to his laurels, and nothing which any man living can write can diminish his fame, we should be failing in our own duty to pass such an occasion without a note of attention. We are bound, as are all other citizens, to remember, and to cause others to recollect the example which he has left us; and to cite the fame which has outlived party spirit and the attacks of contemporaries, as a proof that those who deserve well will receive the willing justice of a grateful people. While we can commend no living politician or statesman with entire immunity from suspicion as a partizan; it is a grateful exercise of patriotism to turn back and dwell on the virtues of those whose account is closed; and to praise where we can do it without liability to the charge of speaking from interest or prejudice.

Such is the popular feeling. Men of all parties and of no political party, meet on common ground this day; rejoicing, apparently among other causes of gratulation, that there is one thing at least, on which this party-divided country can speak unanimously—the fame and glory of one whose whole character—not mere exploits—furnish the brightest page in the history of his time. The worst man must [illegible] glorious passages for the history of his country, honorable in his public, while despicable in his private life; or the good man may shine for awhile in all relations, and then sink, the partial praises of his countrymen kindly dropping a veil over the ill conclusion of what was well begun;—but few—very few—like Washington, are examples to posterity from the cradle to the grave, and alike honorable in all relations, and under all circumstances.

The ancients made their heroes after death, gods and demi-gods. We, better taught, stop short of that impious folly; and as our reverence is preferable to their idolatry, so is the character of the subject of our respect and veneration immeasurably above that of any niche-filler in the Pantheon. Let it not then be empty words, or mere declamation. Let us endeavor to feel what we profess, and to imitate what we so much laud and hear lauded.

As appropriate to this day we submit a poem from "The Leydon Bard," which has lain many days in our possession, awaiting this anniversary.

CHARACTER OF WASHINGTON.

Blest is the land that in its greatness feels
The mellow breeze which Freedom's lofty breath
Wafts o'er its plains; where reason, perched aloft
Upon the summit of intelligence,
Smiles at the feeble writhings of the serfs,
Whose necks with ignorance are bound to earth,
And sorely trammeled by the tread of kings.
The proper sphere for Liberty is light;
There man is man, and not the slave of slaves,
For where his thoughts and feelings are confined
Within the narrow compass of his hearth,
And never, e'en in whispers, heard beyond,
Their energies must soon be lulled to sleep
Within the gloomy chasm of despair.
Then degradation spreads her mournful pall
O'er all his hopes and social sympathies,
Beneath whose shameful curtain he is swept
Unheard, unnoticed, and unknown, to ruin.
But where no frontier rears its frowning head
To fetter thought, except the boundless space
Of vast infinity; and mind unchained
In reason, or in fancy's shallop glides
Upon the bosom of reflection's tide,
There truth and system must have their abode.
In stately grandeur peers the public mind,
Robed in its pristine galaxy of light;
And despots tremble to behold the land
Where Freedom dwells, and Liberty prevails.
Such is the land, the labors, and design
Of him who well conceived, and carried out
A brilliant scheme of human happiness.
He moved his lips, and hemispheres stood [illegible]
He waved his hand, and legions came with joy,
To do his bidding, and award him praise.
His rusty sabre he with dread unsheathed,
To cultivate the dreadful art of war,
Amid the files of his united band;
But kingdoms his delightful mandates heard,
And statue-like they lingered back aghast
To see, admire, and tremble as he spoke.
The path to glory beaten well, and fresh
With trails of champions that had gone before.
Seemed dignified, and honored to excess,
As first he entered on the weary march,
And trod upon the portal's golden step
Of fame's time-honored Parthenon.

The hand
Of high Omnipotence protected him
In peril's hour through warfare's mingled din;
And his deep gratitude to smiling Heaven,
Stands registered upon time's records now,
By far the brightest token of his life—
A lasting echo of what man should be.
The champion of the sacred rights of man,
And victor o'er the mistress of the seas,
He valued not what mortal greatness brought;
But humbly 'mid the honored of his race,
Resigned a sceptre of such costly worth,
That e'en the proudest potentate of earth,
Could ne'er demand a more illustrious boon.
The foes that first as captives to him came,
No sooner gazed upon his lenient brow,
Than in a grateful shout of tender thanks,
With beating hearts that his kind mercies touched,
They praised the goodness of his noble heart.
E'en mid the legions of his enemies,
Were voices heard that proudly spoke, to bless
The institutions that to him gave birth.
The sage-like maxims which fell from his lips,
In careful recollection were preserved,
As precepts that should be a nation's guide;
And which might teach the Delphian priests of old
A lesson heretofore to them unknown.

Whilst in life's grand arena last he stood,
And to his fellow-lab'rers bade adieu,
A nation's warmest sympathies rushed forth,
In streams of adoration o'er his head.
Loud were the shouts which hailed him victor now,
As soldier, statesman, citizen and friend,
Their patriotic echoes spread abroad,
Returning with new lustre for his name;
Whilst ev'ry bosom vied with eager care,
To twine around his silvered hairs a wreath
Of everlasting gratitude and love.

Behold him after life well spent, in peace,
Upon the margin of his fav'rite stream,
Beneath the branches of domestic shade,
There he his harp of meditation tuned,
To notes of sweet reflection; and beheld
Beyond the narrow pale wherein he sat,
His NAME, his COUNTRY, and young LIBERTY
Bloom altogether—three most noble flowers!
This was the glory of a virtuous life.
To move at large before a wond'ring world
In all the pomp and majesty of fame,
Unscathed by envy's sharp and fatal tongue;
Hurl to the earth a mighty corner-stone,
Whose downfall should regenerate mankind;
And when the vast achievement had been done,
Fly to his home, and there expire in peace!
To contemplate the virtues of this Sire,
Amazement bursts, and wonder fills the brain
With marvellings at Nature's handiwork.
How from the deep research of ages past
She could conceal perfection's mould of mind;
And then, as though unconscious, send it forth,
To ornament immortal WASHINGTON!

To the Editors of the Philadelphia Saturday Courier:

Gentlemen—If you deem the following poetry worthy of a place in your popular and widely circulated paper, you will publish it of course. It was composed some few years past, by Robert Downman, Esq., of Greenvale, Lancaster County, Virginia, and I am sure, as I have the original in my possession, that it has never been given to the public through the medium of the press. This highly gifted young man, now no more, was deprived of his sight in early infancy.—He possessed a rare talent and great fondness for Music and Poetry, and his spirit-stirring performances on the Violin, Flute, Fingeolet, and Accordion, were equalled only by the beauty and originality of thought which characterized his poetical composition. He lived for several years previous to, and at the time of his lamented death, near the then dilapidated Protestant Episcopal Church, which was made the subject of the following lines. Fortunately for him, he was nursed in the lap of affluence; but more fortunate still, he had the respect, the esteem and the confidence of all who knew him; and he died leaving many to exclaim in the language of one of his own verses,

"O Death! where will thy darts be staid,
Thou mocker of all human promise?
O Grave! how much we love is laid,
In thy cold lap forever from us.

Yours, &c. W.

WRITTEN AMONG THE RUINS OF WHITE CHAPEL CHURCH.

These ruined aisles and mouldering walls,
Have oft to holy anthems given,
Sweet echo, when the voice of all,
Ascended up in praise to Heaven.
And age and youth, and high and low,
Together came in humble love
And joined to worship and adore
The one Eternal Throne above.

And beauty too, was there with smiles,
That seemed to stern decay denied;
Each happy bridegroom through these aisles,
Once led along his blushing bride.
And where are now that mingled throng,
Of grief and love—of fear and trust?
Swept by the tide of time along,
Around these walls asleep in dust.

And graves are here, o'er which may weep,
The friends whom memory long shall prove
While thousands here forgotten sleep,
That once had life, and hope, and love.
And there where holy men have stood,
The everlasting truths explaining,
The owl may build in solitude,
'Mid tombs themselves to ruin waning.

And walls in silence moulder down,
Whence every voice and sound hath fled,
Save where the wild winds seem to moan,
And hymn the requiem of the dead.
And as their sighing numbers flow,
Through ruined aisles with mournful swell,
I deem it angels sorrowing o'er,
The ruin which on Eden fell.
And in a warning voice they call,
To Adam's thoughtless race below,
All that is mortal since the Fall,
Back to the dust must surely go.

DEATH SCENE OF THE CHRISTIAN.

BY ROBERT MORRIS.

"Faith in her God, she welcomed death,
A sweet release from pain,
And gently yielding up her breath,
She died—to live again."

The triumph of Christianity over all other forms and systems of belief, its divine origin and heaven-inspiring hopes, are never made so distinct and conclusive, as at the closing hours of the true believer. This was forcibly illustrated a few days since, in the case of a young female of this city. She was only eighteen years of age, and had been lingering for months under the influence of that almost hopeless malady—consumption. She rose on the morning in question, and calmly mentioned to some of her friends, that she felt that her last hour was approaching. They endeavored to dispel such an idea, and to cheer her by encouraging language, as to her possible recovery and the promises of the future. But she shook her head, smiled faintly, and begged them to send for the family physician. The request was obeyed—the physician was promptly in attendance. His opinion confirmed the views of his patient. He said that she was evidently wasting rapidly away, and would not in all probability live beyond the day. Still, perfectly self-possessed and fully resigned, she prepared herself for her approaching decease. She called her friends and family around her, told them that she would soon be in the land of spirits, and bade such of them as she might not be able to see again, an affectionate farewell. She then sent for the clergyman who had attended her, and with him engaged in various religious exercises. She sang a hymn during the day appropriate to her condition, and appeared not only composed and resigned; but perfectly happy. She had long been a professed Christian, and as life approached its end, her faith and hopes in the saving and redeeming influences of Christianity, grew stronger and stronger. Her death scene was indeed calm, touching, beautiful. It formed an easy transition from the world of mortality to a region of immortality. The things of this life were parted with, without a regret. Her heart, her soul, had long been disposed to, and prepared for, the journey, she was about to take. She knew that the future would soon burst upon her, "new scenes, a new and an untried world, an eternity vast, boundless, endless. But she was a Christian, and she had faith and hope of immediate ascension to the mansions of light and glory, to the welcome of angels, and to the approving smile of the Creator."

HELEN AND EDWARD;

OR, AN EVENING AT HOME.

BY T. S. ARTHUR.

"Not going to the ball?" said Mrs. Lindley, with a look and tone of surprise. "What has come over the girl?"

"I don't know, but she says she's not going."

"Doesn't her ball dress fit?"

"Yes, beautifully."

"What is the matter, then?"

"Indeed, ma, I cannot tell. You had better go up and see her. It is the strangest notion in the world. Why, you couldn't hire me to stay at home."

Mrs. Lindley went up stairs, and entering her daughter's room, found her sitting on the side of the bed, with a beautiful ball dress in her hand.

"It isn't possible, Helen, that you are not going to this ball?" she said.

Helen looked up with a half serious, half smiling expression on her face.

"I've been trying, for the last half hour," she replied, "to decide whether I ought to go, or stay at home. I think, perhaps, I ought to remain at home."

"But what earthly reason can you have for doing so? Is it you like your dress?"

"O, yes very much. I think it beautiful."

"Doesn't it fit you?"

"As well as any dress I ever had."

"Are you not well?"

"Very well."

"Then why not go to the ball? It will be the largest and most fashionable of the season. You know that your father and myself are both going. We shall want to see you there, of course. Your father will require some very good reason for your absence."

Helen looked perplexed at her mother's last remark.

"Do you think father will be displeased if I remain at home?" she asked.

"I think he will, unless you can satisfy him that your reason for doing so is a very good one. Nor shall I feel that you doing right. I wish all my children to act under the government of a sound judgment. Impulse, or reasons not to be spoken of freely to their parents, should in no case influence their actions."

Helen sat thoughtful for more than a minute, and then said, her eyes growing dim as she spoke:

"I wish to stay at home for Edward's sake."

"And why for his, my dear?"

"He doesn't go to the ball, you know."

"Because he is too young, and too backward. You couldn't hire him to go there. But, that is no reason why you should remain at home. You would never partake of any social amusement, were this always to influence you. Let him spend the evening in reading. He must not expect his sisters to deny themselves all recreation in which he cannot or will not participate."

"He does not. I know he would not hear to such a thing as my staying at home on his account."

"Then, why stay?"

"Because I feel that I ought to do so. This is the way I have felt all day, whenever I have thought of going. If I were to go, I know that I would not have a moment's enjoyment. He need not know why I remain at home. To tell him that I did not wish to go will satisfy his mind."

"I shall not urge the matter, Helen," Mrs. Lindley said, after a silence of some moments; "you are old enough to judge in a matter of this kind for yourself. But, I must say, I think you rather foolish.—You will not find Edward disposed to sacrifice so much for you."

"Of that I do not think, mother. Of that I ought not to think."

"Perhaps not. Well, you may do as you like. But, I don't know what your father will say."

Mrs. Lindley then left the room.

Edward Lindley was at the critical age of eighteen; that period when many young men, especially those who have a pleasant sisters, would have highly enjoyed a ball. But Edward was shy, timid, and bashful in company, and could hardly ever be induced to go out to parties with his sisters. Still, he was intelligent for his years, and companionable. His many good qualities endeared him to his family, and drew forth from his sisters towards him a very tender regard.

Among his male friends were several about his own age, members of families with whom his own was on friendly terms. With these he associated frequently, and, with two or three others, quite intimately. For a month or two, Helen noticed that one and another of these young friends called every now and then for Edward, in the evening, and that he went out with them and staid until bed time. But unless his sisters were from home, he never went of his own accord. The fact of his being out with these young men, had, from the first, troubled Helen; though, the reason of her feeling troubled she could not tell. Edward had good principles, and she could not bring herself to entertain fears of any clearly defined evil. Still a sensation of uneasiness was always produced when he was from home in the evening.

Her knowing that Edward would go out, after they had all left, was the reason why Helen did not wish to attend the ball. The first thought of this had produced an unpleasant sensation in her mind, which increased the longer she debated the question of going away, or remaining at home. Finally, she decided that she would not go. This decision took place after the interview with her mother, which was only half an hour from the time of starting.

Edward knew nothing of the intention of his sister. He was in his own room, dressing to go out, and supposed, when he heard the carriage drive from the door, that Helen had gone with the other members of the family. On descending to the parlor, he was surprised to find her sitting by the centre table, with a book in her hand.

"Helen! is this you? I thought you had gone to the ball. Are you not well?" he said, quickly, and with surprise, coming up to her side.

"I am very well, brother," she replied, looking into his face with a smile of sisterly regard. "But I have concluded to stay at home this evening. I'm going to keep your company."

"And you indeed! right glad am I of it! though I am sorry you have deprived yourself of the pleasure of this ball, which, I believe, is to be a very brilliant one. I was just going out, because it is so dull at home when you are all away."

"I am not particularly desirous of going to the ball. So little so, that the thoughts of you being left here all alone had sufficient influence over me to keep me away."

"Indeed! Well, I must say, you are kind," Edward returned, with feeling. The self-sacrificing act of his sister had touched him sensibly.

Both Helen and her brother played well. She upon the harp and piano, and he upon the flute and violin. Both were fond of music, and practised and played frequently together. Part of the evening was spent in this way, much to the satisfaction of each. Then an hour passed in reading and conversation, after which, music was again resorted to. Thus passed the time pleasantly until the hour for retiring came, when they separated, both with an internal feeling of pleasure more delightful than they had experienced for a long time. It was nearly three o'clock before Mr. and Mrs. Lindley, and the daughter who had accompanied them to the ball, came home.—Hours before, the senses of both Edward and Helen had been locked in forgetfulness.

Time passed on. Edward Lindley grew up, and became a man of sound principles—a blessing to his family and society. He saw his sisters well married; and himself, finally, led to the altar a lovely maiden. She made him a truly happy husband. On the night of his wedding, as he sat beside Helen, he paused for some time, in the midst of a pleasant conversation, thoughtfully. At last he said—

"Do you remember, sister, the night you staid home from the ball to keep me company?"

"That was some years ago. Yes, I remember it very well, now you have recalled it to my mind."

"I have often since thought, Helen," he said, with a serious air, "that by the simple act of thus remaining at home for my sake, you were the means of saving me from destruction."

"How so?" asked the sister.

"I was just then beginning to form an intimate association with young men of my own age, nearly all of whom have since turned out badly. I did not care a great deal about their company; still, I liked society and used to be with them frequently—especially when you and Mary went out in the evening. On the night of the ball to which you were going, these young men had a supper, and I was to have been with them. I did not wish particularly to join them, but preferred doing so to remaining at home alone. To find you, as I did, so unexpectedly, in the parlor, was an agreeable surprise indeed. I staid at home with a new pleasure, which was heightened by the thought, that it was your love for me that had made you deny yourself for my gratification. We read together on that evening, we played together, we talked of many things. In your mind I had never before seen as much to inspire my own with high and pure thoughts. I remembered the conversation of the young men with whom I had been associating, and in which I had taken pleasure, with something like disgust. It was low, sensual, and too much of it vile and demoralizing. Never, from that hour, did I join them. Their way, even in the early stage of life's journey, I saw to be downward, and downward it has ever since been tending. How often since have I thought of that point in time, so full-fraught with good and evil influences. Those few hours spent with you seemed to take scales from my eyes. I saw with a new vision. I thought and felt differently.—Had you gone to the ball, and I to meet those young men, no one can tell what might not have been the consequence. Sensual indulgences carried to excess, amid songs and sentiments calculated to awaken evil instead of good feelings, might have stamped upon my young and delicate mind a bias to low affections that never would have been eradicated. That was the great starting point in life—the period when I was coming into a state of rationality and freedom. The good prevailed over the evil: and by the agency of my sister, as an angel sent by the Author of all benefits to save me."

Like Helen Lindley, let every elder sister be thoughtful of her brothers at that critical period in life, when the boy is about passing up to the stage of manhood, and she may save them from many a snare set for their unwary feet by the evil one.

THE DEATH OF EVE

'Twas evening tide. The fiery charioteer
Who guides the conrsers of the king of day,
Had urged their ascent up the azure space
Which links the orient with the distant west,
Until his burning wheels a moment paused,
Upon its utmost height. A moment more,
And the descending arch-way mirrored forth
The brilliant glories of the irradiant king!
And now, before he reached the utmost bound
Which severs day from night, he paused again,
And cast a lingering look on scenes behind.

Beneath a bower, near Eden's eastern gate,
Around whose leafy sides in festoons hung
The richest, sweetest flowers of orient birth,
Reclined the dying mother of mankind.
The constant partner of her every joy,
And (since that fatal day, when perfect bliss
Fled their polluted bower, and sped his way
To holier scenes beneath the throne of God,)
The constant partner of her every woe,
Beside her knelt. Her children too were there.
Not all—for one was not. Long since his voice
Had ceased to mingle in their pious song,
As with the fading light of evening sky,
They offered up their joyous notes of praise,
To Him who rules the skies. One other still
Was absent from that lovely group, which thus,
In silence, gathered round the mossy couch,
To view a sight on earth unseen before—
A mother's dying hour. That other one
Now roamed a stranger to that holy place,
Which springs from pardoned sin, with Heaven's broad seal
Of reprobation on him.

Some ere this
Had gaz'd upon the pallid corpse of him
Whose blood was by an elder brother shed.
Then nature, trembling, stood aghast, and God,
Before whose face a murdered brother's blood
For retribution cried, in anger spoke,
And midst the gloom His vengeful power displayed.
Now all was calm. Serene the sun declined,
And nought except the breeze's silken hand
Disturbed the ringlets o'er her pallid brow.
But soon a trembling seized that gentle frame—
A quiver passed through every nerve and limb—
Unwonted paleness sat upon her face,
And shortened breath spoke dissolution nigh.

"Companion of my life," at length she said,
"The hour is come. The hour of lamented doom,
Which by my guilt we both incurred, now waits
Its consummation. Speak to me, once more,
Forgiveness of the rash and dreadful deed
Which exiled us from Eden's blissful shades,
To wander here, and reap the bitter fruits
Of our rebellious act." Sudden she ceased,
For thought of joys by disobedience lost,
And pain and death by her own hand incurred;
And more, the hatefulness of sin itself,
Her utterance sealed. A look of tenderest love
From Adam's moistened eye her sorrows calmed,
While from around fell many a tear bespoke
The strength and tenderness of filial love.

"My children," she resumed, "you too have heard
The tragic tale of Eden's shameful fall.
'Tis woful for a mother thus to name
The sad inheritance she leaves to those
She holds most dear. For you I still must grieve;
Yet weep not thus for me. A moment more,
And all of earth from me will pass. A scene,
More bright than even Eden's blissful bowers,
Will then arise before me. Even now
A shining seraph, from above, like those
We often saw amidst the flowery walks
Of Paradise, whispers to my ear,
In accents sweet, of endless joys above,
And bids me look on high. There Abel lives;
And, drest in robes of spotless innocence,
Before the Golden Throne adoring bends;
With him, a convoy of celestial ones
Come to attend my panting soul above,
Where sin is known no more.

"Hark! they draw near!
I see them now! Softly! they beckon me
To join their sung—a song so sweet, like that
They sung, when erst they saw Creation's work,
Wrought and complete. But hark! a single voice.

And one well-known, I hear. 'Tis Abel's voice!
And with a sweet-toned harp alone he sings,
A song unlearned by all the heavenly choirs—
The wonders of redeeming love! That song
My voice shall join. Behold, the Blest Supreme Extends a golden harp, and bids me come!
Then quickly all farewell. 'Twill not be long,
For soon you too will join me there. Farewell!"

While thus she spoke, the solemn group had knelt
Around her sylvan couch, with listening ear,
To catch each word. But when her voice,
Which seemed new-toned to that blissful song,
Pronounced the word "Farewell!" her eye stood fix'd,
Reflecting, like some gently sleeping lake,
The silver beams of evening light; and when
The throbbing breast and quivering lip were still'd—
And smiles, which faded not, illumed the cheek,
As though the soul had left upon that face
The impress of its joy. Then first a cry
Of anguish deep, bespoke the heart-felt grief;
And mingled tears bedew'd that lovely form
Forever stilled in death.

* * * * *

Within the view of Eden's warded gate,
A single mound protects the slumbering dead.
A cypress tree—a daughter's tender care—
Points out the hallowed spot, and 'neath its shade
A bed of flowers their richest beauties yield,
To deck the grave that angels watch and guard.

ADUMA.

West[illegible], Pa.

MY FIRST PROPOSAL.

'A faint heart never won a fair lady,' has become a settled truism; but whether a strong heart ever won a coquet, is problematical; yet as far as I am concerned, I will endeavour to solve the question.

The dullness of the summer months in the city induced me to return to my native town. I had been absent for several years, and longed to visit once more the scenes of my childhood, and enjoy the pure air and fascinating idleness of the country. It was in the quiet and sober village of Pelham, that I met with the heroine of my story.

I had been in town but a few days, when the quiet of the village was sensibly disturbed by a rumour that Mrs. Beal was to give a party, for the purpose of introducing her niece, Miss Polly Shivers. Such an uncommon occurrence formed, of course, the all-absorbing topic of conversation, and various were the reports circulated regarding the young lady who was to form the chief attraction of the evening; but all agreed she was an heiress, and disengaged. A residence in the city for several years had softened the natural uncouthness of my manners, and given me a degree of confidence necessary to figure in society, and this confidence was rendered doubly strong when I thought of the insignificant rivalry I should meet among the village beaux; so I fully resolved to spoilze Miss Shivers, and, if possible, gain her affections.

The evening for the party arrived, and in order to create an overwhelming sensation, as well as to give evidence of my city breeding, I repaired at a late hour to Mrs. Beal's, and, of course, found the whole company assembled. Opposite the door were seen a dozen young ladies, standing arm in arm, watching the entrance of each party, while another group were telling fortunes, or looking over some soiled engravings. The village beaux clustered about the door, keeping at a respectable distance from the ladies, their countenances betraying the will to do, but not the soul to dare.

Miss Shivers was standing in the recess of a window, listlessly gazing on the scene around her, but without appearing to participate in the gaiety of her companions. Her person was rather beyond the common size, or, perchance I should say, it was a very uncommon size, and she would have been vulgarly termed fleshy. Her hair, the colour of which might have been poetically called auburn, but which, in plain prose, we will describe as sun-burnt yellow, was dressed smoothly back from her forehead, and gathered into a knot on the crown of her head, over which a gilded comb stood stiffly up like a gravestone in a desert. I could never discover the colour of her eyes, but they must have been very attractive, for they were continually looking at each other over the bridge of her nose, (which, by the way, offered but a slight obstacle) so that the lady would have been called, by malicious persons, cross-eyed. I have often heard of a transparent skin, and a brilliant complexion, but never exactly understood the meaning of the terms, but I should not say that Miss Shivers had a transparent skin, though her complexion was very brilliant, and beautifully reflected the lights in the room, and shone conspicuous above all others.

The lady was dressed in a white satin, gaily ornamented with flounces, lace, and ribbons, and the dress showed like a newly painted house, and was as stiff as chiselled drapery. An enormous gold chain hung from her neck, to which was attached a watch of no very delicate dimensions, the dial of which being exposed, it was very useful to her neighbours; a pair of long white kid gloves covered the lower part of her rather muscular arms, and finely contrasted with a pair of most inveterate red elbows.

Now, dear reader, you have both you, as well as my feeble pen can describe, the belle and the attractions of Mrs. Beal's party.

Though Miss Shivers was not very prepossessing in her appearance, the ten thousand dollars which I found she had in her own right, induced me to be introduced to her. But I will not weary the reader by a narration of the numerous flattering attentions I bestowed on the lady, or the significant remarks which those civilities occasioned amongst the guests; suffice it to say, that I returned home that night fully resolved to win the heart, at all hazards, of the heiress.

For the first week I made but little progress, but I was not to be discouraged. No attention was omitted; not an art in the whole catalogue of love was left untried; still my lady-love was unmoved; she spoke not a word of encouragement—no, not one sweet endearing accent escaped from her lips to calm my troubled breast. Still I persevered; day after day I was at her house; books I brought from the library; the choicest fruits were to be found on her table, and I read one volume of 'Elegant Extracts,' merely to find some lines for her album expressive of my feelings. Poets have sung of the devotedness of Leander, who swam the Hellespont to see his lady-love, but I waded neck deep in the horse pond to procure for my love the waterlilly. Romeo leaped the garden wall to see his Juliet, but I sat for hours on the fence to watch my Polly as she retired to her chamber. But all these evidences of my devotion were of no avail; I wrought no change; I was enduring 'the keenest of all ills—uncertainty,' and resolved to bring the affair to a crisis. But how to make the proposal was the question. After a dozen plans, I resolved to ask the lady to take a ride, and to accept of that opportunity to open my heart to her. My invitation was accepted, and hope revived again. At two o'clock I was seen driving through the town with Miss Shivers at my side.

The awful moment had now arrived. I was now to know my destiny; I was to be the accepted lover or the rejected one. I became excessively agitated; every word of the beautiful address I had concocted the night previous vanished from my memory. But an attempt was to be made, and when we had passed through the village into the open country, I broke the ice. I began first by calling Miss S.'s attention to the beautiful scenery, for I thought a little sentiment was necessary. I spoke of the waving grass, the laughing flowers, the azure skies, and the thousand little beauties that everywhere met the eye. The lady agreed with me exactly, but she spoke with no enthusiasm; there was no sentiment, no romance, no feeling; and I found this would not answer, so I stood on another tack.

'Have you ever been in Boston, Miss Shivers?'

'No, sir.'

'Don't you think you should like to reside there?' I asked, giving the horse a cut.

'I really cannot say, Mr. Simpson.'

'I think you could be pleasantly situated there; (another cut;) the society is very fine, though one certainly wishes for his friends around him: I often feel lonely, and sigh for a companion—'

'Yes, sir.'

'I am confident you could be happy there,' I replied, almost in despair, and giving the horse a tremendous lash. 'I should delight to introduce you to my friends, if my society is as agreeable to you, as yours is—'

'Mr. Simpson!' shrieked Miss Shivers, 'you are driving into the ditch!'

The words were no sooner spoken than over we went, and both were thrown from the chaise. Miss Shivers screamed, the poor horse kicked, and I endeavoured to free myself from the reins.

I arose at last, but in the very agony of despair, I gazed upon the lady. What an object! bonnet torn, dress soiled, and her face covered with mud. I could have sunk into the earth. I begged, entreated, but had not the power to move.

'I will never venture into that chaise again,' said the lady; 'but why don't you assist me? I shall die—I am dying.'

She went into hysterics. I caught her as she fell, and though my arms were nearly broken in the attempt to save, I still supported her. She revived at last, and, succeeding in persuading her to take a seat in the chaise, I turned the horse's head toward the village.

Here was a downfall to all my hopes. I was a ruined man, I knew. I threw my head back against the chaise, and in silence indulged in my misery. The lady uttered a few words about careless driving, broken bones, and ruined dresses, but spoke not a word of consolation.

I drove rapidly home, scarcely knowing where I was going, until I was aroused by the renewed screams of Miss Shivers, and I had just time to see that I had run over a child who was playing in the road. My companion became alarmed, and ordered me to give up the reins. In vain I expostulated—in vain I stated the ridiculous figure we should make driving through the town; I was obliged to yield my right as driver, and the lady took the reins.

Imagine me, dear reader, riding through the village, driven by a lady.

I returned home in a state of mind bordering on insanity. I thought of the scandal the affair would create, the jokes that would be made at my expense, and the utter annihilation of all my dreams of bliss. I rushed from the room, and finding no person on whom to wreak my vengeance, I ran to the stable and lashed the poor horse until I was exhausted by the exercise.

A week passed, and I scarce ventured from the house, but remained 'a weary-worn and wretched thing;' 'a gloomy wilderness of dying thought,' acting to perfection the despairing lover. At last I ventured to open my heart to a friend, who informed me that Miss Shivers had quite forgotten the affair, and considered it a capital joke. My friend also stated that I should meet her at her house that evening, when all would be explained and settled.

My heart beat warm again, and a smile was seen once more upon my face; but with a faint heart I attended the party, and after various attempts, succeeded in making a humble apology for my past misconduct. I could have cried for joy when I found that all was forgiven, and that I was reinstated in Miss S.'s good graces. Oft shall I ever forget the thousand attentions I paid that evening—the conundrums I told—the 'sugar hearts' I ate, merely to present her with the sentiments—the sighs I uttered, the decided hints I offered—no, not 'while memory holds a seat in this distracted globe.'

The evening passed rapidly away, and when the hour arrived for the company to depart, it was discovered that a cloud had arisen, which threatened a tremendous shower.

Miss Shivers was determined to walk home, though I hinted that I would order my chaise, forgetting the character that I had established as a driver. My arm was offered, however, and under one umbrella we departed. We had two miles to walk, but had not proceeded many rods before the rain began to fall in torrents, accompanied by strong symptoms of thunder. I drew the shawl closely around the lady, and inquired if she was alarmed.

She replied that 'she did not mind thunder so much, but she was rather shy of lightning.'

I had determined during the evening to renew my proposal, and I thought the present a good opportunity, though we walked nearly a mile, ere I could screw my courage to the sticking point. At last I broke the painful silence.

'Miss Shivers, our unfortunate upset prevented me from expressing my feelings as fully as I could wish, but I hope——'

'Oh, Mr. Simpson, how it lightens, I hope you have no steel on your umbrella!'

'No! nor is my heart of steel!' I replied. 'I have longed for an opportunity to express to you my——'

'How careless you are, Mr. Simpson; you have led me into a puddle of water. I should think the lightning would direct you.'

'Oh! but the lightning of your eyes——one directs me,' I exclaimed, trembling with emotion.

'Don't talk such nonsense, Mr. Simpson, I won't listen to it.'

But I had committed myself, and my tongue would not be silent.

'I love you!' I exclaimed, 'and I must tell you so.'

'Mr. Simpson, if you don't mind your business, I won't walk with you.'

I grasped her hand, fell down on my knees in a puddle of water, and while the rains from heaven and burning tears trickled down my face, I gave utterance to my feelings in no studied language. In vain I spoke of the ardor, the sincerity of my attachment; in vain I depicted my future misery if I should be rejected. Eloquence was of no avail, and I changed my language. I upbraided her, I called her a coquette, a hard-hearted, heartless woman, a trifler with my affections. I talked of pistols and suicide, but all, all in vain. The lady tore the umbrella from my hand, and after a few peculiar epithets, left me in my misery.

The rain was falling in torrents, the lightning flashed, the thunder roared, but I heeded them not, but remained fixed, immoveable, senseless. How long I stood upon the spot I know not, but when I came to my senses, I was drenched to the skin, and cold as an icicle. Mortal man could not resist the elements longer. I gave one more look, one more ejaculation of anguish, and ran for home. Wet, exhausted, desperate, I entered the house and seated myself before the kitchen fire. A looking reflection told me of my situation. I saw that I had been sitted, laughed at, and deceived. I knew that I had made a fool of myself, and I became enraged. I paced the room like a madman; it rang with my vows of vengeance. I upset a cupboard of crockery—overthrew tables and chairs—I threw my cat, the[illegible]'s favorite cat into the fire, and knocked that she would seem to be the lord of the creation. Nancy's lap-dog in the head with the gridiron. The whole house was in confusion—my mother screamed, the children cried, but I heeded them not, but rushed to my chamber and locked the door.

How I passed that night, the reader can imagine; suffice it to say, that I left town the next morning, cursing the day I visited Pelham, and mortified by the result of my first proposal.—N. Y. Mirror.

TO MY LAME BOY.

BY JOSEPH BOUGHTON, Esq.

Oh, who can see the wounded bird,
Attempt to soar on broken wing,
Without a pitying thought or word,
Bestowed upon the hapless thing?
Who would not rather see its form
Careering through the arch on high,
And feel his beating heart grow warm,
Towards that sweet tenant of the sky?

Can I then look on that fair face,
And note the sadness resting there;
Regard thy form of moulded grace,
Thine eyes of heavenly impress, where
Are beaming intellect's bright rays,
Nor feel my own with tears grow dim,
As with a parent's heart they gaze,
My boy, upon thy stricken limb?

Thine eyes look out upon the lawn,
Where erst thy infant footsteps strayed,
And where thy feet, like agile fawn,
Have with thy little comrades played.
But now in vain thy spirit leaps,
To join that laughing, merry band,
And that young spirit, drooping, weeps,
To feel that it is thus enchained.

Must that young heart be rent with woes,
And sadness strike each tender string—
Must sorrow's rankling, blighting throes,
Beset each bud thus blossoming!—
And shall the arrows, keen and dire,
That speed from sad Misfortune's quiver,
Descend, with their malignant ire,
On thy devoted head for ever?

No—innocent, sweet trembler, no!
For ever in each feeling breast,
A chord will vibrate to the blow,
Which has thy sinless form oppress'd.
And true will be the tender care
Of those whose eyes shall watch above thee,
And frequent will the fervent prayer
Ascend from gentle hearts that love thee.

And when bold manhood's pathway bright
Shall burst upon thy riper gaze,
Kind friends will cluster in their might,
To cheer thee onward through its maze.
And oh, through life, may Virtue's hand
Upon thy brow her chaplet bind,
And Wisdom, on thy every hand,
Shed treasures of the immortal mind.

REPEAL SONG.

"When my country shall take her place among the nations of the earth, then, and not till then, let my epitaph be written."—[EMMET.

Arise, sons of Erin! the moment is nigh,
When the world shall respond to the patriot's cry!
No longer our necks shall be bowed to the yoke;
By true hearts and strong hands shall our fetters be broke—
And through distant lands, echoed, the glad shout shall be,
Which proclaims to the nations, that Ireland is free!

Awake to the struggle, brave spirits, awake!
From Boyne's sullied water, to Corrib's wild lake—
Let the watch-word of liberty dauntless go forth,
From Munster and Ulster, the South and the North—
'Till the gathering storm shall be borne o'er the sea,
To tell England's proud rulers that Ireland is free!

Arouse! for the sake of the patriot dead—
Not in vain has their blood on the scaffold been shed.
Be our hearts firm as those of the year ninety-eight;
Be our arms stronger nerved, when we think of their fate—
And, like theirs, be our graves—if we live not to see
The land that we love best, a land of the free!

Oh! glorious the contest—and righteous the cause!
For our long oppressed country, her church, and her laws!
And the day is approaching, when bright through the gloom,
Freedom's sun-burst shall rest on the patriot's tomb!
And pure and unclouded the dawning shall be,
From the night of long ages, oh! Ireland, to thee!

Sweet.

WHAT'S IN A WORD?

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT,
AUTHOR OF "MARMADUKE WYVIL," "CROMWELL," ETC. ETC.

Far from the busy mart and the gay haunts of fashion, there stands yet, in the out-skirts of a large city in a free, civilized, and happy land, a tall, dilapidated-looking building, of red brick. By no means devoid of pretension in the style of its architecture, though it had evidently never been completed, with many rows of large and handsome windows, it was probably intended by some speculator, more enterprising than sagacious, for a hotel, or summer boarding-house; but there needed but one glance to see that it had degenerated into a mere hive of the poorest and most squalid of the laboring poor. The doors were warped and shattered; and one leaf of the principal entrance swung by the lower hinge alone, and seemed as if the slightest shock would wrench it from that likewise. The windows, not one of which was entire, were stuffed with all kinds of substitutes to shut out the keen air of an American December night, which was sitting in with more than usual rigor—a half-starved pig lay stretched out in a cavity which yawned under the wretched wooden steps that gave access to the wide door-way; where to carry out the original design there should have been a splendid marble stair and terrace; two or three gaunt and wolfish looking curs were prowling to and fro about the entrance; and a dirty, crop-eared, discolored cat, was watching their movements with a jealous eye, from the broken hand-rail, which offered but a frail support to the hand of any one ascending the slippery and sordid stairs.

It wanted a little while of sunset, and the sky was still full of light, but the very sunshine was cold and ungenial in its aspect; the northwest wind blew, cutting and keen, from the neighboring river; and if a drop of water was spilled by chance on the pavement, it was converted on the instant into a globule of solid ice.

Every one, who was abroad that evening, even if he were wrapped up in the warmest garb of wadded broadcloth and rich fur, felt the severe and biting cold even to his bones, as it seemed; and walked as fast as he could to keep his blood alive, and his flesh unfrozen.

But there was one man, who, though not cloaked against the weather, nor indeed covered sufficiently to enable him to face the mildest breath of winter, far from hurrying along the street, loitered with a sad, pensive, and yet restless air, as if he were afraid or unwilling to reach the end of his wanderings.

He was a man, in the prime of youth, who must have been naturally well looking and powerfully framed, though his features were now so much sharpened by care and perhaps by want, that almost every trace of comeliness had vanished from their outlines; while the expression that pervaded them was so wild, haggard, and painful, that it was actually unpleasant to behold them. His figure also, though the breadth of the shoulders and symmetry of the proportions could not be concealed, was so terribly emaciated and shrunken, that his threadbare and patched though scrupulously clean surtout, of what had been once fine black cloth, fluttered about him like the fantastic draperies of a scare-crow. Not a shred of linen was visible at his cuffs or collar, a rusty black neck cloth twisted about his neck, alone appearing above the collar of his closely-buttoned frock. A more disastrous and lamentable object could not be well imagined than this young man, who should have been, it was plain to me, one of the noblest and most athletic of the great Maker's creatures.

Yet lamentable and frightful as it was, there was, with all the poverty, nothing that looked like a trace of vice or profligacy, nor any thing depraved or low in the character of the man; on the contrary his bearing and demeanor were those of a gentleman, and the expression of his features, although they were pale and pinched and almost distorted, would have been fine and noble, but for the wild anxiety which gleamed from the bright blue eyes, and quivered in the muscles of the mouth.

Bitter and piercing though the night wind was, and insufficiently as he was clad to face it, for his path lay in its very teeth, this man, as I have said, loitered; and at times stood quite still, looking up with an expression half melancholy and imploring, half reproachful, to the bright stars above him. Then he would clench his hands and gnash his teeth, and stride off ten or a dozen paces—and again stop and gaze about him anxiously, as if he were in search of something, which he expected, but could not find.

At last he muttered to himself—"No hope—there is no hope!—none!—neither on earth, nor in Heaven! No hope—nor help—nor pity!" he paused for a moment or two and laid his thin hand on his brow, as if he were in deep thought. "No!" he said; "no! no! that were but cowardly—if I were in the world alone! but with her it were mere baseness and infamy to fly from my own misery—and leave her to die alone.—No! no! I must bear it—bear it, till I have closed her eyes, and then—then—rest!"

He said no more, but hurried on his way as fast as the weakness of his limbs permitted, as if some new thought had struck him, and soon reached the desolate and dilapidated-looking house I have described. Without stopping at all, he mounted the filthy stairs, and passing into the open door-way, ascended flight after flight, each darker and more gloomy and more sordid than that below it, until he reached the attic; there he stopped for a moment at a low doorway and listened before he entered—"She sleeps," he said, in an under voice, before he opened the door; and entered with a light and noiseless foot.

That was indeed a melancholy chamber—there was not a particle of fire on the cold hearth, only a little pile of white wood ashes; there was not a piece of furniture in the room but two crazy chairs, a deal table, and a miserable bed, scarcely half covered by a sort of rug and a colored horse blanket—a man's great coat, a pair of tattered pantaloons, nay even the shirt, which that wretched being should have worn, were laid upon the bed, most vain and sad attempt to [illegible] of the poor invalid, who lay there so still and calm, yet so cold that even in her sleep she shivered, and her teeth chattered though she knew it not.

She was a delicate, fair girl, not above nineteen years of age, with a skin whiter than the driven snow, and a profusion of rich auburn hair, which had escaped from her coarse but clean head-gear, and fell in rich silky masses over the harsh ticking of her uncovered pillow. She too was, like the man, extremely thin and attenuated, but in her the thinness appeared to be rather the result of disease than of hunger; for there was an ominous flush on her transparent cheek, and the blue veins stood up like cords over the poor thin hand which lay upon the pallet's edge, so wasted that you almost might have seen the light shine through it.

For a moment the young man stood looking at her as she slept, with a face of unutterable anguish—then he stooped down and listened to her breathing—and then drawing himself up again to his full heighth, wrung his hands bitterly, while a large tear rolled down his wasted cheek, and fell upon that little hand.

Instantly the fair lids up-rose and a pair of the brightest and loveliest blue eyes, that ever beamed upon mortal man the bliss of most pure affection, shone out upon him full of gay and cheerful hope, and a smile of ineffable sweetness played round the ruby lips which had preserved their freshness to the last, to greet his covering.

"Dear, dearest Arthur," she said, in a faint, low voice, that still spoke unaltered and unalterable love, "how long is it since you have come back? How long have you been looking at me?"

"But now," he replied, "dearest—and now in vain"——

"No, darling, not in vain," she answered—"say not in vain, for is not your coming all and all to me? When you are with me I feel neither want nor sorrow—all is bright happiness and hope, as it was years ago at home. Oh! never say that it is in vain that you come back to your poor Ellinor. Stoop down and kiss me, love."

And he stooped down and clasped her thin frame to his breast, and her white arms were clasped around his neck, and their lips met in the hallowed kiss of pure affection—affection true to the last, through misery and more than mortal anguish.

"Dearest, how cold you are," she murmured, forgetful of her own bitter sufferings—"how you shake, you who are so strong and brave and hardy. Oh! take your great coat, I implore you; I am not cold at all, indeed I am not. I had a long sweet sleep with many pleasant dreams, and I feel quite refreshed, and better than I have felt these many days, and I am not in the least hungry within—I believe fasting is good for me—but I am very much afraid that you are famished too, as well as almost perishing with cold."

"No, I am not," he replied; "Ellinor—no, I am not, indeed. I was given a little food while I was abroad seeking for work, and I have brought you part of it. No, indeed, I am not hungry—and the chilliness will pass away immediately, now that I am out of the night wind."

And he produced two little rolls of bread, and gave one of them to the poor invalid, with a little water in a cracked tea-cup; and, alas! the brightening of her poor eye, and the avidity with which she broke and ate the miserable food, told but too plainly that the tale she had related of her improved health, as the result of her compulsory fasting, was but a kind and pious fiction. And he, while his vitals were devoured with the keen agony of famine, for he had scarcely eaten in three days, looked on with his arms folded on his breast, and a well-pleased smile on his features, rejoicing that she could partake and enjoy the miserable meal which alone he had been enabled to bring home to her.

Which was the greater hero—he who stood there with wolfish appetite suppressed, his tongue cleaving to his palate, and his throat almost convulsed with hunger, yet with no selfish thought in his sad heart, or he who rode in sullen triumph, and smiled where the dead lay thickest, over the charnel plains of Austerlitz and Jena?

A little talk of better days, a few sweet memories of the past sadly recounted, and with a fond smile on her lips, the sick girl sank again into a calm and gentle slumber, and he, the husband of her innocent youth, stood watching her, heart-stricken and despairing.

After a little while, her deep and regular breathing announced that she was fast asleep; and then having gazed for a short space upon the remaining roll, with wistful eyes, he hurried to a small cupboard at the farther end of the room, and laying it on the shelf, closed the door hastily upon it, exclaiming:

"No, no—I will not be tempted. No. I will not—at least she shall have wherewithal to break her fast to-morrow."

Then he groped about in the drawers of the table for a scrap of candle to replace the morsel which was now just expiring in the socket, and having found and lighted it, he sat down, resting his folded arms upon the board, and burying his face in his hands, remained for nearly an hour plunged in the turmoil of rapid and conflicting thought.

His was a very sad, but alas! not unfrequent story. A youthful artist of high promise, and unwearied industry in the old country, he had, as men say, marred his fortunes, and brought ruin on himself, by making a love match with a sweet, virtuous and lovely girl, the daughter of a stout thrifty farmer in the neighborhood of the town in which he pursued his profession. The parents on both sides were dissatisfied; the girl's father, a rude, ignorant hard-tempered man, complaining bitterly that Ellinor should have thrown herself away upon a beggarly painter-man; while the rich, miserly tradesman, whose marriage-bed had been honored by the birth of the noble and intellectual youth, whose mind he was no more capable of comprehending than is the dull tortoise of measuring the eagle's flight, set no bounds to his fury when he learned that his son, for whom he had destined the hand of a cross-grained and skinny spinster, the daughter of a green-grocer Alderman, had demeaned himself to marry what, in the purse-proud insolence of trade, he dared to call a mere clod-hopper's child. Prejudice on the one side, and insolence on the other, soon led to an open breach; high words passed; and it was only by the young artist's active interference, that farmer Goodwin was prevented from laying the weight of his sturdy arm and silver-mounted horsewhip on the shoulders of the pert linen draper—an interference which, while it averted none of his own father's small, spiteful rancor, completed the alienation of the more manly agriculturist; and ended in his being speedily and formally disowned by both parties, and thrown unassisted on his own resources. Sickness and want soon followed; and in an evil hour listening to tales, never to be fulfilled, of the immense facilities of living, and the certainty of employment in the transatlantic world; he set sail for America with his young and lovely wife, their passage-money and the price of their outfit having consumed nearly the whole of their slender means.

It is notorious that in the United States, even in the most prosperous state of the commercial world, while every handicraft, or mechanical pursuit, or even the use of the spade, commands a ready market and high rates of compensation, all intellectual labor is ill-paid, unless it be of the very highest grade of excellence; and all employment of that nature is precarious and uncertain to the utmost.

It happened, moreover, as appears frequently to be the case with the events of human life, misfortune following hard upon misfortune at one time, and at another joy succeeding joy in quick succession, that the period at which Arthur Aston landed with his fair young bride in America, was one of singular and almost unexampled depression even in that land of rapid vicissitudes and continual fluctuations. Hundreds, nay, thousands, who a few little months before, had been rich in every earthly good, were now reduced to more than comparative poverty; and men who, half a year previously, would have lavished thousands of dollars on a picture, or on an article of furniture, were now obliged to look carefully to the expenditure of every dollar.

A few days made it evident to Arthur that his utopian dreams were little likely to be realized; and a few weeks, of which every hour was spent in fruitless endeavors to obtain employment—or what is called by the ignorant and heartless rich men of great cities patronage—convinced him that if he would not starve himself, and see his sweet wife starve before his face, he must be content to descend to a lower sphere than the ideal; to apply his talents to some purpose less elevated, and more utilitarian, than the representation of fair forms and glowing landscapes; and to exchange his ardent aspirations for eternal fame, to the mere struggle for that daily bread which is not given for the mere asking.

After a while, he was glad at a mere pittance to engage with a card engraver, on a salary so small, that, with the closest economy, it sufficed barely to procure the mere necessaries of life for the young couple.

Still they were happy and contented, and grateful to the Giver of all good; and in each other they found that amplitude of perfect bliss which the world giveth not, nor can take away. During the summer months, and the delicious autumn time, that loveliest season of America, they struggled on, still happy, cheerful, and full of hope; and many a pleasant walk by the calm river's side, when the day's toil was over, brought back to the mind of the young bride the happy time when the first love of her fond heart was won by the green banks of that small, brimful, English river, which, flowing through the loveliest of England's lovely landscapes, had soothed her infant ears to sleep on her lost mother's bosom; and banished by the grateful recollection all thoughts of care or present sorrow, lost in the fullness of past happiness.

A little longer, and cold winter came; and with it sickness and fresh sorrow. The keen, piercing cold of America, added to want, and suffering, and sorrow, smote the frail, delicate form of the young girl, and silently and uncomplainingly she wasted day by day; and the hectic flush crept over her pale cheek, and the unnatural brightness of the eye, awakened dread suspicions of the presence of that fiend, which ever preys upon the loveliest and the best.

Then, to complete the ruin, Arthur's employer failed—and failed, too, indebted to the wretched man in above one half of his most miserable three months' pittance; no part, however small, of which, was there a hope of ever more recovering; and, yet worse, of so base a nature was the bankruptcy, that it created a sort of secret prejudice, if not suspicion, against all persons who had been in any wise connected, even as sufferers, with the dishonest artizan's affairs.

His wretched means were all swept away—his poor employment was at an end—his character was in some sort blighted—he was completely, hopelessly destitute—his wife was dying! Could any man be more wretched—be more sternly tempted?

Yet he had striven bravely against fortune—yet he had borne up manfully, and with a resolute and cheerful heart against the spite of destiny—and she, that delicate, frail comforter, had ever smiled most brilliantly, and spoken most hopefully, when matters looked the darkest. Still it was all in vain—every small ornament, every dear relic of better days, long flown, had been pawned or sold to buy medicines or bread; and now, for two long days, there had been nothing left to sell except the clothes each wore upon their person, and bread itself had failed them, as every thing but bread had failed them long before.

Daily, for weeks, Arthur had been a beggar for employment—yet he had begged in vain—even the poor boon of laboring to the utmost for the smallest pittance, had been denied to him—in his own beautiful profession he could obtain no work, he had no skill in handicraft, no strength to dig.

That night, for the first time, he had begged for bread; he had met contumely, insult, mockery—but no compassion; at length, as he was returning home hopeless and starving, to his starving wife, a very poor Irish woman, standing at the door of a wretched-looking shanty, was struck with the misery and famished look of the unhappy man, and went in and brought out the two rolls, which she had carried home as a rich prize, and thrust them into his hand with a tearful eye and a few kind words, and refusing all thanks, shut the door in his face when he would have returned them.

Five minutes before that, the richest man in the city, whose autograph signature he had engraved not a week before on a plate for a visiting card, had denounced him for a drunken dog, and bid him work, or go to the alms-house.

Alas! that it should so often be the poor who feel the most compassion for those poorer yet, and stint themselves of their own wretched sustenance to minister to the wants of their brethren, while the rich are contemptuous, and hard, and haughty!

This night as he sat alone, all these things rushed at once in a torrent over his soul—his wretchedness—his struggles—his despair—and she—she dying!—dying of want, when perhaps a few paltry dollars might preserve her. Then he thought of the rich man, and his brow was heavily contracted, and his hand clenched, and his teeth grinded together, as he thought of the supercilious sneer and cruel taunting laugh with which he had listened and replied to his plainly delivered tale of sorrow.

Then in an instant, as if by an electrical impulse, the autograph flashed on his mind, and at the same point of time, the name of the bank wherein the rich man kept his large deposits, occurred to him—at any other time he could not have recollected it, perhaps, had it been to save his life. He had once carried a check thither for his employer, who kept his account in the same institution—then he remembered that he had seen a blank check of the same bank in his own drawer the day before—nay he remembered even the very nook of the drawer wherein it lay concealed, and the chance by which it had got there.

Thought suggested thought with the speed of light, and almost before the first idea of sin was mooted in his agitated mind, the plan was matured, the plot half executed.

The rich man's sneer and cruel word, had changed the innocent and honourable sufferer into the knave and felon.

The blank check was filled up with rare skill, the haughty merchant's autograph was appended—no eye could have detected the imposture, so brilliantly was the deceit executed—no, not the eye of the man himself, whose signature was counterfeited. It was for a small sum—a very small sum—for even in sin and deceit this honourable point yet remained to the sinner, that he would owe nothing to his fraud but the merest and most absolute necessaries of existence.

The sneer and bitter taunt had turned his life blood to gall—had changed the whole tenor of his thoughts from right to wrong, in a moment—aye! in the twinkling of an eye!

He looked—so completely had passion led him astray—upon his intended crime not merely as a deed justified by circumstances, but as one in itself almost praiseworthy—as a sort of moral retribution—a licensed spoiling of the Egyptian—and taking vengeance in kind on the oppressor.

He was, in fact, for the time, and on that subject, insane. Men will say, "What's in a word?" Often times, I reply, "felony, murder, madness!"

He actually knelt down and prayed when his forgery was completed; and then, without undressing, laid himself down beside his sleeping bride, and after lying awake for a little space, anticipating with a strange sense of satisfaction the certainty of having food and medical attendance for his Ellinor to-morrow, he too sunk into a deep slumber, and awoke not until the sun was high in the clear and frosty heavens.

Then he rose up, brushed his thread-bare garments, and performed his ablutions with assiduous care; and that done, without breaking his fast, after bending down for a moment, and imprinting a light kiss on her fair pale brow, he left the wretched chamber, bent on his evil errand.

An hour later he might have been seen walking among the busy crowds that thronged the mart of that proud city, toward one of the chief banks, but with a step that faltered, either from weakness or irresolution. His face was ghastly pale, and his whole frame shivered between the effects of nervousness and cold, and at times he almost staggered in his gait, so worn was he, and wasted by fierce famine, and yet more fierce excitement.

Several of the bystanders gazed at him earnestly, so strange and sad was his appearance; and one or two who were passing paused in their haste to stare at him, but having stared their fill, they went their way silent and pitiless.

He had now reached the broad flight of marble steps leading the votaries of Mammon up to the great shrine of their hourly worship, a shrine vaster and nobler than any temple built in that country to the Living God, when as he paused at the base of the ascent, two men came down from the door in earnest conversation.

One—Arthur's eye recognised him at a glance—was the young, burly, heartless merchant, whose sneer on the preceding night had almost maddened him; whose simulated check he was about to offer at the counter. His stalwart frame was wrapped in a pelisse of wadded broadcloth, trimmed with rich sables; a well contented smile played over his thick sensual lips, which, as he passed the starving artist, uttered with pleasant emphasis the to him hallowed words—"Millions of dollars."

The other was a hale old man, with hair as white as snow, small twinkling eyes as bright as stars on a frosty night, a broad, hale, ruddy face, from every line and dimple of which smiled out benevolence and good will toward men. His dress was plain, though well made and of excellent materials; and notwithstanding the keenness of the wintry morning, he wore no upper garment over the old-fashioned blue coat, closely buttoned to his chin. He had no need of surtout or wrapper—that gay-hearted good old man—there was warmth enough in every thought and feeling of his kindly soul, to render his body proof to all the cold of Siberia.

His eye fell on the face of Arthur as he passed, scanned all his features for a second or two, with quick and decisive intelligence; and then, as if satisfied, he stopped short, and said in a loud cheery tone:

"What's all this—what's all this, my poor fellow? You look like a sober honest man, and you are cold and hungry, I am sure—what is the matter? are you sick? Upon my life and soul"—he added quickly, as Arthur turned yet paler at the sound of kindly words, while his brain reeled, and his heart beat so quick that his breath seemed to fail him, and that he would have fallen but for the pedestal of a tall marble column—"Upon my life and soul, I believe the man is perishing with hunger—what a shame!—what a shame!—in the centre of our rich community!"

"Pshaw! pshaw! Mr. Brotherton," replied the other—"your tender heart is always leading you astray. He is a wretched drunken vagabond, who begged of me last night in the street; but I knew too much, I can tell you, to give him money to spend in the grog shop. Come along—come along. I cannot waste my time here."

"Then go away!" answered the other—"Nobody wants you. I shall stay here with this poor fellow; he is no more drunk than you are—it is wretchedness—only wretchedness!—Alas! that there should be so much of it in this world. Come cheer up—cheer up. You look better now. I will take care of you. Now stand away, my good friends," he went on—for a crowd began to gather—"Nothing at all remarkable—nothing to stare at, I assure you—only a poor sick man. Call me a cab, my good boy, will you!—that is it—we shall do very well now."

And in a moment, as the vehicle drew up to the side of the trottoir, he helped Arthur Aston in with his own hand, and stepping nimbly in beside him, desired the man to drive rapidly to his own home.

Once there, a little proper food and a glass of wine restored the faculties of the young man, as it were miraculously—nor, as he regained his strength, did his heart, which had been unlocked instantly by the first cheery tones of the good old man, close again stubbornly, or harden itself against the voice of conscience and of better thoughts, upspringing from the seed sown by the first kind word.

All his sorrows—all his sufferings—and his fir[illegible]

meditated sin—were soon recounted to the friendly listener, nor did a few tears flow from the eyes of either during the piteous tale. It needed not a long time to prove the truth of the recital, and—that once proved—Arthur nor Ellinor had any reason more to blame the spite of fortune.

By that judicious patron the young man's talents were employed, and not long afterward the glowing and harmonious offspring of his teeming fancy were seen decorating the walls of the good rich man's stately mansion. The giddy train of fashion crowded the artist's studio, and it was deemed a favour by the fairest and the proudest of the land, to be permitted to bear off a picture from his easel.

His beautiful young wife's disorder, which had arisen from want only, and the ills of poverty, speedily yielded to the sedulous attention of her devoted husband, and the more genial days which thenceforth dawned upon him—nor had a year passed since she lay alone upon the untended couch of almost mortal sickness, before she was the boast and belle of the great city.

Never from that day forth were Arthur and his fair wife tempted beyond their power to bear—they lived happy, and fond of making others happy—honoured of men, and, so far as we may judge, acceptable to the Most High was their way of life.

But Arthur never from the day when the good man saved him, ceased to remember how much of good there had been to him,—how much of good or evil there may be to every man—in the most trivial word that falls from the lips of heedless and indifferent speakers.

This Beautiful World of Ours.

O, this sweet world is beautiful, and life
Is a dear mystery full of loveliness.
[Sar. Cour. May 4.

Oh, this is a beautiful world of ours,
With its birds and its delicate petall'd flowers;
And its glancing streams, and its sunny light,
And hearts filled up with their deep delight.
O, this is a beautiful world, and fair,
With its forms as light as the morning air;
And eyes that dance in their gladsome glee,
And its lightsome hearts that are bounding free,
Dreaming of bliss that ne'er may be;
O, this is a beautiful world to see,
And joy comes rife on the gliding hours,
As they pass in this beautiful world of ours.

How bright are its skies with their gossamer clouds,
That screen the blue with their silvery shrouds;
Now dyed with purple and fringed with gold,
With a crimson streak in each airy fold,
Or tinged with a delicate pink alone,
Like the flush of a rose on a lily thrown.
Now frowning dark in the thunder pile,
Or glancing bright in the sunbeam's smile.
Now sailing like snow-white swans along,
Or hastening past in a motley throng,
And piling up castles with splendor-towers,
As they float o'er this beautiful world of ours.

Sweet Spring comes over our beautiful earth,
And wakens the spirit to gladsome mirth;
And the heart grows light when her voice is heard,
And the leaves of the trembling trees are stirred,
By the wing of many a blithesome bird.
The delicate flowers, 'neath her rosy feet,
Spring forth with their innocent smiles, to greet
And welcome our steps to each green retreat.
The dew-gems gleam on each bending spray,
And the wild-birds warble the livelong day,
And the woodlands ring as they gaily sing,
Their silvery peals to the merry Spring;
And she laughs as she scatters her buds and flowers,
All over this beautiful world of ours.

Then night comes on and the woods grow dim,
The birds have caroll'd their vesper hymn,
To departing day, as the last sun-ray,
From the deepening heavens has passed away;
And the stars look down with a smile of love,
From the darkening arch of the vault above.
Nature her holiest garb doth wear,
And a love-like radiance filleth the air;
Delights through the quickening pulses move,
Till the spirit seems melting away in love;
While the moon looks down from her star gemm'd bow'rs,
And smiles on this beautiful world of ours.

Night goes by, and the morning streak,
Glows on Aurora's crimsoning cheek;
And the sunlight comes and kisses away
The tears from the cheek of the new-born day;
The sunbeams quiver o'er hills and streams,
And the blossoms awake from their dewy dreams,
With many a sparkling gem that gleams,
With a quickening flash in the golden beams;
While every trembling bush and tree,
Is rife with the wild birds' melody.
O, lovely and fresh are the morning hours,
As they pass from this beautiful world of ours!

I love to stand by the glancing streams,
As they sparkle and flash in the sunlight gleams,
And throw up their bubbles all gleaming bright,
With many a colour of rainbow light.
Oh, beautiful, lovely, and fair are they!
As they flash but a moment and vanish away,
Like the visions that light up our early dreams,
Are those bubbles that dash o'er the crystal streams;
Painted with many a beautiful hue,
They gleam but an instant, and pass from our view;
And the hopes that brighten our onward way,
Are as bright, and as quickly they vanish away.
And our hearts fill up with a new delight,
And the stream flows on in its gladsome light,
And scatters its spray in silvery showers,
To think what a beautiful world is ours!

And yet, though lovely and fair to see,
And beautiful though this world may be,
There are in it spirits bowed down with pain,
That ne'er may wake to its joys again!
There are life-long miseries none may speak,
That drink the blood from the crimson cheek,
And quench the light in the flashing eye,
And turn the laugh to the madden'd sigh!
As thorns are found with the sweetest flowers,
So is grief in this beautiful world of ours!

When the beauty of earth shall have passed away,
When its blue skies fade, and its flowers decay,
When the spirit shall tire of the restless mirth,
And the unsatisfactory joys of earth;
When its gladness hath power to charm no more,
And all is dark which was bright before;
We will leave these scenes for the fadeless bowers
Of a far more beautiful world than ours!

THE ANTIQUARIANS.

A PHILADELPHIA STORY.

BY H. N. MOORE.

"The gown is his that wears it, and the world his that enjoys it," says the proverb.

"What have you to-day, Dickins?" Dickins was spreading the cloth for dinner.

"Soup—fish—stewed oysters and boiled mutton, sa," was the respectful answer of Dickins, as he noiselessly arranged plates, knives, forks, glasses, napkins, etc. His bachelor master, though he dined solus, made it a rule to have his table set for two, liable as he was, just at dinner-hour, to the ever-welcome dropping-in of his esteemed friend and brother-in-law, Godfrey Oldmixon.

As the servant was leaving the room, he said—

"You needn't serve up the mutton, Dickins; I'll have some venison, instead. How long has that saddle been hanging?"

"Three weeks the day before yisterday, sa."

"Bring in a slice or two on the chafing-dish, then."

"Yis, sa."

"And here is the key of my wine-closet; bring me one of those bottles on the upper-shelf, to the left."

"Yis, sa." And exit Dickins.

In a few minutes soup, fish, and oysters, together with uncooked venison on the chafing-dish; besides vegetables, a decanter of brandy, and a bottle of Madeira, were on the table. The bachelor supped a few spoonsful of the soup, ate plentifully of fish and vegetables, and sipped brandy and water.

"Is that sprinkled well with salt, Dickins?"—speaking of the venison.

"Yis, sa."

"Draw the cork"—pointing to the bottle of Madeira.

"Yis, sa."

The cork of the Madeira was extracted.

The bachelor passed a knife through the middle of a half-pound lump of butter, leaving one moiety upon the plate, and tossing the other into the chafing-dish. Half of the Madeira was emptied into the dish, also.

"Light the wicks, Dickins."

Dickins did so, and a strong lambent flame expanded over the convexity of the dish; the musical simmer of butter and Madeira was presently audible, and a savoury steam titillated the olfactory of the bachelor and the nozle of his servant.

While the flesh of deer, with Dickins standing by with knife and fork, to keep turning it, is being cooked, we will suppose that the bachelor has lifted the cover from the dish of stewed bivalves, and is freely partaking of them.

"It's done, sa," says Dickins, as he stoops and puffs out the spirit-flame.

"Change my plate," says the bachelor.

Presto! and a slice of deer, plentifully spooned with butter and Madeira gravy, is before him. With vigour does the bachelor ply his knife and fork; indeed, with such a gusto does he masticate and swallow, notwithstanding soup, fish, and bivalvulars, already deposited in his ventricle of digestion, that a finnicking appetite would wonder to see him, and a dyspeptic would be horrified.

Now, don't suppose, reader, that our bachelor is that vulgar creature, a gourmand; he is not: but a man of exercise, of high health, and with an appetite. He is fond of a good table, and indulges in terrapins, capons, canvass-backs, and those sort of niceties. He is rich, and can afford to have them. But as to making a swine of himself, he is far from it. He indulges with discretion.

While he is at his venison, suppose we describe him.

Ambrose Quaint is his name—a bachelor of forty-two; and a nice, amiable, quiet-natured celibat he is, in the comfortable enjoyment of four thousand per year. In the house where he now resides he was born; it is a three-story old brick, in the street called Pine, and between the streets Third and Fourth, Philadelphia. His honored parents died several years ago, and he has lived there ever since, "keeping bachelor's hall." He has a housekeeper, a quid-nunc looking woman; one that seems to be always on the alert, never off her guard. She is a Miss Krips, upwards of fifty, wears dress-caps and fashionably made frocks, and, presuming upon the score of once having been a lady somewhere in some of the West Indies, she thinks herself something better than housekeepers in ordinary, and wears a quizzing-glass at her side, looking through it upon all occasions as if she were most inconveniently near-sighted. If you will listen to her, she will very obligingly give you much information of manners and customs in the islands of St. Kits, St. Thomas, Jamaica, and others, illustrating it to you by a detail of incidents, in which is slipped in at every opportunity, "the British officers," "dining at our house," "the carriage," etcetera.

Worthy of notice too is the bachelor's cook—a flabby-faced, high-colored Englishwoman, in blowsy cap and calico short-gown: she goes by the name of Becky, and is a great terror to three pointers that the bachelor keeps—a kennel at the back end of the yard accommodates them. These pointers, not satisfied with a liberal allowance of purtenance and the table scraps that fall to their share, have a habit of sneaking down the back area and gravely peeping in at the window, and in at the kitchen-door, if open to to the extent of a crack; and several beef-steaks doing quietly on the gridiron, have at times (the door being open and Becky's back turned) been carried off by them, just when the tread of their master was heard above, pacing to and fro with a most keen appetite.

These depredations had dreadfully enraged Becky against Messrs. Grouse, Carlo, and Jet; she wondered why "Mr. Quaint would keep such consarned things about him—what could he see in the nasty thieving brutes?"

But Becky had no conception of partridge-shooting pleasures, and her master had; he went annually, about the first of November, into Lancaster county, accompanied by his brother-in-law, and scoured the fields in pursuit of partridges, and clambered the crags of a place called Wolf Rock Hollow, after pheasants.

So exasperated was Becky Cook with Mr. Grouse in particular, that it was the wish of her heart to "spit him alive;" and many a time and oft, as Grouse stood peering wistfully through the panes, heartily did she express to herself the satisfaction it would give her to see him in the roasting condition of Monsieur Turkey or Madame Goose, whichever it might be. But Grouse was an old dog, wide awake for cooks, and kept at a respectful distance. Tempting as might be the savory steams that reached his acute nostrils, he never advanced into the kitchen while Becky was there. Carlo and Jet, who were years younger in experience, were less cautious, and received daily kicks and cuffs in consequence of their intrusions. Grouse, like a skilful general, always saw his way clear for a retreat in case of exigency. Did he venture as far as the door, and his yellow eyes were seen by Becky, she was sure to dash at him the first thing she could place her grasp upon—of which the following is an anecdote.

It was about three years ago. Carlo and Jet were plump little canine infants, toddling and tumbling up and down the area steps to the infinite worriment of their anxious mother, Dido, (a pointer of youth and great promise) who overlooked their gambols with a maternal expression of countenance and a feasing whine. Becky was moving about the kitchen fire, and Grouse was gravely watching through one of the window panes. Becky's face was the color of her stove when red-hot; there was malignity in her eye which ever and anon glanced at Grouse, who, with his presence of mind and discretion on the alert, had noticed the aggravated state of her physiognomy, and kept his body sheltered, merely permitting his head to be exposed, ready to dodge the projectile, should it be hurled. Grouse knew well enough why the cook was thus irate. A beefsteak was stolen from the fire the morning previous, and he was seen toting it down the yard to the kennel. Miss Krips had seen him from a second story back window, and informed Becky of his guilt. Dido for an instant left her pups, and ran back to the kennel; in that instant one of the pups tumbled the height of two steps, and yelped out as shrilly as if half killed. The paternal feelings of Grouse in that instant, caused him to lose sight of his prudence, for in hastening to soothe his yelping progeny, he exposed his person full in front of the window, and instantly did Becky shy a stew-pan at him. Fell was her purpose. With all the nerve of a muscular arm, accelerated by the impetus of boiling hot anger, was the stew-pan hurled. "Out! you black thieving rascal!" was the emphatic accompaniment. The window was broken, but her aim was so incorrect that the missile struck wide of Grouse, he vanishing up the area, and retreating to the kennel, while Becky was left to explain matters to Miss Krips, who came bustling down into the kitchen, and to Ambrose, who was disturbed in his perusal of the morning paper by the crash, and came to the head of the kitchen stairs to ask what was the matter. In reply to Becky's explanation, he told her that the sash must be repaired and the panes put in, out of her wages.

"The loss of the beesteak is mine, not yours," "and you must learn better than to dash stew-pans through windows, at my dogs."

Having mildly, but impressively, uttered this reproof, he retired to his parlor and resumed his paper, not without a passing thought of how inconveniently calamitous it would have been had Grouse been maimed, young and untrained to the field as was Dido, and so near at hand as was the partridge season. This same Dido only lived to see her sons once in the field when by an accident she was deprived of life.—Mr. Quaint and his brother-in-law had passed a week out in Lancaster county and were returning home by the night line of cars; Grouse, Dido, Carlo, and Jet, with the bags of game and shooting contraptions, stowed within an enclosure of wire-railing surrounding the top of the car in which they sat. The night was cold and dark, and the iron-horse was rushing at the rate of twenty miles an hour, snorting aloud and startling the silence of gloomy forests; all at once, was heard a shriek as if one of the dogs had fallen from the top of the car—another shriek, but it was far behind. At the next stopping-place Ambrose and Godfrey got out and ascertained that Grouse, Carlo, and Jet remained within the wire-railing, but Dido was missing. Leaving directions with the barkeeper at the stopping-place, they resumed their journey home.—The barkeeper's letter followed in two days, stating that the dog was found the next day lying between the rails of the track, with two of her legs broken, frozen to death.

Ambrose's present waiter is a mulatto, very spruce in appearance and quite dexterous in waiting upon the table, for plates vanish and come again with almost magical celerity. He happens to bear a name spelled with an i instead of an e in the last syllable, that is now so familiar to the public—Charles Dickins; Charley Dickins, as the waiter next door calls him in the daily colloquies with which they enlighten each other while washing the front steps; Dickins, as his master addresses him. Sometime ago the bachelor had a young fellow from Canada who proved well enough in his capacity, but had such a spice of foppery about him that it was disgusting. The chap, whose hair was not short when he came into the bachelor's service, permitted it to grow longer and longer until it was of a length and fashion even outdoing the scalplock touch so prevalent now-a-days, approximating to the picturesque and cavalier profusion of Charles the First and his courtiers; black as jet was it, and so saturated with bergamot-scented pomatum, that Ambrose, who despised such things in general, could but experience a particular distaste to it in one whose situation necessitated him to be grubbing at coal-fires and brick-dusting knives and forks. On Sunday the fellow would be trigged off in broad-shouldered coat, puckered gaiter pants, pivot-heeled boots, gorgeous vest, and, in fact, would be so dressed that the bachelor finally felt it necessary to his comfort to discharge the fellow with a written good character.

But let us look in upon the bachelor as he sits, after dinner, in his elbow-chair in his old-fashioned parlor. You see a plumpish, not obese, body; a small-featured, rotund countenance; animated grey eyes; dark hair, cut close to his head by his neighbor and barber, of extensive reputation, John Quard, who connoiseurs in singing birds, and has the front of his blue frame covered in summer time with pendent cages and yellow warblers. His (Quaint's not Quard's) shirt-collar, you observe, is not reversed as is the mode, but stands up under his ears and pokes out in a sharp corner at each side of his cheek. His vest has not a rolling collar, but the primish cut of years ago, and a shirt-frill protrudes from it. His trousers are loose and flowing, but, whilst he is seated cross-legged, inasmuch as he wears no straps, they ride up his boots, and when he is walking they show many creases and bulge at the knees, contrasting strongly with the stretched down and skin-fitting pants of Chesnut Street promenaders. Straps he never wore, and he says he never will. His coat is always of brown or of a shade very near it. He is seated, you see, at a circular table covered with a green and white tapestry; and is reading in a folio tome of some quaint old author of the Elizabethan era. Of nothing does he pride himself so much as his collection of books. In the words of Chaucer—

> "For him was lever han at his beddes hed,
> A twenty bookes, yclothed in black or red,
> Of Aristotle and his philosophie,
> Than robes rich, or fidel, or sautrie."

There, between fire-place and window, you see the bookcase that was made to his father's order sixty years ago; it is filled with works which have been read and re-read by Ambrose ever since he was able to read. He reads the current literature of the day, at least such of it as is of a nature he can endure, but has a never-failing resource among his own volumes. Those two portraits—that elderly gentleman in blue coat and powdered caxon, and that middle-aged lady in neat cap, rich brocade gown, and with face all smiles—represent the parents of Ambrose. Those two ebony-framed engravings—that hanging between the windows you can see at a glance is Washington; the one above the mantel-piece represents a clergyman—one who possessed brilliant talents, and was for several years rector of Christ Church and St. Peter's (Philadelphia), but so great was his aversion to the Revolution that he left the country and went to England—an impressive orator, a tasteful poet—Jacob Duche.* Those two busts on the bookcase—that with the peaked beard is Ben Jonson, that with the wreath, Tasso.

Hark! a knock at the front door. Charles Dickins, with as Chesterfieldian a suavity of manner as could be expected from a waiter, and grinning in the goodness of his heart, opens the door. In walks a gentleman. Dickins throws wide the parlor door and "Mr. Oldmixon, sa."

"Good day, Godfrey," says Quaint, speaking with that easy familiarity with which we salute a daily visiter.

"Good day, Ambrose."

"Sit down. How is Jane?"

"Well."

"And the children?"

"Well."

A quaint pair of brothers-in law are Ambrose Quaint and Godfrey Oldmixon! Schoolboys together, similar dispositions led them into similar quiet pursuits, and naturally into friendship. Godfrey was in those days, as now, much at the house in Pine street, and consequently much in the company of Ambrose's sister—a good-natured girl, who had no physiognomical beauty, but a figure remarkably elegant; her manners were easy and attractive; never girl of her age possed more intelligence. Her attractions, hidden to many, were discovered by Godfrey; a mutual attachment took place, and they were married.

"What if Jane had not taken a fancy to you, Godfrey—if she had married some one else?" said Ambrose, one evening as the three of them (Jane with baby on her lap) were seated in his parlor and dozing in their comforts. These were but simple words but the tones in which they were spoken conveyed a world of meaning.

Godfrey and Jane reside in Eighth street, between Walnut and Locust; their house is a wide three-story; the three windows in front of the second story reach down to the floor, with inside shutters and a semicircle of iron-railings projecting in front of each. This house is but one of a few that remain about the city—this few indicating how small a portion of a community is proof against that tide of innovation that has been sweeping over the social condition of private life within these twenty years past.—Thirty years ago these balconie projections were to be seen, two or three, if not more, in every square of residences where the wealthy clustered. No farther back than the visit of La Fayette to the United States as the guest of the nation (it was in 1824), we can remember how frequent they were to what they are. How vivid is that picture to our eye!—triumphal arches, emblematically emblazoned flags flying, banners aloft, the military and populace moving to martial music in one dense mass, windows and house-tops crowded, hats and handkerchiefs waving, and the spontaneous huzza of a grateful people greeting the hero as he passed! How many of these balconies that have since disappeared were then crowded with beautiful ladies!

This house was an heirloom that had descended to Godfrey. At the time of his marriage with Jane, it was the only source of income enjoyed by him. It rented for six hundred and fifty dollars, out of which he dressed, boarded, purchased books, and kept himself in pocket-money. Jane, having her income of four thousand, proposed to reside in it. Godfrey acquiesced; due notice was given to the occupant, upon whose removal, the new-married couple took up their abode there. And there, from 1820 to the present time, they have resided, the most affectionate man and wife in Philadelphia perhaps; during which twenty-three years they were made the happy parents of two daughters and four sons, and had had the pleasure of uniting the eldest daughter to a worthy young country gentleman, and are now the grandparents of a hearty little Ambrose, junior. This daughter, who is an especial favorite of her uncle's, has called her firstborn after one who has ever been indulgently kind to her, and whom she loves with a deep feeling. Lycoming county is her place of residence; she and her uncle regularly correspond, and in his letters he entertains her with much city gossip in his quaint style of epistolizing.

Ambrose and Godfrey are much in the habit of taking long walks, beguiling the way with conversation which they alone could enjoy, and making observations upon things that scarcely any other two in the world would give a second thought. About every other afternoon Godfrey repairs after dinner or to dinner to the residence of Ambrose, and (weather permitting) they take a stroll. If they do not conclude upon a walk, they sit together in Ambrose's parlor and converse, or each gets a volume down from the bookcase, and there the two of them read. If either meets with a passage that is instructive he reads aloud and the other pauses from his book to listen. The passage calls for merely a comment, perhaps, and they resume their silent perusal, but not unfrequently one remark leads to another, they forget their books, and hours of animated discussion ensue.

Anything old excites the interest and veneration of both. Inordinate is sometimes their curiosity in regard to a dismantled building, and nothing disquiets them more than to see (sacrilege as they consider it) the daily tearing down of time-darkened walls and putting up of glaring new fronts instead. Ambrose, in particular, from his youth possessed this feeling. Godfrey took it up more from his brother-in-law's example than from an original bent; but it has so grown upon him, that it is now but in the slightest degree less strong.

"What do you think, Godfrey," said Ambrose, one afternoon, as his brother-in-law entered,—(this was about six years ago)—"the old Presbyterian Church, in Pine street here, above Fourth, is to be gutted completely; pews, pulpit, windows, roof and floors, are to be all new; the aged trees are to be hewed down; there is to be a basement, according to the recent style of church building; the exterior is to be rough-casted."

Now, the reader, if a resident of Philadelphia, is most likely familiar with the locale of which we are writing. He must know that Ambrose Quaint, to reside in Pine street, between Third and Fourth, must look from his windows upon the old Episcopal church and grave-yard of St. Peter's opposite; that the grave-yard occupies the whole square in length, and is half a square in breadth; that at Fourth street the ground of the Third Presbyterian Church commences, and reaches nearly to Fifth; and that in the centre of this stands the white structure that has been reared upon the walls of a building that a few years since stood in venerable plight, surrounded with tall trees, wearing as shaded and as reverential an appearance as its neighbour.

"Ah, Godfrey! what a modernizing age we have fallen upon. We shall have nothing old to look at in our walks shortly." Approaching a window and looking over at St. Peter's, "May this, at least, this time-honored House of the Lord, be preserved from the desecrations of that boasted March of Improvement which is striding over our country, and trampling in its progress, with ruthless disregard to the past, upon all that is venerable and hallowed! Time-honored church, how I revere it! What sacred retrospections are associated with it! Within its walls, from Sabbath to Sabbath, sate my parents in their childhood, before its altar they were united; at its font Jane and I were christened; and from early life to old age, it was their place of worship! Do you remember the Sundays of our boyhood, Godfrey?"

"They were halcyon days, Ambrose!"

"Our old pew, Godfrey—you remember? and the two boys with spotless collars neatly turned down—our ringletted hair—the prayer-book that Jane and you held together—my honored and beloved parents!—and the loud rolling of the organ—and the hymn of praise—and the prayers—and the responses—and—"

"Remember—yes!" Godfrey glowingly interrupted; and as a stream from the reservoir of memory flowed upon his heart, he was filled to overflowing with gratitude for the happiness he now enjoyed, and had enjoyed for the most of his life, as the schoolmate and companion of Ambrose in earlier years, and as the husband of Jane, and his brother-in-law since.

A devout and prayerful feeling animated the breast of each, as they looked over towards the old church; their hearts were full to overflowing; and Ambrose broke forth with a quotation familiar to both, and peculiarly apropos to the moment. They were standing side by side.

> "I love the church, the holy church,
> That o'er our life presides;
> The birth, the bridal, and the grave,
> And many an hour besides!
> The vaulted dome that trembled oft
> Above the chaunted psalm;
> The quaint old altar where we owned
> Our very Paschal Lamb;
> The chimes that ever in the tower
> Like seraph-music sung;
> And held me spell-bound in the way
> When I was very young.
> Be mine through life to live in her,
> And when the Lord shall call,
> To die in her, the spouse of Christ,
> The Mother of us all!"

* * * * *

The world is full of common sense and nonsense; but much that seems ridiculous is not so, and au contraire.

Respect for the Past, veneration in presense of its monuments, indicate at once a gentle mind, pure taste, good heart.

It will readily be inferred that these reverential feelings for whatever wears the impress of Time, cannot dwell in a breast unattended with an antiquarian propensity to search into the history—the details, the memoirs, as it were—of such memorials of the olden time as come within notice. Antiquaries in many particulars the brothers-in-law are,—and there is an anecdote of the kind that the invidious make a source of ridicule. Before relating the anecdote, it is requisite that the reader should know that this propensity leads them to take an especial interest in rain-spouts. Rain-spouts, quotha! Yes—you smile—perpend before you ridicule—read!

As they perambulate the city in their customary walks, the dates upon the spouts are a never-failing fountain of interest to them. You are quizzing, certainly? In truth I am not. With all the old and interesting houses noticed by Watson, in his Annals of Philadelphia, they are perfectly familiar, and in their antiquarian explorations about town, they have discovered several worthy of record, overlooked by that author. A date upon a spout casually meeting the glance, will be to the memory of either a magic touch. To the mind of either, a date is the starting-point of a stream of thought, conversation, argument, ideas and sentiment. In Philadelphia, where the period at which a house is erected is almost invariably recorded upon the spout, a penchant of this kind (spout-gazing shall we call it?) is apt, very apt, to plant itself in the soil of a quaint and thoughtful disposition; and it has "ample room and verge enough" to ponder, speculate and philosophize; for dates from the present 1843 are spout-recorded as far back as 1727, if not earlier. Those old, sober-looking three-story houses, with massive door-frames and thick window-sash, that here and there remain about the city, like a maiden aunt of ninety in a family, in antiquated dress—such houses as present a front chequered with glazed bricks, a style now in utter desuetude—they are the dwellings to arrest the attention of the quaint and antiquarian. A house of such an aspect, with the year 1750 on the spout, in the sprawling figures peculiar to the last century, is an object of intense interest to the brothers-in-law; they will at once imaginarily invest it with the furniture and inhabit it with the people of that period, and review the social and political condition of our forefathers at that time. They will see in imagination, wainscotted parlors, carved tables and chairs, bright andirons supporting big hickory logs blazing upon the hearth of an elaborated chimney-piece, and a gentleman of the old school, in powdered periwig and benevolent countenance, small clothed and silk-hosed, his feet in silver-buckled square-toes, and his body in embroidered waistcoat and coat, sitting at the fireside, surrounded by his wife and children, correspondingly habited.

Again, 1768 on a spout, would be associated with the birth of Joseph Bonaparte, for instance, who was born on the 7th of February of that year; and 1769 with that of his illustrious brother, and of the Duke of Wellington, in which year both were born. From thoughts in respect to the birth of these, our brothers-in-law would follow up the career of each hero, discussing doubts, stating facts, and explaining probabilities of history, to their mutual edification and pleasure. A spout with 1776, would bring in review the American Revolution, with its brilliant array of great names and glorious associations.—Another, with 1793, would recal the Reign of Terror, with all its train of horrors—its atrocities—the guillotine—blood—the death of Louis XVI., of Maria Antoinette, and of the many distinguished persons who were the victims of that dreadful crisis.

The dates mentioned are merely promiscuously quoted as exemplificatory of a general effect. One date would be confined not merely to the events of one nation or the biography of one person, but extended to cotemporaneous history and biography.—For instance, 1793 reminded them not only of the French Revolution, but of that awful epidemic, the Yellow Fever, which ravaged Philadelphia with its accumulation of miseries during that year. The 1733 upon the old State House spout is seldom passed by either of the brothers-in-law without a sequence of musings, in which is pictured the Hall of Independence, with the Signers of the Declaration. Dates upon the title pages of books have the same tendency. A glance at 1715 reminds of the death of Louis XIV., and the whole epic and the episodes of his life and reign; 1660 of Charles the Second, his restoration, and the profligacy of his court; 1599 of the birth of Oliver Cromwell and his career; etcetera.

Godfrey, accustomed to the sight of dates upon spouts in his habitual walks with Ambrose about Philadelphia, feels himself quite lost in New York, in which city he has an aged relative whose heir he is, and the old lady exacts from him quarterly visits of one week's duration each. As he toddles the old lady about on his arm, he looks around, during the long pauses in conversation, in vain for a spout with a date upon it, or a time-darkened brick house, to set his thoughts in motion—every spout is a blank, every house is red. The few exceptions that there are, it has not been his lot to discover. He loves and honors his aged relative, but is always glad when the week expires, and he is at liberty to hurry back to Philadelphia and the company of his wife, children, and brother-in-law.

But the anecdote.

The brothers-in-law, in strolling along Second street one day—this was eight years ago—paused, as they invariably did when passing that way, to admire the quaint style of Christ Church,—turning away from which, Godfrey noticed a very old front, to which he directed the attention of Ambrose, on the opposite side of the street. (The house has since been torn down, and new stores built on the site.)

"The spout," was the first thought of Ambrose—"what date has it?"

"There appears to have been a date on it," said Godfrey, "for I can distinguish traces of figures."

"Traces?" said Ambrose. "Yes—I see."

"The figures have been knocked off most likely by some ruthless Goth or Vandal of a carpenter's apprentice," suggested Godfrey.

"Why do you think so, Godfrey?"

"The roof has been newly shingled, you see, and a boy with a hatchet in his hand and mischief in his thoughts"—

"Yes—yes—very likely, Godfrey. What an old affair it is!" uttered Ambrose, in antiquarian veneration, as his eyes scanned the checker-board-like front, and the old-fashioned appearance of the house.

"What if we go across and make inquiries?" proposed Godfrey.

Across they went, but to their interrogatories they could elicit no satisfactory answers in regard to the age of the house, and so forth. The date had never been seen by the lady they spoke with, and in fact she was not aware that there ever had been one, though, looking up at the spouts of the opposite houses as she spoke, she supposed it quite likely, but it must have been a great while ago. In fact she had never noticed before that it was the custom to have dates upon spouts. An odd kind of business for two gentlemen to knock at a door and ask questions about, thought she; and it occurred to her that they might be quizzing her, but their countenances were so serious, that upon second thought she dismissed the suspicion.

"Yes, there certainly has been a date," said Ambrose, having stepped to the edge of the pavement, and gazing earnestly up to the spout as he spoke; "the traces of four figures are evident—there's a one and a seven distinct, and the other two look to me like three and two. What if it should be 1732, Godfrey? the year in which Washington was born, eh?"

"If we had a ladder now," said Godfrey.

"Yes—or a stout rope," said Ambrose. "If a rope can be procured, and if this good lady will permit me, with it around my waist I will climb out of her garret window, and——"

"Ain't you afraid, sir?" said the lady.

"Afraid, ma'am—not in the least. Why where will be the danger? My brother-in-law can stand inside of the window and hold on to the rope, while I creep on my hands and knees down to the edge of the roof and peep over the eaves."

"And would you go to all this trouble to——"

"Yes, ma'am, to ascertain the date of the spout on your house," answered Ambrose, in reply to the lady's surprise.

"Well, I declare!" said the lady.

"You wonder at our curiosity, ma'am. No doubt you look upon this as a foolish notion of ours. But notions are various, ma'am—they differ to a wide extent."

"True!" admitted the lady.

"The pleasure," continued Ambrose, "that my brother-in-law and I take in an antiquarian research of this kind is to us as keen as is the delight experienced by a lady in putting on a new dress—and can aught be more gratifying than that, madam?"

"Well," said the lady, smiling, for the compliment had reached her, "get your rope and try."

Ambrose hastened to the nearest grocery and borrowed one of those substantial hempen twists with which brawny draymen lower hogsheads into cellars, or heave them up therefrom, as the case may require. A drudge about the store shouldered the coil and followed Ambrose to the house, through the entry and up to the garret. With alacrity did Ambrose lay aside his hat and strip off his coat. One end of the rope was made into a noose and fixed round his waist; the other end made fast to the leg of a bedstead.

Thus secured, Ambrose crept out of the garret window and crabbed it, with Godfrey holding on to the rope, slantwise and across to the edge of the steep roof. The grocery-store drudge gaped with his mouth and eyes wide open. The lady of the house looked on in trepidation over the shoulder of Godfrey, who, with feet planted firm and his grasp tight upon the rope, stood with tremulous interest in the result of his brother-in-law's scrutiny of the spout.

It is not to be supposed that any movement like this could be effected without notice in such a thoroughfare as Second street, between Market and Arch. A staring crowd soon collected on the opposite pavement. "What's he after?" was the general question. "It's hard to tell," was the general reply.

The eaves of the house (as may be observed upon all very old buildings) were heavy and projecting, and the bachelor found it not so facile a matter as he had anticipated to get at the spout. The eaves shot completely over it, and he must consequently stretch himself far out to enable him to scrutinize with an accuracy that the decyphering of the characters on the spout required. The spirit of alacrity with which he had started was quite checked, as he now felt conscious of the danger that threatened. He felt inclined to retreat; but there was the gaping crowd opposite—if he did not accomplish his purpose, what a shower-bath of ridicule! "Hold tight, Godfrey."

"I sa-say, Ambrose, hadn't you bet-bet-ter-er come in again?" was the quivering remark of the brother-in-law, whose knees now shook against each other. His grasp upon the rope was growing uncertain, too.

Ambrose inwardly coincided—he thought to himself he had better—but he was in for it, and neck or nothing he resolved.

"Hold on, Godfrey, hold tight"—and he placed himself flat upon his breast, stretching his head over the eaves and squirming his neck about like a topsy-turvy terrapin on the floor of an eating-house.

"I say there, take care there!" cried a voice from the crowd below.

"Look out, or you'll loose you're balance," cried another.

"That chap in the window looks frightened," was remarked.

"If he should let go the rope now."

"Hold on, Godfrey"—and the bachelor squeezed himself a little farther. He had now stretched over far enough to get a sight of the figures, or rather the traces of them, and the one and the seven were plain—a little nearer, and he should be able to decide whether the doubtful figures were three and two, or other numerals.

"Oh, he'll fall! he'll fall!" shrieked a female from the crowd.

The brother-in-law was indeed frightened as the voice from below had suggested.

"Hold on Godfrey," reiterated the bachelor, his face distented and red with blood, as he made another movement. He was now stretched beyond his balance and his weight upon the rope was heavy.

"Hold on, Godfrey."

But the trembling, frightened Godfrey was capable of heeding the injunction no longer—he fainted—the rope dropped from his grasp, and the heels of the bachelor were somerseted over the eaves. Loud shrieks rent the air from below, and the tender-hearted of the crowd covered their eyes with their hands and ran away, dreading to encounter the shocking spectacle of spattered brains, mangled flesh and crushed bones, which was instantly pictured in their eyes.

These shrieks were in less than a moment followed by boisterous laughter. The precaution of having the rope fastened to a bedstead leg saved the bachelor's life. Kicking and sprawling, with the ease and grace of a tyro in swimming, he now hung midway between roof and pavement, swaying to and fro, in a situation ridiculously imminent, and to the infinite amusement of the crowd. Hilarious shouts and all kinds of odd remarks emanated from below, and the cake and apple stand of a plaid-cloaked and crazy-bonneted woman near by furnished missiles to the no small discomfort of the object in suspension.

"It's an ill wind that blows nobody any good," remarked she of the apples and cakes, gratified by the quick and profitable vendition of her stock in trade.

His pendulous and oscillatory eminence abashed our bachelor much; he was for the time as bad off as a rogue in the pillory. In a moment or two, however, he was relieved from his predicament by being pulled in through one of the second story windows.

The majority of the crowd then dispersed. The lady of the house smiled, and the grocery-drudge grinned.

"Where's my brother-in-law?" were the first words of Ambrose, as he got upon his feet, and got the rope from round his waist.

"Here I am," said Godfrey, having recovered from his momentary swoon on the garret floor.—"Here's your coat."

Ambrose—not injured, his skin chafed a little by the rope, and his mind flurried a little—quickly put on his coat. He gave the grocery-drudge a piece of silver and dismissed her.

"Sit down, sir; compose yourself; I should think it imprudent for you to go out just now," said the lady, as she motioned the brothers-in-law to observe through the window a portion of the crowd lingering in front of the house to gratify themselves with a shout of exultance at the bachelor's egress.

They waited awhile, but the crowd dispersed not. In this state of affairs they were obliged to escape by the back way, ripping their pants over yard fences, wading through kitchen slops, and retreating (skulking almost) through Jones' Alley into Front street, and round home.

This anecdote of the brothers-in-law was for months a standing joke; but the bruit of it has died away to an echo merely; it is in the remembrance of but a few of their acquaintances.

* * * * *

This veneration for the Past, discovers itself in many of the bachelor's traits; in the care he takes, and the pride he has therein, of the old-silver which has descended to him, the quaint fashion of which he preserves inviolate; in the well-worn, big-lettered brass door-plate which he retains with the same A. QUAINT—his father's name—which has been there from his earliest remembrance, instead of adopting the small plated style that almost every family now-a-days places under the bell-handle: and in the respect, able as he is to be costly, that he holds the articles of furniture left by his parents, retaining them in parlours and chambers precisely as they have been since his childhood. It was not long since, that he accidentally found, in the shop of a silversmith, a silver tankard, of antique pattern, with the initials of his great-grandfather thereon. He immediately purchased it—left it with the smith to be burnished—and set about, with true antiquarian zeal, to trace the vicissitudes by which it had descended from his progenitor to the smith. He has an antique silver cream-cup that was sometime ago presented to him by a maiden aunt of his, Annabel Quaint, who su-vives at a great age; this cup has a squat, duck-like look, and many a fine lady or gent would deem it in wretched taste to garnish a tea-table with it, but the bachelor is of a different notion, and for no money would he part with such a relic of the olden-time. In the plain, prim parlour of his aunt, is another memento of the Past: it is a portrait of John Penn, Esq.,* presented to the Quaint family by Mr. Penn himself; at the death of the good old lady, it becomes the property of our bachelor. With his aunt, who resides in quaint style and comfort, in the upper part of the city, Ambrose has frequently long conversations. She is a loquacious old lady, but he is as quick to ask questions as she is to answer them, and hour upon hour, they will sit together, chatting of the olden time. With anecdotes of our Revolution she teems, and Washington, Howe, Lafayette, Cornwallis, Franklin—the great ones of both sides throughout the war—pass in review before you, with vivid effect, as she narrates, conversant as she is with so much that the dignity of history passes without a notice. And in nothing is his respect for the Past more evinced than in his attachment to the family pew in St. Peter's; in which pew, for a century almost, his family has worshipped. Not the narrow seat of modern churches this, but the family accommdating enclosure that affords the degree of privacy requisite (such the bachelor's opinion) to quiet and unostentatious worship. To his religious duties, none more attentive than he, both in form and spirit,—punctually in his seat Sunday after Sunday, with Godfrey and Jane and their children, repeating the prayers, the creed, the litany, the psalter, and showing forth the praises of the Lord throughout the sacred and impressive services of the Episcopal church.

A subject of much interest to Ambrose, was the recent addition of a steeple to St. Peter's;† it was to be in keeping with the style of the church, not an innovation of modernism; it was investing the church with more of its characteristic venerability, imparting to the whole that old-English aspect that we delight to associate in our mind with an Episcopal house of worship. It was, therefore, with his entire approbation that he saw the rearing of that "silent finger which points to Heaven." From letters sent by him to his niece in Lycoming county, we have the privilege to extract, and we find use for the following.

"It much—much indeed—rejoiceth your uncle, my beloved niece, to know that your happiness hath daily increased since you changed the name of Oldmixon for that of Wentworth. Your last letter is all sunshine—your feelings, dear Cecilia, are mirrored in that epistle as beautifully correct as you may see a face in the glass at your toilet. I never compliment. The simile was unavoidable; it came in pat. But don't be too sanguine, my dear girl. Much hath the young wife and mother to be proud of, I know, but——

"You ask me to tell you all the particulars relative to the steeple of St. Peter's that is being erected. My sundries of information thereof amount in the aggregate to no more than, that a gentleman, Benizon Goodwill, by name, hath—without any ostentation in the matter, I really believe—presented the congregation with a chime of bells, like unto those that you have heard tintinnabulate so harmoniously in the steeple of Christ Church. The cash to purchase the bells it was his pleasure to offer, and to accept it was the pleasure of the congregation, and this steeple—belfry and spire, rather—is being built to suspend them in, upon their arrival from England. They are expected by the next of Cope's packets, I believe. The donor of these bells was several years a merchant, residing in the East—at Canton, I think. Having acquired wealth, he returned to the United States. He is of a slender figure—he dresses neatly in black; his hair is thick on his head, but gray; and he wears gray whiskers. I judge him to be between his fiftieth and sixtieth year. He has won for himself a character for liberality and open-heartedness that renders him deservedly popular, and he occupies, at present, a prominent position in society here." * * * *

From another letter we extract—

* * * "We were talking at the time about old houses, regretting the loss of Mrs. Stamper's and Gov. M'Kean's quaint residences—you can just remember them if you try, Cecelia, I think; they were at the corner of Pine and Third streets, with long gardens running back; the sites are now occupied with rows of new three-story bricks. Dr. Blackwell's old house, with its chequered brick-work, and massive mouldings, remains in excellent preservation; but the luxuriant side-garden is gone, and a red row occupies the site. What an abomination in the eyes of an antiquary these red-rows are! 'But they will grow old in time, Uncle,' you say.—Ay! but—

"The steeple of St. Peter's is finished. It presents a square tower of brick-work, rising above which is a spire; the spire is surmounted by a gilt cross, at a height of more than two hundred feet. I look at it now from my window—how it towers! The bells—they were rung to-day for the first. The daily papers had apprized the citizens, and, as early as eight o'clock this morning, the pavement before my door, and all along from Third street to Fourth, was crowded with a concourse to hear 'a grandsire' chimed. At the hour appointed they were rung, and right musical was the effect. But you should have seen the gilt cross, how it shook; the jar of the bells vibrated it to and fro, and the crowd, with mouths agape, and half-suspended respiration, expected to see it topple every moment; but the ringing is done, the concourse has dispersed, and it still glitters in its lofty altitude.

"The elevation of this cross has not been unattended with dissatisfaction. It ought not to be there, say some, who are for substituting a vane—but the majority of the congregation approve of it. The vestry of the church were at one period equally divided upon the matter. Dr. Chapman, of facetious notoriety, being told this 'wondered how that young man‡ managed to get along with a vestry where one half were vane and the other cross.' The architecture of the steeple is ridiculed, too; the spire is compared to a candle-extinguisher by one—and another is put in mind of a shot-tower by the belfry. But these exceptions are prompted by either hypercriticism, folly or ignorance; good taste has not a word to say in disapprobation. But it is proverbially impossible that any thing should please everybody.—For my part, Cecilia,—and your parents agree with me,—I regard the whole with a favorable eye, and freely award my quota of approval to the liberal spirit which has characterized this undertaking from first to last." * * *

Venerable, hallowed St. Peter's! There—it was there that Ambrose first saw the light and love of a fair face that——

It was several years ago. Ambrose was but twenty years of age. It was the Sabbath. Religiously impressive was the solemnity that reigned throughout the interior of that old church. The hymn that immediately precedes the sermon was concluded, and the last sounds of the organ lingered in faintest reverberations on the ears of the congregation. Never was autumnal afternoon more beautiful; warm and mellow were the tints of sunlight that shone through the antique casements, and a calm and holy pensiveness prevailed in the breast of Ambrose as he reclined his head back in preparation to bestow his attention upon the discourse that the good and beloved Bishop White was about to commence. A hush as if it were empty was the church. Hark!—a faint exclamation, as if from some one in pain. Ambrose turned to look—a lady!—he sprang forward to an opposite pew, and caught her in his arms as she swooned. To support her into the air, was but the work of an instant. She revived.——

From this how easily to suppose an attachment took place. Sweet,—yes, she was a sweet young girl, the first and only love of Ambrose Quaint! She had come from the north, to the warmer climate of Philadelphia, with the hope of benefitting her health, which had been sensibly affected for some months past by that slow, but sure destroyer, consumption. In the family of the M——s, she received every kindness, and a flattering sensation of renovated health disposed her to participate limitedly in the gayeties of society during the ensuing winter. Ambrose was ever by her side. Pure was the love that grew up between them, and the following autumn was fixed as the time when they should be united in form, as in heart they already were. But that disease—deceptive, alluring consumption!—like a fire which had smouldered, to burst forth in time with intenser flame, it now renewed its ravages upon the delicate frame of the fair girl, and it was but too evident to her lover, and the kind friends surrounding her couch, that her lamp of life would burn but a little, a very little, longer.—She died.—

Those that feel deeply, can ill express their sufferings. Ambrose followed in the funeral procession without a tear—but he did not mourn the less. Too sacred his grief to be paraded! But in the privacy of his chamber, after the burial, oh how bitterly he wept! And to such an extent her death affected him, that he was prostrated on a sick bed, and his life was at one crisis considered in danger. Four months was he confined to his chamber. In time, though, these deep traces of anguish were worn away, and the world claimed its proper part as his life stole on. But so wedded to her was his heart, that he then vowed to be the husband of her memory ever after, and faithfully has he kept his vow. Before the world he is a bachelor, but a husband in his own heart! Frequently does Godfrey, upon entering the quiet parlor in Pine street, find his brother-in-law abstracted in an intensity of thought, with his eyes tear-dimmed, and bent upon a miniature. The interruption causes Ambrose to shut up the case, and return it to his pocket. Godfrey is at once aware of the character of Ambrose's thoughts, and the latter is conscious of the other's knowledge. How sacred to the heart such musings are, Godfrey comprehends the electric spark of feeling touches the wire of sympathy, and his eyes are also tear-dimmed. Not a word upon the subject is spoken by either; but, each relapsing into a train of musings, several moments are passed in the silence and luxury of sentiment.

The memory of his love is to Ambrose like the ideal-presence of his saint to the devout Catholic; and though life, deprived of her, has not for him the same objects it otherwise would have had, yet its duties are many he knows, and that sense of duty instructs him not to indulge in sensibility to the extreme which is sometimes permitted to human the heart, but to be active in the sweet offices of humanity, and to participate rationally in the pleasures that life affords when properly pursued. "He knows the world without despising it—the peculiar privilege of a great mind."

"Thus while the world but claims its proper part,
Oft in the head, but never in the heart,
His life steals on; within his quiet dwelling
That homefelt joy all other joys excelling."—[Rogers.

ON TIME.

Even while the careless disencumbered soul,
Sinks all dissolving into pleasure's dream,
Even then to Time's tremendous verge we roll,
With headlong haste along life's surgy stream.

Can gaiety the vanished years restore,
Or on the withering limbs fresh beauty shed,
Or soothe the sad inevitable hour,
Or cheer the dark, dark mansions of the dead?

Ah! Beauty's bloom avails not in the grave,
Youth's lofty mien, nor age's awful grace;
Moulder alike unknown the prince and slave;
'Whelm'd in th' enormous wreck of human race.

The thought-fix'd portraiture, the breathing bust,
The arch with proud memorials arrayed,
The long-liv'd pyramid shall sink in dust,
To dumb oblivion's ever-desert shade.

AUNT JERUSIA'S GOLD NECKLACE.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

Nothing within the memory of the oldest inhabitant of the obscure country town of Redfield, had created such a "sensation," as Mrs. Le Richmond's new house; it being the only three story building in the place, and except the meeting-house, the only one painted white. Its situation, too, which was on an elevated piece of ground, added greatly to its imposing appearance. Many of the inhabitants were proud of this new and splendid edifice, regarding it as not only ornamental to the town, but as giving it a consequence which it did not before possess: and if a stranger inquired the way to the little inn of Redfield, instead of saying as formerly, that it was a quarter of a mile from the meeting-house, they were in the habit of saying that it was half a mile from the large white house on the hill. Others, on the contrary, considered the building of so large and costly a house, as an innovation upon the primitive customs of the town, which ought by no means to be countenanced. Among these Miss Jerusia Hopkins, a spinster of fifty, set her face against it in a most decided manner, and gave people to understand that she should abstain from cultivating an acquaintance with so proud a woman as Mrs. Le Richmond, and should use her influence with her sister, Mrs. Fay, in whose family she resided, to induce her to follow her example.

Mrs. Fay, the widow of a respectable farmer, had only one child, a daughter, who at the time of our story, was sixteen. Lucy was a high-hearted, joyous creature, and the notes of the sweetest song-bird that thrilled on the ear from the woods, or the orchard when the trees were in full bloom, had nothing in them that sounded happier, or more musical. She had, moreover, all the beauty and simplicity of the flowers that grew in the sunny nooks of the woodland, or on the borders of the clear brook near the homestead, where she loved to linger and observe the limpid water, as it quietly rippled over the smooth pebbles, or sparkled down the side of some old gray rock. Her eyes, which were of that most changeful of all hues, the hazle, were large and brilliant, and shaded by long, curved lashes, perfectly black, although the cloud of curls that fell down her neck, were of a rich, sunny brown. Her complexion was of a clear, healthful hue, in which ordinarily the lily predominated, but when exercising in the open air, the richest of roses seemed to be melting through her transparent cheeks. With all her beauty and sweetness, however, she was no favorite of aunt Jerusia.

"I do think," said she, one day to her sister, "that you are to blame about that girl."

"Why?" inquired Mrs. Fay.

"Why! I should think you would know why.—Don't she go roaming about in the woods and down by the brook a whole hour at a time, doing no earthly thing but singing and plucking flowers."

"I know that, sister, but it is for her health to exercise in the open air, and it does my heart good to look at her when she comes back, with her eyes sparkling so bright, and her cheeks looking so red."

"She better exercise herself at the spinning-wheel, as you and I used to, when we were of her age."

"She does spin five skeins a day, which is called a good day's work."

"Yes, but she is so spry, she can whirl off her five skeins by two o'clock in the afternoon. She might just as well spin her eight as not. She is what I call a lazy, idle baggage, and the man who gets her for a wife will repent in dust and ashes, or I will never guess again."

Just at this moment Lucy bounded into the room, with a large bunch of frost flowers in her hand.

"Only see how beautiful these are," said she. "I could hardly step along the sunny edges of the woodland, without crushing them, they were so plenty."

"And it would have been no great matter if you had," said her aunt Jerusia. "You had better be turning the spinning-wheel, and so I have been telling your mother."

"Now, aunt, if you will not scold a single word," said Lucy, "as soon as I have finished spinning tomorrow, I will starch and iron your best sheer muslin cap, so that it will look as well as it did when it was new."

"I have no thoughts of scolding, Miss Flippant. I guess your cousin Jerusia"—and she applied the corner of her apron to her eyes—"would not accuse her old aunt of scolding."

Lucy made no reply, though a crushed tear sparkled on her long silken eye-lashes. But the ill humor of her aunt cast only a transient shadow over her spirits, and five minutes afterwards, when Celia Carter, a girl of her own age, was seen approaching the house, she ran to meet her with a face radiant with smiles.

"Did you know that a gentleman and two ladies from Boston, are visiting at Mrs. Le Richmond's?" inquired Celia, as they entered the house together.

"No—who are they?"

"Mr. Clarence Le Richmond, her nephew, and a Mrs. Allison and her daughter."

"Have you seen them?" said Lucy.

"Yes—they walked out after tea, last evening, and I happened to meet them."

"And how did they look?" inquired Lucy.

"Look! Why they looked like other folks, I suppose," said aunt Jerusia, looking sharply up from a blue and white coverlet, fresh from the loom, on which she was sewing a netting fringe.

"Yes, as your aunt says," replied Celia, "they looked pretty much like other folks, only a little more stylish."

"None the better for that," said aunt Jerusia.—"Old as I am, I have spun and wove four kiver-lids this year, with my own hands—two bird's-eye fashion, and two in the rose of Sharon. Now what kind of a figure would this city Miss you tell of, make in the loom, think ye?"

"I have heard," said Celia, "that Mrs. Le Richmond intends to have a soiree, before they return to Boston."

"And what new-fangled thing is that?" said aunt Jerusia.

"Celia means a party, I suppose," said Mrs. Fay.

"Well, it is amazing," said aunt Jerusia, "how genteel people do grow. In my young days, when the boys and girls met together, we called it having a frolic. After a while they began to tell of having a party—and now, in order to be at the top-notch of gentility, you must call it having a sworry."

"You mean a soiree, aunt," said Lucy.

"To be sure I do, and I said a sworry—what did you think I said, Miss Flippant?"

"Come, Lucy," said Celia, "I want you to walk part way home with me, if you are not particularly engaged."

Lucy looked inquiringly at her mother.

"Yes, go child," said she, and Lucy went, regardless of the speech which her aunt commenced about idleness.

"Has not your aunt Jerusia a gold necklace?" said Celia, as they walked down the green lane that led to the road.

"Yes, she has—why do you ask?"

"Have you never heard what a beautiful ornament gold beads make for the hair, woven with black bugles?"

"No, I never have."

"Hannah West, who has been living in New York, says the beads and bugles are woven into nets to contain the braided hair behind."

"I don't think that I should look so well with my hair braided as I do with it curled, as I generally wear it."

"Oh, yes you will; your hair is so bright and glossy, it will look beautifully braided."

"But how are the beads and bugles to be arranged?"

"O! Hannah knows how, and grandmother has promised to lend me her gold necklace, so I shall send and get some bugles in season for Mrs. Le Richmond's soiree."

"Have you received an invitation so soon as this?"

"No—but that makes no difference, for we shall both of us be invited of course, and as I am going to send to-morrow for some bugles, I thought you might like to send at the same time."

"I should," replied Lucy; "but I am afraid that aunt won't lend me her necklace."

"Why not? It will not injure it in the least."

"I know it—but I am so unfortunate, though I do my best to please her, to be no favorite of hers."

"It will be no harm to ask her," said Celia; "and as the person I shall send by, is going in the morning, it will be necessary for you to ascertain to-night."

"I am almost certain," said Lucy, "that she will not lend it to me. I will let you know, however, early in the morning."

When Lucy returned home, she took the first opportunity to consult with her mother relative to the necklace.

"I think your hair will look better as you always wear it," said her mother, "but since you seem so very earnest to have it, you can ask your aunt for it, though I think it will be of no use."

"I should think she might lend it to me," said Lucy, "as she never wears it herself."

"I know she never does, but she designs it for your cousin Jerusia, and on that account, is very careful of it."

"Do say a word in favor of her letting me have it, will you, mother?" said Lucy, who returned to the room where her aunt was still busily engaged sewing the fringe to the edge of the coverlet.

Assuming all the courage possible, she said to her aunt—

"I am going to ask a favor of you."

"That is nothing strange—what do you want now?"

"I want to borrow your gold necklace to wear one evening, and no more."

"Borrow my gold necklace?" said her aunt, dropping her work into her lap, and looking up with an air of utter astonishment.

"Yes, aunt, just for one evening, as I said before."

"And pray what do you want it for?"

"To wear to Mrs. Le Richmond's."

"I thought as much. No—I don't like the proud widow well enough to let my gold necklace go into her house. Besides, I am going to give it to your cousin Jerusia, who was named for me, and I never intended that any body should wear it again, till it goes round her neck the day she is eighteen, which will be the fourteenth day of next month, just two weeks and two days from to-day."

"I must say, sister," said Mrs. Fay, "that I am sorry that you feel so determined not to lend Lucy your necklace, for you and I both know that it is natural for young girls of her age to like to look as well as they can."

"She wants to look well in the eyes of that city spark, I suppose. Jedediah Green would make twice as good a husband. Birds that fligh high, are apt to light low."

Finding her to be inexorable, neither Mrs. Fay nor Lucy said anything more upon the subject. They had all been silent for five minutes or more, when aunt Jerusia said—

"Lucy, I have a mind to make a bargain with you."

"Well, aunt," said she, "what is it?"

"If you will engage to make me fringe enough for the red and white kiverlid I am weaving, I will lend you the necklace for one evening."

To this, Lucy readily assented, for the reluctance with which her aunt had acceded to her request, had made the ornament described by Celia Carter, appear doubly desirable.

The bugles were sent for, and arrived in due season, and it is doubtful, whether the pleasure enjoyed by Lucy and Celia in weaving them with the gold beads, under the direction of Hannah West, was not superior to that of wearing them. The next point to be settled was relative to their dresses, and after some hesitation on the part of Celia, whose inclination leaned towards a changeable silk, made out of an old one her grandmother gave her, but which, having been turned, looked as good as new, they concluded to dress in white. All this was settled before they had received the anticipated invitations. They came at last, however, and aunt Jerusia being included in that sent to Mrs. Fay and Lucy, she was so far mollified as to say, she believed after all that Mrs. Le Richmond was a real lady.

"Do you mean to go, aunt?" said Lucy.

"No, child," she replied; "but may be, I shall conclude to go and take a social cup of tea with her in the course of the winter."

To Lucy, time crept with a snail's pace, till the desired evening arrived, and although the mantua-maker, who undertook to remodel her white dress according to the newest fashion, was not deeply skilled in the mysteries of her art, as she remained to assist in putting it on, she succeeded by a process known only to the "craft," to make it set, as she said, exactly like the dress Miss Allison wore on Sunday.

The Parsonage was the most handsomely furnished house of any that Lucy had ever seen, the parlor being adorned with a sofa, covered with highly glossed copperplate of gorgeous colors, and the door with a carpet ornamented with red and yellow stripes, which the good dames of the neighborhood had spun and wove, and presented to the minister's wife on New Year's Day; she was, therefore, dazzled and almost bewildered by the flood of splendor which broke upon her when she was ushered into Mrs. Le Richmond's drawing-room, the walls of which were nearly covered by pictures in massy gilt frames, and the windows concealed by curtains of the costliest fabric. She had too much tact, however, to suffer her astonishment to be perceived. The extreme beauty of her countenance, and the sweetness of its expression, almost immediately attracted the attention of Miss Allison, who requested to be introduced to her. Mr. Le Richmond, too, the "city spark," as aunt Jerusia called him, did not fail to perceive that she was by far the loveliest girl present, and sought an early introduction. Much to her own surprise, she soon felt as free from embarrassment in their company, as when she was with her most intimate associates; for she had not yet learnt that it is the secret of true politeness to make every person feel at ease within the sphere of its influence. She never spent an evening so pleasantly before, and when she returned home, as her aunt Jerusia had gone to spend a week with her brother and his family, she, without any fear of being checked, commenced conversing with her mother, relative to what the had seen and heard.

All at once, her mother exclaimed—

"Why, Lucy, what has become of your head-dress?"

Lucy started, and put her hand to her head.

"I have lost it," said she, "but how, I cannot tell. What shall I do? Aunt Jerusia will never forgive me if her necklace is gone."

As it was a bright, moonlight evening, they thought if she dropped it while returning home, they might possibly find it; they, therefore, went quite to Mrs. Le Richmond's door, lookir carefully at every step. Their search was unsuccessful, and they thought it possible that she might have dropped it before she left the house; but they could not think of seeking admittance, as they found by the lights that gleamed from the different chamber windows, that the inmates had already retired to their sleeping apartments. Lucy returned home with a heavy heart, and her mother was far from feeling happy, for she knew that offering to replace the lost necklace by a new one, would be of no avail, as it would not be the necklace. Lucy slept little that night, and if for a few minutes she lost herself, black bugles and gold beads were ever before her eyes. Her only comfort was, that her aunt Jerusia was absent. It was like a reprive to a criminal, and she indulged a faint hope that she might find the necklace before her return. In the morning, she rose before the sun, and recommenced her search. She had gone up and down the road several times before there were any indications of the family being astir at the great white house. At length she beheld a thin wreath of blue smoke borne upwards on the morning air, and assuming as much courage as possible, she approached the door and rang the bell. The door was opened by a girl, who informed her that Mrs. Le Richmond had not yet risen, and would not like to be disturbed so early, but that she was certain that she would be perfectly willing for her to look for the necklace, in any apartment which had been open to the company the preceding evening, and that she would assist her in the search. It was not to be found, however, and Lucy was again compelled to go home, more despondent than ever. Directly after breakfast, she informed Celia Carter of her loss, who joined with her in making every effort to discover the lost treasure. The idea of encountering her aunt's anger so preyed upon Lucy's spirits, that she could neither eat nor sleep, and her merry song, and her still merrier laugh, were hushed. Time passed on till it wanted only three days of her cousin Jerusia's birth-day, previous to which she knew that her aunt would be at home. The next morning she dreaded to look out of the window, lest she should see her coming.—About an hour after dinner, the chaise of her uncle Hopkins, which had been the family chaise of his father before him, its square top lined with spotted calico, and edged in front with a white linen fringe, came nodding up the lane. Lucy's face became suddenly flushed, and then she turned quite pale.

"Mother," said she, "do you tell aunt about the necklace, for I cannot."

Mr. Hopkins assisted his sister to alight, but said he was in too much of a hurry to come in. Aunt Jerusia, whose spirits were uncommonly good, said she had a nice visit, and that her niece Jerusia would make them a visit the next day.

"You know," said she, "that to-morrow is her birth-day, and I intend to tie my gold necklace round her neck with my own hands. I suppose, Lucy, you have strung it, as I told you, on the yellow silk string. I have bought a nice piece of purple lustring ribbon to tie it with."

Lucy burst into tears, while Mrs. Fay undertook to inform her sister that the necklace was lost.—"But," added she, as she saw the storm of anger gathering on her brow, "I have money enough to purchase another, which you are welcome to."

"And what good will another do?" said aunt Jerusia. "I valued it for the sake of its antiquity. It has been in the Hopkins' family almost a hundred years, and had it not been for that vain, idle girl of yours, it might have remained in it a hundred years longer. For my part, I think I am pretty well paid for indulging her in her foolish vanity."

Lucy endeavored to express her deep regret, in the hope that it would soothe her, but it only exasperated her the more, and she had wrought herself in a state of mind bordering on frenzy, when some one rapped at the outer door. Lucy opened it, and Mrs. Le Richmond, Miss Allison, and Clarence Le Richmond entered. Lucy hastily attempted to obliterate the traces of tears, and Mrs. Fay whispered to her sister, and begged her not to pursue the subject of the necklace in the presence of their visitors; but aunt Jerusia had not the least idea of practising such forbearance, the less so, from her natural self-consequence being much increased by her having on her red and green striped Italian silk, her best sheer muslin cap, and her high-heeled lasting shoes; a costume which, in her opinion, put her on a level with Mrs. Le Richmond as far as personal appearances was concerned, while, in most other respects, she considered herself her superior. She accordingly took the first opportunity to inform Mrs Le Richmond that she had been reprimanding her niece for her carelessness. Mrs. Le Richmond not knowing what answer to make to such a piece of family information, contented herself by a slight inclination of her head.

"The truth is," resumed aunt Jerusia, "when you had company a few days ago, Lucy, thinking, I suppose, that some city spark might be present, (as she spoke, she cast a sidelong glance at young Le Richmond,) wanted to look mighty fine; so nothing would do, but she must borrow my beads. Well, she warnt content to wear them round her neck, but she must go string them crinkle crankle-wise, with a parcel of black bugles, with which she made a thing shaped a good deal like the net we boil greens in, to wear on the back part of her head. Well, she put it on, and wore it to your house, and that was the last I shall ever see of my beads, I suppose."

"She was so unfortunate as to lose them," said Mrs. Le Richmond.

"Unfortunate! For my part, I call it downright carelessness. You cannot think how idle and careless she is, and, in my opinion, she would be the ruin of the richest man in the world, who should be so unfortunate as to marry her. She is not much like her cousin, Jerusia, I guess; my brother's oldest daughter."

"I would willingly replace the necklace by a new one," said Mrs. Fay, "but the one lost had been in the family about a century, I believe, and it is more on that account, than its intrinsic value, that my sister so highly prizes it. The loss of it has made both Lucy and myself very unhappy."

Lucy, on whose cheeks the blush of shame and vexation had, during her aunt's speech, been growing deeper and deeper, had, with the utmost difficulty, suppressed her tears. The last words of her mother, spoken in a tone of sympathy, at once caused them to flow afresh, and she was obliged to leave the room. Clarence Le Richmond, who had often thought of her since the evening he met her at his aunt's, felt highly indignant towards aunt Jerusia, whose remarks, by no means, lessened her in his estimation. Lucy bathed her eyes and face in cold water, hoping to be able to return, but on consulting her glass, she found the vestiges of recent weeping too apparent, which obliged her to content herself with looking from the window, to witness the departure of the visitors.

"What an opinion Mr. Le Richmond must have formed of me," she half murmured to herself, "from what aunt Jerusia said of me." She then thought of certain flattering attentions he paid her on the evening of the party. "But if he should ever think of me now," she thought, "it will be only as a vain, idle girl, beneath his notice. How foolish I was for borrowing the necklace, for after all, my hair would have looked better as I usually wear it."

It did not occur to her, amidst her regret at what had happened, that she might not be considered a suitable match for a rich and fashionable gentleman like Clarence Le Richmond, as she was entirely ignorant of the distinctions of society, as they exist in large and populous cities. Before leaving her room, she determined within herself to make one more thorough search for the necklace. She, therefore, directly after tea, put on her shawl and her cottage bonnet, and, arranging her curls as becomingly as she could, as she would be obliged to go close to Mrs. Le Richmond's, she told her mother that she should be back before dark; and set out upon what she considered her almost hopeless excursion. She pursued her way slowly, stopping almost every minute to turn over the dry leaves, which the autumn wind had drifted under the fences. She had arrived at the foot of the eminence on which Mrs. Le Richmond's house was situated, and was looking among the leaves beneath a large maple, when she heard some one pronounce her name. She looked up and beheld Clarence Le Richmond. Her face was instantly suffused with blushes, for the scene in the afternoon flashed upon her mind.

"You are looking for a certain net, composed of bugles and gold beads, I presume," said he, "What will you give me if I find it?"

"Oh, anything I have in the world," she replied.

"The price may be greater than you imagine," said he, smiling at her earnestness. He then drew a small package from his pocket, which partly opening, so as to disclose its contents, he presented to her, saying, "This, according to your aunt's description, must be the lost treasure."

With a face covered with smiles, it was her first impulse to press her lips to the hand that restored it, but reflection came in season to check the action, and she attempted, in set phrase, to speak her thanks. The feelings of her heart, however, could not find vent in such a formal way, and finally, though smiles still wreathed her lips, tears gushed from her eyes. Le Richmond drew her arm within his, slightly pressing her hand as he did so, and they proceeded slowly towards the homestead. It is probable that Lucy had never been so happy in her life. The weight which, from the loss of the necklace, had so long heavily pressed upon her spirits, was removed, and it was evident, from Le Richmond's appearance, that he was far from regarding her in the light in which her aunt Jerusia had represented her. In his heart, too, there were many delightful emotions, which reflection, as yet, came not to crush. There was, to him, something perfectly unique in the simplicity and confiding manner of Lucy, which, joined with her beauty, was weaving around him a stronger spell than he imagined.

"It is so lovely an evening, will you not prolong your walk?" said he, when they arrived opposite the green lane that led to her home.

She declined, saying that she told her mother that she would be at home before dark.

"How strange," said she, looking up to him and laughing, when they had nearly reached the door, "that I never thought, till this minute, to ask you where you found the necklace."

"If you will permit me to go in," he replied, "I will inform you and your mother and aunt Jerusia, all at the same time."

Aunt Jerusia gave him a sharp look over her spectacles, as he entered, as much as to say, "What brings you here so soon again," and Mrs. Fay handed him a chair. Lucy, in the mean time, removed the bugle and gold bead net from its envelope, and handed it to aunt Jerusia.

"Where on earth did you find it?" said she.

"Mr. Le Richmond found it," Lucy replied.

"I want to know if he did. How lucky. Did you find it in the road, Mr. Le Richmond?" she inquired, turning towards him a countenance which had undergone a perceptible mollification.

"No, madam, I found it in the shrubbery, suspended on a rose-bush."

"I remember now," said Lucy—"and it is strange I did not think of it before—that as the evening was very mild and beautiful, Celia Carter and I, and several others, went to walk in the garden without our bonnets."

"Well, I am sure I am glad that it is found," said Mrs. Fay, "and shall always feel truly grateful to the finder."

"So shall I," said aunt Jerusia, "and if you will come to-morrow afternoon, and take a dish of tea with us, you shall have the pleasure of seeing the gold beads around my niece Jerusia's neck. She is a nice girl, Mr. Le Richmond, and will make a capital wife. Within a year past, besides doing a great deal about the house, she has spun and wove a hundred yards of tow and linen cloth, and whitened it all herself, so that it looks more like a snow-drift than anything else. I can tell you that she is the master smart girl you ever saw in your life, and hasn't a drop of lazy blood in her veins. You won't catch her out in the woods after flowers, nor singing songs and such kind of trash; but on Sunday she can sing a psalm tune equal to any of them. Now, Mr. Le Richmond, it is none of my business, but I should like to ask you a question or two."

"Certainly, as many as you please."

"Well, people do say, that you are rich enough to buy a dozen such farms as we have in our town;—now I want to know if it is really so or not."

His color heightened a little as he replied—

"That must depend on what they are valued at."

"I see you don't care to deny it," said she, "and my advice is, that you marry some real smart girl for a wife, and settle down among us. Now my niece, Jerusia, will have a fifty acre lot for her portion, which will make a pretty snug little farm, I tell her. Don't you think so, Mr. Le Richmond?"

"I should think it would," he replied.

"Well, you must come to-morrow afternoon, as I said before, and take a dish of tea with us, and you will have a chance to see her. She isn't a girl to take the eye at first, but she will do twice the work that Lucy will, and not spend one half so much on finery."

Mrs. Fay now joined her own cordial invitation with aunt Jerusia's, and he promised to take tea with them the ensuing afternoon.

The next day, directly after dinner, the old chaise was again seen nodding up the lane. It a few minutes, it stopped opposite the house, and Miss Jerusia alighted.

"Now, Sam," said she, addressing her brother, a boy of a dozen years old, who came with her, "go right back as fast as you can, for father wants the horse for the cider-mill, this afternoon."

Aunt Jerusia went to the door to welcome her niece, followed by Lucy.

"I began to feel afraid that you wouldn't come," said her aunt. "I expected you before dinner."

"Well, I did calculate to," she replied, "but I was busy stringing apples, and I ought to have staid at home this afternoon, and kept on stringing, it is such complete weather to dry them."

"But you must consider, child, that your eighteenth birth-day don't come only once in your lifetime, and we expect the city spark will be here to tea."

"Do tell me—well, I am glad I wore my white gown. I thought, at first, of wearing my new calico, but finally I thought I would dress in white, considering it was my birth-day."

"Well, I am glad you did wear it, for upon the whole, I think Mr. Le Richmond quite a nice young man. I took care to give him a hint about your spinning, and weaving, and the fifty acre lot."

"La—did you, aunt? Now I am sure I shall not know which way to look, when I come to see him."

Miss Jerusia had, during the foregoing colloquy, entered the house, and divested herself of her bonnet and shawl. In almost every respect, she formed a striking contrast to Lucy. Her size, for a person of her sex and years, was of surprising amplitude, and exposure to the sun and wind, while whitening her hundred yards of cloth, for she was generally in too much of a hurry to put on her cape-bonnet, had so embrowned her skin, that it was nearly the color of her hair, which was somewhat between a brown and a flaxen. She still adhered to the obsolete fashion of wearing a large comb, with a top four or five inches high, the gloss of which, she occasionally restored by the white of an egg. She had made an attempt to curl her hair, by putting it in papers the night preceding, but, being all unused to the curling mood, it already dangled from her forehead and temples, in a kind of stringy style, which made her look as meek as her own barn door fowls, when their plumes were drooping from exposure to a sudden shower.

"If Mr. Le Richmond is coming, I suppose I had better keep my gloves on," said she producing a pair of coarse white thread gloves, which she said she had knit between sunset and dark, when she could see to do nothing else.

"La, no, I wouldn't," said her aunt, approaching her with a smiling countenance, with the necklace suspended from between her thumb and finger, which she gently vibrated in the sun, which shone in at the window, in order to make it glisten, and look as tempting in the eyes of her niece as possible.—"There," said she, "don't you think you will look handsome with this round your neck?"

"La, aunt," she replied, simpering, "you don't expect me to praise myself, do you? But I will say this, I always thought a gold necklace set off a girl more than anything."

"Well, you know that I always told you that I should make you some kind of a present the day you were eighteen, and this is what I meant to give you—so sit down in this chair, and let me tie it round your neck."

She obeyed, and the necklace was tied with the purple ribbon, in a manner quite satisfactory to aunt Jerusia.

"There," said she, "now go and look in the glass, and see if it don't look handsome."

Miss Jerusia viewed herself for some time, with an air of great complacency, when, happening to glance her eyes out at the window, she saw Clarence Le Richmond coming up the lane.

"Dear me," said she, hastening to a chair, and taking her knitting-work, which she said was a pair of meetin' gloves for Sam, "he won't think me so industrious as you told him, aunt, if he catches me without any work in my hands."

She had only time to get fairly engaged, before Le Richmond entered.

"This 'ere girl," said Aunt Jerusia, "is my niece, that was named for me, that I told you about," and he very gravely made a bow, and Miss Jerusia rose and made a courtesy.

The combined advantages of being dressed in white, and having her neck adorned with a gold necklace, much to aunt Jerusia's surprise, did not wholly attract his attention from Lucy, although her dress was nothing better than a pink and white gingham, and her neck was without ornament, except the brown, glossy curls, by which it was shaded.

"What o'clock is it?" said aunt Jerusia, desirous to see whether his watch was gold or silver.

"Half past four," he replied.

"If I may be so bold," said she, "I should like to just look at your watch."

"With the greatest pleasure," said he, handing it to her.

"Now do you suppose this is real gold?" said she.

"So the watchmaker told me," he replied.

"Likely as not, it cost you the matter of fifty dollars."

"Yes, madam, more than twice that sum."

"Do tell me if it did! Here, Jerusia, take it and look at it, so that you can have it to say you have had a hundred dollar watch in your hand."

"Well, it is handsome—that is certain," said Jerusia. "Our schoolmaster's is just nothing at all to it. Here, Lucy, I suppose you want to look at it, don't you?"

Lucy blushed, as with an air of embarrassment, she received it from Jerusia's hand, and was about to rise and return it to Le Richmond, who prevented her by rising himself, and taking it. The half hour before tea was spent in a manner peculiarly edifying to aunt Jerusia, who descanted on the virtues of the "fifty acre lot" with great volubility. She, moreover, informed him, that two large chests, which sat in a certain back chamber, and which contained household linen enough to last twenty years, would certainly fall to the share of her niece. In the meantime, the younger Jerusia, plied her knitting-needles most indefatigably, throwing into her countenance a look of great demureness, highly proper and becoming for the occasion, and never, but once, opening her lips, when she remarked, if she didn't mind and get Sam's gloves done for him to wear to meetin' the next Sunday, he would be awful put out with her. Though Le Richmond, as in politeness bound, lent an attentive ear to aunt Jerusia, his eyes frequently wandered to Lucy, who, with cheeks glowing from a consciousness that he was regarding her, looked lovelier than he had ever seen her before. As soon as the sun had fairly sunk below the horizon, Miss Jerusia rolled up her knitting-work, and said she must go, for Sam said, if he came for her at all, it would be before sunset. As she was putting on her shawl and bonnet, in an adjoining apartment, she whispered to her aunt to know if she thought Mr. Le Richmond minded her gold necklace.

"Mind it!" said her aunt. "Yes, indeed, I guess he did. I saw him look at it over and over again, and once, he kind of smiled like, as much as to say he thought it looked handsome."

"Did he, though?" said Miss Jerusia, looking very much pleased.

"I am certain he did," replied her aunt, and I should think nothing strange, if he should offer to go home with you."

"Shouldn't you? Well, I shall be so frightened.—If he offers me his arm, had I best take it or not?"

"No, indeed. According to my idea of things, it would be amazing bold on so short acquaintance, and I should advise you not to walk too near him, but now and then edge away towards the other side of the road."

Le Richmond, as aunt Jerusia had conjectured, offered to accompany her home, though it must be confessed, that the look he cast back on Lucy, showed that it was an act of politeness, which he would have willingly dispensed with. Aunt Jerusia stood at the window observing them, as long as they remained in sight, and was greatly satisfied to find that her niece obeyed her parting advice to the letter.

Clarence Le Richmond found autumn so very attractive in the country—so he told Mrs. Le Richmond—that he came to the conclusion not to return to the city, so soon by several weeks as he had first intended. He often, by the merest accident, met Lucy during her customary rambles. It was the last of November, and so warm and bland, that it seemed as if summer had returned to shed one more sunny smile on the scenes where she had lately reigned, that one of those accidental meetings took place between them.

The clear air had renovated her bloom, and as she stooped to gather the brown nuts, thickly strewn beneath the trees, she looked beautiful as a young wood-nymph. It so happened, for he certainly had premeditated no such thing, that he addressed to her certain words, such as are found only in a lover's vocabulary. And can it be doubted, that these words were to Lucy's ear even more musical than the wood-bird's song, which she had ever loved so much? Reflection came, in a calmer moment, to Le Richmond, yet he did not repent. Why should he? He was in possession of a large fortune: he was subject to no person's control, and Lucy was beautiful, sweet-tempered, and so young, that there was ample time for her to learn every thing necessary, in which she was deficient, while her mind was still pliant.—Lucy's mother was consulted, and Mrs. Le Richmond was, likewise, admitted to their councils, the result of which was, that Clarence and Lucy were to be married at the expiration of one year. Although Aunt Jerusia greatly wondered at Le Richmond's folly in choosing Lucy, when her niece Jerusia, with her "fifty acre lot," and her store of household linen, was ready to accept him, she was put into good humor by an elegant silk dress, presented to her by Le Richmond. A still sunnier gleam shone in upon her temper, when, just as she was trying to decide in what fashion to have her dress made, she was informed that Squire Hichens, a widower of forty-five, and the richest farmer in town, had offered himself to her niece Jerusia, and was accepted.

Bright Hopes.

BY S. D. ANDERSON.

Amid our dullest, darkest hours, bright hopes will often rise,
As Summer clouds that flit athwart the azure of the skies,
Gilding with magic brilliancy the impress of our dreams,
With all the vivid gorgeousness of sunshine on the streams.

And often on our path will come the rainbow gleams of joy,
Such as the worldings rudest touch can never all destroy.
Some kindly word, some fairy smile, will often thrill the soul,
More wildly than the deepest draught of pleasures mad'ning bowl.

And there are times in memory's store more treasured than the rest,
Some moments that are peopled with the memories of the blest,
Some hoarded bliss that comes to us, pure as an Angel's wing,
Or young love's sweetest promises to which our wishes cling.

And long gone years are given back with all there glad'ning powrs;
And manhood lives in fancy o'er the joys of childhood's hour,
Before the chilling hand of Time fell on each scene of bliss—
And earth seemed free as once it was beneath its maker's kiss.

And there are thoughts that often come as offerings to the shrine,
Bright aspirations from that fount whose every gush is thine,
Blent with the dreamy track of fame along the coming years,
And mingled in the prophet pile that busy fancy rears.

Bright hopes that paint the soaring mind to richer gifts in store:
A fairy palace built from it on that dim fortunes shore,
Some far-off isle where Summer reigns eternal in its bloom,
And hopes that spring in gladness there ne'er find an early tomb.

Ballad.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

The ring is on my hand,
And the wreath is on my brow;
Satins and jewels grand
Are all at my command,
And I am happy now.

He has loved me long and well,
But, when he breathed his vow,
I felt my bosom swell,
For the words rang like a knell,
And the voice seemed his who fell
In the battle down the dell,
And who is happy now.

But he spoke to re-assure me,
And he kissed my pallid brow,
While a reverie came o'er me,
And to the church-yard bore me,
And I sighed to him before me,
Thinking him dead D'Elormie,
"Oh, I am happy now!"

It was spoken—it was spoken—
Quick they registered the vow;
And though my faith be broken,
And though my heart be broken
Behold the golden token
That proves me happy now.

Would God I could awaken!
For I dream, I know not how,
And my soul is sorely shaken
Lest an evil step be taken,
And the dead who is forsaken
May not be happy now.

MARY DELAVAN.

BY J. AUSTIN SPERRY.

A gloomy, dilapidated, time-blackened structure, yclept Sternwood Hall, (from a family of that name, who were its original proprietors,) in one of the loneliest and least inviting spots in the State of Maryland, is the opening scene of the present narrative.—The building was of stone, with an awkward chimney run up on the outside of either gable, and great openings in its wall, gave ingress to the rude wind of winter. It was situated in the midst of a sterile looking plain—we might call it a common, for no sign of cultivation is presented—with not a vine clambering over the roof, or a lonely tree near it, to relieve the monotony of its appearance, or give to its antiquity even melancholy grandeur. The interior of the mansion was quite in keeping with its exterior, and its apartments were gloomy and uncomfortable enough. In one of them, upon a snowy day in January, there sat by the fire, in a dingy arm chair, an invalid old man. His face was much marked and furrowed—partly by age, but more by disease and long continued mental agony. A young female, with a pale, sad, yet beautiful face, sat upon a stool at his side, holding one of his withered hands in hers, and looking up tenderly and anxiously at his emaciated features. She was his daughter, and the only friend whom the reverses of fortune had left him—save a few negro domestics—the only being whose face ever greeted his solitary abode. And she—oh, with what sweet devotedness did she cling to that dying parent! smoothing with filial love and angel gentleness, his thorny path to a lowly grave! It was a spectacle to which the sternest nature could scarce have denied the tribute of a tear—to look upon that slight girl, unwearying in her holy duty, ministering to the last wants of that infirm sire—springing with the alacrity of sleepless affection to meet his every wish—suppressing the sigh that struggled in her own breast, and concealing the canker that was preying upon her own life, that her faint smile might dispel the gloom that was gathering around him.—That daughter's sweet love was the lone star that rose upon the evening of the old man's life, and it brightened the more as the night of the grave approached him.

Roderick Delavan had been a man of wealth and influence in the Southern States. He had been drawn into the whirlpool of political life, and had been ruined. Domestic griefs crowding upon public cares, completely paralyzed his energies, and he fell from the pinnacle to which his ambition had borne him. He was a proud man, and could not brook either the scorn or pity of those who beheld his fall. So he fled from the theatre of his more prosperous career, and came, with the only child the grave had spared him, to end his days—he little thought how soon—in the solitude of Sternwood place. More of his history than this it is not necessary, for the purposes of our story, to reveal.

The old man was gazing vacantly through the window at the falling snow. He started, and as if unconscious of his daughter's presence, called aloud upon her name.

"I am here, father;" and she pressed his thin hand more tightly within her own. He looked down into her face with the enquiring gaze of one who was trying to recall once familiar but forgotten features. By degrees, the light seemed to break in upon the darkness which clouded his memory, and bending his trembling head, he pressed his lips to her pale brow.

"Go, child," said he, "call hither your brother."

"Father!" she exclaimed, and raised her mild eye to his, while a tear that stole quietly down her cheek, betrayed that something in his tone and manner had awakened in her breast an emotion of pain.

"Why do you hesitate, child? Go call me my boy."

The girl burst into tears, and the old man, after regarding her for a moment in surprise, said, as if speaking to himself, in a suppressed tone—

"Mary is weeping—what can trouble the child?—She will not call me my boy. My boy!—why, what am I saying—he perished at sea, long ago. And yet I saw him through that window, distinctly. His face was turned upward, with its familiar smile, and the snow-flakes fell and melted upon his forehead. Was it not strange, dear, that his features should be so fresh in my mind, when the next moment, I scarce knew yours? But, I am failing fast—my course is almost run."

"O! do not, do not talk so!" said she, looking up imploringly through her tears. "There are many days for you yet, father, and I cannot bear to think that we will be separated."

"And that grieves me too, child. To think of your being left without a home—without a friend. Curses upon them that have brought me to this! My poor Mary! But there is a Power will guard you, and—and—I stand here, gentlemen, to vindicate that measure—I am not daunted by the opposition it has met with—I am aware"——

He paused, and his eye, which had brightened with the last flighty words, again grew lustreless and vacant, and his head sank back upon the chair-top. The daughter softly quitted her seat, and bringing from the mantel-shelf a glass which contained a composing draught, placed it to his lips. He turned away his head languidly, and said—

"Not now, Mary. I feel calmer, easier, indeed, than I have felt for some time. Be seated again—there! Look at the falling snow."

He raised his hand with a steadiness he had not been capable of for weeks before, and pointed to the window. The girl's countenance exhibited an expression of distress at his incoherent language and manner. She raised the glass once more, and proffered him the soothing mixture.

"Drink it, father; you are feverish and agitated, and you need rest."

"Child, I tell you, no! I do not need it. My mind is not wandering now—the film has passed from before it. I feel as if my torpid soul were awakening into a new existence—as if the strength of youth had returned to bear me back from the very threshold of the grave."

"O, joy! joy!" cried the girl, springing up, and in the sudden elation which his words occasioned, throwing her arms about his neck. "It is returning health! I knew you would recover, and your Mary will not be left alone. We will live pleasantly here in the old Hall, and when Spring comes"——

"Do not indulge such idle hopes, my daughter," said the old man, and he shook his head sadly as he continued. "It is not returning health—it is only the brightening up of an expiring torch, or the last gleam of a setting sun. But do you mark the snow?"

"I see," she replied; "how fast it is coming down!"

"Yes, and thick and chilly as those flakes, misfortunes are now crowding upon your young heart.—But it may be well. That drear, icy garb gathering upon the earth, will cherish germs beneath it which will put forth in beauty in the spring. Mary, when I am gone—"

"No, no, no, father! do not talk of when you are gone. I know you are recovering, and will be quite well soon. Spring will come, with its warm sun, and we will walk forth and look upon every thing in nature that is bright and beautiful. We will be happy—oh yes! happier in this humble, quiet place, than when fortune smiled more brightly upon us;—and you shall be as proud of your Mary in our secluded home, as when she was the admiration of a false-hearted crowd."

* * * * *

And spring did come, but the old man walked forth no more. The sun of the first morning of flowery May rose in cloudless splendor, and its ruddy beams fell like mockery upon the sorrowing form of Mary Delavan. She was kneeling by the last resting-place of her heart-broken sire. Poor, sorrow-stricken orphan! her tears fell fast upon that fresh mound. She was alone now. In the whole earth, there was not one heart to share her grief—not one shelter she could claim by any tie—not one friend to dissipate the loneliness of her young spirit—no asylum even, to which she could fly from want—despair! A melancholy prospect this for one so gentle and so young! Sad change from the luxury and splendor in which, but a few short years before, she had moved! Sad enough!

Well, the sun rose upon Mary at her father's grave; ere it set, Sternwood Hall and its appurtenances were sold beneath the sheriff's hammer, to liquidate a portion of her father's debts, and she was a dependant upon the purchaser's charity—charity (if it may be called such) which sprung, not from any sympathy for her misfortunes, but from that condition of society which imposes upon a man, for his character's sake, the task of appearing not inhuman. She easily apprehended the feeling which prompted the meagre kindness extended to her, and her father's proud spirit burning in her breast, woman's as it was, scorned to be dependant upon such reluctant hospitality. She conceived a plan of maintaining herself by means of those little domestic accomplishments which, under other circumstances, she had acquired merely as a source of relief from the tedium of a lonely hour. Knowing little of the world, save that bright side she had seen when, in other years and other lands, she had mingled in the gay walks of fashionable life, she imagined that in the busy thoroughfares of a city she could easily obtain employment, either at needle-work, or as instructress in some seminary or private family, for which latter, by education, if not by experience, she was well qualified. Baltimore, being the nearest city, was the place to which her eyes turned as the scene of her future struggle for her daily bread. The idea once formed, with the strength of resolution so characteristic of woman in the hour of adversity, she did not delay to carry it into execution. The new owner of Sternwood Hall, content to be rid of so unprofitable a burden, did not oppose the step; but, with an amiable boast of his own benevolence in extending to her, thus far, the shelter of his roof, laid her under still further obligations by a letter of introduction to an influential friend in the city. She had a very little stock of money, enough, perhaps, if used with economy, to maintain her for several weeks. Thus provided, she bade adieu to the endeared spot which held her father's remains.

The day upon which her journey was undertaken, was dull and cloudy, and the country along the route was by no means picturesque. There were but few romantic views or striking objects to engage attention; nothing to draw the mind from itself, or cheat the heart of the grief which pressed heavily upon it; and as the stage-coach, of which she was the only passenger, rolled along the solitary road, her thoughts turned inward, and reverted to the past. And oh, it was a melancholy train of memories which then crowded upon her mind. The joyous visions of a few years agone, where were they?—the warm-hearted friends, the smiling companions, the fond parents, the cheerful home? Passed away, like sunlight before a storm, or the verdure of summer before the blight of an early autumn. So sudden! It seemed but yesterday she had felt a mother's soft embrace—but yesterday that her heart grew warm beneath her father's approving smile. The tones of a brother's voice, too, were lingering within her breast, and his words of affection, every deep accent, came back mellowed from the past, like the soft return of echo from the distant hills. Nor had her breast been a stranger to deeper and more thrilling emotions. She had known the wild spell of that love which transcends the mere ties of blood. She had hung upon the words of one who became to her heart more than self—tones which, to her, were eloquent of all that is noble, and generous, and good. She had worshipped with all the energy of woman's nature; and he upon whom the rich treasures of her affections were bestowed, was not unworthy of the offering. Alas for her young hopes! A brother and a lover, it was said, shared the same ocean grave.

Words suffice not to depict the agony of those few hours of reflection. Every burning thought seared her brain as a brand of fire. Grief crowded upon grief, in gloomy retrospect, until the fountain of her tears gushed up and broke forth in a long and passionate flood. It is strange how an unrestrained flow of tears will assuage the keenest anguish. Mary wept, and grew calm. Her grief seemed to have expended itself by its own violence, and there was even pleasure in the tranquil feelings which succeeded.—Hope now sprung, Phœnix-like, from despair. She looked forward to her future destination, and laid out plans for her future actions. She would toil for money, not merely to meet her own wants, but that she might do good to others. She would seek the abodes of wretchedness and sorrow, and relieve the distresses which haunted them. Hers would be the task to comfort the afflicted, and to gladden the needy—and hers would be the sweet reward of prayers and blessings from grateful hearts. She would make herself loved among the children of want, and respected among the silliest.

While she indulged in these pleasant dreams of the future, night came on; but so wrapt was she in her thoughts, that she scarce noted the change from light to darkness. It was near ten o'clock, that her reverie was broken by the halting of the coach before an old and gloomy-looking inn, within the suburbs of Baltimore. It was now, as she alighted, that the imprudence of the step she had taken, for the first time flashed upon her mind. Here was she, alone, unknown, in the city. She had come under the protection of no one, and had no voucher for her character, other than her own word. Was it probable, under these circumstances, that she could obtain lodging at a public house of respectability? She was hesitating whether she should enter the inn, go at once to the landlord, and throwing herself upon his generosity, explain her whole situation, when a boisterous shout from within greeted her ears, followed by peals of Bacchanalian laughter, oaths and imprecations. She started back from the door, and stood for a moment shuddering at the thought of having so nearly ventured into a den of iniquity.—The idea of passing the night, in her unprotected condition, under the same roof with a gang of drunken revellers, was not to be entertained for a moment. The only alternative which presented itself, was to proceed at once to the house of the gentleman to whom her letter of introduction was addressed. She turned to the coachman, and requested him to drive her to No. — Sharp street. The fellow, who was not possessed of the most obliging disposition in the world, and seemed to be more than usually irritated by some unruliness on the part of his horses, refused, in a surly tone, to comply. A lad, who was lounging in front of the inn, at this moment stepped up, and offered his services for a trifle to conduct the lady, if she was disposed to walk, to the place designated. She gladly agreed, placed the consideration demanded in the boy's hand, and directed the surly coachman to stow away her baggage (no great task) at the inn, until called for.

Arrived at No. — Sharp street, the boy, considering his commission at an end, merely pointed to the door and precipitately retreated. She ascended the marble steps, and applied a faltering hand to the knocker, and then, with a palpitating heart, awaited the result—for to a proud mind, it is a task which requires no slight degree of courage, to face a stranger in a suppliant's attitude. But Mary, it seemed, was to be spared that humiliation. Five minutes passed and no answer came to her summons. She repeated it; and the loud raps reverberated within, and returned to her ear with a moan of startling emptiness, sounding "the knell of another hope." Again and again she repeated the knocks, until the conviction that the house was untenanted became almost certainty. The boy might, perhaps, have mistaken the number, she thought, but upon raising her eyes to the top-sill of the door, the feeble rays of a street lamp showed but too plainly that he had not erred.—While she was pondering upon the next course to pursue, she was startled by a strange din in a neighboring cross street. It came nearer and nearer, until at length the broad glare of torches burst upon her sight, and a company of riotous firemen, in blood-red coats and hats, shouting like fiends, and indeed their whole appearance corresponding with one's ideas of the inhabitants of Tophet, whirled past her, with their engine—the rattling of whose wheels, blending with yells and angry vociferations in strange confusion, echoed and re-echoed far and near through the deserted streets, breaking upon the midnight stillness like the tocsin of a savage war party. It was a scene at once disgusting, terrifying, and bewildering to the heart-sick adventurer, and she stood quaking with dread, for she knew not, if observed by these demon-looking ruffians, to what brutal violence she might be subjected. She felt relieved when the last dark and passion-marked face had gone by, and she was still unperceived. She was composing herself to apply once more to the knocker of the door—for she had still a lingering hope that there might be some one within, even if not of the family she was in search of, some one at least who would direct her where to find a secure asylum for the time—when the flashing of receding torches revealed to her gaze a tin label on one of the window-shutters containing the ominous words, "To Let." She descended the steps, sick with repeated disappointments, and was wandering, she knew not whither, but had gone only a few yards, when her strength began to fail her; a faintness crept over her limbs, and her brain grew dizzy. She tottered back to the steps of the house she had left, and leaned against the ballustrade for support. Death-like stillness now reigned in the street; not a sound indicated that human beings were near. Even the watchman seemed to have deserted his round, perhaps for a slumber in his box, or to render his devotion at the altar of the toddy-vender. How strange was the contrast between that moment and the five minutes previous, when the bright glare of torches flashed upon the night, and the rioters dashed in their mad career through the street, causing the still walls to ring with their wild clamor. Now all was quiet as if the sombre edifices were but the monuments of the dead, and the rays of the street lamp fell upon door and window, and its cold, pale gleam was reflected back from the dingy cornices, which looked as gloomily as if they were frowning upon the intrusion of the straggling rays. And as Mary stood and contemplated, her strength revived, and anxiously she listened for some human footstep, and strained her eyes through the darkness to catch a glimpse of some living form, to which she might speak and implore guidance or protection. At length she saw a dim object coming noiselessly and slowly, close within the shadow of the houses, towards her. It approached with stealthy step and exposed to her view a being who seemed to have escaped but newly from the pit of misery, or to have stolen itself from a charnel house. The rags that hung upon its limbs seemed ready to drop off with their own weight. There was no expression in its lank face, save a half-stupid kind of despair.—The sunken eyes looked cold and leaden from beneath the matted brow, and dark locks hung dishevelled by the wan and bloodless cheeks. In truth, it looked like a thing let loose for a little space from a grave of torments. As this figure glided by Mary, it turned its ghastly features towards her with a look that seemed to implore her pity. Her heart was moved by the wretched spectacle, and in the momentary excitement of her warm sympathies for the miserable being before her, she forgot her own sad and pitiable condition.

"Father of mercies!" said she, inwardly, "there is starvation and sorrow, and the agony of lingering death in that haggard face. Poor wretch! want and grief have gnawed its very heart strings, and it moves like something not entitled to the human shape. Can such things be, here in the midst of hundreds and thousands, who daily eat, drink, and make merry; the wasted crumbs from whose tables would, perhaps, make the heart of you emaciated creature leap wild with gladness and gratitude? Oh, I feel as if I could scourge such a world till it cried—cried for the mercy it knows not."

She felt an unaccountable desire to follow the steps of the distressed object that had just passed, to overtake it, and speak to it in words of kindness. But while she was debating with herself the propriety of such a step, the figure disappeared in the distance.—With the passing of the object that had thus excited and engaged her thoughts, they returned to her own perplexing dilemma. Where should she go? What should she do? She could do nothing but wander the streets until she met some one of whom she could implore counsel or assistance. To add to the distress of her situation, a slight rain commenced falling, with every prospect, from the thickness of the sky, of increasing to a storm. She had turned into Pratt street, and was hurrying along at a rapid pace, when she was encountered by the same wretched object which had passed her in Sharp street. He was issuing from a store, which he had doubtless broken into, with his arms loaded with boots and shoes. He no sooner beheld her than he started, and in the alarm of detected guilt, dropped the plunder at her feet. A watchman at the same moment rushed across from the opposite side of the way; the haggard burglar took to his heels and a chase ensued. Mary was bewildered by the scene and stood in mute surprise until she was aroused by the voice of the watchman who returned unsuccessful from the pursuit.

"What's the matter, girl?" said he, "what are you waiting for? Get along home, or I'll take you to the watch 'us."

"Alas! I have no home," said Mary. "I am a stranger here and know not where to go—for pity's sake, direct me to some respectable place, where I may obtain shelter for the night."

"Respectable!" ejaculated the watchman, as he gathered up the shoes which lay at her feet, and closed the door of the store, which the thief had, in his haste, left open. "Respectable houses don't take in females that walk about in the rain this time o' night, and women that pretend to be virtuous don't come to strange places by 'emselves. We'll toddle to the lock-up—that's the most respectable place you can get into to-night."

"Oh, gracious Heavens! no! no!" she exclaimed, seizing and clinging wildly to his arm. "Oh do not take me there—I have done no harm! I am an orphan, and have no friend to give me shelter or protection. Hear me, and when you know what brought me here, you will find me shelter."

From the vehement manner in which these words were uttered, the watchman was half inclined to believe her deranged. His heart, however, was not altogether devoid of the gentler feelings of humanity, and he lent an ear to the story of her trials. He was at first a little suspicious of her veracity, and even when she had concluded, he paused to consider whether the impulse that prompted him to aid her did not militate with his duty as an officer; but his kindly sympathies prevailed at length, and he conducted her a few squares to the house of a widow acquaintance, where, after some hesitancy on the part of the woman, and much argument and entreaty on his part, he finally procured her admittance for the night. He had his misgivings, notwithstanding, and before he departed he called the woman aside, and directed her not to suffer Mary to leave the house before he should see her again in the morning.

Mary retired to the humble bed that was provided for her, with a heart grateful that her miseries, for a few short hours, at least, were ended. But the agitation of her mind kept sleep from her wearied eyes until the first gleam of daylight; and then when it did come, it was more a stupor that followed mental and physical exhaustion, than the refreshing repose of slumber.

* * * * *

The forenoon was pretty well advanced, when a scene transpired in a police office, in a narrow street of the city of monuments, to which we must invite the reader's attention. A worthy Justice of the Peace was seated at his desk, wondering whether the world had suddenly grown very moral; for he had not heard a case since the forenoon of the day previous—when his office door was opened, and an officer made his appearance, with a ragged and half-starved looking culprit in charge.

"Ah!" exclaimed the magistrate, seizing his pen, and assuming a tone of official dignity and severity, "who is this individual?"

"Harris Bender," replied the policeman.

"Harris Bender, eh? Well, what is the charge against him?"

"Breaking into the shoe-store of Messrs. ———, at one o'clock this morning."

"And where is the evidence?"

"Coming," said the officer; and the words had scarce passed his lips, when the watchman, who has been already introduced to the reader, entered with Mary Delavan. Her face was very pale, and there was a wildness in her looks which was very different from the calm and sweet expression which had usually marked her features. Her eye was restless, and the despair of a goaded spirit shone in its quick glance. She had evidently, from the disarray of her habiliments, been hurried from her bed to the police office, without knowing upon what disagreeable errand she was bound.

At the same instant with the entrance of Mary, another police officer brought in a tall, well-dressed, and rather pretty woman; and these were followed by a few idlers, whom curiosity had attracted to the place. Among the latter, was a young man, in the plain, starched habits of a professor of religion. He had a fine, open countenance, and every feature glowed with that generous and affable expression which springs only from hearts in which the nobler feelings of man's nature have been cultivated.

The examination commenced. Mary was compelled to testify that she had seen the prisoner, (whom she had recognized at a glance) on the night previous, issuing from a store in the street where the watchman had found her, with a bundle of shoes in his arms, which, upon being alarmed by the approach of the watchman, he dropped at her feet, and made his escape. Her evidence was sufficiently conclusive to warrant the committal of the man for trial, and Mary was required to give security in the sum of five hundred dollars to appear against him. This decision of the magistrate she did not comprehend. When it was explained to her, she immediately stated that she had no such security to offer.

"I must commit you to prison, then," said the magistrate, bluntly.

Mary raised her eyes, and fixed them upon him in a glance of unutterable anguish; then, without uttering a syllable, closed them, and folded her hands upon her breast as if in inward prayer. There was something irresistibly touching in this little act, eloquent, as it was, of the deep misery of her lot, which appealed strongly to the sympathy of the young man in the religious garb. The watchman, too, who had taken her under his protection, was moved, and a tear trickled over his rough cheek. He approached the magistrate, and related to him the account which she had given of herself when he had found her.—The magistrate, after having patiently listened to the narrative, shook his head with the significant smile of one who knew the world too well to be imposed upon.

"You are a good-hearted fellow," said he to the watchman, "but you let your feelings sway your judgment. Remember, this is not the first time you have been duped into neglectfulness of your duty."

"But," persisted the watchman, "she has a letter of introduction to Mr. L——."

"Let Mr. L—— be sent for, then."

"I went for him this morning," returned the other, "but he has left the city."

"Let the girl show the letter, then. If she is unfortunate and innocent, as she represents herself, you can easily find some one charitable enough to go her bail.

A ray of hope brightened Mary's features. She seized her reticule, and opened it eagerly. But the letter was not among its contents. Her features sank again into their dull, listless, despairing expression, and she said in a tone of indifference, which showed that her heart had been wrung to the utmost, and no blow could further wound it—

"I have lost it."

The magistrate very leisurely picked up his pen to fill a warrant of committal, remarking in an under tone to the watchman—

"You see the girl is a deceitful jade; but your credulity swallows any thing that falls from a woman's tongue."

The words, though not intended for Mary's ears, reached them. Her feelings, though deadened to misfortune, were keenly alive to the insult to her character. An instant start was the effect it produced; the color mounted to her cheek; her eyes flashed with virtuous indignation; her lip curled proudly; and with her head erect, and a step of firmness and dignity, she approached the magistrate.

"I am," said she, and her tones, though slightly tremulous with the depth of her emotion, were distinct, "as incapable of falsehood, as you are of justice or mercy. You have the power—condemn me to what ignominy you can; while I am innocent, I can bear the worst."

The magistrate changed color, and quailed a moment beneath her glance, but soon rallied, placed the warrant he had made out in the constable's hand, and motioned him to take her into custody, with an angry gesture. He had mistaken the fearless retort of injured innocence, for the bold defiance of an artful miscreant.

The young man in the religious garb now stepped forward. The scene had deeply interested him, and impressed by the girl's manner with a conviction of her guilelessness, he resolved to befriend her.

"Will your honor inform me what is the amount of bail required in this young woman's case?"

"Oho!" sneered a voice at his elbow, "what is bred in the bone won't come out of the flesh. I thought you had broken off your acquaintance with light-o'-love characters, and joined the church."

The young convert (for he had but recently been taken into Christian communion) shrank back, abashed and mortified that his charitable motives should be misconstrued. He had the holy aspiration, but not the moral courage, to be a Christian. What would the world say? But he cared not what the world said. There is something chivalric in battling openly with Satan, and winning the applause of that respected class of our fellow-beings who profess the Christian faith. What would the brethren say?—That was the cross whose weight he could not support. If the girl should not prove so innocent as he believed her, his fellow-Christians might mistake the purity of his motives, and suspect him of sliding back to the evil ways he professed to have forsaken. Too many are there, who strive to be Christians in the eyes of their fellow-mortals, forgetting that Higher Tribunal by which, not the outward actions, but the secret workings of the heart must be judged.

The officer, in whose charge Mary was, sent for a coach. In the meantime the Justice proceeded to hear the next case, which was that of the woman whom we have mentioned. The charge against her —it is not necessary here to state its nature—she did not attempt to refute. She was subjected to a trifling fine and ten days' immurement in the county jail. There was a pensiveness and a gentleness in the air of this woman (affected doubtless for the occasion) which, to an unsophisticated mind, argued anything but a nature steeped in dark and fearful passions; and there was a placid, thoughtful beauty in her features, which had certainly once been more brilliant, and were yet, though grey hairs were mingling with her brown tresses, sufficiently unimpaired by the hand of time, to be called fascinating. When she had heard her sentence, she quietly paid the fine, and while the warrant for her committal was in process of being made out, she approached Mary, and said, in an under tone—

"This is the world and its justice, child. It grieves you now—after a while you will despise it, and triumph over it."

Mary raised her eyes with some astonishment to the woman's face, and encountered its expression of kindly sympathy with a feeling of gratefulness.—There was a bitterness in the woman's tone which harmonized with her own thoughts, at the moment.

"I despise it already," she replied with emotion.

"When you do so thoroughly," rejoined the other, "it will no longer have power to sting you."

The coach arrived, and they were hurried away to the felon's abode. Guilt and innocence were companions in the same narrow cell—sharers of the same lot of infamy.

Of all the qualities of our nature, pride is, at the same time, the most dangerous and the most indispensable—a blessing and a curse. Like that most fearful of the elements, fire, if properly restrained and applied, it may be productive of infinite good, but once escaped beyond control, it rages with devouring fury, consuming every virtue and kindly feeling, until it leaves the soul a scathed, blackened and cheerless ruin.

Alas for Mary! Against every withering mischance she had borne up with the courage of a martyr—but this last trial was fated to undo her. She was degraded in the eyes of the world, and her pride, stung to the quick—to desperation—whispered of vengeance—on whom? The world which had wronged her. And how? By violating those laws by which she was doomed to so unmerited an ignominy. Silly girl! she knew not what she was doing.—Wounded pride could only turn upon herself, like the wounded serpent which madly buries its fangs in its own flesh.

The woman who shared Mary's cell had from the first marked her for her victim, and too skilled an incendiary of evil passions was she to leave a doubt of her success. She fanned the flame which was kindled, until it blazed up with fearful intensity—the funeral pile of virtue. No wile was left untried to excite the woe-worn girl's indignation against the world which had dealt so harshly with her. Then by a cunning appeal to her womanly sympathies in behalf of her own errors, and by gradually familiarizing her mind to fascinating details of vice, she eventually overcame the barrier which Mary's principles of moral rectitude opposed to her design, and subdued her to her will.

Upon the very day that the fallen woman's term of imprisonment expired, the burglar, against whom Mary was held in durance to testify, died in his cell, and of course our heroine was discharged with her iniquity-steeped companion. They issued forth together, and Mary was led from the dungeon to a still darker fate.

* * * * *

May with its bloom passed, and June with its fearful skies came weeping for the blossoms that were fallen and the bitterness of its young fruit.—How emblematic of life! Youth is the May-day, with its blossoms of hope, and then succeed the first realities of life, like the fruit in its first stage—all bitterness—and our June is a tearful one; and a well or ill-spent life brings an age of comfort or grief, as an arrid or genial summer brings an autumn of famine or a glorious harvest.

A storm obliterated the twilight of the first evening in June; but it was soon over, and the moon struggling through the clouds poured a sudden flood of pale light full into the lonely chamber of Mary Delavan. She started from her couch, as if in alarm, to the midst of the room. And what was there in those clear, harmless rays that should startle her?—Was it not the same beautiful planet she had often gazed at with delight? Was there any change in its beams? None! But there was a change in the being on whom they fell. There had once been a purity in her breast, to which the chasteness of the calm moonlight was congenial. That purity had fled, and in its place was—guilt! Her soul was dark, and it feared and hated light—for light is the emblem of truth. She had no sooner reached the shadow beyond the flood of radiance which poured through the window, than the momentary excitement which had impelled her ceased, and the same miserable sensations which for hours before had oppressed her, returned. Oh, it was horrible!—that feeling of emptiness, and loneliness, and gloom, which at that moment possessed her. There was a desolateness within her that was almost unendurable. Virtue and truth had left her breast, and vice and evil passions had scarcely yet stepped in to fill the void made by their desertion.

"It does seem," she mused, passing her fingers calmly over her brow, "that the mind, or the soul, or whatever that may be which we call self, has for its companion an unseen good as well as evil genius, whose presence and promptings give direction to thought and guidance to action. The companion genius of my soul was the good one—I have expelled it, and the evil one seems loitering at the door, as if in doubt of its right to enter the vacant tenement.—Hence, this loneliness, this fearful solitude within me. And how strangely calm and unmoved I reflect upon these things. Oh!" she exclaimed aloud, and her face brightened with the instant thought, "oh, what hope is this returning? I may even yet recall the good spirit that was my guardian angel—I will!—I will! I will shut out the evil one!"

She pressed her hands convulsively to her breast, contracted her brow sternly, and bent low her head, as if by this movement she were closing the door of her heart against the spirit her exclamation referred to. But if the evil was shut out, there was no barrier which could exclude remorse.

A golden brooch, which secured a bracelet upon her wrist, at this moment slipped its fastenings, and by a slight movement of the arm, was thrown to the floor at a little distance from her. Accustomed to the sight of this trinket daily, and almost hourly, it had not before called up an unusual emotion; but her mind was now wrought up to a painful state of excitement by the reflections which had just passed through it, and, as it lay glittering in the moonlight, the sight recalled to memory the hand which had bestowed it. It was her brother's gift, and a train of early associations came up before her mind with harrowing rapidity and vividness. In the unutterable anguish of the moment, she groaned aloud. She pressed her fingers again to her brow—it was no longer cold and clammy, but hot and feverish—it was burning with the glow of awakened guilt, and her hand shrank from the touch. Oh! the pangs of that remorse!—the moments it endured were hours of agony, and they brought madness with them.

There was a knock at her chamber door.

"Who is it?" she exclaimed, and then, without pausing for an answer, continued—"Stay a moment, I am coming. Coming," she added, in a lower tone, "but not to you who knock there—not to you!" The summons was repeated. "Have patience," she exclaimed, "I am coming—wait till I am arrayed."—Again she added, in the same suppressed tone as before, "Coming, but not to you! Yes, wait till I am arrayed. It shall be in crimson—that is fittest. Crimson—deep—deep as the blush of shame!"

There was mirth in the low, convulsed laughter which succeeded these words—but it was a very unnatural kind of mirth; it sounded like the delirious laughter of a maniac, and it continued to burst from her lips at momentary intervals, as she moved slowly toward her toilet. Again the knock at the door was repeated. "Oh, I am coming!" she exclaimed, impatiently, as she drew from her dressing-case a bared knife, which she held wildly up to the moonlight, where its bright blade gleamed and flashed like a meteor!

* * * * *

Misfortune is no palliation of guilt. No wrongs received at the hands of others, can justify a departure from the path of honor and virtue; and the most miserable of all infatuated beings, are those who think by wantonly wrecking their own good fame, to spite the world. They but attempt to retaliate upon their Maker, the injuries they receive at the hands of the evil one; and their blind resentment must inevitably recoil in its force upon their own heads. Is it not better to suffer all—and if it comes to the worst, die with the blessed consciousness of a spotless reputation, and the comfort of an approving conscience, than to yield to the impulse of passion, or the allurements of vice, and die—for die we must in any event—goaded to madness by the pangs of remorse?

Ye, who are beset by the "ills which flesh is heir to"—who are battling against a stern fate—yield not! Struggle on, for the next hour may bring you a triumph! Pause ere you cast away the last hope; for the moment that you despair, the prize may be within your grasp, and you lose the success for which you have so long bravely striven, and which but one more effort might make your own.

Such was the case with Mary Delavan. The knock at her chamber door was to announce the return of that brother whom she supposed had found an ocean grave. He had been wrecked, saved, and had wandered for years beneath "Afric's burning sun;" but the limits of our story will not allow us to give more of his history here. It will be sufficient to say that he had returned, learned his sister's misfortunes, and agitated with affection and fears, but still confident, despite the appearance of circumstances, in his sister's integrity, had tracked her to this place.—We cannot paint his heart-rending disappointment upon finding her weltering in her own blood—fallen from virtue, and a suicide. The shock was more than he could bear. A brother's love excused a sister's weakness, and bitterly he cursed the institutions of his country which had driven her to shame and the grave. The same false reasoning and the same mistaken spirit of resentment which had actuated her took possession of him. He saw her placed in the earth, and then left, none knew whither.

A few years ago, a pirate was executed in one of the West India Islands. He bore several names; but on his person was found a pocket-book, whose only contents consisted of a lock of braided hair, and a small piece of paper curiously cut, upon which was inscribed, in a childish hand—

"E. V. DELAVAN—FROM HIS SISTER MARY."

HOME HAPPINESS.

Like a drink to the desert, alone in its glee,
I [illegible] small home can no comfort to me;

Like a bird in the forest, whose world is its nest,
My house is my all, and the centre of rest.
Let ambition stretch over the world at a stride,
Let the restless go rolling away with the tide;
I look on life's pleasures as follies at best,
And, like sunset, feel calm when I'm going to rest.

I sit by the fire in the dark winter's night,
While the cat cleans her face with her foot in delight;
And the winds all a cold, with rude clatter and din,
Shake the windows like robbers who want to get in;
Or else, from the cold tube hid and away,
By the bright burning fire see my children at play,
Making houses of cards, or a coach of a chair,
While I sit enjoying their happiness there!

I walk round the orchard on sweet summer eves,
And rub the perfume from the black-currant leaves,
Which, like a geranium, when touched, leaves a smell
That lad's love and sweet-briar can hardly excel.
I watch the plants grow, all begemmed with the shower,
That glitter like pearls in a sunshiny hour;
And hear the pet robin jus[illegible] whistle a tune,
To cheer the lone hedger when labour is done.

Joys come like the grass in the field, springing there,
Without the mere toil of attention or care;
They come of themselves, like a star in the sky,
And the brighter they shine when the cloud passes by.
I wish for but little, and find it at there,
Where peace gives its faith to the home of the bare;
Who would else, overcome by her fears, run away
From the shade of the flowers and the breeze of the day.

Oh, the out-of-door blessings of leisure for me!
Health, riches, and joy!—it includes them all three.
There peace comes to me,—I have faith in her smile,—
She's my playmate in leisure, my comfort in toil;
There the short pasture-grass hides the lark in its nest,
Though scarcely so high as the grass hopper's breast;
And there the mes-loit kid's the wild honey bee,
And there joy in plenty grows—riches for me!

Far away from the world, its delusions and snares—
Whose words are but breath, and its breathing but cares,—
Where trouble's sown thick as the dews of the morn,
One can scarce set a foot without meeting a thorn.
There I see some view the world as a lightly-thrown ball,
There are some look on cities like stones in a wall—
Nothing more. There are others, Ambition's proud heirs,
Of whom I have neither the courage nor cares.

So I sit on my bench, or enjoy in the shade,
My toil as a pastime, while using the spade;
My fancy is free in her pleasure to stray,
Making voyages round the whole world in a day.
I gather home-comforts where cares never grow,
Like onions, the heavens rain down with the dew,
Till I see the tired hedger bend wearily by,
Then like a tired bird to my corner I fly.

The Capture and the Escape.

An Incident of the Irish Rebellion.

BY THOMAS J. BEACH.

It was in the latter days of that tremendous struggle for liberty, so well known by the common title of "The Irish Rebellion," as to require no more definite mention at our hands, that the courage, patriotism and sincerity of those who were enlisted in the cause, were conspicuously exhibited by the severity of the trials they were required to undergo; the perils they had to encounter, and the despair that thickened around them—like black clouds indicative of the storm that was about to scatter the true-hearted bands of the United Irishmen, and sweep the bravest and the best from the face of the earth. Already there had fallen before the British arms, many a bold spirit in whose skill and intrepidity the hopes of thousands had been centered, and in whose bloody grave the hopes of thousands were buried for ever. Numbers had been captured, and loaded with fetters, whose weight alone could restrain their active limbs, then thrust into dungeons inaccessible to all but the officers of death—the sole means of preventing the spread of that influence, which must have grown out of such examples of indomitable resolution, unyielding patriotism and faith, as were exhibited by the unfortunate captives, even to the end. Spies it was well known had been crawling about the country, and such active measures had been taken by the government, and well directed onslaughts made by British troops, as rendered it too apparent that information was conveyed to the enemy by "traitor knaves." Danger threatened on every side, and the most secret meetings were attended with risk of life, even in the mountains—in the very heart of the rock. At length the treachery of Reynolds led to the arrest of several of the most prominent leaders of the insurgents on the 12th of March, 1798, who were captured "at one fell swoop." Of the party who were assembled on that occasion, one alone effected his escape—brave, eloquent and good, the patriot and fast friend of Ireland, Lord Edward Fitzgerald. He succeeded in eluding pursuit, and with every prospect of success for several weeks. Endeared to the hearts of the people, he seemed to be secure against all the efforts of that foe, who was scenting every avenue with all the ferocity of war-hounds spurred on by an insatiable thirst for his blood. Alas! the fidelity of a host, each one of whom would have sacrificed himself for the noble victim, was insufficient for his safety. On the 12th of May, after a desperate resistance, he fell into the hands of the enemy, and was exposed to the terrible vengeance of that power, whose tenderest mercy to the Irish rebel was a speedy death. The news of this severe calamity carried consternation for a moment into the bosoms of the bravest who were yet at large; it was but for a moment, and recovering from the shock, the rescue of Fitzgerald was a theme of whispered discussion among a few daring spirits, to whom the ignominious death, which, in the event of failure, was their sure and certain fate, presented no terrors in comparison with the glory of saving him, who would have been the saviour of themselves and their native land.

Among the adventurous spirits which that stirring time called forth from the interior, was young Arthur Donore, the son of a wealthy land owner, whose love for his broad acres overcame the active devotion in his country's service, which it is but justice to say he would have manifested, had his situation and circumstances been the reverse of what they were. But it was no secret among Arthur's acquaintances that his father allowed him to draw for very liberal sums, and the drafts were promptly honored, although the old gentleman knew the uses to which his son appropriated the money perfectly well. To counteract any sinister consequences from this course, however, it was rumored, and not without foundation, that "the squire," as old Mr. Donore was called, had more than once volunteered to supply the King's troops when quartered in his vicinity, with sundry beeves, and had entertained with great ceremony at his own dwelling, the officers of the regiments, with the best that his cellar and his larder could afford. He is also said to have bowed them off upon their march with much courtesy, and upon returning to his mansion has been casually overheard to damn with considerable animation every Englishman in the country. This is, however, mere tradition, and cannot be traced to any authentic historical source.

Young Arthur had been chosen the chief of a little party of twelve, which formed a branch of a band of some two hundred determined and active men, with either of whom, and in any quality requisite to the duty to which they were pledged, Arthur Donore would compare with advantage. Yet active, thoughtful and attentive as he was, he found time and opportunity to fall in love with one of the prettiest, sweetest, and most charming girls in the neighborhood, Agnes O'Terry. Agnes was an orphan child, and had been brought up in the family of her uncle, Phelim O'Terry, who was an avowed friend of the royalists, though by no means a serviceable one, being too much interested in his own pursuits to give much attention to the affairs of the King. He cultivated his land, cursed the rebels, sold his produce, and went to bed with the full consciousness of having done his duty. Perhaps if he had known that such a full-blooded anti-royalist as Arthur Donore was performing prodigies of valor, liberating his country from the yoke of England, and afterward occupying an elevated station in her councils, in the dreams which flitted around the pillow of his pretty little niece, Agnes, every night, his apathy might have been moved to a proper consideration of the necessity of interposing his authority, and handing the young phantom hero of the dear girl's brain, to a reality any thing but agreeable. But Arthur and Agnes were wise enough to keep both their love and their rebellion to themselves, and it was only in a stroll at evening in the thick wood, upon the silent hill, or by the brook that came leaping and brawling along the valley, that they talked to each other of love and happiness—of treason and death. And how strange were the emotions that thrilled their young breasts—how conflicting—how opposite—how hostile was each alternating word and thought! with this a tear—with that, a smile; with this, a dread—with that, a hope; with this a palace—with that, a dungeon; life with the one, and with the other darkness, chains and death.

One evening the moon was pouring down a brilliant stream of placid light on hill and grove, and plain and river, when they met at their usual trysting place. Arthur passed his arm around her waist, took her left hand in his and carried it to his lips.

"How hot your hand is, Arthur," said the gentle girl.

"Fancy, dear, fancy, that's all," he replied, and conducted his companion with a quick step, along the path which led into the wood. They had advanced some distance under the deep shade in silence; at length the young man suddenly spoke: "Agnes," he said, "you love me, dearest, with all your heart!"

"Did you mean that for a question, Arthur? No, you would not offend me by asking it! Love you? O, I would follow you through the world—poverty or in pride, live with you rich or poor, die with you, lay down my life for you, Arthur—give up all for you—all, but—my honor!"

"And if you gave up that, Agnes, dear, Arthur Donore would be your's no longer—he could love you no more. Look at this gold cross I wear: I bought it in Dublin, and afterward put it to the test of the chemist's art. It sustained no blemish, but proved to be pure gold—had it failed under the test, I would not have worn it another hour. It might have appeared as bright to another, but to me it would have been worthless. So with woman, Agnes; if she falls under the art and passion of the man she loves, she becomes his victim—not his wife. He would be rid of her as soon as convenient; she may be as beautiful to the eyes of another, but to him she is a thing of no value. He never loves her more. But I am cheating the priest of a homily. Agnes, dear, I have something particular to say to you to-night."

"Say it, Arthur, I am ready to hear. I know it will be nothing that I ought not to hear."

"Lord Fitzgerald is taken—we have just received the news."

"God protect him!" exclaimed the girl, with that fervent emphasis which such an event at such a time was well calculated to inspire.

"He must not die, Agnes, if the lives of a handful of United Irishmen can save him from the scaffold. You know he must not die," said Arthur, meaningly.

"I do not understand you, Arthur—you would not—"

"You know, darling," interrupted the youth, "that I am in a dangerous service at best; I have been in the battle, and bear the marks of the Englishman's bayonet, and the scratch of his sword: his bullet has made a whole in my hat—thank God it wasn't my head—and the time may come when his rope will—don't tremble so, darling, there's been better men hung than you or me either."

"Arthur don't talk to me of that," sobbed the poor girl, clasping her arms around his manly neck, as it were to protect it from the sacrilege contemplated in his words; "let us fly now, dear Arthur; we have plenty of money to carry us safely away."

"What, fly, and Fitzgerald in their hands; think in, Agnes, and unsay that counsel. Listen to me. We have a chance to save him, but, it is a desperate one—a 'forlorn hope,' as the soldiers call it. If we fail I shall be close to him in his last moments, and we shall go to heaven together—Fitzgerald and Arthur Donore!" Animated with the suggestion of his ardent patriotism, the young man lifted his eyes upward, and the straggling beams that came down through the foliage betrayed a glistening tear.

"Arthur, cruel, cruel Arthur, you love me not—Arthur would rather die with Fitzgerald than live with Agnes."

"You haven't got the argument right, darling," said O'Connor resuming the lover, and kissing the tear wet cheek of his devoted girl; "say this—'Arthur O'Connor would rather die for Fitzgerald with honor, than live with Agnes in disgrace.' Agnes consented to that?" But Agnes could only give such consent as sobs and tears implied. "Our party meets to-night for action," he continued; "we assemble at Fergus O'Leary's old watermill, on the stream beyond the wood, about a mile above the gibbet, where Flynn and McGanty were hung—it is some three miles from this; you know where it is, do ye, Agnes?"

"I do," she replied.

"Well, I mention it to you that if any thing should happen—what's that? A footfall, by St. Patrick—yonder bough sprung, too—there's not a breath stirring—hush!" and the youth bent cautiously down, till reclining upon his hand, he was able to apply his ear close to the ground. He remained in this position several minutes, but detecting no repetition of the sound, he arose.

"I don't think it was any thing," whispered Agnes, trembling at every joint.

"I hope not," added Arthur, also in a whisper; "but I would have given the parson a double title this year to have been at that bough five minutes ago; though it might possibly have been caught in another branch during a blow, and that instant released itself."

"Or a bird might have alighted on it or left it," said Agnes, and at that instant a thrush darted into the tree above their heads, and broke into song. "I told you so."

"Well then, it was a bird. Now I must be quick and tell you all. Agnes I shall not see you after this night until the expedition is over, and if I should be taken, you will not be allowed to visit me unless you are my wife. Will you go with me now to Father Phillip and become my own? Will you darling—and then I'll conduct you back at once to your uncle's house, and leave you till we can meet under worse or better circumstances. You will not answer me! Agnes will you—"

"Sudden as it is and unprepared as I am, if it will make you happier," interrupted the gentle girl, "I will."

"Ah! bless my pretty one," exclaimed Arthur catching her to his heart, and kissing from her lips the honey which those sweet words had left in passing to his ear. But he delayed not to lavish caresses, though he felt how exquisitely the bliss of that moment relieved the arduous duty he had pledged in his country's service. Giving to his betrothed the support of his strong arm, her feet but lightly touched the ground as he hastened with her along the path of the wood which emerged near the dwelling of the reverend man, upon the verge of the neighboring village. Arthur prefaced the subject of his visit with a handful of silver and gold, and the priest summoning his little household to be present at the ceremony, Arthur and Agnes were in a few minutes linked in happy union by the holiest ties. As they were about to depart the priest followed them to the door, replaced the money in the young man's hand, saying that he was familiar with the name and deeds of Arthur Donore, and desired him to apply the money to the sacred purposes of his heart; "it is Father Phillip's donation," said the venerable man, "to his struggling country."

Conducting his bride to a spot within a few paces of her uncle's dwelling, Arthur indulged in a long and passionate embrace; it was a moment of ecstacy not unmingled with the pangs of acute apprehension; it was a parting for a few hours or for ever, and he could not resist the conviction that the probabilities fearfully favored the latter. His wife—his newly wedded wife bathed his cheek with tears that would not be suppressed, and it was not till he felt his own bosom yielding to too tender emotions, that he was able to tear himself away—"Good night, Agnes," he exclaimed, "good night; your husband will meet you here to-morrow, or—" the last words were lost to her ear as the young insurgent darted off toward the wood, and took the dim path to O'Leary's mill. Sorrowfully Agnes stole into the house and reached her chamber unobserved. She longed to sleep that the time might pass more rapidly away, but she discovered that the anxiety that pervaded her mind, would banish all repose from her pillow until she could hear the result of Arthur's undertaking, or see him again. Nearly an hour had passed away, and she was sitting at the window looking toward the spot at which he had disappeared from her sight, when her attention was arrested by the sound of horses feet, and in a few minutes three persons rode up to the gate of entrance, dismounted and tying their horses to the fence walked up to the door. A thundering knock brought old Phelim out with great promptness, inasmuch as he had not retired to bed; otherwise they might have knocked the house down, and the old gentleman would have crawled out of the ruins asleep.

"Walk in gentleman," said O'Terry, eyeing the military equipments of two of the party, and recognising in the third one Paddy Mullen, a ragged scamp of the village who was known to keep up a familiar intercourse with every hen-roost for five miles round the country—"walk in gentlemen," he said, "walk in, but you, Paddy Mullen, if you set your foot in my door, I'll set my foot in—"

"Stop, sir," said the officer, "he must come in; he's in the king's service to-night, and I cannot allow him to be out of my sight; we shall remain but a few minutes, and so there will be no harm done." Accordingly the whole party were admitted, the door was closed, and Agnes could hear no more. She awaited their re-appearance in an agony of suspense, and conjecture was nervously at work to divine the purpose of so strange a visit, and from such unwelcome visiters. In about a quarter of an hour one of the two in regimentals came out, mounted his horse and rode off at a full gallop toward the village at which she was aware a small detachment of soldiers were quartered. Another quarter of an hour elapsed, and the second soldier, accompanied by Paddy Mullen came out; they mounted their horses and on bidding O'Terry good night, the officer advised him to keep an eye to the girl, or he would get himself into trouble. They trotted slowly away toward the wood and were soon lost to the view of the trembling girl, who had felt her blood chill in every vein at that soldier's parting words. Her anxiety became intense, and though she had been unable to trace the path of the royalists from her window, she felt almost confident that they had taken a direction toward O'Leary's mill. Her very fears began to fill her heart with determination, and scarcely knowing how to act by a sort of instinctive impulse she went down stairs. Her uncle was alone, and sat smoking his pipe at the table; he looked up sternly and demanded her errand. Embarrassed, she replied that she feared something was the matter, as she had seen soldiers leaving the house.

"Go to bed, go to bed," said he, "and let me hear no more of your associating with rebels, or you will bring me as well as yourself to the dungeon and the block."

Agnes obeyed in silence; she had not failed, however, to observe upon the table, pen, ink and paper, and a few fragments of the letter strewed upon the floor. These articles she felt assured had been used by the visiters, and resolving to satisfy her curiosity she awaited patiently until her uncle had retired; then quietly descending to the room she picked up the scraps from the floor; they were written upon; an error in the billet which did not admit of correction, had, beyond doubt, caused the writer to tear it up and prepare another; she placed some of them together as well as her trembling hands permitted, and presently her most dreadful forebodings were realised. She could make out the name of "Arthur Donore"—"O'Leary's mill"—"send eighteen men"—"Paddy Mullen"—"to-night in the woods"—"sweet heart, Agnes O'Terry"—"d—n pretty Paddy says"—"too good for a rebel"—"be active," &c. &c.

This startling discovery was too explicit to be misunderstood, and it required but a few moments reflection to enable her to determine how to act. Opening the door with great caution she passed out, closed it after her, and ran with speed into the woods. Then taking a circuitous rather than the direct route, she hastened on toward O'Leary's mill; almost breathless and exhausted, having scarcely relaxed her pace she arrived at a spot where the path she had chosen struck into the narrow and customary road, about half a mile from the mill. Here she was petrified for an instant to find herself close to a couple of horses tied to a tree by the wayside; but she recovered her self-possession upon finding the riders were absent. She listened, and heard voices at some distance down the road in a direction opposite to that she was pursuing, which she supposed were those of the soldier and Mullen, who had probably walked down to see if the detachment was coming up; at that moment she heard Mullen exclaim "here they come;" not a moment was to be lost; releasing one of the horses she sprang into the saddle, and guiding the animal upon the turfy edge of the road, galloped off; in the stillness of the night, however, every footfall sounded painfully distinct, and Agnes could but imagine she had never heard a horse tread so heavily before; her fears were excited, and the mill was yet a quarter of a mile distant when those fears were realised, and she discovered that she was pursued; a horseman at full gallop was within two hundred yards of her, and she without a whip or—no not without a spur; a pair of scissors was fortunately at her waist, and plunging the pointed blade into the horse's flank the spirited animal goaded thus, bounded forward with mad precipitation; she was gaining on her pursuer, and neared the mill considerably in advance; a light was twinkling through the broken window and she could already discern the figures of men within; anxious to warn them of their danger she uttered a scream so startling and shrill, that the horse reared, affrighted at the unnatural sound, and flinging his delicate burthen to the ground, dashed on with the speed of the wind. That cry, however, brought out the insurgents, and as the horse came down among them, the bridle was seized by Arthur Donore.

"Good God, the dragoons are upon us; fly, we are betrayed; into the woods—a single horseman comes; I'll meet him and try his metal." So saying, as his companions disappeared in the woods, Donore leaped into the saddle and rode on to meet the approaching foe, who had slackened his pace as he came up to the spot where Agnes had fallen.

"Stand rebel, and surrender," said the soldier.

"Not with such a light above, and such a steel beneath me," replied Arthur.

"Then look to your head, braggart," said the dragoon, drawing his heavy sword and spurring towards the insurgent. But Arthur had already drawn a pistol from the holster, and as his assailant came up deliberately fired; the soldier reeled upon the horse, clutched at the pummel of the saddle but there was no holster there, and fell heavily to the ground; he muttered the words "d—n, if the girl had taken—Paddy Mullen's—horse—this wouldn't have—happened," and sank exhausted with the loss of blood. Arthur was in a moment by his side and proceeding to search the body for papers, when a female form at a few paces distant caught his eye; he knew the dress, and raising the face to the moonlight recognized his Agnes; the blood was trickling from a wound at the side of her head, her cheek was cold, and the gentle breathing of her lips had subsided; his heart was bursting with anguish, and he checked not the tears that flowed plentifully from his eyes; he judged easily from the circumstances around him the cause of this catastrophe; Agnes had evidently sacrificed herself for me. His reflections and lamentations were, however, interrupted by the rapid approach of horsemen, and starting to his feet, he discovered by the ringing clatter of arms, that a party of soldiers were coming down at fast gallop; lifting the lifeless girl in his arms he bore her to the mill, and in the room where that death scream had appalled his ear, calmly awaited his fate. The soldiers came up, entered the mill and presented themselves before him; he was seated with Agnes clasped to his bosom;—"Fire, soldiers," he exclaimed, "You shall not part us; one of your villains has slain my wife, and I have killed him; the carrion is without there; come, do your work, I'll die with her in my arms."

But the scene excited the pity even of the hirelings he addressed, and quenched the thirst for blood. "Tell us," said an officer, "where are your comrades, and you shall live."

"I do not wish to do a murder," said Arthur, "but if you repeat that proposition, either you or I, will never look upon the sun again.

"O, ho, there's some hot blood in you yet; seize the fellow," commanded the officer; and Arthur unwilling to release his embrace of Agnes was easily secured. An order to "take the woman from his arms" was not executed without a violent struggle in which one of the soldiers was stabbed to the heart, with the scissors which Arthur had discovered in the hand of Agnes and wrenched from her grasp in the last moment of resistance. No sooner was she separated from him than she gave signs of recovery; consciousness speedily returned, and now it was that they experienced the agony of their situation. While he had imagined that his wife was dead, the young insurgent had been reckless of life himself; but now that she was alive and restored, but not restored to him, the desire of life and liberty made doubly cruel his bonds. But short time for reflection was allowed him when he was conducted from the mill, mounted upon a horse in the midst of a dozen of dragoons, and conveyed to the village at which he had that same evening been made the husband of Agnes. She was taken in charge by the officer of the detachment and half a dozen men, and escorted to her uncle's house, her guilt as an accessary being attributed rather to love than rebellion, and accordingly overlooked.

Arthur was lodged in a contracted building called "the cage;" his limbs were loaded with chains, and a huge padlock united the links in a common circle about his waist. A sentry was posted at the door, and no little precaution had thus been taken to secure the prisoner, it being ascertained that he was no other than Arthur Donore. His name had become too familiar in its association with the rebellion in that quarter, and upon the following day he was privately sentenced, after the brief formality of a court martial trial, to be hung upon the tree nearest to his place of confinement and at the ensuing midnight hour.

The afternoon was drawing to a close and the declining sun looked through the narrow loop-hole in the thickly rivetted door, as if to take a parting glance of one upon whom he would not look again alive. The hope of escape through the aid of his friends he knew was too fallacious to be indulged for a moment. They were ignorant of his approaching fate and would be overwhelmed by the fact of his arrest; and were it otherwise, they dared not assemble to confer, and could not venture into the village alone. He felt that he could meet death without a pang, could he behold his wife once more before he died; but all communication with any living soul had been forbidden him. The tears and entreaties of woman, however, prevailed over this stern decree, and the sun was just setting when Agnes, attended by an officer, presented herself at the door of the little prison, with an order to be admitted for a quarter of an hour to the presence of her husband. The order required the interview to take place under the eye of the officer, but he was young, and not having yet grown callous in the service, remained without by the sentinel. Agnes was ushered into the cell alone, and the sudden clanking of chains was her first welcome; Donore was lying upon the straw, and a coarse rug partially covered the upper part of his body, as if it had been hastily thrown over him. Agnes sunk by his side and threw herself upon his bosom; he raised himself to meet her embrace, and by the action exposed his left arm, which was stripped, and in which he had opened a vein. Agnes would have shrieked at the dreadful thought which rushed to her mind, had not her husband intuitively placed his hand upon her lips and at the same instant whispered in her ear, "Neil Sassenach!" Then calmly taking up the mug in which water had been served to him, he allowed the blood to trickle slowly into it, until it contained nearly half a pint; in the meantime he continued his conversation with Agnes in their native tongue, both of them speaking with much energy, though in subdued tones. But their quarter of an hour had been permitted almost to double itself, when Agnes was summoned away

A long, long embrace, tears and reiterated adieus, and that parting was over. As she walked away leaning upon the arm of the officer, her eye was accidentally arrested by a rope with a running noose suspended from one of the stout branches of a neighboring tree; a shudder thrilled her frame, but lifting her heart to Heaven she there reposed a holy trust, that the cord of the executioner might never disfigure the neck of her husband, or disgrace the name of Arthur Donore. She left the officer at the edge of the village, and thanking him in broken language for his courtesy, took the path to her uncle's dwelling and soon disappeared in the intervening copse.

Night came on, and the sentry continued his measured march before the door of the village cage, occasionally giving a word to a comrade as he passed to quarters. At length all was still, and the solemnity of night was unbroken save by the remote murmuring of a stream, and the fitful song of a restless bird. Every inhabitant of the hamlet had retired to rest before the village clock struck ten, except some half a dozen soldiers who were tippling beer in a little room of the house occupied by the detachment, awaiting the hour which was to summon them to perform the last offices upon the body of the sentenced rebel, young Arthur Donore. But that rebel was resolved to cheat the "gallows tree," and as the sentry passed the door of the cage a few minutes before eleven o'clock, he heard the sudden clank of chains within, a staggering step, and the heavy fall of a body to the floor, succeeded by a deep guttural groan. Unlocking the door, a scene of horrible ghastliness presented itself. The body of the prisoner had sunk with the legs drawn under it, and the head fallen over toward the door; the neck was exposed in the bright moonlight that streamed in, and from ear to ear there was nothing but one gore of blood, and a pool of the crimson fluid had dabbled his dark hair, as his form apparently writhed in the last agony; a large pocket knife was firmly clasped in his right hand. Even to one accustomed to the horrible scenes of war, the mutilated body of the suicide is possessed of adventitious horrors, and it remain in such company was too much for a soldier even of that day to endure. The sentinel gazed upon the mangled remains of the wretched insurgent, and turning with a shudder from the revolting scene, hastened to the rendezvous, some two hundred yards distant, to inform the officer of the night of the occurrence. Disappointed of their prey, the minions of the law cursed their own neglect in not searching the rebel more carefully, whereby they might have discovered, and deprived him of the instrument of death. They proceeded, however, without delay, to the cage, but what was their astonishment to find that the body had been already removed; there was the pool of blood, and there lay the chains in which their prisoner had been bound; but the prisoner—where was he? A strict search was immediately set on foot, and continued through the night. A party visited the residence of Phelim O'Terry, but there they learned that Agnes had also disappeared.

* * * * * * * *

A boat was moored in a little inlet of the sea, about a mile and a half from the scene we have described, and a fishing smack was at anchor a cable's length from the shore. A horse approached the spot at full speed; the faithful creature bore a double burthen; a female alighted first, and her companion, a young man, springing to the ground, caught her in his arms, and carried her to the boat; with a strong arm and a good will he handled the oars, and in a few minutes they were upon the deck of the little craft, with all sail set, a good breeze aft, and her sparkling prow standing down the channel for the coast of France.

"Tell us how you managed it," said the old fisherman, as soon as the young man had washed a mass of clotted blood from his neck.

"Bless your old soul, nothing easier," said Arthur; "I had to trust to myself alone you see, and so while I had nothing else to do I turned my attention to phlebotomy, breathed a vein in my arm, and caught the blood; luckily Agness here got permission to visit me, for the last time, eh darling!—at least the poor thing thought so when she come in—and so I got her to charter your smack, Teddy; well after the night set in I commenced the painting, and laid it on from ear to ear; poured the rest of the blood on the floor, and then blundered down among it, and a pretty frightful beast I made of myself, he sure of it, for the loon of a soldier toddled off as I expected, leaving the key in the door; I observed that the key of my padlock, when they put the chains upon me, was attached to the same ring, and so I just took an opportunity to borrow it for a moment during his absence—and—and here I am."

Arthur and his bride made a safe landing in France, but the pleasure of escape was not unmixed with bitterness and sorrow, for the first news that fell upon their ears was the death of Lord Edward Fitzgerald.

LINES FROM A CONVALESCENT.

TO H. G. E——N, Esq.

List, Harry, to the poet's song;
Though caged the bird that sings to thee,
And harsh the notes he would prolong,
Till sweeter toned by liberty.

Shut from the clear bright world around,
And all its gay and gladsome life,
On wings of retrospection bound,
Tossing its pleasure and its strife.

long my path by every way,
the welkin rings with very joy,
d shout and laugh to hail the day,
hat wears no trace of time's alloy.

This, Harry, is glad boyhood's home;
The hills, the vales, the streams along,
The sky above, a spotless dome,
Fill'd with the music of his song.

Sweet vale of love, young friendship's home!
How leaps the heart to sing of thee;
While nearer in bright visions come
Those precious pastimes back to me.

Crown'd with the lily and the rose,
Where drinks the heart its full of joy,
And youth in all its beauty glows,
And stoops to kiss the blushing boy.

Decked with the flowers that fill the heart,
In perfumes from the fields of bliss;
Rich in the smiles that know no art,
Hallowed by love's first holy kiss.

Sweet early love, that after years
Or flight of time may not destroy,
Though friendship sits alone in tears,
And memory weeps departed joy.

Oh, ever thus my harp in tone,
Would sing of life without a tear,
Of joys for aye that wakes no moan,
Through all the peaceful atmosphere.

While memory, happy in the past,
Lives 'mid the glow of that bright day,
Unmindful of the shades that cast
Their gloomy shadows o'er my way.

And here, but not by marble walls,—
Where friendship's steps are wont to tread,
'Neath sculptured tombs and laboured scrolls,—
Would we enshrine the lovely dead.

Safe where the heavenly powers keep
A guard of shining angels near,
The ashes of our kindred sleep,
Hallowed by many a holy tear.

The half blown rose, whose timid glance
First shrank from this bright world of ours,
Yet smiling through her blushes, drank
The pearly dews that crowned the flowers.

Loved memory of a precious flower,
That blossomed but to fade and die;
To leave my heart in grief's first hour,
To droop beneath its agony.

The first fair child of early spring,
The sweetest bud of all the year,
A gentle, tender, beauteous thing,
Germ of a higher, happier sphere.

For ever now an angel near,
To guard the steps and cheer the way
Of manhood in this vale of tears,
Where all are hastening to decay.

Wealth, pomp, and power, and living fame,
That woo to splendor and a crown;
To leave no record of a name,
When time shall tread their trophies down.

And we shall sleep as sleeps the dead;
Forgotten in this world of death,
Where friendship comes with mournful tread,
And grief awakes the tranquil heath.

To rove amid the groves of heaven,
And pluck the fruits of sinless life;
'Mid early loves and friendships given,
That blessed us in this world of strife.

THE TEST.

An Interesting Tale of Real Life.

BY A "LADY OF MARYLAND."

"I would not enter on my list of friends,
Though graced with polished manners and fine sense,
(Yet wanting sensibility) the man
Who needlessly sets foot upon a worm."

"Well, Edward, what does home look like after your long absence?"

"Exactly the same as when I left it, mother. I cannot perceive the slightest change. Time seems to have stood still with you all here. Your eye remains as bright and your cheek as smooth as ever, and I could almost fancy it was but yesterday I parted with you."

"It is three years since, my son, and the time which to you appears so short, has passed heavily enough with me. But do you miss nothing at home? Is there no familiar face absent from our little circle?"

"Oh! yes, poor little Adeline—what has become of her?"

"Her father has returned, and taken her home to a beautiful estate he has lately purchased. Adeline is at the head of one of the most splendid establishments our country affords. But why do you smile, Edward?"

"At the idea of Adeline being at the head of a splendid establishment! She who always seemed afraid of being obliged to speak, and was absolutely distressed to death if a stranger happened to look at her."

"She was very young when you saw her last, and was certainly very timid; but she is much improved both in manner and appearance since then."

"I am glad of it: there was abundant room for improvement in both."

"You speak harshly, Edward. Adeline was always extremely amiable, and her society has been my chief solace during your long absence."

"You do not mean to tell me, mother, that you, with your lively energetic mind and warm affectionate heart, could find pleasure in the society of such a being as Adeline Howard?"

"Why not?—you know Adeline is not deficient in intellect."

"But she is in feeling. She lacks soul, animation, tenderness, all that can interest the imagination or warm the heart. She is exceedingly amiable! Yes, negatively so. She has not sufficient energy to be otherwise; but she has no sensibility: and the utter absence of it renders her perfectly uninteresting in spite of the regularity of her features."

"But you forget that three years have passed since you saw her."

"True, and in many respects she may be improved; but she can never possess that refined feeling, that exquisite tenderness which renders woman a creature to be loved, cherished, almost idolized."

"You speak feelingly, my dear Edward," said Mrs. Hamilton; "I am inclined to suspect that you are thinking of some one who possesses those qualities in which you imagine Adeline to be deficient."

"I will not conceal from you, my dear mother, that I have met with a being who realizes all my ideas of womanly perfection, one whose beauty, perfect as it is, is yet her least attraction. Oh, mother, had you seen her beautiful eyes fill with tears, and the bright glow fade from her cheek, as she listened to the pathetic tales I have sometimes read to her, you would own with me that softness, tenderness, and sensibility, are the true attractions of woman."

"It is very true, my son, that those are very attaching qualities, and the woman who is destitute of them lacks that charm which is peculiar to her sex, and without which she can never be warmly loved, however her conduct may command our esteem.—But before we determine the value of sensibility in any particular character, we should know to what it tends. That is a very false, though I believe a very common kind of sensibility which exhausts itself in lamenting over misery without making any effort to relieve it."

The entrance of a servant who presented young Hamilton with a letter, interrupted the conversation.

"Your letter contains pleasant news, Edward, I am sure," said Mrs. Hamilton, after a pause, during which she had marked the countenance of her son, as he read again and again the few lines which his letter contained.

"It does indeed, mother, and it is not unconnected with the subject of which we have just been speaking. To be plain, it is a letter from Frank Burnet, containing an invitation to attend him as groomsman. His wedding is to take place in a few days."

"Well, and is it the prospect of a wedding that makes your cheek flush, and your eye dance so merrily?"

"No, mother: but——"

"But what, Edward?"

"I never thought you dull before, mother. Can you not divine that Frank is to marry Miss Linden, and that her cousin who resides with her, and who is to attend her as bridesmaid, is the only being who has ever made an impression on the heart of your son."

"I could not divine all this certainly, my dear Edward, but I can rejoice that it is so, since it appears to afford you so much pleasure. But you have not told me the name of the fair lady who is destined to be my daughter."

"Ah! my dear mother, I am not certain of that! Beauty and merit like hers must attract universal admiration, and I am not vain enough not to have many fears, though I am not without hope. Her name is Herbert—Cecilia Herbert. She is an orphan, and resides with her uncle, Mr. Linden, whose daughter Burnet is to marry. On one occasion, I accompanied Burnet on a visit to Miss Linden, and it was there I saw Miss Herbert."

Mrs. Hamilton looked with maternal pride upon the handsome features of her son, and as he left the room, she mentally exclaimed—

"With a form of surpassing elegance, with a mind of such lofty powers, and with a splendid fortune, it is not likely that he will be refused by any woman. My only fear is lest the object of his choice should not be worthy of the noble heart that beats in the breast of my only son."

* * * * * * * *

There were lights and music and the sounds of laughter from many lovely lips in Mr. Linden's spacious drawing rooms. The bridal party entered and the music ceased, and the light laugh was succeeded by a solemn silence, as the man of God commenced the ceremony which was to blend into one the destinies of two loving hearts. The bride, a pretty, modest looking girl, leaned on the arm of her chosen one as she uttered the responses which bound her to him forever, and the deep seriousness of his countenance evinced his sense of the importance of the trust confided to him. By his side stood Edward Hamilton, his fine face flushed with emotion, and his whole soul beaming in his eyes, as he sought those of Cecilia Herbert, who occupied a corresponding position by the side of the bride. And here was a form and face that might well rivet the attention of a passionate admirer of female beauty. Her form was about the medium height, and symetrical in all its proportions. Her complexion was dazzlingly fair, and the rich hue of her cheek could only be rivalled by the still more brilliant color of her half-parted lips. Her hair of pale glossy brown fell in luxuriant ringlets over her brow and cheeks, and almost obscured her eyes—those eyes of deepest blue that in their alternations of melting softness and of sparkling vivacity were alike bewitching. They were now bent timidly on the ground, and it was only at the conclusion of the ceremony that they were raised to meet the ardent gaze of our hero. Then the deepening color of her cheek, the modest confusion of her manner, evinced her sensibility to the admiration she excited, and completed her conquest over the enamoured heart of Edward. Scarcely could he restrain the expression of his feelings, but he remembered his promise to his mother to scan closely her character before he committed himself by a declaration from which, when once made, he could not in honour recede; and for the remainder of the evening he paid her only those attentions which their relative positions justified.

The bridal party were to remain a week at Thorndale, the residence of Mr. Linden, and then the newly wedded pair were to proceed to their new home, accompanied by their particular friends, among whom Miss Herbert and Edward were of course included.

The week which followed the nuptials was one of unmingled enjoyment to our hero. He fancied he was reading the character of her he loved, when in fact he was only becoming more and more absorbed by his devotion to the fair girl who was his constant companion. His mornings were spent in riding or walking with her; his evenings in reading to her, and marking with delight the sensibility which evinced itself in smiles or tears, as the subject of their studies was humorous or pathetic—or, in hanging over her chair, as she performed some brilliant piece of music, or warbled in a voice of melting softness some touching ballad.

The time sped swiftly away, and the morning at length arrived which was to disperse the happy party, and on which the bride was to take her departure from the paternal mansion. Her new residence was about forty miles distant, and thither the bridal party proceeded, the weather being remarkably fine, in open carriages. Edward, whose wealth permitted the indulgence of his tastes, and who was fond of fine horses, drove Miss Herbert in a phæton, with a pair of spirited animals, which were somewhat difficult to restrain. He managed them, however, with perfect ease, and purposely kept in the rear, that he might enjoy the society of his companion unrestrained by the presence of others.—Gradually his voice assumed a tone of deeper tenderness, the long pent-up feelings of his heart struggled for utterance: another moment would have decided his fate—but in the agitation of his mind, he had relaxed his grasp of the reins, and his horses finding themselves unrestrained, started off with a rapidity which it was for some moments impossible to check. In their headlong speed they passed a cottage, near the door of which several children were at play, and to the indescribable horror of our hero, a little girl, who was too much frightened to get out of the way, fell directly in front of the carriage, the wheel of which passed over her. The next moment Edward succeeded in stopping the horses, and assisting Miss Herbert to alight, they both entered the cottage into which the poor child had been carried. The little sufferer was extended upon a bed, pale and apparently lifeless, and by her side stood her weeping mother and a group of children. The cottage was evidently the abode of extreme poverty, and the utter absence of neatness made every thing appear even more forbidding and miserable than it would otherwise have done. The woman, it appeared, was a widow, and the mother of eight children, who were dependedt upon her labor for support.

The agony of Edward Hamilton, as he looked upon the little creature, upon whom his carelessness had been the means of inflicting severe and probably permanent injury, if not death, was extreme.—Yet it did not prevent his doing all that could be done for the sufferer. Leaving Miss Herbert in the cottage, he proceeded in quest of a surgeon, and in a village about a mile distant, he found one, who returned with him. While Doctor Willis was examining the condition of his patient, Edward retired to the porch of the cottage, in which Miss Herbert was seated. He did not appear sensible of her presence; he was wholly absorbed by his anxiety for the suffering child. Cecilia approached him—he did not raise his head. She laid her hand on his arm, and uttered his name. Still he remained silent, and she proceeded—

"Dear Mr. Hamilton, do not let this affair distress you so. You could not help this accident, and you have done all you could do in procuring a surgeon, and every thing necessary for the child."

"But if she should die, I can never forgive myself, nor bear to look at the poor mother who had been by my means deprived of a child."

"There is no fear that the child will die; and even if it should, the poor woman will have no cause for complaining of you. Indeed, on the contrary, I think she should be obliged to you for removing a part of her burthen. Seven children are enough for one woman, in all conscience, particularly if they depend on her for support."

As Miss Herbert uttered these words, Edward Hamilton, looking for a moment intently in her face, with astonishment depicted in every lineament of his countenance, started from her side and walked into the garden, where he threw himself upon a rude bench, and gave unrestrained vent to his emotions. Had the beautiful face of Cecilia Herbert been suddenly transformed into that of a gorgon, he could scarcely have been more shocked than he had been by the words which had fallen from her lips. True, her object was to console him, but how hard, how coarse, how unfeeling must be the heart which could conceive such thoughts—which could prompt the lips to speak lightly of that most holy tie which binds a mother to her child. Edward's gloomy meditations were interrupted by the surgeon.

"I have come, sir, to let you know the situation of my patient. It is not near so bad as I expected. She will do well if she have the necessary comforts, and those, I am sure, your liberality will provide."

"Most willingly, my dear sir, if you will be my agent in this matter, and let no expense be spared to procure every thing that can conduce to the comfort of the poor little sufferer and her mother. I have a young lady under my charge, whom I must convey to her friends, but in a day or two I will be here again, when I hope to hear favorable accounts of your patient."

Pressing the good Doctor warmly by the hand, Edward returned to the house, and placing a well-filled purse in the hands of the woman, and desiring that a nurse and every comfort should be procured for the wounded child, he handed Miss Herbert into the carriage, and they pursued their journey in silence, and with feelings very different from those which, only a few hours since, had filled their bosoms.

How short a time will sometimes change the whole current of our lives! On the morning of this day, Edward Hamilton could conceive of no greater bliss than to call the fair creature by his side his own; and the only thought that troubled his mind was a fear lest he should not be able to awaken in her bosom feelings corresponding to those which filled his own. Now, amid all the gloomy and despondent feelings which saddened his heart, he was yet thankful that circumstances had revealed to him the real character of the object of his love, before the irrevocable words had passed his lips which must have bound him to her forever. He remembered his mother's words, and he acknowledged the truth of the remark, that many who will weep over the fictitious woes of the poet and the novelist, have little sympathy with real distress. He recollected that amid all the agony and confusion which the late accident had occasioned, Cecilia had never essayed to soothe or comfort the suffering child or the alarmed mother, and had seemed more annoyed by the dirt and discomfort of the cottage as it affected her own convenience, than moved by the evident misery of its occupants. As these thoughts passed through his mind, the manner of Edward became more and more contrained—and when, at a late hour, they arrived at their place of destination; it was a relief to both to separate.

Fatigued as he was that night, Edward Hamilton could not sleep. He had retired at an early hour to his apartment, which was at the back part of the house, and the window of which overlooked the back portico. The night was warm, and he sat at the open window, hoping that the air would cool his fevered temples and calm his nerves, which had been irritated by the events of the day. He had sat but a few minutes when he heard voices below, and the sound of his own name uttered in the voice of Cecilia Herbert, caused him involuntarily to pause. The speakers were Miss Herbert and another young lady, who were promenading the portico arm-in-arm.

"Well, Cecilia," said her companion, "has he come to the point yet?"

"No, indeed! I think he is further from it than ever. I thought this morning he was going to say something to the purpose, but just as he opened his lips, his horses took fright, and I thought we should have been dashed to pieces."

"And that, I suppose," said Miss Milton, laughing, "scared away his love, did it?"

"No; but unfortunately as we passed a miserable hovel, near which a group of dirty children were playing, one of them fell down, and the carriage passed over her. The child was carried into the house, and we followed as soon as we could get out of the carriage. You never saw such a miserable, dirty looking place. I could scarcely bear to remain in it for an instant, and the bed on which they laid the wounded girl, was so disgusting that I would not have gone near it for the world. I dont know what Hamilton wished or expected from me, but something that I did, or something that I omitted to do, has offended him, for he has been cold and reserved ever since. For my part, I believe he fell in love with the mother."

Edward heard no more. Sick and disgusted, he retired from the window, and endeavoured to lose in sleep the remembrance of his unhappiness. Early on the ensuing morning, (having written an apology to his friend, and given it to the servant who attended him,) he left the house, and was several miles distant before its inmates had arisen. Edward travelled rapidly, for he was anxious both to escape from his own thoughts, and to ascertain the situation of the child who had been injured. Upon entering the cottage, he was sensible of a great improvement in its appearance. The room in which the little girl lay was perfectly clean—the little bed was hung with white dimity curtains, and covered with a delicate white counterpane. The windows were furnished with blinds which admitted the air, while they excluded the glare of the sun—altogether the apartment wore an aspect of neatness and comfort which contrasted strongly with its appearance on the preceding day. Edward attributed this change to the exertions of Dr. Willis, and inwardly blessing the kind physician, he proceeded to inquire into the situation of the patient. She was better, much better, and comparatively free from pain. As Edward was addressing some enquiries to Mrs. Ross, the mother, the doctor entered,

"I am glad to see that your patient is better, doctor," said our hero, "and I thank you from my heart for the kind and efficient manner in which you have executed my wishes;" and he glanced, as he spoke, round the neat and cheerful looking chamber.

"You are mistaken, my good sir," answered the worthy physician; "with the best intentions in the world, I could not have effected so great a change in so short a time. This has been the work of fairer hands than mine, though I will not deny that I had some agency in the matter. Immediately on leaving here yesterday evening, I was sent for to attend a sick servant at Col. Howard's, and after prescribing for her I related to Miss Howard the accident which had befallen our little friend here. She came here soon after, and took measures to make the situation of poor little Mary as comfortable as the circumstances would admit. She did more. She watched by her bedside all night, and with her own hands administered the necessary medicines, and by her soothing attentions contributed to restore the sufferer to composure. I think," he added, with energy, "it is scarcely exaggeration to say, that woman is an angel."

"She is indeed an angel of mercy," said Mrs. Ross, "and Mary may have cause to bless the accident which brought her to our house."

"Does Col. Howard live in the neighborhood?" asked Edward.

"He does," replied the doctor; "he has lately removed here, I think not more than a month ago; and the poor people have already reason to be thankful to the Providence which brought him and his lovely daughter to reside among them."

At this moment a tap was heard at the door, and a lady entered the apartment.

"Ah, Miss Howard," said the doctor, respectfully presenting the seat from which he had arisen, "allow me to name Mr. Hamilton to you."

"I believe I had the honour of knowing Miss Howard before," said Edward, with a feeling of respect very different from that with which he had been accustomed to think of 'poor little Adeline Howard.'

She frankly extended her hand to meet the offered one of her old acquaintance, and enquired with affectionate solicitude after the health and welfare of his mother. She then passed to the bedside of the wounded child, and bending over it, she spoke a few cheering words, and produced a small basket of choice fruit. As she stood there, Edward fixed his eyes upon her, and saw that three years had indeed produced an alteration. When he had last seen her, she was a timid, unformed, bashful girl. Now she was a graceful, dignified woman, though modesty and reserve were still the characteristics of her manner. Her person was tall and perfectly formed, and her features were regular and beautiful, though her complexion lacked brilliancy, and her dark grey eyes neither sparkled with vivacity nor melted with tenderness; but shone only with the mild and tempered light of benevolence and intellect. Edward sighed as he remembered the splendid orbs on which he had so lately loved to gaze, and before he recovered himself, Miss Howard had left the cottage. He then recollected, that as the friend of his mother, he ought to have paid her the respect of attending her home, and he determined that as he meant to take up his abode in the neighboring village till Mary Ross had entirely recovered from the effects of her accident, he would on the ensuing morning pay his respects to Adeline and her father. He did so, and being pressed to remain to dinner, he complied, and in the evening he attended Adeline on a visit to the cottage of Mrs. Ross. He was surprised at the close of the day to find how little time he had to be miserable. On the succeeding morning Col. Howard returned his visit, and Edward found his village residence so dull that he could not refuse to return home with the old gentleman.

Gradually little Mary recovered, yet still Edward lingered in the neighborhood. What detained him there? He did not know, nor did he pause to enquire. Sufficient for him that he was happy there; not with the tumultuous feelings which had so lately agitated his breast, but with a feeling of deep and quiet happiness which was as new as it was delightful to him. It is said that hearts are most easily caught on the rebound. This may be true, yet it was not till many months of intimate association had convinced him of the worth of Adeline Howard, that Edward owned to himself that he loved her with a depth and tenderness far exceeding all that he had felt before. He had learned to distinguish true sensibility from that, which, venting itself in sighs and tears over imaginary sorrows, turns with disgust from real suffering, and is too exquisite to come into contact with distress for the purpose of relieving it. When he saw that Adeline, though delicate in her habits, and refined in her tastes, shrunk not from witnessing any misery which could be alleviated by her presence, he felt that hers was a heart with which his own could fully sympathize. He did not love in vain. Adeline became his happy wife, and his mother welcomed with delight the only woman she had ever seen whom she thought worthy to be the bride of her son.

THE MESSIAH.

When first born nations looked through distant time,
And future years before them swiftly pass'd,
Nations with pomp and kingly pride came forth,
To rule the world, then sunk into the tomb—
And other nations rose, and slept in death.
Far down in time, like ocean's wandering waves,
New kings commenced their reign, new poets sung—
New prophets lived, and birds and beasts were slain,
To testify the death of Him "to come."
Like one who on the shore of ocean stands,
When the blue waves lie still, and pendant stars
At twilight gild the main, till the pale moon,
With broader beams, comes forth upon the deep,
And last of all the sun lights up the day—
So ancient seers look'd out on time's broad sea.
First in the shadowy distance, scarcely seen,
While age on age, like wave on wave, flowed on,
They just discerned, through mists of centuries,
The "promised seed"—the appointed Shiloh crowned.
Tracing the opening vista, they beheld
An era of increasing light and joy;
Beyond, far down, an age of darkness lay—
An age of terror and the reign of death.
Few prophets lived, few poets sung, few fires
Were burning on the altar of the Lord,
And they but dimly, till like oilless lamps,
Their beams expired and left the world in night.
Intently through the years of fearful gloom,
They traced long shadows, reaching down—half down
The day of time; at length, like passing clouds
Before the sun, they vanished in the light
Of Bethlehem's star, which shed his efficient beams
O'er the world's gloom, gilding the hoary locks
Of coming years, with hues like those which crown
Angelic forms in the bright realms of bliss.
At length the day long promis'd and desir'd,
Arrived, fulfilling ancient prophecies.
Earth slept, unconscious of its destiny,
Not knowing the Messiah was at hand.
Calm was the air, serene the cloudless heaven,
When rose in brilliancy the star whose beams
The wise men guided to the infant King.
Mute was the shepherd throng, and prostrate, while
They wondered and adored. Silent their flocks—
And silent all, except the vocal spheres,
Where angels, with loud, bursting melodies,
In strains of rapture sung "Good will to man,
On earth be peace and universal joy;
For unto him is born a Saviour, who
Is Christ the Lord—whose reign shall never end—
Whose name shall be Immanuel—God with us!"
They, listening, not in vain, but full of faith,
With joyful haste, to Bethlehem repair,
Approach the manger, and the lowly couch,
Where, with rich gifts, they bow themselves before
The infant Majesty of heaven and earth.

THE GLEANER.

BY MISS POWER.

Midnight had tolled from the church-tower of the quiet little hamlet of Ashley; all around was silent as the lowly graves that clustered about the old, gothic, ivy-clad church itself, whose dark shadow swallowed up in obscurity half the tombs on one side, while those on the other lay bathed in a flood of light, that the yellow harvest moon poured down upon them, making each humble name, each simple inscription of love and piety graved on the headstones, legible as at noon. From the latticed window of a small cottage that stood in the midst of its little garden, somewhat apart from the other houses of the village, the light—the only one visible—gleamed brightly; and now and then the casement opened gently, and a female head might be seen stretched forth with an expectant and somewhat anxious air; at length the sound of a footstep struck upon the ear of the watcher, and in a few seconds there appeared the figure of a man wrapt in a large cloak, and bearing some burden in his arms. The woman hastily closed the lattice and met the stranger at the door, which she carefully closed as soon as he had entered.

"Is your husband at home, Mary?" he inquired.

"No, sir," she replied; "he heard that the poachers were likely to be about the new plantation tonight, so he went with the blood-hound to watch for them."

"Then to your care," said the stranger, "I confide this charge;" and, as he spoke, he threw off his cloak and laid a new-born infant in the woman's arms.—"I know," he continued, "that you will tend it fondly and carefully—that you will, indeed, be a second mother to it; but remember," he added, emphatically, "remember, no word, no hint, must ever escape either you or your husband, as to how this child came to your care. You will tell your neighbours, as we have already agreed, that it is the orphan of your cousin who died at Winchester. You will rear it, in every particular, as if it were your own; and on the first day of each month you will receive a sum more than sufficient to defray whatever expense it may entail upon you: but, however, I have arranged all that with your husband. You will have the child christened Ellen, and it will of course bear the surname of your cousin. Now farewell—one kiss for the poor little stranger, who will, I am sure, never feel the want of a mother while under your care."

"That it never shall, sir!" replied the young woman, earnestly; and even were it not for your sake, Mr. Edward, I should love it tenderly, because it comes to supply the place of my poor little Willy;" and, as she spoke, she fondly pressed the slumbering infant to her breast.

Satisfied with this assurance, the young man threw his cloak around him and departed.

"God bless him!" said Mary, as the door closed after the visitor; "a finer or a better lad never broke bread. But this is a strange business. I suppose the child must be his: but who can the mother be?—Ah, I warrant," she continued, looking at the fine cambric wrapper of the infant, "that none but gentle blood flows in its veins. Poor little one! many a tear has that mother shed over you this night, I know: it must have been a hard necessity that forced her to part with you almost as soon as she became possessed of you; but God knows that however she may miss you, you shall never miss her while I live!" and, as the young woman fondly kissed her little nurseling, she felt half consoled for the loss of her own infant, which had died a short time previously.

Mary Graham had lived, from the age of sixteen, as nursery-maid in the family of Sir Edward Harrington, the proprietor of Ashley Park. Her good looks, good temper, and good conduct, had gained her the favour of all the household; and when, at twenty-three, she had left her situation to marry the head game-keeper of Sir Edward, her master had given the young couple the prettiest and most comfortable cottage in the village, which, with a considerable portion of the surrounding country, belonged to him. Since her marriage, which had occurred about two years previous to the commencement of our tale, her kind patrons had ever continued their protection and good will towards her. Seldom did a day pass by without some of the younger members of the family finding their way to Mary's cottage. Her husband, too, was in high favour; and deep consultations were often held between him and the elder sons of Sir Edward, upon the important points of rearing dogs, making artificial flies, &c., in all of which subjects he was deeply learned.

Sir Edward Harrington had many excellent qualities: he was generous, sincere, kind, and considerate, to his inferiors and dependents; a fond and indulgent husband and father, and a firm and true friend; but his pride was extreme, his enmities deep and lasting; in proportion to his attachment to those he loved, was his aversion to those he hated; and though not prone to take offence, yet, when once aggrieved, he never forgave the offender. At college he had had a violent quarrel with a young man named Vane, who had been his schoolfellow and friend, and whose family seat adjoined that of Sir Edward's father; from that time the two young men had never spoken, and though, when in after years each succeeded to his paternal estate, Mr. Vane (on whose side the quarrel had commenced) made some attempts at reconciliation, the haughty and implacable spirit of his former friend rendered him deaf to all such overtures; and he, in his turn, being disgusted at this obstinacy, the breach became wider than ever.

Sir Edward's family consisted of five children, three sons and two daughters. Charles, the eldest, had completed his twenty-third year, and Edward was just of age; the other children, the offspring of a second marriage, were considerably younger.

Mr. Vane had but one child, a daughter, verging on that lovely age, eighteen, whose mother had died in giving her birth. Accustomed from her childhood to the most perfect liberty, Laura Vane was necessarily a little spoiled, and had no idea that her will was ever likely to be disputed by her doting father; not that she was disposed to try the point, for she was tenderly attached to him; and, naturally good-tempered and affectionate, though high-spirited, she was ever fond and gentle to her father.

On the occasion of a royal birth-day, a grand subscription-ball took place at the country town, some few miles from the estates of Sir Edward Harrington and Mr. Vane, at which both families appeared. It was Laura's first ball, and radiant with joy and delight, she certainly looked very lovely; all eyes were directed to her, as, with the step of a sylph, she moved through the crowd of dancers. Among the most earnest of the gazers was Charles Harrington: he had heard of the beautiful heiress, and had seen her as a child, but as no intercourse had ever taken place between even the younger members of the two families, she was a perfect stranger to him.—But love and youth despise the variances of hate and age; and, to shorten our tale, the two young people, somehow or other, struck up an acquaintance, and fell desperately in love: then came interference on the part of the parents, angry altercations, tears, &c.; in a word, the course of their true love ran as crooked as it was possible for it to run;—and thus matters continued for upwards of a year, when Laura, while staying at the house of a friend, was taken dangerously ill, and, in spite of all that could be done to save her, expired within two days of the first attack. Charles Harrington left England on the death of the object of his affections, and after a few years his family lost all traces of him; and the unhappy Vane, almost broken-hearted by the loss of his only child, gradually pined away in his lonely wretchedness, and died not many months after his daughter.

Ten years flew by, and considerable changes had taken place at Ashley. Sir Edward had been dead some months, his second son had got an appointment in India, Charles was still abroad, no one knew where, and Lady Harrington and her younger daughter (the elder being married, and her son at college,) were the only occupants of the once gay and hospitable mansion. Graham, the husband of our old friend Mary, had fallen into ill-health, and was no longer able to perform his duty as game-keeper.—While Sir Edward was alive, he had allowed this faithful servant a comfortable maintenance; but since his death this had been withdrawn; and though Lady Harrington and her daughter assisted them most kindly, they were no longer in the same flourishing circumstances as formerly. The sum for the support of little Ellen had for the first three or four years been punctually remitted, but since then had never been received, so that she was now, instead of being a means of support, a burden to them: but as such they never for a moment considered her; she was indeed to them as a dearly beloved and cherished daughter; and her sweet and gentle disposition, her warm heart, and fair and intelligent face, rendered her a fit object of love and interest, not only to her adopted parents, but to the inhabitants of the village, who had ever a kind word or a simple gift for the little, quiet and somewhat shy child, whose gentle manners and fair face made them almost unconsciously feel that she was superior to the children around her.

In harvest time, little Ellen would go forth to the fields to glean, and, somewhat apart from her young companions, pursue her task, singing to herself, in a soft under-tone, some of the ballads Mary Graham had been wont to sing to her in her early childhood. Many a handful of corn was dropped in her path by the kind-hearted reapers, so that, like Ruth, her gleanings ever far exceeded those of her juvenile neighbours.

One day, having collected a rich harvest of wheat, and being moreover laden with a can of new milk, which the wife of the farmer to whom the field belonged had given her to take home, our little heroine, somewhat fatigued by the heat and the weight of her burden, sat down on a rustic bench close to the lane which led to her home. The song of the birds, the distant voices of the reapers, the murmur of the honey-bee, all the sounds of summer were wafted to her ear; the balmy breeze waved her rich hair, the sunshine lay on all around, wild flowers peeped up from the bank, and the child fell into a happy trance, which was only broken by the sound of a strange voice, inquiring if John Graham still lived in the cottage by the church. Our little dreamer was broad awake in a moment; and, with a deep blush and a curtsey, replied in the affirmative, adding, that she lived there too, and offering to show the way to the gentleman, (for such the stranger evidently was.)

"What!" he exclaimed, "you live there?—What is your name?—Is it Ellen Grey?" and upon receiving an affirmative from the astonished child, he clasped her in his arms, pressed her to his heart, and, mid smiles and tears, called her his child!

And now, at last, was Mary Graham informed as to the parentage of her nurseling: Charles, now Sir Charles Harrington, was the father of the little Ellen, and Laura Vane the mother. Finding that there was no hope of gaining the consent of their parents to their union, they had entered into a private marriage, of which the only witnesses were Edward Harrington and a Mrs. Ellerton, a young widow, who, though a few years older than Laura, had been for years her only friend and confidante; who had been present at Ellen's birth, and who closed the eyes of the ill-fated young mother.

Sir Charles Harrington never entered into a second marriage, so that our little gleaner is now one of the richest heiresses, perhaps, in England, being already in possession of the Vane estate, which she holds in right of her mother, and also entitled to the reversion of Ashley Park, with all lands, tenements, &c., thereunto belonging. John and Mary Graham, though falling into the sere and yellow leaf, are "as happy as the day is long,"—never weary of chanting the praises of "their child, Miss Ellen," such being the titles by which they connect their parental feelings, and their respect; and looking forward eagerly to the time when their cares may be employed by a grand-child, Lady Ellen,—which, entre nous, gentle reader, may not be very far off, as there is a certain Lord Al——, but it is not fair to tell a secret that has been confided to us.

Uncle Edward has made a splendid fortune in India, and is coming home to find a wife to help him to spend it in England; for myself, I doubt not that he will succeed.

THE MASTER HAND.

BY MRS. NORTON.

And dost thou say my heart is cold,
Because thine eye cannot discover
(As round its jealous glance is rolled
On glittering crowds) one welcome lover?
And dost though think I cannot love,
Because thy suit my lips reprove?

Oh, valueless the wind-harp's tone,
Which, swept by Summer's careless breezes,
Gives forth a wild, uncertain moan,
As often as the zephyr pleases.
Who marks its faint and careless sigh?
Once heard, it has no melody.

But when the stricken lyre, which long
Hath hung upon the wall decaying,
Breathes out its soul of love and song,
Obedient to the minstrel's playing,
And to its master's touch alone
Responds with loud and plaintive tone,—

Then, then the power of Music breaks
The spell that bound our calmer feeling,
And every slumbering passion wakes
In answer to its wild appealing;
'Till then our swoll'n hearts, too full for words,
Die trembling on those quivering chords.

Years bring no change. Even tho' we stand
Where cold the minstrel's form is lying,
Fancy shall see that skilful hand
Once more among the sweet strings flying;
And Music's floating notes shall come,
And mock the silence of the tomb.

And many an hour and many a day,
Shall Memory please herself by bringing
Small scattered fragments of the clay
That hung upon that wild harp's ringing—
Though Summer breeze caress in vain,
And soulless hands awake no strain.

Even so the heart, that, sad and cold,
Warms not beneath thy careless wooing,
Hath known Love's power in days of old,
And worshipped—to its own undoing,
And many a passion, quiet now,
Hath glowed upon my faded brow.

And still, perchance, the day may come,
When, from its halls of silence taken,
That heart, in its deserted home,
To life and love and joy shall waken.
It hath the Music at command;
But thine is not the master's hand.

THE OLD COAL MAN.

[FROM THE ELLWOOD PAPERS.]

The few cold days we had early in the fall made fires necessary, and as we had not yet laid in our winter's supply of fuel, it became necessary to get a single ton of coal.

As soon as the load was thrown down before the door, a gray headed old man, lame in one leg, presented himself, and asked if he might put the coal away in the cellar. His face was all begrimed, and his clothes black with coal dust. In one hand he held a shovel, and in the other a basket.

"How much do you charge?" I asked.

"A quarter dollar, ma'am," he replied, in a respectful tone, touching his hat as he spoke.

"Very well," I replied, "you may put it away." And I returned to my room, which looked out upon the street. On glancing out, as I seated myself by the window, I saw that the old man had a fellow laborer, who looked as old, as poor, and as dirty as himself. The sight of these two old men, toiling for their shilling a-piece, with their heavy baskets of coal, touched my feelings. I thought of my own gray-headed father, whom I loved with filial tenderness, and imagination pictured him in the condition of the two men at work beneath my window. My heart turned from the picture with a shudder, but I could not help looking down at the men, and the sight of them kept my thoughts busy.

"What a poor pittance it is that these men toil for," I said to myself. "How eagerly they work, as if the reward of their labor was to be a hundred dollars, instead of the eighth of a single dollar a-piece. Can it not," I asked, as my feelings became more and more interested, "to pay them more than the price agreed upon?"

"But why do that?" I argued with myself, "twenty-five cents a ton is the regular price for putting away coal. No one expects more. That is their price, and they are satisfied with it."

"That may be," I reasoned in turn. "But why are they satisfied? Because they can get no more. Twenty-five cents a ton has been fixed as a fair compensation, and it is useless to ask more."

"Well," I opposed, "and why has this price been settled on as a fair one? Simply, because it is really worth no more to perform the amount of labor required to put away a ton of coal. A man can do it alone in less than an hour, and twenty-five cents an hour is good wages for a labouring man. Working ten hours a day, he would earn two dollars and a half a day, or fifteen dollars a week."

"But," my benevolent feelings urged against this, "a coal man cannot, of course, get ten hours' work a day at putting in coal, or even five hours."

"How do you know that?" said prudence. "You don't know any thing about how much work he can get. A great many tons of coal are bought in a large city like this. No doubt these men make a great deal of money. They seem content enough with their wages, at least, and, of course, they are the best judges of its sufficiency."

"Well, perhaps it is all so," I returned, mentally, lifting my eyes as I spoke, and glancing at the two old men below, who had nearly finished their task. "But they dont look as if they earned five dollars a week, much less fifteen. A quarter between the two! Indeed it seems like too little. I really feel ashamed to offer it. How many, many quarters, and halves, and even dollars, do I spend in self-indulgence, while these poor old men have few of the comforts of life. And now I am arguing with myself against the justice of paying them a fairer compensation for their labor, than that for which I agreed. The fact is, we are very nice in our bargains with the poor, holding them strictly to the minimum of compensation, while upon ourselves we lavish all kinds of expensive indulgencies. In the morning we will chaffer with a poor sempstress, cook, chamber-maid, white-washer or porter, about a sixpence—and in the afternoon spend ten or twenty dollars foolishly. A dollar thrown away upon self-indulgence, costs us not a pang. But sixpence more to a poor dependant, than just happens to suit our vascillating ideas of economy, gives us an hour's uneasiness and self-reproaches.—The fact is, I'll give the old men a quarter a-piece. That is little enough."

To oppose this resolution, came the thought, that if I gave them more than they asked, I would do them really more harm than good. That the good which a shilling a piece would do them, would be no kind of a compensation for the disappointment they would experience in not getting a like advance at other places. The fact of having been better paid here than usual, would naturally lead them to think about increased pay elsewhere. They would no longer be content with the regular price. And to take content from the poor man, would be to do him the greatest possible harm.

While I thus thought, a domestic came into the room, to say that the coal was all in the cellar. For one moment I hesitated, and then handed over a single quarter of a dollar. As I did so, I felt a slight pang. The servant left the room, and I again glanced out of the window. The two old men were patiently awaiting the reward of their labor. Cool as the day was, their work had started the perspiration, and they stood with bared heads, wiping their soiled faces; their thin gray locks waving in the wind. My heart was touched at the sight, and I half uttered the name of my domestic aloud, under the impulse I felt to recall her, and double the coal men's compensation. But I restrained myself. In a few minutes it was too late to put my good intentions into practice.

I was not satisfied with myself. Try as I would, I could not drive from my mind the image of the old man who applied for the privilege of earning a shilling. To me an extra shilling would have been of no consequence—to him it might have proved a blessing. I felt that I had been guilty of grinding the poor—not in thoughtless adoption of social customs, but deliberately and of set purpose. I had saved a quarter of a dollar, but at the expense of a troubled conscience. At last I succeeded in driving these unpleasant thoughts from my mind. Friends whom I loved came in, and in pleasant converse new images arose, and new affections came into play. One of these friends wore a neat ornament that pleased me very much. It cost three dollars. So well did it suit my fancy, that I commissioned my husband on the next morning to procure me a similar one. He did so. But before I had an opportunity to wear it in company, I was led once more to think of my old coal man.

Two or three mornings after that on which our ton of coal was bought, my eye lit upon a few brief paragraphs in the newspaper which evidently alluded to the lame old man who had excited my unfruitful sympathy. He was dead. A blood vessel had been ruptured during a fit of coughing, and he had died of suffocation. The paragraph went on to state that he had left a wife and four little children who had been solely dependent upon his daily labor for food. They were now in distress and destitution. He who had loved them had been suddenly removed from them. The fatherless and the widow were left in want and desolation. An earnest appeal to the sympathies of the public followed.

I threw the newspaper aside—put on my shawl and bonnet—took my purse from a drawer, and hurriedly left the house. A brisk walk of half an hour, brought me to a comfortless row of tenements near the Schuylkill. In an upper room of one of these, I found a middle aged Irish woman, in feeble health, with four children. A question or two brought out a gush of native pathos, that drew tears from my eyes. The style and eloquence of her lamentations for her lost "mon," showed her heart to be full of deep tenderness—and that her loss was truly irreparable. I found her very poor—actually in want of the most common necessaries of life. To a question or two about her husband, she replied—

"Och, indade, ma'am, and my poor John was a hard working mon, when he could get it to do, and didn't drink a drop. But he had been out of work nearly all summer—and hard enough has it been to get even praties for the childther. And now, just as the coal time had come on, and he was beginning to get something to do, he has died—och hone!"

"How much could he make in this way?" I asked, after her new burst of grief had subsided.

"Never more than three or four dollars a week, unless sometimes when the gentlemen favored him, and give him a little something more than the regular price for putting away their coal. But this was not often. Rich people don't think much about our wants. They would make us work for them for nothing if we would do it. John often came home angry, because, he said, that even after he had earned his money, it was begrudged to him."

The woman spoke with bitterness. I felt that there was too much justice in what she said—and that I was not altogether guiltless. I emptied my purse before leaving her meagrely furnished room, and went away I trust a wiser woman.

LIFE'S LESSON SHOULD BE.

BY B. HALLECK.

Forget not—regret not
The joys that have fled,
Though sweeter and fleeter
Than fresh odors shed
From the jessamine's cup,
Or the bright chalice hid
From the gaze of the sun
'Neath the violet's lid.

Forget not—regret not:
Hope ever should burn
The incense of love
In her funeral urn.
Shedding glory and light
O'er the gems of the past,
By time on the altar
Of memory cast.

Forget not—regret not,
Why should we regret,
While one star remains,
That another has set?
And though all may have faded,
Others brighter by far,
Through the gloom may arise
Than one once worship'd star.

Forget not—regret not:
Life's lesson should be
Like the stars that are hung
O'er the limitless sea,
A guide to our path,
Bright links of the chain,
To lead us and bind us
To virtue again.

THE COQUETTE.

A TALE OF THE WORLD.

Chapter I.

MRS. CHETWYND'S DRAWING-ROOM.

"My child," said Mrs. Chetwynd to her lovely daughter, as they were both seated in that lady's luxuriantly furnished drawing-room, in one of the most fashionable streets of London, "do, for one moment, attend to me; I wish to speak seriously to you on your present condition. Whilst I live all will be well, but when I die you will be destitute—absolutely destitute. I have, as you well know, only a life interest in your poor father's estate, and instead of having saved something out of my income for your future maintenance, I have always been unable to make it do, and now I am deeply in debt. Had Heaven blessed me with a son, then this economy would have been unnecessary, but as it is, your cousin Cramner got every thing there was to leave, and you nothing. Do then, dear Emilia, make up your mind, whilst the opportunity is allowed you, to procure for yourself a good husband and a comfortable home.—You are pretty well educated, and with pleasing manners. You are, or rather have been, the fashion; and had you chosen, you might long before this have been a happy and envied wife."

"Happy, mother," interrupted the daughter, as she raised her fair head from her embroidery frame; "happy! what with that odious and horrid Mr. Smith, or that no less disgusting Sir John Beaumaris?"

"And why not," resumed Mrs. Chetwynd, gravely; "Mr. Smith, as far as I know—and for weeks he was here almost daily—was anything but odious and horrid. His person was good—his manners, though rather unformed, were not vulgar—his estate was far greater than you could have any pretensions to share, and"—

"His name, too, was so pleasant," added the daughter.

"I have yet to learn, Emilia," resumed the other, "that having a common or ugly name, is a sufficient reason for refusing an agreeable man. Name! oh, my child, be not so thoughtless. But Sir John, his name surely was good enough for you, and his rank sufficiently high; what can you allege against him?"

"Oh, a thousand things. In the first place is he not old enough to be my father?"

"Hardly; he, I think, Emilia, was thirty-eight, and you one and twenty."

"But he was grave enough and cross enough; and oh, mother, I would rather die an old maid than marry such a man. No, my husband must be far different from either Mr. Smith or Sir John Beaumaris.—Let me see, he must be young, handsome, agreeable, travelled, rich, and talented; must have a good house in town, (not a box like this), a villa at Richmond, a mansion in the country, and an old castle in Scotland; then his name must be a good one, his family high, and his descent noble. I should prefer a peer, of course, but I should not, I think, on reflection, refuse such a man even though he were a commoner; and now, mamma, you know what your future son-in-law is to be like."

"Nay—nay," was the answer, "such a one you will never gain. But, child, I foresee your doom—an old maid, destined to wear out life as a 'companion' to some cross and tyrannical woman; hated by your inferiors, scorned by your employers, and tormented with the constant reflection, that, had you taken your parent's advice, your lot, instead of being thus miserable, would have been most happy. You think me wrong, now, Emilia, but the time will soon come, when you will bitterly remember this conversation."

And the tears came in the affectionate, though imprudent mother's eyes, as she thus sketched her darling daughter's future fate.

But that daughter would not believe her assertions, would take no heed of her warnings, and blinded by her own foolishness and vanity of heart, persisted in believing that ere long she should, by a brilliant marriage, falsify her tiresome mother's gloomy predictions.

A certain Lady St. Philip now entered the apartment, and in the gossip of the day, their previous conversation was soon forgotten, at least by the beautiful, scheming, and heartless girl.

Chapter II.

THOUGHTS AT THE TOILET.

As Emilia sat at her toilet that night, the words of her mother again recurred to her.

"But impossible," she murmured, as she surveyed her lovely features in the bright mirror before her; "is it possible that such can be my destined fate?—Am I really to die an old maid?—no, no; this speaking glass tells me otherwise, and the world, whenever I enter its charmed circles, unless it flatters me too greatly, assures me that I have only to ask, and I shall have immediately. A companion! horrible idea. I remember last summer old Lady Helmenie's telling me all about the miseries and torments she had to endure in seeking for a companion, and she, I can easily imagine, could inflict as well as receive all her troubles. There was poor Miss Saye, too, she went out as a companion, and died, I understand, in her very first place. But, however, I must endeavor to attract one of my numerous admirers, and get him to the point. Let me see, who is there amongst them who possesses all those requisites I asked for this morning—the Duke of Glenmorris; ah, he is too high a prize for me; besides, he was offended last week with me, because I laughed at his fine speeches. Lord Villehapton! hum—I could not object to him, but I have no chance there. Sir Peter Penmuire! he is a blockhead; besides, I am not sure that he has a villa, and a villa I will have. Sir Claude Cremorne! ah, he is a darling, but then he is so dissipated; besides, he is a coxcomb, and always seems to think that every one is dying for him, and such a man I cannot bear. Well, who is there left? Only, I protest, Colonel Fitz Spencer, and poor Mr. Clanwilliam; and one of these two it must be, and now which? —The Colonel has an uncle a baronet, and if by any lucky chance his two gawky sons should die, then after the old man is gone, the Colonel would be Sir Henry. Now, I have no objection to him; he is not very good looking to be sure; but then I believe mamma was almost right in what she said, and I must not expect too much. And lastly, this Mr. Clanwilliam; what can I say for him? Which is the better prize of the two? Both, I think, are about equal, and so I will leave it to chance to decide. To-night I shall, I know, meet them both, and it shall not be my fault, if one of them, at least, does not before long pop the question."

Thus far had she thought, when her maid's question as to whether "she would wear the blue crape or the primrose satin," effectually changed the current of her ideas, and she was soon busily engaged in the mysteries of the toilet.

Chapter III.

THE TWO LOVERS.

And so she went and met them; but alas! for her hopes, neither that night, in spite of all her attractions (and, to tell the truth, she had never looked more beautiful), nor in the course of the next few months, could she draw a "declaration" from either of the two gentlemen. Both seemed suddenly to have grown prudent and cold, and both evidently cared but little for all her charms.

For the Colonel there was, however, some slight hope remaining, for if he did not show her much affection, yet he testified none to any other woman; but for Mr. Clanwilliam, all hope was now over, for he had openly joined in the admiration of a new and most lovely belle, and was, if report spoke true, deeply smitten with the fair beauty.

In the meantime the season passed away—the last ball of the season was danced—the last dinner eaten—the last scandal discussed—and people only waited for Parliament's breaking up, to betake themselves to the country and all its attractions; and still nothing was done in the way of procuring a husband for Emilia.

Mrs. Chetwynd talked on, but her daughter paid no attention to her discourse, and when at last they left London to pay a visit to the hospitable house of an old friend at S——, it was with a sinking heart, and a sad apprehension, that the former thought upon her declining health, and of the rapidly approaching time when her thoughtless child must be left alone to bear the scorn and hatred of a world that hath no compassion for poverty or want, and that only loveth wealth, and rank, and station.

Chapter IV.

THE LAST CHANCE.

Still there was a chance: for amongst the many guests whom they met at S——, was the same Sir John Beaumaris whom Emilia had refused with so much scorn the year before; and still willing, too, he appeared to forget all her former coldness, and again to ask her to be his richly portioned wife. And after many long and serious discourses on the subject, the foolish girl was actually nearly persuaded that it would be advisable for her to give the baronet that encouragement which she well knew would be all he wanted to enable him to propose again, when, unluckily, (or should we not say luckily!) Colonel Fitz Spencer suddenly appeared again upon the stage—and henceforth the baronet's doom was fixed.

What! marry him? when she could have the charming Fitz Spencer, only by a little exertion on her part? No, never! And in spite of all her mother's admonitions, she at once, and without ceremony, made the truth evident to Sir John—and he, as he well might be, disgusted with her conduct, soon left her to her fate; and within a very short time married a girl, who, though not beautiful, and a belle, was yet modest, amiable, and affectionate.

It almost seemed as though the Colonel read the secrets of the coquette's heart, for he continued to lure her on as long as the baronet remained; but as soon as ever he was gone his attentions became less frequent, his manners grew colder, and she was very soon convinced that all her hopes from that quarter were in vain.

And thus the six weeks of their visit passed away. At the end of that time they left S——, for the house of another friend, where unfortunately there were no beaux for Emilia to captivate; and Christmas saw them once more in Baker street.

Mrs. Chetwynd day by day grew weaker, and was now assured that her time on earth was very short; whilst the sad knowledge that at her death her daughter would be quite destitute, affected her body as well as her mind—and rendered her less than ever capable of resisting the attacks of her insidious disease.

But Emilia, what said she? Was she sorry for her treatment of Sir John; and disappointed at his marriage with another? Probably in her heart she was, though she would never own it. But that she was irritated with Colonel Fitz Spencer, there could be no doubt; and in the bitterness of her feelings when she found how much he had deceived her, she first of all found and experienced the pangs of retributive justice—for she, that had so often deceived others, was deceived herself.

Thus, then, another year dawned, and found Emilia aged three and twenty, with waning beauty, (for time and distress of mind, aided by constant dissipation, had begun to produce their usual effects) a dying mother, and no lover at her decease to supply her with that home and protection she would so much stand in need of. Was she not, in spite of all her faults, to be pitied?

Chapter V.

THE PROPHECY FULFILLED.

"Who is that cross, disagreeable looking woman I saw with your aunt to-day?" said Lady Helena Carmane to Augusta Errington, as they were walking together in the spacious and beautiful park of Errington Court, one bright May morning last year.

"Who? Oh, only the companion," was the answer.

"And who is she—has she no name?"

"Yes, I believe so," said Miss Errington, with a laugh, (she had good teeth, and was therefore fond of laughter). "She is a Miss Chetwynd. But why do you ask? I am sure there is nothing wonderful in her appearance—not but what she is good enough for my aunt."

"Why, because I fancied I remembered her many years ago as a very lovely girl."

"Indeed, did you?" asked the other. "Well, she must be changed then, for now she is anything but lovely."

"Time alters all of us," replied Lady Helena in a grave tone, "and you, my young friend, will find that twenty years hence, you will not be quite so good looking as now."

The compliment to her present beauty was at least acceptable to the young lady's mind, and she went on to ask with some degree of interest for further information.

"Her's is a sad story, my dear. She might once have been the wife of my brother-in-law, Sir John Beaumaris. Indeed, so attached to her was he, that I believe he twice made her an offer of his hand."

"And she refused him?" asked Augusta, in wonder.

"Ah! you may think it strange now—but she was vain and foolish—and a coquette. No one was good enough for her, though she herself had not a penny: and so time went on, and at last her mother, who had a very good jointure, though she foolishly saved nothing of it, died, and left her child destitute.

"And then, what could she do? She had no friends, for her conduct had disgusted every one: and literally after Mrs. Chetwynd's funeral, and the furniture had been sold, she had not got fifty pounds in the world. I know this to be true, for Sir John, notwithing her bad treatment of him, still took some interest in her fortunes. Well, she tried for a place as companion, and after awhile succeeded. But she did not stay long at Lady St. Laurence's, for she was soon found out in a most violent flirtation with young Lord Isleforte, the heir. This of course would not do; so she was dismissed. What next became of her I do not know; but when I again heard of her, she was living with a deaf and almost blind lady in Kent, who kept no company, and never stirred from home. So you may imagine that was not a very pleasant situation. What a change, too, from her previous life, and how much she must have suffered when she thought (as she could not but think sometimes) of the opportunities she had thrown away, and of the station in life she might have held, had not her absurd pride and vanity stood in the way. Well, I suppose she kept there till old Mrs. Kerr died, for I saw her death in the papers this spring; and now I suddenly find her living with your aunt, Mrs. Bellew. And now you know her history. Would, poor thing, that she could recall the past—and then how differently would she act; but she chose her own way, and is now suffering from it."

"But was she really ever beautiful?" asked the young lady.

"To be sure, it is long ago, and she has had much to bear—but now she seems to be so grave and ill-tempered, I really wonder aunt can like to have her in the house. But then, she, too, is not the gayest, nor the best tempered—well, it is a sad story."

"It is so," was the answer. "And one from which we may all profit. But you ask whether Emilia Chetwynd was ever beautiful. I tell you I remember her one of the most lovely girls I ever met with. Do you recollect that curious old collar I showed you the other day, which you abused so much? Well, that was named after her the "Chetwynd," and for a time every body wore them. Ah! she was quite the fashion then—the belle of the day—and now—ah! Augusta, you see what she is come to."

And the kind-hearted lady sighed as she thought of the difference; and henceforth Miss Errington, remembering the past, treated her aunt's companion with less hauteur than she had formerly done.

Chapter VI.

HER FUTURE FATE.

Alas! that such should be the history of Emilia Chetwynd! But that it is true cannot be doubted—and that there are many others whose fate has been like hers, can as little be denied. Oh! that the young would beware; and that they would shun the character of a coquette, and let prudence, as well as love, guide them in their search for a husband.

But there are many—many Emilia Chetwynds in the world, and though some may not meet with so just a reward for their sins as she has done, yet that all in some measure are punished for their crime in after life is, and must be evident.

And now, at the age of thirty-eight, behold her—as fulfilling the repugnant office of "companion." Worse, far worse off than a servant, she has to bear with all the bad temper of her employer; is always expected to be useful to her—nay, is commanded to amuse her. She has no time of her own; she is allowed to express no wish contrary to Mrs. Bellew's likings or dislikings; is at any hour liable to be turned off without warning; and finally, should she ever struggle on till Mrs. Bellew's death—then, when that event takes place (and it cannot be long) she will once more have to seek her bread, and once more have to accommodate herself to the habits and wishes of her next employer.

Pity her we may; but we cannot in our hearts say that her lot is undeserved; and however much we may be tempted to exclaim against her punishment, yet must we remember that all these things were foretold her by her mother; and that, had she chosen, she could have avoided them all, and now have been a happy and beloved wife.

The Rainbow.

BY AMELIA.

I sometimes have thoughts in my loneliest hours,
That lie on my heart like the dew on the flowers,
Of a ramble I took one bright afternoon,
When my heart was as light as a blossom in June;
The green earth was moist with the late-fallen showers,
The breeze fluttered down and blew open the flowers,
While a single white cloud to its haven of rest,
On the white wing of peace, floated off in the west.

As I threw back my tresses to catch the cool breeze,
That scattered the rain-drops and dimpled the seas,
Far up the blue sky a fair rainbow unrolled
Its soft-tinted pinions of purple and gold;
'Twas born in a moment, yet, quick as its birth,
It had stretched to the uttermost ends of the earth,
And, fair as an angel, it floated all free,
With a wing on the earth, and a wing on the sea.

How calm was the ocean! how gentle its swell!
Like a woman's soft bosom it rose and it fell,
While its light sparkling waves, stealing laughingly o'er,
When they saw the fair rainbow kneit down on the shore
No sweet hymn ascended, no murmur of prayer,
Yet I felt that the spirit of worship was there,
And bent my young head in devotion and love,
'Neath the form of the angel that floated above.

How wide was the sweep of its beautiful wings!
How boundless its circle! how radiant its rings!
If I looked on the sky 'twas suspended in air,
If I looked on the ocean the rainbow was there;
Thus forming a girdle as brilliant and whole
As the thoughts of the rainbow that circled my soul—
Like the wing of the Deity, calmly unfurl'd,
It bent from the cloud and encircled the world.

There are mouents, I think, when the spirit receives
Whole volumes of thought on its unwritten leaves,
When the folds of the heart in a moment unclose
Like the innermost leaves from the heart of a rose;
And thus, when the rainbow had passed from the sky,
The thoughts it awoke were too deep to pass by;
It left my full soul like the wing of a dove,
All fluttering with pleasure, and fluttering with love.

know that each moment of rapture or pain
But shortens the links in life's mystical chain;
I know that my form, like that bow from the wave,
Must pass from the earth and lie cold in the grave;
Yet, oh! when death's shadows my bosom encloud,
When I shrink from the thought of the coffin and shroud,
May Hope, like the rainbow, my spirit enfold
In her beautiful pinions of purple and gold.

A Summer's Sunset.

O'er the bright bosom of the western sky
The radiant, gorgeous clouds of sunset lie,
And with their rich and varied dyes display
Their lustre borrowed from the orb of day
Whose dying rays reflected glory shed,
And beams still linger tho' that orb hath fled.
O! who could gaze on such a scene, and who
That sky, those rainbow-tinted clouds could view;
That drapery of heaven which oft the sun
Puts on when his diurnal race is run,
With heart unmoved, untouched by awe nor feel
Devotion's fervour o'er his bosom steal.
Here let the Painter at the sunset hour
In homage bow to him whose matchless power,
And skill transcendent o'er the heavens threw
That flare of light, those clouds of varied hue. ERASMUS.

The Earth is Beautiful.

BY CAROLINE GILMAN.

The whole broad earth is beautiful
To minds attuned aright,
And wheresoe'er my feet are turned,
A smile has met my sight.
The city with its bustling walk,
Its splendor, wealth, and power,
A ramble by the river side,
A passing summer flower.
The meadow green, the ocean swell,
The forest waving free,
Are gifts of God, and speak in tones
Of kindliness to me.
And oh, where'er my lot is cast,
Where'er my footsteps roam,
If those I love are near to me,
That spot is still my home.

THE FATAL SISTERS.

BY MRS. CAROLINE LEE HENTZ.

"Who are those three ladies dressed in black, in the corner of the room?" asked a young lady, who seemed the stranger guest, of another seated at her side.

"Why do you ask?" replied Louisa Marshall, the young lady addressed—"Do you find their appearance so attractive?"

"Not exactly attractive," answered Miss Warner; "but there is such a similitude in their figures, dress and demeanour, and they are so different from the rest of the company, I feel a curiosity, if not interest, concerning them."

"I will tell you all I know of them," replied Louisa, her eye brightening with pleasure, at an opportunity of indulging her ruling passion, observing too that a handsome young man, who was turning over the leaves of a Souvenir, was within hearing of her musical voice. "They are the three Misses Collins—of the maiden sisterhood—who live somewhere in the outskirts of the town, in a 'grand, gloomy, and peculiar' style. What brought them out in a fashionable circle to-night, I cannot divine; for I thought they never went any where except to church and the church-yard. They always dress in black, have that same solemn, changeless demeanor, those long, thin, unsmiling countenances, and deep set eyes."

"Perhaps they have met with deep afflictions," observed Miss Warner; "indeed their mourning dress indicates it."

"That may have been—as we have not resided here long, I know nothing of their past history.—Never having felt the same curiosity as yourself, respecting them, I always feel a chill creeping over me when I am about to meet them. I call them the Fatal Sisters, and I have no doubt, if you examine them closely, you will perceive the distaff of Clotho, the spindle of Lachesis, and the shears of Atropos, under the folds of their everlasting black dresses."

"Excellent," exclaimed a young man, who had been attracted near Louisa by the vivacity of her countenance, and the animation of her gestures. "It is one of the best things I ever heard in my life. I shall never look upon them again, without thinking of the Fatal Sisters. And now I think of it, there is a striking resemblance—only the starry robe and crown of stars are wanting."

Excited by applause, Louisa continued her sarcastic remarks till she had gathered around her a circle of apparently admiring listeners. She could not help glancing her eye towards the handsome stranger, who still stood a little aloof, with the book in his hand, but its pages no longer occupied his attention. She met a dark, fascinating, fixed gaze; but it was evidently the gaze of indignation, not of admiration. The cheek of the young man was flushed—he closed the book, and laying it on the table, with some precipitation, walked towards the corner were the Fatal Sisters were seated, and was soon engaged in earnest conversation with them.

"Who is that young man?" asked Miss Warner, with provoking calmuness, of the confused and blushing Louisa.

"I don't know," replied she, in a changed voice. "I never saw him before. He must be an acquaintance—perhaps friend or relative—of the Misses Collins. Who could have dreamed of such a thing? He looks so fashionable and high-bred, and they as if they had just issued from the tombs. He must have heard every word I uttered. I dare say he is repeating it to them at this moment. Well, if he is mean enough to do that, I don't care what he thinks of me."

But she did care a great deal, in spite of her expressed indifference, and she secretly resolved that she would never give play to her satirical spirit, within reach of a stranger's hearing. It was not long before she felt that her punishment was begun. She saw the lady of the house approach the young man, and by the direction of her eye, she knew she was asking him to be introduced to herself. A cold and polite bow of negation was returned, and she had the intense mortification of knowing her acquaintance was rejected. She learned, moreover, that his name was Woodville—that he was the nephew of the Misses Collins, and the son of their only married sister: for whose death they still wore the sable badge of mourning; that he possessed an independent fortune, with every advantage that nature and education could impart—and that, as the party was given in honor of his arrival, the lonely sisters had been induced to leave their almost vestal retirement, and appear for the first time, for many years, in a crowded and fashionable drawing room.

Louisa was silent and abstracted the remainder of the evening. She did not blush for her unkindness and levity, in levelling at unoffending strangers, the arrows of derision, but she throbbed with indignant shame, at being detected in the act. Accustomed to be admired, anxious to shine, desirous to secure the reputation of a wit as well as a beauty, Louisa considered herself one of those privileged beings, who may trample with impunity on the social rights of others, provided she could do it with a graceful step and brilliant smile. Personal satire is the easiest as well as the most wounding species of ridicule—and they who indulge in its exercise often become fearfully expert before they are aware of the keenness and power of the weapons they are using.

Young Woodville was not mean enough to repeat to his aunts the remarks of Louisa—but in all societies there are some who bear the amiable character of tattler—who listen and smile and gather up the venom of slander, that they may diffuse its poisonous influence. Through a medium like this, the Misses Collins were informed of the classical embellishments which the lively imagination of Louisa had thrown around their persons. Like all beings of delicate sensibility and retired habits, they were extremely sensitive to personal ridicule, and reproached themselves for being persuaded to depart from their usual quiet tenor, to be exposed to such indignities.

"I know we are no longer young and handsome," said Miss Collins, the eldest of the maiden sisters, after they had returned home, and were discussing the events of the evening; "and it was very foolish to place ourselves in contrast with youth and beauty. I believe all of Mrs. Gray's guests were young, but ourselves, and I have no doubt our sad countenances did throw a chill over the poor girl's spirits."

"You must not feel slighted, dear Arthur," said the second sister, in the same meek tone, "if we refuse all other invitations, while you are here. Even if this circumstance had not occurred, I should have returned weary and dejected. Had it not been for our presence, you might have derived pleasure from the very source which now causes you pain and displeasure—I regret this far more on your account than on ours."

"Yes," added Miss Esther Collins, the youngest of the three, with a smile, though a tear trembled in the corner of her eye; "we deserve the lesson, for the vanity which suffers from the wound; and I have no doubt the young lady herself reflects with pain on her conduct at least, she never intended it should reach our ears."

"I have as little respect for the young lady who listened only to betray, as for the one who could indulge in such unfeeling remarks," observed Arthur, whose indignation was somewhat softened by the recollection of Louisa's conscious blushes, and evident self-reproach. "I admired the beauty and graceful vivacity of the last, and it was the musical tone of her voice which first attracted my attention. But the lips which, cold and rancorous, distil the venom of satire, can have no charm for me, though sweet as the flowers of Hybla's scented field."

We have thus introduced the few personages who are actors in this moral sketch. Notwithstanding Louisa's regret, she could not erase the impression she had made, or prevent the repetition of the unfortunate witticism. The name of the Fatal Sisters was affixed to the three sad-dressed females, and even in their retired walks to the house of God, children were heard to whisper the soubriquet they did not understand. Several times Louisa resolved to write them a note of apology, but the fear that Arthur Woodville would believe it addressed to himself, rather than to them, restrained the expression of her penitence and shame. Her curiosity was now painfully awakened on the subject of their history, and the cause of their secluded life. There was an old lady, who resided in the neighborhood, who, from her great age, seemed coeval with the rocks and hills which girdled the valley—one who, having seen better days, was held sacred from public charity, and supported by private benefactions. She was called, by common respect, Old Lady Storer, the head of the aristocracy of the poor. From this ancient and distinguished oracle, Louisa sought the information she desired.

"Yes, yes," said the old lady, taking off her spectacles, and wiping them again and again, as if to clear away the mists of by-gone days. "I will tell you all about them, for I love to talk about the gracious ones. I remember them when they were young and handsome as you are now—in a different way, to be sure, for they had a grander look, with their bright black eyes, and long curling black hair, which covered their shoulders like a mantle. It seems but yesterday, since I used to see them riding by, with their long skirts, and black plumes waving among their ringlets, smiling with the young gentlemen who followed in their train; for, of all the young damsels of the country, they were the most sought after and admired. I was old then, and I little thought I should have lived to see them grow old, bright and blooming as they were. They had no mother, but their father lived, and people said he was father and mother in one. He was a high-minded man, just to all, and kind to the poor. I know he has been kind to me. Well, Miss Betsey, the eldest, was to be married, and there was to be a splendid wedding. And well they might attempt to shine, for a more beautiful bride these eyes never looked upon, and the bridegroom was a goodly man, of noble proportions and gentle countenance. I used to see them walking together, slowly and alone, and I thought something would take place. I have seen them stand for hours together, on the banks of that stream yonder, that you see shining up in the sunbeams, when the moonlight was on it, and they seemed to forget there were any human beings in the world but themselves. The wedding day came—carriages without number rolled up to the door—while I stole there on foot, to see my young benefactress, as I feared, for the last time. Night came on, and yet no bridegroom was there. Miss Betsy's cheek grew as white as the white dress she wore, but she tried to smile, and said he would come soon. The father grew angry, and swore in his pride that the man who dared to slight his daughter should answer it in his heart's blood. Alas! another hand than his, had drank that true heart's blood. All night they watched his coming, but in vain. Miss Betsy would not believe him false, and she sat at the window, starting at every sound, holding her breath, and turning red and pale a dozen times in a moment.—The next day, slow steps brought him to the door, in the bridegroom's dress, but it was all dabbled in blood, and there were six wounds in his heart, each of which was large and deep enough for his soul to pass through. He was murdered by the way-side, by whom God, the All-seeing and All-knowing, only knows. He was rifled of his purse, his watch, and the ring of his betrothal—so it was supposed his assassin was a robber. Oh! many a day has passed since that sad day, and I have looked upon many a sight of woe—but never have I seen such a spectacle of grief as I witnessed then. Miss Betsey did not shriek and rave as I have heard some do in their agony—but she clenched her hands, till the blood oozed from the roots of her nails, and dropped upon her bridal robes. For weeks she never spoke or wept, and all thought that her mind had become a blank, through despair. At last the tears began to flow, like the rain of the deluge, day and night. They washed the roses of youth from her cheeks—they dimmed the sun-light of her eyes. She grew old before her time—and never from the day when she put off her white, blood-spotted robes, has she worn any thing but a suit of solemn black—the badge of her heart's widowhood. But, blessed be God! she mourns not like one without hope. She has found consolation in the promises of the Gospel, and looks forward to a re-union with her beloved, on the green borders of the promised land."

Old Lady Storer paused, and wiped the mist from her glasses with her white linen apron. Louisa wept. The romantic story of love and sorrow awakened her fullest, warmest sympathies. A better feeling than curiosity urged her to listen to the history of the two younger sisters, which the old lady commenced with new animation, pleased with the sensibility of her youthful auditor.

"Miss Lucy," continued the aged historian, "was next in age, and she clung to her sister in her grief, as if she shared all its bitterness. Miss Mary, the third daughter, married Mr. Woodville, a rich man, and went far away from her own home. Esther, the youngest and fairest, the darling and pet of the whole family, went with her, and for a while it seemed that joy had forsaken the household. But, after a time, Lucy was seen riding and walking with a young man, still handsomer and nobler in person than he who was murdered. I heard they were to be married, and I trembled, fearing that some doom hung over the household, and that the bridal wreaths were never to bloom round their maiden brows. Again there were great preparations for the event, and Esther was sent for to officiate at her sister's wedding. She was then in the first bloom of youth, and had about her a charm which no one could resist.—The fickle bridegroom transferred his affections to this youngest, loveliest sister, and the quick eye of jealous love soon perceived the change. She loved him as few women could love, but she was proud, and her delicacy shrank from receiving vows through honor, which the heart no longer sanctioned. She yielded him to her sister—but she scorned the idea of being a sister's rival. She was wretched at the thought that she had unconsciously supplanted her, and vowed that her future life should be an expiation for the offence. Thus, these three young sisters, blighted in all their hopes of happiness, devoted themselves to their father, who began to show the incipient marks of insanity—a disease which gained a fearful ascendency over his once powerful mind, and terminated only with life. Their married sister, Mrs. Woodville, died a few years since, under circumstances peculiarly melancholy, and I am told that her only son is now on a visit to his relatives.—It is hard for one who sees them now to realize what they once have been; but sorrow such as theirs dries up the very blood, hardens the soft features, and draws the lines of premature age on the face and form. But disappointment has brought with it many a godly lesson to them. It has weaned them from the world—it has lifted their hopes to Heaven, and it has taught them great tenderness to the feelings of others. Their charity never faileth—it suffers long, and is kind; and truly it vaunteth not itself.—They furnished the roof which shelters, and the garment that covers me. These glasses, by which I am enabled to read God's blessed word, are the gift of Miss Betsy's own hand. Miss Lucy provided this [illegible] chair as an indulgence to my aged limbs. And in every comfort I possess, Esther has some active agency. This very morning she put this nice cap on my head, and told me when it needed crimping, no other fingers than hers must do it. Oh! when the Lord makes up his jewels, they will shine like stars in the diadem of his glory!"

Louisa left the cottage with an humbled and subdued spirit. The tide of youthful vanity ebbed low in her heart. The early history of the Fatal Sisters occupied her mind. Their blighted love, singular misfortunes, and evangelical virtues, seemed as so many accusing spirits condemning her for her heartless mockery. She looked forward through the vista of years, and felt, for the first time, that there must be a dreary prospect before her, if the misfortunes common to humanity should fall to her lot. She had no sustaining principle in her own mind, and the anchor on which she leaned was tottering and insecure. In the sunshine of her life, she had turned from the guiding cloud, and she dared not hope that the pillar of fire would appear to illumine the darkness of her destiny. Oppressed by an unusual weight of reflection, she entered her chamber that night, and in obedience to a custom of hers, long indulged, and often reproved by her more cautious mother, she drew her table by the bed-side, and throwing herself upon the couch, began to read by the candle-light, though she in vain endeavoured to fix her thoughts upon the book which she held in her hand. Her mother slept in an apartment on the opposite side of the stair-case, and Louisa flattered herself that it could not disturb her repose, nor endanger her safety, and that there was no harm in disregarding a warning suggested by overweening apprehension. She held the book, and turned the pages, but her thoughts were wandering, and the dread of some coming evil became so intense, that her heart palpitated, and her cheek turned pale. She had long known that there was sorrow and disappointment and death in the world, but she had assumed it as a truth, that the three sisters had always been old, sad and unattractive; and, because they had once been beautiful, and young, and loving, she reasoned upon the same principle that all who were young and lovely, must pass through the same fiery and defacing ordeal.

At length the reaction, succeeding over-wrought feeling, took place. A sensation of languor stole over her, the book fell from her hand, while the candle still burned by her side. The windows of her chamber were left open, the damp night air swayed heavily the folds of the curtain, and now and then the long blaze of the unsnuffed candle wavered and bowed towards the muslin drapery that waved near the head of the sleeper. Louisa was awakened by a hot glare around her. She started up, and beheld herself encircled with flames. The curtains had come in contact with the blaze, and were consuming with fearful rapidity. At the foot of the bed, they were festooned up, to admit the air—and Louisa, following the impulse of self-preservation, so strong within us, in the hour of peril, darted from under the burning arch, and forgetful of every thing, but flying from danger, rushed down the staircase, and fell with violent shrieks against the door, which she vainly sought to unclose.

When she recovered a consciousness of her situation, she found herself in the open air, at a little distance from their blazing dwelling, the roar of flames sounding terribly in her ears, their glare shining with dazzling horror on her eyes. Her mother stood near, with disheveled hair and disordered dress, wringing her hands, and crying out in despairing accents—

"We are undone—we are undone! Nothing can be saved!"

Louisa saw and heard all this, and she knew that her incendiary hand had lighted that burning pile, that her own disobedience and wantonness had made them houseless and homeless. Mrs. Marshall was not rich. She had a small annuity, which, in addition to her house and household goods, enabled her to live in comfort, and to furnish Louisa with the paraphernalia of a fashionable wardrobe. There was no insurance, nothing was saved, and they must depend upon the kindness of friends for food and raiment for the morrow. They were taken to the nearest neighbors, but the family was large, and they knew they must be a burden there. Mrs. Marshall was delicate in constitution, and the shock and exposure to the night air prostrated her on a sick bed. Louisa felt that if her mother should die, she had dug her grave with her own hands, and she lifted her hot and burning eyes to Heaven, and prayed that she might die too. While she sat by her mother's bedside, in a state bordering on distraction, three figures softly entered and approached the spot where she was seated. They were all clothed in black—they looked pale and sad—but their voices were mild and their words kind. They were the Fatal Sisters, come on an errand of mercy, and they would not be refused. They came, like the Good Samaritan, to pour oil and balm into the wounds of affliction, to offer shelter to the homeless, food, raiment, home-born comforts, and ministrations.

"I have not deserved this from you," said the weeping Louisa. "You have more reason to hate, than to pity me."

"Come with us," said the elder, "and we will try to make our home even as your own. Our house is large, our means are ample;—we are all skilled as nurses, and there is perfect quiet such as an invalid loves. A bed can be placed in the carriage, and your mother can be borne there without danger or fatigue. Be assured," added she, pressing her hand, "we cherish no feelings towards you, but the sincerest kindness and the deepest sympathy."

Louisa felt the language of Scripture verified in herself. Every word and look of kindness was like a living coal on her remorseful heart. Misfortune had humbled her pride, and in proportion as her pride and vanity were abased, her gratitude was exalted.

A few hours saw herself and mother domesticated in the family of the lonely sisters. Mrs. Marshall soon recovered under their soothing and gentle influence, and Louisa gradually assumed an appearance of composure. But self-reproach and anguish gnawed at her heart.

"Oh!" she would say to herself, a thousand times a day. "had I obeyed my mother's injunctions, we might yet possess the blessings of home. How long must we eat the bread of dependence?"

This was a question constantly recurring, and it produced the most solemn resolves on her part, to make up to her mother, as far as possible, for the consequences of her rashness. She knew her mother's annuity was small, and she determined she would never encroach upon her now slender means. She would teach a school—she was sure their former friends would assist her. The moment she suggested the subject to the kind sisters, they encouraged and supported her in her virtuous purpose, and Arthur Woodville eagerly assisted her in the plan.—Louisa's desire for admiration, which had often led her into folly and excess, seemed completely swallowed up in the nobler ambition that now urged her onward. She felt she must be low in the esteem of young Woodville, but she would not scorn his pity, for it was all she merited.

"I wonder you are willing to stay with the Misses Collins," said her former friend, Miss Warner, during a ceremonious call; "they know all you have said of them, and you have fastened upon them such a ridiculous name, I am sure they never can forget it.—It is a pity that Arthur Woodville heard you, for who knows what might have happened, remaining together in the same house so long?"

Something had happened in consequence of this juxta-position, of which Miss Warner was not aware. The society of one of such exalted powers of mind, and noble and ennobling qualities of heart, gave a stamp to the character of Louisa, such as no one who knew her in her days of folly would have believed it capable of receiving. She felt animated in the discharge of every duty, by the hope of securing his approbation—being assured that the wanton levity of the past was forgiven, if not forgotten.

Louisa found another warm friend in her misfortunes, and that was old Lady Storer. It was near her cottage that Mrs. Marshall rented a small house, where Louisa taught her daily school; and the old lady would bring her knitting and sit in an arm-chair, which Louisa would always abdicate on her entrance, and invested with the grandeur and solemnity of great age, her presence inspired awe and diffused stillness amid the juvenile band. By and by she brought her hour-glass, and placed it upon the table, and its gliding sands whispered as they slid along of everlasting peace. Louisa wondered at her own happiness.—The days were too short for her new duties. The time, which she feared would hang heavy on her hands, flew by on wings of down, and scattered light as it flew. It is true, she had some trials, but they were easily borne. If a little rebel resisted her laws, and threatened to bring a spirit of misrule into her peaceful community, old Lady Storer would lift her spectacles and shake her silver locks, in grave rebuke, and the young offender was generally brought to a conviction of its faults. The Sisters, too, aided her, in her task, by their counsels and encouragements, and Louisa often said she would not exchange her situations for any other in the world.

But, alas! for the strength of human resolution!—It was not more than a year from the commencement of her new duties, before she prepared to resign them. The children wept as they bade her farewell, and entreated her not to leave them. They tried to bribe her with flowers and garlands, but she told them, with a tear in her eye and a smile on her lip, that other duties called her, and she must obey the summons. Old Lady Storer took up her hour-glass with a sigh, for she had passed many happy hours in that little circle. It was pleasant, in life's polar winter, to be surrounded by the primroses and violets of opening spring. She had, too, her forebodings, for old age loves to catch the dark shadow of the future, and she was sure there was a doom hung over the house, to which the destiny of Louisa was shortly to be linked. But she did see, what she prophesied never was to be consummated—a wedding in the home of the lonely Sisters. The old Lady wept, for she remembered the hopes of other days so fearfully blighted—but she prayed that a blessing might descend on Arthur and Louisa as they stood before the bridal altar, once more erected in the family mansion. That blessing followed Louisa to her new home and rested there—for the ark of the covenant went before, and the place where it rested was hallowed ground.

Louisa was reminded, in looking over her wedding gifts, of her once prevailing sin—but so gently, she could hardly feel it a rebuke.

She found in a careful envelope a beautiful distaff, a silver spindle, and a pair of scissors, as bright as the sunbeams that gleamed on them. Threads of gold and silver were wound upon the distaff, and these words were written on the white paper in which they were wrapped:—

"May all your days be woven of these bright filaments, and no dark worsted be permitted to mingle with the brilliant tissue."

Louisa's cheek crimsoned, and for a moment she wondered that the three gentle Sisters, who now represented to her imagination the three Christian graces—Faith, Hope and Charity—should have recalled a passage in her life, which she wished buried in oblivion.

"Forgive me, my Louisa," said Arthur, unwinding some of the glittering thread, and passing it sportively round her neck—"the gift is mine. Receive it, as it is offered, in the spirit of confiding love; and instead of being a painful memento of the past, it will be a pledge of a bright and happy futurity."

Reader! this is an "o'er true" sketch, scarcely embellished by the tints of imagination. It is not necessary to point out the moral, like the writers of ancient fables. Of all the dark threads woven in the variegated web of human life, there are none so black as those fabricated by the hand of slander; and let not those who indulge in satire and derision, ever dare to say, in the pride of self-reliance, "Thus far will I go, and no farther."

HOW AND WHEN TO WOO.

BY WILLIAM C. BRYANT.

Dost thou idly ask to hear
At what gentle seasons
Nymphs relent, when lovers near Press the tenderest reasons?
Ah, they give their faith too oft
To the careless woer;
Maidens' hearts are always soft,
Would that men's were truer!

Woo the fair one, when around
Early birds are singing;
When, o'er all the fragrant ground,
Early herbs are springing;
When the brookside, bank and grove,
All with blossoms laden,
Shine with beauty, breathe of love,—
Woo the timid maiden.

Woo her, when, with rosy blush,
Summer eve is sinking;
When, on hills that softly gush,
Stars are softly winking;
When, through boughs that knit the bower,
Moonlight gleams are stealing;
Woo her, till the gentle hour
Wakes a gentler feeling.

Woo her, when autumnal dyes
Tinge the woody mountain;
When the dropping foliage lies
In the half choked fountain;
Let the scene, that tells how fast
Youth is passing over,
Warn her, ere her bloom is past,
To secure her lover.

Woo her, when the northwinds call
At the lattice nightly;
When, within the cheerful hall,
Blaze the faggots brightly;
While the wintry tempest round
Sweeps the landscape heary,
Sweeter in her ear shall sound
Love's delightful story.

CYMON SMYTHE;

OR, AVARICE OVERREACHED.

BY EDWARD YOUNG.

Chapter I.

Simon Smith, or, as he called himself, Cymon Smythe, Esq., Attorney and Counsellor at Law, sat in his office, in the little village of Joneston, in one of the States, "out west," engaged in filling up a deed.

Now, the matter of drawing out a deed, considered in the abstract, has nothing in it of a very pleasurable nature; but the deed in question appeared to be a very pleasant one, indeed, to Simon. There was a pleasant smile on Simon's countenance; or, as near a pleasant smile as his countenance was capable of putting on; and his face was not very highly gifted that way, that's true. But, as we were saying, there was a smile on Simon's face, and a twinkle in his little eyes, and he paused occasionally in his task, to smile at the reflection of himself in the looking-glass that hung over the writing desk, and to rub his hands with an infinite relish. Altogether, Simon seemed to be in the very best possible humor with himself and the whole world.

"Will forever warrant and defend," ejaculated Simon, as he put the finishing stroke to the document. "Now that's what I call pleasant. There's nothing like being sure in these matters. I know plenty of folks that call themselves rich, and are considered rich, that are not worth a cent, but there's no mistake about this. 'Squire Joseph Allbright's a rich man, and I know it, for I've drawn up many a deed and mortgage in his favor. Let's see: here's this farm and mill, worth twenty thousand dollars, and then there is three or four others, besides houses and village lots. He must be worth, at least, fifty thousand dollars; and only two children, Henry and Kate. That's twenty-five thousand, each; or, at least, the 'Squire will give Kate twenty thousand. That'll be thirty thousand to Henry and twenty thousand to Catherine."

Simon paused in his soliloquy to admire himself afresh. To make his wiry hair assume anything like a descent shape, was a task of some importance; his whiskers, too, were quite refractory; he had pulled them and brushed them, and twisted them round his fingers, nearly all the morning; but in spite of all they would grow back. If any reasonable man, in a fit of temporary insanity, had permitted such excrescences to disfigure his face, the first effort of his returning reason would have been used in shaving them off. But Simon never meditated the possibility of such a thing: he considered his whiskers as the very "ne plus ultra" of whiskers; and his moustaches, in Simon's opinion, surpassed Count Knockmanozoff's. Besides whiskers and moustaches were fashionable, and that was enough for Simon.

"Yes," cried Simon as he gave his moustache the finishing twist. "Yes, I can get Kate Allbright, I know. She can't resist me, and I can't resist her—twenty thousand dollars. She's always pleased to see me; laughs at my witticisms; (I think I'm tolerably witty), praises my poetry, and is altogether partial to me. Twenty thousand dollars and a good practice! I'll get along yet."

Simon's soliloquy was interrupted at this point by the entrance of a client. There was a tone of great condescension in Simon Smi—we beg his pardon—Cymon Smythe, Esq.'s voice as he returned the salutation of his client.

"Remarkably fine weather for the season, Mr. Woodford," said Smythe.

"Very fine, indeed," returned Arthur Woodford. "Mr. Smythe, I have exchanged my lot for one of 'Squire Allbright's, nearer the business part of town, and I wish you to fill up the deeds. You can do it to-morrow?"

"Certainly, certainly," replied Simon, nodding graciously. "And how do you find business in Joneston?"

"Very good! Much better than I expected."

"I'm glad to hear it. By the by, I have a pair of boots I guess I'll let you fix. Wait a minute, and I'll show 'em to you."

While Simon was getting his boots the door was opened, and a poor Irishwoman with an infant in her arms, and four small children at her side, entered the office.

"A very fine day, jintlemen. Have yeey a thrifle, jintlemen, ye cud give to a poor, lone widdy? Me husband, Dinnis—pace to his sowl—was tuk wid the faver an' ager, an' couldn't doa hand's turn for more nor six months, an' thin, to the top o' that, he tuk the billyous faver an' died wid it. I'm come all way from the State of Allaynois afoot, jintlemen. Could yeey help me wid a thrifle? and the Lord will bless you."

"Han't got any thing to give," growled Simon.

"Iver so small a thrifle," urged the poor woman.

"Got nothing to give I tell you. Clear out! These Irish beggars," continued Simon, as the poor woman went away, "always have some such story to tell. Beg, beg, beg: get your money to spend for drink.—No doubt her husband is some great lazy rascal that won't work; as for his being dead, I don't believe it.—But what's your hurry?" cried Simon, as Arthur opened the door. "Wait a minute, you have not seen my boots yet."

"I havn't time now, I'll call again, or you may bring them down to my shop," said Arthur, as he left the office. He hurried on till he overtook the beggar woman, and, putting a half a dollar in her hand, said—

"There is a little for you, good woman, I wish it was more. You see that shoemaker's shop at the further end of the street? Come there in an hour; I think I have some shoes I can give you for your poor children."

"May God bless your honor!" fervently ejaculated the poor creature. "The Father of the widdy and the fatherless, who's given you the big heart, grant that ye may never need the means to help the desolate. Meself and children will pray for your honor. God bless you, sir!"

"I wonder," thought Arthur, as he walked away, "I wonder how rich people, who have the means to assist the unfortunate, can refuse themselves the pleasure of doing it. If they could only feel half the pleasure that I do in giving my mite, they would not wait to be asked, but would seek for opportunities to be charitable. They can spend hundreds for pleasure, dresses, and feasting, and wine. Wine? indeed: the look and blessing of that poor woman have made my heart feel warmer, and my spirit more cheerful than all the wine in the world could effect."

Arthur Woodford did look happy. He was a good-looking fellow at all times; but now his handsome face had an extra glow of beauty on it, and his dark hazel eyes were lit up with the light of the happy spirit within, till, in spite of his rough dress, he looked like a nobleman. And so he was—one of Nature's own nobles—worth a dozen of the generality of the Dukes and Lords of the old world, any day. Arthur, as you know by this time, was a shoemaker, and had not long been a resident of Joneston. He was about twenty-five years old, middling height, well formed and robust, with a look of candor and intelligence in his face, which his inner man did no discredit to.—His quiet, unassuming manners, strictly moral habits, good sense, and good nature, had already won for him the friendship and esteem of every one in Joneston, whose esteem was worth possessing.

As a general thing, there is more of genuine republican feeling and sociality in the small towns of our republic than can be found in any other places in the world—than can be found even in the larger cities of our own land. And this is true, especially of the villages of the western States. There is to be found very little of that distinction of class which characterizes the older States. The professional man, the merchant, and the mechanic associate freely together, seeming to recognize to the fullest extent the truth of the axiom "that all men are created equal." The question is not so frequently asked there "is he rich?" or "is he of good family?" Or, if asked, it is not with the view of determining what grade he shall associate with. The stranger who removes into one of our western villages has not long to wait for acquaintances; a few days are sufficient to introduce him to everybody. And there is such an open-hearted frankness about western men, and they seem to take so much delight in doing little acts of kindness for new-comers, that a stranger is soon at his ease, and feels as if instead of being in a strange land, he was among old friends whom he had known a life-time. The citizens of Joneston were characterized for their enterprise, morality, and sociability. It was just the place for a young man to commence life in whatever talents he might have; there was plenty of opportunity here to draw them out, and a right-seeing sense in the people to appreciate them, and push him forward.

But let us return to Simon, whom we left somewhat angered and astonished by the look of contempt which Arthur bestowed upon him.

"Well, I vow, I should like to know what you mean, Mr. Snob," cried Simon. "Who are you with your proud looks, you poor, petty cobbler? Hang you, I can buy you and keep you, too, a half a dozen times over."

So far as money went, perhaps, Simon could show six dollars to Arthur's one: but in spite of his declaration, we may be permitted to think that the concentrated riches of a community of Smiths would fall far short of the true worth of one Arthur Woodford. With this belief, we make bold to say that Simon could not buy him once, to say nothing of the six times. And, before we go any farther, we may as well give the reader what information we have of the previous history of Cymon Smythe. The first knowledge Simon possesses of himself is at a period some twenty-two years prior to the date of our story, when he found himself sitting on the steps of a house in one of our western cities, shivering with the cold, and crying with hunger. In this situation he was found by the owner of the house, who, being fortunately a humane gentleman, ordered the housemaid to take him into the kitchen and give the poor child something to eat. His stomach having been satisfied and his face washed, Simon was taken into the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Davenport.

"Poor child," said the benevolent Mrs. Davenport, "I wonder that he did not freeze to death in those rags."

"What is your name little fellow?" inquired Mr. D.

"I dun know," said Simon.

"Where do you live, then?"

"I dun know."

And "I dun know" was all the answer that could be obtained from Simon.

"Poor creature! What shall we do with him, James?" enquired Mrs. D.

"Indeed, 'I dun know,' as he says. 'Tis an awkward affair. Perhaps some enquiries will be made for him. At any rate, we will keep him for the present, for I cannot bear the idea of sending any child to the poor-house, as it is now conducted."

So the matter was settled. Days and weeks passed, but no enquiries were made for Simon, nor could Mr. Davenport learn any thing from those he enquired of. The boy was fairly domiciled in Mr. Davenport's kitchen, where he was christened Simon Smith by the house-maid.

When as large as boys usually are at six years old, he was sent to the district school, which he continued to attend till he was fourteen, when he was taken by Mr. Davenport into his office, as a kind of a clerk, allowing him a small salary for his services. His duties in this situation were not very burthensome, consisting in making fires and sweeping out the office, going on errands, and sometimes copying legal documents. Simon contrived to lay by nearly all his salary, and Mr. Davenport dying when Simon was about twenty, left him to shift for himself. He had not been idle in his situation, but had managed to pick up a smattering of law, and being seized with the idea that he could push his fortune better at the West, he started for that section of the country, and arrived at D—— with two hundred dollars in his pocket. His first business was to get into a lawyer's office, to study for admission to the Bar. This he soon found an opportunity of doing, and being blest with what the Irish call "the gift o' gab," he contrived, while reading Blackstone and Kent, and copying documents for his teacher, to pick up enough money by pettifogging to lay by a little over and above his expenses.

Simon passed examination, and had his name enrolled among the honorable fraternity of attorneys; and hearing that Joneston presented a good opening, he removed there and commenced practice.

Simon prospered. He talked large—boasted much of having studied in the office of the celebrated Mr. Davenport, and being gifted with an abundance of words, he managed to delude many into the idea that if he was not a very good-looking fellow, he was, as the Hoosiers say, "an all-fired smart hoss." But this was only among the more illiterate part of the community, who are apt to consider that eloquence consists in the number and sound of the words, without regard to sense. Upon this reputation, and descending to many little meannesses to get "cases," Simon made money—and kept it. Let Simon alone for doing that. He was not the individual to spend money—not he. And Simon, too, was a moral young man—never attending balls, or sleighing parties, or any other amusement that cost anything. Dancing was immoral, very—when he had to pay the fiddler.

Simon had lived in Joneston about five years when our story commences; and, although by some he was considered a tolerable kind of a lawyer, by the majority he was despised as a mean, grasping pettifogger. He had been called so once by one of the nabobs of Joneston, but he pocketed the affront because he could not afford to quarrel with 'Squire Harding. But enough of Simon for the present.

Chapter I.

There was to be an evening party at 'Squire Allbright's, and Cymon Smythe, Esq., and Arthur Woodford were among the number of invited guests.—Evening came, and found Kate and her brother Henry seated in the drawing-room to receive their guests.

"How do I look to-night, Henry?" enquired Kate.

"Splendid! You never looked better in your life. Poor Mr. Smythe, what glances he threw at you, and all lost. You're too cruel, Kate. The poor fellow thinks you are in love with him."

"I in love with him! Bless the poor man, what could put such a ridiculous notion in his head?"

"What? Why, your coquetting with him, to be sure. I know you only did it to laugh at him; but he thinks 'tis because you admire him. At any rate, he admires you, for he told me so."

"Told you so? Well, I declare, that's a new way of wooing. What did he say?"

"What will you give to know, Kate? It must be something valuable, for recollect my honor; it won't do to sacrifice that for a trifle. Mr. Smythe didn't expect that I should tell you. Oh, no—ha! ha!"

"You provoking little rogue, do tell me."

"For how much, Kate? What say you to that copy of Bryant that Arthur Woodford presented to you?"

"Indeed, I shall give you no such thing," replied Kate, with a slight blush.

"I knew it—I knew it. That's right, Kate. Arthur Woodford's present is worth more than all Mr. Smythe ever said in his life; at least, you think so. Now, confess, if I'd asked for anything else but that, you would have given it to me."

"No, I would not—there; and I think you're a provoking boy. I'd give you nothing."

"Yes, a kiss, at least: there, and now I'll tell you. I happened into Smythe's office yesterday, and he soon began to flatter me, and then to praise you, and finally says he, 'Ah, Henry, if I dared but tell her how much I admire her: her beauty, wit, and good nature. How fortunate will that man be who shall win those matchless charms.'"

"Matchless charms!" cried Kate, scornfully. "My matchless charms are all contained in papa's strong box."

"That's it, Kate; he is a mean fellow. I've wanted to talk with you, and this is a good opportunity. You think because I'm a little boy yet, only sixteen, that I can't see anything; but I can—I can see that you are a little, just a little, in love with Arthur Woodford, and that he is in the same state with you. You needn't blush, 'tis a fact, and I'm glad of it. If I'm to have a brother-in-law, I hope you'll select me a good one; and for my part, I don't know a better, nobler-hearted man than Arthur Woodford."

"Do be still! What do I care for Arthur Woodford? Do you suppose papa would let me marry a mechanic?"

"And why not? Isn't father one of the best men in the world? And didn't I hear him tell 'Squire Harding that he did wrong in forbidding his daughter Julia associating with the Hart girls, because their father was poor? 'And,' said Pa, 'I'd rather my girls and Harry should associate with good, honest, hard-working young people, than with such worthless, well-dressed drones as Tom Clavers and Joe Sherrod.' That's what father said. Now, don't you think he would rather you'd marry a noble fellow like Arthur, than such a tight-fisted fellow as Smythe? I guess he would."

"Mr. Woodford has been winning your little heart with a few doses of flattery," said Kate.

"Now, Kate, you know better. Arthur never flattered any body; that you know. I'll tell you what he did do. Last Thursday I saw him talking to an Irish beggar woman; but he didn't know that I or any one else observed him. And when I came along I gave her a shilling, and asked her what that gentleman had given her? 'The blessing of the Father be wid him,' says she; 'I'll tell your honor. Ye see the lawyer's place beyant? (It was Smythe's.)—Well, I went in there wid me childher, an' there was him an' another man, a little red-whiskered fellow. Well, I tells 'em how me husband died, an' axed 'em could they help a lone widdy. What does me little man do but tell me to clear out, as spiteful as a bear, not givin' me even the kind word or look, barrin' the help. I shuk the dust of my feet at his door, an' come away. In a minute out comes that gintleman, an' says he to me—givin' me fifty cents—'Good woman, here's a thrifle for you, an' come down to me shop, an' I'll give ye some shoes for yer childher.' The blessing of all the Saints in Glory be wid him!' I tell you what, Kate, I never felt better in my life; and I made up my mind then who I should like for a brother-in-law."

Didn't Kate look pleased while Harry was telling his story? She said nothing, however, for by this time the company began to assemble.

Never was there a happier party than that met at 'Squire Allbright's, if happy faces and merry laughs be any criterion by which to judge of happiness. Tom Clavers and Joe Sherrod were the noisiest. These young gentlemen seemed to act as if they thought the more rumpus they could make, the more attention they should attract, and the more gentlemanly they would be considered, because they contrasted so admirably with Arthur Woodford and others who were engaged in a quiet conversation on the beauties of the engravings and annuals which were on the centre table. Clavers and Sherrod came from, no one knew where, and lived, nobody could tell how; but they always dressed well—were full of the little tittle-tattle and small talk so highly relished by many would-be ladies, and were altogether 'nice young men.'

Accompanied each by a young lady, as noisy as themselves, and followed by a few witless young men and women, who were seduced by their dashing manners, Clavers and Sherrod marched and raced from room to room, up stairs and down, keeping up a shower of small wit and torrents of laughter, till they made themselves very conspicuous, and very annoying, too, to two-thirds of the assembly, who heartily wished them at home twenty times an hour. Cymon Smythe was there, of course; and Cymon paid great attention to Kate Allbright, too, as a matter of course.

"Miss Catharine," said Simon, conducting Kate to the piano, "will you favor us with one of your sweet songs?"

Kate was not one of those young ladies who require a great urging to do what they intend to do from the beginning. She did not plead a bad cold, a lack of practice, or any other of the excuses so prevalent among fashionable damsels, but took her seat at the piano at once.

"Beautiful! Seraphic!" ejaculated Simon, as Kate finished. "Do you know, Miss Catharine, that you have improved wonderfully? Ah! what a delightful thing music is; and I am such a lover of it—it fills my soul with a multitude of such exquisite sensations, that I can never weary of hearing it. An air like that you have just sung, and sung as you sang it, might almost win me back to life if I was dying."

"Upon my word, a very pretty speech, and worth twenty such airs. And what do you think of music, Mr. Woodford?" said Kate.

"I believe no one is more susceptible of the 'concord of sweet sounds' than myself," said Arthur—"but I never could succeed in giving an exposition of my feelings that was intelligible even to myself. If you will permit me to take your seat, Miss Catharine, I'll try and give you a random thought on hearing an old song that I often heard at home."

Arthur ran over a symphony, and in a fine tenor voice, sang the following:

SONGS OF HOME.

The songs of home! the songs we heard
And loved when we were young;
We ne'er forget them, for they are
The songs our mothers sung.
Ah! little do we know the worth
Of childhood's sinless days,
The pleasures of our fathers' hearth,
And those dear olden lays,
Till added years bring added cares,
A long and weary train,
To bid us prize those simple joys
We ne'er can know again.

The songs of home! those dear old songs,
We heard our mothers sing,
The earliest sounds that mem'ry caught,
And longest to it cling.
Though other songs in happier hours
May charm our ears awhile;
'Tis only they when sorrow low'rs
Can win from us a smile;
The world may hold a thousand airs
More sweet and musical,
But one dear song of home to me
Is richly worth them all.

"You surprise me, and very agreeably, too," cried Kate. "Why have we not found out before that you played and sang so well? No matter—you shall pay for cheating us so long. I'll punish you."

"Believe me, no task that you can impose will be anything but a great pleasure to me," replied Arthur.

"We shall see that. And, in the first place, I order you to find Mary Hart, and bring her here forthwith. We'll have a quartette. I'm sorry that one who loves music as you do, Mr. Smythe, can't sing. What shall we do? Can Mr. George Hart sing?"

"Admirably."

"Then bring him with Mary. Ah! here they come!" cried Kate, as Arthur returned with Mary and George Hart. "Now, Mary dear, do take this seat. You know, or ought to know, that you can play ten times better than I can."

Dear Kate, how happy she was! And poor Cymon Smythe, for once in his life, could say nothing; but, ah! how he looked! If looks could annihilate, poor Arthur would have been knocked into nonentity twenty times while Kate was speaking.

Whilst the quartette was being sung, Simon turned away and entered into a political disputation with the editor of the Joneston Gazette.

"Will you favor us with that air I heard you sing last night, Miss Mary?" said Arthur, when the quartette was finished.

Kate played and sang very well, but she was quite right in saying that Mary Hart sang better. How beautifully she performed, and her voice was so full and rich, it was a treat to hear her. Kate's eye sparkled, and her beautiful face flushed with rapturous excitement, as Mary sang the first stanza. At that moment in dashed Clavers and Sherrod, with their noisy train, and Simon and the editor waxed warmer in their controversy. It was no bad representation of Babel on a miniature scale. Kate was a little vexed, and so were all who had ears for music.

"Gentlemen," cried Kate, as Clavers and Sherrod romped by; "do for pity's sake cease your frolic for a little while. Have you no ears? Don't you hear that she plays and sings divinely? And you, too, Mr. Smythe; really, I'm astonished that you should make such a noise. Don't you hear that Mary is an angel?"

Kate's tone expressed that she doubted Mr. Smythe's enthusiastic love of music, notwithstanding his sentimental declaration, and Simon felt that she did. In truth Simon had no more ear for harmony than a hog; not half so much, indeed, as the "learned pig Toby." He could not whistle, to say nothing of singing, three consecutive notes of Yankee Doodle, or any other common air, correctly; so that his being called to life by the power of music, may be set down as "fudge."

We knew Simon well, and we have always had an idea that no sound had so great an effect on him as the jingle of the precious metals.

Enough of that—let us return to the party. The song was finished, and Kate, now that the excitement had passed, imagining that at the moment she might have been hasty, and perhaps a little rude, was eager to atone for her warmth, and entered into a conversation with Simon. Arthur sat at a little distance from them, taking no part in the conversation except when remarks were addressed especially to him. He was content to be silent, and to admire undisturbed the beauty and vivacity of Kate Allbright's face, which was a perfect embodiment, a warm, breathing realization of his soul's ideal. There is no incentive in the world equal to love. Nothing that refines the heart and exalts the mind like a true and worthy affection. And this was the case with Arthur. The beauty of Kate Allbright had pleased his fancy, and the purity of her heart, and the intelligence of her mind had captivated his heart. In the world's estimation she was far above him, and it would be madness for him to expect to win her; but love pays little heed to such difficulties: it stops not to consider whether the object be attainable. And Arthur thought not of the distance between them till he had yielded himself up to the sweet passion; then he began to see the difference that divided him from the object of his love, and to believe that his passion was hopeless. But the belief of its hopelessness did not make him despair—it exalted him. It filled him with a determination to make himself worthy of her; it refined his feelings—called the dormant energies of his mind into activity, and in a measure re-created him.

The conversation between Kate and Simon at last turned on poetry.

"By the way, I believe you are a follower of the Muses, Mr. Smythe," said Kate.

"Why, yes, I flatter myself that I have talent that before way. You have seen my lines 'To Greece,' in the last Journal, I suppose. My friend the editor, tells me that they have much of the fire of Byron in them. Indeed, I think myself that they would not discredit him."

"I was much pleased with them," replied Kate.

"There are not my best," returned Cymon. "Still, I think they're good, considering how quickly I composed them."

"Are you so expert then with the pen? I have a great mind to give you a task."

"Ah, how happy I shall be to perform it," cried Cymon.

"Will you? Then, Mr. Smythe, I'll give you a theme—'The West.' You will certainly surpass yourself in this untrodden field. And, Mr. Woodford, you recollect that I said I should punish you for deceiving us so long; you must take the same theme also for a poem."

"Mr.' I cannot; indeed I can't. Pray, excuse me; or commute my sentence to something within my power," cried Arthur.

"Ha! you are trying to deceive us again," exclaimed Kate.

"No—but—Miss Catharine"——

"I won't hear a word. Do you think I don't know who is the author of those poems in the Gazette? You can write—so, gentle knights of the quill, do your devoir. A lady's smile awaits the victor."

"Your smiles are valuable, Kate," said Mrs. George Hart; "but allow me to suggest a more tangible prize. You embroider beautifully. Now then, promise the victor a pair of slippers. Shall I in your name?"

"I did not think of getting myself into work, or I should not have been so ready to impose a task on others," replied Kate. "Still, I won't let that baulk me of my honor; so you may offer the premiums."

"Very well. Then, gentlemen, the successful competitor is to be rewarded with a pair of slippers embroidered by Miss Catharine's own fair hands. I know that no inducement, except the hand, could be stronger, and I hope to see something excellent from each of you. The poems must be sent to me to-morrow evening. Is it not so, Kate? Well, the following evening the award will be made.

"I shall try to present you something excellent," said Simon.

"And I shall do the best I can," said Arthur.—"Such a prize will call all my powers into activity."

"I believe you," said Mrs. Hart, in a whisper—"and if I'm not mistaken, you'll have a partial judge on your side."

"I fear you are mistaken," replied Arthur.

"No, I am not; and you'll find it so some day.—Kate is partial to you, and if you were not so fearful you might win her. We married ladies are allowed to know a little of such matters; and, take my word for it, Kate almost, if not quite, loves you."

In a little while the party separated, and Arthur went home in better spirits than he had been for some time. Yet what was it to him that Kate loved? Could he hope to win her father's consent? We shall see.

We must take our readers again to Cymon Smythe's office. It was the morning after the party. Simon sat at the writing-desk, not, however, engaged in writing—no, it was a more pleasant task: he was counting a pile of silver that lay before him, and which had just been paid to him by a client.

"Forty-eight—forty-nine—fifty," said Simon, as he finished. "There's nothing like the hard stuff yet. This, with what I have in my cash box, makes two thousand, seven hundred and sixty dollars and fifty-three cents. That is not bad. And I have it all safe—in specie. Catch me keeping notes, or loaning money on mortgage, or speculating. Not I. 'A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.' Now then, I'll put this away, and then for writing that poem. Confound it! I don't half like it; but it's got to be done. I wish I could find something to give me an idea."

Cymon sat down to write. It was a difficult task for him; but he succeeded at last in completing it. He then copied it, folded it, and directed it to Mrs. Hart; which was hardly done when Mr. Joe Sherrod entered the office.

"Well, Smythe," cried Sherrod, "how goes it? I say, that was a pretty fine party last night."

"Why, yes, tolerable. But you got rather a sharp talking to for making such a noise as you did."

"Pooh! I didn't mind that; Kate meant no harm. And for that matter it seems to me that you got the worst of it."

"Oh, no, not at all. Kate apologized to me."

"She did? Well, I shouldn't have thought it; but I suppose she made a distinction in your favor. You are rather attentive in that quarter."

"What makes you think so?"

"It's the general talk. You'll be a lucky fellow if you get her. Upon my honor, if her old man wasn't such a straight-sided old chap, I'd give you some trouble—I'd run opposition to you."

"I shouldn't fear you."

"Perhaps not. But I tell you what it is, Smythe, I think you'll have trouble enough as it is. I'm glad though that you're fixed there so that you won't interfere with me."

"Interfere with you? I didn't know that you were aiming at any one."

"I havn't been; but I'm going to begin. Not with any one you know, though. There's a young widow come to town last night, on the boat. I havn't seen her yet; but I'm told she's handsome, not over twenty-five, and what's of most consequence, she's got the 'ready.'"

"How much?"

"Report says ten thousand. If it's only half that I'll be satisfied. What say you for calling on her to-morrow? I got acquainted with her brother at the tavern: a tip-top fine fellow, and he'll introduce us. You'll go? Good. Then I'll call for you. What time is't. Eleven! I must be off and take a drive with Tom. Recollect, to-morrow!"

"Ten thousand, eh!" soliloquised Cymon, after Sherrod's departure. "I don't know, Josey Sherrod, whether I shan't interfere with you. Don't be too sure. Ten thousand, slap up. No waiting for old men to die, nor contingencies of that kind. That's worth thinking of at any rate. Besides, I'm not sure that I can get Kate; and I have heard that widows were easier to get than young girls. There's no harm in trying to make an impression any how; so that if I fail with Kate, I'll have the widow to fall back on."

* * * * *

"Well, Kate," cried Mrs. Hart, as she entered the parlor in the evening, "I have the documents here which are to decide for whom you are to exert your skill at embroidery."

"I've but little choice which wins," said Kate.

"It will do for you to say so; but I imagine you have a little predilection one way. But now for the poems. Call Harry to read them, so that we can decide. Here, Harry, we want you to read these.—Begin with this. Clear your voice, and put yourself in an oratorical position."

THE WEST.

BY CYMON SMYTHE, ESQ.

Awake my tuneful muse to sing
The glory of the West;
The richest land in all the world,
And certainly the best.
Its skies are blue, its air pure too,
Its trees grow very tall:
The barbarous, savage Indian once
Was monarch of it all.
And flowers so rare grow bright and fair
Upon its verdant green,
And rushing rivers there are found
The best was ever seen.
The Indians they are drove away
By white man's mighty arm,
And where they used to hunt their game,
The white man has a farm.
Now fertile, blooming prairies,
Produce abundant wheat,
Her enterprising farmers sees
Their joy is now complete.
And cities they grow in a day
Upon its rivers shore,
And peace and plenty fills the land,
What can you ask for more?

"Ha! ha! ha! Nothing, my dear Mr. Smythe.—We're satisfied. We wouldn't ask for any more for the world. What do you think of it, Kate? Is it not unique? And is it not wonderful that any human being who could in all seriousness perpetrate such stuff as that, should esteem himself a poet? Yet this Mr. Smythe thinks himself second to no one in America."

"Precisely so, Alice. It is just those who could seriously write such trash, who have such an overweening conceit of themselves. True genius is always modest."

"Yes, and distrustful of itself," said Mr. Hart.

"I must differ from you there," replied Kate.—"Genius may be modest and retiring, but not distrustful of itself. It has always appeared to me that the higher order of genius, particularly of the poetic, must carry with it a degree of confidence in its powers; an innate consciousness of its strength and ability. I can believe that one with only a partial amount of genius; or, to speak more properly, one with a high order of talent, may be oftentimes doubtful of his strength. Possessed of a mind capable of appreciating the labors of a genius, and not so blinded by vanity as not to see the difference between them and his own efforts, he will feel his inferiority, and be likely to rate himself lower than he really is."

"Will your honor please to sum up your argument and let us know what it amounts to," said Harry.

"I should say, therefore," continued Kate, not noticing Harry's bantering tone, "that genius has great modesty with great self-confidence. One with middling and sometimes a high order of talent, modesty united to diffidence and self-distrust; and another with neither genius or talent, great self-confidence, with a super-abundant vanity and no modesty."

"Very well. Now, then, we'll hear what Mr. Woodford has to say. Come, begin."

THE VOICES OF THE WEST.

FIRST VOICE.

I heard a murmuring sound,
As the west wind hurried past;
A wild and mournful voice,
Dreamy, undefin'd, and vast.
I heard the rustling leaves
Of old primeval woods;
The roar of waterfalls,
And the rush of mighty floods;
The cry of savage beast,
Of panther, wolf, and bear;
And the songs of unknown birds,
Trembling sweetly on the air;
And the light foot-fall of savage men,
As they swept the forest through,
The bow-string's twang, the arrow's flight,
And Indian's war hallo.
Harsh, jarring, wild, unearthly,
Were the sounds together whirl'd;
Like the murmuring of chaos
Ere light broke on the world.

SECOND VOICE.

Again the west wind past;
But another voice it bore;
More defined, and yet more vast
Than the one it held before.
I heard the forests groan
As the mightiest trees were fell'd;
And the pattering of the wheels
Which the water-falls impell'd.
The river's voices warred;
But mingled with them now,
I heard the clanking engine,
And the steamship's hollow sough.
The low of kine, the neigh of steeds,
The clucking of the hen,
The watch-dog's bark, the cock's shrill chime
And the song of husbandmen;
The ringing of the anvil;
The grate of saw and plane,
And the rattling of loaded dray,
That told of Commerce's reign;
And the dear, heart-soothing chime
Of the old church going bell:—
All the mingled sound and din
That out from cities swell.
'Twas the birth-cry of an Empire,
In the wilderness brought forth;
Which yet shall be the glory,
And the hope of all the earth;
For millions of free-hearted men
Shall homes and altars rear,
And the poor, down-trodden of the world
Shall find a refuge there,
Europe's, Asia's, Afric's glory,
Like stars that flee the day,
Shall be swallowed in the brightness
Of this young Empire's ray.
Tyrant's foot or bondsman's knee
On its soil shall ne'er be prest;
For the starr'd flag of the free
Guards the Empire of the West.

"Who wins, Kate? I say Arthur Woodford, and shall notify him accordingly. But what do you think of it?"

"That I'm disappointed. Mr. Woodford can write better. There is not the least attention paid to versification. Some lines have one number, and some another of syllables; and so far as that is concerned, it is not equal to Mr. Smythe's."

"Not equal to Smythe's? Now, Kate, you must be crazy. I don't believe you. You think that it is worth a dozen of Smythe's," said Harry.

"So do I, Harry," said Mrs. Hart.

"You may both think as you please," replied Kate, "and I shall do the same. I do not consider this poem at all equal to many of Mr. Woodford's in the Gazette. What his idea may have been when he commenced it, I don't know; but I imagine that he has failed to express what he intended at the beginning—that is, that the execution is not up to the conception. And this, by the way, may be said of his poems in general."

"And I think the same may be said of your criticism," returned Mrs. Hart. "But, never mind, good or bad, Arthur Woodford is to have the slippers."

"Yes, and no one will be better pleased than Kate, in spite of her complaints."

After some further conversation, Mrs. Hart left, and Kate sank into a reverie, trying to analyze her feelings for Arthur Woodford. Although her eye grew brighter, and her cheek warmer, at his approach, and the mention of his name made her heart beat quicker, yet she did not love him, she thought. She admired his talents, esteemed him for his moral worth, had just that amount and kind of feeling which makes a firm friendship—but it was not love. So Kate came to the conclusion that she entertained nothing more than a sincere friendship for Arthur Woodford.

What a self-deluding passion is love. Kate loved Arthur. She might try to cheat herself into a contrary belief, but the passion was fixed—a warm, fervent love—such a love as only women who have hearts can feel. Not that sickly preference, based on outward appearance, which some imagine is love, and wed with, and regret before the honey-moon is passed: but a deep, soul-seated feeling, which is never known but once—which clings to its object through every change, in weal and in woe, in poverty, disease and affliction—yea, even in crime! Such was Kate's love for Arthur.

Chapter IV.

The following morning found Joe Sherrod, accompanied by Cymon Smythe, in one of the private parlors of the Joneston Hotel, which was for the present the residence of Mrs. Decamp. The widow sat on the sofa near the window, and while she is sitting there, we may as well try and sketch her portrait.

She was apparently about twenty-five, fresh and rosy; her admirable figure was displayed to the best advantage in her lounging attitude, and her whole appearance was rather captivating at first sight. Her hair was dark brown, nearly black, and arranged with exquisite taste to set off her broad but low forehead. Her mouth was rather large, but her lips were so ripe and tempting, and the teeth they disclosed in parting, so white and even, that it could hardly be called a defect. Her nose was perhaps a thought too long, but on each side of it was such a sparkling black eye, that it could not throw a shade on her downy cheeks. Altogether, the widow would have been pronounced a handsome woman by the majority, but there was something about her which we did not like. About her eyes, particularly, there was a bold, yet sinister expression, which gave them, at times, the appearance of having a slight cast—not a decided squint, but a certain undefinable look which, like Miss Julia's, was "werry pecooliar."

"Do you intend making Joneston your future residence, Madam?" enquired Cymon.

"Perhaps I shall," replied the widow; "the little I have seen of it I like very much, and if I can find a house that suits my fancy, I shall purchase it and settle down. I've travelled so much for the last two years, that I begin to feel the need of a permanent residence."

"A very good idea," Mr. Sherrod remarked. "I hope Joneston will be that favored spot; for, to tell you the truth, we need you here very much."

"Indeed—you flatter me."

"Do I Smythe? Not at all. Society here is in a horrid condition. In fact, we have no society—it is a mere mob. Would you believe it, Madam? mechanics are invited everywhere; there is no exclusiveness, no refinement, no ton. Go where you will, you are sure to be jostled by these dirty artizans, and offended with the smell of glue, or wax, or cabbage."

"You give me a pretty picture of your village; but can it possibly be true?"

"Too true. Now, if I am not mistaken in your appearance, you know what good society is, and if you stay, would set a proper example. It only needs one possessed of wealth and beauty to commence the reformation, and many here will follow; and in a short time the mechanics will be cut dead, and reduced to their proper level."

"You certainly flatter me," replied Mrs. Decamp; "but I assure you if I should remain, I could not think of associating with mechanics."

"Then we must prevail on you to stop," said Cymon; "for every time I go anywhere, I am shocked by having to meet these low-bred laboring men."

After some further conversation, equally uninteresting, interspersed with ill-natured remarks on their neighbors, Sherrod and Smythe took their departure.

"Have you learned who they are?" enquired Mrs. Decamp of her brother.

"Yes—Smythe is supposed to be worth five thousand dollars. The other, nobody knows how he lives; but he is presumed to live by his wits, and you know such fellows have generally but a small capital."

"He won't answer, then. Smythe must be the man."

* * * * *

Simon having reached his office, fell into a cogitation. The personal appearance of the widow had captivated his fancy, and a perplexing debate was agitating his faculties as to whether it were better to accept Kate Allbright with her twenty thousand dollars in prospect, or to make a bold push for the more dashing widow with her ten thousand in hand.

"I don't know what's best to be done," soliloquized Cymon. "I'm up a stump. Kate's a very pretty girl, but the widow's amazing handsome—such lips and such eyes! Ten thousand in ready money now. Can't I turn that into twenty thousand before I should likely get Kate's? I think I can. I must reflect awhile——Well, my mind's made up; I'll try for Kate first. If I get her, well—if not, I'll lay siege to the widow; and as there's no use standing shillyshally, I'll go see the 'Squire at once, and get his consent."

Cymon proceeded at once to carry this resolution into effect. 'Squire Allbright was at home, and Cymon was ushered into the library. The usual remarks on the weather, and the common topics of the day, being disposed of, Cymon opened the business which had brought him before the 'Squire.

"I have come to see you on a subject of great interest to me," said he, "and, as 'tis best to have it settled at once, I will say that I've come to ask your consent to address your daughter."

"Humph!" returned the 'Squire, "that's manly. You love Kate?"

"Dearer than life."

"And for herself alone?"

"Certainly—most certainly."

"I believe that you are doing a very good business, and that 'tis increasing. Very good. I understand you that you love Kate for herself—so of course it will not make any difference to you whether she has any dowry or not?"

"No—to be sure not. I care nothing for money. And I've always considered that it should have no weight in marriage."

"That's right. Give me your hand. If you can get Kate's consent, mine shall not be wanting. But before you propose to her, let us have a fair understanding. You think that I am rich?"

"Oh, no—I don't think, I know it."

"I am sorry to undeceive you," said the 'Squire, in a serious tone, "but you are mistaken."

"Is it possible? You're joking, surely."

"Indeed, I'm not. You, as well as others, have an erroneous idea of my real circumstances. I will be candid with you, so that you may not think when 'tis too late that you have been deceived. My circumstances are briefly these: When I came to this part of the country, I had but little of my own, but my brother having some spare funds on hand, sent them out by me to invest in real estate. Most of the property now held in my name belongs to him, and I have just received a letter from him, stating that he is engaged in settling up his business in the East, and will soon be here. When he arrives, I shall have to deed back to him that which is really his, and that will leave me but a very small property. I am glad, therefore, that you have such an affection for Kate, as 'twill give her a good home."

"Hem—Iam—hem—very much surprised," stammered Cymon, whose face was visibly lengthened.

"No doubt; but, as you love Kate for herself, that can make no difference to you."

"I—I—don't know that," cried Cymon, who began to think that he had got into a scrape, and was desirous of getting out as soon as possible. "I supposed, of course, that you were able to give your daughter something. And"——

"Well, what?" said the 'Squire, tartly.

"Why, if you must know, I don't think you've acted honest in pretending to be rich when you ain't."

"Go on, sir."

"I should never have thought of proposing for her if I had not supposed she would be worth something some day."

"And so your love for her amounts to just that, does it?"

"Certainly. With my prospects and standing, one naturally expects to get an equal at least. And as I think I've been deceived, I shall not consider myself bound by anything I've said."

"So, so! Then I have the pleasure of bidding you good morning. And, do you hear? I shall not grieve if I never see you again. Good bye, sir!"

"I don't think you will ever see me here again," said Cymon, as he took his hat and marched out.

"Ha! ha! ha! I thought I knew what kind of stuff you are, Mr. Smythe," cried the 'Squire, rubbing his hands in great glee. "Why what a pitiful, little scamp you are. I hope you'll meet your match, and I've an idea that you will. There's a Providence yet in the world, and such grasping, money-loving dogs generally suffer in some way. I've stretched the truth a little; but I hope it is excusable. And I'm not sure that good will come of it, for that fellow will spread the news, and there's nothing like a reverse for showing you who are your friends."

The 'Squire had stretched the truth. The facts were these. His brother had sent some money by him to invest in land, and the property he had purchased with it had risen greatly in value; but aside from that, the 'Squire was worth forty thousand dollars.

Chapter V.

A week had passed by since the scene at 'Squire Allbright's, during which time Cymon had paid assiduous court to the widow, and spread the report of the 'Squire's circumstances, with some additions of his own; so that it had got to be very generally believed that, instead of being rich, 'Squire Allbright was not worth a cent, and was moreover deeply in debt. Cymon did not tell how he came by the information. His version of it was that in attending to some legal business for the 'Squire, he had ascertained that the property all belonged to his brother; and he thought it his duty to put the public on their guard. The 'Squire did not contradict the story. Some regretted that it was so; some were glad, because they liked to see others reduced: and one was glad because it filled him with hope.

Cymon, as we have said, paid assiduous court to Mrs. Decamp and his addresses were treated very favorably; he had now arrived at the determination to propose for her hand. Arrayed in his best, Cymon proceeded to the Joneston Hotel. We will not delay the reader with an account of the interview, but simply say that Cymon proposed and was accepted.

About the same time Arthur Woodford called at 'Squire Allbright's and was ushered into the library. A few uninteresting topics having been settled, Arthur said—

"I hope you will not think me impertinent, but may I ask, is the report I have heard, that you had met with reverses, true?"

"Unfortunately," replied the 'Squire, "it is very true, that I am not so rich as I was supposed to be."

"I don't know whether to say I'm glad or sorry, 'tis so," said Arthur.

"I do not understand you," replied the 'Squire.

"It has given me hope. From my first acquaintance with your daughter, I have felt an ardent and sincere affection for her. As long as you were reputed rich, I loved hopelessly; for I was not presumptuous enough to think that I should be accepted.—But since I've learned the state of your affairs I've been emboldened to ask your consent to address her."

"That is all very well; but do you think you are able to support a wife?"

"Not in the style to which your daughter has been accustomed; but I believe I can support one comfortably and honorably. My business is increasing, and in a few years I shall be as well off as I wish to be. At present, I can only offer her an honest heart, and a pair of willing hands. My whole desire would be to surround her with comforts."

"I believe you, my dear sir, and I must tell you that I have always esteemed you so highly, that if, instead of waiting till now, you had offered yourself when I was considered wealthy, I would have accepted you as heartily and wished you as good success with my dear girl, as I do now. If you can make yourself acceptable to Kate, I shall be proud to call you my son-in-law."

Soon after this conversation, Arthur left; and the 'Squire said to himself—

"Well, I never was better pleased in all my life. When I told Smythe to try him, that I was poor, I had no idea that it was going to turn out so well.—I've suspected sometime that Arthur loved Kate, and I think she returns it. He is poor comparatively; but, bless my soul, he's not so poor as I was at his age. I like him, for he is a fine young man. I hope Kate thinks so, too, and I imagine she does."

During the next few weeks, Arthur was a constant visitor at 'Squire Allbright's, and a continued acquaintance with his sterling qualities soon removed what doubts Kate might have had in regard to the state of her feelings towards him. She could no longer disguise the fact of her affection.

Certain of her father's consent, and believing in Kate's looks he had read a favorable feeling for himself, Arthur determined to avow his love. With this determination he one evening entered the parlor where Kate sat, looking so bewitchingly beautiful, that his courage began to fail. However he soon found words: but what he said, and what Kate replied, we leave to the imagination of the reader; for love conversations, however interesting to the parties, are rather tedious on paper. That Arthur pressed his suit with all the ardor of a young, warm heart, and the resistless eloquence of an honest love, is all we can say. And that Kate, like a sensible girl, as she was, received the confession of his love, and admitted her affection for him with a frankness which Arthur blessed, and, we presume, kissed her for, is all the reader may know.

Arthur left the house the happiest of men, for Kate had fixed an early day for the ceremony; and by a singular coincidence, it happened to be the very day on which Cymon Smythe was to lead the widow Decamp to the altar.

Our tale is nearly told, and we shall use but a few more words in bringing the reader to the denouement.

A happy party, among which were the Harts and Hardings, were assembled at 'Squire Allbright's to witness the celebration of the nuptials of Kate and Arthur. Every thing passed off in excellent style, when just before they were about to break up, the 'Squire—who had cracked jokes with the old folks, and romped with the young ones, his merry blue eyes twinkling, and his honest old face fairly shining with happiness—begged the attention of the company a few minutes to what he had to say.

"My dear friends," said the 'Squire, "always excepting the night I was married myself, this has been the happiest evening of my life; not only because my dear girl has been united to one of the best men in the world, but also because by your attendance here to-night, you have convinced me that all those friends I valued most highly have remained true to me and mine. I cannot permit you to go away without correcting an error. You have heard that I am poor?" All bowed an assent. "It is altogether a mistake, I assure you. I am nearly as rich as I was ever reputed to be. At any rate, I think I am worth forty thousand dollars."

This announcement was received with marked pleasure and approbation.

"I believe," continued he, "this is good news to all of you. I perceive, my dear Arthur, that you are as much surprised as any one. I don't imagine, my son, that you are one whit happier, only on Kate's account. She knew it all the while. Let me again assure you, my friends, how much I am indebted to you for your presence this evening, and that I shall always be happy to see each and all of you at all times. God bless you all!" Here ensued such shaking of hands and congratulations, as nothing could equal, and then the party separated in the best humor imaginable. More noisy, if not more joyous, was the party that attended the wedding of Cymon Smythe and Mrs. Decamp. Nothing occurred at it of interest; so we will merely say that they were married, and that Cymon deemed himself a lucky individual. Perhaps he was.

The following day 'Squire Allbright presented the young couple with a pleasantly situated residence, near his own, into which they were to remove in a few days. Rich in their affection for each other, and comfortably situated so far as this world's goods are concerned, Kate and Arthur entered on their married life with every prospect of continued happiness. Not so with Cymon. The first sorrow of Cymon's matrimonial existence was when he learned that the 'Squire, or rather the construction he had put upon the 'Squire's words, had deceived him. But oh! this was as nothing to what occurred on the third morning of the honey moon. On that eventful morning, Cymon slept rather later than usual, and was somewhat surprised on waking to find himself alone; but on looking at the sun he concluded that he had overslept himself. He dressed and descended to the breakfast room, nothing doubting to find Mrs. Smythe and her brother at their morning meal. Alas! they were not there, neither could the "help" give him any information of their whereabouts. What could the matter be? Cymon began to feel alarmed. He hurried up stairs, and the first thing his eye lit upon was a letter lying on the light-stand, which he had not before noticed. With strange misgivings he tore it open, and read the following:

Dear Smythe: By the time you have read this, I shall be some distance on my way to Canada. It will be useless for you to follow me. I could not be prevailed upon to return. I have taken an unaccountable dislike to you, and think it best for us to part. And as I had no ready money by me, I have taken the liberty to help myself to yours. It amounts to about three thousand dollars. I was in hopes it was more, but I'm content with that. Please accept my thanks for it, and believe me to be,

Yours, affectionately,
AMANDA DECAMP.

P. S. My husband, who accompanies me, desires me to present his best respects, and to advise you, when next you are desirous of entering on a matrimonial speculation, to be particularly cautious of young, rich and strange widows, especially if they have a brother with them.

Pen cannot paint the agony of Cymon on reading this epistle. He searched the room all over; but his cash-box—his darling cash-box—which he carried home with him every night, and deposited at his bedside, was nowhere to be found.

The widow had absquatulated—that is to say, had de-camped with it, and Cymon was distracted. He started forthwith in pursuit of the fugitives, but could not overtake them, for the very sufficient reason that instead of going towards Canada, they had started for the South—Texas perhaps. But although they eluded pursuit at that time, yet there is an overruling Providence in the world, keeping watch over the actions of mortals; and sooner or later metes out to crime its full degree of punishment.

The subsequent destiny of Mr. and Mrs. Decamp we may hereafter lay before the reader; at present we will only say that Cymon Smythe returned to Joneston almost broken hearted, and so little was he esteemed that no one seemed to pity his misfortune.

THE SMUGGLER.

BY MISS PARDOE.

It was early on a dark and stormy November evening, that, in a small cottage situated under a high cliff, near Folkestone, in Kent, the family of Jacob Horton, an industrious old fisherman, were collected round a blazing fire of mingled coal and drift-wood, awaiting the hour of supper. The cottage consisted only of three rooms, which were floored with brick; but there was an air of neatness and comfort about the whole aspect of the place, which made it cheerful in spite of the poverty of its inmates.

Jacob Horton was a hale and hearty veteran, who had braved the wind and waves during the best portion of a century, and struggled manfully with want and temptation throughout the same period. At the age of thirty he had married the daughter of a neighbour, more remarkable for her modest demeanor and careful housewifery, than for either beauty or that species of coquettish village wit which is apt to captivate men of less prudent and steady principles. He had been rewarded for his good sense by the untiring and uncomplaining industry of his wife, who, far from being weak enough to repine at the hardships to which they were both occasionally subjected, only became more fertile in expedients, and more energetic in exertion, whenever a season of trial overtook them. The approval and affection of her husband, were recompense sufficient to the good dame, whatever might be her deprivations; and they were ungrudgingly and cordially expressed, for Jacob thoroughly appreciated the cheerfulness of spirit and alacrity of will with which every concession was met by his honest-hearted help-mate; and whenever he returned thanks to Providence for the prudence and industry of the mother of his children, he did not fail to do so equally for the unselfish and willing nature with which they were coupled. Nothing enhances the virtue of doing your duty, like the doing it in every circumstance as if it was its own reward.

For many years the worthy couple were childless; and both Jacob and Sarah were weak enough to repine at this dispensation, and to believe that they should be both happier and more comfortable had they a family; forgetting that if it required a struggle to support themselves during the winter months, when the bitter weather rendered the avocations of Jacob at once more dangerous and less profitable, while it necessarily exacted a greater outlay for their narrow housekeeping, every addition to their little circle must only tend to increase their difficulties. The fisherman dwelt on the delight which it would be to him to have a son, whom, from his earliest infancy, he would train to the adventurous pursuit which he himself followed; who, even as a boy, could accompany him in his now lonely fishings under the bright summer moonlight; and who, when grown to manhood, might be at once his friend, his comrade, and his hope. The mother, with all a woman's unselfish and outgushing tenderness, lingered over the picture of a smiling infant nestling on her bosom, or springing in all the gleefulness of infancy in her arms, or crawling over the well-sanded floor, within reach of her watchful eye, while she plied her needle or her wheel. This was her first picture of regret; and then, true to the timid instinct of her sex, she willingly skipt over the next few year of peril and of toil, in order to image to herself the child who had been the plaything of her womanhood, grown up to man's estate, and become the prop and solace of her age. Alas! how frequently does the selfishness of human nature lead parents to overlook the fact, that Heaven often denies in mercy the yearning desire which renders them impatient under its wise and beneficent decree.

At length joy visited their humble home, for Sarah became the mother of a boy, whose extreme beauty soon grew into the proverb of the hamlet. A proud man was Jacob then, when he spread his sail, and threw back a parting glance at Sarah and his child, as they stood upon the shingley beach to see him start; and a proud woman was his wife when on her homeward way, she was stopped by some warm-hearted neighbour, anxious to steal a kiss from the laughing, crowing infant whom she carried in her arms. No matter what fatigue the fisherman might have encountered during the day, he was never too weary to sport with the gamesome child when he returned to his home at night; and the boy was scarcely four years old, ere, on a calm summer's noon, he would row him out to sea, and flinging him from the boat, and then springing after him, encourage him to make companionship with an element upon which so much of his future life was destined to be passed. This vigorous mode of training was for some time strongly deprecated by the mother; but as it was pursued day after day without any evil result, she suffered herself to be laughed out of her fears; and this the more readily, as she knew the fondness of Jacob for his boy—and was herself once more in a situation calculated to divert her anxieties in some degree from her first-born.

Another son completed the happiness of Horton, and an unusually profitable season led him to declare that the infant had brought a blessing with it. The remark was prophetic. But having now given our readers an insight into the fisherman's past career, we will at once revert to the narrow hearth beside which we first brought him under notice.

On the evening already mentioned, it was surrounded by five individuals. The warmest settle was occupied by Jacob himself, whose loose trousers and short jacket of coarse blue cloth, were surmounted by a venerable and benevolent countenance, about which his long hair, as white and as glittering as moonlight, fell in masses so profuse, as to indicate, that to him years had brought no decrease of strength. He was busy in repairing a herring-net, and at his feet, pursuing the same task, sat a fine young man of about twenty, whose large deep blue eyes, chestnut hair, and manly countenance, were the very types of frank and good-humoured happiness. In form, he was robust and well-proportioned; and his laugh, which on ordinary occasions was frequent, revealed teeth so dazzlingly white, that they gave an air of joyousness to his whole appearance. The mother, who was a goodly specimen of comely old age, was far more attractive with her silver locks smoothly banded beneath her snow-white cap, her decent dress of linsey-woolsey, and her clean coarse apron, than would have been many a decayed beauty, who, in losing her personal charms, had also lost that proper self-pride which prevents the faded coquette from degenerating into a slattern. Sarah Horton had unconsciously achieved that most difficult feat for a woman—she had grown old gracefully; and now, as she plied her wheel in the full blaze of the cheerful fire, had there not hung a deep shadow of care upon her brow, she might have served as a model of calm and contented age. Near her, and also facing the fire, sat a young and pretty woman of eighteen or nineteen, before whom stood a similar implement of industry; but the monotonous hum of the matron's steadily revolving wheel, was not echoed by that of the fair creature at her side. It is true that the thread of flax was between her slender fingers; and that a foot, whose beautiful proportions were only too apparent in the faded finery of a heedless slipper, originally far too delicate and costly for the condition of its wearer, rested upon the treadle; but neither foot nor finger were in motion. The girl sat bending forward, with her uncombed ringlets falling in a cloud over her face; her cap, which had lost its purity of tint, and which was profusely tricked out with a gaudy-coloured ribbon, pushed carelessly backward; while her naturally beautiful figure was marred and rendered even unsightly, by the unwomanly want of decency perceptible in the arrangement of her clothes. It was easy to see that her gown, her apron, and even the shawl that she had flung about her shoulder, had all once been of the most showy description; but that, their first freshness faded, she had made no effort to replace by neatness the gaiety of their original appearance.

It was a melancholy sight: for where a young and lovely woman, whatever be her station in life, however high or however humble, loses her self-value, and yields to an habitual indolence, which prompts her not only to disregard her natural advantages, but even to sully them by a want of neatness and common order, there must be something hollow or cankered at her heart; something perverted or unworthy in her nature; or a carelessness of consequences, and a recklessness of the future, calculated to produce the most unhappy results.

Her eyes were fixed upon the fifth individual of the group, who occupied a settle opposite to the old man. It was the child of prayers and tears—the first-born of the Hortons. The lonely infant had advanced from a laughing and handsome boy, into a man of such surpassing beauty, that, had the soul within been worthy of the shape in which it was enshrined, earth would scarcely have contained his prototype; but young as he was, for he had barely numbered five-and-twenty years, evil passions and unholy dispositions had given a character of ferocity to his countenance which negatived all his attraction. His finely arched eye-brows almost met above his nose, from the habitual scowl which lowered upon his brow; and there was a savage and sneering rigidity about his mouth, that, in his moments of violence, repelled alike sympathy and affection. Yet there were times when these foul signs of satanic nature were for awhile effaced; and during these brief and unfrequent intervals, there was a haughty power about the beauty of the youth, which, fearful as it was, and better suited to some high-born noble than to the son of a poor fisherman, failed not in its effect on all with whom he came in contact. It was the spell of a master-spirit, for good or for evil; and, alas! he had not chosen "the better part."

At the moment in which we have introduced him to the reader, he was engaged in sharpening the blade of a large clasp-knife, which he was industriously grinding on both edges, and forming into a point. Between his knees he held the stone necessary to the operation; and occasionally a gesture of impatience escaped him, as some temporary impediment occurred. At his feet lay curled up a wiry, crop-eared terrier, blind of an eye; one of those suspicious-looking brutes whom an honest man would shrink from claiming, although it might be valuable both for its courage and attachment. It is singular how much moral character may be remarked in dogs. How opposed is the bold yet gentle bearing of the Newfoundland, the docility of the spaniel, the fine instinct of the sporting-dog, and, above all, the intelligent devotion of the shepherd's collie, to the sneaking, cunning, stealthy carriage of the coarse-coated, sharp-eyed, snarling terrier of the vagrant and the idle. Jacob Horton, had he been consulted upon the subject, would not have given house room to the ill-looking and worse-tempered animal at his hearth; but the son had been too long accustomed to set the inclinations of the father at defiance, for such a trifle as this to be mooted between them.

There had been silence in the cottage for several minutes, which was at length broken by the old man, whose eyes, as he raised them from his employment, fell on his elder son. A deep sigh escaped him; and he shook his grey head mournfully, as he said in a tone rather of sorrow than rebuke:

"I wish I could see you working on the nets, my boy, instead of making that knife look fitter to commit murder with, than to serve as a tool for an honest man."

"Maybe you would," was the sullen reply; "but I leave needles and spinning-wheels to the women.—They don't suit me."

"And how do you expect to use such a knife as that will be, if you go on grinding it for another half hour?" asked his father, in the same subdued voice in which he had first spoken.

"I thought you said just now that it would do for murder," answered the young man, without looking up, or desisting for an instant from his occupation.

"Nay, nay, my dear Richard," interposed the meek old woman; "don't talk so to your father. He only spoke out of his love for you."

"Why are you so savage, Dick?" asked the young woman, in a sharp, wiry voice; "no one will take you for either a boy or a woman."

"Hold your tongue, Mary," was the answer, as the young man looked up, and glanced fiercely at her. "If I'm obliged to be baited by my father, I won't sit here to be twitted by my wife."

"Nonsense, my dear lad," again interposed the anxious mother; "the poor thing meant no harm."

"She'd better be minding her wheel than preaching to me," said Richard Horton; "but if she can do nothing else, she can hold her tongue; I suppose that won't interfere with her idleness."

"It becomes you to blame me, don't it?" laughed the girl bitterly; "you, who promised me, when I married you, that though, maybe, your parents were poor, I should have a house of my own, and the best of clothes and food! And what have you done for me? Here I am in your father's hovel, wearing the rags of the things I was married in, and living upon stale bread and fish! I, who could have had Geoffrey Maston, the miller, and ate the best of meat every day in the week, if I saw fit. And you reproach me with idleness! Didn't you tell me I should never put my hand to work? And didn't you entice me away from a comfortable home, only to make me a beggar?"

Richard Horton sprang to his feet, with clenched hands, suffering both the knife and the stone to fall to the floor; while the terrier, barely escaping a wound from the one or the other, bounded into the centre of the room with a quick short bark, and then stood motionless, with the poor remain of ears that he possessed fiercely cocked, and his solitary eye turned like a ball of fire upon his master, as if waiting until he should indicate a victim. The quailing mother had sunk back in her chair; but the fair young creature who had provoked the storm, rendered desperate by disappointment, did not even alter her position: while ere another word could be spoken, or a blow struck, the old man stood erect, and stretching out his nervous arm:

"Peace!" he shouted, with the voice of a stentor; "the first who offers violence to his own blood beside this hearth shall earn my curse! How now, Richard Horton; is it come to this? Pity, rather than punish, the poor weak girl you have taken to your bosom, and sworn to cherish and protect. Have more respect for the grey hairs of your mother, than to strike a blow under her very eyes. Have more respect for yourself than to raise your hand against a woman. For shame, for shame, my son! Let us rather sit down in fellowship and love, and advise together how we may mend the evils she complains of, than brawl and fight, as if we were drunkards in a beer-shop."

"I was quiet enough till I was baited like a bull," violently replied the young man. "Am I to blame that everything I have put my hand to has gone wrong since the black day of my marriage with a slatternly girl? Is it my fault that I can't dress her like the Squire's wife, and feed her as farmer Thomson crams his turkeys? Have not I have braved storms, and darkness, and a jail, and a felon's death, over and over again, to satisfy her selfish vanity? And must I be bullied out of my life, because I've failed? No, I say, no! Let her look to it; for when my day of luck comes, it shall be a heavy day for her."

"Richard," said the old man solemnly, as he pressed him back into his seat; "let us have no more of this; Mary was wrong, very wrong; but she's young, and didn't think of what she was saying. She only spoke in idleness."

"I'll be sworn she did, as she does every thing else," said young Horton with bitterness. "Look at her now, and show me if you can, in that untidy slutish woman sitting by your fire-side, what's left of the smart, active girl I lost my liberty to. Isn't it enough to make a man desperate—to turn him into a savage?"

"My son," interposed the old fisherman, "there was one thing wanting to make Mary a good wife, and that one was example. You took her from a station of life where she couldn't be fit for the hardships of a poor man's helpmate. You wouldn't be persuaded that your nets and your boat wouldn't keep her as she had been accustomed to be kept; and you mustn't blame her now if it don't answer."

"I never meant to keep her by such paltry means," was the sullen remark.

"I fear not, indeed," sighed the unhappy father; "and it is just upon that subject that I want to talk to you. Be persuaded, my boy; be persuaded, while there is yet time, to leave off the wretched trade you have taken up, and the wild associates you have got among; return to your old calling, and your father's heart. You may still be poor, but you'll offend no longer against th laws of God and man."

"Why, is there any commandment that says we shan't land the brandy, or the tobacco, or the dry goods that we've honestly paid for, whenever and wherever we please? No; the free-trader isn't a thief; he'a honestly told down his money for the articles, and he's a right to do as he will with them."

"Richard," exclaimed the old man in a tone of anguish, "you're a madman, and you'll bring yourself to the gallows!"

"Who knows but I may, if I live long enough," was the flippant answer; "but, at all events, I shall have many a good spree first, and show the stuff that I'm made of, instead of plunging through life like a coward or a fool."

"Peace, I say, once more," cried his father angrily; "I will have no such prison-talk under an honest roof; so throw aside this wicked nonsense, and tell me, like a reasonable being, if you can, what course of life you're determined on; for if you intend to follow up the trade you've commenced, you shan't bring suspicion and disgrace on your father's home, poor as it may be."

"I can't go on starving," said the young man sullenly: "and what's more, I won't. There's plenty of gold in the country, and he that can win it ought to wear it. Why should a man sit down quietly, and let the great folks put their heel upon his head, and crush him? or labour night and day to pamper the pride of a set of upstarts, who will grind out his youth and his strength, while he toils to earn a few pence, which must be wrung from the niggards at last, when he can put a bold heart upon the matter, and gain gold by his own courage?"

"Because the pence that are honestly earned will bring a blessing with them; and the gold that's got by stealth, with an uneasy conscience, and a constant fear of punishment, can only bring sorrow," said old Horton. "Don't talk to me of courage and a bold heart; true courage doesn't sneak about in the darkness, frightened at every sound, and ready every moment to make sure of its own safety by violence, and even murder. Let me tell you, Richard, that the boy sitting here at my feet has shown twice the courage that you have. He has withstood temptation, and done his duty, while you've been running your neck into danger, and grieving your parents' hearts."

"Ay, he's a brave one," said Richard, glancing at his brother askance with a contemptuous leer; "and he turns a pretty penny by his bold deeds; doesn't he? Why, I suppose he may make a matter of five shillings a-week when he sets himself about it?"

"And he makes them like an honest lad, Dick," said the old man. "Ned has no need to shirk when he sees a blue coat on the beach as he runs the boat ashore. Take care that, poor as his earnings may be, he isn't obliged some day to keep your wife out of them."

"She'll be well kept when that time comes, I shouldn't wonder," laughed the young smuggler—"I wish 'em both joy of it. However, we'll talk about that to-morrow: so give me my supper, mother, or I must be off without it."

Mrs. Horton obeyed without comment, but with a heavy heart; and the frugal meal was not yet over when a shrill whistle sounded from without, and Richard started to his feet; while the dog, hastily bolting a morsel of fish, which his master had just flung to him, rushed across the kitchen, and began to scratch against the door, as though he sought to open it, and escape into the free air.

"Richard, my son! my son! at least stay at home to-night," cried Jacob, rising from the table, and placing himself between the young man and the doorway. "In pity to my grey hairs, listen to me for once. I don't know why, Richard—for I'm but a poor, ignorant old man, and I'm afraid to give a wrong name to the terror that's upon me—but I feel as if I should get over all my sorrows if you would only stay at home to-night."

"I can't, father: we expect a cargo, and I must help to run it. I shan't be able to show my face again if I shirk; and I wouldn't give two-pence for my life if once the lads take into their heads that I mean to peach." And so saying, young Horton strove gently to put his father aside; but Jacob would not be so repulsed.

"Listen to me, Richard," he persisted; "you were the first born of our hearts, and would you break them now? I do implore you, even on my knees, do not go forth to-night." And as he uttered these words with a solemnity which smote even upon the stubborn spirit of him to whom they were addressed, the old man sank upon the floor at the feet of his unhappy son, and clung wildly to his knees. Young Horton turned turned away his face, while he endeavoured to loosen the strong grasp in which he was held; and with averted eyes continued his attempt to argue his agonised father out of an opposition which he had already resolved should be useless.

"Get up, get up, father," he said impatiently; "this is no moment for child's play; go I must, so it's of no use making me waste my time. However, let me see this cargo run, and then we'll talk about what can be done afterwards. Mind, I don't say that I'll give it up, but perhaps I may; for its true enough that I did promise Mary a place of her own, and a power of other things, and I should like to keep my word, only I don't choose to be told of it at every turn; and, besides, I want to show you all that I'm above the law, and a match for the 'long-shore bull-dogs any day in the week." And by the time that the misguided young man reached the climax of his speech, the touch of natural feeling with which it commenced had given place to a savage ferocity, worthy of the desperate errand upon which he was bent.

At this moment another whistle, shriller, but less sustained than the first, rang out upon the night air; and by a violent exertion of strength, Richard Horton wrenched himself from the old man's grasp, who, by the suddenness of the motion, was flung forward upon his face, and the gray hairs to which he had just so pathetically alluded, were trailing in the dust. The wretched young man turned one look upon his father, and muttering, "'Twas his own fault—he would have it so,"—he sprang across the threshold into the darkness, followed by the terrier. As Jacob fell, the second son started to his feet, and ere the door had closed behind his elder brother, he had raised his miserable parent tenderly in his arms, and led him back; with the large tears slowly trickling down his furrowed cheeks, to his settle by the fireside, whither Mary followed him.

"Don't take on so, father," he said, with an awkward attempt at consolation; "Dick's a wild chap, but he always contrives to keep himself out of trouble, whoever may get caught. Why, he was in that fray where Jack Smith and Ned Davis were took, though you never knew it; and you see he managed to get off clear. So, don't give up because Dick's been a bit rougher than usual to-night. He's a good fellow at bottom; and I warrant he'll be the first to be sorry for what he's done when he comes back."

"Ay," echoed Jacob, as if unconsciously, "when he comes back."

"There's a dozen of them down Dover-way said they'd have him; but you know they mayn't keep him for all that, when he comes to see rightly into the thing. He was over-persuaded."

"But they tried you, and you were not over-persuaded," answered his father, with a mournful shake of the head.

"Why, yes, so they did, to be sure," reluctantly acquiesced the good-natured lad; "but you see I'd no fancy that way."

"Heaven be praised! Heaven be praised!" said Jacob solemnly; and the sorrows of the afflicted family found a relief in silence.

Suddenly the report of a pistol was heard, ringing sharply out upon the night-wind; and it was succeeded by another and another, each apparently nearer than the last, to the cottage of the Hortons. Jacob clenched his hands more rigidly, and bent down his face upon them, until his long gray hair streamed over the dark tresses of his daughter-in-law, who had instinctively shrunk yet closer to him. The old woman fell back in her chair, and flung her apron over her head to conceal the agonized workings of her features; while Ned, the only individual of the party whom apprehension for a beloved though undeserving relative, had not deprived of his self-possession, bounded from the floor, and seizing a fish-spear which stood near him, was preparing to quit the cottage, when the movement attracted the attention of the old man, who, raising his head, and perceiving the intention of his son, exclaimed hurriedly, "Stir not a step, Edward, or you shall carry my curse with you! Am I to lose both of my boys in the same hour?—Stand fast, Ned; stand fast, I say. You cannot help him, and you may peril your own life in the fray. D'ye think I would sit here, old as I am, if I could save him one chance of ill? Let us pray, children; let us pray; there is no help but from above." And while he was yet speaking, the old man sank upon his knees in supplication, and those about him silently followed his example.

It may seem strange, that as this was by no means the first time that Richard Horton had come into collision with the preventive force, the emotion of the family should have been so powerful; but it must be remembered that a presentiment of evil had settled upon the spirit of his father; and, moreover, the sounds of the conflict had never before approached so near to the threshold of the old fisherman. The next half hour, even occupied as it was in prayer, appeared almost interminable to those whose petitions were diverted from their earnestness by the continued signals of violence from without. But at length all was still: and after a brief interval of agonised and voiceless devotion, Jacob Horton rose from his knees, and sighing deeply, resumed his seat. One by one his wife and children also placed themselves beside him; and then, without a word of comment or speculation, they all awaited, in mute anxiety, the re-appearance of the young smuggler.

Some time had passed away in this melancholy watching, when suddenly the tramp of steps, and the clamour of voices, once more came upon the silence of the night; and now there was no farther interval of stillness, for each was conscious that those without were slowly but certainly approaching the cottage, and ere long a heavy blow with the stock of a pistol upon the door, and the cessation of the steps, announced that the strangers, be they whom they might, desired admittance.

"Draw the bolt, Ned," said Jacob, in a voice that sounded hollow, and almost extinct; "draw the bolt, and let him enter, for the last time, under the roof of his father."

The young man sprang forward, and did as he was desired; when, as the door fell back, the figure of one of the coast-guard was seen upon the threshold. "I'm sorry to disturb your family so late at night, Master Horton," he said civilly, as he nodded to the old fisherman, who sat transfixed, with clenched hands and glaring eyeballs, the very embodiment of prophetic horror; "but we've had a skirmish with the smugglers just under the turn of the cliff, and want to know what we've caught. So lend us a light, will you, young man, and help us to get him up to the fort?" And taking from the hand of Edward Horton the lantern in which he had hastily placed their solitary candle, he bent over the dying man, and held the light close to his face. As soon he had done so, he uttered a long low whistle of astonishment and perplexity, and continued gazing upon the blood-stained countenance for several seconds, ere he again glanced towards the group in the cottage kitchen. "Sit still, Jacob; sit still, old man," he continued with rough kindness, as he saw that the fisherman had risen from his seat, and was approaching the door; "this is no sight for you; so heave ahead there, my lads, and pick up this chap; there's life in him, maybe, yet; and we can get help at the fort, if Master Ned here will bear a hand with the lantern."

"No, no," cried Jacob, with hysterical violence; "here—here, where he drew his first breath, let him draw his last. I know—I see—I feel that it is he! I am old, but you cannot cheat me in this! Leave him, and go—go! Stay not here, for his blood is on you; and I, miserable old man that I am, I am his father. Leave him to me now, he cannot break the law again."

"I am afraid," said the principal of the party doubtingly, "that it's more than I dare do; for it's no use denying that you're right in your guess, Master Horton, more's the pity. But, after all, as you say, there's an end to his smuggling (for I believe he's gone outright;) and if you'll only promise that he shall be forthcoming if it should prove otherwise, why, I don't care if I strain a point, and run the risk."

"Go, then—go," said Jacob huskily. "leave us to our dead, and let us close our door upon them that slew him. You have done your duty, and I will not curse you; but go, for it kills me to look upon you."

"Poor soul! it's natural enough," said the rough sailor, as he turned to depart; "well, good night t'ye, Jacob, and better luck for the future." And without the interchange of another word, the father of the slain man parted from his slayers, whose steps had ceased to be heard ere he approached the dead body of his son, which had been lifted across the threshold by two of the blockade-guard.

While this short dialogue was going forward, the wretched mother stood in the centre of the floor, speechless and motionless; her dilated eyes riveted on the livid and upturned countenance of her son, her lips parted with a voiceless agony, and her form as rigid as that of a statue. The miserable wife had been unconscious from the first moment in which her eyes had fallen upon the body of her husband; and she lay back upon her chair, with her long hair, which had escaped from under her cap, streaming to the ground, and her arms hanging helplessly beside her. Perhaps the individual of the group who at that moment suffered the most intensely, was the brother; for there was a solemnity in the old man's grief which bore him up.

The other actors in this humble tragedy did not, however, long continue in the partial passiveness of feeling in which their first anguish had found a temporary mitigation. Ere long, shriek after shriek rang through the cottage, and the distracted wife, awakening from her trance, flung herself frantiely upon the dead body of her husband, mingling with her wail for him the most bitter reproaches upon herself: while the heart broken mother, less demonstrative, but even more affecting in her despair, seated herself upon the floor, and having lifted the head of her lost son upon her lap, bent over it until it was hidden from the gaze of those about her. The sterner grief of the old man was tearless; but as he stood leaning over his wife, a thousand thoughts of the past were called up by the dark realities of the present; and he felt rebuked by the very vices of the son over whom he mourned.

He lay there who had been reluctantly granted to his impatient beseechings, when he wearied Heaven with prayers for that which it withheld in mercy: and thus drew down a malediction and a punishment in what he deemed, in his blindness, must be a blessing. How was his pride humbled now! How was his presumption levelled with the dust! Like the first man, when he hung over the corpse of Abel, he felt that for him death had indeed come into the world!—There lay the scoffer against the law, stricken down by the very law that he had spurned. He, whose proud spirit had revolted against labour, and who had left his wife a pauper upon the compassion of the brother whom he had affected to dispise—the disobedient son who had been the awful instrument of retribution and rebuke to his own parents—the man who had repaid good with evil, love with scorn; and who had taught a great and fearful moral to his fellow-men, by proving, in his short and dark career, how much of misery, of anguish, and of shame, may be brought upon a whole family, and not unfrequently upon a wide circle, by the errors and vices of an individual. It were vain to dwell upon the misery of the Hortons. Suffice it, that not even the devoted and dutiful affection of the surviving son could blot out from the memory of Jacob and his wife the disgrace which had been brought upon them by the errors of their lost one; while the widow, who was thrown upon their pity, became a sadder and a wiser woman, earnest to repair, by her activity and gratitude, the indolence and thanklessness of her married life. The good character which the old people had borne for more than half a century, stood their friend in this season of trial; and not a finger was raised in scorn of them or theirs; and it was well that it was so, for grief already lay so heavy at their hearts, that it was bowing them rapidly to the grave.

MERRY OLD HOUSEHOLD FIRE.

BY JOSIAH D. BANGS.

I love the fire, the clear wood-fire,
With its merry old honest blaze,
As its light beams forth, like a glance of mirth,
From a friend of the olden days.
The fire!—the fire!—the bright-browed fire!
With its voice like a pleasant lay,
And its laugh outright, at the frosty spite,
And storms of old winter gray!

They may drag the coal from its dusky hole,
Like an imp from the pit of shame,
And the cold, rich walls, 'round palace halls,
May glow with its sullen flame,
But the cheek will pale, as a sickly veil
Were over the features thrown;
And the eye grow dim, unnerved the limb,
At the glance of the burning stone.

Yet never you fear the wood-fire clear,
As it leaps from the hearth-stone high,
As it sparkles and spits, and sings by fits,
Will sadden the cheek or eye.
Oh, no!—not so!—but a rosier glow,
O'er the blushing cheek spreads free,
And the eye grows bright, with a merrier light,
In the blaze of the green-wood tree.

I love the fire—the old wood-fire,
'Neath the humble roof that gleams,—
As a welcome warm from wind and storm,
For the weary and sad it beams.
For the houseless poor, at the palace door,
Need seek no sheltering dome,
While never as yet hath the wanderer met
Repulse in the poor man's home.

That pilgrim band, as they touched the strand,
'Mid the gloom of the tempest dire,
They kindled it then, those stern-browed men,
The merry old household fire.
And the stoutall trees that had braved the breeze
Long 'ere the Mayflower came;
Their forms still bow to feed e'en now,
That homely but hallowed flame.

And I love that fire—the household fire,
For it speaks of the olden time,
When the voice and look were an open book,
And true to the heart's deep chime;
When the simple prayer that was uttered there,
In the calm still hour of even,
Though the words on earth might have their birth,
The thought seemed fresh from Heaven.

Oh! ne'er may it die, as a thought gone by,
That gleams on the hearth-stone free;
But aye let it leap, and sparkle and sweep
'Round the heart of the green-wood tree.
Forever the same may its bright broad flame
Shine out with a cheerful blaze,
And around it still fond feelings thrill,
As they did in the olden days.

MONEY TO MAKE OUT;

OR,

THE EVILS OF DEBT.

BY MRS. H. M. DODGE.

"Unfortunate, indeed! There is Col. B., and I must meet him, or cross over the street, which, by the by, I can do, with a very good grace, as there is a table on the opposite walk, covered with fine flower pots, arranged for sale. Really, that's too bad! He is crossing too, and I must meet him after all! I began to hope that I should reach home this morning, without the honor of another dun."

"Good morning, Mr. Hall, how are you?"

"Quite well myself, Colonel, but—but my child is rather ill, so you will please excuse me, as I must be in haste."

"With all my heart, Mr. Hall; but when you have a little leisure, we will look over our accounts, as I have a large sum of money to make out within a week, and shall therefore be under the necessity of calling in all my dues. Good morning."

"Money to make out! This is the universal cry. Now, there is not, in the whole English language, another combination of words which can fill my mind with such strange gloom and terror, as that same 'money to make out!' Should a bold assassin enter my chamber at midnight, present a dagger to my bosom, and bid me fight for my life, it would not horrify me half so much as the entrance of a kind friend, whom I owed and could not pay, if I guessed he had 'money to make out.' Were I in a frail vessel, in the midst of a furious tempest, and should I hear the Captain say, after a long and desperate struggle of effort, that all was over, and we were sinking into the dark bosom of the deep, it would not unnerve me half so much as that dreadful 'money to make out.' Nor if I hung on the tallest spire of St. Peter's Church at Rome, and saw the whole vast building a mass of red flame beneath me, methinks I should not feel one half the strange uneasiness that maddens my brain when I am told, with a peculiar nod, there is money to be made out. Yes, and what would be, if possible, still worse, were I fastened to the fatal table of the Inquisition, watching the slowly descending swinging knife, as it came nearer—nearer—nearer,—until it whizzed my very hair, I am sure that a colder horror would not then curdle my life-blood, than that which comes out of that most fearful of all arrangements of letters, 'money to make out.'"

Thus mused our genteel and richly dressed city mechanic, as he passed rapidly up Broadway, looking neither to the right hand nor the left, lest he should meet some too familiar countenance. Just as he turned into the street which led to his own house, he met a woman, who was selling early strawberries. She asked him to buy. He thought he could not afford it, but the fruit looked delicious. He fumbled his pockets, and finally succeeded in bringing out a fifty cent piece. This would purchase enough for a fine dessert; and, any way, it was only fifty cents, if he was in debt; and, certainly, such a trifle could not affect him; so he gave the woman the only piece of coin he possessed, and directed her where to leave the fruit. He had walked on but a few rods, when a ragged, half-starved looking little negro boy stepped into the path before him, and very impertinently said his mother wanted the money he owed her for washing.

"Very well, my little man," said Mr. Hall, who was sometimes rather complimentary, when unexpectedly dunned; "but I have no change to-day, though I shall have some this week."

"Mother said she must have it now," persevered the boy, in a louder tone of voice. "It's only fifty cents, sir; she has some money to make out to pay her rent, and if it ain't paid by to-night, we shall be kicked into the street in the morning."

"Money to make out again!" groaned Mr. Hall, with strides which left the little blackey far in the rear, and soon brought him to the marble steps of his dwelling. "Who could have believed that even the mouths of the very negro boys in the street, would open, to pour upon me those words of shame and madness?"

He entered a large and handsome back parlor, threw himself on a sofa, and covering his face with his handkerchief, he charged the maid to admit no person to that room, and to answer all inquiries after himself with a "not at home."

We do not know exactly what passed in his mind during the hour which he remained in that position; for he gave no other signs of life than a wild whisper of the word "debt," followed by a convulsive shiver, when the door-bell was once heard to ring; but we will take his own text, and thus innocently fill up this painful blank of time by imagining what the sermon might have been; and if our words are not precisely the same as those by which he expressed his feelings to his own mind, still, we doubt not but there may be a very striking similarity between the ideas.

"Debt! Who is nursing a scorpion in his bosom, until the poison will taint his whole blood, and madness or death will ensue? It is the man in debt?—Who is clinging to the top of the unsheltered, eternal rock, gazing with bursting eye on the vast and wide expanse of ocean around him, and exposed to the pitiless vengeance of the wild elements, with no hope of escape? It is the man in debt! Who is sailing on the calm waters, far above Niagara, and delighting himself by gazing into the clear depths beneath him, knows not his position, until the changed motion and the staggering rapidity of his boat startles him with the dreadful truth that he is in the rapids, and is nearing with increasing speed the frightful chasm? It is the man in debt! Ah! and who is leaning over Ætna's cratur, and while he gazes far down into the depths of boiling flame, feels his foot slip, his balance lost, and finds himself sinking—sinking? It is the man in debt!"

At length our man in debt sprang upon his feet, with an energy so wild, and yet so determined, that one might well have imagined that he believed himself suspended over the warring fires of the volcano, and fully designed to make good his escape. His eye gleamed with new fire, and his countenance glowed with a strange brightness. He strided the room rapidly, and clearly evinced, by his quick glances from one thing to another, that some new and important subject was undergoing a thorough investigation in his mind. Once he paused, and carefully examined the quality of his coat and pants, the high lustre of his satin vest, the fineness of his linen, and the gold chain, which was the safeguard of a one hundred and fifty dollar watch. Then he glanced at his wife's piano, but quickly turned from it with a deep sigh to a long and sorrowful gaze upon the flower-pots arranged in the back yard. The dinner bell at length broke in upon his reveries, and an unusual expression was seen on his countenance when he entered the dining room. His wife tenderly inquired the cause, but he replied only by a strict scrutiny of her cap, her dress, the furniture of the room, and lastly, of every thing upon the table. After the meats were removed, a beautiful glass dish, filled with strawberries covered with cream and loaf sugar, was brought in and placed on the table. He started at the sight, as though an adder had bitten him, and his affectionate wife again inquired the cause of his strange conduct.

"We are not able to afford such things, Lucy," said he quickly.

"Why, my dear," answered Mrs. Hall, "the woman told Betty that you paid only fifty cents for them."

"Only fifty cents!" reiterated the husband, rising from his chair; "the bill of our poor washerwoman is only fifty cents, and though she greatly needs it to-day, I cannot pay it in consequence of purchasing this unnecessary fruit."

"Unnecessary!" repeated Mrs. Hall, with a sneer.

"But wife," added he, with a severe determination in his voice, "there must be a change in our affairs. I cannot live longer as I have lived for a year or two past. I am no longer a man among men. I am dunned at the corner of every street, and am always afraid to look about me, lest I should meet the eye of some one whom I owe. I am utterly crushed with debts, and if there cannot be a change we are lost!"

The pretty lip of the young wife pouted in silence.

"I repeat it, with the strong emphasis of a drowning man, there must be a change in our affairs. We must abridge."

"Abridge!" cried Mrs. Hall, reddening to her very temples, "what can we possibly abridge?"

"My dear," continued Mr. Hall, with a soothing tone, as he beheld the distress of a wife whom he most tenderly loved, "any sacrifice which you may be obliged to make, will cost me a far more severe trial than it can possibly cost you; but I see no other way—we must abridge our expenditures."

A long pause succeeded. At length Mr. Hall resumed:

"My brother has a less lucrative trade than mine, and yet with a family three times as numerous, he owes no man a dollar; besides, he has money in the Bank."

"And he works like a slave with his own hands," replied Mrs. Hall, "and just look at his wife—she is always in the kitchen, like a bound girl. Besides, only think of two dreary, half furnished parlors, and such a morsel of a kitchen, with no nursery!"

"And I intend to work with my own hands, too," answered the husband; "and my dear, as we have but one child, can't you give up your nursery and nursery maid?"

Mrs. Hall turned pale. Had it come to that?—Must she be tied up to her own offspring, no longer able to ride, walk, or visit at pleasure?

"And," continued he, cautiously, "if we had a smaller house, we could do with less help in the kitchen; and besides, we should need less furniture, and several expensive, and nearly useless articles, might be turned into the payment of debts. My gold watch, and your piano"——

The poor wife sunk back in her chair, and covering her face, burst into a hysterical flood of tears.—Had she heard the conclusion of the sentence, she might perhaps have felt more for her husband than for herself—for, pressing his hands against his throbbing heart, he declared that death, but not debt, was preferable to asking her to make this last sacrifice, and with hollow groans he traversed the apartment.

Mrs. Hall was the spoiled child of indulgence; still she was naturally kind and amiable, and nothing was wanting but the proper circumstances and the right direction given to her feelings, to develope her true character, and make her a most patient and self-denying wife. That afternoon, as soon as her husband had gone, she ran over the street, to see old Mrs. Green—a woman highly esteemed by all, for her excellent good sense, as well as for her kind and sympathetic heart—and to her she made know her troubles.

"Tush! tush! child," said the old lady with a smile, "never mind that. Just come down patiently to your altered circumstances, and trust me for it, you'll be a great deal better off some day, than you ever were yet."

"But how shall I begin?" said the young wife, wiping away her tears.

"Begin? Why begin by giving up all you can do without, and be comfortable. Let the piano go first."

"Don't name it, Mrs. Green. Oh! my dear piano! what should I do without its music?"

"Its music? Would not the music of your husband's happy heart, relieved from the burden of debt, be much sweeter in your ears? Give up the piano—it is a childish toy compared with his peace."

"And what next? Mrs. Green," inquired Mrs. Hall, as a new light seemed to animate her countenance.

"Why, dear woman," replied the old lady, tapping her under the chin; "after you have parted with all you can spare, have taken a low rent house, and dismissed all your help but one girl, then begin one of the sweetest things that a mother ever had to do—the taking care of your own dear baby; and you will soon find its little smiles and love will more than repay all your efforts."

"Mrs. Green! my friends would all shun me! Just think of Mrs. Brown, and Mrs. Willet, and Mrs. Goodenne"——

"Stop! stop! child—what have you to do with them? They will not pay your husband's or your debts. Besides, if they are persons of good common sense, they will not despise you for conduct which it is both your duty and interest to perform, and if why should you care for their friendship? It is not on them that you are dependent for happiness, but, as the old-fashioned poetry says—

> "From our own selves our joys must flow,
> And that dear hut our home."

Now, let me assure you that nothing affords greater contentment than independence—even on a small scale—and this your poor husband is fully prepared to enjoy. I have been told for a long time that he was deeply in debt, and that he was toiling to keep up a style and appearance which he could not long maintain. Yes, Mrs. Brown and Mrs. Willet both told me so, and they said, too, that he owed their husbands money, which they had often asked him for, but never expected to get."

"Is it so, then," replied Mrs. Hall, sobbing like a grieved child. "I am glad you told me that. It will help to crush this pride, and nerve me up to duty. My resolution is taken. Dear Mrs. Green, you have saved me."

"But let me give you a little advice," said the old lady, "before you commence your new course of life. I have been over the same ground myself, and I can assist and encourage you a great many times, by telling you how I got along, and perhaps you may profit a good deal by my experience. In the first place, and I consider this very important too, never appear depressed or discouraged before your husband. Your cheerfulness will do much to keep up his courage, and assist him in the labor and self-denial which he will have to encounter. If you have any sad feelings, either suppress them entirely, or give them vent when you are alone; but above all things, never upbraid him. This would inflict a wound upon his very heartstrings, and I should greatly fear, would shake the foundation of his affection for you. At any rate, don't make the experiment. You say your husband was always kind and indulgent; be assured then that he will do the best for you that he can; and even if, in his righteous determination to throw off the burden of debt, and restore to every man he owes his own property, he should sometimes be obliged to deny you conveniences which you may find it difficult to do without, don't repine before him or make use of any short words; nay, don't even let a shade pass over your countenance; but let him see that you can cheerfully deny yourself for his sake. I can assure you, he will not forget such things, but will reward you when he is able. There is another rule which you must adopt, and impress it daily on the mind of your husband, if you would get out of debt: never buy what you do not strictly need, nor even then, if you cannot pay for the article when you take it—do without it rather than make a debt. This is what has crushed you."

Mrs. Hall went home with altered feelings. She examined all her furniture, and selected the plainest and most useful articles to be retained. She looked at her beloved piano, and the tears would start, but she dashed them away, and said the sacrifice must be made. It was the gift of her dear husband on the morning of their marriage, and it should be given up for his sake. Suddenly a new thought crossed her mind. She was a fine musician—every one admired her at the piano. The instrument, if sold, would not probably bring half its value—would it not be more advantageous to keep it, and become a music teacher? She screamed with joy at the thought—Several young ladies of her acquaintance were about commencing music. In less than three hours, she had visited every one of them, and had engaged ten scholars, at $50 per annum. Four of the young ladies were the daughters of merchants whom Mr. Hall was indebted for a less sum than the amount of the music lessons.

"And, now," said she, as she flew home with the lightness of a happy bird, "they will never dun my dear husband again."

That night Mr. Hall walked Broadway with a slow step and heavy heart. He had seen most of his creditors, told them his plan, and arranged with some of them to take his most valuable furniture and his watch. He had dismissed his foreman, determining to fill that station himself, and he had rented a small but convenient two story house, at $180 per annum. This was in reality the best afternoon's work which he had done for more than two years; still he was miserable. When he went out, he left his wife in a paroxysm of tears; how could he meet her and tell her of his arrangements? He passed his own door several times, and walked up and down the street with the feelings of an outcast. He was unable to ring the bell, and sat down on the steps to meditate on his wretched lot. At length observing that the back gate was open, he passed into the kitchen, and stole softly up stairs. The nursery door stood ajar, and he heard his wife singing Watt's cradle hymn with a cheerful voice, and rocking her infant in her arms. He felt encouraged, and the next moment he was embracing the two dearest objects of his earthly love. The young wife tenderly smoothed back the long black locks which had fallen over his forehead, and assured him that she was never so happy as at that moment. Then she went on to tell him all her little plans, and while he met the animated glances of her sweet blue eyes, he pressed her still closer to his heart, and felt that he too was happy.

Two years from that evening, Mr. Hall owed no man a shilling. He still lived in the same small house, still labored early and late, and his wife still taught music; but had you searched the city over, you could scarcely have found so happy a family.—Every prospect of wealth began to dawn upon them, and they looked back, with grateful hearts, on the vortex of ruin from which they had so narrowly escaped.

DANCING SONG.

Dance, dance, as long as ye can,
We must travel through life, but why make a dead
march of it?
The fine linen of State may sit well upon man,
But 'tis pleasant, methinks, just to rub out the starch of it.

Dance, dance, as long as ye may,
See the plumes of the pine, how they dance on the mountain;
See the ocean floods dance while the winds pipe
and play,
See the radiant bubble-drops dance in the fountain.

Dance, dance, let no cynic rebel,
See the stars are for ever all dancing and twinkling;
'Tis the music of spheres that they dance to so well,
And that music is ceaseless, though soft be the tinkling.

Dance, dance, every one,
The goats round our heads dance in endless gyration;
The very worlds foot it away round the sun,
Keeping up the old figure first led by Creation.

Dance, dance, see the sweet rose
Bend to the blue-bell in light minuetting;
Summer leaves fall when the autumn gust blows,
But they dance and die merrily wildly pouzetting.

Dance, dance, look on the hill,
The white lilies nod, and the bulrushes quiver;
The beautiful water-flags! when are they still?
They dance in the mill-pond, they dance in the river.

Dance, dance, see over-head,
How the clouds dance along, with their gaudy robes streaming;
Look below, see the legion of dancers that spread
In the corn-ears that shake with their golden crowns gleaming.

Dance, dance, the wisp-light will try
With its harlequin dancing to tempt the lost ranger;
The flame of the ingle-log dances on high,
To shed joy in the household, and beacon the stranger.

Dance, dance, the savage is found
Dancing in fury, in triumph, and laughter;
The child from the village school trammels unbound,
Dances as rarely he's seen to dance after.

Dance, dance, as long as ye may,
Nature gets up a great "ballet" about us;
Her stage-room is vast, so come trip it away,
For Life's Opera cannot be perfect without us.

George Washington Wilkins.

The Man who lived for his Country.

BY H. HASTINGS WELD.

It has been queried whether party newspapers are or are not a public blessing. Mrs. George W. Wilkins has no doubt that they are a domestic nuisance.

It has been debated whether caucus, spontaneous or newspaper nomination is the proper way to bring a candidate before the public. On this, as on the first point, Mrs. Wilkins has but one opinion—that all party machinery only tends to domestic derangement.

In the fable, the comparative merit of the party who first touch the heel, and of that which first plants the toes in walking, remains an open question. So do parallel cases in our own republic. On such subjects again, Mrs. W. is quite unanimous. Her motto is, "a plague o' both your houses!"

There are more women of Mrs. Wilkin's "political faith" than there would be, if there were more men of the right kind. Public spirit is lauded in the newspapers, and greeted with three times three cheers at the "Head Quarters"—but a man's spirit should not run so entirely into public channels as to leave him no interest in domestic matters. Mr. W.'s did. His heart was in whatever canvass might be on foot, till his dear duck at home found herself entirely forgotten. His thoughts were oftener on election returns than on his own profit-and-loss account; and he knew the salary and value of every office in the State and Union, better than he did his own baker's bill. Domestic matters, pressed upon his notice, were regarded as inopportune and unimportant intrusions; just as the real business of the nation is set aside in Washington, while the Congressmen are more agreeably employed in talking of themselves against time, and for party. His children fared as ill as private claims on the Congressional docket; the principle in both places being heroically to scout and neglect what should be attended to, and to give the whole thought to what were better left undone and unsaid.

Mr. Wilkins soothed his conscience with the plea that he "lived for his country." No doubt his country is very much obliged to him, but it has unfortunately hitherto taken no method to make its sense of that obligation apparent, or to lessen any of its weight. Meanwhile, as we have hinted, his own affairs were falling not a little behind hand; and it did not require more than the ordinary penetration of a woman to discover that fact. Still, with the recklessness of a gambler, the more he suffered by his negligence towards his own affairs, the more inattentive did he become; seeking in the excitement of partisan politics and the hazards of party chances, that occupation of his mind that should enable him to shut his eyes upon the financial difficulties that were accumulating about him, and the domestic discomfort which had now invaded his once happy house. At the time when our sketch opens he had become desperate.—His patriotism was no more a thing of volition or a mere amusement. It was life and death with him. He had spent time and money so liberally, so extravagantly, that office alone could make him whole, or, failing in that, could provide him with a refuge from absolute want. At least so he thought. Still he endeavored to conceal his dilemma. He succeeded, but only partially. His heaviest creditors suspected the truth, but they were too politic to betray him. Wise after their generation, they very disinterestedly turned their influence in aid of his hopes. In another man's case, with Wilkins for a looker-on, he would have comprehended their motives. In his own he was too blind to see them, or if he suspected the state of the case, he would not acknowledge it, even to himself.

Mrs. George W. Wilkins grew impatient. We have said that she had penetration enough to discover that he was embarrassed, but she did not understand the whole of his difficulties, nor all of his motives. Irked at his neglect of her, she resolved to make an effort to bring him back to domestic habits again. On one Monday morning she begged him for the evening of that day to be hers.

"Beg pardon, my dear," said the husband, as he peeped at her for a moment over the top margin of a political newspaper: "but this evening I am, unfortunately, engaged with the committee of safety."

The wife was disappointed but she persevered.

"Well, then, George, to-morrow evening will do."

"Unlucky again"—the husband really began to feel sorry—"but to-morrow evening I must meet the county delegates."

"County fudge!" Mrs. George W. was going to say, but she did not. It would have been both unwifelike and unladylike. She drew a long breath and said, "perhaps, then, my dear, on Wednesday evening?"

Mr. W. had glanced down the leading column of his paper, and reddened—partly with confusion, and partly with impatience—as he peeped under the margin, and answered, "really, Ann, I am sorry, but I am engaged on that night to meet the ward committee on important business."

"Thursday night?"

Wilkins bit his lips. He was attempted to say something hasty. He looked at his children and thought better of it. "I should be happy to be with you every evening, but the other party are straining every nerve; we must employ all our tactics, and on Thursday night the list of nominees for the city watch is to be examined and fixed upon."

"Say Friday night, then." This was spoken in a voice a little sharp. Both husband and wife were now restrained by good breeding alone from what would have seemed very like a quarrel.

Wilkins had now reached the top of his paper again, and, forseeing that he was to be compelled to answer for every night in the week, he said, "I perceive you are determined, Mrs. Wilkins, to have the whole arcana of party management out of me. On that evening we have to decide between the claims of two 'boss sweepers,' to determine which of them is likely to marshal most votes in his troop of scavengers."

"Very important business, certainly, Mr. Wilkins. But after having thus spent five nights out of six abroad, you will give us the sixth at home?"

"I would, but—"

"Come now, George"—

"I am really sorry, but I have promised myself to two or three of our fellows. The truth is, that some people are to be managed one way and some another. We have on that night a little supper."

"And you are wanted to pay the whole bill, as usual, I presume," said the wife, out of all patience. Wives never look at such things through their husband's spectacles."

"You know I am never guilty of such extravagant folly," said George W., with some heat.

"But you do 'become responsible,'" said his wife, "and that amounts to the same thing in the end."

"Ann," said the husband, in a softened tone, "I am sorry to find you prying so much into my business. It is unlike you."

"George," she answered, cadence for cadence in his manner, for both were grieved, "I regret that you force it upon me;" and stretching her hand up for the card-rack, she took out and handed him quite a parcel of tradesmen's bills. "I am deeply mortified that you do not, as you did once, either anticipate these or leave me the means to pay them."

"Tell them to call at the counting-room," said the husband, as he left the table and took his way nominally to his business. He was in a sad state of perplexity. It lasted until he met the first political friend; dissipated then for an instant, the feeling of uneasiness returned with every business step that was forced upon him. He was, indeed, like all gamblers, most miserable while the mighty stake was pending; but he counted on a relief from all, when his appointment should reach him. On this he firmly counted. He really earned it twice over, as party services are estimated, and still daily he was struggling, "playing the patriot," to "make assurance doubly sure." What a life for a freeman!

Hardly had Wilkins left his house, when No. 1 of the applicants, whose "address" Mrs. Wilkins had packed in the card-rack, sent his daily messenger.—She knew the rest would follow, and afraid of the saucy look the servant would give her as the stereotyped answer would be given to each dun, she put on her hat and hurried out, unfashionable as was the hour. The child's heart, let whatever other ties may grow about it, tends ever back to its earliest support, and Mrs. Wilkins' steps mechanically carried her to her father's house. Her mother, after a word or two of greeting, left the room. The daughter rose to follow.

"Ann!"

She started at her father's voice, and as she turned, perceived that he had folded up the paper he had been reading, and was placing his spectacles in his pocket. The daughter awaited what he might have to say to her.

"Close the door, my child, and sit down by me."

Without knowing to what this all might tend, she complied. There was a moment of silence and embarrassment. The father abruptly said, at length—

"Ann, I refused to-day to endorse your husband's paper."

The poor woman turned pale, then red, then burst into tears and buried her face in her hands. This was so cruel! And how had she deserved it? But the skilful physician probes deep before he attempts to apply the remedy. The old gentleman proceeded:

"You know your husband is in difficulties."

The wife nodded.

"And that he never can recover himself." This was said in the kindest of tones, and her father had taken her hand and was looking with all a parent's earnest affection into her face. He proceeded—"I am not poor, at any rate. I could have done him the favor he desired—and much more—but it were only to throw a bubble to be swallowed in the ocean of his losses. He does not appear to know it, but he is a hopelessss bankrupt."

The wife had now nerved herself for the worst, and sat erect, pale, but composed. It was now the father's turn to give way, and the old man wept.

"Your husband should have told you this, but I know he has not. I saw you coming, and wished to spare your mother the pain of this interview. I have no reproaches for you; you must have none for him. It will do no good."

The daughter's lips trembled.

"You must not want; your dear children must not,"

"Their father!" whispered the wife.

"And he must not either. But, Ann, he must not ruin me first, and then make a double shipwreck of character and substance."

The father rose and paced the floor. Ann revolved these deeply discouraging matters in her mind. She thought of herself, her children—worse than all, her husband—dependent and beggared. She felt almost as if her father was no more a father, and resolved at one moment to go away without accepting or thanking him for his vague, and, as it seemed to her, his ungracious offer of assistance. Then she remembered the tradesmen's bills—the very servants unpaid—and felt as if she had no more a home to return to.

Her father did not keep her long in suspense, for the mother, thinking probably that he had had abundance of time, now returned. The presence of a third person gave new collectedness to both, and the old gentleman proceeded to tell her that he had settled upon her enough for comfortable maintenance; and he pressed upon her acceptance the first quarter's income, from his own hand.

"And now," he said, "there is but one condition which I exact. Not a word of this to-day or to-morrow, to your husband; keep your secret till he makes you his confidant."

It was hard to promise. It was hard to thank her father. It was impossible to control her feelings, and she burst afresh into tears. He escaped the contagion by hurrying away, and Ann returned home to find a tradesman's boy just turning chop-fallen from the door. She called him back, and enjoyed that cheapest of all luxuries, the satisfaction of paying the demand. We say cheapest, because when you give another but his own, and receive pleasure thereby, you certainly buy joy with another's capital.

Now, once more happy, how did she burn to let out the secret! She saw her husband post away at night; she knew now his nervous anxiety for occupation, and was half inclined to quarrel with him that he did not make her his help-meet. How much do those mistake, who fancy that the wife cannot be a man's best counsellor!

Ann was almost miserable in her happiness. She felt that with a word she could stay his uneasiness, for now, with the key to his conduct, she could read in his moody countenance the anxiety he felt for his wife and family. She saw his hand tremble as he passed his fingers through Jane's flaxen curls; she knew that it was not a cold which made his voice husky when he said, "we will see about that," as Jane asked him if she was not to join the new music class at school. And as the boys clambered upon his knees, and dinned their begging petitions into his ears, she saw that he would have pushed them rudely away, in his agony of hoarded and concealed perplexity, if he had only dared to say, what they must soon feel, that their father was a beggar!

Still he went to the meeting of the committee.—Can a gambler stay away from his dice? His all was staked on party devotion; he must play his part down to the last instant, and while hope remained. Should he fail after all!

That fear haunted his dreams. He groaned in his sleep, and then the groan was followed by a mumbled party shout—and then an exclamation of disgust—of loathing. Then her own name, "poor Ann!" Oh, how she longed, as she watched his face, in his troubled sleep, to shout joy in his ear, and read to him her father's deed of settlement! But she was pledged to silence, though her heart ached!

A strange enigma is human nature. Will it be believed that after all, before she slept, she had determined upon tormenting him more still? And yet she did. It is a trick of the fondest friendship, when you see one whom you love in despondency, to add to his vexation, that the relief may be more exhilarating.

Mr. Wilkins almost feared that the furnishing of the next breakfast would be wanting. He started with puzzled pleasure at the well-spread board; but he asked no questions. It seemed to him an omen of good, and he took hold of the morning paper with an affectation of more than ordinary engagedness, lest his wife should obtrude some unwelcome news upon him. He would not have been surprised to hear that the baker had cut off supplies, his butcher refused another steak, or his cook struck for arrearages. But no such word came; no word of any kind. His coffee was sipped to the lees, and no kind voice asked for "his cup." He looked over, and then let the paper down to the floor to gaze in undisguised astonishment at the breakfast scene.

The sugar-bowl was crowned with a ragged pamphlet. The toast was hidden under a newspaper. The tea-pot was turned into a Chinese pagoda, with more roof than body, by an open document which rested upon it. The whole breakfast paraphernalia was thus displaced, and Mrs. W. was deep in the colums of a society report, or some such matter.—Little Johnny had quietly doubled up his spoon to make a bridge from his bowl to his saucer, of the same comparative cost to his bread and milk that the future Harlem bridge will be to its purpose. Little Sam, on the other side, had straightened the sugar-tongs, as an approach to the demonstration of the problem that a good rule works both ways; and little Jane was mapping diagrams on the table with slops.

"Mrs. Wilkins!" he cried. The children started, and Mrs. W. leisurely looked up. "Your children are doing all manner of mischief!"

"Ah!" said the lady, keeping her finger on the place where she was reading, that she might not lose it, "Well, I do really wish that you would take care of them."

The father sent them from the room. "Ann," he began, "this practical joke is unkind. If you only knew!"—The door-bell rang, and a note was brought in for "George Washington Wilkins, Esq." He read it—turned pale—and, rising from the table, stood staring out of the window to conceal his face from his wife. She went up, and resting her hand upon his shoulder, looked anxiously and affectionately into his face. He would have shaken her off, his heart melted and he could not. He saw each of his children's faces in hers. He read the chronology of their married life in her features; the first happy year; the contented ones that followed; the care which had dimmed her fine features, as he went abroad for that companionship he should have sought at home. He kissed her pale forehead, and dropping into a chair, uttered not a word. She sat down beside him, and passing one hand round his neck, took the open note in the other.

"Is that all?" she asked.

"And is not that enough? Yesterday, Preston promised me that he would take care of my note to-day, on which he is endorser. To-day he writes, in cold, cramped terms, that he cannot. Is not that enough?—my paper protested; my house falling about my ears; my wife and children beggars! But it isn't all. My everything depended upon an appointment under government, which Preston's influence had all but secured. If he refuses this trifle, of course it is because the application has failed."

Oh, how Ann longed to shout, "I'm glad of it!"—How did her heart ache for her husband. But they were interrupted, and Wilkins c[illegible]osed his face, a a political friend was announced.

"So," said the caller, "Preston himself has that birth he promised you! A shabby trick he has played the whole of us."

Wilkins controlled himself wonderfully well. It was all explained. While working to procure Wilkins a place, to pay himself and others, he had found it a better speculation to take the office himself, and let the debt go. The visitor soon bowed himself out, to bruit the news, and the husband and wife were again alone.

"Tell me all, unreservedly," begged the wife. It would not be idle curiosity if I did desire, merely as a wife, to know the whole; but I have still another reason. Tell me all—trust me, George; do, and I will not betray you."

He did. It was a painful narrative to both while it lasted; to him that his friends were thus hollow; to her that her husband had been thus duped. But the sun soon broke the clouds away. She told her news. The first fear of want to his beloved ones was over, and the mother of his children seemed dearer than ever.

Many years have passed. Our hero still "lives for his country;" but he has learned that a good citizen's first duty is to that "imperium in imperio," his own family, loyalty to which is the guaranty of good citizenship. Who serves his own household best, best serves his whole country, his whole kind, and his God; for neglect of one's own, comports with neither patriotism nor piety.

Fortune has once more smiled upon him, and his wife's patrimony is swelling untouched, for her children. The traitor, Preston, retained office long enough to ruin him for all other pursuits, and now supports a miserable consequence as fogleman for whatever faction will best pay, an l whipper-in of such partisans as are self conscious of being even less than he.

Nanny, wilt Thou gang wi' Me?

O, Nanny, wilt thou gang wi' me,
Nor sigh to leave the flaunting town?
Can silent glens have charms for thee,
The lowly cot, and russet gown?
Nae langer drest in silken sheen,
Nae langer deck'd wi' jewels rare,
Say, canst thou quit each courtly scene,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

O, Nanny, when thou'rt far awa',
Wilt thou not cast a look behind?
Say, canst thou face the flaky snow,
Nor shrink before the winter wind?
O, can that soft and gentle mien
Severest hardships learn to bear,
Nor, sad, regret each courtly scene,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair.

O, Nanny, canst thou love so true,
Through perils keen wi' me to gae?
Or, when the swain mishap shall rue,
To share wi' him the pang of wae?
Say, should disease or pain befall,
Wilt thou assume the nurse's care,
Nor, wishful, those gay scenes recall,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

And when at last thy love shall die,
Wilt thou receive his parting breath?
Wilt thou repress each struggling sigh,
And cheer with smiles the bed of death?
And wilt thou o'er his much-loved clay
Strew flowers, and drop the tender tear?
Nor then regret those scenes so gay,
Where thou wert fairest of the fair?

THE BACHELOR'S WILL.

BY MRS. M. ST. LEON LOUD.

A lovely group were the Mayberrys as they drew around a bright fire, whose ruddy glow illumined every nook and corner of a small, but pleasant apartment, while the wind of a December night howled wildly without. The widow and the fatherless—the poor and unknown! Yet over them the sweet spirit of peace and domestic love, which flies from many a stately dome, folded its white wings.

"Fanny," said Frank Mayberry, a young gentleman of some eight years old, with curling hair, and black eyes, "I wonder if we shall get any presents on Christmas eve? I should like a cannon—a real brass cannon."

"And I," said the lisping voice of the little rosy pet of the family, "I should like a great doll; look Fanny, so tall," and she raised her dimpled hand as high as her own head.

The person thus addressed, looked up from the work on which she was busily engaged, and with a warning gesture, said in a whisper—

"Hush! you forget that you must not wake mother—and now, dear little brother and sister of mine, let me tell you, that you are not to expect such presents this year. You know we have no father now, to bring us money and beautiful things; so you will be good, reasonable children, and say nothing about presents—it would distress mother. I will tell you how we can keep pleasant holidays: we will get something nice for dear mother, and do all we can to make her happy."

"So we will," exclaimed the noble-hearted boy; "and, Fanny, can't I sell my marbles to help you? I am getting too big for such things," and he drew himself up on tip-toe.

"Well, do not make a noise now," said Fanny, kissing him tenderly; and taking the little one on her lap, the attention of both children was soon absorbed in a fairy legend improvised for the occasion.

On a couch, drawn up before the fire, her delicate features, colourless as the pillow on which she reclined, lay the mother for whose repose they were thus solicitous. The first sound of Frank's voice had broken her light slumber, and though her eyes remained closed, not a word had been lost upon her. Tears stole down her cheeks at the thought that the highly prized and innocent gratifications of childhood must be denied to those so dear to her; yet how inexpressibly soothing to her heart was the knowledge of the perfect love existing between her children, and their devotion to herself. Mrs. Mayberry was an invalid both in body and mind, and to divert the latter from preying upon itself, she had been persuaded to leave the solitude of her own chamber, for the more cheerful atmosphere of the family sitting room; and there, supported by cushions and pillows she usually spent the day, beguiled, in spite of herself, into a temporary forgetfulness of her sorrows, by the unwearied efforts of her children to amuse and comfort her; or lulled to sleep by the sweet voice of the elder daughter as she chanted the beautiful ballads of olden time. If the invalid slept, Fanny would draw Frank and Milly close to her side, and tell them tales of genii who dwelt in chrystal palaces; or of sea nymphs who watched over the dead far down on the coral floor of the ocean, till thoughts of their father would steal over their light young hearts and sadden them into silence. And that elder daughter! Methinks I hear some one ask me to describe her.—Describe Fanny Mayberry? Take an inventory of the charms which went to make up the graceful fairy-like being of sixteen summers, who was the guardian angel and preserver of that helpless family—the light of their eyes, and the idol of their hearts? One might as well describe a sunbeam—a dancing spray flung from the brow of a sparkling waterfall—a sound of passing music. Ah! believe me, I shall impose no such task upon my sober grey-goose quill. Thou hast now, dear reader, an introduction to every member of the Mayberry family—pardon me: for in a comfortable corner, on a small rug worked in zephyr, for her especial use, by the fair fingers of Fanny Mayberry, sits a tortoise shell cat who was taken in, on the very day little Milly was born, and shares with that young lady the importance which [illegible] to the youngest of the family. Nor is she wanting in a due appreciation of her position, as you may judge from the dignified erectness of her attitude and the unutterable self-complacency with which she folds her tail around her snowy feet, as she purrs her low song; and the side-long glances of jealous disdain which she casts upon her opposite neighbour, a Newfoundland dog, of the largest size, whom she appears to consider as a decided interloper. Ever and anon, the new comer, in the overflowing of an honest heart, extends towards her his huge shaggy paw, as if to say—"Come, shake hands and be friends," then suddenly withdraws it, as if aware of the shrewish temper hidden beneath that fair and placid exterior. Ah! Neptune, it is true thou art become prime favorite, and Mrs. Grimalkin may now sit whole days unnoticed by the fireside, while thou art caressed by every one. Often too, when bending over thee, tears fall fast from the eyes of those to whom thou art the living witness of widowhood and orphanage. Yes! when the beautiful vessel that was bearing swiftly to his home the long-absent husband and father, laden with the rich treasures of the East, and full of warm, active, buoyant life, went down beneath the foaming waves—when the heavens were dark and a fearful tempest swept the bosom of the ocean, thou—but we will descend from the apostrophical vein in which we might become so entangled as to grow unintelligible, and inform the reader that a few months previous to the date of our history, the noble merchantman, commanded by Captain Mayberry, was lost in a storm at sea, and one only of all her crew, escaped to "tell the tale." In that dreadful hour, Neptune never for a moment forsook his master's side, and when the long-boat, crowded almost to the water's edge, put off from the sinking vessel, he swam by it until it swamped, and every soul went down into the ocean depths. With difficulty he regained the portion of the wreck above water, where, with cheek and brow pale as death, yet with a calm and fearless eye, stood a mere youth, surveying the appalling scene. Lower and lower sunk the white wings of the Sea Gull, as with a short prayer for mercy, the young man sprang into the waves. All grew dark around him, and hours must have elapsed ere he was taken up by a homeward bound vessel, clinging with one hand to a broken mast, and grasping with the other the long hair of the noble animal whose powerful efforts were fast failing. Intense was the anguish of those who listened to this recital from the lips of the survivor, and when after a few brief hours, Darcy Howard departed for his own home in a distant city, and there was no longer an eye to intrude upon the sacredness of their grief, the bereaved ones clung closer to each other, and wept afresh. From the elastic minds of the children, the bitterness of their first grief soon passed away, for their father had not been "taken from their midst." He had not shared their daily occupations and amusements—the hopes and fears of their childhood, and, though the joy of those brief periods, when his vessel was in port, had greatly endeared him to their hearts, his longer absences caused him to be remembered rather as a favorite guest, than one of the familiar household band. But in the bosom of Mrs. Mayberry, the deep chords of affection which bound her to the object of her first love—the husband of her youth—had been rent asunder, and the shock had well nigh proved fatal to her delicate frame: sinking her mind at the same time into a state of helpless and hopeless despondency.—Every thing devolved upon Fanny, who, hitherto a timid, retiring child, came forth from this, her first trial, a thoughtful, energetic woman, and well qualified, by her affectionate spirit, for the duties which pressed upon her.

The ample pay of Captain Mayberry had supported his family in the comforts, and many of the luxuries of life, but it was their all, and an immediate change in their establishment became necessary. Fanny's arrangements would have done credit to an older financier, at the same time all was done so quietly, that Mrs. Mayberry felt no added pang from the prospect of reduced circumstances.

Two months from the death of Captain Mayberry, found the little household settled in a very small but neat dwelling in a private street, and Fanny had the rich reward of seeing a faint smile of satisfaction pass over the pale face of her mother, as she said—"It seems very comfortable." Yes! and bright and pleasant grew that humble home, for Fanny's own hands were actively employed from morning till night; and it is astonishing what wonders can be wrought by one pair of hands—small, delicate ones, too—when moved by a willing spirit. It was Fanny who rose with the dawn, and lighted the fires, that the rooms might be comfortable when her mother came down; it was Fanny who made and baked the fine white rolls which they ate for breakfast; and it was Fanny who rubbed the brass, and dusted the furniture, until every article shone as if the light of her own sunny spirit was reflected upon it. Now, let no one suppose that Fanny had acted in all this without counsel. She—no; the Mayberry family had a friend—a dear, queer, old "single gentleman," and no less a personage than the owner of the Sea Gull, to say nothing of sundry other crafts; in short, a wealthy shipping merchant.

Mr. James Ballantyne was the very counterpart of Brothers Cheeryble of Dickens, with a face—I had almost said "round as the shield of my fathers."—but as I am not so certain on that point as was the immortal Ossian, I shall merely say round as the moon, and as bland, with small twinkling eyes, as if two of the lesser luminaries, yclept stars, had been set like gems on the broad disk of the above-mentioned planet. A smile of the most perfect benevolence just relaxed the muscles around a well-shaped mouth, displaying the white walls of an "ivory palace" in which time had made no breach; add to these the more solid attraction we have spoken of, and you may be sure he was a man who stood pretty high in the world. But not for this last qualification was he prized—we may as well say beloved—by the Mayberrys, for beloved he certainly was, though without the least spice of romance. To Mrs. Mayberry, he was the early friend, and liberal patron of her husband; to the younger children, the bountiful dispenser of toys, nuts and gingerbread; while Fanny treated him with the frank confidence she would have extended towards a near relative. Better than any other human beings were the Mayberrys beloved by Mr. James Ballantyne, and when he learned that his richly laden bark had gone down in the midst of the ocean, his own loss seemed but as a feather's weight in comparison with the calamity that had fallen upon them. With many offers of assistance, tendered with a sincere desire for the acceptance, he strove to atone for his innocent share in their misfortunes—and gratefully did Fanny avail herself of his advice and experience, while with true delicacy she declined all pecuniary assistance.

In our opinion, the noble oak supporting a delicate vine upon its strong and sturdy branches, bearing it aloft from the dust of earth into the pure, free upper air, where its dancing tendrils may rejoice in the sunshine, and daily with the zephyr, answers a higher and more beautiful purpose, than when hewed and squared into mathematical proportions, imprisoned, perchance, in the keel of some merchant vessel, till it rots away in ignoble servitude. Something of this very original idea passed through the mind of Mr. Ballantyne, when he began to experience the delightful conviction that he was necessary to the happiness of the Mayberrys—all of them—and it was better and far more agreeable to serve so lovely a family, than to be forever selfishly and sordidly poring over immense invoices and bills of lading, or laying in cargoes and ship-stores. He would have laughed had any one hinted that the secret of all this was comprised in the little magic word "Fanny!" How the earthly particles fly from a heart subjected to love's alembic! That of Mr. James Ballantyne was in danger of becoming wholly etherealized. Not less astonishing were its effects upon his outward man. For twenty years his garments had displayed one unchanging hue of that delectable mixture in broadcloth, vulgarly called pepper and salt; beautifully diversified on high days and holidays by others of drab, the more exposed parts exquisitely shaded off by the action of the sun into a suspicious whitey brown; and, being of that privileged number whose known ability to dress well entitles them to appear boldly in any attire, no one ventured to sneer at his apparel. Now, however, a shining suit of the finest black encased his portliness, and every article, from the crown of an unexceptionable hat, to the toe of a highly-polished boot, was perfect; and as the newly transformed surveyed himself in the full length dressing-glass that had recently found its way into his chamber, he "laid the flattering unction to his soul" that he had arrived at the precise age most interesting to young ladies. Rejoicing, therefore, in his rejuvenescence, and flourishing scientifically a new ivory-headed cane, he might have been seen every evening, after business hours, threading the streets in the direction of Mrs. Mayberry's dwelling. Oh! those were golden hours for a man who had passed half a century untouched by a warmer passion than love for his day-book and ledger; and when he returned home from that cheerful little room where every thing whispered of the presiding genius—when he heard no longer the music of Fanny's voice, nor watched the movements of her sylph-like figure—oh! how cold and dreary seemed his own spacious parlours, with their costly decorations—while the spirit of loneliness which brooded over his hearth and board, seemed to have acquired additional gloom.

"Fanny," said Mr. James Ballantyne, as one morning, at a very unseasonable hour, he entered, sans ceremony, the small apartment in Mrs. Mayberry's house, where culinary business was wont to be performed, (Cupid forbid that we should call it the kitchen,) where Fanny stood by a table, her cheeks glowing with healthy exercise, the loose sleves of her dress turned back to the elbows, displaying her round and dimpled arms, while the tips of her taper fingers were crimsoned with the juice of the fruit she was preparing for their simple dessert—"Fanny, I wish to speak with you, if—"

"Pray, Mr. Ballantyne," interrupted Fanny, casting a glance at her checked apron, and blushing like one of her own cherries, "pray walk into the parlour—I will be there in a moment."

"No, Fanny, here in this very place must I speak, for never were you lovelier, never dearer than now, when I see you devoting yourself to the happiness and comfort of your family. Fanny, can you take charge of yet another? Have you any love to bestow on one who loves you—who has long loved you as a child—but knew not the strength and nobleness of your woman's nature till within the last few months? I have seen your home growing brighter and brighter, while mine has darkened around me. Speak, Fanny, will you not be the star to dispel its gloom?—will you not share my wealth, and with all who are dear to you, make my home your own—make it a paradise?"

Poor Fanny!—motionless as a statue, she stood until those strange words were ended; then sinking into a chair, and burying her face in her hands, she felt as if the earth were about to swallow her up.—Marry Mr. Ballantyne! a man old enough to be her grandfather! She could pronounce the three cabalistic words comprising the bounden duty of woman, as a daughter, but not as a wife. Wealth!—what has that to do with the gushing feelings of a young and innocent heart? She was sure her mother could not enjoy wealth gained at such a price. Shall we tell all the truth? And far more rapidly than we have written them, did these thoughts pass through the mind of Fanny Mayberry. Yes! even at that moment, there flitted a shadow across the magic glass of memory, and a slender youth, with dark, melting eyes, and thick waves of glossy hair parted from a noble brow, stood before her, in the place of the portly wooer. Fanny rose up, and with all the composure she could assume, and a smile upon her lips, laid her hand confidingly in that of her admirer, and said—

"I have always loved you, Mr. Ballantyne—let me still love you—as a grateful, affectionate daughter, who will honour and obey you, as such, to the end of her life. I can be nothing else to you."

The next morning, Mr. Ballantyne was found in his counting room, clad in his accustomed grey, and perched upon a high stool, with a pen behind his ear, busily engaged bringing up the accounts that had gone sadly behind during his short mental aberration. We shall say nothing of the desperate glances which he cast from time to time at the apothecary's window opposite, where certain little bottles whispered temptingly of a quietus for the sharp pangs with which he was suddenly affected in the region of his heart. But our hero was a man of sense, and had no desire to prove the first exception to the maxim laid down by the immortal bard, that "men have died, and worms have eaten them, but not for love;" so he dined at a hotel for a week,—then hired a French cook and dined his friends at his own table for another week. At the end of that time, he returned to his old habits, and—visited the Mayberrys.

"Mr. Ballantyne—Mr. Darcy Howard," said Mrs. Mayberry, as the former entered their little parlour, and the substance of a certain shadow, we have hinted at above, rose and bowed gracefully to his new acquaintance. "This is the young gentleman who brought us, during your absence last fall, the melancholy intelligence of the loss of the Sea Gull," she added in a trembling voice.

"I wish he had gone down in her," was the first thought of Mr. Ballantyne, but as he looked more narrowly at the handsome countenance of the young stranger, pale with grief or illness, and perceived that his dress indicated a recent bereavement, a softer feeling seemed to take place of his uncharitable wish,—for, albeit "unused to the melting mood," his eyes filled with tears, and grasping the hand extended to him, wrung it with strong emotion; then casting one look at Fanny, who had not dared to raise her eyes, he left the house, and from that time became so wholly absorbed in business as to have no leisure for visiting.

And who was Darcy Howard? The only son of a widowed mother, for whose support, as a last resource, he had gone to sea in the capacity of steward's clerk. On the arrival of the vessel at her destined port, he found a letter awaiting him, containing information of the dangerous illness of his idolized parent; and on learning that the Sea Gull was shortly to sail on her homeward voyage, he procured a passage in that doomed bark. Fortunately, the vessel which rescued him from his perilous situation was bound to the port where Captain Mayberry's family resided; and after performing his painful mission to them, he hastened to his own home, which he reached in time to close the eyes of the only relative he knew in the wide world.

Poor and alone, in his darkest hours there would rise before him a vision of beauty and goodness, brightening one spot of earth, and of a meek and gentle being who might supply to his heart the place of the mother he had lost. Daily did those yearnings for that green oasis in life's desert become more intense, until he resolved to seek it, and ascertain if there was room for a wanderer within its hallowed precincts. We need not say that the kind heart of Mrs. Mayberry received him as a son, linked as he was with the memory of the lost. And Fanny?

> "She loved him for the dangers he had pass'd,
> And he loved her that she did pity them."

Yes, they loved as only the young and pure-hearted can love; yet, as if words would have broken that sweet dream, they never spoke of love. It was enough for Darcy, that after the duties of the clerkship, which he had obtained in a large mercantile house, were over for the day, he was permitted to make one of the circle that gathered round the humble fireside of Mrs. Mayberry; and it was enough for Fanny to listen to the music of his voice as he read aloud, or repeated again and again the story of that dreadful shipwreck.

And thus time flew by with those who took no note of its flight, but there came an awakening.—Poverty like an armed robber stole upon them stealthily but steadily. Poverty! that blighting mildew, eating out the heart of all human enjoyments, rusting and corroding the finest chords of the soul; tearing asunder the ties of home and kindred, and scattering far and wide those bound together in love—laid its iron grasp upon the widow and orphan. The little fund that had been raised from the sale of their superfluous furniture was exhausted, and though Fanny toiled at her needle with all the energy of despair, the product of her labor was inadequate to their wants. Day by day the blooming cheeks of little Milly grew paler and paler—the dark eyes of Frank turned sadly and tearfully upon his sister, as she bent wearily over her joyless task—while, to add to their distress, Mrs. Mayberry became rapidly worse, in consequence of her mental anxiety, until she was confined to her bed a helpless sufferer.

Their last morsel had been divided—their last farthing expended—and where to procure the necessaries her mother's situation required, Fanny knew not. Kneeling by the bedside of the invalid, she gave way, for the first time in her presence, to an uncontrollable burst of grief. Long and silently they wept together. At last, Mrs. Mayberry spoke.

"It is strange that Mr. Ballantyne should have deserted us—and I have been thinking, Fanny, of asking you to write to him. I know it would be humiliating," she continued, observing the slight shudder that passed over the frame of her child, "but the time has come when pride must be forgotten—and, after all, why should we hesitate to ask assistance from one who has always professed such an anxiety to aid us?"

Fanny knew why, and she buried her face deeper in the pillow. Rather would she starve; but her mother—her young brother and sister—should they perish before her eyes because of her pride? She rose, and, seizing a pen, wrote a few hurried lines—she scarcely knew what—and flew to her chamber, to await the return of her messenger. In half an hour, a business-looking letter was placed in her hand. She opened it, and a bank note for one hundred dollars fell into her lap. It was unheeded, for her eyes were rivetted on the contents of that dreadful letter.

"Ah! Fanny, wealth is a good thing, though you once valued it so lightly, and I rejoice that you will allow me to impart some portion of it to you. You might once have become mistress of great wealth, and a heart devoted to your happiness. I am no longer a rich man, Fanny, for I have discovered an heir in whom I am deeply interested; and henceforth the bulk of my property is held in trust for him. I have still enough, however, to place you—and all those so dear to you—forever above the reach of want. Will you, dearest Fanny, still accept the offer which you once rejected? Will you not make me happy, and, in so doing, deserve the blessings of your family? I am about to leave the city for six months, during which time you will receive monthly the same sum I now enclose. If your answer is favorable, I shall depart joyfully, cherishing the hope that, on my return, you will comply cheerfully with the arrangements I may then make for our mutual happiness.

"Yours, devotedly,

"James Ballantyne."

Alas! for "the course of true love," that it should so seldom "run smooth!" Fanny's resolution was taken—an answer was despatched—but when she stood by her mother's bed, and laying the money before her, said, with assumed calmness, "There, mother, Mr. Ballantyne has not disappointed your expectations,"—nothing save the extreme illness of Mrs. Mayberry could have prevented her from observing the change which a few hours had wrought in her child. Ah! little did she dream of the fearful sacrifice with which their deliverance had been purchased! Nobly did the heroic girl struggle to conceal every trace of anguish from those for whose sake she had immolated her heart's dearest hopes, and she succeeded. But when night released her from her duties—when her mother, under the restoring influence of medicine and nourishment, slumbered sweetly on her pillow, watched over by an experienced nurse, whom Fanny had provided—then, and not till then, the long pent up agony burst forth. During the dark hours of that terrible night, one thought alone seemed to burn on her brain in characters of fire—Darcy Howard; how could he bear to learn all that had occurred? how could she let him know it? Yet something must be done instantly, for she must see him no more—she could not trust herself to look upon that noble countenance again. Henceforth it would be crime even to think of him as she had done. The cold grey light of morning streamed in at her window before her trembling fingers concluded the letter which she felt would be as a sentence of death to a loving heart—the more bitter because unexpected—for with woman's pride she had concealed their true circumstances from him. The letter was sent, and the bitterness past.

Now, let no one suppose that pale, cold, and victim-like, Fanny moved about her daily occupations. No! her sacrifice was enriched with the sweet perfume of a cheerful offering. She had saved the life of her mother—she had brought happiness to her brother and sister, and comfort to their dwelling;—could she be wholly miserable? What though she sometimes shrunk like the sensitive plant when touched by a careless hand, as some lightly uttered word recalled feelings which she had hoped forever subdued?—the secret was her own. No one even guessed why Darcy Howard suddenly left the city, and his name soon ceased to be mentioned among them.

Six months passed away, and no tidings of Mr. Ballantyne. Fanny had early acquainted her mother with her engagement, and that good lady, placing implicit confidence in the principles and discretion of her daughter, felt assured she would be happy in the lot she had chosen. One may be sure that both began to experience no small degree of anxiety, as the time drew near for its fulfilment, which grew into wonder and conjecture, mingled on the part of Fanny with a fluttering hope which she dared not attempt to analyze.

Another month and another was nearly completed, when the whole family were thrown into confusion by a summons to attend the reading of a will, at No. 10 —— street! the residence of the late Mr. James Ballantyne; without having had any previous intimation of that gentleman's death. For the honor of poor human nature, we will not decide what feeling predominated in the bosom of Fanny, as they were conveyed rapidly to the place. It was a spacious room—rich and massive furniture gleamed dimly in the light which struggled faintly through the folds of heavy damask which shrouded every window from ceiling to floor, rendering indistinct the forms and faces of the group who sat in breathless silence, awaiting the denouement of this singular scene.

A rattling as of parchment was heard; a dingy roll was unfolded before their eyes, and a sharp voice commenced—

"The last will and testament of Mr. James Ballantyne." (Mrs. Mayberry put her handkerchief to her eyes and sobbed audibly.) "I give and bequeath all my real estate, amounting to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, to my only lawful heir, Darcy Howard, the son of my deceased sister, on condition," here the reader's voice assumed a higher key; "on condition that said Darcy fulfils on my behalf, a certain matrimonial engagement entered into by me some eight months since, with"—hem! hem! "Fanny Mayberry; on condition, further, that said Fanny agrees to perform scrupulously, a promise she once made to love, honour, and obey, as a daughter, a certain antiquated gentleman was so silly as to think she could pronounce them as his wife."

Now we are not going to tell all the particulars of the scene that ensued; how Darcy Howard emerged from a dark corner, and flew to throw himself at Fanny's feet, at the same moment that Mr. James Ballantyne bolted from a curtained recess, laughing heartily at the conceit of hearing his own will read; and how the concussion of the heads of uncle and nephew as they met mid-way, raised bumps unknown in phrenology: nor how Fanny blushed, while Mrs. Mayberry's tears were turned to smiles of joy—but we may tell, that the conditions were accepted, and that about a month later, a happy party assembled round a sumptuous entertainment, prepared in honour of the heir and his beautiful bride.

"Your health, Mrs. Fanny Howard," said Mr. Ballantyne, quaffing a goblet of—water, my friends, for aught we know—we would not say wine for the world. "Your health, Mrs. Fanny Howard, and I now feel myself amply revenged for the trifling affront you put upon me on a certain occasion. I determined to punish you in my own way, and an opportunity offered, when I discovered that the youngster there was the son of my only sister whom I had long mourned as dead. The resemblance to his mother was so striking that, though I said nothing on our first introduction, I took measures at once to ascertain the truth of my conjecture. Had I met him on his first hasty visit, I might have been spared the little mortification you wot of, Fanny—but being absent at the time, when you mentioned the name, it did not occur to me as one in which I was interested. I saw, too, that he was more likely to win favor in a lady's eyes, than a rusty old bachelor like myself.—Nay, never blush about it, Fanny; a young lover is better than an old one, and it was a sore trial to give up a lad like my nephew there for a grey head like me. But you acted nobly, and a good daughter cannot fail of making a good wife. Heigho! 'Love while the heart is in its prime,' that's the best maxim. And now, children, I hope you will never have occasion to find fault with

"THE BACHELOR'S WILL."

THE FATHERLESS.

BY MRS. ABDY.

Seek not the smiling vale, sweet boy,
With early wild flowers gay,
Where birds pour forth a song of joy,
And silvery waters play;
Though violets spring beneath thy feet
Though blossoms scent the air,
No welcome shall thy presence greet,
Thy father is not there.

Seek not the room remembered well,
Where often thou wouldst glide,
Eager thy childish tale to tell,
Close to thy father's side;
How wouldst thou count his treasured books,
And praise his pictures rare!
But never shall a father's looks
Again rejoice thee there.

Some bid thee turn to yonder mound,
Where mournful yew trees rise,
And tell thee in that hallowed ground
Thy cherished father lies;
Oh! seek his grave with sorrowing heart,
Strew it with flow'rets fair,
But 'tis thy father's mortal part
Alone that moulders there.

He lives above the vaulted skies,
With spirits pure and kind,
And casts perchance his watchful eyes
On those he left behind;
May all the counsels he has given,
May all his pious care,
Aid thee to turn thy thoughts to Heaven,
And lead thy footsteps there!

Vain, dearest boy, thy earthward gaze,
Vain thy beseeching sighs,
The guardian of thy infant days
Can glad not here thine eyes;
Yet still pursue thy search of love
In faith, in hope, in prayer,
Till thou shalt reach the realms above,
And meet thy father there.

GAS STOCK IN ENGLAND.

The Young Embroiderer.

BY MRS. LEONARD.

"Will you buy my collar, Miss?" said a pale, meagre-looking girl, apparently about twelve years old, to a bright, joyous young creature, who stood in the door of a fashionable shop, waiting the motions of a lady within. The voice of the pale child was sweet, yet so timid and faltering, that it was heard only by the young girl, who turned her dark expressive eyes upon the shrinking figure before her, and said—

"Where could you get a collar, child, fit for a lady to wear?"

"I worked it, Miss, and may be it is not beautiful enough for such as you—but perhaps you have a mother;" and her mild blue eyes were directed to the lady within.

"You—you worked it!" she exclaimed, with a look of surprise. "And pray, who taught you to embroider collars?"

"My mother, Miss."

"Callahan! Callahan! what pitiable object is that you're talking to?" said the lady within the shop; "do let the street beggars alone, child;—come look at this Mecklin—it is really superb!"

But Callahan was now so entirely engrossed by the little suppliant at the door, that she neither seemed to hear about, or care for the Mecklin. The really beautiful work of this interesting, though extremely miserable looking little girl, surprised her.

"This," said she, "cannot be your work, child."

A deep flush spread over those pale cheeks, and Callahan Clermont was struck with the half pleased, half painful expression of her interesting countenance, as she raised her eyes to hers, and said—

"I speak the truth, Madam."

Callahan turned from her, and laying the collar before the lady at the counter, exclaimed—

"Oh, look at that, Aunt Jarvis!—is it not exactly like French work? How delicate and beautiful those sprigs are—and done, too, by that sickly-looking girl! Do buy it, aunt, it is a picture, and it becomes you so," she continued, placing it on her shoulders. "Oh, you must buy it!"

"O, Callahan, you have not an ounce of discretion! I believe the beggars all know you by sight, for you are always assailed in some way."

"Why, aunt, she has not asked either of us for a cent, and you are not obliged to buy the collar unless you like it; but if you could see how becoming it is, you would buy it, just to please Uncle Jarvis."

"Well, well, child, if she will take a dollar for it."

As Mrs. Jarvis was moving towards the door, her niece sprung before her, saying—

"A dollar, aunt Jarvis! why, the muslin, cotton and thread are worth more than that; don't ask her to take one dollar—offer her five, at least; do, dear aunt, give her five, and take it out of my pocket money."

Though this conversation was all carried on in a low voice, it was heard by a gentleman who stood at the opposite counter, buying a pair of gloves.

"I wish I could teach you a little prudence, Callahan," said Mrs. Jarvis, drawing herself in a very stately attitude as she advanced to the door; "the child has stolen the collar, I dare say."

The poor little girl heard the accusation, and casting a mournful glance on the beautiful pleader, who stood half hid behind her aunt, her cheeks glowing with disappointment and mortification, she took the collar from Mrs. Jarvis, and walked hastily away, without speaking.

"Poor little thing, how disappointed she looked; I am sure she is no common beggar!" Her voice trembled, and her eyes filled with tears. Bending out of the door, as much to conceal them as look after the child, she murmured, half aloud, "I wish I was a woman."

"And so do I," said the gentleman, as he passed rapidly from the shop, and followed the little girl, whom he soon reached. She was wiping the tears from her sunken cheeks with her tattered frock.

"Why do you weep, little one?" said the gentleman in a soothing tone, walking beside her.

She looked up and attempted to speak, but the tears flowed afresh, and she could only sob out, "the lady called me a thief!"

"Better to be called one than to be one, child, for God knows your heart; but you are very young, and seem very poor—too poor to have such rich work to dispose of. Have you no friend to sell it for you?"

"A friend, sir? no—we are very poor, and Jenny says that it is only the rich who don't care for them that have friends."

"And who is Jenny?"

"A poor black woman, that takes as good care of us as she can, but there are four of us, and I am the oldest. Indeed, sir, I am willing to work, though the children, with whom I have no wish or time to play, call me the proud, lazy, little would-be lady, living with a nigger. I am not able to labor, and if I could sell my collar now, I should be so happy; for—for—we have not money enough to"—

She stopped—hesitated—her lips trembled, and the big tears rolled down her cheeks.

"Let me have the collar, child; and there are five dollars, the price fixed on it by the generous young girl in the shop, who wished to buy it so much. Is that enough?"

"Oh, more, sir, more; three dollars would be all I hoped, all I ever expected."

She pressed the hand of the gentleman to her lips, when he gave back the bill to her, and saying, "You have made me so happy!" darted away before he had time to ask her name, or follow her.

The next morning the light-hearted and sweet-tempered Callahan Clermont stood beside her uncle, pleading for a larger allowance of pocket-money. He smiled on her, and said, as he patted her glowing cheek—

"Why, child, what can you do with it? You have now every thing you can wish for. Shelves full of books, new music, flowers, birds, and all kinds of gew-gaws—and, indeed, every thing a child can desire."

"Why, uncle, you forget that I am not a child now; why, do you know that I am almost fifteen? and see, I am quite up to your neck! Double my allowance, dear uncle, and see how prudent I will be. I will put down every thing I spend, even to a penny whistle, if I should buy one, and if there is one thing in it unnecessary for me, one improper charge, I will repay you out of the next quarter. Is not that a fair bargain, uncle? Do try me, for I have not had a cent to spend this whole week. Will you try me, uncle?" and she threw her arms round his neck, and looked so coaxingly in his face, that he found it difficult to refuse her; but he said—

"I must consult your Aunt Jarvis first; she knows better than I do how much you require."

"Oh, no, no!—pray don't consult my aunt, for she says I have not an ounce of discretion. If that is the case, it is a great pity that I am fair!"

"Why so, child?"

"Because, Solomon, who was the wisest man that ever lived, you know, says that a fair woman without discretion, is like a jewel of gold in a swine's snout."

Mr. Jarvis laughed, called her a little rogue, and asked what she wished for so much just now, that required such an increase of funds.

"Various things, uncle; one is a collar—"

"What, a collar and bells to play the fool with, or collar and bridle to hold you in with, fly away!"—for she had bounded away to turn over the letters and

She laughed and replied, "Neither of those, sir, but a muslin collar for the neck."

She then narrated in her own animated and touching manner, the events of the preceding day, the mortification and disappointment she felt; her wish to be a woman, and the rejoinder of the gentleman.—Mr. Jarvis listened with delight to the artless recital, and asked how she could expect to find the child again, in such a city as New York.

"Oh, I shall see her uncle, and I should know her among a thousand. I felt so sorry yesterday, when the little girl walked away, that I do believe I should have run after her, and put all my rings in her hand, had I not feared that Aunt Jarvis would have sent the shop boy after me; and the little girl would have been terrified with the belief that we were chasing her for a thief. The look she cast on me haunts me now, it said so plainly—'When you are so happy, how can you trample on a poor sufferer like me.' I had rather have had five dollars yesterday than ten today; and it seems almost wrong to be so happy, when I think of the poor little girl, with her pleading innocent looks; her meagre form, and tattered garments; and hope I shall never be without money again. I did want that collar so much, uncle. I suppose Aunt Jarvis was discreet and wise and may be I shall be when I am old—"

"Here," said Mr. Jarvis, turning over the letters and papers which Callahan had begun to examine, "here is a packet, directed to Miss Clermont—quite a large one, too, do you know the hand, Callahan?"

"Oh, I suppose it is new music from my music master." She opened it, and, to her utter amazement, the little girl's collar fell at her feet. "Well, this is magic," exclaimed Callahan; "see here, uncle, the very collar—yes, the very one, for here is the paper that I tore when I opened it. Did you buy it for me, uncle, or did Aunt Jarvis? Oh, yes, it was Aunt Jarvis, after all. She sent Peter to find her,—what a naughty girl I was to think she was cross. I will run and ask her pardon, for I was certainly very unjust."

As she was bounding away to acknowledge, and ask pardon for her injustice, her uncle called her back, saying, "Here, here, Callahan, you did not see the lines on the envelope. I think they will unravel the mystery—'To the kind-hearted girl who yesterday wished herself a woman; that she may retain the same warm, generous feelings that now throb in her guileless breast when she becomes one, is the wish of the Donor.'"

"The gentleman in black followed her then, and bought it—how I envy him; how I wish I knew him, for he could tell me all about the little girl, I dare say. Oh, you must help me to find him out, uncle."

"Well, describe him to me, dear."

"Now, let me think," replied Callahan, putting her hand to her brow, "he is tall and slender, dresses in black, and walks very quick, his voice is uncommonly fine, and I suppose he is handsome—but I did not see his face, uncle, for I only looked at him as he walked away."

Mr. Jarvis laughed, and said, "You will be an excellent hand to find him out, without knowing his name or his looks; but, never mind, you have the much desired collar, and now you won't care for the double allowance."

"Oh, yes, I shall, uncle, and you will give it to me, I know,—and to-morrow I shall come to you for it, and now I must leave you, for Mr. Carter is coming up the steps with an armful of new music, and I shall be practising for an hour or two."

Weeks passed, and Callahan saw nothing of the little collar girl, as she called her; though her aunt said she needed leading strings, for she was starting off after every little ragged child she saw, and once, actually ran into a sailor boarding house because a little ragged girl went in a minute before.

Mr. Jarvis laughed at her, and asked why she did not look out for the tall gentleman in black.

Mrs. Jarvis continued, "you had better give it up, Callahan, for you have worn the collar, and been to Mr. Dashwell's store, until they begin to smile when we come in. He knows no more about the tall gentleman, or the little beggar, than we do, for I asked him. 'A gentleman one day inquired the name of my niece,' he said, but he did not observe his looks, or know his name. Now give it all up, child, and run after no more beggars; and look no more after tall gentlemen that wear black. It looks so much like a child, and is so unlady-like."

"Well, I am only a little girl, you know, auntee; no one expects me to be wise and discreet, like you; and walk along soberly, and look dignified; it would make me ache, indeed it would, Aunt Jarvis."

"You are tall and look quite like a woman in the street, Callahan, and who can tell whether you are fourteen or twenty, if you behave like a lady?"

"Well, I will try to please you when we walk out again. I despair of seeing the little girl, or the tall gentleman in black; and will endeavor to forget them."

A few weeks after this conversation, the family were invited to celebrate the birth-day of an acquaintance that lived about a mile from the city. It was a lovely, rural spot, and great preparation had been made to make the fete agreeable. Callahan was full of bright anticipations; and nothing could be more lovely, than her sweet, happy face, dimpled with health and good humor, she knew she was beautiful, but her own good sense, and the instructions of a pious grandmother, had taught her that beauty would neither make her happy nor useful, that it might attract admirers, but would never gain for her a single friend. Callahan had been the sole care of this intelligent and highly gifted woman until her thirteenth year, when her death caused the removal of the sorrowing girl to her uncle's care, around whose heart she had entwined herself, until he thought of her only as his child, for he often said he would sooner part with his wealth than his lovely little playmate and pet.

The great charm of Callahan Clermont was her disinterested, cheerful temper. No one ever heard her speak an ill-natured word, for disappointments did not make her petulent. She was full of kind and generous feelings, with a reverence for God, which had been so strongly impressed upon her youthful mind, that it still influenced her conduct, though she was not in a family who would increase that reverence, or who would build on the foundation which her good grandmother had laid.

Mrs. Jarvis was a fashionable church woman; strongly attached to the forms and ceremonies of her own church, and strict in her observance of them. In her opinion, the performance of these duties gave her a claim to the title of Christian—which title we must leave her to enjoy, as our story is about the young and for the young.

Callahan was most tenderly attached to her grandmother, though she was old and had a deformed face, that made her anything but agreeable to the eyes, but her intelligence, her goodness, and the peculiar sweetness of her manners, attracted and attached those who were not repelled by roughness of feature.

Callahan was overwhelmed with grief at her loss, and Mrs. Jarvis was amazed to see the child really pine for her deformed grandmother, amid all the elegancies of her own splendid establishment, and the varied amusements of the city. To divert her from melancholy thoughts, they took her to Niagara, and spent several months travelling—but it was long before she could enter with spirit into anything like recreation. Now she was the life of the house; every being in it, from the master to the lowest dependant, smiled at her approach, and all who served her, did it with the light foot of alacrity. Thus cherished, and thus educated, the fair girl bounded into life, like some bright vision of hope and joy, that adversity must pass by in her cheerless round.

But to return to our story.—At the fete, Callahan was like an uncaged bird, and as she roamed through the grounds, or climbed the hills in the neighbourhood, her full heart sparkled in her eyes, or gushed forth in song, until the very birds seemed animated with her joyousness. Exhausted at last, she proposed to her young companions that they should all separate in opposite directions, and seek some solitary spot, to rest in or to ramble, according to their own taste or humour. They agreed: and Callahan sprang for the brook, the course of which she followed until she found herself in a thick grove of dwarf willows, near which was a large patch of osiers for baskets.

"This," said she, throwing herself on the bank by the brook—"this is the very spot I wished to find."

We will leave our favorite to rest, and return to the drawing room of Mrs. Morris, where all the company assembled before sunset, except Callahan; but the sun sunk behind the hills, and twilight was deepening, and still she came not. Mr. Jarvis, beginning to be alarmed, was preparing to seek for her, when she entered the room, pale, and apparently exhausted, her feet covered with dust, and her eyes still moist with tears. Her uncle drew her to the window, apart from the company, and begged to know where she had been and what troubled her so much.

"Oh! uncle," she replied, "I have found her; and heard such a tale of woe."

"Found whom, my child?"

"The little collar girl, uncle."

"Oh, well, I am glad of it, and now brighten up, for see, Mrs. Morris' guests for the evening are already assembling—and it will not accord with the festive occasion to wear a face of gloom."

"I hear the voice of Mrs. Le Ray," said Mrs. Jarvis, who had followed her husband; "and really, Callahan, I should be excessively mortified, to have her, or Miss Le Ray, or even William, see you in such a plight. Your hair is all in disorder—your cape on one shoulder—your shoes covered with dust, and your face almost as white as your frock. I wish the collar girl had been in the Red Sea, or anywhere, that you should not have been plagued with her at this time: do run out the side door, that's a good child, and go into the chamber and arrange your dress—hasten, hasten, they are coming in."

Callahan moved quietly away to obey her aunt, though she sighed deeply, for her young heart was full. The splendour, the bustle, and the gaiety around her, contrasted so strongly with the scene of misery she had just left, that it was long before she could compose her feelings, though her dress was soon arranged; it was, she found, quite difficult to dress her face in smiles,—but she succeeded, and descended to the drawing room, as bright and as beautiful, as even her aunt could desire. She was still pale, it is true, and there was occasionally, during the evening, a shade of melancholy in her dark, expressive eyes, and a look of thought and care, unusual for one so buoyant and playful. She declined dancing on the plea of fatigue—and her uncle, observing her occasional thoughtfulness, retired early. As they took the young ladies home in their carriage, the conversation was general: but when they were alone in their own parlour, Mr. Jarvis drew Callahan to his side, and kissing her pale cheek, said—

"What has sobered you so much, my darling? Open that little heart, for I see it is full to overflowing."

"Well, sit down, uncle, for I have a long story to tell you."

"Then make it a short one, dear, or wait until morning, for it is late now, and you ought to be in bed."

"Oh, I cannot sleep, uncle, until I tell you all about the poor little collar girl. I wandered a great way from the house in search of a quiet spot, and saw the little girl—whose name is Clara Moreton—gathering osiers for baskets. Delighted beyond measure at finding her, and determined now, to know all about her and the family, I insisted on accompanying her home, though the humble little creature told me it was no place for such a lady—that I should be ashamed to go in, when I got there. But this only increased my desire to go, and we set off together.—She led me through cross streets and by lanes, and reached at last, a miserable, dark, shattered looking building, in the cellar kitchen of which, those four children were sheltered, and barely kept from starving by Jenny, a black woman—their only friend. On a small cot, the only bed or resting place in their possession, fit for a human being, lay the sister of Clara, a child of ten years. She turned her languid eyes upon us when we entered, a slight colour tinged her pale cheek—she stretched out her hand, and said in a feeble voice—

"'I am so glad you come back so soon, sisse; did you bring me the flowers?'

"Clara kissed her, and said—'No, dear, but I have brought you something better. This is the kind young lady I told you about a great while ago; had you rather not see her and hear her gentle voice, than to have any thing that I could bring you, Marion?'

"The child nodded, and cast a timid glance upon me as I approached the bed, but I could scarcely restrain my feelings sufficiently to speak cheerfully to the little sufferer, when I looked round upon the desolate, comfortless, apartment, without one article of furniture—save the bed, a bench, and chest—by which the black stood washing. Oh, uncle, why are some so poor and others so rich?"

"That is a difficult question to answer, Callahan—so go on with your tale of sorrow."

"While I stood trembling with emotion by the bed, a little ragged boy came in with a basket of matches on his arm, saying—

"'I am so tired and hungry, Jenny, that I can't stay any longer: nobody will buy to-day, say what I will.'

"He shrunk back when he noticed me, and stood behind his sister."

"'Never mind, child,' said Jenny, 'there is something to eat,' and what do you think it was, uncle?"

"Black bread, I suppose, dear."

"Nothing but a potatoe; they had no bread uncle," said Callahan, her eyes filling with tears, and her voice tremulous with emotion. "No, they had none, and for weeks they had not tasted either bread or meat."

There was a moment's pause, but Callahan dashed away the tears from her drooping lids, and continued,

"Amazed at the contrast of their situation and manners, I asked how they had become so very poor. Jenny said, in a low tone, 'Their father died a drunkard!' and then continued, in a louder one—'We have all seen a better home than this; but God, who knows what is best for us, has seen fit 'to visit the sins of the father on the children.' Alack a day, Miss, there was a time when the blessed mother of these children was as beautiful and as much cared for as you be; and she was only brought from our own happy England, to have her tender heart broken.—But she has gone to her God and Father, and but for these helpless babes, I should rejoice to follow her.' She told me, before I left, their whole history; and lovely indeed did the gentle, tender, affectionate Clara appear, as she detailed her various efforts for their support; the care she took of her sick sister, for whom she deprived herself of even her scanty allowance, and often went for a whole day without food, that she might procure for the dying child some little dainty.

"And now, uncle, I shall surprise you. Do you remember the clergyman who was so very polite to us, when our carriage broke down on the road to Niagara?"

"Yes, perfectly—though I did not admire him much; his breath smelt too strong of brandy. But his wife was a most lovely being."

"She was, indeed, uncle; and looked to me just like the lilies that were drooping in her own vases; and her gentle manners, and sweet voice, reminded me so much of my own beloved grandmother, whose ways were just so loving and affectionate."

"I, too, remember the beautiful English lady," observed Mrs. Jarvis, "and thought her children uncommonly handsome and well behaved, particularly the eldest, though her face had a mournful expression."

"Aunt Jarvis, that child is the little collar girl, Clara Moreton!"

"Is it possible! Well, she is amazingly changed. I never should have known her."

"I suppose, aunt, that sickness, suffering and poverty would change any of us just as much; and me, I am sure, it would have killed outright. But Clara Moreton is a Christian child, or she could not bear, with such uncomplaining gentleness, the misery God has seen fit to put upon her. She bends to the storm like the violet, and when I think of her, toiling day after day in that miserable cellar, with scarcely light enough to thread her needle, I look around me and ask myself why I am so loved, and cherished, when I am not any better than she is, and not half as useful?"

"We will not talk about that now, dear. Tell me how Parson Moreton's family came in New York?"

"He was turned out of his beautiful home (the parsonage) because he was a drunkard. His conduct broke his lovely wife's heart. After his dismissal, and her death, the cruel man gave himself up entirely to his degrading appetite, and was often in bed for days together. The deacons, and other good men in the church, followed him up, and did all in their power to rouse him from this dreadful state, to the care of his children. Angry at their interference, and determined to get rid of them, he took his family to New York. Fortunately, the kind-hearted Jenny accompanied them, for in a few weeks they had no other friend. Mr. Moreton's intemperance killed him, and it was to bury that cruel father that Clara was in such distress to sell her work. Had her unkind parent remained in the village where she was born, and where her mother was all but idolized, they would all have been protected and cherished; for during their mother's illness, the nicest fruits, and choicest wines, the most delicate food, and every attention, was lavished upon her. Two ladies wished to take the two oldest children, but Mr. Moreton would not consent to leave them, because he had determined to take them all to England the first good opportunity. Without a cent to help themselves—without a friend to advise—without any dependence but Jenny, they have struggled on until now. Will you let them suffer any longer, dear uncle? I know you will not. I will take all my allowance, and you will add"—

Callahan stopped, looked earnestly in her uncle's face, saw the kind expression of his benevolent countenance, and continued—"just what you please."

"They shall be cared for, my child; now go to bed, and rest in peace—for you have been so much excited that your very lips are pale. Good night."

The limits of a story will not allow me to say much of the change of habitation, or the gratitude of the orphans, nor is it necessary. every one that has a heart, can imagine it, as well as the joy of the generous, warm-hearted Callahan, who had, by her unwearied energy and disinterested kindness, raised the drooping spirits and cheered the sinking hearts of the orphans.

It is by such deeds as these, that the young obtain a right to be gay and joyous. The mere flush of feeling, from the glow of health and animal spirits, though becoming and agreeable, is but the same emotion that fills the bosom of the antelope, when he bounds over the plains, and scarce shakes the dew from the spring flowers, with his nimble feet.

But when the heart glows with disinterested love to God's creatures—when the young bosom beats with noble and generous sentiments, the eye is lighted with a beam divine, that will give expression to the dullest orbs, and the plainest countenance will wear a smile of almost seraphic beauty.

Callahan's charity was a steady glow, not a spasmodic affection—she spent all her liberal allowance in furnishing the two comfortable rooms her uncle Jarvis hired for them. A year passed, and still the kind-hearted Callahan aided and encouraged by her bounty and her patronage, the three orphans—for the little Marion died in a few weeks after their removal, happy in the belief that Clara had found a friend that would not forsake her.

The little pale, half-starved collar girl was changed by the fostering hand of kindness, into a lovely, interesting, and grateful friend—for whom Callahan felt a sincere and strong attachment. She did not introduce her to her large circle of fashionable acquaintances—not because she considered her an inferior, for in many respects, Callahan felt that she was decidedly superior to most of them. Her education was one of rare excellence, and her mind by no means a common one. With the Bible (which was the treasury from which she gleaned) she was perfectly familiar—and Callahan felt that her bounty had been more than repaid by the knowledge of God and His works and ways, she had obtained from this lovely, pious young creature.

Callahan, now past sixteen, was beginning to feel that she was no longer a child, and must endeavor to think occasionally about dignity and elegance of manners, of which she had heard so much, and thought so little. She had for many months taken upon herself the disposal of all Clara's work, and was often called by her young friends the "Lady Patroness."

One morning she was in a fashionable store with a pelerine cape Clara had just finished, and while she was telling Mr. Laborde that he must get fifteen dollars for it, as it was embroidered by a protege of hers whose work was quite the ton, a gentleman, who stood near, looked earnestly at her, and then said in a low voice—

"The fair girl is changed into the Lady Patroness, and sighs no more to be a woman."

Callahan turned to the speaker—his fine expressive eyes were fixed upon her face. She blushed deeply and attempted to speak, but her voice faltered, and she hesitated—he smiled, bowed, and left the shop. The year before, she would have caught him by the hand, thanked him for his kindness to her protege, and asked his name—but now the timid delicacy of the woman restrained the warm gush of girlish delight, and she saw him depart without even asking Mr. Laborde who he was—though she looked from the door as he crossed the street, and followed him with her eyes, until he entered the house of the British Consul.

Callahan hastened home and told of her meeting with the tall gentleman in black. Her uncle said rather archly—

"I think, Callahan, you will not find it difficult now, to tell me his complexion, and even the colour of his eyes and hair."

"Indeed you are mistaken, uncle," replied Callahan, blushing, though she knew not why. "I only know that he has large, dark, expressive eyes—is quite tall, and still dresses in black."

The next day, while Mr. Jarvis was reading the papers, with his neice beside him, he exclaimed—

"O! ho! what is here? Why, Callahan, lay down your book, and listen to this—'If there are any of the heirs now living of Mrs. Moreton, formerly Marion Ellandon, who can prove their claim to that title, they will find, at the office of the British Consul, papers and letters inviting them to England, to take possession of the fine estate and title of Frederick Baron Ellandon, their uncle in the third degree.'"

Callahan jumped up, clapped her hands, caught up the paper, read it all over again very rapidly—danced round her uncle, and then ran to the stairs, calling loudly to her aunt, who came, running down, exclaiming:

"What's the matter!—what's the matter!"

Callahan was putting on her bonnet when Mrs. Jarvis entered the room; she ran to her, saying—

"Only think of it: Clara is an heiress, and little Fred, Baron Ellandon. Oh, I am so delighted, I cannot wait to say a word—there it is all in the papers."

"Is that all you have been making such a fuss about? Why you silly child, you could not be more pleased if it was yourself."

"No indeed, auntee, I am sure I could not—for I have now all I want or wish for." And away she bounded as happy as she expected to make the little trio.

"I do think, Mr. Jarvis, you indulge your niece almost too much—she does not restrain her feelings at all—how wild with joy she looks, and see how she skips along the walk; I am really afraid she will knock some one over, she moves so rapidly."

"Have no fears for Callahan, my dear wife. With a heart that overflows with love and good will to all around, whose happiness seems but the reflection of others' joy, how can she be too much indulged? I love to watch the growth and expansion of such a mind and heart, and most sincerely pray that nothing will happen to blight the fair promise she gives of superior excellence. There are but few, I fear, that possess a heart like Callahan's."

"She is a good girl, I know, Mr. Jarvis, though I think she is rather too wild for a young lady; you forget that she has passed sixteen."

"Well, my dear, sixteen is mere nothing to sixty. Her manners, though frank and easy, are never rude nor rough; and I would not exchange my bonny niece, with her heart of love, and her smile of gladness, for anybody's niece in the whole world. I hope the dear girl will be the first to communicate the joyful tidings; it is a pleasure she richly deserves, and one that even an angel might covet."

But we must follow the affectionate girl to the humble abode of her friend, which she entered with a smile of delight, and clasping Clara to her bosom, exclaimed—

"Oh, I am so happy I can scarcely speak. I have such news for you all!"

"What can it be that can add so much to your happiness, dear Miss Callahan?" said Clara, in a gentle tone, though she looked with surprise on her flushed cheeks. "I thought you was as happy as mortal could be. But sit down, and let me know this new joy."

Callahan put the paper in her hand, pointed to the paragraph, and then observed, "It is for you that I rejoice."

Clara read it, raised her eyes to heaven, and said, with a trembling voice, "Oh my mother, and my gentle Marion, could you have shared it with us! But God is good—they are happy."

"Yes, dearest Clara, they are happy and so you will be, when you reflect on the good you can do—the happiness you can confer. You can be to others what I have been to you, a friend and comforter."

"True, true, dear Callahan, you shall be my model; and I hope I shall know how to use God's gifts as well as you have. But what is to be done? I know nothing about the Consul, nor indeed anything about business; you must direct me."

Callahan, with an energy and promptness that would have done credit to an older head, arranged every thing; and when certificates, letters, and proofs of every kind were collected, satisfied there was nothing wanted to establish their identity, she took Clara with her in a carriage to her uncle's, who readily accompanied them to the Consul's.—What passed there, it is not necessary to relate. It is sufficient for our purpose to know, that the claims of these poor orphans were established, and they were the acknowledged heirs of Frederick Baron Ellandon. The little match boy, who stood, day after day, with his basket on his arm, and his bare feet knocking against the stones to warm them, when the morning air was chilly—and whose eyes were often dimmed with disappointment as he walked round and round in vain for purchasers—this poor little ragged urchin was an English Baron.

While the Consul was congratulating the gentle Clara on her good fortune, a gentleman entered without ceremony whom he addressed as Harry. The gentleman was retiring hastily, but catching a glimpse of the group, he stepped forward, bowed, and advanced to Mr. Jarvis—

"By what lucky chance, my dear sir, do I meet you in my uncle's office, when I have sought you every time I came to the city, in your own house, without success?"

"Me, Mr. Russell, I have never seen your card, or heard of your calling."

"You live in Broadway, I believe?"

"O no, that is a distant relation of mine of the same name."

"Ah, that accounts for your not hearing of my calls."

Clara's face was crimson when Mr. Russell's eye met hers, and he advanced to give her his hand.

"Sure," said he, "I have seen this face before?"

"You have, indeed, sir; for you are the good Samaritan, who did not pass by on the other side, but stopped to pour oil and wine into my wounded heart."

Mr. Russell shook her hand most cordially, heard of her good fortune with a smile of satisfaction, and then turning to Callahan, said—

"And this young lady and I are old acquaintances, I believe, though I fear we shall not be half as good friends, as if she were still wishing herself a woman?"

"O ho! so this Harry Russell, whose mother was a particular friend of mine, is your tall gentleman in black, Callahan?

"I heard you was studying Divinity somewhere in the neighborhood of the city, Harry, and often wondered you did not come to see me, for your mother's sake, if not for the old times when I used to bring you sugar plums and marbles. But I move that we all adjourn to my house and dine together."

"An excellent move, I think," replied Mr. Russell, "as I have much to say to you all—particularly to my two young friends."

There was a happy party assembled at the dinner table of the hospitable Mr. Jarvis. Callahan moved round among them like the good genius of the house. They separated late in the evening. Mr. Russell advanced to Callahan when he said good-night, and begged her to allow him still to be her almoner.

"I was not aware, Mr. Russell, that you ever officiated in that office," said Callahan, half laughing.

"Why, have you forgotten already, Miss Clermont, that I was but your almoner when I bought the collar?"

"A most convenient and most profitable one I must call you, Mr. Russell; since you not only do the business but provide the means. Oh, you shall have the title, most assuredly. And I will endeavor to pick up a title for myself, as I am stript of all mine; I am no longer the 'fair girl sighing to be a woman,' or the 'lady patroness,' for my only protege turns out to be the greater lady of the two."

"I think, Miss Clermont, you have a fair claim to a title, for I discovered the first time I saw you that you was of noble blood."

Callahan blushed, and turned to Clara, saying—"Mr. Russell thinks he is speaking to you."

"No, my dear Miss Callahan. I understand him perfectly, and it reminds me of what I have often heard from the lips of my beloved mother, when her far off relationship to a noble man was mentioned in her presence—'That nobility of soul was the only nobility worth possessing.'"

"I thank you, Miss Clara; my meaning exactly. And now, good-night. To-morrow I shall call for particular directions from you, Miss Clermont, and a regular installation into office."

"That's right, Harry," said Mr. Jarvis; "come to-morrow, and next day, and just when you like. I shall always be glad to see Lucy Lyman's son, while he is worthy of such a mother."

I will only observe in closing my tale, that it was written for events which really took place; and that I may, if occasion should require, finish the account of Callahan and Clara, who were not separated again until the family sailed for England, as Mr. Jarvis took them all to his own house, and made the necessary preparations for their voyage.

ZUMA;
Or, The Peruvian Secret.

A FREE TRANSLATION FROM THE FRENCH OF MADAME DE GENLIS.

BY ALBERT ROLAND.

Towards the middle of the seventeenth century the animosity of the Peruvian Indians against the Spaniards, continued to exist in all its bitterness.—They were subjugated, but not subdued, and their conquerors maintained dominion over them by force of terror alone. The remembrance of the cruelty of their vanquishers, at the time of the conquest, was but too faithfully preserved from generation to generation, and the present treatment of their oppressors was little calculated to extinguish their hatred. The viceroy then in power, was one of the most heartless wretches that had ever been placed in authority over them. He stopped at the commission of no crime to accomplish his vile purposes. Under his command was a secretary who, moved to every act by an insatiable cupidity, was even more intensely hated than the viceroy himself. This secretary, at about the period of which we write, died suddenly, in horrible agony, with all the symptoms of having been poisoned. A rigorous search was made for the perpetrators of the deed, but not the slightest trace of them could be discovered. This occurrence caused much consternation amongst the Spaniads, as it was not the first crime of the kind of which the Indians had been suspected. It was generally believed that they were in possession of the most deadly poisons, and had, more than once, made use of them; but neither the torture nor the fear of death itself, which had several times been inflicted upon the mere suspicion of the crime, could elicit any confessions from them.

This viceroy was, shortly after, recalled, and the Count Cinchon named as his successor. The Count was in the prime of life and possessed all those virtues and amiable qualities which are so attractive.—

He had just married, and the warmest affection existed between his wife and himself. The Countess wished to follow her husband to Lima, but, fearing to expose her to the hatred and perfidy of the Indians, he begged her, notwithstanding the great pain which a separation would cause him, to remain behind, at least until he could become acquainted with the habits of the Indians. The Countess was dreadfully alarmed at the thought of the exposure of her husband to the animosity of these revengeful savages. Her terror was heightened by the relations of the former viceroy, who represented the Indians as vile slaves, who, though apparently obedient, and ever attached to their masters, were capable of plotting in secret the blackest and most criminal designs against them. He told also the surprising and almost inconceivable subtlety of the poisons of these countries, and represented things in such a terrible light, that the Countess determined to accompany her husband and to watch over him with all the precautions of fear and all the vigilance of love. She took with her some Spanish ladies to compose her court at Lima, among whom was one of her oldest and most intimate friends. Beatrice was little older than the Countess, but her attachment to her was maternal; she had made every effort to persuade her friend to remain at Madrid, for a time, at least, but finding herself unsuccessful, determined to accompany her.

The Indians, however much delighted at the removal of the late viceroy, were not better disposed towards his successor. He was a Spaniard and must consequently be avaricious and tyrannical. It was in vain that they were told of his humanity, gentleness and justice. "He is a Spaniard!" said they, amongst themselves, and in this word was expressed all their deepest hatred. The Indians had not yet felt the softening influences of religion. The teachings of those who pretended so much sympathy for the poor savages were confined to the display of a few external rites, without any attempt being made to instil into their minds, the sublime principles of the Christian faith. Besides, the grasping avarice and flagrant injustice of their conquerors and teachers, accorded but illy with the doctrines by which they professed to be guided. The consequence was that the Indians hated the religion of their vanquishers as much as they hated the Spaniards themselves, and still preserved, secretly, ancient superstitions and idolatrous worship.

The Indians, since the conquest, had exercised a secret and quiet vengeance, which was little suspected by their oppressors. They had been compelled to yield to the Spaniards all the gold and diamonds of the New World, but they concealed treasures a thousand times more precious and useful. They alone were acquainted with the most efficient antidotes and remedies which Providence had supplied to preserve them against the evils of their country.

One of the greatest obstacles in the way of the conquest of the New World, was formed by those dreadful diseases for which the Peruvian bark has since become known to the European world as a specific remedy. At the approach of Autumn, the fevers produced by the miasmata emanating from their marshes, swept away great numbers of the white men, baffling the medicine and skill of their physicians. It was observed that the Indians uniformly escaped the fatal consequences of these dreadful diseases, and this exemption was attributed to their acclimation. But this was not the true reason; they had discovered the salutary properties of the Peruvian bark, but had entered into a solemn compact to preserve this knowledge from the Spaniards, not only to gratify the revengeful feelings they entertained toward them, but in the hope also, that these men would be finally driven out of the country by the insalubrity of the climate.

Notwithstanding the rigorous slavery to which the Indians were subjected, a kind of secret union was still maintained amongst them. Chiefs were appointed whose duty consisted in assembling them on certain occasions, for the purpose of worshipping the sun, of renewing their oaths, and designating victims amongst their enemies. Most of them, with the exception of those employed about the palace of the viceroy, found frequent opportunities of meeting, at night, in places amongst the mountains, deemed inaccessible by the Europeans. At this time their supreme leader, for they had many, was named Xenico. Soured by the misfortunes of his countrymen, and particular injustice, his soul, naturally great and generous, had long been closed against any gentle and tender emotions. A deep indignation, founded as it seemed to him upon the most righteous principles, had, at last, rendered him fierce and barbarous in the highest degree. The base and cowardly employment of poisons was, however, entirely repugnant to his nature; he had never resorted to this terrible means of vengeance, and had always interdicted its use among those over whom he had charge. Xenico had an only son, named Mirvain, whom he devotedly loved, and into whose breast he had instilled a part of his hatred toward the Spaniards. Mirvain, young, handsome and generous, three years before the period at which our story commences, had been married to Zuma, one of the most beautiful of the Indian females in the neighborhood of Lima. Zuma, as gentle and sensible as she was lovely, constituted the happiness of her husband and lived but for him and her child.

Another chief, Azan, had, next to Xenico, the greatest ascendency over the Indians. Azan was violent and cruel, and no natural virtue tempered in him the deep hatred with which he was always animated.—The two chiefs were of illustrious origin, and boasted of having descended from the royal race of the great Incas.

Some days before the arrival of the new viceroy, Xenico convoked a nocturnal meeting upon the hill of the tree of health, as that from which the substance known as Peruvian bark is taken, was called by them. When they had assembled:

"Friends," said he, "a new tyrant comes to rule over us; let us renew our oaths of a just vengeance. Alas! we are able to pronounce them only in the darkness. Unfortunate children of the sun! we are forced to envelope ourselves in the shades of the night! Let us now, around the tree of health, repeat the terrible formula to hide forever its properties from the white man."

Xenico then in an elevated voice, with a firm tone, repeated the following oath:

"We swear never to reveal to the children of Europe, the divine virtues of this sacred tree,—the only wealth remaining in our possession! Woe to the Indian, faithless and perjured, who, seduced by a false appearance of virtue, by fear or weakness, reveals this secret to the destroyers of his gods, and of the sovereigns of his country. Woe to the coward who gives this treasure to the barbarians who rule over us, whose ancestors have burnt our temples and cities, overrun our fields, and whose hands have been bathed in the blood of our fathers. Let them keep the gold they have torn from us, the desire for which is so insatiable and which has cost them so many crimes; but let us, at least, keep this gift of Heaven. If a traitor is ever found amongst us, we swear to pursue him to extermination, be he our father, our brother, or our son. We swear, that if he be engaged in the ties of marriage that we will destroy his wife and children, if they have not been his denunciators; if his children are in the cradle, to immolate them, that his culpable race may be extinguished. Friends do you all, in the depths of your souls, agree to these fearful oaths, which have been left us by our fathers, and which have been already so often repeated?"

"Yes, yes!" cried the Indians together, "we pronounce all these imprecations against whomsoever shall betray this secret. We swear to guard it with an inviolable fidelity, and to suffer the most frightful torments, even death itself, rather than reveal it."

"Remember!" cried the ferocious Azan, "remember, that in the first years of our servitude, thousands of Indians were put to the most horrible tortures—but none wished to save himself by betraying a secret which our fathers have guarded for more than two hundred years. What punishment is terrible enough, then, for him who can betray us? I swear, further, that if there exist amongst us an Indian capable of becoming such a traitor, he shall die by my hand alone; and if he have a wife, with children at the breast, I will sacrifice all."

This fierce avowal was not made without design. Azan hated young Mirvain, the son of Ximeo, not only because he did not exhibit a sufficient degree of animosity against the Spaniards, but because Mirvain, the adored husband of the beautiful Zuma, and father of a lovely boy, was happy; and the wicked are always envious of the felicity of others.

"Azan," replied Mirvain, "every one may be faithful to his oath without exhibiting your ferocity.—Your menaces are unnecessary and useless, for there is no one amongst us capable of becoming perjured. But it is not necessary that there should be a traitor to pursue or a crime to punish, to render you a barbarian, in your feelings and desires."

Azan, much irritated, was about to reply, when Ximeo, who foresaw an angry and violent dispute, representing the imprudence of prolonging these clandestine meetings, ordered all to retire.

The Indians, obliged to dissimulate, always preserved the appearance of respect and submission. A numerous company of young Indian girls awaited the arrival of the Countess at the gates of Lima, strewing flowers in her path. Zuma was at their head, and the Countess was so much struck with her beauty, and the grace and sweetness of her manner, that she desired to have her amongst the Indians who were employed in the palace. The Countess soon became attached to Zuma, and engaged her in the service of her chamber, and about her person. This favor seemed to Beatrice, the friend of the Countess, a great imprudence; for her imagination was so blackened by the terrible stories she had heard of the perfidy of the Indians, that, in spite of the natural generosity of her character, she gave herself up to all the sinister fears and dark suspicions with which distrust fills us. But she was excusable; it was for her friend, and not for herself that she feared: and she saw, with a troubled heart, this friendship of the Countess for an Indian female. The women of the Countess, who were extremely jealous of the new favorite, took advantage of this weakness of Beatrice, to increase her prejudice against Zuma; they said the Indian was false, dissimulating, ambitious, presuming upon her beauty; and that, far from really feeling the love she pretended for the Countess, she detested all the Spaniards. Although Beatrice did not credit everything that was told her, their calumnies had the effect of causing a real aversion to Zuma, especially as she found that nothing she said produced any change in the Countess, who became, daily, more attached to the young Indian. Zuma, on her side, conceived a tender affection for the Countess; but, aware of the aversion in which she was held by the ladies of the Court, remained, except when she was called upon, shut up in her own chamber.

The viceroy spared no pains to gain the love of the Indians; but they had known the commencement of the government of many of his predecessors to promise justice and moderation, to which a few years gave the lie; and the real goodness of the Count was lost upon them.

The Countess had been but a few months at Lima, when her health began evidently to decline. This change was, at first, attributed to the intense heat of the climate; but her sufferings increased daily, and she was finally seized with a fierce intermittant fever. This disease, so strange in its nature, and so unaccountable to the Spaniards, always alarmed them to the highest degree. All the remedies then known, were employed without effect. The inquietude of Beatrice was unbounded; she questioned the physician, whom they had brought from Spain, who, unable to control the malady, spoke mysteriously, and attributed it to some extraordinary cause. The alarmed tone with which he spoke, and his air of concealment, awakened in the breast of Beatrice the horrible idea that her friend was dying of a slow poison. From this time she had not an instant's quiet. She sedulously concealed her suspicions from the Count and Countess, but imparted them to two of the Countess' women, who readily agreed with her as to the cause of their mistress' illness. But who could have committed this crime? No one but Zuma, said they, who had free access to the chamber of the Countess at all hours. But Zuma! at the height of favor with the Countess, what motive could she have in being guilty of this atrocious act? Hatred has always a reason for the destruction of its object.—Zuma was hypocritical, vain and ambitious. It was hinted, too, that she had a secret and criminal passion for the viceroy. Moreover, she was an Indian, and familiarized from her infancy with the contemplation of the blackest crimes.

Beatrice, for some days, repulsed these frightful suspicions, but she saw her friend perishing slowly before her eyes, and her reason gave way to her fears. She no longer observed with her own eyes, but she gave credence to the most extravagant stories. The Count, without dreaming of crime, became very uneasy at the repeated and violent attacks of prostrating fever. Betrice had placed Zuma under strict surveillance, and she was never allowed to enter the chamber where the draughts of the Countess were placed.

The innocent and kind-hearted Zuma, in the midst of these diverse agitations, thought only of the Countess, whom she loved with all the sincerity of a pure and grateful soul. She was deeply pained when she thought of the infallible remedy that existed against this affection, which was consuming the life of her benefactress, and which she was unable to indicate. Zuma was aware of the dreadful oaths by which the Indians had bound themselves to guard this secret. She would willingly have sacrificed her own life to save that of the Countess, but she knew that for her to reveal the existence of this remedy, would be to devote, not only herself, but her husband and child, to a certain death. She knew that Ximeo, the better to insure her discretion, had placed their dear child as an hostage in the hands of Azan and Thamio, another of their chiefs, who, though not so ferocious as Azan, hated the Spaniards in an equal degree. Nor did she dare to confide her trouble to Mirvain, and she was compelled silently and alone to bear her grief. The affliction increased as the weak hope which had sprung up in the breast of the friends of the Countess vanished, as a favorable aspect which the disease for a few days had put on, changed; the next paroxysm of fever was so violent, that the physician announced his fears for her life. Consternation spread throughout the palace at these tidings. The Count and Beatrice were in despair, and poor Zuma suffered more silently, but as deeply, as any. The Countess, aware of her condition, showed as much courage as sweetness and piety. The sacrifice of a life which has been pure and innocent, is always made calmly, and without terror. She received the sacraments, and bidding a tender adieu to her friend and husband, recommended the Indians, and particularly her dear Zuma, to his care. Zuma, a witness of this pathetic scene, was no longer able to resist her excess of grief; her health, already very feeble, gave way entirely, and she was attacked in the evening with the same malady which was destroying the Countess. After two or three paroxysms, Mirvain was allowed by the Indians to carry secretly to his wife, every day, a dose of the precious powder which was to relieve her; they would allow him, however, to take only the smallest necessary quantity. Zuma, after the third paroxysm of her disease, received, in the morning, the first dose of the medicine which she was to take during the day. When she was alone, she looked upon this powder, and tears streamed from her eyes.

"Great God!" said she, "it is Thou who inspirest me! I can save her life by sacrificing my own. My course is taken. I will not reveal this great secret. She shall have the medicine intended for me, and will recover. They will not suspect me, but will attribute her cure to the remedies used by her physician. I expose neither Mirvain nor my child. I do not betray our oaths. I die only, and she lives. What is the life of the poor Zuma, compared to that of this child of Heaven, who makes use of her power only to console the afflicted and to succor the unfortunate? to the generous protectress of the poor and the slave, whose dying voice I have heard praying for these cruel Indians who are allowing her to perish, when it is in their power to save her. And, oh! my benefactress, in the shades of death you have not forgotten your faithful Zuma! I have heard your mouth pronounce her name and bless her! Yes! I swear by the holy light of the sun, that I will save thee!"

Zuma then enclosed the powder in paper, put it into her bosom, and, with a great deal of difficulty, rose from her bed. She then considered the means by which she would be enabled to introduce herself, secretly, into the chamber where the draughts of the Countess were placed. She had no idea of the horrible suspicions entertained with regard to her, nor the precautions taken to exclude all the Indians, and herself particularly, from this chamber. She had observed that since the illness of the Countess, none of the Indian slaves had been employed in her service; but she attributed this state of things to the zeal and jealousy of the Spanish ladies, or to that of which she had heard so much, and understood so little, etiquette. She resolved to defer her visit till the evening, when she hoped to find no one awake; but, to be sure that she should make no mistake, she went down to reconnoitre the way, and to see if she could not find some passage into this room except that through the Countess' chamber. Luckily she discovered a back door, in which was the key, opening from a long corridor into the chamber she so much desired to enter. She glided noiselessly back to her room, determining that she would make the attempt to accomplish her purpose as soon as night came on.

According to the orders of Beatrice, all Zuma's actions were strictly watched, and on this day one of the spies hastened to that lady to report to her that the husband of Zuma had called in the morning to see his wife—that they had had a long interview, of which, however, she could hear nothing, although she had stationed herself at the door, as they conversed in a very low tone—that Mirvain left the chamber of his wife, at last, with an agitated air—that Zuma then came down stairs, traversed the corridor, and examined carefully all the doors, till she came to that of the Countess' ante-chamber, where she stopped, with every evidence of surprise and agitation, and then re-ascended to her chamber. This relation awakened anew all the slumbering fears of Beatrice. She at once conceived that it was the intention of Zuma, for the accomplishment of some purpose, to enter this chamber in the evening. The women were ordered to keep strict watch upon the chamber of Zuma, and to report to Beatrice the moment she left it; they were ordered, also, to leave the key in the door of the Countess' ante-room. Beatrice went, without delay, to communicate her intelligence to the viceroy, who, without entering into all her suspicions, was very much moved, and consented to secrete himself with her, in the ante-chamber, that evening, to await the result.

An hour after the close of the day, Beatrice was informed that Zuma had descended the staircase without lights, and with all the precautions of fear and concealment. Beatrice and the Countess went, hastily, to their hiding places. After the lapse of some minutes, they heard the door open softly, and saw Zuma enter. She was pale, and trembled, and walked slowly with great apparent effort. She looked around the chamber with a troubled and affrighted countenance—and went toward the door which led into the chamber of the Countess, where she paused a moment as if to listen. All was quiet. Zuma approached the table on which was a decanter of crystal, containing a draught for the Countess; she drew from her bosom the paper of Peruvian bark, opened it, and taking up the decanter with one hand, with the other she poured in the powder. The viceroy froze with horror at the sight, and unable longer to control himself, rushed from his hiding place, exclaiming:

"Wretch! what have you put in the decanter?"

At this apparition, Zuma lost all command of herself, and the decanter slipped from her hand and was broken to pieces. She fell upon a chair crying—"I am lost!" and fainted. She was taken up and carried to her chamber.

The Count and Beatrice determined they would hide from the Countess the intended crime.

"She would beg for the pardon of this monster, added the Count, "and nothing in the world could induce me to grant it. An example is needed and I will make one."

The tidings soon spread in the palace and city that Zuma had been detected in an attempt to poison the wife of the viceroy. On the same evening she was delivered up to justice and sent to prison. Mirvain, upon learning the frightful news, went immediately to seek Azan and Thamir—and with death in his heart, said to the former:

"You have my son in your hands, but promise me that after our deaths, if we do not reveal the secret, you will give him back into the hands of my father!"

"We swear it!" said Azan; "but remember, that the least indiscretion will cost his life."

"We know how to die," replied Mirvain.

With these words, he left the ferocious Indians and threw himself voluntarily into prison, as the accomplice of his wife. He had easily divined the motive of Zuma, but was unable to justify her, except at the risk of his son in the hands of the barbarian Azan, and he resolved to die with his unfortunate wife.

At the break of day the Council assembled to examine Mirvain and Zuma. The doors were opened and a great number of Indians, amongst whom were Xenico, Azan, and Thamir, crowded into the chambers to witness the trial. The unfortunate couple were dragged in loaded with chains. Zuma, on perceiving Mirvain, cried with vehemence—

"He is not culpable—he was entirely ignorant of my designs"—

"Stop, Zuma!" cried Mirvain, "I am equally guilty with yourself—and could I exist after your death?—Let us die, Zuma," he added, significantly; "let us die in silence, and the life of our boy will be saved."

Zuma understood him, could make no reply, but burst into tears.

The examination commenced. Zuma was unable to deny the facts which Beatrice and the viceroy alleged against her. It was asked how she obtained the powder which she put into the draught.

"She received it of me," cried Mirvain.

Zuma attempted to deny it by saying that her husband was entirely ignorant of her designs.

"And what were your designs?" asked one of the judges.

"It was not my intention or desire to poison the Countess," replied Zuma.

"Why then did you use this powder? Did you believe it to be some salutary remedy?"

At this question Zuma trembled. Her eyes at this moment encountered those of the cruel Azan; his look was menacing and she seemed to see her slaughtered child before her.

"No! no!" cried she, with a distracted air, "I know nothing of remedies."

"It was poison? You confess it?"

"I confess nothing."

"Answer, then."

"I can but conceal."

At these words Xenico advanced and placed himself between the two prisoners, saying—

"Give me chains also. I wish to die with them."

"Ah! my father! live for our child," cried Mirvain and Zuma, in the same breath. But he persisted in his intention.

The judges had receivrd orders not to make use of the tortures in any attempt to discover accomplices. They removed Xenico and re-conducted Mirvain and Zuma to prison. The physician of the Countess then appeared. He declared that the malady of the Countess presented such extraordinary symptoms, and had so long resisted the most efficacious remedies, that he could not help giving way to the most horrible suspicions. There was no doubt he said, left upon his mind, as to the atrocity of Zuma's designs. He believed that this ungrateful and perfidious slave had been administering a slow poison to the Countess, but, finding herself excluded from the sick chamber, and fearing that the youth of the patient and the efforts of the physician might overcome the effect of the poison already administered, had determined to accomplish her purpose by one powerful dose.

At this detail, the judges trembled with horror, and on the strength of the mere opinion of this unprincipled man, who was mortified at the ill-success of his treatment, Mirvain and Zuma were declared guilty of the crime of poisoning, and condemned to be burned alive at noon, on the same day. The prisoners were again brought into the hall to hear the judgments. Mirvain listened to the sentence with an heroic firmness. Zuma threw herself at his feet:

"Thou art lost through my agency," cried she, "this is my only source of grief. O, pardon me!"

"Accuse but the barbarity of our judges!" replied Mirvain. "Be consoled, Zuma! the tyrants who have condemned us to death, liberate us from a frightful yoke. A few hours hence and we will be slaves no longer!"

These words moved even the heart of the hard Azan.

"Mirvain," cried he, "make yourself easy with regard to your son; he shall be as dear to me as if he were my own."

Orders were now given for the preparation of the pile upon which, in three hours, they were to suffer the most frightful of deaths.

The countess appeared to be really dying. Her physician reported to the viceroy that there was no possible hope for her recovery; that she would be unable to sustain more than three returns of fever, and that in six or seven days she would be no more. The count, looking upon Zuma as the cause of this dreadful misfortune, allowed no thought of clemency toward her to enter his breast. He offered pardon to Mirvain, however, if he would make a full confession of his crime.

"Tell the viceroy," responded Mirvain, to the offer, "that even the hope of saving Zuma, could not draw another word from me."

The viceroy did not wish to witness this execution. He left Lima in the morning for a country residence about half a league from the city, with the intention of remaining there all day.

The unfortunate Xenico conceived a thousand impracticable plans for the rescue of Mirvaro and Zuma. He would have made an attempt to assemble his friends for the purpose, regardless of consequences, but on this morning the Indians were closely watched, and were not even allowed their ordinary liberty. Even a secret interview with Azan and Thamir was impossible. A proclamation was soon issued ordering all the Indians in Lima to assist at the execution. They were without arms; the Spanish guard around the pile was doubled, and two hundred soldiers escorted the unfortunate victims. Nothing was left but submission. The distracted Xenico determined to throw himself into the flames and perish with his children.

During this time, whilst the whole city was agitated in anticipation of the terrible spectacle, the countess, entirely ignorant of what was going on around her, lay in an intermission of her fever more prostrated than ever. The agitation of every one who attended her was so great that the countess at last observed it, questioned Beatrice, and saw clearly that something extraordinary had occurred, and was concealed from her. Beatrice often left the chamber to weep without constraint, for there was within her heart a half consciousness of the innocence of poor Zuma, notwithstanding the circumstances seemed to force her guilt upon her. During an absence of Beatrice from the chamber, the countess interrogated one of the women who knew all, and perceiving that she wished to conceal something from her, imperiously demanded to know the truth. The woman then related the circumstances, and added, that Mirvain and Zuma, far from denying their crime, had gloried in it. The surprise and horror of the countess, at this frightful revelation, may be easily imagined. She immediately ordered a litter to be prepared, and rising with much difficulty and after repeated efforts, with the assistance of her women, succeeded in attiring herself. When the litter came, she placed herself upon it, notwithstanding the prayers of the women and Beatrice, and ordered the four stout slaves who bore it to hasten with all possible speed to the place of execution.

Twelve o'clock struck. Mirvain and Zuma, on foot, loaded with chains, issued from their prison, and started for the place where they were to suffer. Zuma was hardly able to sustain herself; but with the assistance of a priest and one of the soldiers, she moved slowly through the crowd, which pressed upon them toward the place of execution. In the crowd she perceived Azan carrying in his arms her dear boy. At this sight she gained new strength, and disengaging herself from the priests and soldier, rushed toward Azan, and in a moment the child was gazing in the face of his mother. She shed upon its innocent face a torrent of tears as she imprinted upon its lips the last maternal kiss.

"Zuma," said Azan, "cheer thyself; remember that your death is an act of vengeance, and that our secret will be rendered more inviolable than ever."

"Oh! I do not desire vengeance," cried Zuma; "if I could but save the countess I should die content!"

She was unable to say more. She was pressed forward, and her infant torn from her arms. When the feeble, clinging grasp of the little fellow was broken, as he struggled to remain with his mother, then, indeed, did it seem as if her heart would give way.

They moved on and approached the place of execution; Zuma's strength gave way as the fatal pile came in view. She fell into the arms of the priest, who accompanied her, almost insensible.

"Zuma," cried Mirvain, "have courage; our death will not be very painful, in an instant we will be suffocated."

"Oh!" replied Zuma, "I see but the flames. Oh, how terrible!"

As they approached, each step augmented her overwhelming terror. The Indians with cypress boughs in their hands, were gathered with mournful countenances around the pile. Suddenly they heard cries from afar, and presently a cavalier riding at full speed darted amongst them.

"Stop! stop!" cried he, "the countess orders it, and will be here in a moment."

The proceedings were stayed, and Zuma with clasped hands implored heaven that they might be saved. The litter of the countess was soon observed coming at a rapid pace, the bearers urged on by the impatient lady. It reached the place of execution, and was soon surrounded by the guards and Indians.

The countess raised her veil, and her sweet countenance alone, though pale and languishing, announced clemency and pardon.

"I have not," said she, "the power to grant a pardon, but I know that I shall obtain it from the goodness of the viceroy. In the meantime, I will take under my protection these two unfortunate beings. Remove their chains and scatter that pile, which should not have been raised had I been earlier aware of these proceedings."

At these words the Indians threw up their cypress branches, and made the air resound with their cries of joy. Xenico rushed from the crowd, crying:

"Yes! she, too, shall be saved!"

The countess invited Mirvain and Zuma to follow her, and they walked near her litter, and thus returned to the palace, followed by an immense crowd, blessing with enthusiasm the clemency of the countess. Arrived at the palace, she drew Mirvain and Zuma into her chamber, where they fell on their knees by her side. Greatly exhausted by the effort she had made, she seemed for some moments to be dying. She gave a hand to Zuma and to Mirvain. Beatrice, unable to bear the sight, demanded liberty to have the two Indians taken into the anti-chamber and guarded.

"No! no!" cried the countess, "I will answer for them; let them remain."

"Great heavens!" exclaimed Beatrice, "you hold in your arms two beings who have conspired, perfidiously, against your life!"

"Where else should they be," replied the countess, "they have repented, I know, even if they ever did harbor evil designs against me, and I freely forgive them."

"Oh! my benefactress," cried Zuma, "would that I could prove to you how much I have loved you. But I will not survive you!"

"Detestable hypocrite," exclaimed Beatrice, "have you the effrontery after having been detected in the attempt to poison your mistress, to pretend such great affection for her?"

"Insult them not, Beatrice," said the countess, "they have repented of the act. Ah! Zuma, is it possible that you, whom I loved so much, in whose countenance purity of soul seems depicted; is it possible that you could have been guilty of this crime of which they accuse you?"

Zuma, almost beside herself, and unable to bear the thought that her benefactress should consider her guilty of an act so repugnant to her soul, attempted to speak, but Mirvain fearful that in her excitement she would reveal the secret they had sworn to keep, interrupted her:

"Zuma," said he, "be silent. The truth and our innocence must become known. The life of the countess will be saved."

Mirvain was questioned in vain; he preserved an obstinate silence. A courier had been despatched by the Countess for the viceroy, at the moment she started to rescue Zuma, and she expected his arrival each instant, wondering that he did not return. She was about to send another messenger, when an unusual commotion was perceived in the court of the palace, and shouts were heard which announced the liveliest joy. Beatrice went out to ascertain the cause, when the voice of the viceroy approaching the chamber was heard. The Countess ordered the door to be opened, crying, upon the appearance of her husband:

"Pardon, my lord, pardon for the culprits!"

"They are your saviors!" exclaimed the viceroy, entering the chamber.

Every one was petrified with astonishment. The viceroy bore in his arms a beautiful boy, at sight of whom Zuma could not repress a cry of joy. It was her own child. Zuma again pressed to her bosom the dear boy whom she believed she had held in her arms for the last time, and the viceroy overwhelmed her with his evidences of gratitude. Ximeo came in at this moment, and addressing Mirvain, said—

"You may speak freely, now; the secret of the tree of health has been revealed by general consent. Many of us have taken the powder in the presence of the viceroy, and he desired to take a portion himself, before bringing it here."

The Count related in a few words the important fact which the Indian had revealed.

"Great heaven!" cried the Countess, throwing her arms around the neck of Zuma, "this angelic creature would have sacrificed her life for me, and was about to be immolated for that consummate act of goodness! Is it possible that an act so sublime and touching, could have been construed into an atrocious crime?"

"And this heroic pair," said the viceroy, "would have braved a terrible and ignominious death to preserve their child!"

"The Countess has done more," said Zuma; "believing us monsters of ingratitude and perfidy, who had conspired against her life, she rescued, with an overwhelming degree of goodness, and protected us."

"She, as yourself, will receive the reward of her virtues," said the viceroy; and taking out two doses of the precious powder, prepared them for Zuma and the Countess; the latter would take her's from no hand but that of Zuma.

Beatrice and all the Spanish ladies now surrounded Zuma, and loaded her with caresses. Beatrice, with a passionate movement, kissed that hand which she was the first to consider capable of so black a crime.

In the midst of this enthusiasm, the viceroy took Mirvain and Zuma by the hand, and led them out upon a balcony which looked down upon the principal streets, now filled with Spaniards and Indians.

"Here," said he, showing them, "here are the voluntary victims of gratitude, of parental love, and the sanctity of an oath. Indians! their sublime virtues, and the noble act of the Countess, have done away a hatred, formerly too legitimate, but now unjust. You alone were able, by an unanimous act, to absolve yourselves from a cruel and vengeful oath, and you have done so; from the enemies, you have become the benefactors of the old world. The care to render you happy, is henceforth not only a duty of humanity, but one of gratitude. Indians! all of you, who in this memorable assembly, come to sacrifice your fierce resentment to sweet pity and justice, are free. Such exalted sentiments render you worthy of equality with your vanquishers. Enjoy this glory—you have been enfranchised by your virtue. Love your sovereign, and be faithful to him. The lands will be distributed amongst you, and whilst you cultivate the tree of health, let the reflection that through your agency this gift of heaven is spread over all the earth, render you doubly happy."

This speech excited in the highest degree the enthusiasm of the Indians; and this day, which opened so sadly upon them, closed with deep and heart-felt rejoicings.

The fever of Zuma, and that of the Countess, under the influence of the new remedy, rapidly subsided, and in a week the Countess was in full convalescence. Honors and fortunes were heaped upon Zuma and her spouse, which she bore with her characteristic humility. Her affection for the Countess never diminished, and they remained warmly attached friends ever after.

Count Cinchon introduced the Peruvian bark into Europe. It soon became known by his name, for its valuable tonic properties, and a preparation of Cinchona is still regarded as the most valuable remedy in those terrible autumnal diseases so common to a low, marshy country.

HIDDEN SORROW.

BY EMELINE H. BROWN.

'Tis this hath filled my tones with mirth,
And lit the beaming eye;
The semblance of a careless heart,
A bitter mockery.—Harriet E. Spencer.

There flitted through the lighted hall a being strangely bright,
A form of matchless loveliness, a creature made of light;
With restless lip, and varying cheek, and eyes of flashing jet,
That thrill'd into the very soul whene'er their glances met;
And sparkling words of gaiety fell ever from her tongue,
While silv'ry peals of laughter through the vaulted arches rung;
They called her happy, but the smile forsook that brow of snow,
And o'er it came a look of deep, unutterable woe!

"And so ye think me happy! ah! but little know ye how
An aching heart may throb beneath a gay and careless brow;
The eye may flash, the cheek may glow, the lip with smiles may wreathe,
As light may gleam upon a stream, where all is dark beneath;
Yes, many a mad'ning thought lies veiled beneath a careless air,
And mirth and gaiety may hide a heart of dark despair!

"Oh, often when in festive hours my brow with smiles is dress'd
And all unfelt, my careless laugh rings far above the rest,
There comes a thought, a bitter thought, I may not, dare not tell,
That, like a bolt of freezing ice, may check the spirit's swell;
And then my brow, to hide its gloom, a gayer smile will wear,
And seek to veil its mournfulness beneath a mirthful air.

"O, when you meet with one whose laugh is ever ringing out,
And sparkling jests, and giddy words, give echo to the shout;
With laughing brow, and flushing cheek, and ever-beaming eyes,
Know that beneath that seeming joy a life-long anguish lies;
The deepest grief will seek to veil itself with artful wiles,
And fearful is that misery that hides its face in smiles!

"I'm weary, ah! how weary! and a load is on my breast,
I long to fall asleep, and be forevermore at rest;
There is a world whose cloudless realms enfranchised souls traverse,
Whose pleasure hath no bitterness, whose love is not a curse!
And I am sad and weary, so weary I would fain
Close up my eyes in sleep, and ne'er awake to earth again!"

EMILY ALLISON;

OR,

THE SEWING GIRL.

BY CAROLINE ORNE.

"Well, Elsey, what do you wish for?" said Elvira Belmont, to a girl who had been waiting some five or ten minutes for her to finish an animated discussion between herself and Adeline Bradford, relative to the most fashionable and becoming material for a ball-dress.

"The girl that sews for you is below," Elsey replied, "and wishes to know if it is convenient for you to pay her to-day. Here is her bill."

As Miss Belmont unfolded it, exhibiting a long catalogue of charges, she exclaimed, "What does the girl mean by sending me such a list as this? I don't believe she has done half what she has charged me with." And she ran her eye over the different articles, though without repeating her accusation—Having examined it, "Only think, Adeline," said she, "here is a bill, amounting to fifty dollars, for working caps, capes, collars, and flounces. Mrs. Allan was here a few days since, soliciting charity for one of those sewing girls, but I am sure there could be little occasion, when they can earn such large sums."

"Does she charge high for her work?" said Adeline.

"I cannot say that she does. She worked me a cape for three dollars which was quite as beautiful as those which were selling for ten and twelve."

"What induces her to work so cheap?"

"Why, to confess the truth, I threatened to quit employing her if she did not come down to my prices. Here, Elsey, take back Miss Allison's bill, and tell her to call again next week. If I pay it to-day," said she, turning to Adeline, "I shall not have enough left to purchase the elegant ball-dress we have been talking about."

Elsey, after an absence of a few minutes, returned. "Miss Allison," said she, "wishes to know if you can make it convenient to let her have a few dollars, if you cannot pay the whole."

"No, not a cent. I don't choose to take the trouble of paying her by driblets. Tell her to call next week, and she shall have the whole."

Miss Allison, who had called regularly for the last six weeks, and uniformly received the same answer, had followed the girl up stairs, and, taking courage from despair, now entered Miss Belmont's dressing-room. Adeline Bradford was much struck with her appearance. She was a tall, graceful girl, apparently eighteen or twenty, with a profusion of light brown hair, and the finest blue eyes she ever saw, with those long, curved lashes, which impart to eyes, of whatever hue, one of their most seductive charms. Her whole countenance, indeed, was of rare beauty, though very pale, and marked by that worn and haggard look, occasioned by privation and severe toil.—At the sight of Adeline Bradford—for she expected to find Miss Belmont alone—a hectic flush flitted over her cheeks, which, for the moment, made her appear almost radiantly beautiful.

"Could you not be content to receive my answer through my waiting maid?" said Miss Belmont, in a tone of anger.

"Pardon me," she replied, her voice trembling with agitation, "but I was in such pressing want of a few dollars."

"Well, you can certainly wait till next week. I have not a single cent that I can spare to-day."

Miss Allison, though she made no reply, did not leave the room.

"You may go," said Miss Belmont; "I have given you my answer, and shall not recede from it."

"Miss Belmont," said the poor girl, in a voice half choked with tears, "I have neither father nor mother, and have a brother and sister at home, who are too young to work. This morning I divided the last piece of bread between them. It is now more than a year since you commenced employing me, and I have often, for the sake of not disappointing you, sat up nearly all night, but, as yet, you have paid me nothing."

"I am very sorry that I cannot spare you the money to-day," said Miss Belmont. "You must call on some one else who employs you."

"I have been able to obtain employment from only one lady besides yourself, and she has been absent from the city several weeks. Had it not been for her, who has always paid me when the work was finished, the children—as I often have myself—must have suffered for food."

"Well, there is half a dollar, and as bread is cheap, now, it will purchase a good deal."

As she spoke, she carelessly threw it on the table, when it rolled off and fell upon the floor. Another hectic flush passed over Miss Allison's countenance, as she stooped to pick it up.

"I will credit it on my bill," said she to Miss Belmont—then turned and left the room.

"Was not the girl's pertinacity astonishing?" said Miss Belmont. "I found she was determined not to go till I gave her something—so I threw her the half dollar to get rid of her."

"If she were not so very pale, and had not such an anxious, care-worn look," said Adeline, evading a reply to what Miss Belmont said, "she would be one of the most beautiful girls I ever saw."

"She looks well enough, but I cannot endure to see a person in her situation so bold and impertinent."

Before Adeline had time to reply, Elsey re-entered the apartment, saying that Mr. Lester was below, and wished to see Miss Belmont. Elvira's countenance brightened, for Herbert Lester was the person whose regard she coveted above that of all others.—In this respect she showed taste and discrimination, for in elegance of person and manners, as well as in trinsic worth, he had no superior. He was wealthy, likewise—he and Lucilla, his only sister, having shared between them the princely fortune of a deceased relative.

"Come, Adeline," said Miss Belmont, after hastily adjusting some portions of her dress more becomingly, "will you not go down and assist me to entertain Mr. Lester?"

"I will go down," returned Adeline, "but I have already made a long call, and must return home."

As she walked slowly towards home, the image of Emily Allison was constantly in her mind, and she determined, as far as her means would permit, to endeavor to relieve her wants. These were comparatively limited, for her father, though a man of considerable wealth, had a large family to support, so that she not only found it necessary to work her own capes and collars, but with the assistance of her mother, to do the plain sewing for the family. When she arrived home, she exmined her purse, which she found contained only a few shillings; her quarterly allowance, with which her father regularly supplied her, having been expended in the purchase of a more expensive dress than ever she had indulged in before, to wear to the anticipated ball. She now regretted that she had not listened to her mother, who always advised her, never on any occasion, when she could well avoid it, to go to the full extent of her means, in purchasing an article of dress, but always, if possible, to retain something by her for purposes of charity. What little she had, she enclosed in a blank envelope, and sent it to Miss Allison. While Adeline Bradford was thus employed, Herbert Lester, who had been for some time attracted by the brilliant beauty and graceful manners of Elvira Belmont, found, during an hour's conversation with her, that she acceded so cordially to all his favorite opinions and most cherished sentiments, that he took leave of her with the nearly formed determination to win her, if possible, for his bride. When he returned home, he found his sister had arrived, who had been absent several weeks, on a visit to some friends in the country. After those many questions had been asked and answered which often follow each other in quick succession, when friends who have been separated again meet, Herbert, leaning his head upon his hand, remained silent several minutes. He then said—

"I am glad that you have come home, Lucilla, for I wish to know your opinion relative to a certain lady, who, I am half afraid, will steal away more than her due portion of the heart which has, as yet, been exclusively devoted to you."

"And respecting whom you have already decided in your mind, I dare say," said his sister.

"Very nearly, I confess; but still, I should like to know what you think of her."

"You must first tell me her name."

"Elvira Belmont."

"I would rather you had said Adeline Bradford."

"Adeline is a very pretty girl, but not half so brilliant as Elvira."

"Certainly not—but her beauty is of a kind that improves upon acquaintance, and I have reason to believe that her moral sentiments are purer and more elevated."

"That cannot be. I spent an hour with Elvira this morning, and found her sentiments, in every respect, pure and elevated as your own. When I informed her that you had it in contemplation to raise a fund for the relief of indigent widows and orphans, she was enthusiastic upon the subject, and her fine eyes actually filled with tears."

"I am delighted at what you say, for I had formed the opinion that she was selfish and unfeeling."

"I told her that you would probable call on her when you returned, for the purpose of consulting her relative to the most judicious and practicable method of carrying your plans into operation, and she replied that she trusted you would find her with a well-filled purse and a willing heart."

"When I intend to call on her, I suppose I must let you know, so that you may accompany me."

"Certainly. But to change the subject, do you know there is to be a splendid ball a week from this evening, and that you must go?"

"Yes, I heard there was to be a ball; but so far from knowing that I must go, I had concluded in my own mind to remain at home."

"I shall insist on your going, for Elvira Belmont and Adeline Bradford will both be there, and I want you to compare them, now that I have, as I hope, removed the strange prejudice you had imbibed, that Elvira was selfish and unfeeling."

"Well, I will agree to attend the ball, on condition that you will walk with me as far as Miss Allison's this evening, and call for me when it is time for me to return."

"Who is Miss Allison?"

"A young girl who sews for me. She works lace and muslin beautifully; but I make a point of giving her plain work principally, as it does not require such close attention, and is less trying to the eyes."

Her brother promised to go with her, and at seven o'clock they stood before one of those miserable habitations of the poor, which, in greater or lesser numbers, may be found in the dark and lonely courts and alleys of all our large cities. Herbert knocked at the door, which was opened by a blue-eyed, curly-headed boy, almost seven years old, who had been weeping, for bright tears were on his cheeks. Her brother now left her, having promised to call for her in about an hour.

"Is your sister Emily at home dear?" enquired Miss Lester.

At the sound of her voice he sprang forward, and clasping his arms round the skirts of her dress, exclaimed—

"O Miss Lester, how glad I am that you have come, for Emmy does nothing but cry."

Emily, when she heard some one knock at the door, made an effort to compose herself; but her feelings were in that peculiarly excited state, that made her as unable to bear kindness with composure, as "the proud man's contumely," and when Miss Lester took her by the hand, and with an air of unfeigned interest enquired respecting her health, and how she was getting along, she burst into such an uncontrollable agony of tears that she was obliged to leave the room. This caused the tears of little Edwin to flow afresh, and his little sister Letty, only three years old, who knew there was sorrow, though she could not comprehend the cause, hid her face in his bosom, and wept from sympathy. It was not long before Emily returned.

"Excuse me, Miss Lester," said she, "my firmness seems utterly to have forsaken me to-day, and although I knew it distressed these poor children, I could not prevent my tears from flowing."

"I am afraid that your health has suffered in consequence of applying yourself too closely to your sewing."

"It is true that I have found myself failing of late, but it was not that. There are times when some trifling incident will cause all our sorrow, past and present, to rise up at once, and like a swollen tide, threaten to overwhelm us. For a whole year I have worked early and late for a lady, who now owes me fifty dollars, and who has never paid me a cent till to-day, when, after much solicitation, she threw me a half dollar, as a person would throw a bone to an ill-natured dog. Thinking of the careless, disdainful manner in which she threw me the money, gave the impulse, and many, many painful and bitter things rose up before me, with all the vividness of reality. I thought of the days when I was surrounded with as much splendor as she, who had the heart to treat me with so much scorn, is now; and when I had a father who would not suffer "the winds of heaven to visit my face too roughly;" and of the time when, by the failure of others, and injudicious investments, he became a bankrupt, and finally sank into a state of hopeless imbecility. I thought, too, of my beloved mother, who, with no one to assist her but me, and with scarcely bread to eat, watched over him a whole year, as she would over a helpless infant, and when he was gone, how like the vine uprooted and broken by the fall of the decayed tree round which it twined, she too drooped and died. All the agony and desolation of that hour came back to me, as did the voice that mingled its tones with her funeral knell, as it told me the vessel was lost in which he sailed who would have protected me and saved me from all that I have suffered."

Miss Lester did all that she could to soothe her excited state of feeling, but finding that the feverish flush on her face increased rather than diminished, and that her pulse was wildly throbbing, she began to be seriously alarmed, and having persuaded her to lie down, took little Letty in her arms, who soon fell asleep. A few minutes afterwards, her brother called for her to return home, and she requested him to go for a physician, who, in the course of fifteen minutes, was at the bed-side of the sufferer. He informed Miss Lester that there was every symptom of inflammatory fever, and unless the most energetic means were resorted to, there was every reason to apprehend that her disease would terminate fatally. Miss Lester remained with her all night, and in the morning procured her a good and careful nurse. She likewise took the children home, and committed them to the care of her housekeeper.

"I believe I shall call on Miss Belmont," said she to her brother; "and as you will, of course, go with me, according to promise, I advise you to look particularly to the tie of your cravat, and see that your hair is arranged in the most becoming style."

"How soon shall you go?"

"In half an hour."

"I shall, without fail, be ready to escort you."

They found Miss Belmont alone, and looking—so Herbert Lester thought—beautiful as an angel. The conversation took a literary turn, and he was charmed to find that she had read extensively, and that his favorite authors were hers. In poetry, particularly, he found that they agreed not only in admiring the same authors, but the same poems, and she recited several pathetic passages which he named with so much taste and feeling, that he began to imagine that his sister, though her hand was "open as day to melting charity," was dull and frigid when compared with Elmira Belmont.

As soon as Miss Lester found opportunity, she brought forward the subject which her brother had mentioned the day previous, and was pleased to find that Elvira entered warmly into her plan. When Lucilla Lester rose to go, she remarked that she intended to call on a young girl, who was sick and an orphan, whom she considered one of the most prominent objects of charity within her knowledge, and invited Elvira to go with her. She readily assented, and fifteen minutes' walk brought them to the dwelling of Emily Allison. Herbert Lester left them at the door, and Elvira followed her conductress into a mean apartment, where, to her inexpressible consternation, she beheld in the patient her, whom, the day preceding, she had treated not only with incivility but rudeness. Her first impulse was to go to the bed, and in a whisper to entreat her not to appear to recognize her. It was a useless request, for delirium prevented her from recollecting either her or Miss Lester. When Elvira became aware of this, emotions of joy succeeded the feelings of fear and shame which had, at first, assailed her. Her joy, however, was of short duration, for soon her own name was pronounced by Emily, sometimes with epithets of reproach, and then in accents of entreaty, though in language too incoherent to reveal distinctly any circumstance which had taken place. But soon there began to be "method in her madness," and, seizing Miss Belmont by the wrist with a frantic grasp, from which she could not break, she recounted minutely all the incidents which she had the evening previous told Miss Lester; only now, instead of suppressing Miss Belmont's name, she revealed it.

"And yet," said she, when she had finished, looking up into Elvira's face, "for all she was so hard-hearted, she was as beautiful as you, and very rich."

Lucilla, who could not help pitying Miss Belmont, in whose countenance feelings of shame, amounting almost to agony, were depicted, succeeded by addressing the poor girl, who was perfectly insensible of the retributive pain she was inflicting, in a soothing, conciliatory manner, to prevail on her to release her reluctant auditor.

"I hope," said Miss Belmont to Lucilla, after somewhat recovering her self-possession, "that you will not be so ungenerous as to suffer the ravings of a maniac to influence your opinion concerning me.—It is true I owe her for work, and that she called yesterday for her pay, when I happened to be totally unprepared, but I promised to pay her next week, and she would have found me as good as my promise."

Miss Belmont had the discernment to see, at once, that her explanation failed to reinstate her in Lucilla's good opinion, and, saying something about her nerves being unequal to bear such a scene, she coldly bade her good morning, and left the house.

She had been gone only a short time, when some one rapped at the door, which, on opening, Lucilla found to be Adeline Bradford.

"I am much pleased to meet you here," said Adeline, "for you may be able to tell me whether it will be likely to wound Miss Allison's feelings to offer her a few dollars, without requiring her to sew for it in return?"

"Your aid will be very acceptable," replied Lucilla, "though, unfortunately, Miss Allison is insensible to what might either wound or give her pleasure."

"She cannot be dead," said Adeline, starting.

"No, but she is in a burning fever, and totally deprived of reason. But how came you to know that she needed pecuniary aid?"

'She called at Elvira Belmont's the other day when I was there, and I inferred from her appearance and what she said, that she was not only in indigent circumstances, but actually suffering from privation.—Unfortunately, I had parted with all my money, except a trifling sum to purchase a ball-dress and several ornaments more expensive than I could well afford. One of these, a beautiful bracelet, Elvira coveted the moment she saw it, so I let her have it for eighteen dollars, the same I gave for it, one half of which I intend for Miss Allison, the other for a poor widow I happened to meet with last evening. But you will begin to think I don't pay much attention to that portion of scripture which forbids us, when we do alms, to sound a trumpet before us. The truth is, Lucilla, when I am with you, it always seems as if I was in the presence of a sister, and I feel sure that you will not impute my telling you, to motives of vanity."

"I wish you were my sister," said Lucilla, "and I think you will be one day." This remark brought a crimson glow to the cheeks of Adeline, which did not fade at the appearance of Herbert Lester, who, at that moment, came in view, and approached the door-step where they stood. After greeting Adeline with much politeness, he enquired of his sister for Elvira.

"She has been gone this half hour," she replied.—"Some more convenient opportunity, I will tell you the reason why she did not wait for me."

Though it was a painful duty to disclose to her brother the unfeeling and selfish conduct of Elvira Belmont, it was one which Lucilla felt bound to perform, and, simply stating the facts, she left him to draw his own inferences.

In five or six days Miss Allison's disease had performed its crisis, and her physician pronounced her out of danger. As soon as this was the case, Lucil-ca, assisted by Adeline, commenced carrying into effect a plan which had been formed for her benefit.—Neat and convenient apartments were taken for her in a more open and airy part of the city, which were comfortably furnished, and several ladies, who considered it not only dishonest but cruel to delay paying the hard earnings of the laborer, of whatever class, when it was in their power to pay, promised to give her their sewing. The better prospect which thus dawned upon her contributed to the restoration of her health, and at the expiration of a few weeks she, with Edwin and Letty, took possession of their new abode. She found not the least difficulty, now that she was promptly paid, to procure a comfortable subsistence for herself and them, without working at unseasonable hours. She even found leisure to devote an evening, now-and-then, to the friends whose exertions had so effectually ameliorated her situation in a manner that suffered her to live independent of charity.

Miss Lester, her brother, and Adeline, had dropped in one pleasant but cold evening, and were enjoying the comfort of a good fire and the pleasures of an interesting conversation, when a quick, smart rap was heard at the door, which Miss Lester remarked had a sound of impatience in it.

"Shall I go to the door, Miss Allison?" said Herbert Lester.

"I am obliged to you," she replied, "but as it is probably some one who has brought me work, I had better go myself."

"Is Miss Allison at home?" they heard a voice enquire.

"My name is Allison," she replied.

"Will you permit me to come in?" said he; "I have some important intelligence to communicate."

She, of course, assented, and the next moment a man, somewhat above the middling height, wrapped in a cloak which was so disposed as to muffle the lower part of his face, while a cap concealed his forehead and eyes, entered the apartment. Having arrived about mid-way, he changed his voice to its natural tone, as he said—

"Emily, do you not know me?"

The name of Edgar Tracy burst from her lips as she sprung towards him, but failing to reach the arms open to receive her, she fell at his feet in a swoon.—Throwing from him his cloak, he knelt down and supported her, while Lucilla and Adeline administered the proper remedies; the young stranger, in the meantime, bitterly reproaching himself for his want of consideration. She soon revived, and the remainder of the evening was spent in listening to the perils and escapes of Tracy, who, as may be surmised, was the betrothed lover of Emily Allison, who, she believed, had long since found a grave beneath the waves of the ocean.

He and two others, he informed them, left the wreck in a small boat. Both of his companions perished, but he was at length taken up by a vessel belonging to Europe, bound on a voyage to some of the South Sea islands. Here, in consequence of a long and severe illness, induced probably by the injury his constitution had sustained from hunger and exposure while on the wreck and in the boat, he was obliged to remain and suffer the vessel to sail without him. He was unable ever to write a letter to his friends, though he gave the captain the address of Mr. Allison, who promised to forward a line the first opportunity after his arrival. As no such letter was ever received, he probably forgot to perform his promises.

As the wrecked vessel, of which Edgar Tracy was the captain and principal owner, was insured, his loss was trifling, and, though he was not rich, he possessed a competency which would enable him to give Emily Allison a comfortable if not a splendid home. He, therefore, urged her to name an early day for their bridal.

"I have reflected much," said she, one day, when he had pressed the subject with more ardour than usual, "as to what course I ought to pursue, and have at length decided, that in justice to you, I ought to remain as I am, for I shall be not only a portionless bride, but these dear children—I cannot leave them, and—"

"Leave them! Could you, for a single moment, imagine that I wished you to leave them?" said he, interrupting her with much vivacity. "I have enough for all. Our home shall be their home, and I doubt not but that they will bring a blessing with them."

Emily wept, but her tears were not those of sorrow, and before they parted it was decided that their marriage should take place in three weeks. Herbert Lester and Adeline Bradford officiated as groomsman and bridesmaid on the happy occasion, and Lucilla, who arranged every thing with the propriety and fine taste peculiarly to herself, had the gratification to perceive that her brother's unfortunate attachment to Elvira Belmont was slowly but surely giving place to an affection for one lovelier, though less brilliant, and who possessed those gentle and truly feminine virtues, which were a source of happiness to herself and to those within the sphere of her influence.

STANZAS

TO THE MEMORY OF BURNS.

WRITTEN FOR, AND INTENDED TO BE SUNG AT, THE LATE FESTIVAL —BY ELIZA COOK.

Oh! Robin! Robin! child of song,
The nobly poor—the bravely strong,
Warm hearts have met to crown thy lyre,
And mourn the fate that quenched its fire.
Like many another rare and great,
Thou wert not treasured till too late,
Thy "magic mantle's" glowing sheen,
Burst through thy shroud-cloth ere 'twas seen.

Oh! Robin! Robin! bards divine,
Fair wreaths for thee have loved to twine,
But none that deck thy memory stone,
Eclipse the laurels of thine own.
The craven hand would seek to fling
A shadow o'er thy richest string;
But never shall such coward slave,
Shut out one ray from Robin's grave.

Oh! Robin! Robin! princes now,
Will speak of him who "held the plough;"
And many a pilgrim hails the spot
Made sacred by the "ploughman's cot."
The lips that laugh—the hearts that grieve,
Chant forth thy strains from morn till eve;
For Nature ever fondly turns
To hear her own sweet truth from Burns.

Though not beside of hallow'd worth,
Marked Scotia's men and Scotia's earth;
Since Burn's has sung, she needs no more
To spread her fame the wide world o'er.
Oh! Robin! Robin! proudly dear,
Thy spirit still is with us here;
And Glory's halo round thy head,
Shines as we laud the mighty dead.

THE BLIND BRIDE.

The following poem derives its origin (says Hood's Magazine) from a romance of real life, the scene of which is in one of our midland counties. A young lady of great beauty and accomplishments was suddenly deprived, by an inflammation, of the sense of sight. Nevertheless, instead of sinking, under so heavy a dispensation, into listlessness and melancholy, with an admirable spirit she retained her cheerfulness, and continued all her former pursuits, as far as the privation would allow. She continued to play, sing, walk, and even ride on horseback—preserving a bright mind, amidst her darkness, and a happy countenance. Soon afterwards a gentleman returned from abroad, who had been the companion of her childhood—and her lover in his boyhood. Touched by the noble spirit with which she bore her calamity, and still retaining his old attachment to her, he offered his heart and hand for her acceptance—in spite of the urgent counsel of his friends, and even the remonstrances of the lady herself. But he remained firm to his purpose; and the verses were composed, as if addressed by him to his Blind Bride.

Thou seest me not, my own dear bride;
Yet bright thy smile, my Esperance,
As when we sported side by side,
Or mingled in our playmates' dance—
Thy step, as then, is light and free,
Thy stirrup firm and fearless still;
Such power abides in constancy
Of faith, and hope, and steadfast will.

I loved thee then, my heart's first joy,
I love thee now, and tenfold more,
Than when the saddened stripling-boy
Left thee and thine, and England's shore;
One lingering gaze behind I cast;
Thy young eye watched me from the hill;—
O had I deemed that look thy last!—
But here thou art, and dearer still.

Thy mind's a kingdom all my own;
And like the lark, in morning air,
Thy playful voice, whose minstrel tone
Can charm away my every care.
The peace which pure high thoughts impart,
The scents, the sounds of jocund earth,
Are thine—and more than all, a heart
That beats for thee and feels thy worth.

What though alike unmarked by thee,
The moonbeam and the noontide ray,
'Tis mind, and heart, and converse free,
Turn gloom to joy, and night to day.
Then cheer thee love; where'er we go,
My step, my thought, shall wait on thine:
Thy spirit, tried in weal and woe,
My Esperance, shall strengthen mine.

END OF THE CRUIZE.

BY AN OFFICER OF THE NAVY.

Heigho for the days of my youth, when the word home possessed for me all—nay, more than all the charms which poets ascribe to it. Then my three years of wandering was sure of a happy termination; and in meeting dear friends, I was more than repaid for my long exile.

True it is, that even then, in parting, pain would predominate: but that was temporary, and how soon would Hope, pointing over the long time of separation, fix my view on the promised, though still distant, pleasure of a re-union. Then there was in the words "Homeward bound," which sent a thrill through my veins, and produced many, very many fond dreams of future happiness.

Alas! "poor Jack," "a change came over the spirit of thy dreams." Age in its mildest form speedily chills the warm feelings of youth—but you have outlived every tie, to find yourself alone on the verge of dark futurity, when the soul most requires close communion with its fellows, a blighted—disappointed man. The home of your childhood, with all its fond associations, is in the hands of a stranger—the green sod covers father, mother, brothers, and sisters, who once watched to welcome the returned wanderer. And she to whom you pledged your faith, who vowed no chance, no change, could turn from you her earliest love—gone; yes, but not as those I hope to meet in a happier world; but lost—irretrievably lost to me. Tell me not of the fidelity of woman. But why should they? for the young, the gay, the happy, are these delusions. Who care to deceive the gray-headed, blighted misanthrope: for thus they term me. A misanthrope! I, the once open-hearted, confiding Jack Gasket; who knew not what it was to be unhappy until—but no: I will croak no longer—

"But will tell you a tale of my happier days."

"What the deuce can we be waiting for? What can possibly detain us now? Why don't we get under way?" and such like inquiries, were heard from many lips, one fine summer morning, in the year of our Lord, one thousand eight hundred and—— (no matter what) on the larboard side of the quarter-deck of the U. S. frigate Ranger, which had just finished her three years' service on the east coast of South America, and received orders for home.

Our bills had been paid—our leaves taken of our friends and "flames" in Rio, the Comet and Gun had brought off all boats and officers from the shore, the ship was unmoored: riding cable hove into a short scope: running rigging rove, but still we tarried. "What can the Captain mean by this unnecessary delay?" repeated many an owner of a rueful countenance, as he cast his eyes at the pennant and dog vane, and appeared to feel the loss of each breath of the fanning land breeze as though it were the blood from his arteries.

"We have received our sailing orders, have we not, sir?" inquired one of the youngsters of the third lieutenant, who was standing on the horse-block.

"Oh, yes; the captain told me yesterday that we would sail this morning for New York, if we should have the land breeze—if not, we would beat out in the evening."

"Report says the old gentleman's better-half wears the swabs (epaulettes) on shore, and that he is not anxious to resign his liberty," said one of the reefers, sotto voce.

"No, no," said another, "she is Captain General of some two-score Temperance and Anti-Tobacco Societies, down East, and the skipper is in fear and trembling that he may be obliged to forego his glass of wine and cigar after dinner."

"Ah! here he comes—Heaven grant he gets under way at once."

And the group of young gentlemen who had been just criticising their captain's movements, touched their hats respectfully, and fearful of a slight reprimand for standing and talking on duty, began most industriously to walk the quarter-deck. A single glance told our worthy Commander that the time had now arrived, when we must lift our anchor, for in less than two hours the tide would turn and the land breeze give way to a calm, when we should be obliged to tow out with our own boats and those of the squadron, or beat out with the wind dead ahead in the afternoon, which, independent of being tedious, is not unattended with danger, owing to the narrowness of the entrance, and to counter currents. As he turned to give an order, he caught the anxious eyes of all on deck, fixed on him, and appreciating the anxiety all felt, but determining to mystify us for eagerness which did not comport exactly with his ideas of discipline, he turned again, and pursued his walk on the starboard side of the poop. But he could not long disguise his own anxiety to be moving, under an apathetic manner. He, too, had his friends—his wife—his children; whom he was as anxious to greet as any one; and his fine face beamed with pleasure as he ordered the first lieutenant to "call all hands—up anchor for home."

"Up anchor—up anchor," was passed from man to man, on the gun and berth decks, and before old Clewline gave the first twit, twit, to assemble his mates, every body, fore and aft, was at their respective stations.

"All ready for heaving, sir," was heard from the officer in charge of the forecastle.

"All ready! All ready forward, sir." "All ready for heaving, sir," was heard about the quarter-deck and gang-ways, in the various tones, from the deep, full base of the oldster going home to his examination, to the shrill treble of the youngster, who had just finished his first cruise.

"Very well, sir," was the first luff's response to the second lieutenant, and lowering his voice so as to reach the discomfitted reefers—

"Young gentlemen, you need not be so excessively zealous to-day, in passing orders. I believe I hear quite as well as usual. Man the bars. Heave round."

The fifer called forth his liveliest notes—the men sprang to the bars, which bent under their weight, and in came the cable cheerily. All were employed —some aloft preparing the sails for loosing—the tops men's busy hands putting on, taking off—piping in the gangways—ever and anon the hoarse order of an officer mingled with the bird-like notes of old Clewline's call, who stood on the bowsprit, watching the cable as it came in at the hawser-hole, and occasionally piping "heave round," which was repeated aft by his mates.

Even the idlers compromised their dignity as cabin, ward-room stewards, cooks, &c., and threw their weight with a will on the slack messenger. None were idle, and all partook of the excitement of the moment.

"Short stay apeak, sir," was heard from the officer of the forecastle. "Pawl the capstan. All hands loose sails. Aloft sail loosers—trice up—lay out, and loose."

"All ready forward, sir."

"Very well."

"All ready with the main."

"Are you ready with the mizen topsail! Confound these forty's, (anglice: forty thieves, as the mizen topmen are generally called, from their number and supposed propensities,) they are always late," grumbled our worthy first luff, who, be it known, had a few days before, pronounced them the smartest topmen in the squadron, but to day they could not keep pace with his impatience. Why I know not—but if the fact that he took unto himself a wife about ten days after the ship arrived, can throw any light on the subject, I cheerfully record it.

"All ready, sir."

"Let fall—sheet home, and hoist away."

Down thundered the heavy folds of canvass, which a minute before were distended to the yard-arms and hoisted to the mast-head.

"Starboard, after and larboard head-braces. Brace up. Man the bars."

And again the heavy tramp of the men timed with the merry notes of "coil away the hawser."

First is heard from the forecastle, "the anchor is a-weigh,"—then "the anchor is up;"—"pawl the capstan;"—"starboard head braces;"—"avast, let her fall off;"—"brace round the head yards." We had now let go our last hold of foreign ground, and as our anchor was catted and fished, our gallant old frigate, who so long had borne us through fair and foul in safety, fell off with her head towards our far-distant home. The courses and top-gallant sails were now set, when, beginning to feel the stiff land breeze, the ship careened under its influence, and speedily drew us near the flag ship, whose decks were crowded with men and officers, watching our progress.

"Where is the Gunner?"

"Mr. Linstock, are you ready for saluting?"

"Take out the logger-heads."

"Starboard, fire!—Port, fire!"

The exhilarating sounds of our parting salute echoed and re-echoed from the mountains which surround this most beautiful of bays. Bang! bang!

"There goes an answer from the Commodore's forty-two pounders."

"Hark! their band."

Yes—Home, Sweet Home, mellowed by the distance, fills every heart with rapture.

"Stand by to cheer ship."

And as we passed the line-of-battle ship, the soul-stirring hurrahs of four hundred men enhanced the exciting interest of the scene. In a moment her rigging was crowded, and their hearty response showed how well our parting courtesy was appreciated.

"Another cheer and lay down from aloft."

And the freshening breeze soon carried us out of sight of our old companions, with whom we had passed so many happy hours.

Passing Santa Cruz and Round Island, we met a fresh sea breeze, when bracing round our yards we stretched boldly out into the broad Atlantic, and at sunset the most lofty of the range of mountains which skirt the coast, appeared but specks on the horizon.

The first night out, in a homeward bound, is a period of rejoicing. Our anticipations begin to assume a more tangible form;—there is no more to be dreaded from vexatious delays;—the land is now astern, and the next we make will be our own native shores. A few days out on a long passage, the idea becoming more tame from the constant recurrence of our thoughts, loses its first exhilarating influences, and like most anticipated pleasures, clogs before we obtain possession.

The Oriental Prince who was advised by his sages to seek happiness by changing shirts with a happy man, might have recorded a more fortunate search, had his good genius led him into the steerage, or Midshipmen's berth, of the good ship Ranger, the first night out from Rio, for a more jovial, happy set of fellows than its inmates, never collected around a mess table. Supper over, a bowl of punch took its place, when many a cup was pledged to a happy meeting with our friends, as well as to our old companions whom we left behind us. All were present who were not immediately on duty, and harmony and good fellowship appeared to prevail. Songs were sung—guitars used—flutes ferretted out from various recesses, and put into requisition—toasts were pledged again and again, and every thing combined to promise a happy termination to our convivialities.

Of this party one only did not appear to share general joy, but sat moodily apart. A few days before he had been the gayest of the party—no one was happier than he when it became certain we were to return immediately home—and none the preceding Saturday night had pledged more warmly the standing toast of "Sweethearts and Wives." Indeed many of us shrewdly suspected there was some fair one to whom Fred Hastings had pledged his heart and hand, which enhanced in no small degree the promised pleasure of his return. Two days before sailing, a merchant vessel arrived from New York, which I boarded, and upon my return I presented a missive with a blue seal, directed in a neat feminine hand, which I judged would afford him no little pleasure, from his blushes and confusion when I presented it. Away he went below, to find a quiet corner in which to devour its contents, and an hour afterwards I found him walking the quarter deck, but in an instant I noticed that the radiant, joyous expression of his countenance had changed; his mein was as usual, deliberate, but his contracted brow, and compressed lips, gave evidence of severe mental suffering. I was surprised at the sudden transition, but not wishing to intrude upon his thoughts, turned to leave him, merely remarking,

"No bad news from home, I hope, Hastings."

"No—nothing—very strange—but enough to induce the wish that my return was for the present postponed; but it is too late now to effect an exchange, were my examination out of the question."

His voice was husky, and from that hour his whole demeanour was changed; no longer the life and soul of the mess, he scarce spoke except when addressed, and then his remarks were caustic and bitter, nor did he again express a tittle of his late joyous anticipations.

Moodily he sat, on the night of the day when my simple story commences—listening to, but taking no part in the conversation, and occasionally, as a remark of others evinced their pleasure and happiness, a derisive smile would wreathe his fine features. He was a cynic at twenty—and had already felt all the bitterness of disappointment, and unrequited affection.

We all sympathised with him, for he was a general favourite; his good nature, obliging disposition, and high toned moral character, causing him to be universally esteemed where he was best known.

The man has yet to live, however, who has no enemies; and thus with Hastings, and even in our small community there was one exception to the general rule; one whose course of conduct was diametrically opposite to that of the general favourite, whose calm and determined character he feared to bring himself in collision with. He would fain have been his friend, had he been permitted, but having forced, a young man belonging to one of the other vessels, into a duel, which terminated fatally, Hastings informed him that he disapproved his conduct, and that all intercourse between them must cease. He was a reckless, open-hearted, boisterous fellow, as ready to oblige a friend as to quarrel with, and shoot him, at ten paces;—a professed duellist, he sported his hair triggers, boasted of his capabilities at drawing the fire of a novice, and driving any particular button, in company with the ball, into his body. He let no opportunity escape to be a second in an affair of honor, kept himself continually in good practice, and appeared to feel a perfect indifference to danger.

Of all, that night collected around our mess table, no one was gayer than he—none sung a better song, proposed a better toast, or told a better story. But under the veil of mirth and hilarity, I thought I saw occasionally a different expression, as his eye met that of Hastings;—there was a something sinister in the expression, and though I could not understand it, a foreboding of evil crept over me. I noticed that the scene ill comported with the feelings of Hastings, who had ordered his hammock slung, and was now preparing to turn in. As he crossed the steerage, Gainsville, for thus the young man was called to whom I have alluded, rose hastily, and placing himself immediately before him, held out two glasses of the beverage we had been drinking, and offering one, said,—

"Mr. Hastings, we are now in a homeward bound ship, and I would willingly part in friendship with all my shipmates. I hope, therefore, between us the past may be forgotten, and that you will join me in drinking a toast you were not wont to refuse—Sweethearts and Wives."

For a moment Hastings paused, as if undecided, but, recovering himself, answered calmly—

"No, sir, even in a homeward-bound ship I cannot take your hand in friendship. I disapproved of your course of conduct, which was my reason for withdrawing my friendship. You have not changed it. We will doubtless soon be separated, but in time may be thrown together again, in which case it is my wish that we continue as hitherto, strangers to each other. As to pledging a toast with you, I will not;—having neither sweetheart nor wife, you will excuse me, if I decline."

"So, sir," said Gainsville, as Hastings, bowing slightly, was about to pass him, "I am to understand that you refuse my proffer of a reconciliation?"

"Yes, sir; you have interpreted my words correctly."

"Then, sir, I pronounce you a revengeful, unfeeling ruffian. For you the word home can have no hallowing influence, and the wine I filled to drink to you and your friends, I bestow thus." And he dashed the contents of the glass in his face.

"And thus I resent it," said Hastings, felling him with a single blow to the deck.

He was on his feet in an instant, when the contest would have been renewed, had not the others, who were hitherto silent spectators, interfered to prevent it.

"You shall hear from me," said the discomfitted party, vainly endeavoring to repress his rage, "although I suppose you will screen yourself under your pretended moral principles, which prevent your rendering reparation, though they do not your giving an insult."

"No, sir—we may as well understand each other. It will be time enough for your sneers when your challenge has been declined. Send your friend, and I promise you shall have no reason to complain."

So saying, they separated—and each of the party, who had met for conviviality and enjoyment, turned thoughtfully into his hammock, bitterly regretting that the termination of a happy cruise should be marred by such an unfortunate incident.

As day followed day, all mention of the difficulty was studiously avoided. Each pursued his own occupation and amusement, to while away the time which hung heavily on our hands—but our ardor was damped, when we considered that one or perhaps both of our messmates might never realize their anticipations of home and happiness—feeling certain as we did that a duel was inevitable.

Chapter Second.

A pleasant passage of thirty-eight days, and the glad cry of "Land ho" informed us that our native shores were in sight from our mast-head. "Land ho!" "Land ho!" passed from man to man—from deck to deck—and every face gleamed with pleasure. All were soon on the spar-deck, to catch a glimpse of the long-desired spectacle. Gally cooks, holders, ship's corporals, non-combatants, who for weeks had not seen more daylight than the scanty portion which finds its way down the narrow hatchway, were up and straining their eyes to discover what was not yet visible except from aloft. Even our good-natured, lazy marine officer, who had never before been known to get as high as the sheerpole, actually crept up to the fore-yard, to have a view of the Highlands of Neversink, which now peered above the horizon.

As evening approached, one after another well-known object was recognized;—the fore-and-aft schooner, a rig purely American, was hailed as an old acquaintance; and when the pilot came on board in his tiny, sylph-like craft, as many hands were extended to him as if he had been an old and tried friend, and as many questions asked as if he had just returned from the kingdom to come. As he came on board at too late an hour to attempt to enter the harbour that evening, we hauled off the land under an easy sail, tacking every two hours, to enable us to keep our position, and take advantage of the earliest daylight.

I was just turning in, with a mid-watch in perspective, when a boy informed me that Mr. Hastings wished to speak with me on the forecastle. Knowing that it was his watch, and instinctively divining the cause of his message, I threw on my pea-jacket, and followed the boy on deck, where I found Hastings leaning thoughtfully on the Jacob's ladder, with his eyes fixed on the shore, which loomed out duskily on the lee-beam.

"Ah! Gasket—the messenger told me you were turning in; had I known that, I should not have disturbed you. But I supposed you like the rest, too full of joyous anticipations to indulge the night of a land-fall on your own shores, after a three years' absence, in your natural rest. But as you are here now, I may as well tell you at once why I sent for you, and not detain you long from the embraces of your favorite deity. The Ranger's is not the first steerage where our grub has been eaten off the same mahogany. We have always been friends, and I hope I have not been premature in counting on you as my friend in this affair with Gainsville?"

"No, certainly not; but I hope there will be but little difficulty in adjusting it amicably. He has challenged you, then?"

"O yes; Brougham brought me a note this afternoon, just after the land was reported, in which he demands satisfaction or an abject apology—such a one as I will never consent to make. So he shall be even gratified in his first request;—and now, that I know I can depend on you, the rest is easily arranged."

"But, Hastings, is there no hopes of adjusting this difficulty without a meeting? Now, at the termination of the cruise, neither ought to be so punctilious. That is the opinion of your shipmates, none of whom would be willing to sacrifice your honor, and they are all as anxious as myself that it should go no further—so allow me to use my influence to bring about so desirable an object."

There was some steadiness in his manner when he answered—

"I have already done all I will do or allow any to do in my name. I told Brougham I would apologize for the blows if he would make the same reparation for throwing the liquor in my face. This he refuses, contending that I gave provocation in refusing to take his hand in friendship. I did not seek a quarrel, but did not wish to be his friend, for he has injured me, deeply injured me; but how or when, it matters little now, though it is still unatoned for. Nor do I, as I told him, approve of his conduct, setting aside all feelings of personal dislike; he is, I believe, without principle—is a professed duellist—and a bully, if you allow me to apply the term to a man who occupies the position of a gentleman. He boasts of his aim, and is happy to have it known that he has shot his man. No, we must fight—so good night, old boy"—(resuming his familiar manner)—"I will not keep you out of your hammock, particularly as I expect a quick relief from you at twelve o'clock."

I shook poor Fred by the hand, and retired to rest with a foreboding of evil I could not suppress. I was confident that something unusual had occurred with Hastings to have changed so much his sentiments in regard to duelling;—time was when he would have made an effort to have avoided a personal rencontre, to which he was morally and religiously opposed.

After my mid-watch, I again turned in, and when I awoke at seven bells, we were standing in through the Narrows, with all larboard studding sails drawing, and at ten in the forenoon we dropped our anchor off the Navy Yard.

To our great joy we found we would not be detained to strip the ship, she being turned over to a new crew and officers, who were waiting for her on board the receiving ship. All was consequently hurry and confusion, each one packing up to get on shore as soon as possible, on leave of absence, having been filled up immediately and sent on board by the Commodore of the station. Having some relatives in the city, I went immediately to see them, only learning in my haste the hotel to which Hastings intended to go, and promising to call upon him as early as possible that evening.

It was near eleven o'clock that night before I could get to his room at the City Hotel, where I found him busily engaged in writing on a table strewn with loose papers, taken from a writing-desk—the old and constant companion in his cruizings. Under a loose pile of letters, and only partially concealed, lay a finely mounted pair of duelling pistols, with a powder flask, bullet box, and other formidable accompaniaments, and near them a bunble of Spanish cigars, one of which he lighted as I entered—at the same time recommending them to me.

"I fear, Gasket, that I have interfered with your pleasure, in bringing you thus early from your friends."

I assured him I was perfectly at his service, and sat down in silence to listen to what he might have to communicate.

There is something appalling and repugnant to our nature, thus to sit in calm converse with one who, before the next sunset, will probably be in another state of existence. To listen to his trivial remarks is mockery, and how terrible appears the coolness which enables him to observe all the punctilios and etiquette with which you would so gladly dispense. It was thus with me; I was called to receive, perhaps the last request of an old and tried friend, who, instead of appearing to appreciate his awful situation, was quietly smoking a cigar, and conversing on some unimportant subject. It was mockery, and I could not listen, but interrupted him to converse on the subject which then lay uppermost in my thoughts.

When I referred to the expected meeting, his demeanor underwent an immediate change—the smile was banished from his face, and the half-uttered jest died away on his lips, but still he retained a consummate coolness which baffled me.

"Oh, yes, by the way, I may as well tell you we have arranged it to come off at six in the morning; but before we make any further arrangements, I have a question to ask you: Are you willing that we should meet on terms of equality?"

I answered, "Of course: as his friend, I would not consent that it should be otherwise. His life, as well as honor, he had entrusted to me, and it should be my care that he should enjoy at least, all the advantages of his antagonist."

"I am glad—truly glad, to hear you say so, Gasket, for I have seen many who, although advocates of the custom of duelling, and who have no objection to see men shot down at ten paces, between the words 'Fire and Three,' would shrink with horror from any arrangement out of the ordinary routine, even were it to ensure that equality for which the judicial trial of combat with arms, was originally instituted, and upon which their kind, disinterested friends dwell so much. To you these remarks do not in the least apply. I know you, as well as myself, regard the institution as most barbarous, and that motives of friendship only, have induced you to consent to see me through this difficulty. But you know, as well as I, how many personal combats might be prevented by the seconds, when it is not done, and how coolly those gentlemen discuss the preparations—measure the ground—snap the pistols, etcetera, instead of attempting to compromise matters."

"What distance do you prefer, then, Hastings?—as the challenged party, you have the choice—the weapons will be pistols, of course. Indeed, I see you are already provided."

"Why, of course? because the custom of this country has prescribed it. Suppose I choose the Rapier, because I am an adept in the use of that weapon, his second would object, because his principal is not—yet I have no right to object to the pistol, even though he is a good shot, while I have scarce fired a pistol a dozen times in my life. No, no: the supreme arbitrary laws of duello, in this country, where the sword is not generally worn, prescribe that we must be killed with pistols, so I even bow to its high and potent mandate, and choose that weapon. As you say, however, I have the choice of distance, so as to obviate the evident inequality which exists between a capital shot and a novice, I to-day informed Brougham, after you left the ship, that I would meet his principal at the distance of two paces—that is," said he, as his eye flashed with an unnatural brightness, and a strange, almost repulsive smile, rested on his features as he watched my countenance, prepared to note its expression; "with the muzzles of the pistols at each other's hearts: this arrangement brings us on a perfect equality."

"You are jesting, surely," said I, trying to force a faint laugh; but his manner gave the lie to my assertion, for although he still smiled at my astonishment, there was in his eye, an expression which proved too plainly what were his intentions. "You would not—you could not be so sanguinary. Such a quarrel as yours surely demands no such fearful method of adjustment. It is murder—cold, deliberate murder—and I will lend myself to no such horrible purposes."

"Then I have mistaken you, Gasket," said he, rising deliberately to ring the bell; "but stop—you shall first hear my reasons—when, if you persist in your refusal to accompany me, late as it is, I must seek another friend." His manner was cold and reserved, almost haughty, as he drew up his fine figure before me, his nostrils dilated, his lips compressed, but his brow still smooth and fair. "You have long known me, and in me found an unflinching opponent of the duello. I have even deprived myself of the society of those I esteem, because they had fought; and at one time, you may remember, I risked my reputation among you, by informing the first lieutenant of a projected duel between two youngsters, whom I in vain endeavoured to reconcile. Until now I have always honorably avoided all necessity for being engaged, either as principal or second. I have ever been heedful not to give offence, and have not been tardy in making ample amends, if in any instance, a word or action of mine had wounded the feelings of any one. This duel, you are well aware, is not of my seeking. I rejected, it is true, his proffered friendship; but how could I consistently do otherwise? My sentiments had been openly expressed; and when he returned to the ship, with the blood of one of my associates on his hands—one whom he had forced to fight him—he being in the wrong throughout—I could do no less than tell him that his hands could never clasp mine in friendship. Yet, in doing this, I was careful not to wound his feelings—but what I told him, I had deliberated upon, and did it coolly and dispassionately.

"At the time, he acknowledged the propriety of my conduct. Why, then, did he attempt to take advantage of a moment of excitement, to bring about a reconciliation he must have known could never be effected, or fix upon me a quarrel he knew I would fain have avoided. He hates me with a bitter, implacable hatred—that of an unsuccessful rival. Did he know, however, the contents of the letter I received before leaving Rio de Janeiro, triumph would have taken its place and this collision have probably been avoided. He has tried many times, by words, not spoken to, but at me, to induce a retort on which to hang a quarrel. He has boasted (this I know) that I should not escape him, and being well aware that I would less regard a quarrel were right clearly on my side, he addressed me the first evening out, as he did, to induce others to believe that he was anxious to become reconciled, and thus throw the stigma of a duel on me. I saw his motive—indeed I have been advised of his intentions, and acted as you have seen, on this knowledge.

"Even then, when he peremptorily demanded an apology, I offered him one in case he made reparation for his first insult. He refused. I now have the consciousness of being in the right, and of having done every thing in my power to prevent a meeting, but without success. Shakspeare says—'Beware of entrance to a quarrel: but, being in, bear it that thy opposer may beware of thee.' Should I meet him at the distance at which duels are usually fought, he would probably kill me, which he wishes doubtless to do.

"Like the wolf, when he once tastes blood, man is never content until he gluts himself—that is, when young: but when nearly the number of years generally allotted to man have passed—when the bright paths of life appear nearly traversed—while for the future appears that dark, indescribable uncertainty from which the boldest shrink with horror, then the conventional opinions of the world availing them no longer, they feel compunction for the deeds that were done, and shudder at what in youth they panted for.

"Without he has to-day received letters from one who was once dear to both, he thinks me in his path as a successful rival; and for this reason alone I believe he would fain remove me. On the other hand, should I kill him, which I think improbable, I should be branded as a murderer, pointed at as a homicide, or by the most liberal as a duellist, which I would very little prefer to the harsher appellation—and that, too, by that same arbitrary conventional society who would brand me as a coward did I dare to refuse to fight. I must fly like a felon, (indeed, by the law all engaged are considered felons,) or risk its penalties in the same manner as a common assassin or burglar. How futile will prove all their attempts, by a ten minutes' legislation, to break down an institution that has existed among civilized nations for about twelve centuries, and which, in times past, was established by the ecclesiastical Courts, in order that the Almighty might thus show the right when the weak reason of man cannot grasp it. Let people say what they please—let sermon after sermon be preached—and article after article written, reprobating it—go into the world, even among the more gentle sex, and you will see their lips curl with scorn, should their attention be directed to a man who allowed himself to be insulted without thus washing out the stain. It is true, that this is not a proper test of courage, and that one who declines a challenge, and refuses thus to endanger his life in a duel, may retrieve himself by a gallant action in his country's defence, or some other good cause. But, in the whole course of his life no such opportunity may offer, when he goes down to his grave with a blot upon his fair fame.

"And what have those who so much reprobate the crime, done to prevent it? Nothing—literally nothing. They have, it is true, proscribed it by several penalties—but we can see no good that has ever resulted from them. In history, we have examples of governments under which duelling was a capital crime; but even that penalty, like our fines and imprisonment, has failed in effecting the desired object. The time will come, doubtless, when this remnant of barbarism will be banished from all civilized communities. But, mark me, it will not be as long as the punishment is indiscriminate, and no distinction made between the right and the wrong.

"Our statute laws are at present in utter disregard to the feelings of those governed by them, who never can be brought to consider a man condemned, for a fair, open, personal conflict, as a disgraced felon; laws instituted by men who appeared to take no cognizance of the fact that, to a certain portion of our community, courage is a capital without which a man cannot enjoy life. No, no—don't interrupt me. I am not, as you suppose, changing my opinions to work out my own justification. Here, take another cigar. I know, by long experience, that to be the best mode of insuring you a quiet auditor. Ah, now," said he, smiling, as I resumed my position, "I may continue. When finished, I will willingly hear your views. These have always been my opinions, yet you know I am no duellist. A man enters the Navy or Army, where he requires no other capital than the intellect granted to us all, and physical courage: he is selected from among his countrymen to fight their battles—and, in the former service, to protect their commerce and represent them abroad in peace. By the regulations, the people, through their representatives, have provided for the government of their military institutions, he is required 'to show an example of courage,' &c., to those under his command, and let him fail in this, or let his bravery be doubted even, and his influence is permanently lost. He has lost his value—his capital—the only requisite for admission to his country's service. It is true, he may be a brave man notwithstanding, but the generality of those around and below him will doubt it, and common men will hesitate in following an officer, of whose courage there is a question, on a dangerous enterprise, as he may fail them in a crisis. Again, if duelling is excusable in one instance, it must be in all; and who is there among those even most opposed to it, who would not applaud, rather than censure, a representative of the country who risked his own life rather than permit his flag to be insulted by a stranger?

"We are allowed," says a celebrated writer on international law, "to defend our property from the attacks of a robber; and instead of blame, we receive commendation if in such defence the life of the robber should be sacrificed. 'Casuists may say,' he continues, 'that honor is ideal.' Be it so. There is much said which contributes to my honor and happiness, and it is my property, and must be defended in the manner society has prescribed. Should I permit an insult to pass unnoticed, it is tarnished, nay, lost, in the eyes of many with whom I am in daily association, and whose opinions and good-will are of more importance to me than those of all the sage law-givers, of whom I hear only through their prohibitions. Perhaps much I have said has been irrelevant. Indeed, when I commenced, I had no intention of giving you at such length my views. But now I will return to my own case, general principles apart.

"Mr. Gainsville has long wished me to do violence to my feelings by fighting him, in which case he had little doubt, from his knowledge of his weapon, that the result would be favorable to his wishes; or, in case of my refusing to fight him, to have branded me as a coward among my associates, would have answered his purposes. He shall be disappointed. I feel now, owing to certain circumstances that have lately transpired, that my life is of little value to myself or others. Relations I have none who know or would regret me. So I am willing to make a sacrifice to rid the world of a dangerous man, who might do much injury to society. I do not care to live, and be branded either as a murderer or a coward—neither do I feel willing to allow myself to be sacrificed to answer his base purposes, and leave him behind me to injure others, as his disposition would doubtless prompt him to do. These, then, are my reasons for availing myself of my prerogative and choosing the distance that has startled you. My papers I leave in your care. You can read all when this affair is over; then you will see how little I have to attach me to this world, and be at no loss to account for a calmness which is that of despair.

"All that bound me to life and tended to my happiness, has gone, and now death for me has no terrors, because life possesses no charms. Call it heartlessness, if you like, but my predominate feeling is curiosity: I wish to see if, on to-morrow, he who has always appeared so reckless, so careless and indifferent to danger, will not quail before the certain, inevitable death I have prepared for him. Your answer, Gasket! Will you or not act as my friend? If so, we will arrange these papers to follow you—for you are aware that a return to New York would be unsafe."

His sophistries had not convinced; but as he was determined in his course, I could not desert him, so I readily promised, and we set about our sad task.

"These letters," pointing to a large packet, sealed and addressed to me, "you will read, and will find a full explanation of much you don't understand in my conduct for the last few weeks. These are now of no importance, so I will burn them. Here are two miniatures. This," opening one of a beautiful girl of about sixteen, "you will have forwarded as I have directed in this letter. The other, of my mother, you will keep as a memento of my friendship."

Everything was barely arranged and a note addressed to my friends, requesting them to forward the baggage of both to Philadelphia, when the rumbling of the carriages in the street announced the approach of day-light, and warned us of the necessity for starting.

"Here, Gasket, I believe all is arranged; I will leave the key at the bar while you conceal the pistol case under your cloak. Come, come, we must away or we shall be too late for the Hoboken boat."

With a sad foreboding, which his gay demeanor did little to quiet, I accompanied him across to the ferry, after which, an hour's walk brought us to a secluded glen behind the village, where a thick undergrowth would effectually screen the expected tragedy from observation.

Upon our arrival, we found we had anticipated the other party; so Hastings, who was now in a gayer mood even than during the night, commenced striking fire from a spare flint, and sat down, as he said, to quietly enjoy his last cigar, at the same time offering me another, which he took from his case.

"My God, Hastings!" my pent feelings getting vent, "have you no feeling, no compunction for the deed you are about to commit in ——"

"Nay, Jack, don't again quote that old hackniied expression. 'Cold blood,' which is neither new nor applicable—but, joking apart, and I know, to you, my attempt at hilarity must seem fearfully ill-timed, I feel no compunction—he has willfully forfeited his right to life, and that right I now feel myself in possession of. As to myself, for more than forty days, this scene, which I looked upon as inevitable, has been ever before my eyes, and death, when viewed through no false medium, which the attractions of the earth present to most of us, loses its terrors.

I am not now to die; the bitterness of death was past when I first determined to meet him, and in this manner. My only wish now is to see that prating bully pale before me, and show him that those who profess to be conscientiously opposed to such conflicts have higher motives than a fear of death, and that when the time arrives that they think it necessary to die they can leave the world and brave futurity without a shudder. You all want a warning, Jack, and I hope the sacrifice I am about to make will benefit many. But here come my antagonist and his friend; we must up and receive them. You have but to reject all proffers for an adjustment, and you express my wishes."

I rose to receive Brougham and Gainsville, who now approached; both were deadly pale, and I saw in a glance that the former, as much as myself, dreaded the part we were to play; his principal was calm, but I thought I could trace in the uneasy workings of his countenance a fear of death; for a moment his face, as if by an effort, was stern and composed, but ever and anon the muscles of his mouth would twitch convulsively and his eye quailed as he met that of Hastings. In the ordinary acceptation of the word he was a brave man, yet he shrunk from the fearful ordeal which had been prepared for him. Hastings, too, noticed it, for a slight and derisive smile played about his mouth when his eye met mine after his searching glance.

I felt the moral lesson the look expressed, and since that day, when I see those who are willing to risk their life so needlessly, I am loath to believe it is because they are prepared to part with it, but they depend on chance or accident to preserve what they unnecessarily hazard.

The usual civilities exchanged, Brougham expressed a wish that the quarrel might yet be adjusted without a meeting, or, at least, that Mr. Hastings would not insist upon the distance, which must inevitably prove fatal to both parties. Upon conferring with my principal, which form I complied with, though knowing how uselessly, he answered me peremptorily, "No; I came here to fight since he would have it so, and not at this late hour to talk of a compromise." I gave his answer to Brougham, who said he thought Mr. Gainsville might be induced to apologize for his first insult to Mr. Hastings, and accept from him an apology for the blows.

"That, of course, he will not do," said H., who had now come within hearing, apparently impatient at the delay; "he refused yesterday before I had chosen this unusual distance; we must not expect him to do it now."

His manner was hurried and somewhat agitated, while his adversary bit his lip until the blood started at the bitter sneer. The pistols were then loaded and presented to the parties, who were placed about three feet apart, so that the muzzle of each held a steady pressure against his opponent's chest under the right arm. Both were cool, but there was nothing in common in their coolness. Hastings took his place briskly, with a smile a casual observer might have mistaken for a happy one, while the movements of his adversary were mechanical, and the workings of his countenance told of the deep anguish within.—His eye once wandered, as if to see if none were there to interrupt them, to my face, and to Brougham's; but seeing nothing upon which to base his hopes, his eye met that of his opponent with a look of malignant hate. It was the triumph of desperation and pride over fear—the distinction between the coward and the brave man.

Once only did his features relax, as he felt the position of his adversary's pistol, which pointed outwardly—and not in a vital direction; but it was momentary, for I, having won the word, approaching with a cocked pistol in my hand, asked—"Are you ready, gentlemen?" Hastings, passing his pistol directly over and in the direction of the heart, answered "I am," distinctly; while Gainsville's answer was indistinct. He had been playing with his victim—allowing Hope even at that moment to delude him.

Brougham and myself, with our pistols cocked, stood on our side, each opposite the other's principal. Again I asked, "Are you ready?" and being answered as before, gave the words—"Fire—one—two—three!"

The discharge was simultaneous with the word "fire," and both fell—Gainsville, after a convulsive bound in the air; while Hastings, turning on his heel, fell heavily on the ground, his clothes burning from the closeness of the explosion, and the heart, which but a moment before beat wartnly within his breast, lay bare and shattered.

Many, many years have passed since that fearful morning, but the scene is ever present in my memory—it haunts me in my dreams and waking hours, and never do I remember the mangled forms of those victims to this iniquitous custom, but a shudder steals over me which chills my warmest and most joyous moments. All Hastings' requests were complied with; his papers and letters, which he left me, were much more satisfactory in accounting for his sudden change of opinion and deportment than all his casuistries on the evening preceeding the duel.

They are still in my possession, and may perhaps, some future day, be added to the small store of events in the by-gone days of "Jack Gasket."

THE VICTIM OF CONSUMPTION.

BY JAMES LUMBARD.

I saw him in youth, the glad morning of life,
When the heart with a thousand fond raptures is rife;
When the tide of existence rolls smoothly and gay,
Like an unruffled stream on a calm summer's day;
When smiles of pure gladness illumine the face,
Where sorrow has left not a visible trace;
When Hope paints the future in colors as fair,
As the hues of the rainbow "suspended in air."

I saw him again, but a change had been wrought,
In the form but just now with such loveliness fraught!
The hand of disease on its beauty was laid,
And fearful and sad was the ravage it made;
From his cheek had departed the roseate dye,
And gone was the brilliance that shone in his eye;
And the pale, wasted form, and the flickering breath,
Too fearfully told of the messenger, Death!

Again when I saw him, the spirit that shed,
A halo of gladness around us, had fled;
And the form that but now was in life's early bloom,
Was enrobed in the shroud for its rest in the tomb;
The eye-lids were closed like the beautiful flowers
That fold up their leaves in the dewy night hours;
But Death, as he bore the freed spirit away,
Bestowed a sweet smile on the cold coffined clay!

Oh, never again in this perishing world,
Where the flag of disease and decay is unfurled;
Where those who are shrined in the innermost heart,
Are ever the first who are called to depart;
Shall I see the dear friend whose devotion and truth,
Were the light and the joy of my pathway in youth;
For the grave, the cold grave, has closed over the form,
Erewhile with existence and joyousness warm!

There's a region above this dark valley of ours,
And death cannot enter its shadowless bowers,
To wither the blossoms that brilliantly bloom,
And load the sweet airs of that clime with perfume;
And there, with the angels surrounding the throne,
Are the loved, who from earth and its sorrows have flown;
And there, when life's struggles and trials are o'er,
Shall I see the sweet friend of my youth evermore!

Utica, N. Y.

HACO, THE SEA KING.

IN TWO PARTS.

BY W. H. HERBERT,

AUTHOR OF "THE BROTHERS," "CROMWELL," "RINGWOOD, THE ROVER," "THE MAID OF ARC," ETC.

PART I.

Wild blew the grim north-easter, whirling aloft, over the whole face of the blotted heaven, the dim and misty fog wreaths, lashing below the surface of the vexed Atlantic into a series of howling billows crested with snowy foam, and driving in the whole sweep of the mighty Ocean against the granite ramparts that gird the stern coast of New England. It was as yet but early autumn time, and the primeval forests, which, in the days wherof my tale must speak, grew stately and luxuriant down to the very margin of the deep, had scarcely changed their rich grateful verdure, for the first of those glorious tints which tell of present frost, and coming winter, but the keen-cutting gale, which tossed their agitated limbs creaking and groaning in strange dissonance, was such as would have suited well the dark skies and leafless woods of bleak December. There is, perhaps, no more romantic or more lovely scenery on earth, when viewed under the genial influences of summer weather, than many points that may be found along the iron-bound coasts of what are now the States of Maine and New Hampshire, the bold, stern granite crags, crested with everduring umbrage of the pine and cedar—the deep ravines and chasms, through which some mimic torrent comes babbling and foaming down, to lose its petty murmurs in the huge diapason of the never-silent sea,—the myriads of wild islands, that stud the azure deeps some large and rich, with grassy lawns and green savannahs, and shadowed by huge timber trees, others bare shrubless blocks of granite, lifting their bald heads high above the fiercest spring tides, and again others mere reefs and arrowy ledges, dripping and black forever with the moisture of the waves that momentarily batter their summits—and to make up the picture, the singular and glassy brightness of the translucent sea, so clear that you can mark the smallest pebble at the bottom, in fifteen fathoms water, and the resplendent glory of the far-cloudless ether. But on the other hand nothing perhaps can be imagined more desolate, more gloomy, or more fearful than those same coasts, when seen during the prevalence of a north-easter—the leaden sky above: below the sullen ocean, gloomy and dark as night, save where it bursts in yeasty foam more fearful than the blackness, the wild wind howling and sobbing through the shattered forest, the awful breakers, here leaping up into the air from the concussion of some reef unseen amid their boiling surf, here flashing up, high as the mainmast of an admiral, against some towering crag, and showering their bitter spray far landward over the bent tops of the tortured forest. Such a sight was it, and such a tempest; hundreds of years before, the world-dreaming Genoese had started from the petty port of Palos, for the discovery of a region, which had been twice before* discovered, and twice before forgotten. Night was approaching rapidly, and with the growing twilight, the storm waxed wilder yet, and the scene more fearful. A few faint sea-fowl, which spite the fury of the tempest, had been unwillingly compelled by hunger to quit their rocky haunts in pursuit of their finny prey, were beating wearily, tack after tack, up wind, with harshly plaintive clamors, to gain some shelfy cliff or isle, that towered above the spray.

One huge bald-headed eagle was wheeling far aloft, over a point of granite, that ran out sharply into the foaming surf, feathered with giant pines, so sturdy that they scarce bowed before the gale, clapping his wings and shrieking his fierce rapture at the storm; but not a sign of man, even in his most savage state, was visible along the rock-bound coast, or the wave-girt islets; no smoke-wreath worming its way aloft among the multitudinous green boughs, no red fire glancing through the spaces of the mossy boles, no bark canoe hauled up on the dry shingly beach, no wigwam or skin-tent under some sheltering knoll. Not a tree had been felled by human hands of all the countless millions that overspread that forest-continent, though thousands strewed the earth, prostrated by the viewless hurricane, or sapped by slow decay. Not a barque had been launched from those virgin shores—the very redmen had scarce penetrated yet so far to eastward, though they had long before swept like the flood-tide over the builders of Palenque and Uxmal, over the pilers of the mounds, the tillers of the prairie, the civilized descendants of the old Phenicians. But now, with one huge square-sail, reduced by reefs to the smallest compass, her other canvass furled, and her yards lowered, driving before the gale with terrible velocity, and cleaving the very waves, which she outstripped with a hoarse sound, like scornful laughter, a long black galley came scudding down the storm. Strange was her model, and such as now would be deemed utterly unseaworthy; yet he who had seen her ride the waves with the easy grace of the wild swan, now swooping into the hollow trough, now buoyantly and majestically breasting the huge swell until it melted under her, would scarce have judged her as inferior to the best frigate that now stems the ocean. She was extremely long, and her bows very square—her beam being placed far-forward, and her frame narrowing aft more suddenly than in the boasted craft of modern days—but, in the place of what we should now call the cut-water, she had a sharp projecting beak, plated and edged with solid iron, strong bands of which, wrought into singular devices, fortified all her prow, which, like her stern, was decked some twenty feet aft with a little bulwark, or rail rather, running round it. To this were attached some twenty shields on either side, vast hollow circles of bright steel, though tarnished somewhat by the driving spray, each having blazoned on its surface some rude and terrible device, the earliest insignia of incipient heraldry. Behind this half-deck, if it may be so called, the waist was very low, and completely open for sixty feet or better, with thwarts, stretchers, and thole pins, for a numerous crew of rowers, although the long oars now were all laid in, and only eight or ten hands visible upon the decks or in the waist—the stern, as I have said, was likewise decked, for nearly twice the length of the prow, being much narrower, and was surmounted by a little after-deck under the cover of which the tiller could be worked, while several loop-holes had been perforated in the sides for arrow-shot—above this rose a tall flag-staff of iron, and from it, streaming out toward the bow, floated a broad white ensign with a black raven, the proud emblem of the Danish and Norwegian Sea Kings, as it was the peculiar and chosen bird of their great Odin. The masts were two in number, one rising from the after part of the forward deck, which was completely stripped of all its hamper, only a few strong stays and shrouds appearing—the top-mast had been housed, the yards sent down, and not a stitch of convass was to be seen; the other, which stood some distance abaft the centre of the waist; about two-thirds of the galley's length from the head, bore the one square-sail under which the barque was scudding; and about this were clustered all the men who were in sight, with the exception of one—a tall and stately figure, who stood upon the extreme verge of the prow, thundering out his directions from time to time to change the vessel's course as his keen eye detected the up flashing breaker, telling of jagged reefs, or the discolored water, betraying the more treacherous sand bank right in the galley's track—and two who stood beneath the after-deck swaying the massive tiller, to which the good ship started, obedient as a charger to the rein. The waist of the rover, like the bow and stern, was garnished with a row of shields, but whereas those on the decks were large enough to cover the whole person from the chin downward to the knees, and were elaborately wrought in steel adorned with carved and gilded bearings; the others were not above half the size, fashioned of hides of the wild bull or mountain elk, many times doubled, and bound together by stout rims and studs of iron. Such was the aspect of the galley and her crew, which on that wild and stormy night careered so fearlessly and fleetly among the barren rocks and forest islands, that gem the lovely bay of Casco.

The vessel, as we have said already, was the perfection of the marine architecture of that remote, rude age; and, when we consider what strange feats were accomplished by those long Norse galleys, propelled by sail and oar, with neither compass nor chronometer, nor aught to guide their sturdy mariners, except the stars by night, and the great sun by day, we cannot but believe that they deserved the high encomiums of the Runic minstrels, who boasted them, in their wild lays, the dragons, or the vultures of the deep, the riders of the storm, the blast defyers!—The men were evidently all of one tough northern stock, not very tall, but wonderfully strong, and built alike for feats of prowess or agility. Not one of them had anything upon his head except his own thick tresses, all of one common hue, though varying through many shades of gold and auburn, from flaxen to bright red; nor did they seem to heed at all the fury of the gale, which tossed their tresses into tangled elf-locks, or the cold sleety rain, that froze as it fell on their close curly beards, and thick moustaches. Their dresses were short frocks, with close cut hose, of elk-skin, coarsely tanned, and were gathered at their waist by broad belts of the same material, with ponderous clasps of iron; their feet and ankles were protected by laced sandals of bull-hide, dressed with the hair outside; and in his girdle each bore a long, broad two-edged knife, with a buck-horn hilt, one of the tines making a rude guard, but no other weapons, —although around each mast there was a rack of heavy ashen javelins, about five feet in length, with broad barbed iron heads, of eighteen inches; and under every field was a huge curtal axe, of ten pounds weight or over, its stock all bound with plates and bands of metal. But if their garb was singular, their persons were yet more so; their skin, where it had not been exposed to the sun and storm, was white and delicate as a fair woman's, with all the veins in blue relief distinct upon the snowy surface; their eyes, without an exception, were of the brightest, clearest blue, with a quick, dazzling glance, that resembled more the flash from the orbit of a falcon, than the expression of aught human. Rarely exceeding five feet six, or eight at most, in stature, their shoulders were much broader than would be looked for now in men vastly taller—their chests deep, round and massive—their flanks extremely thin and clean—and all their lower limbs developed to the fullest muscular proportion, gave them an air of lythe and flexible agility, and power almost invincible, more like the sinewy strength of wild beasts, than the might or energy of man. But in addition to all this, their arms were of a length so unusual—the fingers, as the limb hung down naturally by the side, reaching considerably below the knees—that it gave them an air almost unearthly, particularly when combined with the piercing flash of their keen blue eyes.

To the dress of these mariners, there was, however, one exception; the man who stood at the bow, directing the course of the galley, wearing a suit of the armor peculiar to his day and nation. This person, too, was somewhat taller than the rest, not being, perhaps, much short of five feet ten; and, had it not been for the disproportionate breadth of his shoulders, and the length of his arms, he might have been called eminently handsome. His forehead was broad and ample, his nose well cut and rather sharply aquiline, his mouth firm, bold, and perhaps imperious, except when a smile played over it, erasing in a moment all that appeared objectionable in the feature—his long and curled moustache, his close crisp beard, and the fine waving locks, which parted evenly upon the foretop, flowed down on either side his face, were all of a bright sunny amber, that suited well with the rich coloring of his clear complexion, and with the large bright eye, that seemed to pierce the dunnest mist, and read at a glance the symptoms of the brewing storm. His head, unlike those of his followers or comrades, was covered with a casque or basinet, of highly burnished steel, with a projecting peak shading the eyes, solid cheek pieces, connected by a ring under the chin, and a curvical, or neck-plate, fastened by hinges to the skull-cap, protecting all above the shoulders. This singularly formed headpiece had no avantaille, or vizor, for that appendage had not yet been invented; but it was fitted with what was called in later days a nasal, a narrow plate, or rather bar, of tempered steel, carved so as to fit the front of the casque, on which it traversed in a sort of groove, so that it could either be thrust up above the peak, or drawn down and attached by the lower extremity to the cheek-pieces at the chin, protecting the nose, and indeed the whole face, from anything but the direct thrust of a pointed weapon.—This helmet, which was, despite the damp sea air, kept bright and burnished, was overshadowed by a huge pair of gilded vulture's wings, the crest, as it were, of the distinguished wearer; for none but a man of mark would have been suffered to assume so haught a cognizance. The arms and body of this warrior were covered by the peculiar hauberk or shirt of mail worn by the northern heroes, composed of stout steel rings, not linked into each other like the chain armor borne by the Crusaders, but sewed edgewise upon a shirt of elk-skin, reaching to the mid-thigh, and belted at the waist by a broad girdle, covered with plates of steel. In time of action, or immediate peril, the Sea King, for he was no less than one of those wild hero-pirates, had doubtless hose of mail to cover his stout legs; but in the present instance they had been laid aside, as well as the two-handed broad-sword, and the huge war axe, and his strong limbs were covered only by the tough leathern trews, and sandals of bull hide.

Such was the form, and such the garb of him who scanning with a practised eye the mysteries of the darkening deep, piloted that sharp galley, flying, as she did, fast as the eagle's wing, before the gray northeaster, through many a tortuous pass, where the huge breaker boiled beneath his lee an instant, and roared the next many a fathom in his wake, as the obedient barque answered her helm with instinctive quickness. The orders which he thundered forth from time to time, couched in the old Norse tongue, were clearly heard above the hissing of the sea, and the howling of the wind, so high and trumpet-like, were his commanding tones, and instantly obeyed by the keen-witted crew, who seemed, as it were, to anticipate his orders. Once or twice it was necessary, in order to get the galley's head round sharply, to thrust out a long oar and pull a stroke or two, and then perhaps to do the same on the other side, to force her about again as rapidly; and though in these manœuvres, the loss of a second's space, a stroke too many, or too few, would have insured the loss of ship and crew, all was done with a deliberate promptness, that could not be surpassed by the best disciplined and ablest mariners that ever rode the surge.

But now the night was blacking more and more, and the storm waxing wilder, and as they drew near to the long point of granite rock which ran out far across their course, due southward, with the dark pine trees all defined clear and distinct against the western sky, whereon a faint and sickly glow of red announced the setting of the sun, and the bald-headed eagle wheeling in air above it, daylight was rapidly deserting them.

"Ho! Alf!" shouted the leader, suddenly, "summon me Snorro Sturleson"—and at the word, one of the men in the waist sprang aft, and pushing back a sliding pannel in the bulk head of the stern cabin, whence a red glare streamed out into the misty night, uttered a word or two which could not be heard without, so hoarsely came the roar of the mad breakers on the ear, as they dashed furiously against the rocky wall, at less than a mile's distance; but their import was soon rendered plain, as an old man, whose frame unbowed by years or hardships, and sinewy limbs, and erect port, belied the tale told by his snow-white beard and hair, stepped forth, and, treading on the rocking thwarts as steadily as though his feet were planted on the earth-fast granite, made his way forward to the Sea King. His dress was a shirt or frock, cut like those of the others, but made of a rich bear skin, the black fur outwards, and in his port and bearing, no less than in the deferential air of all who looked upon him, might be discovered the respected sage, no less than the undaunted champion.

"See, Snorro!" cried the Sea King, as the old man stood beside him, "what readest thou there, and there, and there?"—and, as he spake, he pointed to the soaring eagle, to the white breakers, and to the fading sunset.

"A sign!—a harbor!—light!"—answered the sage. "Readest thou not so, fair-haired Haco?"

"I read," the king replied, still gazing out intently on the waters, "and there," pointing to a long line of jagged rocks which ran out with the white surf plashing over them far seaward of the promontory, "there I read peril—and there a channel!" And as he uttered the last words, he flung his left arm wide toward the ocean, where far beyond the reef a wooded island loomed up large against the misty sky. "Between the reef and isle, I read a channel."

"I read!" again asserted the old man.

"But, Haco, night comes."

"We must do, therefore, quickly," he replied, interrupting him. Then raising his clear voice to the utmost pitch—"Call all," he shouted. "Call all! Cheerily ho! Call all!" And in an instant, as it were, the waist was crowded with the light haired Norsemen—a hundred mariners, at least, with ten or twelve, whose armor and high bearing denoted their superior rank, were mustered in the mute, attentive expectation. "Oars all! Ready the starboard braces!" Another moment passed, and with two of the champions, a dozen seamen stood on the after deck grasping the ropes by which to turn the aquaresail, while the rest seizing the long tough sweeps, and holding them erect, gathered by divisions, each with their proper leader, waiting the word to act.

And here, before proceeding farther, it will be necessary in a few words to point out the position of the vessel and the land, so that the reader may comprehend at once the effect of the manœuvre. The galley darting directly down before the north-eastern gale, was running parallel to the coast, which lay on the right hand, at about a quarter of a mile's distance, and her head was of course pointing south-west, so that the long point which ran out at right angles to the land, was exactly under her bows, and if she held her course any longer, she must necessarily rush headlong on its iron barrier. The skilful mariners who guided her, well knew that beyond the perilous promontory the water must be calm and sheltered, so that it would be easy, that once weathered, to find a secure anchorage. In order to effect this, however, it would be necessary to turn the vessel's head to the south, and to coast along the awful reef toward which wind and sea would drift them constantly side onward. No ship can hold her course across a violent wind without making more or less leeway, and the whole safety of the ship under such circumstances depends on the accurate calculation of the drift as compared with the headway. At present, however, there was no choice.

"Out oars! give way."

The words were hardly spoken before the long blades dashed in the gloomy water.

"Haul on the starboard braces—port the helm—hard-a-port!"

It was done, and like a thing of life the vessel started round and looked for a moment as if she could have made her way across the very track of the wild gale—but heavily the surges dashed her in, and though she fore reached gallantly, yet the lee drift was fearful.

"Pull on your starboard oars—pull for your lives—pull all!" cried Haco. "Snorro, direct the steersman thou, while I go ply the oars. Ho! Gurlang! Harald! Rafen! spring to the long oar, champions. Hagen the strong-armed, and stout Hedin, ply starboard, ply for life!" and with the words, he leaped into the waist and seized the stroke oar, while the champions, whom he had called by name, displaced as many of the meaner mariners, and bent their strong thewes to the task with energy that made the strong ash oars spring steel-like as they dashed the foam wreaths from their quick glancing blades. It was a perilous and fearful crisis, and what made all more awful was that the rowers, whose faces were of course directed to the stern, could see nothing except the foam-flakes whirling in their wake, and the tremendous surf dashing across the ragged reef, nearer as it seemed to them, and nearer yet, at every dash of their oars. Snorro alone, who piloted the galley, could mark the way they made, and his experienced eye, although it judged, and judged rightly, that they could weather the extreme point of the reef, perceived that there was yet another, and another danger; the channel was so narrow between the islet and the reef, and they were drifting down so rapidly, that he much apprehended there would scarce be room again to change her course and fill upon the other tack, before the surge would sweep them on the points.

"Larboard oars, easy. Starboard, give way, give way! Stand by your sheets and braces," Snorro called, in a voice that no one would have dreamed could issue from so aged lips. The very crisis of their fate was come, as broadside on she swept into the channel, the starboard oar blades grated upon the jagged reef, and the last breaker curled under the clear run of the trim built galley, and lifted it over a shelfy point that might have pierced its planking. The sharp beak was within six feet of the islet beach, but fortunately it was bold and the water deep in shore, for had the prow touched there never so slightly, the heavy current would instantly have swept her in stern foremost, and nothing could have saved her from destruction.

"Let fly your sheets! let fly! starboard the helm! hard starboard! hold water starboard oars! hurra! hurra! pull all!" And loud and wild amid the storm rang the triumphant burst of the Northmen's cheering, as they swept through the narrow channel, and were a moment after in water nearly smooth, although their sail was still exposed to the full force of the wind. Again her course was altered, and in an instant she was running with her head straight in shore, to leeward of the rocks whose windward edge she had so perilously coasted, into a deep and sheltered bight between another woody islet, and the steep point of granite rock which secured it from the eastern tempest. Five minutes more, and her sail flapped idly in the dead calm as she ran, under the lee of those vast cliffs, into a basin as still and peaceful as a dead mill pond; then came the splash of her heavy anchor, and the rumbling of her cable, and as she lost her way entirely and swung to her moorings, and the square-sail was furled, the last glimpse of the daylight faded, and Snorro Sturleson, pointing aloft to a vast pine tree, which leaned out far from the cliff's brink, over the vessel's mast, whereon the eagle had just alighted, and was even now folding his mighty wings, exclaimed to Haco:

"The night is here! the sign was true! and we have found the harbor!"

"True, Snorro," said the king, "but having found, we must strive hard to keep it. Ho! bring us torches from within, set the hearth out upon the brow with the old iron grating, bring rosin and pine knots and kindle me a beacon, that we may make out something of this cove—it it is as dark as a wolf's mouth already—foul fall the loss of our small pinnace! we must e'en build a new one."

Within a shorter space than can be fancied, some large plates of sheet iron were spread upon the iron beak, a massive grating raised above them, and a vast pile of dry pine knots and birch barks, with turpentine and rosin, kindled upon the bars, that dealt a column of broad wavering flame ten feet aloft into the murky air, casting a strange and lurid glare over the dark green verdure of the pines, over the dull gray cliffs, over the shadowed water, rendering every thing distinctly visible, though with a wild and unnatural lustre.

"So! we can see things now, and judge what we are doing," exclaimed Haco; "Now, Alf, my bold one, off with thy coat of skin, take an inch rope in thy right hand, swim to the cliff there, pass it round that huge pine trunk which springs out of you crevice, and bring me back the end as soon as may be; meantime bend on a good hauser to the other end, ye on the prow—and you, Nidorunder, do you likewise swim to the islet there, and pass a line about the strongest trunk you can find on the shore; moored thus we shall float safely, hap what may!"

No further words were needed; nor would the orders of the fair-haired Haco, the most renowned Sea King of the time, have needed repetition, had they commanded things much harder than a short plunge in a midnight sea. Flattered and pleased, rather than daunted by the mandate, the hardy men flew overboard, and within half an hour the vessel was moored, head and stern, between the islet and the crags, in perfect safety, let the wind blow where it listed. Scarce was this done, and ere the crew had yet retired from their quarters, when the door in the forward cabin was pushed backward, and, strange apparition in such a scene and season! a lovely girl stepped forth, to whom all eyes were turned upon the instant, in respectful admiration.

Nearly as tall as any of the men, except the very tallest, she had none of those strange peculiarities which marked the males of her bold race; but on the contrary, her form was exquisitely moulded, slender and delicate, yet full of soft, voluptuous roundness, and her face was beautiful as ever was the face of woman. A vast profusion of soft golden hair flowed down over her neck and shoulders, below her shapely waist, in rich luxuriant tresses; her bright blue eye was formed, as it seemed, alike to beam with radiant mirth, or to melt in the sweetest tenderness; her skin was pure as the virgin snow on the untrodden Alps, before the sun has kissed it, and her lips, no simile but would be faint and feeble, beside their warm carnation! Her dress was singular, yet beautiful. An under robe of spotless linen, fell nearly to her feet, which were covered with small sandals, all decked with golden studs, in ample draperies, but over this she wore a tunic or short kirtle of the finest scarlet cloth, with hanging sleeves that left her white arms and her swan-like neck uncovered, all trimmed and bordered with the richest ermine, and above all a mantle of the same costly fur, gathered up to her shoulders by large clasps of virgin gold. As she stepped out into the waist of the galley, the full glare of the beacon fell on her beautiful figure, and bright speaking lineaments, and the sweet smile effaced the stern expression of Haco's mouth, as his eye dwelt lovingly upon her glorious charms.

"Is all safe, Haco?" she asked, in a voice tuneful as a silver bell;—"Is all safe, Haco, in this wild harbour?"

"Thanks to Niorder!* aye, and, I might well say, thanks to Freya! likewise! for if he saved us from the perils of the deep, she it was who preserved us from the perils of your sire's pursuit."

"And think you that we have escaped it?"

"Past doubt we have, beloved Asgarda. To-morrow, should this wild storm cease, we will ashore and see whether it be some of your green islands, we may not find a spot to build a bower that shall efface the fiords and fells of the old Northland from your recollection! Meantime, hie to your cabin, my sweet one, where presently I will rejoin you. And now, my men, he added, as she disappeared, "we have toiled hard and prospered—spread now our choicest stores; broach, Rafen, broach the mightiest ale cask—Ogiered and Ughtred, strike your notes, chant out your blythest lays—for hap what hap to-morrow, blythe will we be to-night; here, on these coasts of Vinland, a thousand leagues aloof, we still will drink the toast of our great sires:

"Skoal, to the Northland Skoal!"

Loud was the burst of cheering that followed that brief speech, louder the revelry that rang till midnight among the crags and pines of that untrodden solitude, starting the wild birds from their roosts, and the wild beasts from their forest lairs. The storm died quietly away, the stars came out in the clear heavens, but not an eye took note of them—the ale was mighty, and deep were the wooden quaighs from which they drained it, and night was waning into morning before the beacon died away, and the loud Runic strains ceased to alarm the forest echoes, and the sun rose again and scaled the heights of heaven before the sated revellers aroused them from the heavy slumbers which had succeeded to their day of stormy peril, to their night of more stormy glee.

The morning broke as beautifully as ever morning did, in the transcendent atmosphere of an American autumn. From the horizon to the zenith, there was not one speck of cloud,—no, not so big as a man's hand, to tell of the coming tempest; the whole vault of the heavens was as bright and as transparent as if it had been hewn out of a vast block of sapphire; the sun rushed up triumphantly above the many colored tree tops, and filled the universe with light and gladness. The Sea King stood upon the forward deck of his war galley, the first man awake of all that manned her, and gazed abroad over the lovely scene which stretched before him, far as the eye could reach, in gay but placid beauty. The broad expanse of Casco Bay opened before him, studded with its three hundred glittering islets, walled in by the sublime gray rocks of stern Cape Ann, and overshadowed by the eternal forests which crowned each ocean isle and beaked promontory, with garniture more gorgeous than the pomp of a kingly coronation—for, shew the regal purple that can compete with the rich crimson of the maple, the gold that can outvie the hickory and poplar, the velvets that can match the soft pile of the green sward, the plumes that wave so lightly as the nesh tassels of the feathery larch; or where are the Labaan odors, the myrrh and frankincense that stream from golden censers, when judged beside the balmy perfumes that float upon the free breath of boon nature—where the sounds sent forth from stringed instruments, flute, hautboy, horn, or trumpet, that sink not into vilest dissonance, when listened to after that sweetest natural concert, which is compounded of the soft sigh of the western wind, vocal among the pine tops, of the far trill of falling waters, the song of birds, the hum of bees, the very tap of the woodpecker on the hollow trunk, the caw of the inharmonious crow, and the scream of the fierce wild cat, mingling with the more gentle and melodious sounds in a strange harmony, and the deep bass of the mighty ocean booming, in perfect unison with one and all, a grand and giant diapason.

Such was the scene across which, lighted by the slant rays of the sun, new risen, the bold Sea Rover cast his astonished eyes,—and little used, although he was, to yield his soul to soft and soothing influences, little as he in general cared for smooth seas or smiling landscapes, preferring ever the loud voice of the keen northwest, shouting among his cordage to the mild music of the summer wind—delighting in the ear-piercing trumpet, or the dread yell of battle, heard high above the clang of blade and buckler, as the sole minstrelsy fit for heroic ears—still Haco felt that the genial air, the lovely scenery, the absolute tranquility, were for the time delicious; and, for the time, he yielded to them, and he gazed on and filled his soul with beauty, and mused in day-dreams more like the meditations of some love-stricken youth of Italy or Spain, than the high visions, terrible and proud, and gory, that were wont to float through the brain of the fierce Norseman. The spot in which the bark was moored, was in itself as romantic as anything that can be imagined. It was a deep and narrow channel, between a small and wooded islet on the left hand, and the steep craggy promontory which they had, the preceding night, so dangerously doubled, frowning upon the right; before the bows of the vessel, at about forty yards distant, lay the beach, feathered with thickly-growing underwood, all dyed in the splendid tints of autumn. The islet to the left was low, and covered only with stunted oak bushes, and sumacs, with the rich crimson cones and scarlet berries, so that the eye could reach beyond it to the bright bay with its tiny wavelets, all laughing in the merry sunshine, and thousands of gulls and wild fowl on the wing, disporting themselves in the brisk air of the early morning. While he was yet gazing, and debating within himself whether he should retain the berth into which he had, it might be said, accidentally brought his ship on the previous evening, or whether he should move farther, in search of a more secure anchorage, a slight noise from the beach called his attention; and, raising his eyes, he saw a tall and graceful doe, with a fawn about two-thirds grown by her side, which had forced her way through the coppice quite down to the edge of the surf, and stood gazing at the ship with her full liquid eyes fraught with a wild astonishment, that partook, however, in no respect, of fear—not even when Haco stepped down from his elevated post, and having brought a long steel bow and a brace of shafts, advanced to the very beak of the galley, and stood there in full view of the timid creatures. For a short space, while you perhaps could have counted twenty, the warrior stood watching the movements of the beautiful animals, which, so utterly unaccustomed were they to the sight and hostility of men, were browsing on the soft tips of the foliage, as if they were in absolute security; but in a few minutes the ardor and excited eagerness of the hunter came hot upon the spirit of the Norseman, unused to pity even the weak of his own nature, he raised the bow deliberately, having already notched one arrow on the string, and holding the other between the first and middle finger of the bow-hand, he braced the bow with care, so that the string should recoil well clear of his inner forearm, and threw his whole body into the horns of the weapon, in that most graceful attitude which befits best the noble archer craft; he did not aim along the shaft, not he, but fixed his eye upon the object, and raised the weapon with a steady upward motion, until the feather of the shaft came to the level of his aim, then drew the left hand back till it had reached his ear, and the barbed steel head was resting on the gripe; a quick twang followed, and before the feathered messenger had reached its mark, a second twang succeeded it, (so quickly did the right hand, which had just released the bow-string, grasp the plume of the second shaft, notch it, and having drawn it to its full tension, launch the missile.) The little fawn fell first, and scarcely struggled, so deftly had the arrow been directed to the great artery of the neck, and so exactly did it sever it; the doe received the arrow in her heart, and bounded, as it struck her, some six feet high into the air; and as she fell, although she stood ten yards at least from the ocean's edge, her beautiful head was pillowed on the waters. There was none of that frightful gasping, that fearful animal convulsion, struggling, as it were, to avoid the necessary end, which follows the infliction of a mortal wound by a weak hand or an ill-directed weapon; but, on the contrary, so strong was the hand and so sure the aim of the archer, that all unnecessapain was spared to the victim, and the steel head had scarcely penetrated, which it did with a speed second to that of light only, to the point for which it was intended, before, with one shivering throb, the life and sensibility of the victim were brought to a close together.

"Alas!" said a soft voice at his elbow, "Alas! for the beautiful doe, and the little fawn! Oh, Haco, why didst thou slay them?"

"Lovely Asgarda," replied the Sea King, turning round to his fair lady-love; "methinks I have seen you slay them too, in old Gardarike's woodlands, and on the snow-clad ridge of Kiolen, which overlooks two seas."

"Aye, Haco," answered the beautiful girl, "you have, I doubt not, and will, I trust, again,—but it must be when the fleet beast bounds fairly from the covert, and the clear horn awakens all the lusty echoes, and the hounds rave behind; when keen excitement sends the heart's blood in streams of liquid fire, through every swollen vein and artery, when every nerve leaps life-like to the mighty impulse. But not when they steal forth from their lone coverts to crop their morning meal in quiet—not when they come out, as it were, to welcome us to their wild forest-land—not, Haco, when they trust in us. I know not why it is, but when I came forth from my couch among yon heavy sleepers, and saw the bright and glorious day-god driving his fiery chariot through the azure, my heart was light as thistle-down, and yet more buoyant, and when I climbed up hither to greet my gallant Haco, all nature seemed to promise a life of tranquil pleasure—but when I see those slaughtered victims, slaughtered in their security and confidence, mother and child together—there is a shudder in my very soul, there is a cloud over my eyes—there is a dark dream of a bloody future!"

"Well may you term it a dream, sweet Asgarda. For say what here can harm you—we are beyond the reach of your stern father. Frode, the great, hath not, midst all his thousand gallies, a bark that could ride in safety the billows we have conquered, not amidst all his pilots, a helmsman that could steer him to this new world of ours. Here, lovely one, here will we found a new empire, and Haco and Asgarda shall be the happy pair whose names shall live for ever, the mighty parents of a fresh dynasty, the planters of the puissant Northmen on the wild woodland shores of Vinland! Look forth, look forth, my love: is not this calm and island-studded bay, fairer to gaze upon than the rough frozen fiords, the sounds and races of our rock-bound Northland? Are not these bright woods gayer than the grim pines, winter-bleached and stag-horned, that crest the wild brows of our uplands? Can you not here be happy?"

"With you, Haco," she replied, turning her full blue eyes upward to meet her lover's gaze, "with you, Haco; with you, anywhere. Oh! yes—it is indeed lovely. But now, my Haco, arouse yon slumbering sluggards, and let them move the good bark from her moorings, and row us through the bay, until we find a sweet spot where to build our bower."

"Be it so, bright Asgarda," answered the chief, and raising to his lips a huge bugle, made from the horn of the vast Northern Urus, bound round about and tipped with polished brass, he blew so loud and clear a reocille, that echo after echo came ringing from the rocky isles and iron headlands, long after the wild crew had started from their sleep, and rushed out with arms hastily caught up, buckling on their battle-brands, and clasping their steel casques in all the fierce tumultuous confusion of an unexpected summons to the fight

A few words speedily explained the leader's wishes, and in a little while the stout bark was unmoored and skimming cheerily, propelled by the stout oars of a portion of her crew, over the clear blue surface, while the rest were employed busily on the forecastle, in flaying and preparing for the table, the victims of their chieftian's archery. Haco, the while, with his fair bride, and four or five other beautiful girls—her waiting maidens in time past, who like their mistress, had decided rather to brave the perils of the stormy sea, and seek the wild shores of the Western World, vague rumors of whose existence had already been promulgated among the discoverers of Greenland, where they might dwell unharmed, with the heroes of their choice, than to remain in the palace homes of their noble fathers—sat on the high-raised stern, with Harald, Hedin, Hagen, and others, of the bravest officers of the Sea Rover.

Many a fairy isle they passed with broad green lawns, and beautiful savannahs, many a lovely reef or round-topped rock, haunts of the seal and sea-gull, but until noon was near at hand, they found no spot that pleased them for a permanent abode, but when the sun was high, they steered upon a larger island than they had yet discovered, and coasting round its eastward and south-eastward side, found no place where they could effect a landing, so steeply did the gray precipices rise from the brink of the waters, while the tall growth of noble trees, oak, hickory, and maple, which rose yet above the rocks, shewed that the soil within must needs be very fertile.—They turned the southern cape and it was still the same, a vast wall of gray granite—the western, it was still the same, though something less precipitous—but still the same magnificent coast of timber trees peered over the stern barrier, and four or five bright rivulets of limped water, came leaping down in mimic cataracts, with a loud sound like joyous laughter.

Determined now to explore the island thoroughly, they coasted round the whole western side, and steered toward its northern coast, now resolute, if possible, to effect a landing. The northern side was still bold and rock-bound, but not near so lofty, and from it they could see the green hill sloping upward, part open lawn, part massive forest, and part low underwood, all overrun with the green tendrils of the wild vine thickly hung, now with the long purple clusters, and now there is an opening in the rocky wall, a narrow opening, not above eighty or a hundred feet in width, with the deep water, so deep as to be perfectly black in its limped clearness, glancing and rippling against the natural piers on either side. The galley, at one waive of the master hand of Haco, shot through the narrow pass and floated instantly in a small land-locked basin, perhaps a quarter of a mile across, sheltered from every wind of Heaven.

"Skoal,* skoal!" one universal shout, arose from every mouth on board the bark. "Skoal! skoal! to our new home and fastness!"

On every side there was a narrow stripe of smooth white land, framing the dark blue waters like a gold setting to a Venetian mirror, and beyond this a natural lawn of smooth, short green sward, dotted with sumac bushes, and here and there a clump of the red juniper matted with the rich tracery of the abundant vines, with a clear mountain streamlet dancing through the meadows as if it sought to find its way to the vast ocean; and around all the sheltering forest was out-spread, now blazing with every tint and color that can be found on the pallet of that great master painter—Nature.

"Aye!" exclaimed Haco, as the tumultuous cheering of the glad crew subsided—"Aye! here shall be our home; what sayest thou, beautiful Asgarda?—Here shall our gallies lie in safety, and on yonder crag," pointing with the words, to either headland of the harbor—"a tower of stone shall make our port impregnable—on yonder level meadow a bower for our bright ladies—on yonder inland hill a watch-tower. Ashore—ashore—we will ashore forthwith!"

And without much ado, or many words spoken, the daring mariners exchanged the narrow quarters, which had for many a weary day been their sole dwelling place, for the fair woodland scenery which was to be thereafter their home and country. That day was given up to sacrificial rites in honor of the great gods whom they and their forefathers had adored for ages in the rough Northland—Odin and Thor and old Niorder—to revelry and song and feasting. Red gleamed the festive fires on the fresh shores and virgin waters of that fair island, and loudly rang the jocund chorus, and fast circled the great wassail bowl. That night the galley was the resting place. But with the dawn of the next morning the clang of axes and the din of toil had replaced the sound of feasting and mad merriment. The fair-haired Sea King, with all his chosen chiefs, and first in dignity and in the reverence of men old Snorro Sturleson, the bard and seer, were busied in surveying their new kingdom, planning the sites for dwellings and vantage grounds for fastnesses against the foe, should a foe track them to their distant harbor. The men meantime were hastening to get out the stores and cargo. A forge was soon erected on the beach, with anvil, store of iron, and an abundance of those implements for which the rugged Norsemen were so famous. Axes were singing merrily on many a giant oak and heaven-kissing cedar, and ere the night fell, the foundations of a long hall, or barrack, had been laid on a little knoll fronting the opening of the harbor at about sixty yards from the margin of the land-locked bay. Day after day the toil continued unremittingly, while mindful of the coming winter the hunters scoured the main, the fishers swept the deep, the fowlers waged continual warfare on the innumerable tribes of the air. Wood was split and piled for winter fuel, and all the work went on merrily. Thus, long before the first snows had begun to fall, there were erected on that island shore a dozen low roofed buildings, framed rudely, it is true, but sturdily and weather-proof, of the squared trunks of the huge trees that grew in such profusion round them. The hall, a large long building, with a vast table stretching down the midst, and massive settles upon either hand, with a large vault-like fire-place at either end, was first constructed; and when its walls were decked with shirt of mail and shields and helmet, with many a northern battle-axe and many a massive falchion swing from the rafters overhead, it was to their untutored eyes as nearly the perfection of architecture, as could be wrought of wood instead of the massive masonry which formed the dwellings of their fathers. A bower, as it was then termed, or in other words, another building, nearly of the same size for the use of the women, divided into sundry chambers, was raised beside it, with separate dwellings for the chiefs, and a tall block-house or watch-tower, as they called it, which overlooked the settlement and was intended to be its defence in any time of trouble. A huge round boulder of the native granite, which was found on a neighboring hill top, was rolled down from its natural resting place by dint of mighty toil, and placed on the seashore; and, when a rugged basin had been hewn out of its upper surface, and some strange characters graven about it, this was made holy by strange rites, and dignified as a great Rune-stone, or altar for their bloodthirsty deities. Ere long winter came—but there was store of smoked and frozen game prepared beforehand, and many a cask of mighty ale brewed ere they left their European homes for that wild voyage, and fuel was abundant, and little recked those hardy men, and their brave northern feres the rigors of a climate scarce so severely cold as that of the hills and dales, in which they had been born and nurtured, full of rude health and unpampered strength and stubborn hardihood. Few days were there throughout the long and icy winter in which the woods of main and island rang not to the faying of the northern bloodhounds, (for several huge and shaggy trackers of the deer had been the fellow voyagers of the fierce emigrants,) and to the bugle and the shout of fair-haired Haco and his comrades. Few days were there on which the deer, and cariboo, and the gigantic moose, mightier even than the elks of their own hills, fell not before their fatal archery—for they were skilled of old to skim the surface of the frozen snow on their long snow-shoes, and skate, fleet as the wind itself, over the glassy lakes. Many a fierce black-pelted bear, many a brindled wolf gave their furs to clothe the skin-clad warriors, while richer and more costly robes were furnished to the dames by the soft ermine, and the lynx and martin. By night the fires blazed high, and the ale circled in the mighty horns, while songs of old were shouted out beneath the waning stars, and the fierce chivalry of hardy Europe, with its half brutal crimes, and its half god-like virtues bade fair to be established firmly among the woodlands and the crags of young America. The women plied the distaff, and told each other legends of the mighty dead, and brewed strange medicines from herbs which they brought with them, culled when the moon was full, from their ancestral Norway, and sang, and played on their rude instruments of music, and toyed with their wild lords when they returned weary and mild of mood from the successful chase, and never for a moment rued the lot which led them to exchange the old for the new continent. The clear cold skies of winter at length became overclouded with the damp mists of spring, the air was alive with the innumerable wild fowl, the waters teemed with fish, the atmosphere grew mild and balmy, the grass shot up all green and fresh from the soil that but yesterday was covered with dank snow, the forests began again to show their verdant garniture, and nothing ever seemed so beautiful on earth to eyes accustomed only to the dark pines of Drouthern or the stunt birches of more northern settlements, than did the woods and waters of Asgardafiord, for so, in honor of their chieftain's bride, had the Norsemen named their colony. New buildings were erected, and a few acres cleared for the scant cultivation of those martial rovers—a little barley whence to concoct their loved and potent ale or to knead coarse cakes for their women, for little cared the hardy hunters for food so luxurious and effeminate as bread so long as the broiled meat heaped their boards in abundance, and the ale mantled in their wassail horns—a little flax from which to fill the distaffs, such was the agriculture of the nations, which then teemed in the mighty cradle of north-eastern Europe, before they had as yet swept like a torrent over the southern kingdoms, and given birth to the mightier races, destined in after time to rule the universe.

Days passed away, and weeks were numbered into months, and it was now nigh midsummer, and as yet not a sign or sound of danger or pursuit had reached the eyes or ears of the expatriated warriors—they prospered—they were happy—and if at times their souls waxed weary of the calm lives and innocent amusements which had succeeded to their turbulent career of piracy and bloodshed—and if at times their spirits grew athirst for the din of battle, the havoc, and the glory, and the rapture of the strife, they were recalled ere long, to the more domestic joys that grew up fast around them. For now the lovely bride Asgarda had become a lovely mother, and a young Haco, whose blue eyes and long fair hair made him the very image of his father, sported upon her knees, and even thus early displayed the dauntless spirit of his heroic race, by clapping his young hands, and shouting at the flash of his sire's broad-sword, as he waved it in the sunny air, high over his unshrinking head. And not Asgarda only, but Swanwhitar, so named from the dazzling whiteness of her complexion, which outrivalled the purest swandown, and Hilda, and Oddruna, had made their lords proud fathers. The stern war galley had been long laid up, but many a light pirogue had been constructed, and twenty sail at least hailed from the infant settlement. Thus had time travelled onward, and all their fears—if they can be said to fear, who expect evil without dreading—had long since been forgotten,—when, on a lovely evening in the early autumn, one of their fisher barks, which had been plying far to the eastward, beyond the mouth of the great Penobscot, almost as far as the Bank, came staggering in with every inch of canvass set that she could carry, and instantly gave notice that she had been chased for three whole days by a large vessel, which by her build and trim she knew to be a war-ship from the Northland; and two or three of her older mariners declared that they knew it for the great galley of the old King Orvarod, the puissant and revengeful father of Asgarda. Fire flashed from the keen eyes of Haco—vain were all prayers. There was no doubt but they might lie safe in their hidden fastness until the search were over, and beautiful Asgarda, brave as a maiden, ambitious as a wife, but timid as a mother, stooped to entreat.

"I!—I! Haco—I stoop to hide from a living foe, and that foe my father and a Northman—I who swept the waters of the midland seas, whose raven flag has banished every drop of blood from the swart cheeks of Spanish and Italian warriors! I hide me like a fox in his burrow—for shame! for shame, Asgarda!—wouldst have thine Haco styled Nidering?—Not so not so! To arms! brave friends—to arms! Up with the raven banner—launch the long galley, my stout champions—stretch to the oar! Ho, thy axe, Hagen! Ho, thy great war-sword, Hedin!"

Fierce joy blazed out from every eye—loud pealed the battle cry.

"To-night," they cried in unison, "to-night will we sup here in triumph, or with Odin in the hall of heroes!"

And to that gallant boast, the women, now aroused to their accustomed recklessness of daring, responded joyously, as they rushed to and fro to seek their husbands' shields, and arm them for the battle; and all the while the babes, instead of whimpering or wailing, as would the puny infants of these degenerate days, laughed loud and crowed, and clapped their hands amid the furious uproar. Anon the hostile galley drew in sight, and Snorro Sturleson pronounced it at the first sight to be the ship of Orvarod—that instant was a vast beacon piled of green wood and juicy branches, to send a great smoke heaven-ward, and high beside it was hoisted the black raven of the Norsemen, in haughty but deliberate defiance. Then gathered to the cliffs the women, bearing their infants in their arms, that they might look upon the high deeds of their sires. Straight toward the island steered Orvarod's stout ship, and then, unseen before, up loomed another and another sail,—and high above their topmasts waved the emblazoned banners of two far-famed heroes, brethren, the sons of Sigurd—the elder a rejected suitor of Asgarda, the other of the bright Swanwhitur. Then loud cried Haco:

"I have not seen the great Valkyriur, the choosers of the noble slain—yet, friends and heroes, we go forth to death and glory. To-night we sup in the hall of Odin!"

And with the words, each mighty war-king clasped his blooming bride, for the last time, to his mailed breast,—then rushed to the war-galley. Forth like a thing of life she darted from the sheltering inlet—forth like an eagle from his eyrie, to encounter the disturber of his nest—and, on those towering rocks, women alone were left to look upon the strife, wherein the combatants were husbands—fathers! But not for that was one eye dimmed, or one cheek blanched—but as each war-axe gleamed and fell, their musical and piercing strains rose shrill above the war song of the champions.

Orvarod's ship came stoutly on—and stoutly Haco's met it. A Runic bard would have called that the feast of swords, the revelry of champions, would have invoked the golden-footed fowl to banquet on the carcases of heroes. He would have termed it a delight more rapturous than courting lovely-bosomed maidens, a mightier joy than kissing lovely widows! Words are all wanting in our degenerate tongue, to record the strife of men who fought not for spoil, nor revenge, nor glory, nor ambition, but for the very pleasure of the battle—the maddening joy of slaying! In those days, killing noble foes was but dismissing them to a long-wished glory, the being slain but rushing prematurely into eternal bliss.

Fierce was the conflict, terrible the din—shields cleft asunder, bodies dismembered by the axe and falchion, gave awful token of the might which belonged to the men of that old day; and still above the clang of blade and harness, above the shouts and war cries of the living—for they who died, died mute—high pealed the Runic war song. Long was the conflict ere the life blood of Orvarod streamed on the axe of Haco, and the old Viking's bravest cumbered the deck—dead one and all—around him. Then rose the shout of triumph from the black barque of the fair-haired Rover—then was it sent back from the rock ramparts of the ocean isle. But short-lived was the triumph, for the two sons of Sigurd bore down in overwhelming numbers, fearless and fresh, upon the victors; and Haco's galley, pierced by their iron beaks, went down with all her mail-clad crew, shouting their gallant battle anthem, destroyed but not dishonored.

The victors rowed straight for the island, eager to seize the women who had formerly so scorned them. They reached the inlet, entered it, and landed.—Strange was the sight that met them. A high pile of dry fuel, covered with furry robes and all their choicest garments, had been erected close to the banquet hall, and on that pile, upright, and dauntless, and unshrinking, stood the superb Asgarda, with all her lovely comrades. Aloft in her right hand clear gleamed her dead lord's dagger, while on her left arm sat young Haco, looking up into his mother's face, with cool, determined eyes, as if he read her purpose in the stern resolution that sat on the imperial curve of her proud lips. Swanwhitur held the orch, and as the conquerors drew near, at one sign from Asgarda, she touched the ready fuel, and the bright flames burst upward all around them, hemming them in with a wall of fire.

"Ho! ye vile sons of Sigurd, see how the wives of heroes follow their husbands on the path of glory!—See how their offspring meet the death-blow! Which of you twain could look thus on the blade that smote ye in the eyes, unshrinkingly?"

And as she spoke, she kissed the little child, and flashed the blade across his eyes, which only gleamed and laughed the brighter, and then—smote him! He shrunk not from the blow—and his dying sob was more like a warrior's battle shout than a cry of anguish. So fell each infant of those glorious fathers, and the red flames roared over them and their undaunted mothers, and not a sob was heard from out the glittering canopy, that covered and consumed their mortal reliques. Wide spread the conflagration, till not a wreck was left or one stone standing on another, to show where once was seen the thriving colony of the first Norsemen.

That night, a mighty tempest swept over that rock-bound coast, and never was the banner of the sons of Sigurd seen more along the shores of Greenland, or in the wild Icelandic bays, or in the stormbeat Orkneys; and, save this single record, all earthly trace was lost of the first settlement that ever met the sun upon the forest shores of young Columbia.

THE FORTUNE HUNTER.

A Story from Real Life.

BY JOSEPH WILLSON.

Part I.

We have been long accustomed to consider the practice of coquetry as being confined altogether to the ladies; so that whenever we hear that designation pronounced, the spectre of some fair, but artful deceiver, of the gentler sex, at once rises up before us. We have looked upon it as a sin of gender, which, although occasionally producing a monster out of its pale, is universally regarded as besetting only the fairest portion of creation, to whose weakness it more aptly belongs, and, as a weapon of defence, most readily commends itself. But still there are numerous exceptions to be met with, and among the most conspicuous of these, Edward Condon may, with great propriety, be numbered. Added to this, (and which was doubtless the source of his insincerity,) he was one of those young gentlemen who are known to society—though from no acknowledgment on their part—as "fortune hunters;" not a young man impelled by proper motives to secure to himself a WIFE in the woman of his choice; but one whose decision in that important matter turned mainly upon the presence or absence of lucre.

The free and frequent expression of his opinions among his intimate friends, and particularly to Frank Liston, betrayed Edward to be deeply imbued with sentiments of this most unattractive character. In other respects, if indeed a young man can exhibit exalted traits in other respects, when so much at fault in this, he was generous and liberal to a remarkable degree. But the difference in the meaning of the terms "matrimony" and "matter-o'-money," he never could clearly define; but determined at all events that in his choice of a wife, his decision should be guided by the latter. Not a few have wrecked their hopes of happiness on this fatal rock! not a few, after all their scheming and manœuvring to attain this end, have finished their career in disappointment and disgrace.

Liston, the boon companion of Edward, was a young man of very different character. He had the advantage of a few years' experience over his friend, but was naturally more thoughtful and observant of what was passing around him. He understood Edward thoroughly, and never failed to oppose him in his peculiar views on the subject of courtship and marriage, whenever it was introduced; and it being a favorite theme with the latter, it was frequently made the topic of their conversation.

"Liston," exclaimed Edward, on one of these occasions, after hearing his views denounced as usual, "you are terribly severe upon the frailties of poor humanity! Do you mean to assert that there is no admissable instance in which a young man may employ a little deceit in his intercourse with females, without incurring censure?"

"No," returned Liston; "I am not now prepared to defend such a sweeping proposition as that question embraces; though I consider it by no means untenable in a strictly moral point of view. This, however, I leave to utilitarians and ultras, and confine myself to that wherein are involved serious consequences; and such is generally the inevitable result of deceit where the heart is concerned."

"Utilitarians and ultras!" laughingly repeated Edward. "Why the man is getting liberal, not to say rational. Believe me, Liston, I have been sometimes disposed to regard you as a utilitarian of the most rigid school; but I am happy to see you are beginning to relax a little."

"Not in the least," he mildly replied; "nor do I now retreat from a single position I have heretofore advanced or maintained."

"Ah! ah! I see," said Edward, still disposed to be satirical; "you have relapsed again into your moody philosophy, and I shall expect a dissertation anon. But to come to the point—the concerns, as you say, of the heart. Now tell me, would you have a young man like myself to rush blind-folded into matrimony, without pausing to weigh consequences and the prospects of happiness ere the Gordian knot is tied—ere it is too late?"

"Not at all—but the very reverse," rejoined Liston. "Yet I do require, that in weighing those consequences he should not proceed so far, or in such a manner, as to jeopardize the happiness of her of whom he desired to be informed. But I must say you have departed from the point directly at issue. A mere prudent inquiry in a matter of such importance, is surely very different from a false profession of love, designed to serve some ulterior purpose which doth not appear, but having no view to the happiness of her to whom it is made. And this——"

"Stop, stop, my friend," interrupted Edward; "you insinuate more than is deserved. I never defended open professions of love——"

"Indeed!" said Liston, as with surprise, before Edward could finish his remark. "Well, that is a confession as bold as it is honest! Nor do you, I suppose, approve of their being made!"

"No, not, as I was about to say, unless with the most honorable intentions."

"Pray, then, how far do you go? Tell me what sort of false professions of attachment those are you contend for, which may be made to a trusting and unsuspecting girl, without the sacrifice of honor on the part of the maker?"

Edward here assumed an air of gravity, as if at a loss how he should meet this unequivocal demand.—He paused for a moment, and then resumed.

"This requirement of yours," said he, "has presented the subject in a much more serious light than I have heretofore viewed it. But let me illustrate a little. We will suppose, for instance, that I am seeking a companion in wedlock——"

"The very thing," interrupted Liston; "now we shall have it!"

"And further, suppose," continued Edward, "that in that delightful search I meet with two young ladies, equally beautiful, agreeable, and alike well-bred. I make up my mind to choose between them; but upon examination, I find that one of them has relative prospects, which, if realized to their extent, will place her in a condition far superior to the other—while her present advantages in that respect are inferior. Now I require to know if I am deserving of censure for endeavoring to maintain good terms with each, in order that when I make a proffer of marriage, I may be able to do so with the certainty of securing the most superior relative advantages—For, Liston, let hungry and penniless moralizers carp as much as they will, wealth and happiness will still continue to be found dwellers together, under the same roof."

"Indeed!" rejoined Liston, "and that too against all the evidence we daily have to the contrary! But this is not all. You say you would keep on what you denominate 'good terms' with both the young ladies. You would not make an open, unequivocal declaration to either, but leave each to infer from your actions that you contemplated doing so at some future period. Thus you necessarily risk the peace of mind of at least one of the parties; you stand in the way of her making other and perhaps equally or more desirable conquests; and, should misfortune come upon them, I am forced to the conclusion that the sentiments you advocate would lead you to fly from them both! And what, in the course of these proceedings, becomes of Love—the only cement of conjugal felicity? And why is this most wicked delusion employed? For the most execrable of mercenary purposes. Excuse me, but I only characterize it as it deserves."

"There you are!" returned Edward, sprightly; "gone again into extremes. I really cannot agree with you in all respects. I cannot see that, because I choose to make myself agreeable to a lady, that she is justified in concluding therefrom that I intend, by and bye, making to her a declaration of love? If she indulges such anticipations in the absence of any plain and positive intimation, she does so upon her own responsibility, and, of course, must bear the consequences. And I cannot understand wherein I am culpable in this."

"Ah," said Liston, "so you have very adroitly attempted to 'soften down' your former expressions, but you have not amended the matter much. For my part I utterly repudiate all such insincerity and deception. There are but few men who do not readily join in the condemnation of every species of coquetry when practised by the ladies. If then, it is worthy of denunciation in them, how much more so should it be when resorted to by us, who have so little inducement for its assumption? However, I fear we shall never be able to agree on the subject; so I will leave you for the present, with the gentle warning, that you had better take care that you are not caught in your own net by some of your fair acquaintances, before many months roll over your head."

"Ha! ha! ha!" laughed Edward. "Never fear—I'll take good care of that! I have got every thing in perfect train; and will astonish your prosy dullness before I have done! Good day." And with this they separated.

In personal appearance Edward was decidedly a good-looking young man, though there is nothing remarkable in this respect that requires particular description. He was of fine form, tall and well made; good and even features, displaying a manly and intelligent countenance. His affable disposition, and agreeable and winning manners, together with his intelligence and general information, were well calculated to insure him success in his intercourse with the ladies; and, though young, and not in all things discreet, he was not ignorant how to display them to the best advantage. But I will not detain the reader with further description, satisfied that each will paint for him or herself precisely such a being as their fancy may dictate, with but little reference to any particularities the writer may be at the pains to give.

Among the young ladies of his acquaintance, who attracted the particular attention of Edward Condon, was Camilla Inglis. Miss Inglis was, at the period to which we now have reference, just turning her eighteenth year. She was not one of those extraordinary beauties of whom novelists often write, but still she was far from being mere common place.—She was of that class, of which, many such the reader may have seen, who never fail to arrest attention wherever seen; and too often to entrap even the guarded devotee, whose admiration they may have commanded. Nor was she, in form, a Venus de Medicis; and if she had been, it would not be well so to represent her; (for a waist as nature is apt to fashion it, is not generally regarded with admiration at the present day;) but of the true modern school, tall, and though naturally inclined to slenderness, yet made more so by that patent engine of compression (now happily discarded by many,) known to married men as the "lacing apparatus." This being the standard, and presenting these requisites, she was, of course, deemed by all a "handsome figure." Her hair was of a very dark auburn, approaching to black, which hung in graceful curls on either side of a fine, prominent, gently receding forehead; and the latter, we may be permitted to say, in this phrenological age, presented every indication of the natural possession of an enlarged and capable mind. Her eyes were of the color of her hair, dark, sparkling and lustrous; such as poets have oft done homage to in song; whose keen and piercing glance betrayed at once the quick perception and the deep and searching penetration of their fair possessor; qualities she was well known to possess in an eminent degree. Her face was in coincidence with her form; not that she had a long face, properly so to speak; but of that oval mould, which, clothed in brunette—the lovely hue of Camilla—will ever be admired. Her countenance, like her nature and disposition, was mild, gentle and winning, and to all appearance, habitually so. She may indeed have occasionally exhibited the substitution of little intellectual tempests for this seeming habitual blandness and sunshine: for the calmest waters will at times be ruffled. But be this as it may, she was possessed of too much self-command often to betray her unevenness of temper, or let it mar her pleasures on any occasion where she might not choose to make it apparent. Her eyes were, therefore, ever beaming with a bright and joyous light, which shone brilliantly through her long dark lashes, imparting, with her endearing smile, ease and guiety to all around.—If at such moments it could be supposed that this appearance covered a corroding converse within, surely the troubled countenance, the stern forbidding look, the quick, impatient contracting of her dark brows, beautifully arched and full as they were, gave never the slightest indication of its presence. In a word, ever cheerful seemed Camilla Inglis; and though I have not, as before intimated, sought to represent her without fault—a being of perfection—yet she was one whose various attractions rendered her an object of no small regard in the circle in which she moved, and of which she constituted a most prominent member.

The lively, affable, and engaging disposition of Camilla soon gathered about her a numerous train of admirers, among whom, as before said, was Edward Condon. She was at no loss for suitors, and though there were many, perhaps, more worthy than he, yet by some fatality that we cannot divine, it soon became evident that Edward shared largely of her thoughts and partialities. That he, in his vague and uncertain mode of proceeding in such matters, should have succeeded in making this impression, might, considering her acuteness of perception, have created some degree of astonishment, had it not been as well known then as now, that—

"Love's not a flower that grows on the dull earth;
Springs by the calendar; must wait for the sun;
For rain; matures by parts; must take its time
To stem, to leaf, to bud, to blow. It owns
A richer soil, and boasts a quicker seed!
You look for it, and see it not, and lo!
E'en while you look, the peerless flower is up,
Consummate in the birth!"

It is the spontaneous growth of the human heart; and where it springs up, pauses not to inquire if the object for whom it is conceived is worthy of the rich bestowal. She loved him as she imagined and believed him to be; and not as he really was.

But did Edward love her? There is but little doubt that if this question had been propounded to him, he would himself have been somewhat puzzled to give it an answer either satisfactory to himself, or to those by whom the demand might have been made. Taking in view his various pretensions, it might be safely inferred that he did. He often saw her, often visited her; and in his conversations would frequently make ambiguous references, but effectual for his purpose, to much more than he allowed his tongue to express in so many words. He was, however, undecided in his mind in regard to an alliance with Camilla; and conducted himself in this manner in order that he might not have much difficulty in deserting her, in the event of his finding greater inducements elsewhere. To her birth, education, or station in society, he had not the slightest objection; yet still an impediment existed somewhere, which (assuming that he loved her,) prevented his making an open, candid and honorable avowal.

If the reader is here in the least at a loss to discern the motives that ruled in the bosom of Edward Condon, he may, without any attempt at mystification, at once have all such doubts set at rest. Edward had great faith in his uncertain and undecided advances, as being fully adequate to all that he designed. He readily relied upon what he saw and believed to be their success; and concluded within himself that he had already so wrought upon her imagination in this way, that she was his at a word. He regarded her as one whose hand he would have no difficulty in obtaining, whenever it might suit his convenience, or, more truly, his interest, to make the proposal; while at the same time he did not wish so far to commit himself openly, or appear to do so, that it would require any known sacrifice of honour, should he in the end determine to resign her. Thus he settled upon Camilla as a sort of resort, to be availed of as the success or failure of schemes more highly prized might prompt him.

It now became necessary for Edward to sustain this odious deceit in a manner to avoid suspicion; a task which, under the watchful and jealous eye of woman, is of no easy accomplishment. Like most persons zealously wrapped in some favourite pursuit, he in a measure lost sight of the perceptions of those around him, and vainly imagined that the world had lost sight of him. But this latter clause was far from applying to Camilla. Gay, lively and seemingly thoughtless as she was, her mental perceptions were acute. Strange that Edward should have lost sight of this fact! And not less strange that he should have almost entirely forgotten the existence of his friend Frank Liston!

Part II.

The indifference, and cold and guarded demeanor of Edward Condon towards Camilla Inglis, now began greatly to increase; so that although previously suspecting nothing wrong, she now appeared to be effectually aroused by a just appreciation of his many deceitful wiles. She had often heard him represented, by those who knew not with what effect it fell upon her ear, as a character of no very flattering description; and some of her gossipping friends even went so far as to hint that he was "making love" to Louisa Weldon, an acquaintance and friend of Camilla's, who was in a fair way soon to become in possession of a large and most inviting fortune. Whether Miss Weldon would accept of him or not, (for she was not aware of his attentions to Camilla,) they could not with certainty say; but doubted that she would refuse, should he make the offer. Camilla heard all this without any emotion; though not without the consideration which she deemed it merited. Combined with her own knowledge and observation, the truth of it was indeed rendered highly probable, and she daily became the more confirmed in the belief. But she was at no loss as to what course she would pursue for the purpose of fully satisfying herself. She determined that as little was known to her friends of the peculiar attentions of Edward to her, to reveal nothing; nor give, even to Edward himself, the slightest occasion to suppose that she suspected his faithlessness. She had too much pride, too much self-respect to enter into a rivalship with others for the conquest of one whose insincere and deceptive course would, if made apparent, prove to her satisfaction his entire worthlessness; and proudly disdained to manifest even indignation, however she might feel it, lest that might be construed into personal disaffection with his conduct.

Mr. Inglis, the father of Camilla, was a retired merchant. His wealth, though not immense, was altogether adequate to maintain his family in entirely independent circumstances, and to secure to each survivor a handsome competence in the event of a division of the estate by his decease. But that division could take place only on the occurrence of this latter event. Camilla was without any private fortune, or income, aside from this source. She was led to the consideration of this fact; she looked upon her existing state of affairs, and her prospects, as quite satisfactory to herself; but thought they possibly might not be of the character to endear a lover whose affairs of the heart were to depend altogether upon Dame Fortune, instead of being directed by little blind Cupid!

Camilla was resolved to do nothing hastily. She knew that a very little time would speedily unravel all that was now shrouded in mystery, and that too without giving herself much, if any, trouble. Although she had seen much to confirm it herself, yet she was reluctant to believe all that she had heard of Edward. Could it be possible that he had been, the while, but a mere trifler with her affections, vibrating, like the pendulum of a clock, between herself and some other deceived fair girl, seeking final acceptance with the one only when all hopes of superior wealth with the other, were banished from his mind? These were thoughts that irresistibly rushed upon her mind—but she would soon know all; and armed by her pride against all querulousness, she gave them but little entertainment.

It was in this state of uncertainty that Camilla determined, on a fine morning, in making her usual round of visits, that her first call should be upon her friend, Louisa Weldon. From Louisa, she had good reason to believe, she would learn all that was necessary to guide her future conduct towards Edward. She knew that her friend, between whom and herself existed much mutual esteem, would soon satisfy her, and all through the medium of a casual morning's gossip, as to how far she had been the innocent instrument of inviting or facilitating Edward's faithlessness.

Louisa was not aware that Camilla felt any interest in Edward's movements; and she would, therefore, be likely the more readily to communicate concerning him, should he become the subject of conversation, than delicacy might otherwise permit. We leave her then awhile to prepare herself for the visit, and in the interim will give, what the reader no doubt desires, some further knowledge of Louisa Weldon. This, so far as her connection with this relation is concerned, may be done in a few words.

It will be interesting to know here only, that the station in society occupied by Miss Weldon, was in every respect equal with that of Camilla Inglis. Of her personal beauty, however, so much cannot be said, as in this Camilla bore off the palm. Her mind had not been neglected, and her disposition was of the most generous and noble character. She lived—the only daughter of her surviving parent—with her mother, her father having been taken from her when she was but a child. Their present income was small, but fully sufficient for their maintenance, independent of exertion or want. Louisa was not, however, without large and well founded expectations, which, if secured to herself, and a first cousin who was equally interested with her, (an event daily expected,) would place them both in possession of large fortunes. This consummation would, too, no doubt impart to Louisa additional attractions, which few mercenary lovers could well resist. The question of their right of inheritance had long been subject to the "uncertainties of the law;" but they were now dwindled down to the certainty of having their rights wholly sustained, and the results thereof finally and speedily secured to them. It may, therefore, be easily conceived, that, among the designing, Louisa Weldon and her brilliant prospects were never for a moment lost sight of.

Camilla was now ready to pay her intended visit. She had descended to the parlor, and was adjusting her hat before a large pier mirror, when a ring of the door-bell announced that some one awaited admittance. She was about to give the "not-at-home" to the servant, fearing that the visitor, if visitor it was, might prove some one who would be likely to detain her; but, before doing this, her eager eyes were permitted to glance out of the window, through the half-drawn curtains, towards the step, upon which, to her surprise, she beheld standing the form of Edward Condon! She attempted to withdraw herself quickly, in order to avoid his observation, but it was too late. Edward was himself, at the moment, looking towards the window, and caught her glance, which he at once recognised by his smiles. He was, in consequence, much against her secret wishes, admitted.

Camilla received him with an air of rather cool indifference, and very laconically replied to most of the numerous questions and compliments he bestowed. She had not before seen him for two or three days previous; and then he was less attentive to her than she had ever before observed; but it was evident that a change had come "o'er the spirit of his dream;" and that his late increasing indifference was now suddenly supplanted by excessive admiration and glowing rapture. But Camilla was not to be diverted from her previous intentions by this. In truth, she felt more than ever convinced that something was wrong; and she therefore treated him with a dignified reserve, which she might hereafter sustain or retrace, as subsequent revelations might dictate.

"You seem prepared for a walk this bright morning; a finer one you could not well have chosen," said Edward, after a pause.

"Yes," replied Camilla. "And pray, to what strange circumstance am I indebted for this unusual visit from Mr. Condon?"

Edward felt the full force of this question, as indeed he had cause to feel. He thought he discovered in it a sarcastic bitterness such as he had never before received, or expected to receive, from Camilla; yet, conscious of his deserts, he feared to say much, but endeavored to pass it over by treating it as a mere jest. He then, in the most obsequious and conciliatory tone, remarked—

"You design to pay visits this morning, I infer?"

"Yes, I have a particular engagement, and hope Mr. Condon will excuse me."

"Of course, dear Miss, of course I must; but may I do myself the honor of becoming your escort?"

"Thank you, Mr. Condon; but I am going to visit a particular friend, and you will excuse me," reiterated Camilla.

Edward seeing the stern and smileless countenance with which this was spoken, did not press his offer. He knew what might be the cause of the cool and formal treatment he had received, but felt assured that Camilla had not been so soon made aware of it, if indeed she ever would be. He therefore thought it best to be careful how he proceeded—to forbear making any direct enquiries—and affect freedom from all suspicion that her conduct was occasioned by his presence. For this reason, he said in a tone of assumed anxiety and tenderness—

"I trust your visit does not involve anything serious, or calculated to make you sad?"

"I cannot say that it does; still we like to go alone sometimes, and particularly when we have good reasons for it, as I have at present."

"Such, I suppose, as I must not know. Well, I will not insist on your making them known to me. But pray, before I leave, tell me, has Liston been here to-day?"

"He has; he stopped a few moments, expecting, as he partly expressed himself, to find you here."

"Yes, true; I did say to him that I would be here to pass a few hours with you; but was detained by the way, which accounts for my not arriving sooner."

With this doubtful interview, Edward Condon, after stating to Camilla that he had something of the greatest interest and importance to communicate to her, and regretting that her engagements deprived him of the opportunity of doing so, as he expected and intended, that morning, he took his leave. He also expressed his intention of calling again soon, at which time he hoped to find her disposed to give a favorable ear to what he had long contemplated, and could now no longer conceal!

From this moment, though he artfully attempted to conceal them, he was encompassed by the very worst of fears. A vision of the fabled creature that perished of starvation in the midst of plenty, whilst choosing of what to partake, rose vividly before him, and warned him to guard against a similar fate.—Expecting that Liston, after parting with Camilla, had gone to visit Louisa Weldon, he started there in pursuit of him; without the most distant idea that that was also the point of Camilla's destination!

Camilla, left alone, and on the point of leaving, was again arrested for a few moments by a pull of the bell-handle. She was at the time in the hall, approaching the door, and would not turn back, but opened it herself. It was the carrier, bearing to her a letter. She at once recognized its source—returned into the parlor—where she opened and perused it with evident emotion. With a much lighter heart did she, after this last circumstance transpired, set out upon her visit to Louisa Weldon.

After a pleasant walk, Camilla was with her friend, from whom she learned much more than she anticipated. But she heard it all with great apparent indifference and presence of mind. When Louisa was nearly exhausted with talking and laughter, Camilla remarked upon what she had been saying—

"So, you say the gallant Mr. Condon has been flirting with you, has he? Well, no wonder. One would suppose that the fondness he evinces for the society of the ladies, would long ago have led him to matrimony."

"Flirting!" returned Louisa sprightly, feeling her pride touched: "you mistake me, Camilla, I did not say flirting. I do assure you he was quite serious."

"Pardon me," said Camilla, smiling; (having learned by that assurance just what she desired to ascertain with certainty)—"I merely used the word playfully, and designed not to detract aught from the sincerity of your new admirer."

"Oh, no; I am sure you did not," rejoined Louisa; "but you know, or may have heard, that Mr. Condon has the reputation of being a trifler; and I only wanted to show you that he can be in earnest sometimes. Neither is he, as you seem to suppose, a very new admirer; for his actions have for a time led me to suppose that he contemplated something of the kind."

"Oh," said Camilla, continuing her friend's strain; "but his great diffidence perhaps prevented him from opening his bosom sooner."

"That," returned Louisa, "together with his having never received from me the least encouragement. This I think should have deterred him at the time. But probably he is a little vain; if so, he found in me a poor flatterer."

"How? Did you reject his suit?"

"Reject it! Why ask me that? Surely, Camilla, you are aware that Mr. Lis——"

Here Louisa suddenly checked herself ere she had completed the sentence, leaving the name she was about to pronounce but half expressed. She seemed fearful of divulging more than was altogether prudent.

"Liston, you would say," said Camilla, smilingly.

"He," said Louisa, waiving her previous remark, "I am sure is no trifler, and neither am I."

"Nor should you be, at least with him; for Mr. Liston is in every way worthy of your confidence and esteem."

"Yes; and Mr. Condon knows that—that—indeed, my dear Camilla, I cannot divine what induced him to make such overtures to me, knowing, as he did, that——"

"I comprehend your meaning," interrupted Camilla, seeing Louisa's hesitation; "but are you sure he was aware of your previous acceptance of another?"

"No doubt of it. Mr. Liston and he are very intimate; and it is very probable that it has been referred to between them."

Louisa spoke as if she conceived the overtures of Edward an insult to her truth and constancy, already plighted to another; and seemed desirous of fastening greater odium upon that young gentleman than he really deserved.

"Oh, well, you should not be too severe upon him," said Camilla; "though it must be confessed that if he was informed of it, as you conceive, it was wrong for him to offer a temptation to your sincerity, and ungenerous to attempt to rival his friend."

"Temptation!—rival him!" echoed Louisa; "no, indeed. And then to think of his inviting me to a pleasant drive, as he said, to Mount Auburn, which I of course declined; and then to Monsieur Maroncello's Concert, which I also declined; then to the Artists' Exhibition; and, perseveringly, I know not where else—until, finally, I had to tell him I was not at liberty to accept of his proffered attentions. I must confess, Camilla, I could not imagine what it was that induced this sudden fit of gallantry."

"And then——"

"After that," resumed Louisa, "he appeared to be greatly surprised—quite shocked—made numerous excuses and a few particular requests, (which I comfortably consented not to violate,) and then took his leave, evidently no little discomfitted."

Camilla Inglis inwardly rejoiced at this result, as communicated to her by her unsuspecting friend; but, true to her previous resolution, she exhibited no indication whatever that her feelings were in the slightest degree enlisted. She had often conversed with Edward respecting the excellent qualities of Louisa Weldon, and had found, to her pain, that he was frequently disposed to speak indifferently, and even slightly of her; in which she had more than once, felt it her duty to check him. She had not, therefore, the least reason, on her own part, to think that he cherished intentions towards her which would have led him so far as the present developements betrayed. She believed, likewise, that Edward did not act from any momentary impulse; that some extraordinary circumstance, which was not yet within her comprehension, dictated and governed his conduct; and she desired, if possible, before leaving her friend, to discover what it could be. In order to ascertain this, she made a few other unimportant remarks concerning him, but learning nothing which could solve the mystery, (as in truth Louisa did not, herself, as may be seen, have the most distant suspicion that it was prompted by aught else than her own personal charms,) she rose to depart.

"Well, Louisa, my dear, I must now go. I have a very particular letter to write to-day—and to whom, do you guess?"

"Guess?" said Louisa; "let me see—but you have always such a shower of correspondents, that it will be quite difficult for me to determine at one trial—unless it be to my noble, ever-constant, persevering cousin, whose suit you may have at last determined to favor?"

Camilla blushed and smiled, but said nothing.

"Have you heard from him recently? I dare say you have," continued Louisa, eyeing her friend, and already beginning to rejoice in what her heart fondly desired. "I dare say he has written you another of those soul-stirring epistles, such as attachment like his alone can give expression to!"

Camilla still reddened and smiled, and with a beam of satisfaction in her eye, answered that she had received a letter from him that morning.

"Then permit me to plead for him," said Louisa, "that you give him a favorable reply; for I know he devotedly loves you, and will not fail to make you happy. More than this, he is now better prepared to take you to himself, than he was when first he sought your hand;—though I do not mention this as an inducement to you to comply with his wishes, as I am sure no secondary consideration could, for a moment, influence my dear Camilla in such a matter."

"How?" eagerly exclaimed Camilla, at once anticipating a double discovery, and for the moment forgetting herself—"what mean you?—pray explain! Lionel vaguely referred to something of the kind in his letter, but he gave no particulars."

"And, perhaps, for the same reasons, I ought now to refrain from telling you. It might be doing great injustice to you both."

"But what," said Camilla, recovering her self-possession, "what if I tell you I have a right to know?"

"A right to know," repeated Louisa, taking Camilla by the hand; "then you have already determined in his favor, have you? If so, I may explain, without wronging either of you."

"Then set aside all your objections, and tell me," said Camilla; "for I do assure you it will not have the least effect upon my intentions in any respect—neither to expedite, nor retard them. My mind—but enough—tell me."

"I see, then," said Louisa, "that you have not yet heard of our good fortune. Well, know then, my dear, that the long-contested claims of which you may have heard me speak, and in which Lionel and myself were so deeply interested, have at length been finally settled, and altogether in our favor! This is the secret, Camilla, and this is the decision that places my cousin in possession of that wealth which he is ready to lay at your feet—to lavish upon your happiness—and which never can be fully enjoyed by him, unless it is shared by you!"

Camilla sensibly felt the warm enthusiasm of her friend, in endeavoring to impress upon her the suit of her beloved cousin; but another light had unexpectedly burst upon her! She saw in those words what Louisa saw not,—so that, even at that moment, she could not help turning from her and saying, but in a tone which she did not hear—

"Yes, yes!—and this, too, is the secret of Edward Condon's base treachery and falsehood!—this the secret of his new-born, but zealous passion for Louisa Weldon!"

However humiliating to herself, and likewise to Louisa, in this Camilla judged rightly. If to this moment she had entertained any doubt as to the true character and designs of Edward Condon, it was now entirely dissipated and banished from her mind. But she was prepared for the worst. Her well-founded suspicions of his fidelity, had before filled her with indifference, and now demonstration caused her to regard him with perfect abhorrence. All that she now cared for in regard to him, was an opportunity to administer a balm to her wounded pride, by inflicting upon him some marked, signal, yet dignified resentment. This determination, it must be admitted, was in the true spirit of revenge—but it is human nature. Who will gainsay or assure upon it? Who, under like circumstances, would feel, or be disposed to act differently?

Camilla, now fully satisfied of all that she sought through the medium of that day's visit, took leave of her friend, and returned home, to put in immediate execution her design of inditing an answer to the letter which had that morning been placed into her hands.

We left Edward Condon wending his way to the dwelling of Miss Weldon, whither he set out, after parting with Camilla, in search of Frank Liston.—Fortunately for Camilla, whose destination was the same, he failed in reaching the house, in consequence of meeting Liston by the way. It is now necessary for us to retrace our progress a little, in order to explain more particularly the object of his call that morning upon Camilla. The prompt and decisive repulses which he had met with, prior thereto, in his advances to Louisa, (and which have been sufficiently indicated by her own relation,) deeply impressed him; and told plainly that his choice, or, as he vainly imagined, his option, no longer lay between the two fair girls whom he had singled out as his alternates, if, indeed, he could, with any rational probability, longer cherish the hope of acceptance with either. He was totally unprepared for such a result, as his vanity never permitted him to dream that he should ever receive such a refusal from Louisa. But, in addition to this, and most of all with him to be deplored, not only were all expectations of securing the last named young lady entirely banished from his bosom; but the fortune of which she had become possessed, that darling object of his heart, over whose fate he had so long, but in silence watched, and for which he had so faithfully, and, as he believed, successfully, acted out his own favorite doctrine of "keeping on good terms," was in like manner lost with her!—blasting all the anticipations he had fondly cherished of finally becoming himself its possessor. Should he make another essay? No; she was too prompt, too firm, too decided, to admit of the remotest doubt but that her refusal was sincere, and admitted of no retraction, no re-consideration.—More than this, she had told him that she was not at liberty to receive his attentions. Then, thought he, she must be engaged! And to whom? The wily Liston! Was this the result his prophetic eye foresaw, when he warned me to beware lest I should be caught by some of the girls in my own set? But," he added, audibly, "Camilla yet remains!"

Such and similar were the musings which harrassed Edward, as he approached the family mansion of Camilla Inglis, after discovering that the cherished cause of his dissimulation with her, was so unexpectedly placed beyond his reach. It was gone, entirely lost to him, and he would delay no longer in endeavoring to secure the hand of her that remained. He therefore determined to improve the first opportunity openly to declare to her his wishes and intentions, lest she, too, might be snatched from his embrace at a moment when he least expected it. To do this was the object of his visit that morning. "It is never too late to do good," says the old saw; but daily experience tells us that it is often too late to put in force past resolves upon good performances at some future period.

But to return. Perplexed as he was by doubts and fears, which now began to take firm hold upon him, he hastened from the presence of Camilla, after the cool treatment he received, in pursuit of Liston, thinking that through him he might discover if anything relative to his own double-dealing had been betrayed to her. He feared not that Louisa would communicate to Liston his overtures to her: he parted with her under a promise to that effect, stating, as was most true! that he had not, till then, the most distant idea of the extent of the confidence that existed between them; and as there was no positive harm done, he knew she would keep it. Alas, for human foresight! Pity that he did not include in this prohibition her dear friend, Camilla Inglis! And little did she imagine the discord and mischief she was sowing, when she poured it into Camilla's attentive and listening ears! Edward had proceeded but a short distance, when, as before stated, he met his friend.

"Pray, what's in the wind now?—and why did you fail to meet me this morning?" said Liston, in one breath, observing Edward's agitation, and advancing towards him.

"Cold—and couldn't help it, if I must answer in the form and with the rapidity with which you ask," said Edward, facetiously: for although his feelings were very sensibly affected by his unexpected reverses, yet his nerve and presence of mind had not forsaken him. "I was detained till late," he continued, "and when I reached Miss Inglis', she informed me that you had left."

"Oh, then," returned Liston, "I see you did make the effort to be there in time; so you are excusable. But why that sombre look? Did you turn to making love to Miss Inglis, as a recompense for not finding me?"

"Truly," said Edward, "if I seem dull, you are unusually gay. I should judge, Frank, that you have been making love, and very successful love, too! Eh?"

"I making love! Ha! ha! ha! Did I ever tell you that I contemplated such a thing?"

"Very true," thought Edward, "you never told me that; and therein I have been deceived." But he contented himself with answering—

"No; but you know we are not apt to be forward in entrusting such secrets to others—at least in their incipient stages."

Liston again laughed, as well he might; for he knew that his was advanced to all but maturity. He had long ago seen partly through Edward's designs, and played his part in the chase accordingly. His choice of Miss Weldon was governed by no mercenary motive. He sought to make her his, if possible, in any event; and the fortune that had come into her possession, he viewed only as the means signalizing his success. He knew nothing of the present state of affairs between Edward and Camilla; but being now at ease on his own part, and having heard Edward eulogize her charms and accomplishments, deemed it a fit opportunity to quiz him a little on that subject. He therefore replied to his last remark—

"True; and I expect that is the case with you at present—you have the secret locked in your own bosom. I, however, will confess that I am not a little bewitched by the numerous attractions of a fair acquaintance of yours."

"Indeed," said Edward, affecting surprise and ignorance as to whom his friend had reference, "and what, pray, may be her name?"

"That you must discover hereafter," said Liston, and then added—"But isn't Miss Weldon a charming creature?"

"Ah, I thought so," said Edward, striving to appear indifferent, (for he plainly saw that Liston was not aware of any thing wrong having taken place); "I could have said as much. I congratulate you, my dear fellow, on your success—as I doubt not that you have been successful. I have lately been thinking of making a similar move myself."

"Lately been thinking," repeated Liston; "why, dear me, I have been under the impression that such an intention claimed your thoughts long ago! How is it with Miss Inglis?"

"She is well, fair and blooming as ever," said Edward, evading a direct reply

"Yes, yes, I know it; but I mean how do you succeed?—what progress do you make? Hav'nt you made formal proposals yet?"

"To confess the truth, Frank, I have not."

"Still clinging to your old theory, eh? Take care, my dear boy, that it will not be the means of more than one disappointment to you, ere you abandon it."

"Disappointment!" exclaimed Edward, gazing at his friend as if startled at the mention of the word; but recollecting himself, he suddenly changed his tone, and added—"Ah, Frank, we do not always practice what we preach, whether the doctrine be good or bad."

"Well, that is the most penitential confession I have heard lately," returned Liston. "Surely, some powerful influence must have wrought upon you recently, to produce such a result! So, then, you never intended to follow up your doctrine. Eh?"

"Whatever I may have thought of it once," returned Edward, "I have no disposition to follow its precepts now. The fact is, Liston, I have come to the conclusion to—"

"Do what?" asked Liston, seeing Edward hesitate.

"Seek the earliest opportunity to make known to Camilla, (what she no doubt already strongly suspects!) the—the—"

"Profound and unutterable regard you cherish for her," said Liston, catching up the words and continuing the sentence;—"throw yourself at her feet, and conjure her to pronounce the words which must seal your fate—upon which alone depend your present and future happiness or misery! Is that what you would say?"

"The same in substance," said Edward, pleased that his intentions were anticipated; "but a little different in phraseology. What do you think of it?"

"I approve of it highly—the best thing you could do. I have not the least doubt of your success. Do it, Ned, and do it speedily."

"I am under promise to make an early call upon her for that purpose," said Edward, looking enquiringly.

"Then go, by all means," said Liston; "go this evening. I should like you to have all that part of the business fully understood before Louisa's birth-night festival takes place—which will be in a week or two. So, be sure you go—delay not a moment."

"This evening?" said Edward; "I think I shall."

With this they parted—Liston, with a light and merry heart; leaving Edward to ponder his advice, and meditate as to whether or not he should act in accordance with it. He studiously avoided communicating to Liston the indifferent treatment he had already received from Camilla; though it was plain to be seen (which his friend did not fail to perceive) that he entertained serious doubts as to what might be the result of his proposals. He would fain have had Liston believe, from the manner in which he spoke, that his voluntary promise to that young lady, (in regard to which, being at the time herself in a state of uncertainty, she remained strictly non-committal,) to repeat his call at an early moment, was by the desire of her to whom he made it.—And so, indeed, Liston partially took it; which will account, in some measure, for his zealously urging him not to violate it. But we leave Edward a while to his reflections, and turn again to Camilla.

Indignant as she was at the thought of Edward's conduct, which was so fully yet thoughtlessly confirmed by Louisa, her course was at once decided upon, and she made no delay in following the path she had marked out. She immediately, on her return home, answered the letter she had received from a former faithful lover, (before incidentally alluded to,) and for the purpose of completing her triumph over Edward's well-ascertained deceit, worded it in a manner that she doubted not would have the effect of speedily bringing him to her side. It must not be supposed that Camilla decided thus altogether from motives of resentment and revenge. That she at one time preferred Edward to him she was now about to accept, is not denied; but she likewise entertained strong partialities for Lionel Weston, (for such was his name,) but owing, as may be supposed, to the fact that the "course of true love" is wont to pursue such an uneven course, (which, by the way, is a new version of a very old line,) she had heretofore discouraged his advances. This partiality, however, was greatly heightened by the conduct of Edward; and a comparison of the two characters, now brought in strong relief before her, strengthened and confirmed it. The one, under the most painful discouragements, was to his ardent professions, ever faithful, ever true! Although he had been induced to change the place of his abode, in order to fly the presence of one who, to look upon, under the circumstances, but added to his torture—yet he had never refrained, during his absence, from sending to her at suitable periods, one of those silent, soul-breathing messengers, which recounted the moments of his separation, and evinced, in strains of mingled eloquence and adoration, that no distance could darken, no time could efface, the deep and unalterable passion that for her his bosom had conceived! On the other hand, she saw in Edward, one who, by deceit and artifice, had attempted to steal away her heart; and then, so to retain her, in a state of suspense, until his interest might induce him to act for her good or to her evil; one who had sought to reduce her to the low condition of the alternate of another, between whom the decision depended on objects collateral and altogether mercenary! This was, in truth, as much as she could well endure to think of, without becoming wild and frantic with scorn and hatred. And could she for an instant entertain a doubt as to which of these two was most worthy of her hand?

Another circumstance, trifling though it be, operated to enhance Camilla's regard for Lionel Weston. His last communication to her, coming at the moment that it did, afforded her an immediate relief from the shock which her feelings had received; seeming to her as the happy means, timely sent by some ministering angel, to shield her from the assaults of an evil spirit that menaced her!

After Camilla concluded her answer, and sent it upon its destination, she wrote a note to Louisa, to come, without fail, and pass the evening with her.

It was about the hour of twilight, that Edward Condon sat in his room, at home, absorbed apparently in the most profound thought. Suddenly springing from his seat, he poured forth, in a strain of soliloquy which readily betrayed the subject that so thoroughly engrossed his attention.

"I will go," said he, "I will go. Camilla can but reject me. She may have heard more of me than is good for her happiness that she should know. Louisa may have—but no; I cannot think it! However, as I said, she can but reject me—which is not likely to be the case. Ha! I know these women well. If I find she suspects my sincerity—my constancy—and is disposed to be petulant, I will leave her awhile to her thoughts—to meditate on the consequences of provoking my patience too far!—till I have time to take another course. Ha, ha! indifference!—resentment! By Jove, it's nothing but jealousy, after all!"

Alas! how far a man may become the dupe of his own vain imaginings! And how truly debased in mind is he, the better feelings of whose nature have been blotted out by a base, sordid, avaricious love of money! Especially is this spirit odious in those who, like Edward Condon, are already well-conditioned in that respect; but who, nevertheless, have learned to adore money, not for the comforts it procures, but—because it is money!

The evening came. Louisa had complied with Camilla's note, and was with her at an early hour, discoursing upon the probabilities of the future, and of the fair prospects of their being, in a short time, brought somewhat nearer together by stronger ties than had heretofore existed between them. Edward Condon likewise received his full share of the conversation. Camilla no longer concealed from Louisa the deceptive attentions of Edward to her, both previous and subsequent to the repulse which the latter had given him. Louisa, strongly desirous, as she was, of Camilla's alliance with her cousin, failed not to impress upon her mind the grossness of the character which was capable of such conduct; and added, that she would long ago have exposed him to Liston, but for the pity with which she regarded him.

"I think," said Camilla, "he has grown very conceited of late, and will need some severe lessons to bring him to his proper senses."

"Yes," said Louisa; "and it would appear that he is now in a fair way to get one that will be of much service to him; one that will teach him prudence and circumspection—qualities of which he stands greatly in need."

"But suppose he comes here this evening," said Camilla, "as he promised himself to come soon, to make to me that very important communication of which he spoke—shall I listen to it?"

"Be governed altogether by your own feelings," answered Louisa. "You already suspect what he intends, and will, therefore, be at no loss to give him such answers as he deserves. You need no suggestion from me—be governed entirely by your own feelings. Suppose I leave the room when he comes in, in order to give him a fair opportunity to say what he desires?"

"Oh, no," said Camilla; "that might look like giving him some encouragement—or as if there was some understanding between us. You had better remain; indeed, Lu, I wish you to stay with me all night."

"I should like much to stay," replied Louisa, "but mother will expect me home early, and I must not disappoint her."

"But I will send immediately to inform her, and solicit her permission?"

"Then, of course, I will stay."

Camilla was about to despatch a messenger upon this service, when a ring of the door-bell was heard.

"That," said she, "is no doubt Edward's ring."

"Yes," said Louisa, "or else it is Liston, seeking me."

Camilla was right. Edward Condon was announced, and in a few seconds presented himself before them. It would be quite a difficult task to describe his feelings at this moment, as he seated himself a little distance from the table in the centre of the room, near which the two ladies were sitting

He had thought much of this visit, and the probable result of it; and now to have its object so unexpectedly thwarted, and that, too, by the presence of one who, of all others, he could, at that moment, have at least wished under her own maternal roof, was a shock too sudden and severe even for his nerves to bear with his usual self-possession. He expected surely to find her alone, or he would have staid away; and least of all did he anticipate meeting Louisa Weldon there. He consequently appeared quite bewildered; cast a vacant look around him, and from one division of the parlors to the other, as if to be certain there were no more tormenters present; and was evidently too much disconcerted to know precisely what to say, or how to account for himself.—He cast no very loving glances at Louisa; thought she had a great deal better be at home, or elsewhere, particularly at that moment, as he knew Camilla would, just then, be glad to dispense with her company! Finally, despairing of an opportunity to fulfil his intent, he was more than half resolved to make brief his visit; but he concluded to protract it awhile, in the hope that some escort would soon arrive to take Louisa home, and he would then be able to have a private interview. Accordingly, some trifling conversation was introduced, which was kept up chiefly between himself and Louisa, though she, in truth, gave him very little encouragement in that way to stay where he was. Camilla preserved a dignified reserve, (which Edward construed in his favor,) and answered very briefly such remarks as were particularly addressed to herself. Edward vainly believed that Camilla was as anxious for Miss Weldon's absence as he was himself!

The evening hour was fast advancing, and with it Edward's restlessness increased. A little more time allowed, and he would probably have been rude enough, in his growing impatience, to introduce an extemporaneous essay, for the especial benefit of Louisa's ear, on the impropriety of young ladies being from home at improper hours; but he soon received some momentary relief, by another sturdy ring at the door. "Come for her, no doubt," whispered he to himself, at the same time giving a sideway glance and nod at Louisa—"Come for her, no doubt—now we shall be relieved."

"Did you call at our house?" asked Louisa, addressing the gentleman that had just entered.

"Yes," answered Liston, (for it was he,) "and have come," he continued, casting a knowing and cheerful look at Edward, "to do myself the honor of escorting you home."

"You surely did not come directly from there," said Camilla, (who, having for a moment been called out of the room, was just returning as he concluded the remark)—"for I have a message from Mrs. Inglis, which assures me if that is what you came for, you will have to go away without her." Camilla smiled, and turning to her friend, added—"She has no objection, Lu."

"Then," said Louisa, "he will indeed have to depart without me. But suppose, Camilla, we send him on an embassy back again, to give information that he has seen us well, contented and happy?"

"Pray what is all this mystery?" said Liston, with mock surprise, and casting another, but doubtful, glance at Edward.

"Does Miss Weldon intend to stay—stay—," muttered Edward, as his last hope of seeing Camilla alone that evening began to fade; but they, intent upon indulging a joke at Liston's expense, and far from seeing into the extent of his (Edward's) agitation, entirely overlooked the question he attempted to ask.

"Yes," said Camilla, sprightly, (directing her attention to Louisa's remark,) "excellent thought!—and as he expected to return there this evening, it will be no disappointment to him."

"Then commission me quickly," said Liston, "and let me know what I am to perform."

"And if he is to come immediately back here, for Miss Weldon," interposed Edward, with emphasis, at the same time rising from his seat and looking towards the hall door, as if ready to move on the instant of ascertaining the negative of his amendment.

"But were you not there when the message came?" asked Louisa, addressing Liston.

"There! Where? At your house? No message came from you while I was there."

"Oh, then," said Camilla, "if he had waited awhile, he would have heard it. As he did not wait, he does not deserve to know."

"Ah, say you so, Camilla? Now if I had waited there longer, I should not have been able to get this out of the evening mail for you," said Liston, handing her a letter.

"A letter! From whom?" asked Edward, with eagerness, advancing towards Camilla.

"That," answered Camilla, "I will the better know when I break the seal—which is not to be at this moment."

"You do, then, suspect its source?" asked Edward.

"Very likely—the hand-writing of the superscription is quite familiar." And so saying, she turned from Edward, without giving him time to add another remark, and approached Louisa, whom Liston, during the slight interval, had managed to engage at the opposite end of the room.

"I have told him, he was so curious to know," said Louisa, turning to meet Camilla's approach—"and have consented to spare him the journey back again. And now," she added, turning to Edward, "Mr. Condon must know."

"Thank you, thank you," said Edward, affecting much greater ease than he felt; "by all means let me hear?"

"Of course, Ned; if that young lady," said Liston, nodding at Camilla, "has not already whispered it into your ear, I'll tell you myself."

Camilla frowned at Liston and turned away.

"She has not," said Edward.

"Then," said Liston, giving the young gentleman he had striven to serve, the most dubious look of all; "it is, that Miss Weldon is not to go home this evening. She remains here."

"Oh, ah!—y-e-s," said Edward, straining the remark after a deeply drawn breath; "yes—I thought so—suspected as much. Come, Liston, our walk lies partly in the same direction—shall we go?"

Liston, not wishing to detain Edward in a situation where he appeared so ill at ease, complied, and they departed. He enquired of Edward, as they proceeded homeward, if he had succeeded to any extent in declaring his wishes?

"Not a word," said Edward, with feeling—"not a word. Miss Weldon was there before me—may have spent the afternoon there for aught I know—and you see we have left her there."

Edward could scarcely refrain from embellishing the name of Louisa with some not very pleasing expletives; but the presence of Liston restrained him. As it was, however, he endeavoured to do it as much damage as possible by emphatic pronunciation. After a pause he asked—"But what letter was that you handed to Camilla?"

"Can't say, positively; some friend in the country, I suppose. But, Ned, you seem to doubt Camilla; and I thought I observed—that is—I mean—have you any serious apprehensions as to her regard for you?"

"Very little, very little. She's somewhat timid—retreating—but it's perfectly natural in such cases—where they expect—perfectly. Little doubt but I shall succeed after a fair proposal. Must be patient—patient."

"True," said Liston, whose rising apprehensions were greatly increased by Edward's rhapsodical speech. "True—patience is a great virtue; but when you see these letters flying about, it is well enough to be on the alert."

This gentle hint was not lost upon Edward.

"I have been thinking," he rejoined, "that I had better write her a few lines myself—put the whole matter on a sheet of paper, solicit an immediate answer—send it to her—won't get the answer immediately, of course;—must take time to reflect, you know, (as they say,) when they have made up their minds months before. This will bring the thing to a point at once; and I shall be at ease till I get the answer. I say at ease, Frank, for though I have very little doubt of the result, yet you know we can't predict the course of these fickle, flighty creatures, with certainty."

Frank Liston did not altogether approve of the tone or the tenor of what Edward said; but he generously imputed all to the momentary vexation which the disappointment occasioned him, and so let them pass. He acquiesced in his intention to pursue the course he had marked out, wished him success, and they parted.

Edward reached his room in a much more unsettled state of mind than he desired Liston should be aware of. After seating himself and reflecting awhile, he determined that his letter should be written that night, and be sent to Camilla, by a special messenger, in the course of the next morning.

It was about eleven o'clock in the forenoon of the succeeding day, when Edward's letter reached Camilla. Louisa stood in the parlor with her hat on, just prepared to go home, when it came.

"Louisa," said Camilla, opening and holding the gilt-edged sheet before her friend's eyes, "Louisa, look! would you believe it!"

"Edward Condon! I declare! We were right, Camilla, we were right! Yes, yes—it is a love letter! But what does he say? Read it."

"Not I, indeed!" said Camilla. "I don't wish to see what it contains, after reading the first three lines. Stay till I enclose and return it to him."

And with this she handed the ill-fated paper to her friend, and flew to her writing table to prepare an envelope for it.

Louisa did not object to this course. She considered that Edward richly deserved it—particularly as she saw, on reading the effusion, (what still further convinced her of the odiousness of his real character,) that he used much of the same language that he had before repeated to her. He began by lamenting the want of courage and favourable opportunity to make known his wishes before—doubted not that Miss Inglis had long ago inferred from his actions—those sure betrayers—that she was the first wish of his heart—had often called upon her with the intention of declaring his passion, but his fortitude had as often forsaken him—and trusted, therefore, that the mode he had finally adopted, would be received and treated favourably. With this, after stating that his happiness depended entirely upon a successful reply, he very tenderly brought it to a close.

By the time Louisa had finished its perusal, Camilla was ready with the few lines on the sheet in which she was about to enclose it. Taking it from her friend's hand, she gave it another slight glance, enclosed it, and sent it directly to the Post Office.

"Poor fellow," said Louisa, "he will take it very severely, no doubt. Still, your note is very mild."

"He may take it severely," rejoined Camilla; "but it will be because of its justice; because of the consciousness that he richly merits it. Suppose," she continued after a slight pause, "I were to write him all that I know, (which of course would be beneath me to do,) what then?"

"You are certainly in the right, Camilla," said Louisa.

"Yes—and let him infer, as he most assuredly will, that I have had my wakeful moments as well as he!"

Edward concluded to remain at home the remainder of the day, after sending his letter, thinking that Camilla, in her eagerness to secure him, might possibly acknowledge its reception quite as promptly as he could have desired. In that he was not altogether mistaken; but, as the reader knows, from causes widely different from those his deluded imagination conjured up. He was sitting alone in his paternal mansion, in the parlor, his elbow resting upon a centre table, and his head upon his raised hand, lost in a deep reverie, when the reply was handed to him. It was brought to the door by the afternoon delivery of city letters. He eagerly took it from the hand of the servant who brought it in, and desired to be left alone. He pressed the folded paper between his thumb and fingers, and with no little anxiety discovered it to be a doublet! He intensely regarded the direction on the back of it, but could not discern whose writing it was—for although acquainted with Camilla's chirography, she had, in her precipitancy, taken so little pains in its execution, that he could not, with certainty, identify it. But he would remain in suspense no longer. He opened the seal, and, like the opening of Pandora's box, it disclosed nothing but horrors! His own darling epistle, over which he had spent the better half of the preceding night, and upon which he hazarded so much, fell out before his astonished view! At the first impulse he let the whole fall from his hands, grasped his hair, and wildly repeated, "Ruined! ruined! ruined!—She knows it all! She knows it all!" But,

"Hope springs eternal in the human breast;"

Its latent breath, even at this moment, came o'er Edward. Catching up the sheet which contained the few lines with which Camilla had accompanied the unceremonious return of his proposal,

"Perhaps," he exclaimed, "there is yet hope!—These lines may contain at least one word to cheer!" And then holding up the writing before him, he read as follows:

"Sir—I herewith return your letter of this date, with the assurance that the honour of its reception, after what has taken place, was far from my expectation. It merits no better notice from my hands, and this, I trust, will deter you from its repetition.

"In order that you may know that there is no possibility of my retracing this step, it may not be improper to inform you here, that the heart you seek is already claimed by and conceded to another.

"Camilla."

I will not attempt to describe, but leave the reader to imagine, the utter consternation that overwhelmed Edward Condon, as he threw this note from him.

"Another!" he exclaimed, "Another! Heavens! have I been dreaming! I must never see her again!" And, saying this, he tore the note and the letter into a thousand fragments, which he cast into the grate before him. Then hastening to his room, he soon had a few preparations made ready, and leaving directions for the transaction of certain business, and of his immediate destination, he left by the earliest conveyance for a neighbouring city, where he intended to remain till his arrangements and a favourable vessel would permit him to set sail for a destined port in France.

The rest of the story is soon told. The birthright of Louisa Weldon was also the night on which she was united in the bonds of wedlock to Francis Liston; and, soon thereafter, Camilla Inglis became the happy bride of Lionel Weston, leaving unfortunate Edward Condon to contemplate, in a foreign clime, the dangers of deception, and the folly of fortune-hunting.

A LESSON OF LIFE.

The Teacher to the Listless Student.

BY THOMAS G. SPEAR.

Up and on! nor sit despairing
O'er the common ills of time;
Life, though dull to thy comparing,
Has a meaning most sublime.

Grope not through the world supinely,
Wasting manhood by the way;

But arise, and act divinely,
Working with the shining day.

Think of those who went before you,
Who have flourish'd and have died,
And let great mens' lives conjure you
Still to struggle and confide.

Be deceived not, nor misguided,
But in youth for age prepare;
And avoid a mind divided—
Indecision heeds despair.

Who is he that shines in story,
And is number'd with the wise,
That has won his way to glory,
But by toil and sacrifice.

Every spark from action beaming,
Makes the path of duty clear;—
Every moment lost in dreaming,
Brings remorse of spirit near.

Live not abject nor beholden,
But among the strivers strive,
Making every moment golden,
Bring its honey to the hive.

Thought and labor are demanded
Of the heritors of earth;—
Think, and keep thy soul expanded,—
Work, and know the joy of worth.

Up, and onward to the battle,
While the heart is young and brave,
Where the drums of duty rattle,
Where the flags of promise waive.

Eyes are round you, looking, waiting,
To record each earnest deed—
Be not then in hope abating,
When to strive is to succeed.

Not a star that shines above you,
But has labour to perform—
Not a flower whose beauties move you,
But inaction would deform.

Up, then, while the day is glowing,
Rested and refresh'd anew;
Till, to dust thy form bestowing,
All is done that man can do.

Written for the Philadelphia Saturday Courier.

A PRAYER FOR DEATH.

Oh, Death! thou art an angel bright,
To one by grief opprest;
Thou com'st to him on wings of light,
To give a peaceful rest.

I see no terror in thine eye,
Nor sharpness in thy sting,
And I could lay me down to die,
Without once murmuring.

For of the dreams that once had birth,
In childhood's sunny hours,
Oh! few are left to light the earth,
And hide its thorns with flowers.

And one by one, like Autumn's leaves,
The lov'd and dear ones fall;
And Time, with busy fingers, weaves
O'er all my hopes a pall.

Oh! I have longed to gather wealth,
Have bowed before its shrine,
And offered up my peace and health,
That I might call it mine.

'Twas useless all—in vain I knelt,
My prayers were all unheard,
That sickness of the heart I felt,
That broods o'er hope deferred.

Then what is life to me—when all
That lights its path hath flown;
Its brightest flow'rets fade and fall,
Its laugh but stills a groan.

Welcome the grave! and welcome death!
Ye have no fears for me;
Yours is the couch where slumbereth
The grief-worn, peacefully.

For there no torturing thoughts can come,
No fearful dreams have birth;
And there the wanderer finds the home
Denied to him on earth.

Then welcome be thine icy chain,
To bind this throbbing heart;
And welcome be that still domain
Whose monarch, Death, thou art.

SCIO.

THE QUARREL.

BY MRS. H. MUZZEY,

AUTHOR OF "THE LEGEND OF NEW ENGLAND," "PRIZE TALES," ETC., ETC.

Somewhere about the year 18—, politics ran very high, nearly as high as during the recent Presidential contest. Difference of opinion influenced even the intercourse of private life. Friends became estranged, and in some instances irreconcileable enmity sprung out of the mutual recriminations which not unfrequently distinguished political discussions. A foreigner, who sojourned for a time in our country, was heard to say that "it was strange that in a free and enlightened nation, a man should look upon another in the light of either a knave or a fool, who happened to differ in opinion from himself."

Mr. Osborne and Mr. Berkley were friends in their boyhood—they were friends when as young men they partook together of the social pleasures and occupations of life. They continued friends when both were established in business. Mr. Berkley officiated as groomsman at Mr. Osborne's wedding, and when, soon after, the former took a partner for life, the latter was the gayest among the guests at the bridal banquet. And they would in all probability have remained friends, if Mr. Osborne, who had been rather slow in forming any political opinions, and for a long time wavering, had not at last taken a decided stand in favor of the opposite party to that which Mr Berkley sustained by his most strenuous efforts. This was a blow which Mr. Berkley did not fully expect; he had hoped to bring his friend over to his opinions and frankly gave him to understand that their friendship was in a tottering state, if he continued to support the obnoxious party. Mr. Osborne was steadfast in his own opinion.

"Firm as a rock," he said, "nothing could shake him."

The friends met sometimes—but it was only to discuss political affairs, and to endeavor to change each other's views. Both gentlemen were energetic in their language, and warm in debate; so much so, that they sometimes forgot they were gentlemen, and distinguished each other by epithets which, to say the least, were by no means complimentary. On one of these occasions both became so much excited that a quarrel ensued; each made use of language which neither could forget or forgive. They parted with a mutual declaration, that henceforth they and their families were to meet only as strangers; and each, in terms not to be mistaken, communicated to his household the resolution he had formed, accompanied by a stern prohibition of future intercourse.

Edward, the only son of Mr. Osborne, a youth in his twenty-third year, heard this mandate with sorrow and mortification. How could he exist when denied the sight of the lovely Frances Berkley? How should he spend those hours of leisure which were now chiefly devoted to her society? How forego those hopes which had "grown with his growth,"—hopes which till now had received the parental sanction—of one day calling her his own? For some hours the feelings of the young man were in a state of the most painful agitation. Unwilling to disobey the commands of a father who had always been to him the kindest of friends, he could not forbear regarding as absurd the quarrel which thus threatened to destroy his brightest prospects. But with the buoyancy of youth his hopes soon rose above his fears. Such a disagreement could not, he began to think, be irreconcileable;—the fathers would retract what they had uttered in the heat of passion;—they would become friends once more, and all these clouds would pass away.

Days, which seemed to him as years, had passed, and Edward had not seen the beloved of his heart, when the young people chanced to meet at the house of a mutual friend. Frances lamented as sincerely as her lover the interdict which had kept them asunder, and although she had known instances of her father's unyielding temper, he had ever been indulgent to her wishes.

"I am his only child," she said, "and if I do not overrate my influence, his heart will yield to my entreaties, and make overtures of reconciliation. This must only be a short-lived animosity, which our united intercessions may soon remove."

But as time wore on, the hopes of Edward began to decline, and new and indefinable fears arose in his mind. His father, generally cheerful and communicative, became each day more gloomy and reserved; and Edward remarked with pain that his eye kindled and his cheek flushed whenever the name of his old friend was mentioned. He had yet to learn that his parent was suffering under the keenest pang that a proud heart is destined to experience—the consciousness of obligation to an enemy;—and that in his last interview with Mr. Berkley, an unequivocal allusion to a circumstance of which Edward was ignorant, had stung him to the quick, and left resentment rankling in his heart, which could not be easily assuaged. Mr. Osborne was not a rich man by inheritance. He had commenced his business-life with little more than a good name to sustain his credit. In all his struggles with the commercial world, and they had been many, that good name had never been forfeited. His integrity had remained unshaken and undoubted. About six months prior to his late disagreement with Mr. Berkley, he had been induced to embark a considerable sum in a speculation which promised brilliant results, but which failed eventually, and ruined thousands. In an evil hour he had borrowed from his friend the sum necessary for this experiment. It was a total loss, and he had not the power of re-paying it. It was while devising means to effect this object, and struggling to conceal the difficulties which pressed upon him from every quarter, and writhing under the anticipations of blasted credit and ruined prospects, that he retorted with unwonted asperity to the cutting sarcasms of his former friend, who so far forgot himself as to upbraid him with "sitting down quietly under an obligation to a man whose opinions he despised, and to whose forbearance he owed his only chance of sustaining his sinking credit."

To that vaunted forbearance Mr. Osborne no longer looked. In the pride of his heart he felt that he should prefer ruin for himself—but he dreaded to entail upon his son the consequences of his own acts. His feelings preyed upon his health—his energies forsook him. The same day on which he disclosed to Edward the exact position of his affairs, he was seized with a violent fever, which soon terminated fatally.

Edward's grief for his loss was severe and lasting. He was now alone in the world—his mother had been dead many years. Although unacquainted with mercantile affairs, as his education had been conducted chiefly with the view of his studying the law, his good sense immediately directed him the proper course to pursue. He called together his father's creditors, and paid them to the utmost farthing. Mr. Berkley's debt alone remained uncancelled. Perhaps the young man was desirous of ascertaining what course the father of Frances would pursue towards him. In the meantime, he was taking measures to put in execution a plan which he had formed as soon as the state of his late father's affairs became known to him. Edward possessed a small estate, which had been bequeathed to him by a maiden aunt, the sister of his mother; this little property he determined to dispose of as soon as a purchaser could be found, and with the proceeds to liquidate the debt which had weighed so heavy on the heart of his poor father. He took a journey for the purpose of making the necessary arrangements, and he sighed heavily as with the romantic feelings of a lover, he pictured to himself the quiet home, the sweet and rural retreat which he might there find with the object of his affection—the woodland walks, the blooming garden, the fertile fields, the placid streams and sheltered bowers—would charm the fancy, and delight the taste of his young and artless Frances! But this, his little all, must pass into other hands! And with a saddened heart, but firm, unwavering purpose, he set about taking the steps necessary for the transfer of his little property. A purchaser was soon found, and the sale completed.

After a few weeks' absence, Edward returned home with the sum necessary to discharge all pecuniary obligations to Mr. Berkley. Of that gentleman's present feelings towards himself he knew nothing; he had not seen him since the illness and death of his father. But towards the father of Frances, his feelings were of a mixed nature. Respect for the memory of his parent required him to pursue a different line of conduct from that which his feelings towards her might have prompted. His dying parent had laid no prohibition upon him—had required no sacrifice. He had merely said, with respect to his former friend—"You are free to act as you think best, my son—vindicate, if you can, my integrity to Mr. Berkley. I feel that we were equally to blame; I should have been less irritable if the thought of that unhappy DEBT had not been rankling in my heart!" In a few months Edward had settled, as well as he was able, all his father's affairs; the debt to Mr. Berkley was liquidated through the agency of a man of business, and he found himself, on his twenty-third birth-day, alone in the world, with funds barely sufficient for a few months' support, with no prospect of being able to prosecute the studies which the late events had interrupted, and with scarcely any tie to his native city, except that which bound him to Frances Berkley. They had met twice at houses of their mutual acquaintances, and her artless joy at seeing him, together with the deep sympathy she expressed at his misfortune, had rendered the fair and innocent girl still dearer to his heart.

One day he accidentally met her in a walk. She was alone; and the opportunity being too tempting to be neglected, he moved towards her, and she hastened to meet him.

"Ah!" said Frances, extending her hand, "it is so long since we met!"

Thrown off his guard by this reception, the young man exclaimed—

"If it were in my choice, dearest Frances, we would never be separated again." Then seeing her blushing confusion, he added—"Your father's interdiction, my dear girl, prevents my seeking your society at your own house. I know not if I am not violating his command by thus endeavoring to see you."

"Ah, Edward," returned the young lady, "how unfortunate that disagreement between our fathers! Yet I think mine relents. He appeared much moved by the death of dear Mr. Osborne. It is impossible that he can feel any enmity towards you, to whom he always appeared so much attached."

"That may be, Frances," replied the young man; "but unless he recalls his prohibition, it would not become me to seek an entrance under his roof; and I will not conceal from you that I fear the probability of his retracting is now less than ever."

The inquiring look of Frances seemed to ask an explanation.

"Because," continued her lover, "my circumstances are now such that no prudent father would encourage my attentions to his daughter."

The tone of mingled grief and bitterness with which Edward said this moved the heart of Frances, and she shed tears while she replied—

"My father cannot be so cruel, so unjust. Your misfortunes are not of you own making. Every one acknowledges the uprightness, the nobleness of your character. Can my father alone be prejudiced and illiberal? I cannot believe it."

"What I have asserted is nothing new or strange, my sweet girl," he replied. "Poverty is a formidable barrier to happiness—a poor passport to favor of the prosperous. But," he added, more cheerfully, "I will not repine, neither will I despair. I have no unworthy act of which to accuse myself. I will endeavour to win fortune and favour by industry and perseverance; and if I succeed, my sweet Frances, will you consent to be mine?"

The maiden, with becoming modesty, yet firmly and unhesitatingly pledged her hand to him who had long possessed her heart. The lovers parted, and Edward Osborne felt his heart beat lighter than it had for many months. Frances was above the meanness of disguise, and on her return home she informed her father that she had accidentally met Edward Osborne, and remained with him some time.

"And did you not," returned her father, with unusual asperity, "remember my commands that all intercourse between my family and that of Mr. Osborne should be at an end?"

"I did not forget it, father," replied Frances; "I have never forgotten a command that has always appeared to me—pardon me, dear father!—so different from your usual kindness. Has Edward Osborne ever offended you? or is he unworthy the favour you formerly showed him?"

"You are a bold girl," returned Mr. Berkley, "to question the justice of your father's conduct. But there is no need of dissembling. I admit that the young man has never offended me, except in seeking to see you when he knows my commands to the contrary. I regret, since his father is dead, that we ever quarrelled. I have nothing to advance against the son's character—but I repeat my commands, that henceforth you must be as strangers. I could never be happy with him for a son-in-law, and I know it is to that he aspires. Besides," continued Mr. Berkley, "he is nearly a beggar; he has no dependance, and knows no profession by which to obtain a livelihood for himself. What would he do with a wife? Nay, Frances," he added, seeing the distress of his daughter, who was now weeping bitterly, "I do not wish to afflict you, but this silly attachment of mere children will soon pass away. I know, better than you do, what is for your happiness. Poverty and hardships would ill agree with a girl brought up as tenderly as you have been. You would be miserable, depend upon it—and I should be no less so."

"But father, father," interrupted Frances, gaining courage from her parent's relaxed severity, "You are not poor—you are not without influence. Could you not assist—could you not befriend poor Edward?"

"Frances!" said Mr. Berkley, with a tone and manner which instantly annihilated all the poor girl's reviving hopes, "let us drop this subject forever!—You must give up all thoughts of Osborne, or you will forfeit the love I have always felt for you. I will never consent to your marriage with him, even if fortune should smile upon him. Yet I put no force upon you. Both of us you cannot retain: you lose your father or give up your lover. Say no more to me on the subject; but I advise you to make a prudent choice."

So saying, Mr. Berkley left his daughter, whose young heart throbbed almost to bursting with the violence of her grief.

"Oh!" she thought, as she retired to her chamber to hide her tears and quiet the tumult of her thoughts; "if Heaven had spared my poor mother, she would advise me how to act—she would console me under this harshness of my father—she always felt sympathy with the unfortunate—she would not look with scorn upon Edward's altered prospects: and I should despise myself if I loved him less because he has lost his only relative and has been reduced to poverty.—But Edward, dear Edward, I will not fail you—I will be true to the promise I made you in adversity"—and then the dread of offending and disobeying her father returned with fresh terrors, and the poor girl was overcome with sorrow. But her grief, though sincere, was the grief of eighteen; which soon subsides, for Hope always stands beckoning behind the clouds of Adversity, still pointing through the vista of the future to scenes of azure skies and thornless flowers. So the heart of Frances yielded to the cheering influence of Hope, and she returned to her usual avocations calm, if not happy.

Several weeks elapsed and the lovers had not met. In the meantime, Edward received a letter in reply to one he had written to an old friend of his father, who resided in a neighboring city. This gentleman advised the young man to relinquish, for the present, the study of the law, and to turn his attention to mercantile business, in which he might be able to assist him—he offered him a clerkship until something better might be done, and frankly told him that his house might be his home until the dawning of brighter prospects should make such an arrangement unnecessary. Edward had feelings to overcome and objections to conquer, but he did overcome and conquer them sufficiently to accept the friendly offer of a "friend in need." Much did he wish to see Frances previous to his departure, but conjecturing the cause of her discontinuing her visits to the house of the friend where they had formerly met, and hopeless of obtaining an interview, he entrusted to the care of a friend a letter which explained his present prospects, and announced his departure. After renewing his avowal of affection, he added—"But I require no sacrifice from you, dearest. I would not selfishly entail upon you privation and poverty—you are free; but if I am ever so fortunate as to gain a competence and Frances still thinks of me with kindness, I will return and claim the promise she so generously made me." The letter concluded with these lines:

"I leave thee free: though round my heart
A chain is bound, I cannot never:
And while reluctant I depart,
My heart, my soul, are with thee ever.

Thou can'st not bless me ere I go,
With one kind word, forever cherished:
But, loveliest, dearest, thou wilt know,
Ere love had changed, thy lover perished.

Poor Frances shed many a tear over this letter, but Edward had hopes, and she would hope, perhaps her father might in time look more favorably upon the object of her choice. Frances was too young to know that the man who inflicts an injury seldom forgives. Nor was she aware that from a sense of his own inferiority sprung the true source of her father's animosity towards young Osborne, whose scrupulous integrity in liquidating his father's debt to him by the sale of his own little inheritance, had removed the only real cause of complaint which Mr. Berkley had against him. It would have been more gratifying to his feelings to have been able to complain of injury and to boast of his own forbearance, than to receive his own with usury. He was conscious that by taunting the father with pecuniary obligations of a private nature, he had forfeited all claim to the esteem of the noble minded son—consequently, he felt relieved by the intelligence that young Osborne had left the city. He hoped that absence would weaken his daughter's attachment for him, and that she might in time be induced to make another choice.—At the same time he was contemplating a second marriage himself. His choice was fixed on a lady a few years older than his daughter. He had known her but a short time, and only as the "stranger belle" of a fashionable place of public resort. Had Mr. Berkley been guided by the prudence and foresight which usually influence persons at his time of life, he might have acted differently, but as he never allowed the opinions of any other person to influence his own, the affair was decided as soon as he could prevail on the fair lady to accept his offer.

Mr. Berkley hoped that the gaieties attendant on the celebration of his marriage, would do much towards diverting the thoughts of his daughter from her absent lover. We cannot say that such a hope proved the old gentleman to possess a very profound knowledge of the female heart—but, in that respect, he was far from being singular.

The surprise of Miss Berkley may be imagined, when her father disclosed to her his intentions, at the same time apprising her of the period fixed upon for the celebration of the wedding. The mother of Frances died when she was at the age of fourteen, and she retained a vivid recollection of her virtues, and of her devoted love for her only child. Consequently, she was shocked at the thought of her place being filled by another, but her good sense and the kindness of her heart, determined her to treat with all proper respect, the person whom her father had made choice of. A relative of Mrs. Berkley had presided in the house since the death of that lady, but at the announcement of the marriage, she took her departure, so that Frances was left alone to struggle with her feelings and to receive, as well as she was able, the new mistress of the mansion.

Nature had been bountiful to Frances Berkley. She was endowed not only with a graceful person, and a lovely, intelligent countenance, but with noble sentiments, innate rectitude of principles, joined to a kind and sympathizing heart. She had a mind capable of high cultivation, and she had availed herself of the opportunities which her father's wealth had afforded her, of acquiring much useful information, as well as many agreeable accomplishments. Such a heart and mind are always keenly alive to the attraction of noble qualities and high attainment in others. What wonder, then, that Frances cherished the memory of her absent lover, and that amidst her new trials is found her chief consolation? The daughter of the rich Mr. Berkley would, probably, have had many admirers, had nature been less bountiful in her gifts to her, besides those butterflies that flutter in the summer sunshine, and hover round the brilliant circle of prosperity and fashion. Frances had admirers of real worth, whom she rejected, with gentleness, it is true, but with decision and firmness, that left them nothing to hope. They felt that she was above the littleness of coquetry, and that her triumphs afforded her no gratification. Mr. Berkley was greatly incensed at this conduct of his daughter. He wished to engage her in a round of gaieties and amusements, and he found in his lady a willing auxiliary. He hoped that Frances would grow weary of "hope deferred," and that her constancy would at length yield to the fascinations with which he surrounded her. Edward Osborne, meanwhile, was becoming accustomed to the duties of his new station. Mr. Hatfield, the gentleman in whose employment he was, treated him with much kindness and consideration: he insisted on young Osborne's making one of his household, which, as he was a widower, consisted only of himself, a senior clerk, and a housekeeper. Of this little household, Edward made the fourth, and added much to its cheerfulness by his frank good humor, and his sprightly conversation. His time was not so fully occupied as to prevent his devoting some hours each day, to the studies and pursuits which best suited him. He confided to Mr. Hatfield every particular of his situation, and his frankness met with its reward in the increased interest and regard which his employer felt for him. Osborne had been rather more than a year in his present home, and the duties of his situation had kept him stationary; those duties had of late been augmented by the absence of Rodman, the senior clerk, who complained of ill health, and requested Edward to supply his place, as he considered change of scene and air absolutely necessary. The latter had been frequently surprised at the readiness with which Rodman had at different times made over to him the performance of those duties which more properly devolved upon himself, particularly as he in general behaved towards him with a reserve bordering upon dislike; but as he wished to acquire a thorough knowledge of his business, and was desirous of conciliating, he never shrunk from the tasks imposed on him.

One day, Mr. Hatfield said to him—

"Osborne, I feel that I am growing old. Mine has been a life of toil. I was not formerly successful in my affairs, but still I persevered, and my business, though not very extensive, has of late been regular and somewhat productive. As soon as I have secured a competence for my old age, I shall relinquish the whole concern to you and Rodman.—He is a distant relative, and the only one I have in the world. You can enter into partnership, and conduct the business together. Then you can bring home your pretty wife, and I shall have the satisfaction of knowing that I have been of some use in the world, by giving two worthy fellows a start in business. You shall be my joint heirs," said the old man, laughing; and he added—"Rodman has been with me longer than you have; yet I feel for you a greater interest even than for him.—(he is a worthy fellow, too)—but you are the son of my old play-fellow. That accounts for it—that and your own good qualities, my boy."

Young Osborne thanked his kind friend as well as his grateful emotions would permit, and although he gave a sigh to the career he had been forced to abandon, he yet felt that he had great cause for thankfulness. By pursuing the course marked out for him, he might avoid the miseries of dependence;—and, to a mind like his, independence was life's greatest blessing. Often had the sighs of Edward been wafted to his native place, which he longed to revisit, in the hope of seeing the one being so dear to his heart; and he soon after gladly availed himself of an opportunity which offered of attending to a little business for his employer in that city.

"Good bye, my dear fellow," said his kind friend, as he departed; "remember, if you bring your little lady home, I will prepare a wedding feast for you."

On this occasion, Edward's good fortune exceeded his most sanguine hopes, for he saw Frances the very next day after his arrival in B——. We will pass over the joy of their meeting. Edward detailed to her his prospects and his hopes, and Frances listened with a beating heart. She had also much to impart; and, after a long interview, each remembered much that yet remained to be said. Their first meeting had been accidental; but now that she had promised to see her lover again before he left the city, Frances felt that she had taken a step which was irrevocable, she had made her choice between him and the father who had thus willed. "Be it so," she said to herself; "my father is changed towards me—he is changed in all things. I can no longer contribute to his happiness—he looks on me with distrust, while all his confidence is given to the new object of his love."

Frances Berkley did not make these painful reflections without cause; her father was changed in his feelings towards her, for she felt that he had thwarted her wishes, and given lasting pain to her young heart, to gratify a feeling of vindictive pride, rather than acknowledge himself to blame—he had trifled with the happiness of his unoffending child, who had borne, without complaining, his cutting sarcasms, and the petty persecutions of her step-mother.

Edward Osborne saw that Frances was not happy; he had learned since his arrival at B——, some circumstances which determined his conduct; he urged her to unite her fate with his, and it was agreed on at their parting interview, that he should return in a few weeks and claim his bride. Frances was, in the meanwhile, to acquaint her father with her resolution. She hoped that, situated as he now was, he would no longer oppose her following the bent of her own wishes. Nor was she mistaken. Mr. Berkley heard his daughter in disdainful silence; and in answer to her appeal to his parental feelings he told her that, as she had chosen her own course, she could not expect him to interfere with her arrangements. "If Mr. Osborne expected any dowry with his bride," he added, "he must look elsewhere. The wife of Edward Osborne need never apply to him in any exigence to which her undutiful conduct was certain to reduce her. He would not retard her marriage," he said, "for one instant, by any opposition—for, after what had passed, he could no longer wish her to reside under his roof." In vain Frances entreated that he would look less coldly upon her, or at least do justice to the motives of Edward. He was inexorable. 'He would not," he said, "countenance her marriage by his presence, but his house was free to her while she remained in it, and he required that the ceremony should be performed under its roof. She might invite what guests she pleased to be present."

Although the heart of Frances swelled almost to bursting at this treatment from her father, she quelled her grief as well as she was able, and busied herself in making her arrangements, unassisted, save by that prudence and self-respect which formed part of her character. On Edward's return home, Mr. Hatfield congratulated him cordially on his new prospects, and pleased himself by preparing little presents for the expected bride. The arrears of Edward's salary was cheerfully handed over to make the necessary arrangements, and to furnish apartments for the young couple. The old gentleman was not alarmed at the prospect of young people "beginning the world," as he called it, with little. He had done so himself, and he looked with proper indifference upon those elegancies and luxuries which may embellish, but which cannot constitute true felicity. He busied himself in assisting Edward in his little preparations, and cheered him by the friendly interest he took in all that concerned him. When all was ready, Edward returned to B——, and found his Frances sad, it was true, but still resolved. The clergyman who was to unite them had been a friend of the late Mrs. Berkley. With his family, who resided a few miles from town, she had engaged to spend a couple of weeks previous to leaving B——. The marriage ceremony took place at the house of Mr. Berkley, although neither himself nor his lady condescended to be present; and this Mr. Berkley called "being consistent!" When the few guests had departed, Frances went to take leave of her father. He received her embrace coldly, and in silence. To her request that he would see Edward, he sternly replied—

"No, Frances, no!—he has insulted me by braving my authority, and inciting you to disobedience. I will never see him!"

Frances saw the cloud gathering on her father's brow. She checked the words that had risen to her lips—she knelt one moment at his feet, then rose, embraced him, and departed.

While Edward Osborne and his gentle bride were enjoying the social pleasures that enlivened their visit at the house of the worthy clergyman, a far different scene was enacting at P——. A sick man lay in a darkened chamber; no wife, no child, sat by his bed-side. A female stole about the room with noiseless step. It is true, her face wore a serious expression, but it was not the face of a wife, a child, or a sister. She owed the sick man respect and gratitude, but she was worldly-minded, and she thought more of the benefits she was about to lose, than of the sufferings of him who had bestowed them. The invalid had been ill but three days; yet his disorder had been so violent in its attack, that he was reduced to the last extreme of weakness by his sufferings.—Once, only, within the last few hours, he had essayed to speak. The attendants had tried to distinguish his meaning, but the words "not come yet," were all they could catch, and again he relapsed into a death-like stupor. A young man entered the chamber and sat down in an arm-chair beside the bed. It was apparent that he had left the seat only for a few moments. He took a hand of the sick man in one of his own. The female left the room, motioning as she did so, to the young man to remain. He nodded assent, and when she had closed the door, he slid his hand beneath the pillow and grasped a paper. The sick man stirred not—apparently he slept. The young man watched him some moments in almost breathless anxiety, then, trembling as he did so, he drew forth the paper, substituting one similarly folded, which he had taken from his bosom.

"He will never ask for it," he muttered to himself; "if he should, I can easily produce it; 'tis but natural that I should take charge of it."

The sick man never awoke. When the physician entered, half an hour afterwards, he felt the pulse of his patient, and said that all was over.

"Of course," said the female, who had entered with the physician, "of course Mr. Rodman will order everything, he being the only relation."

"Did Mr. Hatfield leave a Will?" inquired the doctor.

"I do not believe he ever made a will," answered the female; "he charged me to take care of a paper which was under his pillow. I offered to lock it up, but he said he 'would give it into his own hand.' I supposed he meant Mr. Rodman's own hand, so I did not meddle with it. It must be there still."

"Of course it must," said Mr. Rodman.

The doctor gently lifted the pillow and drew forth a folded paper. Rodman requested him to read it. There were only these words, which were scarcely legible, from the weakness of the hand that wrote them:

"Fearing I may not live to reach home, I here state that I bequeath all my property, of every kind, to Charles Rodman, my relative, and—"

"And clerk, he would have added, I suppose," remarked the doctor.

"Doubtless," observed Mr. Rodman, putting his handkerchief to his eyes.

"Well," said the physician, "I am glad it is so. You had best lock up this paper, Mr. Rodman; such things should be taken care of, though in this instance, it is true, as there are no other claimants, there is less need; but worthy Mr. Hatfield was thoughtful to the last."

"Dear old gentleman," sobbed the housekeeper, now really affected.

The day appointed for the funeral arrived. The house was filled with friends and acquaintances of the deceased.

"I wonder," said the housekeeper to Rodman, "that Mr. Osborne has not arrived—the poor dear gentleman was so fond of him, and he seemed so fond of Mr. Hatfield. I should have thought he would have tried to be here in time for the funeral—but perhaps he never got the letter you sent him."

"Probably he never did!" replied Mr. Rodman, "or else he would have been here, I am sure!"

A carriage drove up to the door. "It is he," exclaimed the housekeeper, as she looked forth.

Mr. Rodman trembled excessively, but he went to meet the new-comer, whose countenance expressed alarm and consternation.

"Oh! Osborne," he faltered, "you have come to a melancholy scene."

Edward could not speak—silently he supported the steps of a young female who hung upon his arm in extreme agitation, and led her to an inner room. The painful truth burst at once upon his mind—that coffin, then, must contain the remains of his kind old friend!

Bewildered and hurt that he had received no intelligence of Mr. Hatfield's illness and death, Edward was scarcely himself. What a scene was this to which he had brought his bride! He looked at poor Frances half sinking with dismay, and made an effort to command his feelings, and to speak a few words of encouragement to the weeping girl. Then consigning her to the care of some females, he joined the funeral train that followed the remains of his kind patron to their last resting place.

As soon as the funeral was over, Edward conducted Frances to the home he had prepared for her, for the society of strangers was too irksome to be borne in the present state of his feelings.

"Oh, my poor Frances!" he said, when they were alone, "what a disappointment for you—what a shock to your feelings, instead of the kind welcome I had taught you to expect."

From Rodman, Edward had learned that a letter had been sent, informing him of Mr. Hatfield's illness, which, however, had terminated so soon that he could not have arrived in time to see him even if he had received it. He also learned that his deceased friend had been taken suddenly ill while on a journey, which he had undertaken for the purpose of transacting some business—that he had insisted on proceeding homewards, notwithstanding his extreme suffering; which so exhausted him, that when he arrived at his own house, he was nearly insensible—and continued in that state, except for a brief interval, until his death. Besides the sorrow which young Osborne felt for the loss of his friend—a sorrow which was rendered doubly poignant by the circumstances attending it—he felt that the sudden death of Mr. Hatfield had rendered his situation peculiarly embarrassing. He remembered that Charles Rodman had rather avoided than sought his society during the time they had lived together. Uncertain whether the intentions which Mr. Hatfield had declared to himself had ever been communicated to the former: or if they had, whether they met with his approbation—he knew that if the deceased had made no testamentary disposition of his property, Rodman being his only relative, would naturally succeed to all he possessed. Consequently, his mind was a prey to the most painful suspense.

This uncertainty was not, however, of long duration. In a few days Rodman sought an interview, and after showing him the few lines which Mr. Hatfield had written, in a brief interval of pain, he informed him that it was not his intention to continue the business. "He should," he said, "dispose of the whole concern as speedily as possible—together with the house, and proceed immediately to the South, where it was his intention to settle."

In the course of this conversation, Edward suffered not the remotest hint to escape him, respecting the declaration which Mr. Hatfield had made of his intentions towards himself. He felt convinced that the kind old man had never changed in his views or feelings towards him, and that if time had been allowed him, he would have fulfilled to the utmost of his power, his reiterated promises of befriending and assisting him. But delicacy and pride forbade his alluding to those promises, and his manly, though serious demeanour forced a tribute of respect from the worldly-minded Rodman.

"Upon my soul, Osborne," he said, "you bear this better than I could! Thrown out of employment just when you have most need of resources. I am sorry that—the fact is, if I could continue the business, for your sake I would. But I cannot—my mind is made up! I have taken my resolution. I must wind up the concern as soon as possible, and set out for C——. But," he added, after a pause, "if a few hundred dollars would be of any service to you, say so—I will"——

"Say no more, Mr. Rodman," interrupted Osborne; "I am not much used to buffet with the world, it is true—but I have youth and health. I will borrow from no man—I will depend on my own exertions, and still hope they may not be wholly unsuccessful."

Thus they parted—Edward to return to the humble home, where a kind welcome radiant with smiles, awaited him; and Rodman to devise plans for his future course. In a much shorter time than is ordinarily required for such matters, the latter had completed the sale of his late employer's property. Although the precision and regularity with which the deceased had always conducted his affairs, made it a comparatively easy task, the speedy transfer of all his effects was not completed without some sacrifice to himself; yet Rodman hastened his arrangements as if some powerful motive impelled him to quit P—— as soon as possible.

In their few and brief interviews, Osborne perceived that Rodman's manner was constrained, and that he appeared ill at ease. In the course of a few months, he left P——: but he did not proceed immediately to the South, as he had declared was his intention. Some affairs, either of business or of pleasure, called him to a neighboring city, where he remained some time.

Meanwhile, Edward Osborne's endeavors to procure a clerkship in some mercantile house had been unsuccessful—his spirits sank at times, when he contemplated the situation to which his Frances might be reduced. And did Frances ever repine? did she look back with regret upon the comforts and elegancies of the home she had left? The gay society that frequented her father's house—the few chosen friends with whom she had passed many hours of rational happiness? On the latter, it is true, she often dwelt with affectionate remembrance—but Edward supplied to her the place of all she had left. Could she regret the luxury of a home from which he was banished—would she repine at having quitted pleasures which he might not partake? No: while Edward sat beside her at their frugal board—while he read to her—while they drew together—and while she saw him call forth all the resources of his cultivated mind and taste, for her alone, how could she repine? Frances had made her own election, and she never repented that she had done so—her only regret was for her father, and the harshness with which he had forced her to forsake him. But Poverty will intrude even into the sanctuary which Love has hallowed. Blessed indeed is the abode from which her dreaded presence cannot banish the celestial occupant.—Though suffering many privations, as their scanty means grew yet more scanty, Love still sat enthroned in the humble home of Edward Osborne, and Hope still hovered near him, with her radiant smile. In consequence of his application for employment, Edward had become slightly acquainted with the publisher of a periodical paper, and having formerly written articles merely for his own amusement, some of which had found their way into the public journals, and received a considerable share of commendation, he was emboldened to offer to the publisher just mentioned, some articles, which he had prepared with more than usual care. They were accepted, and being much admired, the productions of his pen soon became in request, and the emolument he received, though not ample, was sufficient to exclude want from their threshold.

In the course of time, Osborne became known to some persons of worth and influence. One of them, a gentleman of the bar, strongly advised him to recommence the study of the law, and offered him all the assistance in his power. Edward followed his advice, and without relinquishing the occupation which had long been his only dependence, he devoted much time to the study of the profession he had chosen.

Talent and application received their reward.—Edward was successful, and a few years found him in a situation which promised competence, at least, if not affluence. During these years, Frances had heard but casually of her father. She knew that he had retired from business, but of his domestic affairs she could only surmise. She feared he was not happy, for during her intercourse with her step-mother, her penetration easily discovered that affection for him had not been the motive of her marrying; that her blandishments were forced, and her exuberant gaiety merely counterfeited. The heart of Frances still yearned towards her parent, and she longed to know if he felt towards herself any portion of that love which had made her childhood happy. The last accounts she had heard was that he had left B——. She did not know that for two years he had been a wanderer from his home—a stranger to domestic enjoyment—the victim of disappointed affection, mortified pride, and impotent wishes for revenge.

A stranger had arrived at B——. He frequented no society, but had been seen to walk alone with Mrs. Berkley. This occasioned no remark, and no one watched her proceedings; when, in the darkness of night, she stole from beneath her husband's roof to meet the stranger, to accompany him to a vessel then ready to sail, and quit for ever the scene of her perfidy and degradation. There was no clue by which to trace the fugitive. She had left no parting word or line, to elucidate the mystery of her flight; but that she went not alone, Mr. Berkley felt certain; that she went not in poverty and destitution, he had also reason to know: and when recovered from the illness which was the consequence of the shock he had received, he set out, burning for revenge, in the hope of discovering her retreat, and punishing the accomplice of her flight.

In the summer of 18—, Mr. Osborne went on a journey to one of the southern States. The object of his journey was to comply with the frequent invitations of a gentleman to whom he had rendered essential service in his professional practice. He was accompanied by Frances and two fine children, whose birth had bound yet closer the tie of affection which united their parents. On returning from this excursion, the party determined to stay a few days in the city of B——, and to visit its environs. They lodged at a hotel, and the evening after their arrival, two passengers, a lady and gentleman, who had just landed from a steamboat, proceeded to the same place. They were closely followed by a man wrapped in a large cloak, the collar of which he had drawn up so as to conceal the lower part of his face; his hat being pulled over his eyes, made it impossible to distinguish his features. The stranger lingered till he saw the individuals just mentioned enter an apartment and close the door. He then withdrew to an adjoining room, and without divesting himself of his cloak or hat, he continued to pace the chamber with agitated steps for some time. He then approached the apartment occupied by the newcomers, knocked, and was admitted. The apartment was adjoining the one occupied by Mr. and Mrs. Osborne, who were startled by a loud scream, and the voices of men in violent altercation. The scream was repeated—it was the voice of a female. Edward stood for a moment irresolute, when an exclamation from his companion determined him; he pushed open the door which divided their own apartment from the one adjoining, and entered, making a gesture for Frances to remain where she was. The group, presented to his view, for an instant appalled him. A man stood with a pistol in his hand, evidently deterred from firing by the female throwing herself between him and the object of his vengeance. The pistol was raised, the aim taken. One glance sufficed to assure Osborne that not an instant was to be lost. He caught the pistol from the hand that held it. The cloak fell back;—Osborne beheld an old man, whose gray hairs fell over his disordered face. It was the father of Frances! It was, then, his voice which had drawn from his beloved that exclamation of terror.

"Take that, meddlesome intruder!" exclaimed Mr. Berkley, as he aimed a blow at Osborne, who stepped aside to avoid it.

Just then, Frances rushed into the room, exclaiming, "My father, why is this?"

The old man looked at them by turns, then tottered to a seat. The next instant he looked round for the objects of his wrath. They were no longer present. An opposite door, through which they had passed, was thronged with curious faces. Edward and Frances led the unresisting old man to their own room, and, after a brief interval, he said, in great agitation—

"Frances! Osborne! I little thought to meet you here. Osborne, you have saved me from the crime of bloodshed. I ought to thank you for it—but I cannot! Yet the villain was unable to defend himself—he had no weapon. I must thank you, young man. And that poor trembling girl! Frances! changed as I am, I am still your father—and thank God! no homicide."

To Frances, little explanation of the foregoing scene was necessary. She had recognized her stepmother when her father sunk into a seat. She had seen her throw herself upon the bosom of the stranger, and she conjectured part of the truth. Mr. Osborne had not seen the man, as the female had stood before him when he entered, and the sight of Mr. Berkley had rendered him indifferent to all else.

When the father of Frances had become in some degree collected, he felt that some explanation was necessary, and he hastened to acquaint his daughter and son-in-law with the story of his wife's desertion and his subsequent pursuit of her and her companion. He had visited every part of the Union to which he thought it probable they might retreat; he had been deceived by various descriptions into the belief that he had discovered them; from place to place he had pursued strangers, in the hope that at last he had found the objects of his search; but he now believed that never till that night had he been near them; for by some words that fell from his faithless wife, he now thought they had crossed the Atlantic, and were but just returned, when he recognized her on her landing from a steamboat; that never till the moment he beheld them, had he contemplated taking the life of the villain who had destroyed his domestic peace, but enraged beyond endurance at the sight of those who had so cruelly wronged him, in a moment of frenzy, he had provided himself with pistols and followed close upon their footsteps.

Frances shuddered at the thought that the grey head of her father might have gone to the grave stained with the crime of murder—that her father might have met the punishment due to the homicide; and again and again she blessed the beloved hand that had saved him from such a doom. And while she hung weeping on the neck of the old man, she prayed him to forego the thought of vengeance—to pursue no longer a frail and guilty being, who had chosen her own lot, and whose crimes had rendered her unworthy even of his revenge.

"Forget her, my dear father!" she said; "forget her and forgive her!—leave her to the upbraidings of her own heart, and your declining years may be made happy by the dutiful attentions of those who really love you."

And Frances brought her children, and placed them on her father's knees, and bespoke his love for them, and bade them love their grandfather.

The simple eloquence of truth prevailed. The heart of the stern old man relented. His obstinate resolves were conquered—he embraced his daughter, and held out the hand of reconciliation to her husband. Edward took the proffered hand, and while a pang of regret for the past shot through his heart, he felt that he, too, ought to forgive.

"Osborne," said the old man, "I have wronged you! I wronged you from the first. I treated your father unkindly, and with insult. I knew his honest nature, yet my fiery passion and unyielding obstinacy had dominion over me, and I would not relent towards you, who had never injured me. But I have suffered—deeply. I trusted, and was basely betrayed. I gave all my regard to a worthless woman, and lavished my wealth to purchase the love which was never mine. I treated with unkindness the child whom I ought to have cherished. I have spent such days and nights of misery, that those whom I have most wronged might think my punishment sufficient."

"Forget the past, father!" said Frances, "and let us look forward with hope to the future."

* * * * *

Years passed away, and Mr. Berkley had descended to a grave bedewed by the tears of his children and his children's children; they had knelt around his bedside and received his parting blessing.

Edward Osborne now ranked among the first in his profession in his native land. Many a poor man blessed him for his disinterested exertions in his favour; and many a one, rich in intellectual endowments and worldly wealth, held out to him the hand of friendship and esteem. He was returning from a tour through the western States, and had stopped for the night at a house of public entertainment in a country village. There were many guests in the house at that time, and Mr. Osborne, as was often his custom, joined them in a social supper, which was scarcely over when the mistress of the house entered, and inquired if there happened to be a lawyer among the gentlemen present.

Mr. Osborne was pointed out to her, and she requested him to walk up stairs, where there was a sick man who had besought her to send for a gentleman of that profession, and "she thought if there happened to be one among the guests, as was often the case, there was no need to send any body several miles, on a cold, dark night, to fetch the one resident among them."

Mr. Osborne followed the landlady up stairs, and on entering the room, beheld a man apparently very ill. The woman informed him that the invalid had been staying there about ten days.

"He was ill," she said, "when he came, but expected to get stronger, so as to proceed on his journey, but he had been growing weaker ever since;" she supposed he wanted some one to write to his friends.

Mr. Osborne approached the sick man, and the woman left them alone.

"I do not wish you," said the stranger, "to draw up a will—I have no estates to leave—no heirs—no one to inherit the little I have. But I want to make restitution. It must be legally done, sir!—There must be witnesses too—nothing is legal without witnesses."

The stranger spoke incoherently. There was something in the tones of his voice that struck the listener as being familiar to him. He drew near, and regarded him attentively. Time and sickness had much altered him, but the countenance was one he had before seen. Osborne requested the stranger to proceed in his instructions. He did so, and mentioned the name of Edward Osborne as the person to whom restitution was to be made. Osborne laid his hand upon that of the invalid, and pronounced his name—"Rodman!"

"Yes," said the other, "Rodman is my name—but who are you?"

"I am Edward Osborne, at one time the clerk of Mr. Hatfield."

The sick man groaned and fell back upon his pillow. After a brief interval Rodman resumed:

"It is wonderful that you should be here at this time. But I feel relieved from half my load of misery by seeing you. It was my intention to seek you out and tell you all. I committed a fraud against you—it may be of little consequence to you now—but it is a heavy load on my conscience. Our kind old employer intended all he possessed to be shared equally between us two. He left a written paper to that effect. I know it—for I supported his feeble frame while he wrote it. I stole it from beneath his pillow in his dying moments, and substituted an unfinished scrawl, which he had begun, when a paroxysm of pain obliged him to desist. I pretended that the first paper was not to be found, and he believed me. It was the one I showed you. Yes! I robbed the dying man—I defeated his last wishes—I wronged you, who had never injured me—you, who was reduced by my villainy to poverty, perhaps to want! I know it all—I knew it then!—It was avarice, you will say, that prompted the base act. It was not the first fraud I had committed, and it seemed a trivial fault, to my distempered imagination—a fault that was pardonable—almost praiseworthy, as it led to the achievement of an object long cherished—long looked forward to—and that object a still greater crime! It was a fiend in the semblance of love, that goaded me on to all my crimes! But I must explain. Have patience, if you can, and listen. I am a native of Louisiana; my mother was a relative of Mr. Hatfield. Before I went to live with him, I became acquainted with Margaret L——. Her beauty enchanted my senses. She loved me in return. Necessity compelled me to accept the offer of my mother's relative. I left my native place and repaired to P——; wretched was our parting—I was wretched when separated from her. After many months had elapsed, she took advantage of an opportunity that offered, and followed me. We often met—I supplied her from time to time with money—no matter how obtained. I was never suspected. Circumstances at length made it advisable that we should meet less frequently. I had become alarmed lest my course of life should be discovered. Actuated by pique, or perhaps a wish for a change of scene, Margaret left P——. She went to one of the fashionable places of summer resort;—from thence I heard from her. Stung with jealousy, I would have followed her, but just then you were introduced by my patron into his establishment, and I feared to leave the field open to you. I feared your supplanting me in the old man's favour. I formed the base project of making you subservient to my purposes, and responsible for my deficiencies. You may remember, I left much of the business to you, and in that I had my own views. Well—you are still calm—you still bear with me—hear me to an end. I heard that Margaret was married. The information came from herself. She bade me consider that step a proof of her love for me. After a time she summoned me to her presence. I found a pretext for a journey, and saw her. She explained her views to me;—her husband, who was far from young, was wealthy, and doatingly indulgent to her. She would enrich herself for my sake. She had weakened his affection for his only daughter, and rendered her father's house a comfortless and irksome home. She would do still more for my sake. Blinded by my infatuated passion, I applauded what I ought to have censured. We parted, but I often heard from Margaret. Then came your journey to B——, and then I learned that you had wedded the daughter of Margaret's husband. Do not curse me till I have finished! Remember, our crimes led to your happiness—to your advancement! Had Mr. Hatfield's last wishes been attended to, you would not have become what you are now—but I should have had one crime less upon my conscience. I could not continue as joint heir, and parted with you in the business which the old man, in his simple kindness, designed for us. The sale of the whole property would enable me to convey Margaret to a distant land, where she would again be all my own. Temptation was before me!—I risked all, and accomplished my purpose! But a year passed before I could accomplish my design with respect to Margaret. In the mean time, I hovered near her. An opportunity at length occurred. She fled with me. We went to Europe—but our restless spirits prompted us to return. I knew not that Mr. Berkley had pursued us, nor that he sought my life, until your hand arrested the weapon that would else in all probability have terminated my career. You did not recognise me. We fled—since we have wandered from place to place, feeling secure in none; since, if detected in a spot so far remote, as we thought, from those we had injured, and secure from all fear of recognition, we had been sought and found, where could we hope for safety? Did I find happiness when I had obtained all that my crimes had won? No, no! But of all my heaviness, that hate act towards you lay heaviest on my heart. But I am punished. Five months since I followed Margaret to the grave—a fever carried her off after a few days' illness—a few straggling strangers saw her coffin lowered in the earth. They had never beheld her beauty—they knew not how madly I had loved her—they heeded not the miserable being whose all lay buried there. No tears but mine ever fell upon the sod that covers her. No kindred monument rises beside her lonely resting place. I lay whole days and nights on the damp earth that covers her. A fever was the consequence. I have been wasting ever since. I have but one wish—to make the little amends now in my power, and to follow to the grave the only being I ever loved."

Mr. Osborne had forbore to interrupt the unhappy man while he detailed his crimes and his misery. He saw that Rodman's days were numbered, and he strove to afford him all the consolation he was capable of receiving. He remained with him till his death, and saw his remains consigned to the grave.

When he returned to his family, who had been anxiously expecting him, he related the cause of his detention. Frances exclaimed:

"I thank Heaven, dearest Edward, that you were at hand to console the last hours of that unhappy man! Surely those who have followed the straight path of integrity and virtue are alone capable of bestowing consolation on the guilty and the penitent."

And looking fondly on her sons, she added:

"Remember, my boys, that integrity and industry are the only safe stepping stones to prosperity and honor."

The Lover and His Dear Beloved.

All that's lovely speaks of thee!
When the glorious sun appeareth,
'Tis the harbinger to me;
Only thus he cheereth.

In the garden where thou go'st,
There art thou the rose of roses,
First of lilies, fragrant most
Of the fragrant posies.

When thou movest in the dance,
All the stars with thee are moving,
And around thee gleam and glance,
Never tired of loving.

Night!—and would the night were here!
Yet the moon would lose her duty,
Though her sheen be soft and clear,
Softer is thy beauty!

Fair and kind, and gentle one!
Do not moon, and stars, and flowers
Pay that homage to their sun
That we pay to ours?

Sun of mine, thou art so dear—
Sun, that art above all sorrow!
Shine, I pray thee, on me here
Till the eternal morrow.

THE LITTLE GROWN GREAT.

BY MRS. LYDIA JANE PIERSON.

In a beautiful seaport town in Connecticut, lived a young mechanic, who was not only honest and industrious, but a man of good education and refined sensibilities. He married in early life a lovely girl, who, though a mechanic's daughter, and brought up to labor with her hands, was no whit behind the governor's child in all that makes the real lady. They commenced housekeeping with high hopes and good prospects, but having met with several losses and disappointments, continued poor, and the embargo in 1809 so affected his business that it was with difficulty he could support his family, consisting, besides himself and wife, of four small children—fine chubby little fellows—the two eldest of whom, of five and seven years old, went to school, and were laureled as the best scholars in their respective classes. The parents were proud of them, of course, and looked forward to a day when they would be great and honored.

Mr. M—— inhabited a small, and somewhat dilapidated house—not being able to pay a high rent—which, however, was kept neat and comfortable within, by the tidy hands of Mrs. M——, who, beside doing all the work for her family, and attending most religiously to her little ones, contrived to earn something by sewing; and thus assist her husband to struggle against adversity, as well as soothe and cheer him beneath his heavy burden. So that although they were sometimes without provisions for the morrow, they spake of hope to each other, made their evening oblation of prayer and praise, for they felt that they had much to be thankful for, and lay down and slept sweetly, trusting that good angels guarded their pillows, and that their Father in Heaven would give them day by day their daily bread.

Mr. M—— had a near neighbor, a Mr. W——, who was counted a rich man. He lived in a large white house, and regarded his less fortunate neighbors with ineffable contempt.

It chanced, one summer day, that Mrs. M—— was prevented from finishing a piece of work, which she had promised the next morning, by the illness of her darling babe; and as her husband went to his shop as soon as it was light, and came to breakfast at eight, she rose early, and sat down to finish her work. As she had only to make coffee for breakfast, she allowed her little ones to sleep till seven, and then, as her fire had gone out over night, sent her eldest boy to Mr. W——'s for a coal. (Loco foco matches were not then in use.)

It chanced that the great man was in his kitchen when the child entered, and asked in his pretty, smiling way for fire.

Mr. W—— regarded him with a scowl, and then asked, in a gruff voice—

"Have you had no fire in your house yet to-day?"

"No, sir," said the boy, shrinking involuntarily.

"Are you not hungry?" asked Mr. W——.

"No, sir," again replied the child; "I have only just got up; but mamma has been up a long time, sewing."

"Sewing!" iterated Mr. W——. "Well, I should think you would starve,—though I suppose you are used to live without eating!"

While the gentleman was speaking, his little daughter, a child of seven years, slipped from the room, and as the boy came out, drew her hand, with a cake, from beneath her apron, and holding it out to him, said, with her red lips trembling, and her bright blue eyes full of tears—

"Take it, Willy, and don't be angry now."

"Thank you, Lucy," he said: "but I can't take your cake, oh, no!"—and he hurried away.

The little girl wept bitterly, and he, as soon as he reached home, and had laid his coal on the hearth, crept away beneath a hedge of currants in the garden, and cried till he was quite sick.

Mr. W——, when he thus forgot his manhood, and stopped to taunt a noble boy with the poverty, which, had it even been a fault of his parents, could not have been a reproach to him, had no conception of the cruelty of the action, of the deep envenomed wound which his words had inflicted. Men do not appreciate the sensibility of children. I have often wondered at the inconsiderate manner in which they speak to them, and act toward them, as if they were not only ignorant of the deep and keen sensibilities of childhood, but also of the fact that the children, now regarded and treated like dumb animals, will, in a few years, be men and women, occupying the position from which the present actors in life's drama will have passed away, and bearing on the heart's tablet the indelible impressions of love or fear, esteem or aversion, written there while the heart was tender, and every impression consequently deep and abiding.

Poor Willy felt agonizingly the taunt of Mr. W——, and with it the kindness of little Lucy was chronicled enduringly. Although her offer of the cake at that time was bitter to his insulted pride, and proudly rejected, yet the tenderness of heart that prompted the offer was dear and precious to his wounded spirit.

He could eat no breakfast that morning, but he forbore to wound the feelings of his parents by repeating to them the words of their neighbor, and he resolved to use every endeavor to rise in the world, that he might one day be able to look down upon Mr. W—— from a nobly won eminence.

The wealth in which Mr. W—— prided himself, he had inherited from his father, who, from a blacksmith's apprentice, became, by industry and parsimony, the proprietor of a fine farm. He married late in life, and this one son was his only child. The old man endeavored to educate him well, but he forgot to imbue his childhood with kindness, generosity and truth.

The old man was very proud of the affluence which he had won so painfully, and the deference which people are always ready to pay to the possessor of wealth, however it may have been acquired.

It is by no means wonderful that the son imbibed an exalted opinion of himself, as sole heir to so fine a property: and affected the societies of those whose estates, having been accumulated by grand-fathers or great grand-fathers, were thus one or two grades farther removed from the working classes.

Old Mr. W—— had determined that his son should have a genteel education. He was accordingly sent to college, whence he emerged with a superficial knowledge of many things, yet without having mastered one single science; and, being no book-worm, as he said, he soon forgot every thing that the poor, patient professors had been at such pains to write, line upon line, and precept upon precept, upon a mind hard as iron to the pen of instruction, and which, like ice, lost every impression as soon as the sun and wind of the outer world acted upon it. But he had "been to college," and he felt the most bitter contempt for every one who was not "liberally educated"—a contempt which he was at no pains to conceal. He had married the daughter of a merchant of the city, and on the death of his father, was easily persuaded to sell his fine farm, and to come into partnership with his father-in-law. He was now at the height of his glory; and as he sat in his front parlor, and looked exultingly at the gold lettered sign, upon which his name glistened beside that of one of the oldest and richest merchants in the city, he felt that he desired no higher heaven. No marvel that such a gentleman should stoop to insult a child.

Well, Mr. M—— grew weary of struggling in the city, and living on the refuse of the markets; so he sold the little he possessed, purchased an old horse and wagon, and with little more than his hopeful family, turned his footsteps westward.

Mrs. M—— wept bitterly, when, from the top of a hill she took the last look of her native place, the last farewell of the scenes of morning life, and felt that those places should know her no more forever. But she soon dried her eyes, and turned her face resolutely toward the unexplored region, in which hope whispered she would find a better home.

They travelled wearily onward, and the blind goddess who stands by the way-side, bestowing a guerdon on one of a thousand of the innumerable emigrants who leave home with all its idols, and go forth on a dreary pilgrimage to court her favor, smiled graciously on our travellers, and pointed them to a wealthy place.

Mr. M—— secured a large tract of wild land, on which he erected his cabin, and made rapid improvements. Willy saw, in the dim future, the fulfilment of his one desire, and at the age of ten years, could boast of his expert axemanship, and bring quite a tall beach to the ground.

Our favorites of fortune were blest with continued health. The winters at that time were unusually mild; and every crop and seed which they put into the ground brought forth an hundred fold; and the laying of the Great Western Canal lengthwise through his land so increased its value, that, in a few years, he found himself rich. Willy was then "sent to college," and came home at the age of twenty-four, with a thorough and classical education. He was soon seated amongst the legislators of his State; and such was the confidence reposed in his honor and abilities, by his fellow men, that there was no office so responsible but they were eager to lay its burden on his shoulders.

A few years ago, as he sat with his associates on the seat of judgment, listening to heart-sickening details of sin and misery, amid the poor wretches arraigned for crime against their fellows, were two men charged with burglary and arson. His very soul shrank inward as he recognized in the elder of the two, a man whom he had long forgotten, his father's haughty neighbor, Mr. W——. "This miserable, white-haired felon, clothed with rags, and covered with disgrace," he said to himself, "is the very man against whom I so long have harbored a bitter enmity. Well, I have now my revenge in full—and what is it? A bitter drop. Poor man, I ought never to have envied you." Such were his thoughts as he gazed on the poor man, who was taught in his childhood to "trust in riches," and who, when they forsook him, turned to "wrong and robbery."

It was proven, as the trial progressed, that Mr. W—— and his son-in-law, had many years ago failed in trade, for a large amount, and became miserably poor. It seemed that he had "been used to live without eating," until unable longer to endure, he and his son-in-law—a vain, vicious-tempered fop, who found little difficulty in deceiving both father and daughter, the first, into a belief of his wealth, the other into a firm faith in his worth and pure affection—took to gambling, and other dishonest practices, by which they had obtained a precarious livelihood, until the commission of the crime of which they stood accused.

Toward the close of the trial, a female came into the court-room, muffled in an old camlet cloak, and having her face concealed by an old hood and a thick green veil drawn down over it. She seemed to walk with difficulty, and took a seat just behind the prisoners. There she remained, silent and motionless as a statue, until the jury, having agreed without leaving the box, signified that they had found a verdict. She then clasped her hands with a kind of gasping utterance, and her whole frame shook violently, until, as the word "guilty" fell on her bruised heart, she sunk heavily to the floor. She was carried out, and the just sentence of the law passed upon the two miserable offenders.

"It is well," muttered the old man. "In the penitentiary, I shall at least have food."

That evening, Judge M—— having learned where the poor woman had been conveyed, made her a visit.

As soon as she saw him, she cried wildly—

"Oh! in mercy let me go with them! I have no friend, no home on earth!"

"Compose yourself, madam," he replied, calmly; "something better will, I trust, be done for you.—Pardon me the question, was your husband kind to you?"

"He was, until misfortune urged him to evil courses, which I could not but plead with him against, and then he became irritable, estranged, outrageous. Oh, I have lived miserably with them, but still I had a home, and was under the protection of a husband. But now, I am an outcast! doomed to beggary and insult. I was not taught to labor in my youth; and my accomplishments, though showy, were superficial, and have been all worn away by affliction. I have no way to earn a subsistence, and no one to take me in. Oh, what will become of me?"

"Lucy," said Judge M——, taking her hand, respectively, "I hope you will not retaliate upon me now the pain which I once proudly inflicted upon you. I have never forgotten the morning when you, in your pure and childish charity, proffered little Willy your cake, nor the blush and tear that beautified your sweet little face at my refusal. I will not conceal from you that I hated your father for his cruel words to me that morning, and resolved, one day, to stand above him on the scale of riches and honor. But you may believe me, I am sincerely sorry for his misfortune, and would make any possible sacrifice to take away his guilt, if that could be done. But, Lucy, I cannot save him nor your husband from the penalty of the offended laws. Neither would I, if I could.—They have sinned in the face of the law, and they must abide its vengeance.

"But I have a home, where love, peace, and plenty delight to dwell, and my affectionate Clara finds one of her chief delights in ministering to misfortune.—Come and dwell with us, and we will regard you as a dear sister. I have told Clara the story of little Lucy and her cake, and you shall find, that, although I hurt your gentle heart then, by a refusal, the good deed was not lost nor forgotten, but shall bring you fruit an hundred fold."

Poor Lucy fell sobbing at his feet, but she could not speak her gratitude.

She is still residing in the family of Judge M——, and no inmate of the house considers the amiable and cheerful Aunt Lucy, as she is familiarly called, a burden or a drawback on their interests or their pleasure.

Her father died in the penitentiary, and her husband, as soon as released, took the road to Texas.—But she affirms that she never knew happiness until she found it in the mansion of Judge M——.

This little story is literally true, and its truth is its only recommendation.—[Ladies' Garland for April.

THE OLD LADY AND THE YOUNG LAWYER.

BY ABBOTT LEE.

A solitary light was gleaming in a solitary chamber. Alas! how much sorrow and sadness, and sickness and labour, and toil and trouble, and weeping and wailing, concentrate round the miserable flickerings of the petty tapers which glimmer from the windows of many a closely pent-up chamber, in the avenues of our great metropolis!

But one is enough at a time; so let us look at what it shows us.

It was in one of those close and murky courts which abound in our city, in a house tottering with age, in which the wind sang through the chimneys, with a sort of castanet accompaniment of window rattling, that our one and particular midnight taper was burning. It was one of those lonely spots which seem the more solitary from being in the immediate vicinity of some of those vast thoroughfares through which ebb and flow the daily tides of our mighty population—the mind naturally contrasting the seclusion with the turmoil. Goldsmith and Johnson, however, have lived in such courts, and a great many others both before and after them; and so, too, did our hero.

Well, this hero of ours was sitting by this beforementioned taper's light. He was sitting there at the time our history commences, and he had been sitting there we could not tell how many hours and days, and weeks and months, and years, without doing a sum in arithmetic; and we should but show a fearful substraction from the value of the total of life if we were to deduct the time so spent. Without the aid, however, of units, tens, hundreds, and thousands on our paper, we might read in the wasted cheek, the hollow eye, the stooping shoulder, the hectic flush, the emaciated person of the student who inhabited that dreary chamber, and watched the lonely hours of the night by that faintly glimmering light, an aggregate of time that seemed well-nigh to have swallowed up the better part of his existence. Hard study, deep thought, and stern anxiety, had written, legibly enough, in unmistakable lines, upon the page of our hero's countenance, that life with him had not been passed upon a bed of roses.

The chamber in which our hero sat was on the third story. A certain air of old-fashioned dustiness pervaded it, and it was well littered over with literature. The large table which stood before him was covered with parchments, packages, and papers; two or three shelves behind him were crowded with grave, dry, legal-looking volumes; and, truth to tell, we think that he himself looked as much like a human book as eye could look into or upon.

And the binding? But, no—to begin with the title-page. For ourselves, we confess to a predilection for the pale, sallow, scholar-like complexion of the lonely student—and sallow and saffron-like our hero certainly was; but there was intellect on his brow, soul in his eye, expression on his lip, and mind over all. The spirit was dominant over the corporeal part—and what matter, then, if the loose coat in which his wasted limbs were enwrapped looked worn and rusty, and his garments fretted by time! It was but just and fit that the soul should be above the body; and it is more than probable that Oliver Paulett would have been a reckless dresser, had he been rich instead of poor.

So, then, he was poor? Ay, he was poor; witness his meagre chamber, his scant apparel, his intent and intense industry.

What was he doing? Why, dear reader, he was paving the high roads of literature: he was correcting for the press. He was poring over a sheet of the shabbiest paper in the world, which reeked the while with odorous oil, and was murky with lamp-black, making hieroglyphical signs in the margin, whereby it was to be understood by the initiated, that certain letters were to be transposed, certain points restored, certain interpolations banished, certain nonsense to be transmuted into sense; in fact, he was transfusing a certain amount of orthography, etymology, syntax, and prosody, into certain columns, and pages, and paragraphs, and sheets, and volumes. In short, dear reader, he was modelling the obscure scrawl I am now writing into the easy text you are now reading; and, if breaking stones on the highway be a labour, all that we can say is, that it is mere child's play to that whereby Oliver Paulett won his daily bread.

Poor fellow! how sadly that high brow was getting wrinkled—how dim was growing the tired eye—how jaded the worn spirit! But still he laboured on: midnight left him at his toils, and the half-dozenth hour of the morning found him there again.

But on the night in question Oliver Paulett spent an extra hour with a pen in his hand, writing a letter full of the kindest hypocrisy to his mother; introducing here and there a pun, or a sly touch of satire, and a dash of mirth, redolent of hope and good spirits, charging her to be happy, for his sake, and doing all that he could to make her so, by telling her of his own hopes, his own contentment, his own conviction of ultimate success in life; declining, however, still her often-urged wish, that she might follow him to town, and share his lot; but hoping soon for the day when they might be again united, and trusting and believing that it could not be far distant; charging her, the while, to be careful of her own comfort, and to use the remittance which he sent her cheerily, and not grudgingly.

We suppose that we must not eulogize hypocrisy in any shape, though we could find it in our hearts to do so. The hypocrisy of true affection seems to us as loveable as the hyyocrisy of duplicity is hateful.

The clock of St. Bride's told one as the poor student finished his letter, and cast his eye around his lonely chamber.

"Nay, my mother," he soliloquized, "how would thine eye shrink and shudder, couldst thou look upon me at this hour! Nay, be happy in thine ignorance of my real position, and rest in the retirement of thy flowery cottage, whilst I grapple with the world in this gladiatorial strife. I may—I must conquer, and then my home shall be thy home." And, with this last thought uppermost in his mind, the poor student betook him to his pillow.

Industry and perseverance!—what noble things these be! What a brave thing it is to see a man, buoyed up with the spirit of a man, stemming the broad tide of adversity, and the world's disfavour!—And we hold that our hero was a hero, because he was doing this. Under the stern necessity of winning, not only his own daily bread, but that of another, he had determined upon emerging from his present enforced position. To do this, he laboured like a slave; reducing his own simple wants to the very narrowest compass, the scantiest measure of the aliment of life, and spending the remaining hours of his prime in studying for the law. Through the drudgery of present toil, he looked for future independence, perhaps for fame. Already his name was enrolled; and he grudged himself pause, cessation, rest, respite, nay, even food and sleep, until he was called to the bar.

Well, it is odd how many little worlds may be packed up under the same roof, without getting mixed; what a many actors may be performing, without getting jostled; what a many threads of destiny may be weaving, without getting entangled, and what a vast deal of sympathy a slight wooden partition may shut out.

In another apartment of the same dwelling, sheltered by the same roof, and divided from the poor student's domicil but by a few intervening panels, was compacted another little household, within four walls of still closer compression, and looking out upon the back instead of the front, over a perfect forest of chimneys, the clouds from which were genegally gathering up into a somewhat dusky veil over the brow of the bright summer sky.

There stood in this dull, monotonous chamber, a large antiquity of an easy chair, covered with faded damask that had once been rich and brilliant, but now looked only like a relic and remembrance of better days. There was something melancholy in its faded grandeur, and a great discrepancy between its high pretensions and the mean deal table, the fragment of shabby carpet, and the couple of comfortless rush-bottomed chairs, which made up the garniture of the apartment; and yet there was a fitness between the seat and its occupant.

There sat, from morning till night, in this right regal chair of state, a stiff, erect, tall, stately, ancient lady, whose pride of mien appeared but to wax the greater in her supreme contempt for all her surrounding poverty. Her light blue eye seemed to glitter its contempt for every thing around her, and her foot to spurn the very footstool on which it rested for support. Her own dress was composed of flowered satin, of a kind that had once been rich, rare, and costly, but which now did but hint a memory of its former glory, it was so faded and fretted, and had so fallen into the sear and yellow leaf. And yet this ancient lady retained the stamp and impress of no ordinary beauty; the oval face still preserved its fine proportions, the fair complexion was not utterly dimmed, the eye retained its light, the lip its pride.

On one of the twain rush-bottomed chairs, opposite this stately dame, sat her contrast and yet her counterpart: a fair young girl, with the same oval face, the same clear blue eye, the same well-cut lip, a complexion with even less of the fresh red rose, but more, far more of the unfaded lily,—but, while thus alike in form, how different was the expression!

This young girl was very busily employed twisting and twirling sundry wire threads, and coloured fragments of gauzes, and we know not what, in various ins and outs between her fingers.

"There, grandmamma, I have finished my task at last!" exclaimed the young girl, poising on her finger a wreath, composed of the most delicate of orange-blossoms, which she had been fabricating out of the above-mentioned shreds and patches,—"I have finished, grandmamma; and I hope the bride who is to wear this will be happy. To-morrow she will be a countess."

"Thou thyself oughtest to be in her place, instead of thus meanly weaving her bridal coronal. Oh, that I should live to see the day when a daughter of the House of Rohillaire is thus reduced to the labours of the mechanic! Girl, look not so delighted that thy task is done, but rather bewail the degradation of its doing!"

"Dear grandmamma, I finish my labour in the hope of a double blessing. May this bridal coronal bring happiness to its wearer, and peace to us with the day's food which its payment will procure us!"

"And thou hast the blood of Rohillaire in thy veins, and yet art content to earn thy daily bread!"

"Is it not better so, than dependence or destitution?"

"And you call not this destitution?" exclaimed the old lady, glancing her proud eye scornfully around. "A beggar's garret for the halls of Rohillaire, smoky chimneys for its verdant woods, and red tiles for its broad meadows! Girl, girl, thou lackest the spirit of thy ancestors!"

Joanna hung her head in silence, and a tear fell upon her wreath of orange-blossoms.

"And I—I too, lack the spirit of my sires, else I should not scorn the bitter morsel! Had not my own soul become adulterated and debased, from its high and legitimate estate, should I not now refuse the contamination of the mechanic's meal, and die, as I have lived—a Rohillaire! But the weakness of my heart binds me to thee, when I look upon thee; for thou hast the lineaments of thy race, though without their spirit; and for thy sake——"

"Dear grandmamma," exclaimed Joanna, as starting nimbly from her seat she dashed away her tears, and kissed the old lady's wrinkled brow; "dear grandmamma, now I am happy again!"

And so saying, Joanna Rohillaire carefully packed up her bridal wreath of orange-blossoms, and tying on her own simple straw bonnet with a smile, a sigh, and a kiss, tripped out of the room, planning how she might make the price of her labour procure some little luxury for the old lady of Rohillaire. And yet Joanna Rohillaire had sat up the greater portion of the night weaving this bridal wreath for the brow of another.

The poor student, however, who lived in the next room, had done more; he had been tempted to undertake some literary labour on pecuniary grounds, which required an almost impossible expedition; and he had sat for two days and two nights without moving from his task. Now it happened that just as the poor flower-girl completed her bridal wreath, the poor student finished his literary labour, and simultaneously they left their domiciles to carry home the fruits of their respective exertions. The poor student, however, had done too much violence to nature to escape with impunity; and no sooner had he emerged into the changing atmosphere of the landing-place, than he dropped fainting on the floor. When he revived, it was to find the kindest eyes in the world beaming over him, the gentlest hands bathing his brow, the sweetest voice in the world asking if he were better.

The lady of Rohillaire was sitting in her brocaded chair, and her brocaded dress, as stiff, as erect, as stately, as proud, and as high and mighty as ever on one side of the little deal table, doing nothing; and Joanna, on the other, very busily employed with all her implements spread out before her, fabricating buds and blossoms, that were all but nature, and at least second-best, when a gentle knock come to their door, and was followed by the entrance of the poor student himself.

"I hope," said Oliver Paulett, "that the motive of my intrusion will be its apology. Unspoken gratitude seems a heavy burden, and I come to express mine, for the condescending kindness which I have received at your hands."

"Gratitude" and "condescending kindness!" no form of expression could better have propitiated the pride of the old lady of Rohillaire; and though the poor student looked towards Joanna, it was the former who replied,

"However fallen we may appear, sir, we belong to a race whose province it has ever been to give rather than receive. Whatever aid, in your illness or necessity, Miss Rohillaire had it in her power to bestow, it behooved her to render; and to such, you were very welcome."

"I did nothing—but I hope you are better," hastily, and with a deep blush, said Joanna.

The poor student's clear, scrutinizing eye glanced from one to the other, and he bowed to each.

"You may sit, sir—be pleased to sit," said the old lady of Rohillaire, waving her hand, with the style of royalty, towards the shabby rush-bottomed chair. "Though even in our fallen fortunes, we would not hold companionship with plebeians, yet you seem ill, sir, and a Rohillaire must ever remember that it is the prerogative of her birthright to succour and protect; therefore be pleased to sit, sir."

Again the poor student's clear eye looked up into the face of the old lady of Rohillaire; but without resenting the mode of her proffered courtesy, he accepted it, and took the sole remaining chair of their costly chamber.

"May I be allowed to say, that I rejoice in the accident which has introduced me to your notice," said our hero, "and at the same time I cannot help wondering how an inhabitant of the same dwelling could be so long ignorant of his vicinity to such superior neighbours." And again the poor student bowed to each of the ladies.

"You have breeding, young man—you have breeding: and I should not wonder if you are of gentle birth," said the old lady of Rohillaire.

"I am almost ashamed to own how closely the pride of a good descent from an old county family clings to me in all that I do," replied the poor student; "more especially when pride and poverty, in my own case, make such a sorry partnership."

"Ashamed!" exclaimed the old lady of Rohillaire. "Ashamed! Be ashamed of thy shame, young man! One drop of the blood of an ancient pedigree must still shine out through all the mists of poverty, manifesting more true nobility than mines of wealth can emulate."

"But still pretensions so ill supported may be better laid aside;" said Oliver Paulett.

"There is something degenerate in this age!" said the old lady of Rohillaire. "Even the daughter of our house, whom I have nurtured from a child, and to whom the high dignity of her race has been as a daily lesson, I cannot teach at all times to remember that she owes to the princely blood which flows through her veins, a princely honour. Humility is the virtue of plebeians and menials. I grant that in them it is a virtue; and yet I cannot cure her of this, in one of her race, debasing quality."

"Dear grandmamma," said Joanna, a tear in her eye and a blush on her cheek, as she went on twisting and twirling her buds and blossoms together; "you know that you were born the lady of Rohillaire, and I was born——"

"A beggar, wouldst thou say, Joanna? Well, and could we exchange places, thinkest thou that I would delve with my fingers for——"

"Dear grandmamma!" hastily deprecated poor Joanna, with a face burnt up with blushes.

"Well! well! it need not to have been so, were not might stronger than right, in this world. But it is the law, sir, the law, which rules men. The world is right in that, at least. It is the law which robs the widow of her portion, the orphan of her birth-right! It is the law, sir!—the law, sir! I detest lawyers!"

"I grieve to hear you say so," replied the poor student, "since it is to the law that I look for a revival of my own fortunes."

"How so, sir?—how so?"

"I am hoping, some of these days, to be called to the bar."

"A base calling it is, sir! A base calling! Land that girl have been pillaged of the revenues of Rohillaire by a piece of the law's base trickery! At this moment another sits in my place, and the child of a churl will heir my father's house and lands instead of my own gentle Joanna; and all because of the law, sir!—because of the law, sir!"

"Dear grandmamma," said Joanna, "let not the past embitter the present."

"And for my part, I cannot but regret that any word of mine should have called up associations so painful," said the poor student; "and I will take my leave, once more expressing my gratitude to Miss Rohillaire for her kind humanity, and to you, madam, for your condescending reception."

"Young man, young man, I have not met with a single being possessing so much gentlemanly feeling since I left the halls of Rohillaire."

"May I then be permitted sometimes to inquire after your health? Sometimes to have the pleasure of a quarter of an hour's conversation?"

"You may come, young man, you may come. A descendant of the house of Rohillaire could never play the churl."

From that time forward the poor student availed himself of the ancient lady's permission, and seldom a day passed without the gentle knock at their chamber-door announcing his approach; and this came at last to be as much a matter of habit as it is usually customary for the sun to rise. Day after day, the old lady of Rohillaire, sitting in her own august chair of state, inclined her gracious head to the young lawyer, on his entrance; day after day, with the same condescending dignity, she waved him to the same old rush-bottomed chair; day after day Joanna blushed when he came, and sighed when he went; day after day the old lady bewailed her lost estates, and enjoyed the comfort of complaining; and day after day the young one talked less and felt more.

And so the lonely lives of all were comforted. Instead of the dreary blank of unmitigated labour, there came little bright spots of verdure in the desert, nurtured by the sunshine of hope. It is, indeed, wonderful how the aspects of things change, when the light of the heart is turned upon them. Both poor Joanna and the poor student had the same amount of labour, the same toils, the same cares; but how much more cheerily were they now gone through, because each now had an energizing influence within; and the glad spirit is all potent, while the jaded one is drooping, sluggish and inert. It is true that Joanna went on weaving flowers, which, being done with peculiar taste and skill, found a constant market; but these flowers now were twice as lovely, since the poor student tapped at her door every morning to present her with some bud or blossom, some cluster, or some spray, which immediately became her study for the day; and being thus associated with a sentiment, not only influenced a fairer copying of Nature's loveliness, but kept the heart of poor Joanna intent upon the donor; and thus her affections became the sweetness of her labours, like the odours which hung around the blossoms which her fingers mimicked. Neither was the old lady of Rohillaire forgotten: the poor student, evening after evening, supplied her with some new book, over which she would pore, during the hours of the day; and at eventide, just the half hour of twilight between the day and the night, she waited quite as naturally, and almost as anxiously for his knock at the door; and whilst he listened to her reproaches of the world for its baseness, and she experienced the nothings of his sympathy, the very world which she has vituperating, almost grew into favour.

And the poor student? He was actually in better health, even though he laboured more to meet his new extravagance in books and flowers; and the secret was this—he was happier.

Well, it happened as usual, that evening came, and, as usual, came the poor student's tap at the door of his neighbour's tenement; but not as usual came the light footstep of Joanna to open it for him, and to welcome him with a sweet smile, and a silvery word, and a glad gesture, all the while utterly unconscious that she was not looking very starched and demure; but instead of this came the harsher voice of the old lady of Rohillaire bidding him enter; and when he did so, it was to feel that the dull chamber was as dreary as emptiness could make it—Joanna was absent.

Nevertheless, though feeling mightily blank and disappointed, he made his usual bow, received his usual wave to the rush-bottomed chair, dropped into his usual attitude of listening sympathy, and heard the voice of the old lady of Rohillaire despairing, as usual, the loss of her estates, the tyranny of the law, and the villainy of lawyers.

Now, 'tis a well-known fact, that people may live in the vicinity of sledge-hammers until they have forgotten that they are considered rather noisy; and thus Oliver Paulett had heard the old lady of Rohillaire talk of her wrongs, from the first moment of their acquaintance, quite as a matter of course; and so long as he could sit and look at Joanna twisting and twirling her pretty fingers, and see a blush mantling her cheek every time her eye met his, he was content to listen, or to seem to listen. In fact, under these circumstances, he had proved himself the best auditor in the world; but now that he saw nothing but Joanna's empty chair, the matter was altogether different. He began to have an idea that he could be bored by Joanna's grandmamma when Joanna was not present, however impossible that might be when she was; and then he fell into a reverie as to how all this was to end; and then he remembered that he was about as poor as Job; and then he supposed it more than possible that he might never, as long as he lived, get a single brief, and then—and then——

"And so you see, Mr. Paulett, our estates were lost to us all through the villainy of that base man, that lawyer!" said the harsh voice of the old lady of Rohillaire, in her loudest accents, as though she doubted his hearing.

The poor student started from his reverie: the untuned voice seemed to awaken him from his dream. "And why," said he to himself, "why have I always taken it for granted that this old woman's complainings could be nothing more than maudlin mistake?—Why have I never investigated the matter for her sake? Simply, I suppose, because I have been so engrossed with thoughts of her, that I forgot even all that belonged to her."

"My dear madam," said the poor student, drawing his humble rush-bottomed seat nearer to the chair of state, "since you have honoured me so far as frequently to allude to the circumstances which led to the loss of your estates, perhaps you will now favour me with their recapitulation."

"Have I not narrated them a hundred times at least?" retorted the old lady; "if they interested you so little as to be so soon forgotten, why should I trouble you with their revival?"

"It is because they interest me so much, that I presume to beg their recapitulation."

"Be it so, sir," replied the old lady of Rohillaire; and thereupon she commenced anew the recital of her wrongs; and this time, and for the first time, the young lawyer listened attentively, bringing to bear upon the case all his legal knowledge, and the full scrutiny of his really searching mind. As the old lady proceeded, the brow of her listener knitted itself into lines of thoughtful attention, and his lips compressed; at the close of this hundred-times-told tale, he put to her a few clear-headed, lawyer-like questions, the replies to which seemed, by the clearing expression of his countenance, to be perfectly satisfactory.

"And these papers, my dear madam; these papers! Are they safe—are they in your own keeping?"

"I have them here in this little box, safe in my own keeping, under lock and key, together with a pedigree of the Rohillaires. I could not suffer my Joanna to be deprived of that."

"And will you entrust me with them? Suffer me to investigate them? Something must—something ought—something shall be done!"

"Willingly, young man. There is the box; there is the key; take them," said the old lady: "when was ever a Rohillaire suspicious?"

Without a single word of compliment or comment, without ever waiting Joanna's return, the young lawyer took the box and the key, returned to his own chamber, locked himself in, lit his lamp, and spent the whole of the hours of the ensuing night and day in investigating an assortment of musty, fusty, rusty, dusty, moulded, faded, stained, yellow and discoloured papers and parchments; all full of the crooked, bewildering, not-meant-to-be-understood hieroglyphics of the law.

Our pale student was paler still when he knocked at the Rohillaires' door on the succeeding evening, and poor Joanna was pale enough, too, when she opened it; for neither had he waited for a sight of her on the preceding evening, nor brought her the morning flower which usually sweetened her day; but all minor considerations were forgotten in the annunciation of his legal opinion that Rohillaire was not lost for ever! that it needed only honest advice and energetic endeavour to restore to the old lady her lost inheritance.

The old lady of Rohillaire clasped her hands together in a passion of emotion: "Penniless, as we are, where are the means to be gained?"

There was silence over the little group, and then the proud old lady bursting into the first tears that Joanna had ever seen her shed, exclaimed in accents of despair, "It is impossible! we must give up Rohillaire!"

"Madam," said the young lawyer, his own pale face actually scorched with the burning blood—"you know my position in life—you know to what my endeavours point. I could much have wished that your good cause had been placed in better hands, more able and experienced ones; but if this cannot be compassed, will you place it in mine?"

"Never shall you repent the day that you served and aided a Rohillaire!" exclaimed the old lady, as she held out her hand to him for the first time during their acquaintance, and which now the young lawyer had the tact to kiss.

No longer the time passed cheerily in that old house,—in that old court—in the old city. A lawsuit was pending; wrinkles were writing themselves very legibly on the brow of the poor student; anxiety sighed out on the lips of Joanna; and the old lady of Rohillaire felt that the struggles of hope were more distracting than the quiescence of despair. But under whatever shade of colour the chamelion—time pass, still pass it will, and thus at last the day came that the young lawyer stood with his first brief in his hand, to plead the cause of the fatherless and widow at the bar of his country; and if for a moment diffidence, and the dread of rather injuring than aiding clients for whom his feelings were so deeply interested, somewhat clouded his faculties, yet with the usual operation of great motives on great minds, he speedily rallied, and with the coolest precision and most admirable presence of mind, watched every turn of the proceedings, taking instant advantage of every admission and omission of his antagonists, while in a speech of no common power, replete with legal knowledge, vigorous argument, and energetic eloquence, he at once persuaded and convinced. In truth, never was made a more successful début on the bar's arena, than this of our poor student on this memorable occasion. O, the joy of that triumph! it was worth all the sleepless hours he had ever spent poring over his midnight taper. Before he could get out of court, he had sundry briefs thrust upon him; but this was nothing to the ecstacy of telling Joanna that he had saved her inheritance: and yet there was sorrow in that, too, for did not her inheritance divide her from him?

Sooth to say, that was a proud day when the old lady of Rohillaire turned her stately back upon the little, mean, narrow, upstairs room, where they had so long sojourned with its beggarly garniture of triple chairs, and its deal table, and whatever else of garnishing it boasted, heretofore seeming of importance, but now disdainfully left behind. It was a proud day, we say, when the old lady of Rohillaire turned her back upon the poverty-stricken chamber, and rustling in the richest brocades that money could procure, paced down in velvet-stepped disdainfulness the time-worn, discoloured, creaking staircase, hanging on the arm of the young lawyer, whilst Joanna, almost blinded by tears, clung tottering to the other. As for the poor student, he looked paler than ever as he thus marshalled his clients away from the spot that had proved so eventful to the history of his heart, as well as his life. As for the organs of speech, they were all sadly out of tune; the old lady of Rohillaire being the only one of the trio in possession of her voice. As for poor Joanna, we verily believe that she loved the little dusky chamber they were leaving, better than the vaunted halls of Rohillaire, to which they were going; the gloomy court to the fair fields, and open valleys, and—could it be?—poverty and toil near the poor student, better than wealth away from him.

As for the poor student, he only felt that he was losing all that he most cared for upon this earth; and the only alleviation of his feelings was to know, that the happy action which had made him miserable, had been done by himself. Eloquent, however, as he had been in a court of law, he was dumb enough in that court of the city, and it was not till he had carefully bestowed the old lady of Rohillaire, brocade and all, in her travelling carriage, and had gently placed the sorrowful Joanna by her side, that he felt that he must speak whether he would or not.

"Well, Mr. Lawyer," said the old lady of Rohillaire, attempting jocularity almost for the first time in her life, "Well, Mr. Lawyer, your pockets are so crammed and stuffed out with briefs, that you could hardly squeeze yourself within the doors of my carriage; so, for this time, I shall not ask you: but term time will give you liberty in a month, and then you must come down to us at Rohillaire."

"You must excuse me!" hastily and rather brusquely answered the young lawyer; "I am swallowed up in business. I had better not. No! I must not—I cannot!"

The bright, sharp, clear blue eye of the old lady of Rohillaire glittered over him. "Must not, and cannot—to a lady—to a Rohillaire—to me—to your friend! and 'swallowed up in business!' Why, Sir, I want you upon business, too. I want you to investigate the long arrears of Rohillaire; and I want to pay you for your services."

"Pay me!" passionately exclaimed the young lawyer, while again the offended blood poured into his cheeks—"Pay me!"

"Aye, aye: pay you—unless you choose to refuse my price."

"I do refuse it—now and for ever!"

"Well, it shall be as you please—I shall not force it upon you; but at any rate, you must come and see our Rohillaire—and the books. This day month, I shall expect you."

The little, ugly, ungracious monosyllable "no," that disgrace to our language, floated upon the lips the young lawyer; but, just whilst it hesitated upon the threshold, he caught an appealing, almost an entreating glance from Joanna's blue eyes, and the word died ere it was born.

"I shall expect you," said the pertinacious old lady of Rohillaire, "just this day month. As I told you before, I want you to look over the accounts, and I want to pay you:" and at these words the carriage whirled off, leaving the young lawyer standing, much hurt, more indignant, but most sorrowing.

The poor lawyer—ah, no! not now the poor lawyer, for briefs had lately poured in so fast upon him, that he stood fair to be soon the rich lawyer—was true to his appointment. He went to Rohillaire because he could not stay away.

As the post-chaise which carried him wound up the sweep to the entrance, and his eye wandered over the fair domain, the noble terraces, and the fine old mansion of Rohillaire, he said, internally, "Aye, now, adieu to hope! the heiress of Rohillaire is no fit bride for Oliver Paulett, though the poor flower-making girl might have been his cherished wife. I have placed an insuperable barrier between myself and my own happiness, but I cannot wish it otherwise."

So our hero left his chaise, but was grievously put to the blush at seeing the old lady of Rohillaire standing on the very steps of her own mansion, to receive him—a condescension which, it is more than doubtful, she would not have offered to royalty,—with hands extended to welcome him, with Joanna blushing and smiling at her side.

"My dear friend," said the old lady of Rohillaire, "welcome to the home which is of your own restoring; welcome both to home and heart!"

The young lawyer could not speak; but the old lady of Rohillaire, passing her arm through his with the air of an affectionate queen, led him through the double file of domestics, who had been so marshalled to do him honour. The poor lawyer was far more bewildered at this moment, than when he had been addressing judge and jury; and, in fact, he scarcely knew where he was, until he found himself standing at the bay-window of a fine antiquated spacious saloon, full of old furniture and old pictures, and looking out on a noble terrace, which commanded an extensive view of richly-wooded and well-watered country.

"You look on Rohillaire!" said the old lady proudly, as with high-wrought satisfaction she followed his eye around; "can you wonder that in alienation, banishment, bereavement and destitution, my heart still clung to the home of my fathers; for when I married, my husband took my name. I took not his—my birth-place, the home of my life, until my sorrows came! You look upon Rohillaire, and now tell me what price can clear me of my vast debt for its restoration?"

"I desire nothing;" said the young lawyer, vainly endeavouring to control his emotion, "I desire nothing but permission to leave you at this moment, and for ever!"

"And we to keep you here from this moment and for ever. Come now, I will offer you my price of payment for the restoration of Rohillaire, though you did refuse it so stoutly by anticipation." And, as she spoke, the old lady of Rohillaire put Joanna's hand in his. "You are well-born, and think you I was blind to your generous affection, whilst it was so purely disinterested, or am I ungrateful for all that you have done, or that I do not now see and feel your honourable scruples? I said that I would pay you, and I pay you thus: You will take the name of Rohillaire, and henceforth be to me a son in name as well as in affection."

The young lawyer's emotions stifled his utterance. "Enough! enough!" exclaimed the old lady of Rohillaire. "To be a Rohillaire is to be generous.—Said I not that you should never regret serving and aiding a Rohillaire!"

WHERE SHALL MY GRAVE BE?

BY MISS LEE.

Where shall my grave be—where?
And can one heart be found
That doth a human impress bear,
And treads this being's narrow bound,
That hath not look'd o'er earth's wide face,
And sought to find its resting place?

There is not one, for thought
Is given unto all;
And man, though with vain passions fraught,
Can never hush its secret call;
Existence hardly knows its worth,
Before it learns of "earth to earth."

There are some hours in life,
When the free soul must spurn
Its turmoil and its empty strife,
And, like the weary captive, yearn
To burst the bar that seems so frail,
And lift the future's inner veil.

No matter where we lie,
Together or apart,
Whether our friend or foe be nigh,
Yet it seems pleasant to the heart,
To claim a fellowship of clay,
With those we lov'd in being's day.

The grave can yield no breath
To make its secrets known,
Yet with the mystery of death,
There comes a soft, clear under tone,
Low whisp'ring that a presence dwells,
Unknown to us, in those dark cells.

Each living soul, perchance,
Springing from out its tent,
In glorious intercourse may glance
Amid the boundless firmament,
Then resting in its fragile mould,
Mingle a knowledge all untold.

Alas! their fitting theme,
No mortal tongue can tell;
We, earth's poor prisoners, cannot dream
Of mind, when bursting from its shell,
It soars to an immortal sky,
And seeks to find immensity.

Too daring is the thought,
For being's narrow space;
These needless yearnings must be taught
Their fruitlessness, till face to face,
We meet upon that stormy shore,
From whence the lost return no more.

Yet may my last abode
Be where a loving hand
May deck with flowers my burial sod,
And make the spot a pleasant land
For souls to rest in, when they hold
Communion, as in days of old.

LAURA MAY;
OR, THE EVENING HYMN.

BY THE AUTHORESS OF "THE SEMINOLE."

Chapter I.

"Stop, Charles, listen! Did you ever hear such a voice? Pray stop!"

Such was the exclamation of Francis Green to his friend Charles Somers, as he caught his arm, and almost compelled a compliance with his wishes. The air to which they listened was very beautiful, but it was the voice of the unseen songstress that thrilled the hearts of the friends, as she sang an Evening Hymn, set to a fine melody of Mozart; and the solemn words were occasionally heard, blessing God for the mercies of the day. The dwelling before which they paused, was one of the smallest size, in a narrow and obscure street in the upper part of New York, and Charles Somers thought, and said, as he looked on its dingy walls and small windows, that were he compelled to call that tenement home, he should think he had but few blessings for which to be thankful.

The hour was twilight, just deepening into night, yet as the friends lingered for the last notes of the hymn, they could see that the curtain which shaded the single front window was of snowy whiteness, and the faint perfume of the modest Mignonette came stealing out upon the night-air from the window-sill, where a little pot was placed. The singer ceased, and the young men passed on; but had they paused a moment longer, and drawn a few steps nearer that open window, they might have heard the low murmuring sound of the Evening Prayer, commending the widow and the fatherless to the orphan's God. Many were the conjectures of the friends, as they walked slowly, respecting the unseen musician.

"How beautiful she must be!" exclaimed the enthusiastic Green. "It was the voice of an angel. Ah, I pity her; condemned to a life of labor, such as must necessarily be the lot of any one living in such a home."

"Do not exhaust all your sympathy on the 'great unknown,'" laughed his merry companion; "perhaps she sung a lullaby to some little soulless-looking morsel of mortality, and you may be dreaming of an angel who only exists in the shape of Mrs. John Smith, some good, honest carter's wife."

A real feeling of pain thrilled the heart of the first speaker, at the careless and idle words of young Somers; for the melody of those sweet tones had touched a chord which had never vibrated before in the bosom of the sensitive and almost visionary student. His friend was half right, however, when he called it a lullaby, for it soothed into calmness the wrung heart of the invalid Mrs. May, who sat supported by pillows, too feeble to join in the song of praise, and almost too weak to place her hand in that of her darling Laura, as she knelt by the side of her mother's arm-chair. But he was wrong in his ironical suggestion of a husband, for the inmates of that apartment were literally alone in the world, with neither husband, father nor brother to protect them.

The room in which they were, was of extremely narrow dimensions, but scrupulously clean; and though an uncurtained bed, which had evidently been occupied during the day, filled nearly one half of it, nothing else showed it to be the chamber of the sick; for Laura thought—as we do—that when the mind is sympathizing with the enfeebled frame of the sufferer, none but pleasant sights or sounds should be allowed to meet the eye or ear. And as no one, surely, can call a whole colony of half-filled, nauseous-looking phials, or a long array of ominous cups and spoons on table or mantel-piece, a pleasant picture, the whole sad paraphernalia of sickness had been carefully removed. A few mementos of former affluence were in the room; the foot of Mrs. May rested on a delicately-wrought ottoman, and near her stood a beautiful work-table, on which lay the large family Bible, from which Laura had read till the twilight obscured the page. It needed not, however, these silent witnesses to tell of better days. One glance at the gentle mother, or graceful daughter, told the tale, in characters not to be mistaken. 'Tis true, poor Laura had lost much of the bright bloom which had once made her rather plain face look almost beautiful—and her hands might have excited the disgust and scorn of those novel-reading young ladies who imagine a fair hand the distinctive mark of a lady—but she had sacrificed her roses on the altar of filial affection; and the said young ladies (who perhaps wear gloves at night) might have envied her the heartfelt pleasure she enjoyed, while performing the tasks which had defaced her beautifully formed hands, for the sunshine of an approving conscience was ever upon her path.

The history of their reverses is but the rehearsal of an oft-told tale; but there are few who have gone down with such uncomplaining fortitude and calmness, from the summit of prosperity to such a depth of misfortune, as Mrs. May and her daughter Laura. Mr. May had been the only child of wealthy parents, who, dying, bequeathed him a considerable fortune, which, by steady attention to business, had been greatly increased; and his highest earthly gratification had been to surround the dear objects of his affection with all the luxuries of nature and art. He chose his home near a beautiful southern city, and for a few years enjoyed more domestic happiness than usually falls to the lot of any one, till in an evil hour he performed that act for a friend which has ruined so many—he endorsed notes to a large amount. The speculation in which the money thus obtained was invested, promised a large return, and it brought it—but it was only one of trouble and sorrow to all concerned. Mr. May was doomed to fully realize the truth of the remark, that "misfortunes, like stars, are clustered into constellations;" for loss succeeded loss, and last of all, a terrible fire consumed an immense establishment in which he was a silent partner, and many, many thousands of his wealth were swept away, like the smoke in which it ascended, reducing his once princely fortune to a bare competence. It was then Mr. May decided on removing to New York, where he believed a more favorable opportunity offered of engaging in a small business than at the South. His wife was an orphan, alone, like himself; so no domestic tie would be severed when they should leave his adopted home, and it needed but a short time to dispose of the beautiful spot it had been their pride and pleasure to adorn. Laura was at that time just fourteen, a happy, joyous child, and although nature had been niggardly in her gift of beauty, she had bestowed her rarest treasures of mind on the graceful girl. Her voice, too, was pronounced by all to be "magnificent" when she sang, but when she spoke,

"You heard her words like voices that o'er the water's creep,
Or like a sercnader's lute that mingles with your sleep."

And this rich gift of nature had been carefully cultivated by the excellent masters employed by the fond father. She was small, and of slight form, which promised, however, to be of perfect symmetry, and her hands were of unrivalled beauty. Mr. May finally removed to New York, and took up his abode in a pleasant street, where for a short time fortune seemed to smile upon his endeavours; but it was very short, and just as he became convinced that he was inextricably involved, he was seized by a fever, which terminated fatally. No doubt his illness was aggravated, if not produced by his mental struggles—but when his affairs were investigated, his debts were all paid, and no stain rested on his memory.

His wife and child were literally left almost penniless, but they were comforted by the thought that no one else suffered through their misfortunes. The pleasant house was given up, the servants dismissed, with the exception of one young Irish girl, and Mrs. May took up her abode in the narrow street, where she still lived.

Poor Laura was grieved at being deprived of her teachers, and sadly she missed her piano and guitar, while often in her dreams she heard the song of her pet birds which she had loved so dearly; but she was careful to conceal such regrets from her mother, and the only luxuries she begged from their former home were a few pots of her favorite flowers, and under her care the geraniums flourished in the little confined yard, as beautifully as in the largest area in the city. The mignonette had been "dear father's favorite," and the little pot was daily carried from the back to the front window, to receive the afternoon as well as the morning sunshine.

And now it was that all the latent energies of her character were developed—for her mother, whose health was ever delicate, sank under the blow of her husband's death, and lay for weeks as helpless as an infant. Laura scarcely left her bedside, and the physician said Mrs. May owed her life to the untiring love and care of her daughter. The doctor's bill had been paid, and their resources had failed, for notwithstanding Laura had proved herself a good economist, many expenses had been unavoidably incurred during that long illness, and when she had paid the last quarter's rent, she had but five dollars remaining, two dollars of which were due the servant. She laid awake nearly all that night, endeavoring to arrange her plans for the future, and felt that hereafter the relative position of parent and child was reversed: that she must be the protector—her mother the object of her tenderest care.

In pursuance of the line of conduct marked out for herself, when she arose in the morning, her first duty was to call the girl to receive her arrears of wages, for she would not employ one whom there was no reasonable hope of being able to pay. Honest Martha at first positively refused to go, when she learned the reason of her dismissal—said she would stay and risk being paid, for she was strongly attached to both Mrs. May and Laura—and at last only consented to leave on condition of being allowed to return when "Miss Laura should get tired of being her own servant," which time Martha prophecied was not far distant. She had been in Mr. May's family from the time of their arrival in New York, and came to them with her warm Irish heart nearly crushed by the cold, unfeeling treatment of her first employers in America—so that while the kindness and forbearance of this amiable family seemed doubly cheering to the poor emigrant, it bound her by strong ties of gratitude to them all.

Mrs. May wept bitter tears when she learned from Laura the exact state of their finances, and knew that the fair daughter whom she loved with all a mother's devoted fondness, must labor for her support; but the urgent necessity of forming some definite plan, and the cheerfulness with which Laura spoke of the future, soon calmed the first burst of her grief.

They had formed an acquaintance with an enterprising widow who kept a small store near them, and they determined through her means to dispose of their few remaining trinkets and rich articles of apparel, in order to create a small fund upon which to rely in case of emergency, while they trusted she would be able to procure plain or ornamental needlework for Laura, sufficient to supply their daily wants. In both she was successful;—from the sale of their little effects she brought them fifty dollars, and at the same time a large bundle of work, with the promise of a constant supply. It would doubtless have excited the surprise of some young ladies, had they seen how Laura's fine dark eyes sparkled, as she received the parcel of shirts, over which she must bend many a weary hour ere the task could be completed; but I trust there is not one whose eye will rest on these lines, but would devote her young life to the care of a mother, as joyfully as did this sweet girl, so tenderly reared, so fondly cherished—for "we can have but one mother."

Months went by—a long winter passed away, and with it the little sum so carefully hoarded, for quarter-day came regularly, and fuel was unusually high; while, to complete the trials of that sad year, just at the time of the commencement of our tale, Mrs. May had again required the attendance of a physician. On the morning after the friends had listened to the evening hymn, the work table and ottoman, the last relics of better days, (if we except a small miniature of Mr. May,) were transferred to their friend, the widow, and a sum just barely sufficient to defray the expenses of Mrs. May's illness, received for them. Poor Laura! she had borne up nobly, but her own health was impaired by close attendance in a sick room, and bending over her work so late at night, as she was obliged to do, and now "want, like a strong man armed," stood at the threshold, so she will be forgiven, we are sure, even if we acknowledge that she wept in secret that day, long and bitterly.

Chapter II.

In one of the handsomest dwellings fronting on Washington Square, sat Mrs. Delancy and her daughter Ellen, surrounded by all the comforts and elegancies of a modern drawing room, and attired in fashionable and becoming morning costume, evidently prepared to receive a visitor, but their present conversation was of a purely domestic character. The music teacher employed for the younger Misses Delancy had been taken ill, and the selection of another formed the subject of their discussion.

"But dear mamma, if Clara and Eugenia must be put to the piano again so soon, why not employ Signor Dorami?"

"Simply because I have determined on engaging a female teacher for the present. The girls are so young they will require a teacher for several years, and I feel obliged to retrench a little just now, in the ornamental part of their education, as so large an amount will so soon be expended for another purpose, on another of my daughters."

Ellen turned away her beautiful face to hide the blushes which the allusion of her mother had called to her cheek, for in a few weeks Charles Somers would claim her as his bride; but she replied:

"But where can we find a lady with the requisite voice and skill, who would be willing to come to the house and teach; for surely, mamma, you would not send the children to any one out of it?"

Ellen Delancey was a kind-hearted, amiable girl, and would have sacrificed almost any personal gratification to relieve the wants of a destitute fellow-creature, but it had never entered her imagination that it would be quite as great a task for some female,—perhaps in feeble health, whom necessity might compel to teach what had been the accomplishments of other days—to come to her pupils, as it would be for them to go to her, and such rosy-cheeked, bright-eyed little lassies as they were too.

"I acknowledge the difficulty, Ellen; we may not be readily suited, but I shall advertise to-morrow, and"——

"If I might only be so bould, mam," said a happy-looking Irish girl, who was putting some flowers in a vase, and had heard the conversation, "if I might only be so bould as to interrupt you—and I beg pardon for the same—I think I could tell you of one just to your mind."

"Ah, Martha, one of your poor companions, I am afraid, who has picked up a tune or two while she was lady's maid or child's nurse."

Martha—for it was our old friend—reddened with a feeling of mortification, but before she could reply, the ringing of the bell announced Mr. Somers. He was scarcely seated, however, before he was informed of the subject of their late conversation, and his advice asked as to their choice of a teacher.

"If you could find one with a voice such as I heard a few nights since," he said, "you would have no cause to regret the change. It seemed the notes of a seraph, and Green and myself stood entranced till it ceased; it was, too, where we did not expect to hear such melody—in a small, mean house, in M—— street."

Martha arranged her flowers very slowly, and listened attentively.

"Have you enquired who lives there, and if it is a teacher?" asked Mrs. Delancy, adding with a smile; "we must appoint you to ascertain the names of all singing angels, we are at present in such need of one."

Martha could hear no more. The idea that perhaps her ever dear Miss Laura might get the situation, which to her seemed so easy and desirable, quite overcame her humble timidity, and she ventured to say at last:

"Indeed, ma'am, and I'm thinking the gentleman and myself are maning the same lady—sweet Miss Laura May—and she's an angel, in truth, all but the wings, and it isn't long she'll be wanting the same, if she doesn't find some friends."

"Martha, Martha!" exclaimed Ellen, astonished at her unaccustomed boldness; but perceiving the tears start to her eyes, she hastened to add kindly, "you seem deeply interested, and the lady must be a great favourite. Tell us who she is, if mamma will please permit you, and when and where you have known her. Is she very beautiful?" she added, glancing at her own brilliant face in the splendid mirror which surmounted the pier-table.

"Beautiful, Miss Ellen! if you mean heart beauty, she's great store of that, tho' it's myself cant tell you how much beauty her face has, for when you see her two bright eyes—like stars in Heaven—you forget quite entirely to look for the rest of her face. And as to the when it was I knew her, it was when I went half heart broke, from that grand Mrs. Morris's, where they think that servants have no more at all of feeling, in soul or body, than a cold stone, and it was then I learned to love her too! She says to me, 'Martha, if you don't know how to do your work, come to mamma or me, and we will show you how,' instead of saying as many would do, 'go live somewhere else till you learn how to work.' And she tried to teach me to sew, when I wasn't busy in the chambers, and every morning I had to bring my needle and low chair into the parlour, while she had the strange foreigner gentleman to show her how to play the piano, and all the time it was myself kept thinking she played and sung the best. All the servants loved her, Miss, but I had most cause, for wasn't I only a poor emigrant?"

"But how does it happen, Martha, that they are living in such a mean street, and are so circumstanced as to need assistance?"

"Oh, Miss Ellen, the dark days came, and God took away the dear father from her, and a good father he was, and a kind husband to Mrs. May—and then they seemed to lose every thing, all at once. I am no scholar, Miss, and don't know how such things are done, but they talked about a great many papers, and one more than all the rest, which was called a 'dorsement. Luck served me when the servants were all sent off—and they moved into what you call a mean street—for they took me with them, and there—if Miss Laura had pleased—I should be this blessed day; but when she hadn't the dollar left to pay me, she wouldn't let me stay, though it's just myself would have felt obliged if she had left me live with her, and work my fingers off for her and her lady mother."

And good Martha's overflowing heart found vent in a flood of tears, which she was obliged to escape to the nursery to conceal.

"Dear mamma, let us go at once and see this young lady, in whose praise Martha is so eloquent," said Ellen, rising; "we may be the means of rescuing a worthy person from distress, and Charles shall show us the way as a compensation for the loss of his morning visit."

Martha's joy knew no bounds as she closed the door behind them, as they left on their pleasant errand. Her vivid imagination would not be controlled, and fancy pictured her darling Miss Laura restored to her former station, surrounded by comforts and admiring friends—forgetting that the world contained hearts colder than her own.

The house was found with some difficulty—for in her eagerness to set out, Ellen had forgotten to ask Martha the number, and Mr. Somers had not taken notice of its situation. Poor Laura! a slight flush of mortified pride tinged her pale cheek for a moment, when, in answer to their knock, she opened the door, and saw the elegantly-dressed strangers, for they were the first of her own rank who had crossed their threshold, since the shadow of poverty had fallen darkly upon it. But even Mrs. Delancy—accustomed as she was to consider herself and daughter as models of ease and elegance—was forced to observe and admire the perfect self-possession and dignity with which she invited them to enter, and enquired their wishes. Never had the petted favorite of fortune found such difficulty i making them known, for she judged Laura by her own proud sensitive feelings, and shrunk from inflicting the pain she feared might be felt when the object of her visit should be made known. As she looked on the delicate form of the young girl, she felt it to be a hard task to ask her to leave the seclusion of home, and the side of her gentle mother, to subject herself to the wearisome monotony of teaching, even for a few hours each day, but as her glance met the soft yet proud gaze of those beaming eyes, she felt that in no other way could assistance be offered to her or her mother, while at the same time it showed her how much it was needed. It took much less time for all this to pass through the mind of Mrs. Delancy than it has for us to record it; and she replied to the enquiry of Laura by saying, "If I address Miss May, as I suppose I do," (Laura bowed,) "a friend of yours gave me the hope of obtaining your assistance in teaching my little girls music. If she has misinformed me, I beg pardon for having intruded."

The large drops gathered in the eyes of her eager listener, but they certainly were not drops of mortification, or indignation; only the overflowing of a thankful heart. This was a scheme she had never thought of: for she was very young, and who was there in all this great city to whom she could refer; and now to have a certain independence offered to her acceptance, and that, too, at a time when hope had nearly deserted her. Oh! it was more than she could bear—at least with composure. But Laura was not one of those who sob and wring their hands, looking theatrically interesting in their emotion, so she sat quite still, and calmly wiped the sparkling tell-tales from her cheek for a moment, before she was able to answer Mrs. Delancy. She then told her the kind offer would be most thankfully accepted if she was considered competent to impart the instruction. Once she could have undertaken the office without fear of failure; but she was afraid her kind, although unknown friend, (how little she thought she was receiving the reward of forbearance and kindness to a servant); had over-rated her present powers, as she had been deprived so long of the opportunity of practising, and her employment had not been such for some time past, as to fit her hands for the use of any instrument—and her eye rested for a moment on the taper fingers, which, to tell the truth, looked as if they had held rough companionship of late. Ellen could hardly hear her through before she clasped one of the small hands in her own, and ere Laura could prevent her, had carried it to her lips. The action startled but delighted the poor girl, for it assured her she was understood and sympathized with, and the drops that now gathered in her eye were suffered to flow unchecked. All necessary inquiries were soon made, and preliminaries settled, and it was arranged that the next morning should see Laura May installed in her new office of music-teacher.

During the walk home, Charles Somers begged his companions to grant him one request, as payment for his assistance in the affair which was so happily terminated, and this was, that Francis Green should not be made acquainted with the discovery and arrangement, nor the new teacher mentioned, till he should communicate the intelligence himself.

It needed but few days to convince the kind, warm-hearted, enthusiastic Ellen Delancy, that in Laura she had found one whom it would be an honor, as well as a pleasure, to call friend, and she would gladly, if it had been possible, have persuaded her to become an inmate of their house: but it was difficult to prevail on her to remain a moment from her own dear mother's side: even to practice her favorite airs. She still continued laboring with unremitting industry, but her resources enabled her now to procure many little comforts and delicacies for her mother, hitherto beyond her means, and that assistance for herself she so much needed, and to Martha's inexpressible joy, she was informed by Mrs Delancy, that her services might be transferred to Miss Laura May.

There is a balm for a sad heart, in sympathy and kind words, which no leech's skill can compound; and Mrs. May daily recovered health and spirits, cheered by the frequent visits of her new-found friends. The little pupils of Laura became fondly attached to her, and in her present happiness she almost forgot the dark hours that had rolled by so heavily.

How very beautiful Ellen looked in her bridal dress, on the evening of her marriage—and almost beautiful looked our sweet Laura, as—arrayed in a magnificent bride-maid's dress, the gift of Mrs. Delancy—she took her station by her side. A crowd of gay friends were assembled, and even Mrs. May had been prevailed upon to join them. We shall not describe the wedding to you, reader, for weddings and wedding dresses are chiefly interesting to the parties concerned, though to be sure we have sometimes known young ladies to evince a little curiosity about them, and to be sometimes a little impatient to see how they would look in blonde and white satin: But those who are married, and had bridal dresses just to their minds, must imagine the bride looked just as they did—while those who have yet to say, "love, honor, and obey," may believe and looked precisely as they doubtless wish to at some future time—and as we hope they will.

Although Francis Green and Laura were to stand together at the marriage of their mutual friends, they had met for the first time, but a few days before, and then her identity with the sweet, but unknown singer, carefully concealed from him, in compliance with the wish of Mr. Somers. Scarcely a day had been passed in company with his friend, in which young Green did not allude to that evening hymn, and many times he involuntarily passed through the street where he had heard it; but the voice had not met his ear again.

And now the ceremony was over—the congratulations offered, and, in one of the intervals of conversation, music called for. All the young ladies who could play without coaxing, had played, and those who needed it, had been coaxed into playing; and at last, the bridegroom—much to his satisfaction—was permitted to lead Miss May to the piano, placing before her a beautiful song, which he knew to be a great favorite of his friend. Before the symphony was ended, a crowd had gathered round her—so brilliant was the execution, yet so sweet the harmony. Charles cast one glance at Francis Green, as the first verse was concluded, and saw that his secret was a secret no longer: for he stood with finger upraised, as if to command silence, and the drops gathering in his eye, just ready to fall. And well might he stand entranced, as that rich strain floated through the lofty apartments, now sinking to the softest note of an Æolian harp—now swelling to a full organ tone. No one spoke—no one moved till it was ended, and then more than one turned away to hide the tear called forth by that melting voice, as well as by the song. When at length, Mr. Somers sought his friend, he found him engaged in animated conversation with Mrs. May, and passed him, merely saying in a low tone—

"How beautiful she must be—it is the voice of an angel."

* * * * *

Two long years have passed—and Laura sits by a pleasant fireside, and near her—with one foot resting on an ottoman, more delicately wrought than the one we first saw her using—sits Mrs. May, gazing on her dutiful child with a mother's fondest look of love. Laura was so occupied with her employment, which was embroidering a tiny robe, destined as a gift to her playful pet—a little chubby Laura Somers—that she did not hear a quick, soft step behind her, and only raised her head as an arm was passed gently around her waist, and a voice whispered in her ear:

"Come, lay aside your work, dearest, and sing us the Evening Hymn of Mozart."

"Why is that such a favorite of yours, Francis?" she asked, turning to the speaker, who is no other than our acquaintance, Francis Green.

"Listen, then, fair lady, and learn, how once—a long time ago—a poor student walked with a friend through a narrow street, in a great city. It was a calm, beautiful summer eve, and they spoke of the bright stars which were seen by the natural eye, as they peeped forth one by one, into the gathering twilight; and of the brighter Heaven beyond, seen by the eye of faith. Just then they passed an open window, from which—mingling with the odour of sweet, fresh flowers—came forth a strain of melody which the dreaming student felt could be sung but by one voice for him; and he went on his way with visions of angels haunting his sleeping and waking hours, and the burden of their song was a hymn of Mozart. The dreamer found at length, that the unknown object of his wild reveries was a creature of earth—to be loved—to be wooed: and was so blest as to meet a return of affection; and just as the two had concluded to share the ills of life together, and strive, by industry and frugality, to win a portion of this world's goods, an unexpected bequest placed them in a situation which one, at least, was fitted to adorn. Crowds gather round the student's bride and ask for songs, but his favorite is the Evening Hymn. What, tears, dearest! you ask me why this is such a favorite, and when I tell you a tale of wild and romantic affection, in explanation, you pay me with tears. Come, let me kiss them off, and now play that solemn strain, which shall henceforth be sacred to us both, as it has long been to me."

A fine manly voice joined in the hymn of praise, and led the devotions of the little family that night; but while he audibly blessed God for all the mercies clustered so thickly around his path, in his heart of hearts a still small voice raised an ascription of thanksgiving for the greatest of all his earthly blessings—the treasure he found when he heard Laura May sing her Evening Hymn.

J.

The Unfortunate Marriage;

OR, THE

Effects of Selfishness and Extravagance.

On the eve of one of those events in a young lady's life which sometimes influences its future destiny, one of those trifling causes whence great events arise—a ball—two girls were seated at their toilet-tables, employed in the important affairs of self-decoration.—Their positions in the dressing-room would have afforded a hasty-judging stranger some clue to their characters. The elder, and perhaps more beautiful of them, Miss Fanny Beaumont, had drawn her table close to the fire, leaving her cousin, Margaret, to dress her hair on the other side of the chamber. But this might have been accidental, as the latter made no complaint, although it was January, and the fire had not been kindled long in the room. Perhaps the business she was engaged in occupied all her thoughts; for, having finished adjusting her hair, she asked her cousin—

"Shall I wear my pink wreath or not?"

"If you ask my opinion," was Fanny's reply, "I say by all means do not wear it; it was most unbecoming to you on Thursday."

"Why, I thought, Fanny, you admired it?"

"So I do. I think the wreath is beautiful; but, somehow or other, it does not suit you."

"I am sorry you think so," said Margaret, in a tone of regret, and still hesitating with the wreath in her hand.

"What is the use of worrying me about it," exclaimed Fanny in a tone of evident pique; "if you are so obstinate, put it on, and make a fright of yourself; it is nothing to me."

But Margaret saw that it was something to her cousin, since it had ruffled her temper; and though she wondered at the importance attached to such a trifle, she yielded, and replaced the flowers in the drawer from which she had taken them. In a few minutes the cloud dispersed, and Fanny was more than usually kind, complimenting her cousin very much on the graceful manner in which she had arranged her hair. By and by, however, she said, as if it were the thought of the moment—

"Margaret, dear, as you have quite determined not to wear your wreath, would you lend it me?"

"Certainly, if you wish it; but I thought you said it was unbecoming?"

"Yes, to brown hair; but not to mine. Pink and black harmonize admirably. I should like it very much, if you would be so kind."

Margaret was young, full of affection for her cousin, and, moreover, had a habit of cheerfully submitting to a certain exacting spirit which occasionally peeped out through the general kindness of Miss Beaumont's manner. It was not the thought of being an orphan, and entirely dependent on Fanny's parents (which was the case), that ever influenced her yielding conduct on such occasions; for I am certain, that if the situation of the cousins had been reversed, the same would have happened. Margaret's was one of those dispositions whose chief pleasures seem to be derived from affording pleasure to others.

The ball passed off as balls generally do. The usual number of quadrilles were walked; there was waltzing for the active, and whist-playing for the passive and those elderly guests who are wont to declare "that their dancing days are over." In short, a cursory observer would have seen nothing in this particular ball to distinguish it from any other ball. To Fanny Beaumont, however, it was an epoch. Mr. Wilton Morris, a young gentleman who possessed a large property in the neighbourhood, paid her attentions so much more marked than any she had received from him at their former meetings in society, that they became the current talk of all the Dowagers present.

In truth, the result of this meeting was pretty decisive, so far as one of the parties were concerned; for the next day, Wilton Morris had scarcely finished breakfast, in company with his mother and sisters, before he ordered his horse.

"Are you going to pay visits, Wilton?" asked his mother.

"Yes, mother; I am going to pay my respects to a lady with whom I had the honour of dancing last night—the most beautiful girl I ever beheld."

"And is beauty her only recommendation?" asked Mrs. Morris.

"Oh, no; I understand she is very accomplished, and I am sure she is amiable."

"I hear from your sister she is Miss Beaumont, the lawyer's daughter," rejoined the mother; "and you cannot be very 'sure' of anything concerning her, for Charlotte tells me you have not seen her half a dozen times."

Wilton coloured, and commenced pulling on his gloves, as if in a hurry to cut the discussion short by a hasty departure; but Mrs. Morris put out her hand to detain him, and the tears were in her eyes as she spoke—

"Wilton, you are your own master, and never did I feel it more sensibly than at this moment."

"My dear mother, I can dispense with fortune in a wife."

"You can; but there are qualities far more essential to happiness, of which, in but a few evenings' intercourse, you can know nothing. No man looks for a wife in a ball-room, but in the domestic circle. Besides, I think you might look higher."

"Nonsense, mother; I dare say if I offered, she would refuse me, for I am sure she ought to be a Countess at least."

But as his mother and sister watched his manly figure, as, followed by his groom, he galloped away, and reflected on the broad acres of which he was master, they felt how very small a chance there was of such a catastrophe. Upon his prudence—the prudence of a young man who had not long attained his majority—they all depended for the means of upholding their station in society.

The elder Mr. Morris had died suddenly, about eighteen months before, without having signed his will, although it was actually drawn out and prepared for his signature; consequently the property, consisting of land, descended to his son, to the utter exclusion of the other children. Wilton, however, was always considered a high-principled, right-thinking young man, an opinion which was partially confirmed when he declared his intention of fulfilling to the letter, his late father's intention. By the will—which of course, in point of law, was only waste paper—the sisters were to inherit five thousand pounds each, and Mrs. Morris was to come into uncontrolled possession of twice that sum; for it was evidently his desire to leave his widow and daughters perfectly independent of his son: and it is but justice to say, that up to the evening on which we introduce him to the reader, Wilton's conscientious intentions never wavered; but he had certainly learned to estimate to the full the advantages of his unfettered fortune.

In three months from the evening of the ball, the storm which Mrs. Morris had dreaded burst upon the family. Despite considerations for his kindred, which ought at least to have caused him to follow out the intentions expressed in the memorandum of his father's will, Wilton Morris became the husband of Fanny Beaumont!

It was what the world calls a "great match" for Fanny, though both she and Wilton would have declared it was purely a "love match." Certainly on his part there was a most absorbing passion; and if the lady, in her dreams of the future, mingled thoughts of a fine house, and carriages, and servants, with the image of her lover, it must be remembered that these realities were too closely united to be very easily divided.

About this time, Robert Leeburn, the young clergyman to whom Grace Morris, Wilton's eldest sister, was engaged, obtained a curacy, it was in a distant county, and would have entailed a separation very painful to contemplate, unless Grace had consented at once to share his humble fortunes. When he first asked her to be his, he had confidently hoped that in due time he should be presented to a living of sufficient value to place him in perfectly easy circumstances; but the death of the patron on whom he relied had sadly changed his prospects. It had not, however, changed their devoted and long-tried affections; though perhaps Grace was taught to appreciate more fully the advantage her own promised fortune would be, in addition to a curate's narrow stipend.—In truth, without some such reliance, they could not with common prudence have married. But it was a very inconvenient time for Wilton to pay the legacies he felt himself in honour bound to discharge. When he had talked of not marrying for years to come, he had purposed during that period living considerably within his very handsome income, so as to save money for that honest purpose. His marriage, however, induced so many expenses, that there was little chance of such a proceeding at present. His mother trembled for the future, and more than once did she remonstrate with him on the extravagance into which he was tempted.

"Mother," was his usual reply, "dear Fanny's taste is so exquisite, that I cannot help letting it have full scope; you know the furniture is dreadfully old fashioned, and, as she says, these purchases once made, we can then live quietly, and even in a few months make up for the outlay. As for your money, and that of the girls, why, I must allow you fair interest out of my income, until I can scrape together the principal." And so it was arranged.

"I wish it had been cousin Margaret that Wilton had chosen," said Charlotte to her sister one day, after they had been discussing, somewhat confidentially, the merits of their sister-in-law.

"So do I," returned Grace; "though I can hardly tell why it is that we all like her the better of the two."

"I believe it must be because she is so thoughtful of the wishes of others, so unselfish," replied Charlotte; "which, between ourselves, Fanny is not."

Charlotte Morris was right; she had gained the key to Fanny Beaumont's character. A discerning writer says, "it is woman's instinct to love; her reward to be loved." Of what is it the reward? Of nothing so much as of that generally considerate and unselfish conduct, which we may class among the minor morals of society; for the most trifling faults, strengthening and deepening with advancing years, too often become monstrous in their consequences.—The very young have seldom the power greatly to extend the circle of their influence; they are, as it were, rehearsing their parts against the time, when, on the theatre of the world, they shall be called upon to act as men and women, guiding others by their example, or influencing them by their authority, according to the circumstances in which they may be placed.

Years passed on, working, as they rolled away, a surprising change in the relative position of the once affectionate family of the Morrises. Indeed so great was the change, that, could it have been contemplated at the time Wilton came of age, it would have appeared a wide gulf that never could be passed; yet, like stone upon stone, had many acts of unkindness, gradually increasing in importance, built up the bridge which spanned it. Mrs. Morris, with Charlotte, was living in a small house, on a precarious allowance, doled out to her by her son at most uncertain intervals; while the assistance which Grace, the curate's wife, received from her brother, might more properly be said to consist in occasional trifling donations than any regular stipend. This was a disastrous case; for confidently relying on the two hundred a year, which Wilton had proposed allowing his sister until he should be able to pay the intended legacy, Mr. Leeburn had become involved in debt to the amount of some hundreds. And now three children, as well as a dear wife, looked up to him for support and protection. His creditors were becoming clamorous; and, above all, he dreaded every hour that his situation would be known to his rector, a severe man, who he felt sure would then dismiss him from his curacy. In such circumstances, how little could his mind be fit for the fulfilment of his sacred duties!

Meanwhile the Beaumont family were in circumstances which the world might call similar, but which were brought about by very different causes. They lived near the manor-house, and of course visited there frequently, as was very natural. But insensibly they had fallen into a common but fatal error, which had been fostered by the selfish vanity of their beautiful daughter, always the spoilt child of the family. She had married into a circle somewhat above that in which she previously moved; but an acknowledgment of this truth would have mortified her feelings, however keenly she recognized it in her own heart. Therefore the foolish attempts of her family to cope in style of living and expenditure with the new acquaintances they made, met with decided encouragement from Mrs. Wilton Morris. Mr. Beaumont's only excuse consisted in his ambitious views for his younger children; but when we are tempted to do "evil that good may come of it," surely, though perhaps slowly, it works out a retribution, even though the object we desire be at last attained.

And the "young people" themselves, the "beautiful" and "fortunate" Fanny, and her devoted husband, were they sailing smoothly down the stream of life? It must be confessed, not quite. From commencing his career extravagantly, Wilton also had become involved in debt; and the estate, which he should have held sacred as a resource for his mother and sisters, was mortgaged to supply his own wants. Still, this was a very different sort of poverty from either of the other cases; but his conduct was assuredly the most inexcusable of all. The remorse and dissatisfaction he felt with himself did not improve his own temper; but though his wife was as "beautiful" and "accomplished" as ever, he ceased to feel sure that she was "amiable." Only gradually had the truth dawned upon him, and after many trials, he felt convinced that her cheerful co-operation in his proposed plan of retrenchment would never be gained, while it entailed self-sacrifice on her part. And how was this to be avoided? Whether it was a fashionable bonnet, a new conservatory, or a tour on the continent, the lady "could not do without" whatever she had set her mind on obtaining. And long, very long, was it before her once adoring husband learned in any degree to resist a gentle hint, a smiling appeal, or a straight-forward petition, far less the most desperate instrument of her will—a flood of tears. Latterly, however, firm resolutions took possession of his mind; the seeds of much misery had germinated there, and now the wife's power was waning; for the selfish cannot be permanently loved.

On a lovely morning in May, Fanny was in high spirits and good-humour; for it was the day on which the grounds were thrown open for a fete champetre, of which she would, of course, be the mistress and the queen. Margaret Beaumont was standing by her cousin's side, when a servant entered the room with a letter, which, though directed to her husband, Mrs. Wilton Morris, after a moment's thought, placed in her own desk.

"Margaret," said the beauty, "don't tell Wilton there is any letter for him. I know the writing; it is from his sister, Mrs. Leeburn; it will only vex him and make him cross, for I can guess pretty well what it is about. I am sure they seem to think he is made of money. I don't believe three months ever go over, without their teasing him about something or another."

"Will he not be displeased at your keeping back the letter?" replied Margaret.

"Oh, I shall give it to him as soon as the fete is over; anything is better than putting him out of humour before it begins. Ah, Margaret, you will find out that this sort of management is often necessary when——when you are Lady Tresham!"

"And that will be—never. I wish, Fanny, you would cease to jest on that subject."

"Why not? I am sure it will be your own fault if it 'never' is. Even Wilton says that he is certain young Tresham is devoted to you."

"It would be affectation in me to deny that I believe he is so. But old Sir Philip is a proud and ambitious man; I know but too well that he would not consent to his son's marriage with portionless me; and I would never be the means, by a clandestine union, of bringing discord and misery into any family."

"Nonsense," returned Fanny; "what need you care? The eldest son must come into the baronetcy and estates, and surely he may choose whom he likes for a wife."

Margaret shook her head with a mournful smile, and pointing to Fanny's only child, who was playing at their feet, she said,

"Shall you reason thus when he is a man?"

"Do you remember you are four-and-twenty, and are never likely to have such another offer?" was Fanny's reply.

"Yes. Nor has Mr. Tresham made, what you call, in direct terms, 'an offer.'"

"Your own fault, then, I am sure."

At this moment Mr. Tresham arrived. He was the first guest. That day he proposed to Margaret in due form, and she promised to be his only on the condition that Sir Philip should prove willing to receive her as a daughter. With the impetuosity of an ardent character, young Tresham determined at once to make the petition to his father, and it was arranged that he should see Margaret the following morning, and tell her faithfully the result.

Meanwhile the fete passed gaily off, but as sometimes, towards the close of a brilliant day, we are surprised by a thunder-storm, so was the beautiful hostess unprepared for the scene which opened on her soon after the last of her lingering guests had departed.

"Fanny," said Wilton Morris to his wife, in that unmistakeable tone of decision which indicates a frame of mind as far removed from all ebullition of temper as from the softness of affection which might yield to argument or entreaty; "Fanny," said he, "I have delayed speaking to you until the evening on a very important subject, because I thought you would construe, as unkind, allusions which might unnerve and unfit you for the fatigues of to-day. Though judging by the eagerness with which you arranged this fete in opposition to my wishes, I am not sure that such forbearance was by any means your due. Are you aware of your father's involvements?"

"No—yes—that is—Margaret hinted last week something."

"Are you aware that he has applied to me for assistance?"

"No, indeed, I am not," said Fanny; and this was true.

"At great inconvenience, I may say injustice, to myself," returned Wilton, "I relieved him from his embarrassments; but the retrenchment in our expenditure I have so long urged upon you, has ceased to be a matter of choice—it is now one of necessity. My proposal is to let the manor-house furnished, as it stands, so soon as I can find a tenant. We shall reside, for the next few years, in the south of France. We can do so with every comfort and many luxuries, on the five hundred a year which was settled on you at the time of our marriage. I recollect that you remarked at the time, it would be a resource whatever might happen, and you see your words have proved true. And I should think, Fanny, you must have money by you, notwithstanding the purchase of expensive jewelry which, from time to time, I have observed you wearing. From a feeling of delicacy, I have hitherto refrained from questioning you on the subject; for I fancied—though, it seems, erroneously—that you were in the habit of assisting your family. I confess it seemed to me very natural that you should occasionally make presents to your younger sisters, and your good, kind cousin; but I hear that such has not been the case."

Fanny's cheek flushed, and tears of anger and vexation rose to her eyes as she replied—

"I have not five pounds in the house."

"Indeed!"

"And I am in debt my next quarter," she continued, in a tone of desperation.

"I am sorry for it," returned Wilton; "but your debts shall be paid, so that we start clear; but I shall insist upon rigid economy for the future, which, however, will not be difficult in the style in which I intend living."

They had had many quarrels; but never had Fanny witnessed in her husband the sort of determination he now evinced. It was no time to draw forth the letter she had placed in her desk. She mentally resolved to keep it for "a day or two," till he should be in "better humour;" but absorbed in her own concerns and real troubles, since they pressed immediately on herself, the selfish woman forgot all else—poor Grace's letter remained undelivered, unopened!

And in all the new arrangements Wilton Morris was making, the reader will ask, "did not thoughts of his mother and sisters present themselves?" Certainly they did, and he made firmer and more just resolves than he had known for many a day, but the absence of energy and decision—unless roused, as power in their exercise by some striking event—was the fault of his character. His was a more passive selfishness than that of his wife. He systematically avoided dwelling on painful subjects; but if they were brought home to him; why, he rid himself of the annoyance if he possibly could. Thus had he relieved Mr. Beaumont's wants, though occasioned by imprudence, because it was distressing to see his wife's family and near neighbours in trouble; and he knew that the threatened exposure, which only his timely assistance could prevent, would have been yet more unpleasant. At the same time, he chose to conclude that, as he had not heard very recently from his sister, Mrs. Leeburn, she could manage for the present without the promised annuity; and he chose equally to misinterpret the brief letters of his mother, who also dwelt at a distance, and the silence of Charlotte.

It is now necessary that we should give some insight into the prospects of Margaret, and the proceedings and views of the Treshams. Sir Philip was a proud, ambitious, and even a prejudiced man; prejudiced very particularly in favour of equal alliances, and rather a despot in his own family.

It must, however, be acknowledged, that he had a strong and comprehensive mind, and his pride was not of a kind which prevented his yielding an opinion, if his reason could be convinced he was in error; and to complete his character, it may be added, that he was strictly just and conscientious, and that beneath a stern manner there was a warm and affectionate heart to the few who were his favorites.—Unfortunately, he had taken a decided dislike to Mrs. Wilton Morris, and knowing nothing of the Beaumonts, beyond having occasionally met them at the manor-house, he established in his own mind that Margaret was a very similar person to her cousin.—However wrong the notion might be, he always considered that Wilton had been entrapped into the marriage, and determined that his son should not make a similar match, without at least plain speaking on his part. Accordingly, he not only forbade young Tresham to think further of Margaret on pain of his lasting displeasure, but resolved to see Mr. and Mrs. Beaumont himself without loss of time, and to tell them very explicitly his determination, so that there could be no misunderstanding on their part.

It was the day after the fete; another bright and beautiful morning, when nature, in her gala dress, seemed smiling almost in mockery at the little passions which make up the sum of human misery. The house in which the Beaumonts resided was on the outskirts of a country town, and surrounded by rather extensive grounds. It was an old-fashioned pile, which had often been added to and altered; so that at the first glance it was not very easy for a stranger to decide which was the principal entrance;—and the old gentleman, who intended paying rather an early visit, in wandering about the grounds, stumbled, before making the discovery, on a member of the family. This was little Henry Beaumont, the youngest child, a particularly interesting boy of about eight years old. On the present occasion, however, he was reclining in a sort of rustic arbor, shedding a torrent of tears, and apparently plunged in some deeper grief than the average sorrows of childhood.

"Will you tell me, my little fellow," said the stranger, "how I am to obtain admittance here, for I can find neither bell nor portal?" But almost before the child could answer, he perceived the distress he was in, and being naturally fond of children, sat down by his side, and asked what was the matter. In a few minutes there were stronger inducements than mere compassion for him to continue the conversation with his little companion.

"A great boy like you crying in this manner!—Why, be a man. What is the matter?" said the baronet, as, with a sort of gentle force, he drew the child's hand from his face; but loud sobs were for some time the only answer.

"Tell me what it is, my little man," continued Sir Philip; "are you in disgrace with your tutor, or what?"

Harry was probably indignant at such a suspicion, for he sobbed out, "No, no. I am crying because—because cousin Margaret won't go away?"

There is no wonder that the name riveted Sir Philip's attention as he said "Go away! Why do you wish her to go away!"

"No; I don't wish it," rejoined the boy, a little calmed by the evident interest the stranger friend was taking in his sorrow, "and till to-day I always thought that cousin Margaret did't wish it because when they used to talk about Mr. Tresham, she always told me not to cry, for she never, never would go away. But now she is crying, and I know it is because she won't, though Mr. Tresham asked her so much, oh, so very much, to go away."

There was something in the simple language of the child which opened quite a new view of the case to Sir Philip Tresham. The "cousin Margaret" was evidently so dearly loved (and children seldom love unamiable persons) that her "going away" had been the great dread of his young mind, till his own grief had been overwhelmed by hers. Sir Philip also guessed that, instead of entrapping his son, Margaret Beaumont had behaved most nobly.

"And so Mr. Tresham wishes her very much to go away? I know something of the gentleman, and can readily believe it," continued Sir Philip, after a moment's pause. "But how came you to know so much about your cousin's affairs?" he asked.

"I was sitting in the bow-window of the drawing-room, reading Robinson Crusoe; and I suppose the curtain hid me, for I think they would not have talked before me as they did. But I was just reading about Crusoe's man Friday, and I never knew they were in the room, till I heard Margaret sob, and soon after that, somehow, I could not help crying too, and so I slipped out of the open window, on to the lawn, that they should not see me. But, sir, you know Mr. Tresham; do you know that nasty old Sir Philip?"

"Why—yes; I perceive he is no favorite of yours."

"It is all his fault; I can make out that. But tell me, sir, if he dies, surely then Mr. Tresham can marry my cousin Margaret if he likes; can't he?"

"Indeed he can."

"Then I wish he would die."

"Pray, is that an echo of Mr. Tresham's wish?"

"No, he did not say so; but, do you know, that I am almost sure he thought it, for Margaret was very angry at something he muttered, and called him wicked, and said it was a dreadful thing to lose a father, and that, if her parents were alive, she would do anything to please them; and then she began to cry again, and he said he only meant that as his father was than seventy, it was not likely he could live many years, and would she promise to marry him whenever he should die. Yet she would not promise; and then he said he would go to Spain" (it was during the heat of the civil war there) "and fight; and, perhaps, when Sir Philip heard of his death, he would regret having been so unkind. Do you think Mr. Tresham will go to Spain and be shot!"

"I cannot tell positively, my boy, but I should rather think so. Do you know I came here this morning to call on your papa; but it occurs to me that the business may be as well transacted with your cousin Margaret. Is Mr. Tresham gone? do you think she would see me!"

"Yes, I saw him go away just now."

Sir Philip sent in his card, and was ushered into the drawing-room described by little Harry, which, however, was now empty. Full ten minutes elapsed before Margaret entered the room; but he was not displeased at having that space of time afforded for observation and reflection. By her, poor girl! it had been spent in erasing as much as possible the evidence of her recent tears; and prepared, as he knew she must be, for something very like insult from him, she rose greatly in his estimation as he recognized the proof of a pride so nearly akin to his own. The old baronet was really the more embarrassed of the two; and after two or three common-place remarks, he plunged into the subject most at heart, saying abruptly—

"So, Miss Beaumont, you have refused my son?"

"Refused him, Sir Philip!"

"I understand you have refused to marry him without my consent?"

"Surely his father does not blame me for that decision!" said Margaret.

"Madam," returned Sir Philip, "until this morning I have been deceived in your character; and my own mistake is the best excuse I can find for my disobedient son. You have behaved admirably."

"And so will he behave; indeed—indeed he loves his father; give him a little time for his—his disappointment to subside, and he will be all you wish him."

"Not if he falls in Spain."

Margaret quickly imagined that young Tresham had declared his intention, with the hope that Sir Philip's dread of his taking such a step might wring from him a consent to the marriage, and she answered, but in a tearful voice—

"He has promised me to give up that thought."

"And did you really, my dear young lady, (the 'madam' was dropped), win from him a promise that he would not hold out such a threat to his father?"

But Margaret was unable to answer. Unnerved by previous excitement, she could no longer restrain her tears; nor was Sir Philip quite unmoved, as, seating himself on the sofa beside her, he took her hand, exclaiming—

"I am not the hard old man you think me. Your conduct has been that which, had I known the happiness of a daughter's dutiful affection, I should have blessed her for pursuing. Your father"——

Margaret shook her head, and murmured—"I am fatherless."

Not while I live," said Sir Philip, in tremulous tones, now fairly giving way to his emotion.

They sat with their backs to the bow-window already named; but at that moment a shadow darkened the room. They turned instinctively, and beheld Philip Tresham on the lawn, the very statue of astonishment. Considering all things, it was very startling to catch the profiles of Margaret and his father, as they sat hand in hand on the sofa. Of that eventful day we shall only futher remark, that it was also an epoch to little Harry, since, without being particularly conceited, he thenceforward considered himself as rather an important person. Neither will our limits permit us to dwell on the happiness of the generous and right-thinking Margaret; we must hasten to a less agreeable task, and narrate an event which followed her marriage.

On that occasion, the young people were presented with the town house of Sir Philip, where, a few weeks afterwards, they took up their abode, and thither a letter was forwarded to Margaret, addressed to her as Miss Beaumont. It was from Charlotte Morris, who, separated from her connexions, had not even heard of the wedding. The contents were harrowing beyond description. In apologizing for thus writing to Margaret, she appealed to the kind feelings which she well remembered she had evinced, and then acknowledged that she feared it was useless to address her brother, since, if to the earnest appeal of her distressed sister no answer was vouchsafed, how could she expect notice? She implored Margaret to use her eloquence with Wilton Morris, to induce him to behave at least with justice; acknowledging that were it not for the sake of Grace and her helpless children, neither she nor her mother would stoop to solicit charity from her unkind, unnatural brother. It afterwards appeared that the forebodings which Mrs. Leeburn had shadowed forth more strongly than ever in the letter detained from Wilton Morris, were fatally realized. Mr. Leeburn had been deprived of his curacy, but stung to the quick by the cruel neglect he had experienced, he forbade his wife to apply to her brother. Yet he was worse than destitute, he was in debt; when, with his wife and children, he left the spot endeared to them by so many associations, and started for the metropolis, with the hope of there meeting with employment as a classical tutor. In London they were received at least with affection by Mrs. Morris and Charlotte, who had removed thither since the latter, though with broken health and spirits, determined on making miniature painting, in which she excelled, a profession. She, too, had in happier years formed an attachment as strong as that of her sister; but the object had proved less worthy; he had not stood the test of altered circumstances, and now the energies of her mind were all directed to rescue herself and her beloved mother from dependence on one so unkind as Wilton. But her sister's distress broke down the resolutions which might have stood the trial of her own sufferings; hence the letter to Margaret, who, herself on the spot, answered it by driving to the humble lodging from which it was dated, while young Tresham, who had as feeling a heart as his dear wife, hastened as quickly as four horses could take him, to convey the distressing intelligence to Wilton Morris. In less than twenty-four hours, the son and brother stood among the care-worn group to whose side he had been summoned, less as a benefactor than a penitent. Yet, before he arrived, Margaret's purse had removed some of the broad evidences of penury; but in the humble roof which sheltered his near relations, and the mean appointments which surrounded those so long accustomed to the refinements of life, in the tears and scarcely restrained reproaches of his mother, in the attenuated form and early grey hairs of one sister, and in the faded beauty and sad tones of the once merry-hearted Grace, Wilton Morris found sufficient weapons to probe him to the quick. He had still the control of sufficient property at last to be just, but the broken bonds of affection were less easily cemented.

Only recently have Wilton Morris and his wife returned to England; and from being one of the most indulgent of husbands, "the world" says he has changed to the sternest. And they even talk of separation. Certainly, what are mis-called "love matches," do not always turn out as well as people could desire.

Margaret is as happy as she deserves to be. Sir Philip is still living, and it is remarkable that she always calls him "father." He took it into his head to educate Harry Beaumont, with the view of establishing him in a profession, in consideration, as he says, of having "taken away" his cousin Margaret.

THE PAINTER.

BY MRS. LIGHTHIPE.

"But ties around this heart were spun,
That would not, could not, be undone."
[CAMPBELL.

In the suburbs of the town of Salerno, there was a small, white-walled cottage, situated on a hill which commanded one of the lovelies prospects in all Italy; warmed by the sun which, in that clime, is said to raise the drooping invalid for whom the blasts of northern shores blow too keenly, and yet cooled by the pure, soft breezes that came upward from the gulf. It was far enough from the town to be hushed from its din and noises, and yet sufficiently near for those who love the tones of their fellow men better than to commune with themselves. It was built by an Englishman, who had brought his fair young wife, whom he idolized, to these skies as a last resort; and pleased with the amendment which a short month had made in her health, he had determined to make it his residence—but she, like a tender flower, just raised her head to the gentle air, and drooped again and died.—And he, weary of the place, sold it into other hands, and departed for his native land. At the time to which my story relates, it was inhabited by an old Italian and his wife; they liked it for the freshness of its air—and he, day by day, went to his business in Salerno, while she prepared his little comforts with exactness, and went the round of her household duties without variation, from one month's end to another. They had rented one part of it to a young man, for the summer months, who had chosen it for the loveliness of its scenery: it was that part which looked far and wide over valley and hill, and yet whose casements opened to the setting sun, and caught the zephyrs that played lightly in its dying beam, and then slept upon the waters.

It was a quiet, sweet evening in early summer, that he sat looking forth upon the sun as he sank down to his rest: there was more of passion in his lip than was wont—there were wild dreams upon the soul, and a kindling hope, that fevered in his eye, as his spirit drank in the intensity of beauty on which he gazed. Fair, almost to effeminacy, his frame was gracefully but slightly made, with a nose like that the sculptor finds on the classic models of old. A small, finely curved mouth, and eyes of that deep blue which seems like the reflection of heaven. The soft air, as it moved back his locks of dark auburn, showed a forhead white, calm and beautiful. He was a Florentine by birth, and nature had made him a painter, with the glowing and enthusiastic temperament which ever belongs to an artist, and above all, to those of Italy. He had devoted himself to painting from his earliest years—had studied the models which the city of his nativity produces in such abundance, and he had already produced some efforts of his pencil, which gave promise that after years might place his among the names he so much burned to reach. There was a nearly finished picture standing backward in the room as the artist had left it after his daily task; it was a child sleeping amid the flowers—and so fresh and softened on the canvass were the painter's tints, that there seemed breathing over the unconscious infant the innocence of heaven. And such, in his studio, was Francisco Salvino.

A slight tap at the door of his room awoke him from his revery, and, as he bade the intruder enter, he turned towards the place. It opened, and a youth stepped upon the threshold: his form, which would have seemed scarcely to have seen fifteen summers, was clad in dark blue velvet, finished at the neck with a white ruff, such as was worn by the higher classes, and, as he lifted a cap of the same rich material from his brow, the dark raven curls which clustered round his head fell from beneath it in rich profusion, contrasting with a skin clear and transparent; his eyes were black and sparkling, and there was an expression of fearlessness and of slight disdain about the small, full lips, as he came forward at the bidding of the painter, and stood before him.

"What wish you from me?" asked Francisco, kindly.

"To serve you, Signor."

"To serve me, boy?—alas! it is but little of servitude I ever need—and the old Signora, who lives in this house, is amply sufficient for all my wants."

"Ah! but there is much that I might do for you that the Signora cannot do," replied the boy; "I might fill your vase with flowers; I could go at your command on a thousand little errands, and I should think a gentleman like you would ever have a page. And then, Signor, is there no lady-love, to whom a swift-footed messenger might better bear a billet than an old Signora?"

"No, saucy one, there is no lady-love," answered the Signor, as he smiled gaily. "But if I were to keep thee, what recompense could I give, except I made thee a painter?"

"Yes," said the boy, catching eagerly at the appearance of acquiescence which the other displayed, "Yes, make me a painter—it is all I will ask in return for the little kindness I may do for thee."

"And where are your parents?" asked the artist, astonished at the boy's evident anxiety to enter his service.

"Ah! they are far, far away," answered the boy, sadly.

"And why do you wish to live with me?" asked the painter.

"Because I love thee," was the quick reply.

"Love me, boy? Have we ever met before?"

"Oh, yes, Signor—in Florence, often—and I thought then how happy I should be to live with you. And now, that I have no friends, I have come to you; and I entreat thee, beloved Signor, send me not forth among strangers."

"Ah, well! poor child, if you wish it, remain in my home, such as it is."

"O, thanks—many thanks"—said the boy; and he sank upon his knee before Salvino, and pressed his hand warmly to his lips.

"And what shall I call you?" the painter asked, as he laid his hand upon the dark curls of the kneeling one beside him.

"Call me Guido," said the boy, "and I will do your bidding."

And the painter looked down into the eyes of the speaker as they were raised to his—but they sank beneath his gaze—and Guido sprang lightly on his feet and turned away.

And so day after day passed, and Guido remained the inmate of Salvino's study—and there were many things he did which none other could do, for where was there another that watched over Francisco with such quickness of affection; he would walk far and early for the sweetest flowers, and arrange them every morning in the vase, as the painter best loved to have them; he culled the choicest fruits to tempt his master's appetite, and the eye of the boy so lightened when he saw him gratified, that Salvino felt happy that he had given a home to one so kind and gentle. And those eyes, too, watched intently the painter at his canvass, one hour after another, unnoticed, and followed him with a passionate, almost tearful gaze, as he went forth on his lonely rambles—but the artist was too deeply wrapped in his own thoughts to heed them.

One day, Salvino left his home to visit the patron who had brought him to Salerno. He went to carry a picture on which he had been employed, and he told Guido he should not return till near the set of sun. Long passed the day to Guido—and eagerly he watched the sun as it declined; he gathered the juiciest fruits, and set forth the evening meal for his master's return, and, when he descried him coming, went joyfully forth to meet him. But there was a thoughtfulness upon the Signor's brow that differed from his usual dreaming reveries—a sadness that belonged not there—and though he greeted Guido kindly as he passed into his dwelling, yet the evening meal remained untouched—each delicacy, too, was put aside untasted, and he sat down at his accustomed casement, where he sank again into his dreaming. The sun went down—the sky purpled into twilight—the stars came forth in the firmament—yet there the painter remained—and in the same place Guido watched him until midnight. The next day he was in the same mood, and the boy asked him tenderly of his visit to the Duke—if he had received him as ever? if he liked the effort of the artist's pencil? and he learned that his patron was as kind as in days past; he had received his picture with enthusiasm—had amply recompensed him—and, more than all, had given command for another more valuable. What, then, could be the cloud upon his master's brow? But Fransisco grew impatient under the gentle questioning, and Guido desisted. Another day, and yet another passed, and though the painter had commenced at his new picture, still, ever and anon, he ceased his work and mused sadly; but, on the fourth day, his spirits seemed renovated—even more than cheerful; he sat down to a fresh piece of canvass, and with his pencil, his whole soul was bent on the lineaments before him, as the colours awoke beneath his touch. Each day he seemed riveted to his work, and Guido beheld at last, in the production which his master retouched with so much care, a lady of such transcendent and majestic beauty, that the boy almost held his breath to gaze. The portrait was placed in the best light from the casement, covered from the dust, and every morning it was the painter's earliest vision; and bitterly Guido saw it was the lady, and not the setting sun, on which Salvino now mused at evening. Sometimes, when the boy gazed on it alone, there was a malignant gleaming from his dark eyes, and a passionate writhing of his lip, that passed away with the sound of his master's step. And then, again, would he half persuade himself that so much loveliness could not exist in a reality—that this was some vivid creation of his master's fancy—and with such a hope he would calm his troubled thoughts.—But a month had not yet gone, when the Duke came in person to inspect his work. As he alighted from his carriage, there was a lady with him; and when, accompanied by his niece, he entered Salvino's study, Guido, with a bursting heart, beheld in the Lady Theresa the original of his master's painting.

The patron commended the growing work—and as the pictures of Francisco passed before them, he had praises for them all—but when he raised the covering from the hidden portrait, the exclamation of delight from them both, suffused the painter's brow with emotion, and as the eyes of the artist met those of the lady, there was a tale of love told and answered. To Guido it was not lost—the blood rushed tumultuously through his veins, and his brain reeled, as he turned and left the place—and when he entered the study again, the visitors had departed.

And now Salvino was often at the ducal palace, the Duke always found employment in his gallery—and the painter was happy. But ever as he returned at evening, he found the boy in tears. Enquiries only renewed his sobbings, and time increased his dejection—until the Signor, conjecturing that he was lonely and weary of remaining in the same place, proposed for him a visit to the Lady Theresa. The proposal was received joyfully, and Francisco having written a billet to the lady of his love, Guido departed for the palace. When he reached the abode of Lady Theresa, he asked to see her alone, and having gracefully handed the letter, stood awaiting the lady's notice. When she had read its purport, and turned to where the boy stood, he seemed buried in thought.

"Come hither, Guido; I would fain recompense such a messenger."

But the youth headed not.

"Are you the boy I noted in the Signor's studio?" she said, as she approached kindly to the side of the page.

"No more a boy than yourself, lady," spoke the seeming youth, as she bared the doublet from her neck; "I wear this garb but at my master's will."

"And why should he seek disguise?" asked the Lady Theresa.

"Alas, and he knows best," answered the other, dejectedly.

"Why do you remain with him, poor girl?"

"Because I love him—poor Leonora has no breath, save with the air of him she loves."

"Does he love thee, Leonora?"

"He has ever said so, lady."

"Come here, then, my girl, and tell me your story; perhaps I may find you a shelter and a home better suited to your sex."

"Not that—not that, lady—it is too late," and with seeming reluctance the jealous girl sat down to fabricate a tale of sorrows for her rival's ear. She told not how, forgetting sex and delicacy, she had left her parents in such disguise, and for the love of Salvino had followed him to Salerno. She did not tell that, in ignorance of the deceit, Francisco at her earnest entreaty had given her a home—but with a long tissue of falsehood—a narrative of such treachery and wrong, that Lady Theresa's heart burned with indignation that one so vile and worthless should have offered her his love—and when Leonora turned to depart, she bade her wait and bear a letter in return.

"Not by me, for you are angered, lady—and if it make my master wretched, I do not wish to be the means."

When Salvino received the rude dismissal, he immediately sought the palace for an explanation, but the lady refused to see him.

Then when Francisco Salvino returned again to his humble home—the painter's work was ended—he never touched his pencil more—he seemed never to sleep, and he took no nourishment—but his body and his spirit alike pined away, and when at last he lay upon his dying couch, he sent by the Duke a last request to the Lady Theresa, that he might see her once more before he breathed his last. Indignant as she had felt, she could not deny him this—and as she entered the room of the expiring artist, her heart smote her bitterly as she beheld his attenuated frame. Thin and ghastly, his eye seemed to gleam forth with more than earthly brightness—his hair clung to his brow with the cold damps of death, and a feeble smile played around his mouth, as he pressed her hand in welcome.

"Lady," he said, "my heart is broken—without you earth had nothing for which to live—and with your love the star of my destiny is set for ever. But ere I die, this spirit would fain know wherein it has offended."

Theresa told him the story of Leonora—and Francisco denied its verity, and was believed. He sent for the treacherous Guido, and as she stood by his side, she seemed with sorrow and despair scarcely less emaciated than the painter himself. For the peace of her dying master, she told the truth.

It was on the bosom of the wretched lady that Salvino died—his last look was for her, and with his latest breath he poured on her the blessing of a broken heart.

Within a convent the Lady Theresa has taken the veil, and gives her remaining days to heaven—and prayer for the soul of him she loved.

And ere the snows that followed those summer months had descended upon the Appenines, they found the body of the false-hearted girl upon the grave of the buried artist—they knew not how she died—but they laid her beneath the same sod, and though no stone marks the spot—yet the peasants know well the grave where the broken-hearted Signor sleeps.

Mrs. Carlton's Last Party.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE MARTYR WIFE," &c &c.

Mrs. Carlton had two faults, love of display, and penuriousness—opposites that sometimes neutralize each other. She moved among the upper circles; though not with that conscious feeling of equality that seeks no borrowed lights, but shines even in the lustre of its own peculiar good. Mrs. Carlton loved to mingle with those who, in general society, were estimated highest for some intrinsic excellencies of their own, or for the more adventitious merit of possessing great wealth, or on account of their connection with certain families. To these her attentions were of the most perfect kind. When warm in the sunshine of their smiles, she was happiest.

It is hardly to be supposed that Mrs. Carlton could act towards those, no way distinguished in society, with the same attention and urbanity as towards these. She was kind and lady-like to all; but, to the highest, as she esteemed them, rather disposed to be obsequious and deferential.

Mr. Carlton had his weaknesses, also. But pen-fluousness was not one of these; nor was he quite so fond of courting and defering to distinguished people. He loved display, however. And was always desirious of making a good appearance.

The Carltons usually gave a party during the fashionable season, and it was always a splendid affair.—If it was not the most splendid of all, it was no fault of theirs, so far as intention was concerned. But, somehow or other, it generally happened that, after all was over, both the husband and wife felt unhappy for weeks. Something went wrong. Some disappointment or mortification always followed. The real cause of this, however, they could not see. They were not philosophers enough to perceive that their end had been a wrong one—that they had sought honor and praise to themselves, instead of seeking, unselfishly, to entertain others.

Towards the close of a fashionable season, Mrs. Carlton said to her husband—

"It is time, dear, that we were thinking about giving a party."

"Yes. The season is rapidly passing away. Suppose we fix upon Wednesday evening of week after next?"

"That will do. The Eldreths gave a grand affair last week."

"They certainly did. It was, decidedly, the most brilliant party that has yet been given."

"For all that, I didn't enjoy myself half as well as I did at Mr. Wayland's," Mrs. Carlton said, in a thoughtful tone.

"Nor did I. The company were under retraint all the evening. Both Mr. and Mrs. Eldreth seemed trying to do their best, but, somehow or other, they did not seem to possess the tact that is required on such occasions."

"While at Wayland's, no very apparent effort was made to entertain any one, and yet all were full of life and enjoyment. Why this difference?"

"I cannot tell, I am sure. There is no accounting for such things. There is a strange capriciousness about people. Sometimes they will be pleased at a simple flower, and pause to linger over and admire its beauties; at another time the richest boquet will fail to attract a moment's attention. It is the humor. The whole company, I suppose, were in the humor to be pleased at the Waylands—any thing would have pleased them on that evening. They were not in the humor at Eldreths—and nothing could have then pleased."

"Well, I hope they will be in the humor when they come here," Mrs. Carlton said.

"I hope so. But there is no telling," was the husband's reply.

"For all the Eldreths' party was so grand an affair," Mrs. Carlton remarked, after musing for some time, "I think we can eclipse it."

"We can try, at least," was the response of the acquiescing husband.

From that time preparations began to be made for the coming party. Mrs. Carlton, with all her love of display, was, as has been said, penurious in her disposition. She too often spoiled a good thing by mixing with it a little dross that costa trifle less than the pure ingredient. The expense of a party would have been to her an insuperable objection, had not a love of show, and the good opinion and admiration of fashionable people counterpoised it. As it had to be given, the same spirit that projected it prompted to the carrying of it out with a lavish hand. But, wherever a sixpence could be saved without the fact appearing, there Mrs. Carlton placed a ready finger.

When it became necessary to prepare notes of invitation, more than a hundred of which had to be sent out, Mrs. Carlton shut herself up in her room with a large card basket upon a table before her, where had been placed a quire of letter paper, and two or three varieties of French note paper. She first selected and arranged the cards into four parcels—each of which bore the names of visitors distinctly classed in her mind. One of these parcels was taken and counted. It contained twenty cards. Twenty sheets of the finest quality, gilt, ornamented, perfumed, French note paper were then selected, and notes of invitation written on these and directed from the cards. Invitations to the next class, indicated by another pile of cards, were written on a less elegant and cheaper kind of note paper, and the next on a quality still inferior. Quarter sheets of letter paper, torn and neatly folded, sufficed for about forty invitations to people of no particular consideration. By this means, Mrs. Carlton saved about a dollar.

This important matter arranged, a servant was despatched with the notes, which were left at the dwellings of the most fashionable people in the city. As ill luck would have it, one of these slipped inside of another; a fine, perfumed affair into a lonely letter paper missive. The plain invitation happened to be for a family named Gleason, who thought pretty highly of themselves—a little higher, perhaps, than other people thought of them; and the more ornamental one was for a family but lately removed to the city, and on close terms of intimacy with the Carltons.—The name of the latter was Egbert.

"Did you ever see the beat of that!" exclaimed Mrs. Gleason, when she fully comprehended the meaning of the two notes of invitation to the same party so dissimilar in their appearance.

"The beat of what?" asked her sister Mildred, a somewhat elderly young lady.

"The beat of this. The Carltons are going to have a party, and here is our invitation. It's a plain, decent enough affair, with the pith of the whole matter contained in Mrs. C.'s elegant scrawl inside. But just look at another invitation to the same party, that has happened to get inside of ours. It is for the Egberts."

"Upon my word!" ejaculated Miss Mildred, who understood the whole thing as quickly as did her sister. "Isn't that a beautiful affair! Gilt edge and perfume for the Egberts; but plain post for us!—They'll miss me from their saloon, that is very certain."

"Really! It goes ahead of any thing I ever heard of," mused aloud Mrs. Gleason. "I wonder who else has been honored with French note paper, and who with Bath post torn neatly into four quarters. Ha! ha! Doesn't it cap every thing!"

"You won't go, of course," said Mildred.

"I can't say yea nor nay, yet, sis. But I think I know one who will not be there."

"Who?"

"The delectable Mrs. Egbert and her charming daughter."

"How so?"

"Here lies their invitation."

"Well?"

"I shall not send it to them."

"I wouldn't."

"I don't intend to. Let Mrs. Carlton see to sending out correctly her own notes. I have no business with them."

"It'll make a break between the two families."

"That's none of my business. Let them take care of that themselves. But it ought to make a break between the Carltons and every other genteel family in town. Who ever heard of such an outrage? It makes my very blood boil, as I think of it more and more. I wonder in what these Egberts are better than we are? Really, I should like above all things to know."

"They never were at all to my mind, nor the Carltons either," said Mildred. "But, I suppose they are birds of a feather."

A visiter called in while this exciting subject was under consideration.

"You go to Mrs. Carlton's next week?" Mrs. Gleason said, during the conversation that ensued.

"Oh, yes! It's to be a grand affair, I presume. The Carlton's are never behind any one."

"But they're sending out their invitations very strangely."

"How so?"

"They are written on paper to correspond with their notions of each family's standing."

"You must be mistaken," the lady said.

"Not at all," replied Mrs. Gleason. "I have seen two of their notes, our own and that sent to another family. They are as different as fancy French note and plain letter paper can make them."

"Indeed!"

"It is true. On what was yours written?"

"You can see," returned the lady. "I have it here," drawing forth a note of the third class.

"Different from both, as I live! Better than one, and inferior to the other."

"You cannot be in earnest?"

"I never was more so in my life. Look! and see for yourself."

The two notes in the possession of Mrs. Gleason were then shown. The consequence was, that the visiter saw that her family had been considered of less consequence than the Egberts. This incensed her deeply, and she went away resolved in her own mind not to attend the Carltons' party. Like Mrs. Gleason, this lady had a high sense of her own consequence. Of course her pride was touched. Wounded pride is very apt to prompt to retaliation of some sort. It did so in the case of both these ladies. From that time until the evening of the party, they busied themselves in ascertaining as far as possible who had been put upon the distinguished list, and who not; and how all had been arranged in relation to each other. All who could be approached on the subject, prudently, were let into the secret. Some were amused, but more made angry at the outrageous insult, as it was termed.

The evening of the party at length came round.—The preparations had been of the most extensive and costly kind, and the whole arrangements such as to show off the taste and munificence of Mr. and Mrs. Carlton with the best possible effect. Thus far, not a single drawback had made its unwelcome appearance; a thing almost unprecedented in the history of social entertainments, especially where the entertainers are more intent on doing something that shall strike with feelings of admiration, than upon making their guests happy.

Towards nine o'clock, some of the company came dropping in and scattered themselves thinly around the brilliantly lighted saloon. Among the first of these were the Gleasons. Ten o'clock came, and only one or two carriages had stopped at the door; these did not bring any of the first quality to be so classed by Mrs. Carlton. In fact, only two or three of the twenty gilt-edged, perfumed, ornamented French billets, had yet appeared, and only a few of the second class. Nearly all who had come, were of the third and fourth classes.

"Your company assembles quite slowly," remarked Mrs. Gleason to Mrs. Carlton, who was, she saw, beginning to feel annoyed at the, to her, unaccountable tardiness of her guests—especially those who were to give character to the entertainment.

"Fashionable people rarely appear very early," was the pointed reply to this.

The remark, made significantly, cut its way into the feelings of Mr. Gleason, notwithstanding her consciousness that she held the vantage ground over her discriminating hostess. Good breeding prevented her letting this be seen, and making an irritating retort.

Half-past ten nearly completed the arrivals. About one half of those invited had come up. Where were the rest? What could have kept them away?

"I don't understand this," whispered Mrs. Carlton to her husband, with a troubled look. "What can be the matter?"

"I am sure I do not know. But there must be something wrong. Those that are here, do not seem to enjoy themselves."

These few words were spoken hurriedly, in a brief pause which the husband and wife made on passing each other near the door of the room that contained their company.

Mr. Carlton entered the saloon. Mrs. Gleason sat near the door, and did not observe him. He overheard her saying to her sister Mildred,

"It serves 'em perfectly right; that's all I can say."

This remark Mr. Carlton felt alluded to them, and to the fact of their evident disappointment in their company. It depressed his feelings at once, because it intimated a cause why a number of persons in high standing had declined coming to his house—a cause of which he was entirely ignorant. From that time he failed in every effort to appear cheerful, and to make his guests feel at home. Such a spirit is always contagious. If we do not forget self, we can never make those we are endeavoring to entertain happy. Self bends all the thoughts inward; and this is perceived in words, tones, expressions of the countenance, and acts. It cannot be concealed. Every one who came near him was chilled rather than warmed.

As for Mrs. Carlton, the absence of Mrs. Egbert and a number of others, whose presence she most valued, annoyed her beyond her power of concealment. There were few in attendance for whom she cared much. Even the external politeness which she assumed towards these, and the words of welcome she uttered, had in them so little of real feeling, that they deceived no one.

At the table, which was set out with great elegance, three or four gay-hearted young men dispelled the icy atmosphere that had thus far enveloped the company. All felt their genial influence—even to the troubled and mortified Mr. and Mrs. Carlton.

After supper a few cotillions were danced, and then the company dispersed, leaving their host and hostess in a state of mortification and chagrin that was almost inconceivable.

"What can be the matter?" Mrs. Carlton said, the pain she felt causing her eyes to fill with tears.

"I do not know. But somebody is wrong. There is some mystery about this business. I heard Mrs. Gleason say—'It served 'em perfectly right,' and I am sure, by her tone of voice, that she was alluding to us."

"But what can it be? We have done nothing."

"What is this? Somebody has dropped a small package," Mr. Carlton said, stooping down and picking up from beside a chair a folded paper.

As he opened it, two notes fell to the floor. Mrs. Carlton picked them up, and found them to be invitations to the party which she had sent out, but from which the names had been obliterated. Upon one of them, which was of elegant French note paper, was written—"Look on this picture!" Upon the other, which was of plain letter paper, were the words—"And then on this!"

"What is all that?" asked Mr. Carlton, taking the condemning witnesses from the hands of his wife, and musing over them for some time before he comprehended their meaning. When he did, he looked her long and fixedly in the face.

"And you made these distinctions?" he said, at last.

"I only tried to save a little in the price of paper."

"Foolish woman!" murmured Mr. Carlton, half audibly. He said no more. It would have availed nothing. It was plainly apparent that a mortal offence had been given to a number of persons, and that a great many others, who had been considered of importance, were little pleased with the perference that had been shown them.

Several other parties came off during the winter. For two of these no invitations were sent to the Carltons. They understood the reason. Since that time they have never attempted to give a party.

THE YOUNG WIDOW.

BY THE COUNTESS OF BLESSINGTON.

"I am willing to believe that you are wiser than I am, my dear Maria, but are you happier?" said Lady Frances Conway to her friend, Lady Deloraine, a widow of twenty-three. Handsome, rich, and instruite, you possess all that is supposed to bestow happiness, yet you do not possess that blessing."

"You are right, Frances; I am not happy. I have passed the days of early youth in a course of desultory reading, by which I have acquired a knowledge that has only rendered me fastidious, and taken away the taste for a thousand innocent sources of recreation, because they fell short of the standard of intellectual refinement which I had formed in my mind. I have studied metaphysics, until they proved that to be incomprehensible which I had previously only suspected to be so, and all the other sciences have been equally disappointing; in short, the number of ideas I have acquired, without my reasoning powers having attained a proportionate degree of strength, places me in the position of an inexperienced general at the head of a large body of troops, which, as he cannot govern, lead him into continual dangers."

"Then, why not abandon your studies, dear Maria, and endeavor to enlarge your powers of enjoyment?"

"Alas, Frances, I may say of study what Rochefoucault said of the court, 'Elle ne rend pas heureux, mais elle empeche qu'on ne le soit ailleurs.' One of the most scientific men of our day has pronounced that the unripe fruit of the tree of knowledge is always bitter or sour; and scepticism, discontent, and sickness of the mind, are often the results of devouring it. Scepticism, Heaven be thanked, I have been saved from, but discontent has rusted all the powers of my mind. I now feel that knowledge should be acquired gradually, and by laborious study; for the ready-made results of the discoveries, labors, and experience of others, that we acquire, without a previous elementary knowledge, affects the mind, as the bringing a person with weak sight from a dark room into a blaze of light does the eyes—it overpowers and confuses."

"But though the extension of your ideas has not enlarged the sphere of your enjoyments, it may have opened a wider circle for your thoughts."

"I doubt, Frances, if it has done even that. Ideas are but the seeds of thought, and do not produce flowers or fruit unless the soil in which they are sown is fertile. Mine was, perhaps, never rich, but it has been over-cultivated, and this renders its poverty more visible, at least to myself."

"You examine yourself so impartially, Maria, that you might be pronounced a philosopher."

"Would I were! and yet what would that avail me? for philosophy only enables us to support misfortunes, without consoling us for them."

"Why will you not be guided by my advice, and enter more into society? It might amuse you, and you would return to your favorite studies with fresh zest."

"I have given up general society because I found that we must bear with it, or live without it, and the latter has always appeared to me the least difficult."

"Still, Maria, I cannot bear to see you withdraw yourself wholly from it. This abandonement of society induces people to think that you are fastidious, conceited, and unsocial: and I, who know the kindness of your heart, am grieved that you should be misjudged."

"Mais ma chere, are you quite sure that I am misjudged, or are you certain that, were I more known the judgement would not be still more severe? I am fastidious, conceited, and unsocial; I confess my errors, mais, helas! I have not the power, or, perhaps, the inclination, to correct them. Society ennuies me; its emptiness, frivolity, selfishness, and heartlessness, excite my spleen; and, if I retain any portion of the kindness of heart for which you give me credit, it is owing to the seclusion in which I live, which, by keeping me from contact with the ces qualities I have named, saves me from their contagion."

"But you will one day marry again," said Lady Frances, "and then you will think differently, because you will feel differently. You cannot fail to have remarked the assiduous attentions of Lord Avondale, which must mean more than the mere gallantry of a man of fashion to a beauty and a bel esprit."

"I will leave your bonnes compliment unnoticed, my dear Frances," said Lady Maria, "and, as Lord Avondale has never declared any serious intentions to me, I will conclude he has none."

"Time will tell," said Lady Frances; "and I hope, my dear friend, you will not refuse the chance of domestic happiness which such an alliance promises."

"My knowledge of the married state has not, I confess, led me to wish to enter it again."

"I can easily believe it; but recollect that Lord Deloraine, although a very worthy man, was wholly unsuited to you, not only in age, but in every other respect. Lord Avondale, au contraire, is of a suitable age, is handsome, well informed, sensible, and agreeable."

"I do not deny that he is all that you assert, but do I not give you the best reason in the world for not accepting his hand, should he indeed offer it, when I tell you that I should never have bestowed a second thought on him, or discovered these merits, had you, Frances, not drawn my attention to them?"

"This was precisely my case with Mr. Conway. I never remarked that he was good-looking, lively, clever, and good-natured, until my kind friend, Mrs. Stapleton, pointed out these advantages; and yet there are few happier marriages than mine has been, and no wife has a higher estimation of her husband's good qualities. It is the happiness I enjoy that makes me so anxious to see you, my dear Maria, in possession of a similar one, and not wasting your youth, as at present, in obstruse studies, that dull the imagination, and chill the heart."

A few days after the conversation, Lord Avondale, finding himself tete-a-tete with Sir Henry Wilmot, his most intimate friend, consulted him on the subject of marriage.

"And so you advise me to pause ere I make my proposal to Lady Deloraine," said he; "nay, I believe you do more—you advise that I do not propose.—What objection can you possibly offer to her? Is she not beautiful, highly educated, and intellectual? Where could I hope to find so many agremens united in one person?"

"I grant you all this," replied Sir Henry, "and it is precisely because I think her so rich in all the advantages you have named, that I fear she is too charming a woman ever to make a charming wife.—This may appear a paradox, but it is nevertheless true, that the most captivating women make the least agreeable wives. Lady Deloraine's beauty must always attract general admiration, and with it the envy that always follows. The object of general admiration and envy often becomes an artificial character, that is to say, her sources of gratification being artificial, the simple and unsophisticated enjoyments of life soon become insipid to a person accustomed to the stimulating and intoxicating draught of flattery; and she who is made an idol abroad sinks into a discontented and languid companion at home."

"There," said Lord Avondale, "my unceasing and increasing admiration would preclude the discontent you anticipate."

"Pardon me," replied Sir Henry, "but how can you be sure that the admiration will be unceasing and increasing? We get accustomed to every thing, and the charms which, first seen, excited the most lively admiration, are, after some time, viewed with only calm complacency. Happy is she who, in ceasing to be the object of extreme admiration, becomes the object of affection, a sentiment much more valuable and durable, but one which, I fear, would not equally satisfy a beauty and a bel esprit."

"Have you ever loved," demanded Lord Avondale, "that you dare thus profane, by doubting, the durability of one of Love's attributes—admiration?"

"Yes," replied Sir Henry, "I have loved—warmly, truly loved, and the sentiment never arrived at its meridian until the first passionate excitement of admiration had cooled; but, alas! she who had been the idol of my public worship was not content to become the Penates of my hearth, and pined for the incense that had been offered up at her shrine. She was a beauty and a bel esprit, so that it is not without connaissance de cause that I look upon all such as more fitted to be admired than loved, and more suited to find happiness in public attention than in domestic affection."

"But," said Lord Avondale, "would you then condemn the young, the lovely, and the gifted creatures, so formed to excite love, to pass their lives in the heartless pleasure of gratified vanity, without enjoying the elevated, the heart-engrossing happiness of insuring that of another?"

"Better it is that they should so pass it," replied Sir Henry, "than that, after having, for a short time, formed the happiness of that other, they should then, as is almost invariably the case, discover that he cannot form theirs. The aching void that a vanity long accustomed to gratification, and then deprived of it, leaves in the breast of one of these spoiled favorites of Nature, unfits them for the calm contentment of domestic life, as most men have found who have made the experiment."

"Lady Deloraine," observed Lord Avondale, "must be already sated with admiration, and her position precludes the possibility of her marrying from any motive than that of a decided preference—a preference that must confer distinction on whoever she honors with her hand. May it not, then, naturally be concluded that such a woman could be happy at home, and that the love of one could console her for the admiration of the many?"

"And on this hypothetical pour-etre you are willing," replied Sir Henry, "to risk your future happiness? Nay, be candid; had you not made up your mind, (as people say, when they determine on something in which they least allow reason to influence them) before you consulted me? You look guilty, my dear Avondale; but you are only an additional instance of the verity of the observation, that people never ask for advice until they have determined not to follow it. But supposing that Lady Deloraine should form one of the rare examples of a celebrated beauty, being content to give up general homage for individual affection, or, as was happily said, to turn all her small pieces of money into one solid gold coin, remember that there are other dangers to be dreaded—she is a Bas Bleu. And recollect what one of the most acute observers of modern days has asserted on this subject:

"'But oh! ye lords of ladies intellectual,
Inform us truly, have they not henpeck'd you all?'"

"My own taste for literature," replied Avondale, with a grave air, "renders an intellectual wife indispensable to my happiness, while it must save me from the inglorious thraldom you would threaten me with."

"I have only one more observation to make," said Sir Henry, "and that is, may not the very similarity of your pursuits and tastes beget a spirit of emulation little calculated to insure domestic harmony? and may not differences of opinion on literary points

"'Wake the nerve where (angry thoughts) are born?'

Fancy a discussion on a passage in Plotinus 'on the Beautiful,' conducted on the part of your wife with that animation which generally characterises the discussion of ladies, making you forget the beautiful before you in the abstract, or a dispute on one of his theories on 'Felicity,' putting yours to flight; while an argument on his 'Descent of the Soul,' makes you wish to believe, with Mahomet, that women had none. The 'Four Dialogues' of Plato may lead to endless ones, until you are content that a dictatorial monologue on the part of Lord Avondale should supply the part of the domestic causerie so agreeable in tetes-a tete with less highly educated women."

"You refer to the abuse, and not the use, of literature," said Lord Avondale. "A mere superficial knowledge might lead to the evils you menace me with; but Lady Deloraine has 'drunk deep, not tasted the Hyperian spring,' and it has strengthened, not intoxicated, her faculties."

"But have you not observed," asked Sir Henry, "that there are moments in which languor and discontent are visible in her manner? How would you support this reaction—this decided want of the vis animæ, that makes to-morrow cheerful as to-day?"

"I flatter myself," said Lord Avondale, "that congeniality of mind, and sympathy of tastes, would fill up 'the void left aching in her breast,'—a void which must be the cause of the inequality of spirits you remark."

"I see you are decided, my dear Avondale, and can only add that, unlike the generality of advisers, when their advice is not followed, I assure you my best wishes for your happiness are yours; and, should my prediction ever be verified, you shall never hear from me that most mortifying of all responses, 'I told you so;' and I truly and sincerely hope your lot may be more fortunate than was mine."

Lord Avondale continued to pay the most marked attention to the fair widow, who, more influenced by the advice of Lady Frances Conway than by her own feelings, received them with a complacency that encouraged him to declare his affection, and to demand her hand. Enamoured as he was, there were moments, however, in which he could not help observing that, even in the midst of one of his most passionate declarations of attachment, the object of them would ask his opinion on the works of some of her favourite authors; and when gently reproached by him for her coldness, she would acknowledge that reason had more charms for her than passion, and that the operations of the brain interested her more than those of the heart. Nevertheless, he did not despair of animating this beautiful statue in time, and pressed his suit so ardently, that at length it was crowned with success, and he led the lovely widow to the hymeneal altar. "The happy couple" (for all newly married ones are, according to newspaper phraseology, pronounced to be so) stepped into their travelling carriage, after a splendid dejeuner given to their friends, and were whirled off as fast as four post-horses could convey them to one of the seats of the bridegroom. No sooner had they left the pavement, than Lord Avondale, seizing the hand of his bride, pressed it fondly to his lips, and exclaimed—

"This, my adored Maria, is the happiest moment of my life! Tell me, dearest, that it is not the least happy of yours!"

"There is something very exciting, I admit," replied Lady Avondale, "in being driven thus rapidly along. The quick movement of the carriage has an agreeable influence on the nervous system. You have, of course, studied the nervous system?"

The bridegroom was at that moment sensible of a considerable shock in his, and, as he glanced at the beautiful face of his companion, which was as calm and unmoved as if she had been ten years a wife. Instead of being only two hours a bride, he felt that there was something contagious in her coldness.

"I hope the library at Avondale Castle is an extensive one," said the lady "and that you have got an intelligent librarian."

"Yes, it is a good one; but you must be satisfied with me for a librarian—at least for the present dearest, for I have none."

"I hope we have no neighbors, for I should detest being broken in upon by visitors, as I always devote my mornings to study and writing."

"You will, I trust, suffer me, my dear, to share your seclusion?"

"I fear we should only mutually interrupt each other. I like to pursue my studies quite alone, for the least noise distracts my attention."

Never did bridegroom find himself in a more embarrassing position than Lord Avondale. Passionately in love, he felt that the coldness of his wife imposed the most chilling constraint on him—a constraint that every hour increased, as he discovered that her faculties of thinking had been cultivated and developed at the total expense of those of feeling. Every effort he made to direct her thoughts to their actual position, and to the happiness he anticipated from it, was met by some erudite hypothesis based on the different opinions of ancient writers on the subject of marriage; and he might have fancied himself seated by a pedantic tutor rather than a lovely bride, so foreign was the whole tenor of her conversation from what might be expected under similar circumstances. Never was a honey-moon passed like that of Lord and Lady Avondale. Cold, dispassionate, and absorbed by her studies, the newly-made wife seemed to consider every moment taken from them as a waste of time. The civilities of the neighboring nobility and gentry, no persuasions of her lord could induce her to tolerate; and he who had hitherto lived on terms of great cordiality with them found himself placed in the most awkward position by the sauvagerie of his Countess. Too late did he discover that he was to expect no companionship in his wife. Her mornings were passed in poring over books, and writing marginal notes on them, and the evening found her languid and dispirited from the too close application of the previous hours. In short, Lady Avondale was a book-worm, and, never having possessed a lively imagination or quickness of apprehension, her studies were so disproportioned to the calibre of her intellect, that she became almost as remarkable for her dullness as for her rare beauty. Her temper was placid and even. She never contradicted her lord, but contented herself by adhering so pertinaciously to her own plans and modes of passing her time, that any attempt to change or infringe on them was found to be impossible.

"With a beautiful and even tempered wife, who could suppose that a man's home could be so wholly destitute of all the charm and sunshine which the presence of a woman spreads over it!" thought Lord Avondale, as he sat alone in a morning-room he had appropriated to his own use ever since he had been excluded from the library. "Study has positively become a monomania with Lady Avondale. Every subject to which I endeavor to direct her attention only leads her to fresh researches in the musty tomes, over which she broods for hours. If I seduce her to a walk to my pheasantry, she becomes impatient to return home, that she may consult Buffon relative to some peculiarity she noticed in the bird, and if I lead her to the conservatory or gardens, instead of taking pleasure in the rare plants and flowers to be met with there, she thinks only of consulting works on botany and flowers, in order that she may analyse and class the different species and genus of those that attracted her notice. An observation about a horse or a dog is sure to lead to an erudite and dry dissertation, on the qualities of these animals; and in short, I cannot open my lips without drawing on myself a lecture replete with dull scientific information, the utterance of which, with the abstruse terms she uses, takes off all charm from those rosy lips, which I long to hear talk nonsense, in preference to the stale wisdom they pronounce. It was only last night that I unhappily remarked on the brilliancy of the moon, and forthwith I was favored with an epitome of the whole planetary system. Oh, ye gods! even ignorance itself would be preferable to this continual mode of converting life into a seminary, uncheered by the relaxation of play permitted by those institutions. Why, why did I reject the counsel of my friend, and wed a woman who will not deign to bestow happiness on me, and on whom I cannot confer it? It is impossible to disguise from myself that I am but a cipher in the mode of existence my wife has adopted. My library, and not myself, constitutes her happiness. Where is the interchange of thought, the delicious causeries I had anticipated—those charming tetes a-tete which with a sensible and intellectual wife form the charm of wedded-life?"

Such were the painful reflections that daily passed in the mind of Lord Avondale, as day succeeding day found his wife pursuing the same course of arduous study followed by similar results—langour and low spirits. His neighbors, offended that their advances towards intimacy had been rejected, treated him with a distant coldness whenever they by chance met, and he lived in a state of positive seclusion. He had now been six months a husband, and Lady Avondale promised soon to make him a father. He hoped that her interesting situation would have produced a change in her conduct, and he repeatedly urged, on the score of her health, the necessity of taking more exercise, and being more in the open air. His pleadings were unsuccessful, for she declared that now, more than ever, was study indispensable for her, in order that she might pursue the various systems laid down by physicians for the management of infants, and the conducting a nursery; and, impressed with the seriousness of this imaginary duty, she devoted more time than ever to reading, and making notes on this subject. The consequences were even more grave than Lord Avondale had anticipated; for her health, injured by her improper mode of life, gave way when her delicate position most required its being strengthened, and she prematurely gave birth to a male infant, who only lived for a few minutes, leaving its mother in a state that for some weeks forbade hope of her recovery. How bitter were the feelings of Lord Avondale during this crisis, and how were they aggravated by the knowledge that to his wife's imprudence and obstinacy might be imputed the disappointment of his hopes and her danger! He however watched by her sick couch with an attention and tenderness that never abated during the long and tedious hours that confined her to it. He soothed, he consoled her, and, weakened by so much suffering, she became docile as a child in his hands.

It was now for the first time that Lady Avondale learned to know the value of affection, and, as this knowledge dawned on her mind, a sense of her own unworthiness came with it. How did she reproach herself for the selfish habits of indulgence so recklessly pursued since her marriage, and her utter disregard for the happiness of that dear being, who like a ministering angel, watched day and night by her pillow. Bitterly did her conscience accuse her of having brought on by her own folly the catastrophe she now deplored. A film which had obscured her mental sight seemed to have been removed from her eyes, for now all things appeared to her in their true colors. How blamable, how sinful had been her conduct! When her convalescence allowed her fond husband to converse with her without restraint, how was she astonished and charmed with the versatility and extent of his information, and the unaffected manner in which it was revealed. His knowledge, not like hers, crude or indigested by the voracity with which it had been devoured, gushed forth clear, fresh, and bright, as some limpid fountain refreshing all that it touched, and she found that she derived more advantage from his conversation than from all the hours formerly devoted to ill-regulated and excessive study. And this was the man whose society she had slighted, for the unhealthy pursuit which had hitherto absorbed all her time, and led to such fatal results! Now, indeed, did she appreciate him truly, and while forming a just estimate of his mental powers, learn to know the infirmity of her own.

Lady Avondale left her sick chamber an altered and a better woman. Her husband now directed and shared her studies, which ever after engrossed only a reasonable portion of her hours, leaving her sufficient time for the fulfilment of all her domestic duties, and for the cultivation of those social ones which have rendered her as popular in her neighborhood as she was at the commencement of her sojourn at Avondale Castle disliked. The qualities of her heart, so long allowed to lie dormant, owing to literature having totally absorbed her time, have now been fully developed, and their healthful exercise constitute the happiness of her husband, and of a beautiful boy, with which it has pleased Heaven to bless them. She has written, but not published, a little book, setting forth the dangers of over-study, which she presents anonymously to any youthful person of her own sex too much addicted to it, and, when reflecting on her past errors, which with a deep humility she often does, she dwells with heartfelt gratitude on the forbearance and tenderness of her husband, which accomplished her correction, and restored her to happiness.

THE TEMPTATION;

OR,

THE EVILS OF IDLENESS.

BY J. T. S. SULLIVAN.

"I will take your son, then, into my employ, but I shall expect him to be industrious, and faithful to his business. Should he prove to be what you have represented him, he shall not regret the arduous duties imposed upon him during his apprenticeship. I have no son; my nephews are provided for; and he may hope to be my successor. But industry, temperance and fidelity are the conditions."

"Thanks—a thousand thanks, my dear Marville!" replied the aged father, with emotion. "You will find Harry capable, and, I am sure, faithful. You have removed a burden of care from this broken heart, and I can only give you the gratitude of a sorrowing parent."

"Don't speak of gratitude, Williamson. If your boy prove what I anticipate, the gratitude will lie on my side. Good morning. My kind regards to Mrs. Williamson, and let me see Henry to-morrow morning at 7 o'clock."

With a cordial shake of the hand, Mr. Marville took his leave. He had scarcely left the humble dwelling of the overjoyed father, before Mrs. Williamson made her appearance, nicely, yet, tidily dressed, in a quiet, clean cap, and snow-white muslin frock, bearing a waiter with some lemonade and home-made cake, which she placed upon the table, with an exclamation—

"Has he gone?"

"Yes, my love; but he has left behind him the brightest hopes to cheer our hearts."

Here the old man began to detail to his wife the conversation he had held with Marville, and the two employed themselves in picturing the future prospects of their son and only child. The desire to impart this news to Harry, as he was always called at home, made the parents quite impatient of his return.

"It lacks but an hour of dinner-time," said the mother, "and he will soon be here. Bless me! I forgot the fish. It will be boiled to pieces!"

With this she hurried to the kitchen, leaving the old man to dream of Harry's good fortune.

Henry Williamson, the father, had been a gentleman of large fortune. He had received a liberal education in his youth, and, being an only child, was brought up to no profession, but that of "killing time." Fortunately for himself, his tastes led him to study, and he had made himself something of a reputation among the literary men of Boston, where he resided. Determined to bequeath his fortunes to his son, and deeming an English education the best, to fit his child for the full enjoyment of his wealth, Mr. Williamson had sent Henry to London, where he remained until arrangements were made for his reception at school. He had attained his fourteenth year when he entered upon his studies.

Henry was handsome, amiable, and, by nature, talented, but he showed but little disposition to study. Still his fear of disgrace induced him to apply himself, but only to an extent necessary to keep up with his class. Letters from England gave Mr. Williamson encouragement of his son's progress, and he was looking forward anxiously to the time when he should welcome Harry home, as an educated young man. How uncertain are our hopes of the future!

When Harry had attained his eighteenth year, Mr. Williamson had determined to visit England, for the sole purpose of seeing his son. He was obliged, preparatory to his leaving Boston, to attend more particularly to his estate, in order to feel assured that every thing would go on in its proper course during his absence. It was a novel thing for Mr. Williamson to turn his attention to such matters, and he was necessarily brought in contact with persons of all grades of society. The novelty of his employment was charming to this man of leisure. He began to make improvements here, and investments there, until he found himself involved in speculations. He fell into the hands of some schemers, and in less than eighteen months from the time he took the management of his property into his own hands, he saw himself entangled in such an intricate snarl of embarrassments, that he called in his friends to investigate his affairs. It was too soon discovered that Mr. Williamson was insolvent. The blow was terrible to him! With almost a broken heart he imparted the intelligence to his faithful wife, a woman of superior mind, and remarkable dignity of character.

With female fortitude did Mrs. Williamson listen to this melancholy statement of her husband. Forgetting herself, she bent her whole soul upon inventing sources of consolation to the partner of her woes.

"It is sad, my dear Harry, very sad," said the old lady; "but all is not lost. They will leave us something, and our wants are few. Henry is the only source of care. But he can soon find employment here, and, like other young men, less capable, he may raise himself one of these days to influence and distinction."

"True, my love, he may do that. We will hope for the best, and may God grant him strength to bear this reverse of fortune. He must return at once."

The next day a letter was despatched to England, re-calling Henry, setting forth the change in his father's circumstances, and preparing his mind for the altered state of things he had to expect at home.

Soon after the fatal disclosure of Mr. Williamson's affairs, his creditors had a meeting, and resolved to furnish a small house in an unfrequented but respectable part of the city, and allow him, during his own life-time, an annual income of eight hundred dollars; and to his wife, in case she survived him, half that sum during her life. But no provision was made for the son. Most of the family plate was also given him for life, but at his death to revert to the creditors.

This was something: but to a man whose income had never been less than twenty-five thousand per annum, it seemed a mere pittance. The self-sacrificing character of Mrs. Williamson, together with her superiority of mind, made this act of the creditors appear in a light of generosity, and inspired her husband with a sense of contentment, which made his situation assume a less desperate character than he had at first considered it.

Mr. Williamson's friends in England had determined that Henry should remain at college until the expiration of that term, when he might retire during the vacation, without giving publicity to his father's misfortunes This detained Henry several months, and, before he reached home, his parents had become domiciliated in their new abode.

At last, Henry arrived. His father's friends had taken care to supply his wardrobe amply, and when he entered the presence of his parents, a feeling of pride filled both hearts at beholding the manly figure of their son, set forth to the best advantage in his subdued English dress.

It were out of place here to detail the mutual sorrowings and congratulations which took place between the three. Suffice it to say, that in less than one month, through the instrumentality of Mr. Williamson's friends, Henry had been introduced into society, and, though still a boy, had become quite a pet of the gay world. In those days, a young gentleman, educated in Europe, was so rare a thing, that he was doomed to be lionized on his return. Such was Henry's fate.

The dangers of society are known comparatively to but few, especially when applied to a young man of Henry's beauty, tact, accomplishments and gay spirits. Courted for his musical powers, no party was given without an invitation being extended to Harry. No supper party among young men was deemed made up, unless the convivial powers of Harry Williamson were enlisted to "make it go off well." This led Harry into a whirl of dissipation, each day of which life made him less fit for the dull routine of business. His parents were retired from the world since their change of fortune, and they knew not of the extent of Harry's gaiety. The father believed him looking out for employment, and was totally ignorant of the course his son pursued.—The lynx eye of a mother read deeper. She never closed her eyes at night until Harry's step had been heard upon the stairs, and often would she creep to his bed-side after he had fallen asleep, to satisfy herself he was at home.

Too often these stolen visits were the source of intense anxiety. The deep sleep, the rapid, heavy breathing, and the inflamed eye-lid, told her of something more than innocent gaiety—and she began to dread the consequences of her son's idle life.

The mother's fears were not unfounded. Often did Harry reach his humble home with uncertain step, and whirling brain. The freedom from restraint, to which he had not been accustomed while at school in England, led him into excesses of which he had heretofore been entirely ignorant.

There is a strange fascination in vice to the young mind. Its indulgence is regarded as an evidence of manliness, and this false sentiment has been the ruin of many a noble heart. Harry Williamson was associated with all the idle young men about town.—True, they were mostly the sons of gentlemen, but idleness is the sister of vicious habits and extravagance, and seldom is seen apart from the latter. It was the case with Harry. His companions had money, he had none. If he obtained it, it was by incurring a debt to a friend. He wished also to appear their equal, and this involved him again in debt to tailors and hatters, boot-makers and bosiers, all of whom toil hard, and require payment of their dues. To the pay-day, Harry gave but little care. His thoughtless life allowed him no time for such reflections. He played cards too, for his companions did, and he was the more induced to this vice, because he hoped to gain, and thus supply himself with money. But he who gambles to win, unless he have the means to pay his losses, always plays at double disadvantage with those who have. He becomes timid and again desperate by turns, giving his adversary the benefit of this uncertainty—an uncertainty never failing to ruin the money-less gambler. Harry had involved himself in "debts of honor," no called, to a large amount, to pay which he neither had means nor hopes. This brought him gradually into disrepute among his companions, and his credit among the tradesmen was also declining. He would often drink to drown the recollections of his melancholy situation, and the increase of this habit was not lost upon his mother.

She had spoken to him of the necessity of his situation. With tears in her eyes she called upon him to change his course of life. With tears in his eyes did Harry promise, resolved at the moment to reform. But the sight of his companions, an invitation, a proposition for some new amusement, found him too weak to say "no," and away he went into the same channel of dissipation, breaking a mother's heart, and laying the foundation for his own ruin.

Let us now take a glance at a different family.—Lewis Marville was the son of an Englishman who had settled in Boston just before the revolution began its work. He had but small means, and with these, through his industry, he had established a highly respectable name among the merchants. His son Lewis was brought up in the most strict manner, and at his father's death, being the only son, he continued the business. His only sister was married at the age of eighteen and left him, only twenty-fours years old, with a good business, to look after himself alone. As his income was sufficient, he determined to marry. He selected a woman suited to him in every aspect, and with her and his unostentatious home, he began life without an idea of any other pleasure, than that of attending to his store, and contributing to the happiness of his partner in life, his Bessy, as he called his wife.

It was not an unusual thing in those days for merchants of extensive business to have their stores and dwellings in the same building. Such was the case with Lewis Marville. And he occupied the same house in which he had been born, and in which his father commenced business before him.

At early dawn Lewis Marville was at his post.—When not occupied with business, he was reading, or applying himself to the education of his only child, a daughter. He had watched over the gradual expansion of her infant mind with rigid care, and endeavored to instil into her heart the firmest principles of virtue and morality. Nor did his efforts prove fruitless. She grew up a fine intelligent woman, not beautiful, yet by no means the reverse. Her associations with the world were such as to keep her profoundly ignorant of the vice of "high life," and she looked upon existence as a quiet Sabbath-day, varied only by the little changes of domestic character, or the anxieties of business.

When Elizabeth Marville had attained her eighteenth year, her mother died. This was an irreparable loss to herself and her father. And the sincerity of that deep-rooted, calm, but resigned grief, depicted upon the countenances of the daughter and husband, as they kneit beside the grave, would have told any one acquainted with the human heart, that many a day would come and go, before the wound of sorrowing grief could be healed.

Soon after this melancholy bereavement, the only clerk which Mr. Marville had ever employed, received an injury of a severe character from a fall, and his physician peremptorily forbade his further attention to business. This accident devolved more than ordinary duties upon Mr. Marville. He could not find a man to replace his old counting-house companion, and his attention was now wholly devoted to his own affairs. His business was extensive, and his fortune sufficient to have enabled him to live on his income. But his whole life had been one of constant employment, and he no more thought of retiring from mercantile life, than he did of giving up his visits to church on Sunday.

In this emergency, his daughter came to his assistance. She began by copying his correspondence, filing away his papers, and at last made herself actually his clerk. She could have married, and married well, but she would not leave her father. The beautiful Lizzy Marville, the confidential clerk of her father, became a subject of remark. Many a merchant went to Mr. Marville's store to see the clerk, when he would otherwise have written. But the universal esteem in which she was held, made her father proud of his child; and, knowing her as he did, he felt no uneasiness in leaving her in charge of the counting-house when his duties called him to the exchange. Still the business kept his daughter too confined, and he determined to seek an assistant.

It was at this moment that Mrs. Williamson induced her husband to confer with Mr. Marville about receiving Henry into his store, and the result of the interview we have read at the commencement of this story. The next day after that interview was the day on which Henry was to make his appearance at the counting-house of his new employer.

The father and mother waited dinner, but Henry did not come home; so they partook of their frugal repast, conjuring up all kinds of fancies as to the causes of Henry's absence. It was no uncommon thing for Henry to be absent from dinner, but that day it struck the parents as very remarkable—they were so anxious to see him. Tea evening come, but Henry did not make his appearance. The clock struck ten—eleven—twelve. The old gentleman awoke in his easy chair: it was two hours later than his usual time for retiring.

"Hasn't he come home yet, mother?"

"Not yet," replied Mrs. Williamson—desirous of keeping the lateness of the hour from the father—"but he will be here directly.'

The old gentleman pulled out his watch. "What? my love, it's past twelve o'clock!"

"But, Henry may be at some party, dear—he will not tarry long."

"It is no time of night for decent young men to be out—and I begin to fear Harry's hours are not very suitable to business. It's high time he had employment. Listen! the clock struck one!"

"You had better go to bed, dear. I will sit up for Henry, and tell him about Mr. Marville."

"No, no, wife! I must see him myself. He must be home soon. How can a young man leave his parents thus to watch for him. 'Tis cruel, and were it not the anxiety I feel for his future welfare, I should be disposed to close the doors upon him forever."

"Remember, husband, you were young once.—When young men get together they know not how time flies. Harry is not aware that we are anxiously waiting his return."

"But he cannot be in good comoany! No young men of respectability are out of their homes at this hour! I am very glad Mr. Marville has kindly promised to take him—else he might go to ruin, if the work has not been already completed."

"Ah!—no, husband! Harry has a good heart. He is easily led astray. Kindness does every thing with him—so when he comes in, speak kindly to him. I am sure it will have more effect than harsh means. Remember, too, husband, that Harry has been idle. His life will now change, and he will become a worthy man."

"I trust he may. But these hours make me dread the trial. Such bad habits are not reformed in a day."

"But if he is occupied he will have no chance to see his old companions, and all may be well yet."

"We will hope for the best, wife. Hark! the door opens!"

And the door did open, and as Harry locked it, he heard voices. He stood still, in breathless suspense. He did not expect to find his parents up. His head was bursting with excitement. His pulse was quick and feverish. He had just left the gaming-table—where he had not only involved himself deeper in debts of honor, but had also had an altercation with a man whom he would have blushed to acknowledge in daylight as a companion. This altercation had given rise to high words; Harry had received "the lie," and in return had toiled his antagonist to the floor. In the midst of this excitement he turned towards home. He stood at the door, hesitating whether he should confront his parents or leave the house.

His mother, who had heard the door locked, and was waiting for Harry to ascend the stairs, came with a light to see who it might be. It was too late and Harry was obliged to go up. He met his mother, and followed her into the little parlour, where his father sat in his arm-chair, his gouty leg tied up in flannels, holding his watch. His mother put down the lamp, took her seat, and prepared to fold up her sewing with trembling nervousness; while Harry seated himself in the first vacant chair, and with downcast looks awaited the bursting of the storm he expected would greet him.

A long silence ensued. At last the clock struck two. The silence of night made the heavy vibrations distinctly heard, and they fell like knells upon Harry's heart.

"Harry! Harry!" exclaimed his father, and hid his face in his hands. The old man had not even looked upon his son, and these tones of desponding sorrow came so unexpectedly to the self-reproached boy, or man, for so he looked upon himself, that his feelings with unexpected revulsion, overwhelmed him. He sprang forward to his father's chair, fell upon his knees, seized his parent's hand, and burst into tears. He could say nothing, for he had nought to say. The old man's emotion subsided, and angry feelings gave way to kindly ones.

"Sit down, Harry, and listen to me."

Harry did as he was bidden. The old man wiped away the tears which had filled his eyes, and giving his wife a look of inquiring anxiety, began:

"Harry, your mother and myself have had but one care in life: your welfare. We have watched over you in infancy, until you grew a promising boy.—While fortune smiled, and means were within our reach, those means were freely given to secure to you the best gift within a parent's power, a liberal education. God saw fit to visit us with reverses; for ourselves we cared not, for we are old, and fast tottering to eternal rest: but for you, my boy, the blow seemed heavy. We were forced to recall you home from England. You came to us the realization, nay, more, of our fondest hopes. We have passed many hours in consultation as to your future course in life. I am unable to have you sitted for a profession, and have therefore long since determined to make a merchant of you, if opportunity offered. That opportunity has presented itself. My old and tried friend, Mr. Marville, has agreed to take you into his counting-house, and desires to see you tomorrow morning, at seven o'clock. You will, of course, go to him. He is a punctual man, and I desire you not to forget that he will expect you as the clock strikes."

Here the old gentleman made a pause. He saw that Harry's feelings were touched, for his face was hid in his hands; and he could see by the convulsive throes of his chest, that he was stifling his sobs. He waited a few minutes, and continued—

"I have little to say, Harry, but that little had better be said now. I never before had the slightest suspicion of your bad hours. I dread to learn the use you have made of your time of late. I hope I may never learn. Your looks to-night are haggard, and I fear you have not been where a gentleman would wish to be seen. I do not mean by a gentleman the man who makes the best bow, and wears the most fashionable clothes, for any rascal may do this. The roughest leather takes a polish, if rubbed long enough. But I mean by a gentleman, a man who fears no one, shuns no one, is slave to no one, and who does to others as he would be done by, for the deed's sake, while he is ready to suffer a strict scrutiny into every act of his life. Such a gentleman I would have you be, my son. Wealth cannot give it, nor poverty rob you of it. You are no longer the heir to wealth. Remember this, that he has most friends who needs none. And the only way to secure yourself friends in life, is to place yourself above the necessity of needing them. You will, perhaps, feel it a degradation to enter Mr. Marville's store as an apprentice to your future profession. I hope you will not, but I fear the follies of youth. Pin the Arabian proverb in your hat—'Ask not who my father was, but what I am!'—and keep this before your eyes, with the conviction in your heart, that nothing is demeaning to a man which is honest in itself, and esteemed by persons whose opinions are worth the having. Quit your old associates—they love you not, nor are their habits suitable to a poor young man, who has the responsibility of an honest name resting upon him. Above all, my dear boy, remember your parents. Their only hope rests upon their child, and God grant this hope may be realized. Good-night, my boy. God bless you!"

The old gentleman took his crutch, and with deep emotion evident in his very limbs, he limped, with the assistance of his wife, to his chamber.

Harry would have hurried after him to kiss his hand—to tell him what he felt—how deeply he lamented his past errors; but he was chained to his chair, and his very heart threatened to burst its prison-house. He seized a lamp, rushed to his chamber, threw himself upon his bed, and gave vent to a flood of tears.

Tears, even to a young man, afford not the relief they do to woman. Women require tears as a safety-valve to pent-up feelings. Men require excitement to work them off. If tears do come, they leave a man subdued, but not relieved. So it was with Harry Williamson. When he rose from his couch, his brain, his heart, were hot—he was overwhelmed with repentance. He thought, in the absence of all associations, that he could snap the links of his old habits—that he could reform his mode of life in that hour—that, in fact, he was a reformed man. He made resolutions—no one ever made better—and he determined on the morrow to commence a new life a better man.

Just as he was about to extinguish his lamp, he heard a gentle tap at his door. He opened it, and there stood his mother.

"Good-night, my son," she said; "I could not go to bed without a good-night kiss. Now, my dear Harry, go to sleep; get all the rest you can. I will be up at six, and wake you. Good-night."

He kissed his doting mother, and as he closed the door, he stopped, and with his hand pressed to his forehead—"to wrong such a mother! what a wretch I have been!" he exclaimed; and all the hours he had robbed her of sleep—all the anxious moments he had caused her—all the pain he had inflicted upon her, seemed to rush upon him at once. He saw his own worthlessness—the despicable character of his associates, and the misery he had entailed upon himself; and all for what?

"No!" he exclaimed, half audibly, "no! I will show my father and mother how I love them, and that I am still worthy of their care and affection."

With these reflections, he sought his bed.

The next morning, before seven o'clock, Harry was on his way to Mr. Marville's store, followed by the blessings and prayers of the two only friends he had in the world. The clock struck seven as he reached the counting-house. He opened the door.

"Good-morning, sir," said Mr. Marville, laying down his pen, and turning his quiet but amiable countenance towards Harry. "Your business, sir?"

"My name is Henry Williamson, sir," said Harry, taking off his hat, and closing the door.

"You are punctual, sir, and I am glad to see it.—Take a seat, sir. There are the morning papers, Mr. Williamson. Amuse yourself a moment with them, until I have finished this letter."

Harry took his seat, and mechanically took a paper; but reading was out of the question. He held the paper in his hand, but his eyes wandered about to examine the room of which he was soon to become an habitual inmate.

It was a room very simply furnished, but every thing in it bore the mark of age, use, and comfort, and gave a cheerful, quiet, business-like feeling to all who examined it. On one side of an old-fashioned fire-place, stood a tall desk, at which Mr. Marville was writing. He was dressed in a plain suit of black, the same sombre color he had worn since his wife's death; his grey hairs were nicely combed back from his forehead, and were gathered in a cue behind, very neatly tied with black ribbon; his silk stockings fitted tight to a well-formed leg, and his shoes were as bright as blacking and labor could make them. On the other side of the fire-place stood a table-desk, with a chair unoccupied, neatly dusted, and as bright and comfortable as well-kept mahogany of fifty years old always looks. Opposite to the fire-place, stood a large, old-styled paper-case, and on either side hung maps of harbours, signals, flags of different nations, etc. etc. In the centre of the room was a small table, on which the daily papers were thrown, and a chair on each side. The floor was sprinkled with white sand, and although few steps had disturbed it that morning, it had been there long enough to dry.

A glance told Harry that the counting-room was merely a place of business, and furthermore, that all business was done with exactness and promptitude.

Mr. Marville finished his letter, read it over, and rang his bell. In a moment, a young lady, about Harry's age, dressed with all the neatness a Quaker could have desired, and looking as bright and cheerful as the November morning without, entered the room.

"Mr. Williamson, my dear," said Mr. Marville; "and this, sir, is my daughter, Miss Elizabeth."

Henry had risen from his seat. He had heard of Miss Lizzy Marville, "the clerk," as she was called, but he had not expected to find her such a person.

"Mr. Williamson and myself must have some private conversation, Elizabeth—but before you leave us, run your eye over that letter, and tell me what you think of it. This is a fine morning, sir," addressing himself to Henry; "but day sets in now with a nipping air. To you young men it's nothing, but my old limbs begin to feel it."

"It is cold, sir, at dawn," replied Henry, who had never seen the morning dawn for five years, unless when returning home so heated by wine that Kamschatka's cold would have been unheeded.

"But, father," said Miss Lizzy, after reading the letter, "you give him here no discretionary power to act. Suppose the ship be forced to put into another port, or cannot obtain this cargo at Java? I would add a few words, giving him some power in case of emergency."

"That might be well, Lizzy. Please add that, and copy it—I will sign the copy."

"Breakfast will be ready immediately," she replied, as she folded the letter, and placed it upon the table desk, under a weight, before leaving the two to their private conversation.

"Well, Mr. Williamson, your father informs me that you are desirous of becoming a merchant."

"I am, sir, desirous of getting any occupation.—My father is poor, and I must earn my own livelihood."

"Poverty has come upon many other estimable men as well as your father, Mr. Williamson: and will be the lot of many yet to come. This is the natural course of events. But to the point! I know you are entirely unacquainted with business. Your father told me this much, and I hesitated much as to taking you into my counting-house. Yet, industry and perseverance will soon enable you to become a business man, and to repay me for the trouble I may have in bringing you up to be a merchant."

"You will find me willing to work, sir."

"I am glad to hear that. A will to do is one of the essentials in attaining an end. My hours and rules are strict. You must be here daily at six o'clock. You will copy my correspondence, keep account of sales and invoices, and obey such instructions as myself or daughter may give you. You will be kept busy until nightfall, oftentimes later. You must, therefore, resign all thoughts of pleasure, and go to work!"

"I am ready, sir, to begin—and prepared for the trial."

"Have you breakfasted?"

"No, sir!"

"Go home and get your breakfast, and return as soon as you can."

Harry hurried home, and found his mother anxious to know all that had happened. Harry related his conversation with Mr. Marville, and spoke in admiration of Miss Lizzy. He also repeated his determination to break off all connection with his old acquaintances, and to devote himself exclusively to business. He despatched his breakfast hastily; and was off to his new duty.

Never was parent's heart more rejoiced than was Mrs. Williamson's that morning. The realization of her fondest hopes seemed to be at hand. She looked upon her son as rescued from the gulf of vice into which she feared his evil associates had drawn him, and, hurried with youthful steps to her husband's apartment, to impart her joy and assist him at his morning toilette.

Harry had returned sooner than Mr. Marville had anticipated, and he gave him a cheering smile as he entered the door.

"You are prompt, Mr. Williamson, and we will at once put you to your task. Here, sir, is the letter book into which my business correspondence is copied. You will mark the page on the letter answered, if it be an answer, and if not, make this sign, to indicate that it is not. There is also an index, into which you will transcribe the name of the person to whom the letter is written. Now, sir, to begin, please copy this letter. Here are quills, ink, and knife at hand."

Henry went to his work with all the ardour of his sanguine temperament, filled with good resolutions, and believing that he had already vanquished himself.

During his occupation Miss Marville entered the room. With his accustomed politeness, Henry sprang from his seat, and stood respectfully, pen in hand, to wish her the compliments of the morning.

"Don't disturb yourself, Mr. Williamson," said the lady; "you must not mind my coming in or going out, or you will never get on with your labors."

The self-possession, the tranquility and dignity of Miss Marville, somewhat disconcerted Harry. He had not been accustomed to such a demeanor, and he read something, he could not define what, in her countenance, that attracted him irresistably and inspired him with a desire to make her his confidante.

He resumed his work, but Miss Lizzy's eyes and manner were constantly before him. He finished his letter, and requested information as to the entries to be made in the index, and the mark on the letter. Miss Lizzy ran her eye over his copy.

"You write an excellent hand, Mr. Williamson, and somewhat different from the writing of our clerks generally."

"I learned it in England, Miss Marville, where I was educated."

"You have been a traveller, then," said the lady.

"Only so far as two voyages across the Atlantic make one such. I went to school in England, but saw little of the country."

"Your writing reminds me of our English correspondents. This copy is excellent. You will make a better clerk than I have been, Mr. Williamson."

"You are very kind to say so, Miss Marville."

"This letter is an answer, as you have probably remarked. Just put in red ink the number of the page on the original, and the number of the letter-book, 4; then write the same numbers under the answer, with the word answer; and in the index write simply the name of the person to whom addressed—"Hansen & Co., London." I will show you how these letters are to be filed hereafter. For the present, put them in this pigeon-hole.

"Now, Mr. Williamson, you will have to learn another branch of your duty. In this small book, marked "receiving-book," you will keep an account of all goods received—thus: if it be a box, you say "box"—then the contents generally, then the mark of the box; and so with packages, bales, barrels, hogsheads, pipes, and so forth. In this book, marked "sales-book," after a sale has been made, and the bill written out, you will see that the same entries are made thus: Bill to Messrs. A. & B., delivered—date—box, bale, or what it may be; then the mark, and to what porter delivered—and compare it with the bill before sent, to see that everything tallies.—There will arrive soon some goods from one of our ships just in, and you will have an opportunity of practising."

"I am afaid, Miss Marville, you will not find me a very apt scholar."

"All things have a beginning, Mr. Williamson. How long were you in England?"

"About six years. I should have remained longer, but my father's misfortunes obliged me to return."

"What have you followed since you came back?"

"I have been seeking employment, but have not succeeded until your father's kindness gave me an opportunity of relieving my anxious parents."

"I doubt not you will prove industrious with such responsibilities on your shoulders. Here are the goods, and here's the book."

Harry went to work—followed closely his instructions, and proved quite an adept at his new occupation. It was a busy day, and Harry got home at night with a sense of fatigue, and a satisfaction of having done his duty, such as he had never before experienced. There is a strange pleasure to be derived from the first labors of our life, when that labor is the stepping stone to our future occupation. It is a pleasure which must be felt to be known. That pleasure was Henry Williamson's that night. He passed the evening quietly at home, and the joy he gave his parents, and the tranquility of the fireside, a novelty to Henry, had a charm which induced him the more to believe that he should never stray again from the path he had marked out for himself.

During the succeeding three months after Harry's enlistment, his fair companion of the counting-room had gained his confidence, and succeeded in getting many details of his former mode of life from his own lips. These confessions were interesting to one who was so little acquainted with the world as Miss Lizzy Marville. Harry had also confessed that he was somewhat in debt; but the full extent of his embarrassments he was ashamed to own, even to himself. Three months elapsed, without much of variety.—Occasionally, Harry indulged in a little gaiety, but succeeded in guarding himself against the temptations of his former habits.

His application to business very soon inspired Mr. Marville with confidence. He gradually assumed greater responsibility. He attended to the collection and payment of moneys, and his rigid exactness gave Mr. Marville every hope that Harry would soon be enabled to relieve him, as well as his daughter, of the arduous duties of the counting-house.

During this period, Harry had frequently met in the street with his creditors, who importuned him for money. He made them promises of speedy payments, which only relieved him for a time from their petitions, while they served to encourage hope. At last, these duns found their way to his place of business. They would call him from his desk, while Mr. Marville was present, who always scanned the visiter with a keen glance, and enquired their business, believing it might concern him. Very soon, these continued calls of persons, evidently no com-

secure yourself friends in life, is to place yourself above the necessity of needing them. You will, perhaps, feel it a degradation to enter Mr. Marville's store as an apprentice to your future profession. I hope you will not, but I fear the follies of youth. Pin the Arabian proverb in your hat—'Ask not who my father was, but what I am!'—and keep this before your eyes, with the conviction in your heart that nothing is demeaning to a man which is honest in itself, and esteemed by persons whose opinions are worth the having. Quit your old associates—they love you not, nor are their habits suitable to a poor young man, who has the responsibility of an honest name resting upon him. Above all, my dear boy, remember your parents. Their only hope rests upon their child, and God grant this hope may be realized. Good-night, my boy. God bless you!"

The old gentleman took his crutch, and with deep emotion evident in his very limbs, he limped, with the assistance of his wife, to his chamber.

Harry would have hurried after him to kiss his hand—to tell him what he felt—how deeply he lamented his past errors; but he was chained to his chair, and his very heart threatened to burst its prison-house. He seized a lamp, rushed to his chamber, threw himself upon his bed, and gave vent to a flood of tears.

Tears, even to a young man, afford not the relief they do to woman. Women require tears as a safety-valve to pent-up feelings. Men require excitement to work them off. If tears do come, they leave a man subdued, but not relieved. So it was with Harry Williamson. When he rose from his couch, his brain, his heart, were hot—he was over-wrought with repentance. He thought, in the absence of all associations, that he could snap the links of his old habits—that he could reform his mode of life in that hour—that, in fact, he was a reformed man. He made resolutions—no one ever made better—and he determined on the morrow to commence a new life a better man.

Just as he was about to extinguish his lamp, he heard a gentle tap at his door. He opened it, and there stood his mother.

"Good-night, my son," she said; "I could not go to bed without a good-night kiss. Now, my dear Harry, go to sleep; get all the rest you can. I will be up at six, and wake you. Good-night."

He kissed his doting mother, and as he closed the door, he stopped, and with his hand pressed to his forehead—"to wrong such a mother! what a wretch I have been!" he exclaimed; and all the hours he had robbed her of sleep—all the anxious moments he had caused her—all the pain he had inflicted upon her, seemed to rush upon him at once. He saw his own worthlessness—the despicable character of his associates, and the misery he had entailed upon himself; and all for what?

"No!" he exclaimed, half audibly, "no! I will show my father and mother how I love them, and that I am still worthy of their care and affection."

With these reflections, he sought his bed.

The next morning, before seven o'clock, Harry was on his way to Mr. Marville's store, followed by the blessings and prayers of the two only friends he had in the world. The clock struck seven as he reached the counting-house. He opened the door.

"Good-morning, sir," said Mr. Marville, laying down his pen, and turning his quiet but amiable countenance towards Harry. "Your business, sir?"

"My name is Henry Williamson, sir," said Harry, taking off his hat, and closing the door.

"You are punctual, sir, and I am glad to see it.—Take a seat, sir. There are the morning papers, Mr. Williamson. Amuse yourself a moment with them, until I have finished this letter."

Harry took his seat, and mechanically took a paper; but reading was out of the question. He held the paper in his hand, but his eyes wandered about to examine the room of which he was soon to become an habitual inmate.

It was a room very simply furnished, but every thing in it bore the mark of age, use, and comfort, and gave a cheerful, quiet, business-like feeling to all who examined it. On one side of an old-fashioned fire-place, stood a tall desk, at which Mr. Marville was writing. He was dressed in a plain suit of black, the same sombre color he had worn since his wife's death; his grey hairs were nicely combed back from his forehead, and were gathered in a cue behind, very neatly tied with black ribbon; his silk stockings fitted tight to a well-formed leg, and his shoes were as bright as blacking and labor could make them. On the other side of the fire-place stood a table-desk, with a chair unoccupied, neatly dusted, and as bright and comfortable as well-kept mahogany of fifty years old always looks. Opposite to the fire-place, stood a large, old-styled paper-case, and on either side hung maps of harbours, signals, flags of different nations, etc. etc. In the centre of the room was a small table, on which the daily papers were thrown, and a chair on each side. The floor was sprinkled with white sand, and although few steps had disturbed it that morning, it had been there long enough to dry.

A glance told Harry that the counting-room was merely a place of business, and furthermore, that all business was done with exactness and promptitude.

Mr. Marville finished his letter, read it over, and rang his bell. In a moment, a young lady, about Harry's age, dressed with all the neatness a Quaker could have desired, and looking as bright and cheerful as the November morning without, entered the room.

"Mr. Williamson, my dear," said Mr. Marville; "and this, sir, is my daughter, Miss Elizabeth."

Henry had risen from his seat. He had heard of Miss Lizzy Marville, "the clerk," as she was called, but he had not expected to find her such a person.

"Mr. Williamson and myself must have some private conversation, Elizabeth—but before you leave us, run your eye over that letter, and tell me what you think of it. This is a fine morning, sir," addressing himself to Henry; "but day sets in now with a nipping air. To you young men it's nothing, but my old limbs begin to feel it."

"It is cold, sir, at dawn," replied Henry, who had never seen the morning dawn for five years, unless when returning home so heated by wine that Kamschatka's cold would have been unheeded.

"But, father," said Miss Lizzy, after reading the letter, "you give him here no discretionary power to act. Suppose the ship be forced to put into another port, or cannot obtain this cargo at Java? I would add a few words, giving him some power in case of emergency."

"That might be well, Lizzy. Please add that, and copy it—I will sign the copy."

"Breakfast will be ready immediately," she replied, as she folded the letter, and placed it upon the table desk, under a weight, before leaving the two to their private conversation.

"Well, Mr. Williamson, your father informs me that you are desirous of becoming a merchant."

"I am, sir, desirous of getting any occupation.—My father is poor, and I must earn my own livelihood."

"Poverty has come upon many other estimable men as well as your father, Mr. Williamson: and will be the lot of many yet to come. This is the natural course of events. But to the point! I know you are entirely unacquainted with business. Your father told me this much, and I hesitated much as to taking you into my counting-house. Very soon, these continued calls of persons, evidently no companions of Harry, led to some suspicions, and to some enquiries. Harry was forced to confess that he was somewhat in debt, and that he made these people promises."

"Mr. Williamson," said Mr. Marville, "I know not what means you may possess, but from your father's representations, I should imagine they were small."

"I have none, sir," replied Harry.

"Then, sir, you commit a great error in thus bolding out promises you cannot fulfil. A man should never promise unless he can perform. You will forgive my intruding these remarks; but my interest for your welfare induces me to take the liberty."

"I am indebted, sir, for your kindness, and will follow your advice."

A few moments after this, Mr. Marville was called from the counting-house, and Harry was left alone with Miss Lizzy. Their conversation turned upon the old gentleman's remarks, and they were so much taken up with their conversation, that Harry did not perceive, through the glass door, the approach of a man, very handsomely attired,—dressed rather more conspicuously than gentlemen generally were. This man was a noted gambler, and held a note of Harry's. As soon as he opened the door, Harry took him aside.

"Mr. Williamson, I have waited long enough for this small amount, and I have come to say, that unless it be paid, I shall expose the matter by requesting Mr. Marville to stop your salary until it is liquidated."

"That would be of no use, and only expose me, for I have no salary."

"You told me, Mr. Williamson, that you were to receive a salary, and on the faith of this I have been silent until now; but I am pressed for money, and must have it."

It was a note for thirty dollars. Harry besought him to give him time, and promised to pay him within a week; but how he was to obtain the money he did not know.

Harry returned to his desk. Miss Lizzy watched the uneasy expression of his countenance, and after a few moments, began by saying:

"I don't like the expression of that man's face; he does not look like a gentleman, nor does he dress like a man of business."

"He is a man of leisure," responded Harry.

"Yes, I should suppose so; but he looks like a very vulgar person."

"I know him very slightly," said Harry, "and regret I ever made his acquaintance."

Here the conversation ended. Harry went on with his work, and Miss Lizzy pretended to busy herself with some loose papers.

That night Harry was unable to sleep,—he knew an exposure by this gambler was sure to ruin him, and he also felt that the fellow would certainly use these means to get his money. What was to be done? He could not borrow the amount—nobody would lend him. His mother, he knew, had it not, and he could not ask Mr. Marville for it. Without solving the question how he was to obtain his thirty dollars, yet feeling they must be had, he fell asleep.

Day succeeded day, until the week was nearly ended. Harry, in a state of intense anxiety, paced his room, turning over every means to get the desired sum. Every suggestion was discarded, as soon as considered, as impracticable. At last, in the intense anxiety of his position, the only mode left was to get it clandestinely from Mr. Marville, and to replace it as soon as possible. But how to do this was a difficult matter to settle. To abstract it from sums entrusted to him, was sure to lead to exposure. He could not borrow the sum in Mr. Marville's name, for he did not know that Mr. Marville ever borrowed from any body, and this would lead to suspicion. As fate would have it, in an evil moment, some devil of his brain suggested the scheme of getting a false key to the strong box, which was locked up in a closet. The key to the closet, too, was required, and he took an impression of both in soft wax. This done, he proceeded to a poor locksmith and ordered the keys. They were completed the next morning, and delivered to Harry at calling. He returned to the store.—Miss Lizzy greeted him as usual, and introduced the subject of his creditors.

"There was another strange-looking man here, not long since, who wanted to see you, Harry, and I must confess he did not prepossess me with his appearance."

"The same one who called here the other day?" enquired Harry, anxiously.

"No, not the same, but very much such a person as to his exterior. But why are you so fearful of that man? You asked if he had been here, with such anxiety and dread. I shall begin to fear, Harry, you have not told me all you know about him."

"I am not well, Lizzy, and I have become nervous of late. I have no fear of such a contemptible person; his manners are very disagreeable, and I don't like to meet him—particularly to-day, because I cannot control my temper."

"Harry, you were not wont to be in such mood. If any thing has occurred, let me know what it is; I may relieve you. It grieves me to see you thus excited, for I cannot but fear something weighs heavily [illegible]

A moment more, and Henry had confessed all; but Mr. Marville returned, and the opportunity was lost.

They were now occupied in receiving instructions from Mr. Marville, who desired both to copy certain letters and contracts, or to preface them in such a manner that the work might be commenced on the morrow.

"I shall be absent until nine o'clock, my dear," said Mr. Marville to his daughter, and requested her not to wait for him at supper. Then, turning to Harry, he praised his industry, and begged him to give his undivided attention to the business now entrusted to his hands, as it was matter of great importance. He left the counting-room, and soon Miss Lizzy followed, to attend to some household matters.

Left alone, poor Harry was now more undecided than ever. The kind words of his employer, the interest of his daughter, whose every word and look he now almost unconsciously laid to heart, shook his determination to execute his plans.

"Yet," thought he, "to-morrow that cursed gambler will be here again. I may find some way, when freed from him, to obtain this money. If he comes, he will insist upon the payment, and either have me dragged to jail, or expose me to Marville. No! I'll pay him; and then I can do something to refund what I most thus borrow—and it is but borrowing, for I shall replace it before it can be wanted. No one is here—now's the time!"

He drew his two keys from his pocket. The closet was opened, and Harry entered. He tried the strong box next, but he could not insert the key at first. He was still endeavoring to force it into the lock, but his hand trembled so, and he was in such fear of being discovered, that he could not succeed. Just then he heard some one descending the stairs. He sprang from the closet, but only had time to push the door to, without locking it, and to gain his desk when Lizzy returned. There was the key, and Harry knew no way of getting it out of the door.—Pretending to be engaged with the papers Mr. Marville had left, he planned a hundred little excuses to get to the closet, but none suggested itself which would not attract attention, and perhaps lead to his ruin. He hoped his fair companion would be called into the house again, but he hoped in vain.

"Harry," said she, after a pause, "these papers must be arranged thoroughly before we can work upon them properly; some are duplicates, and others must be copied in order, or they may not be understood. Let me have the whole of them. You go home now, and I will arrange them during the evening, so that we can begin to-morrow, bright and early."

What was to be done? Harry was obliged to go—but left his handkerchief as an excuse to return. He did return—but the counting-house was empty, the closet locked, the key gone, and no one but the old porter there, who was closing up the store for the night.

"Where is Miss Marville?"

"She thought it cold here, sir, and took her papers up stairs to work in the parlour, sir."

Harry hesitated one moment, and then walked away, undecided what to do, or where to go.

"She has the key!—she must have seen it was a false one!—She must also know that I have used it! Oh! miserable, fatal undertaking! How can I see her again? How can I meet my father and-mother;—how hope for Marville's further protection?—Yet I have done nothing! I did not take the money—not even touch a paper in the closet. If I deny the charge—'twere useless! they must, in the end, find out the whole! Something must be done!"

Thus holding converse with himself, poor Harry wandered through the streets till after dark, and having determined to throw himself upon the mercy of Lizzy Marville, turned towards her house.

After she had determined to finish the arrangement of the papers in the parlor, Miss Lizzy looked about the counting room, to see if all things were in safety. Perceiving the key in the closet, without examining it at all, she locked the door, put the key in her pocket, and went up stairs. As she was about seating herself at her lonely meal, she felt the key, and immediately went to the secretary to put it in the drawer, where it was always kept during the night. What was her amazement on opening the drawer, to find the key there. She examined the one in her hand, saw it was new, and, with a chill sensation creeping over her heart, staggered to a chair, and, sinking into it, felt her mind for a moment bend to the conflict of doubts, fears, and suspicions, which she dreaded to contemplate. There she sat, absorbed in thought, still holding the fatal key in her hand, when the door opened and Harry entered. The struggle he had gone through had left his expression haggard, and his eye wild. He stopped to look upon the form of one who now held his fate in her hands. She started, thrust the key into her pocket, gazed wildly at him, as if to read his heart, and seeing him hide his face in his hands,—sunk back almost lifeless in the chair—

"'Tis true then!"

After a long silence, which Harry had not the heart to break, she turned to him with a sad, almost heart-broken tone, and said—

"Oh Harry, what could have tempted you!" and burst into tears.

These tears were too much for the conscience-stricken culprit;—they whispered to him of love, and also that this love was forfeited by him forever. Springing to his feet, he gazed upon that weeping girl, and with a voice, made touching by the deep excitement of his mind, he at last found words—

"Do not condemn me! I am indeed to be blamed—but I have, as yet, done no wrong!"

At these words, she looked into his face, and, taking the key from her pocket, held it up to him.

"Harry! Harry!—is this no wrong?"

"Hear me! hear me!—let me tell you all, and then, in your hands, I leave my fate!"

"Speak! tell me all—and relieve my mind of these fearful doubts, these racking suspicions. Oh, prove your innocence, and I will love you still!"

These words, this expression, "love you still," first awakened Harry to a conviction of his own sentiments for Lizzy Marville. He seated himself by her side, took her hand, and began the narrative of his dissipations, and his consequent embarrassments.—To one, educated as had Lizzy Marville been, these tales were horrible, almost incredible. She listened to each word; she heard the story of his troubles, and the persecution of his creditors—and now came the point—

"Thus beset, dreading to be dragged to prison, and fearful of exposure to your father, I knew not what to do. Had you passed the sleepless nights, and been obliged, like a criminal, to shun the public streets, for fear of meeting those bloodhounds who pursued me, you, Lizzy, even you, would have thought of desperate means!"

"But not of crime, Harry!"

"Nor did I!—No! no! not crime! I determined to take means sufficient to rid me of this one, and to replace them before discovered or wanted.—But I did not take a penny!"

"Is that so, Harry?"

"Yes, Lizzy, as I hope for Heaven, I am not guilty! I have never wronged your father of a penny!"

"Thank Heaven it is so! You have taken a weight from my heart—but, Harry, there was a sin in thus intending it. What, had you been unable to replace these moneys, what could have rescued your reputation? Nothing! Let us not think of it! Consider, Harry, what a fearful risk it was to run! What endless misery you had brought upon yourself, not only in this world, but the next!"

"Think how I was beset! how persecuted!"

"Even that were no excuse for such an act. For your sake, I am glad it is no worse! I have seen and watched you often. I believe, Harry, I know you better than you know yourself. The fault you have, is want of that degree of pride, which, defies the world, while the conscience is pure. Strive to gain this point;—strive to remember, that contentment of mind is better than anything else the world affords. Do not seem surprised to hear me talk so, for I have learned it from my father. But I will not moralize, Harry. Promise me, as a man, that you will do as I bid you, and I will forget the past—and——"

"Love me still?" added Harry.

She blushed, and Harry felt she had spoken more in an unguarded moment, than she would ever have dared to breathe under other circumstances. He still held her hand—and, seeing her expression gradually sadden, said—

"No answer, Lizzy?"

"Yes, Harry, there is an answer. This hand shall be yours as soon as I am convinced that your heart is pure and upright; that this step was one of thoughtlessness, and not of baseness."

"Do you doubt my heart's integrity?"

"No, Harry! Take not my words so harshly!—I do not doubt you, but my faith in all things has been so deeply shaken here, that I even doubt myself,—I will not, cannot doubt you;—but when you can fearlessly go to my father, and ask his consent, feeling that you have wiped out this blot by subsequent conduct, when you feel this, and get his consent, I am yours!"

"Thanks, Lizzy! thanks! At least I have all at stake now, and if I lose this heaven, I deserve to be lost myself!"

He kissed the open hand he held, and was about to talk of love, when she suddenly checked him.

"Your task is not yet done! To-morrow morning, when I give you the hint, go boldly to my father, tell him the fullest extent of your embarrassments: let him know every thing;—and if he do not help you, I will find other means of relief. No questions—do you promise?"

"I do—although I dread the result!"

"Some one approaches; you must leave me. I will keep this key, until all I own is yours, and then you may lock the secret up, where no mortal will ever hear it, or know of its existence."

Harry left the house. He was now even more excited than before, but how different were his feelings! Shame at his degradation, for having even thought of such a step as he resolved to take, and joy at having, by that step, discovered a treasure unknown to him before, Lizzy Marville's love!

The next morning, at an indication given by Lizzy,

Harry boldly advanced to Mr. Marville, and stated his circumstances.

"I have done this," said he, in conclusion, "because I deem it my duty to let you know my situation, that you may excuse, sometimes, the visiters who call upon me, and also my apparent abstraction when writhing under this persecution. There is also another reason; I am fearful I may be dragged to prison for debt, a disgrace which would fall heavy on my mother and father—and have made these disclosures, hoping you might relieve my embarrassments by advancing sufficient means, which I could repay by services to be rendered after my apprenticeship expires. You have no other security for the performance of such a contract, but my word, which I have lately learned to value more highly."

"I am glad, Henry, that you have spoken thus. I have been much concerned for you. You have the responsibility of your parents' happiness upon you. They rely on you alone for solace and comfort, as they totter to the grave. Your idle years have brought you into trouble, but your industry may save you. I believe your heart to be naturally good, and, therefore, do not despair of your entire reformation. I would see you a man highly esteemed and independent; not so much in wealth, as in that dignity of character which commands respect. You have the basis of such a character—you have the requisite disposition, and however sinful your former life may have been, I am disposed to regard it as the natural result of a want of occupation, and the thoughtlessness of youth. I will speak further with you to-morrow, on this subject. You will prepare me a full and entire list of your debts. I must know all, for you must be entirely free before I can hope to accomplish an entire reformation."

He took his hat and left the room. When he had gone, Harry seized Lizzy's hand, and kissing it, exclaimed:

"You have saved me from perdition!"

A year passed, and Harry, relieved from debt soon after the above interview, had exerted every energy of his mind to win the confidence of Mr. Marville, and the love of Lizzy. One morning he broached to the father his attachment to the daughter. The father had seen the affection which had grown up between them, but still desired to consult his daughter's inclinations before he gave his reply. The next day Mr. Marville took him aside, and told him that he could give him no definite answer to his proposition; but not to disappoint him, he had something to bestow, which he would find in the closet. Harry took the key, unlocked the door, and there stood Lizzy, smiling, holding the other key in her hand.

"Here, Harry, is my hand and heart," she said, "and here, too, is the key which once opened the door to a happier existence. Let us lock it now, so that you may never retrace your steps, and to secure our happiness, throw away the key, so that none else may open the portal!"

Henry and Lizzy were married, and Henry soon succeeded Mr. Marville in his business, which enabled him to soften the sorrows of the declining days of his parents, and secure a glorious and calm sunset to the life of his own Lizzy and himself.

RAISING THE WIND;

OR,

DIDDLING CONSIDERED AS ONE OF THE EXACT SCIENCES.

BY EDGAR A. POE.

> Hey, diddle diddle,
> The cat and the fiddle.
> From an Epic by "Flaccus."

Since the world began there have been two Jeremys. The one wrote a Jeremiad about usury, and was called Jeremy Bentham. He has been much admired by Mr. John Neal, and was a great man in a small way. The other gave name to the most important of the Exact Sciences, and was entitled Jeremy Diddler. He was a great man in a great way—I may say, indeed, in the very greatest of ways.

Diddling—or the abstract idea conveyed by the verb to diddle—is sufficiently well understood. Yet the fact, the deed, the thing diddling, is somewhat difficult to define. We may get, however, at a tolerably distinct conception of the matter in hand, by defining—not the thing, diddling, in itself—but man, as an animal that diddles. Had Plato but hit upon this, he would have been spared the affront of the picked chicken.

Very pertinently it was demanded of Plato, why a picked chicken, which was clearly "a biped without feathers," was not, according to his own definition, a man? But I am not to be bothered by any similar query. Man is an animal that diddles, and there is no animal that diddles but man. It will take an entire hen-coop of picked chickens to get over that.

What constitutes the essence, the ware, the principle of diddling is, in fact, peculiar to the class of creatures that wear coats and pantaloons. A crow thieves; a fox cheats; a weasel outwits, a man diddles. To diddle is his destiny. "Man was made to mourn," says the poet. But not so—he was made to diddle. This is his aim—his object—his end.—And for this reason when a man's diddled we say that he's "done."

Diddling, rightly considered, is a compound, of which the ingredients are minuteness, interest, perseverance, ingenuity, audacity, nonchalance, originality, impertinence, and grin.

Minuteness:—Your diddler is minute. His operations are upon a small scale. His business is retail, for cash, or approved paper at sight. Should he ever be tempted into magnificent speculation, he then, at once, loses his distinctive features, and becomes what we term "financier." This latter word conveys the diddling idea in every respect except that of magnitude. A diddler may thus be regarded as a banker in petto—a "financial operation," as a diddle at Brobdignag. The one is to the other as a Mastodon to a mouse—as a tail of a comet to that of a pig—as Homer to Flaccus—as the "Iliad" to "Sam Patch."

Interest:—Your diddler is guided by self-interest. He scorns to diddle for the mere sake of the diddle. He has object in view—his pocket—and yours. He regards always the main chance. He looks to Number One. You are Number Two, and must look to yourself.

Perseverance:—Your diddler perseveres. He is not readily discouraged. Should even the banks break, he cares nothing about it. He steadily pursues his end, and so he never lets go of his game.

> Ut canis a corio nunquam absterrebitur uncto,

Ingenuity:—Your diddler is ingenious. He has constructiveness large. He understands plot. He invents and circumvents. Were he not Alexander, he would be Diogenes. Were he not what he is, he would be a maker of patent rat-traps or an angler for trout.

Audacity:—Your diddler is audacious. He is a bold man. He carries the war into Africa. He conquers all by assault. He would not fear the daggers of the Frey Harren. With a little more prudence Dick Turpin would have made a good diddler, with a trifle less blarney, Daniel O'Connell, with a pound or two more brains, Charles the Twelfth.

Nonchalance:—Your diddler is nonchalant. He is not at all nervous. He never had any nerves.—He is never seduced into a flurry. He is never put out—unless put out of doors. He is cool—cool as a cucumber. He is calm—"calm as a smile from Lady Bury." He is easy—easy as an old glove, or the damsels of ancient Baiæ.

Originality:—Your diddler is original—conscientiously so. His thoughts are his own. He would scorn to employ those of another. A stale trick is his aversion. He would return a purse, I am sure, upon discovering that he had obtained it by an unoriginal diddle.

Impertinence:—Your diddler is impertinent. He swaggers. He sets his arms a-kimbo. He thrusts his hands in his trowsers' pockets. He sneers in your face. He treads on your corns. He eats your dinners, he drinks your wine, he borrows your money, he pulls your nose, he kicks your poodle, and he kisses your wife.

Grin:—Your true diddler winds up all with a grin. But this nobody sees but himself. He grins when his daily work is done—when his allotted labors are accomplished—at night—in his own closet, and altogether for his own private entertainment. He goes home. He locks his door. He divests himself of his clothes. He puts out his candle. He gets into bed. He places his head upon the pillow. All this done, and your diddler grins. This is no hypothesis. It is a matter of course. I reason a priori, and a diddle would be no diddle without a grin.

The origin of the diddle is referrible to the infancy of the Human Race. Perhaps the first diddler was Adam. At all events, we can trace the science back to a very remote period of antiquity. The moderns, however, have brought it to a point of perfection never dreamed of by our thick-headed progenitors.—Without pausing to speak of the "old saws," therefore, I shall content myself with a compendious account of some of the more "modern instances."

A very good diddle is this. A housekeeper in want of a sofa, for instance, is seen to go in and out of several cabinet warehouses. At length she arrives at one offering an excellent variety. She is accosted, and invited to enter, by a polite and voluble individual at the door. She finds a sofa well adapted to her views, and, upon inquiring the price, is surprised and delighted to hear a sum named at least twenty per cent. lower than her expectations. She hastens to make the purchase, gets a bill and receipt, leaves her address, with a request that the article be sent home as speedily as possible, and retires amid a profusion of bows from the shop-keeper. The night arrives and no sofa. The next day passes, and still none. A servant is sent to make inquiry about the delay. The whole transaction is denied. No sofa has been sold—no money received—except by the diddler who played shop-keeper for the nonce.

Our cabinet warehouses are left entirely unattended, and thus afford every facility for a trick of this kind. Visiters enter, look at furniture, and depart unheeded and unseen. Should any one wish to purchase, or to inquire the price of an article, a bell is at hand, and this is considered amply sufficient.

Again, quite a respectable diddle is this. A well-dressed individual enters a shop; makes a purchase to the value of a dollar; finds, much to his vexation, that he has left his pocket-book in another coat pocket: and so says to the shop-keeper—

"My dear sir, never mind!—just oblige me, will you, by sending the parcel home? But stay! I really believe that I have nothing less than a five dollar bill, even there. However, you can send four dollars in change with the bundle, you know."

"Very good, sir," replies the shop-keeper, who entertains, at once, a lofty opinion of the high-mindedness of his customer. "I know fellows," he says to himself, "who would just have put the goods under their arm, and walked off, with a promise to call and pay the dollar as they came by in the afternoon."

A boy is sent with the parcel and change. On the route, quite accidentally, he is met by the purchaser, who exclaims:

"Ah! this is my bundle, I see—I thought you had been home with it long ago. Well, go on! My wife, Mrs. Trotter, will give you the five dollars—I left instructions with her to that effect. The change you might as well give to me—I shall want some silver for the Post Office. Very good! One, two,—is this a good quarter?—three, four—quite right! Say to Mrs. Trotter that you met me, and be sure now and do not loiter on the way."

The boy does'nt loiter at all—but he is a very long time in getting back from his errand—for no lady of the precise name of Mrs. Trotter is to be discovered. He consoles himself, however, that he has not been such a fool as to leave the goods without the money, and, re-entering his shop with a self-satisfied air, feels sensibly hurt and indignant when his master asks him what has become of the change.

A very simple diddle, indeed, is this. The captain of a ship which is about to sail, is presented by an official-looking personage, with an unusually moderate bill of city charges. Glad to get off so easily, and confused by a hundred duties pressing upon him all at once, he discharges the claim forthwith. In about fifteen minutes, another and less reasonable bill is handed him by one who soon makes it evident that the first collector was a diddler, and the original collection a diddle.

And here, too, is a somewhat similar thing. A steamboat is casting loose from the wharf. A traveller, portmanteau in hand, is discovered running towards the wharf at full speed. Suddenly, he makes a dead halt, stoops, and picks up something from the ground in a very agitated manner. It is a pocket-book, and—"Has any gentleman lost a pocket-book?" he cries. No one can say that he has exactly lost a pocket-book; but a great excitement ensues, when the treasure trove is found to be of value. The boat, however, must not be detained.

"Time and tide wait for no man," says the captain.

"For God's sake, stay only a few minutes," says the finder of the book—"the true claimant will presently appear."

"Can't wait!" replies the man in authority; "cast off there, d'ye hear?"

"What am I to do?" asks the finder, in great tribulation. "I am about to leave the country for some years, and I cannot conscientiously retain this large amount in my possession. I beg your pardon, sir," [here he addresses a gentlemen on shore,] "but you have the air of an honest man. Will you confer upon me the great favor of taking charge of this pocket-book—I know I can trust you—and of advertising it? The note, you see, amounts to a very considerable sum. The owner will, no doubt, insist upon rewarding you for your trouble—"

"Me!—no, you!—it was you who found the book."

"Well, if you must have it so—I will take a small reward—just to satisfy your scruples. Let me see—why them notes are all hundreds—bless my soul! a hundred is too much to take—fifty would be quite enough, I am sure—"

"Cast off there!" says the captain.

"But then I have no change for a hundred, and, upon the whole, you had better"—

"Cast off there!" says the captain.

"Never mind!" cries the gentleman on shore, who has been examining his own pocket-book for the last minute, or so—"never mind! I can fix it—here is a fifty on the Bank of North America—throw me the book."

And the over-conscientious finder takes the fifty with marked reluctance, and throws the gentleman the book, as desired, while the steamboat fumes and fizzes on her way. In about an half an hour after her departure, the "large amount" is seen to be "a counterfeit presentment," and the whole thing a capital diddle.

A bold diddle is this. A camp-meeting, or something similar, is to be held at a certain spot which is accessible only by means of a free bridge. A diddler stations himself upon this bridge, respectfully informs all passers by of the new county law, which establishes a toll of one cent for foot passengers, two for horses and donkeys, and so forth, and so forth.—Some grumble but all submit, and the diddler goes home a wealthier man by some fifty or sixty dollars well earned. This taking a toll from a great crowd of people is an excessively troublesome thing.

A neat diddle is this. A friend holds one of the diddler's promises to pay, filled up and signed in due form, upon the ordinary blanks printed in red ink.—The diddler purchases one or two dozen of these blanks, and every day, at dinner, dips one of them in his soup, makes his dog jump for it, and finally gives it to him as a bonne bouche. The note arriving at maturity, the diddler, with the diddler's dog, calls upon the friend, and the promise to pay is made the subject of discussion. The friend produces it from his escritoire, and is in the act of reaching it to the diddler, when up jumps the diddler's dog and devours it forthwith. The diddler is not only surprised but vexed and incensed at the absurd behavior of his dog, and expresses his entire readiness to cancel the obligation at any moment when the evidence of the obligation shall be forthcoming.

A very minute diddle is this. A lady is insulted in the street by a diddler's accomplice. The diddler himself flies to her assistance, and, giving his friend a comfortable thrashing, insists upon attending the lady to her own door. He bows, with his hand upon his heart, and most respectfully bidding her adieu. She entreats him, as her deliverer, to walk in and be introduced to her big brother and her papa. With a sigh, he declines to do so. "Is there no way, then, sir," she murmurs, "in which I may be permitted to testify my gratitude?"

"Why, yes, madam, there is. Will you be kind enough to lend me a couple of shillings?"

In the first excitement of the moment the lady decides upon fainting outright. Upon second thought, however, she opens her purse-strings and delivers the specie. Now this, I say, is a diddle minute—for one entire moiety of the sum borrowed has to be paid to the gentleman who had the trouble of performing the insult, and who had then to stand still and be thrashed for performing it.

Rather a small, but still a scientific, diddle is this. The diddler approaches the bar of a tavern, and demands a couple of twists of tobacco. These are handed him, when, having slightly examined them, he says:

"I don't much like this tobacco. Here, take it back, and give me a glass of brandy and water in its place."

The brandy and water is furnished and imbibed, and the diddler makes his way to the door. But the voice of the tavern-keeper arrests him.

"I believe, sir, you have forgotten to pay for your brandy and water."

"Pay for my brandy and water!—didn't I give you the tobacco for the brandy and water? What more would you have?"

"But, sir, if you please, I don't remember that you paid for the tobacco."

"What do you mean, by that, you scoundrel?—Didn't I give you back your tobacco? Isn't that your tobacco lying there? Do you expect me to pay for what I did not take?"

"But, sir," says the publican, now rather at a loss what to say; "but, sir—"

"But me no buts, sir," interrupts the diddler, apparently in very high dudgeon, and slamming the door after him, as he makes his escape.—"But me no buts, sir, and none of your tricks upon travellers."

Here again is a very clever diddle, of which the simplicity is not its least recommendation. A purse, or pocket-book, being really lost, the loser inserts in one of the daily papers of a large city a fully descriptive advertisement. Whereupon our diddler copies the facts of this advertisement, with a change of heading, of general phraseology, and address. The original, for instance, is long, and verbose, is headed "A Pocket-Book Lost!" and requires the treasure, when found, to be left at No. 1 Dick street. The copy is brief, and being headed with "Lost" only, indicates No. 2 Tom, or No. 3 Harry street; as the locality at which the owner may be seen. Moreover, it is inserted in at least five or six of the papers of the day, while, in point of time, it makes its appearance only a few hours after the original. Should it be read by the loser of the purse, he would hardly suspect it to have any reference to his own misfortune. But, of course, the chances are five or six to one, that the finder will repair to the address given by the diddler, rather than to that pointed out by the rightful proprietor. The former pays the reward, pockets the treasure, and decamps.

Quite an analogous diddle is this. A lady of ton has dropped, somewhere in the street, a diamond ring of very unusual value. For its recovery, she offers some forty or fifty dollars reward—giving, in her advertisement, a very minute description of the gem and of its settings, and declaring that, upon its restoration at No. so and so, in such and such Avenue, the reward will be paid instanter, without a single question being asked. During the lady's absence from home, a day or two afterwards, a ring is heard at the door of No. so and so, in such and such Avenue; a servant appears; the lady of the house is asked for and is declared to be out, at which astounding information, the visitor expresses the most poignant regret. His business is of importance, and concerns the lady herself. In fact, he had the good fortune to find her diamond ring. But, perhaps it would be as well that he should call again. "By no means!" says the servant; and "By no means!" says the lady's sister and the lady's sister-in-law, who are summoned forthwith. The ring is clamorously identified, the reward is paid, and the finder very nearly thrust out of doors. The lady returns, and expresses some little dissatisfaction with her sister and sister-in-law, because they happen to have paid forty or fifty dollars for a fac-simile of her diamond ring—a fac-simile made out of real pinchbeck and paste.

But as there is really no end to diddling, so there would be none to this essay, were I even to hint at half the variations, or inflections, of which this science is susceptible. I must bring this paper, perforce, to a conclusion, and this I cannot do better than by a summary notice of a very decent, but rather elaborate diddle, of which our own city was made the theatre, not very long ago, and which was subsequently repeated with success, in other still more verdant localities of the Union. A middle-aged gentleman arrives in town from parts unknown. He is remarkably precise, cautious, staid, and deliberate in his demeanor. His dress is scrupulously neat, but plain, unostentatious. He wears a white cravat, an ample waistcoat, made with an eye to comfort alone; thick-soled cosy-looking shoes, and pantaloons without straps. He has the whole air, in fact, of your well-to-do, sober-sided, exact, and respectable "man of business," par excellence—one of the stern and outwardly hard, internally soft, sort of people that we see in the crack high comedies—fellows whose words are so many bonds, and who are noted for giving away guineas, in charity, with the one hand, while, in the way of mere bargain, they exact the uttermost fraction of a farthing with the other.

He makes much ado before he can get suited with a boarding-house. He dislikes children. He has been accustomed to quiet. His habits are methodical—and then he would prefer getting into a private and respectable small family, piously inclined. Terms, however, are no object—only he must insist upon settling his bill on the first of every month, (it is now the second,) and begs his landlady, when he finally obtains one to his mind, not, on any account, to forget his instructions upon this point—but to send in a bill, and receipt, precisely at ten o'clock, on the first day of every month, and under no circumstances to put it off to the second.

These arrangements made, our man of business rents an office in a reputable, rather than in a fashionable quarter of the town. There is nothing he more despises than pretence. "Where there is much show," he says, "there is seldom any thing very solid behind,"—an observation which so profoundly impresses his landlady's fancy, that she makes a pencil memorandum of it forthwith, in her great family Bible, on the broad margin of the Proverbs of Solomon.

The next step is to advertise, after some such fashion as this, in the principal business sixpennies of the city. The pennies are eschewed as not "respectable"—and as demanding payment for all advertisements in advance. Our man of business holds it as a point of his faith that work should never be paid for until done.

WANTED.—The advertisers, being about to commence extensive business operations in this city, will require the services of three or four intelligent and competent clerks, to whom a liberal salary will be paid. The very best recommendations, not so much for capacity, as for integrity, will be expected. Indeed, as the duties to be performed involve high responsibilities, and large amounts of money must necessarily pass through the hands of those engaged, it is deemed advisable to demand a deposit of fifty dollars from each clerk employed. No person need apply, therefore, who is not prepared to leave this sum in the possession of the advertisers, and who cannot furnish the most satisfactory testimonials of morality. Young gentlemen piously inclined will be preferred. Application should be made between the hours of 10 and 11 A. M., and 4 and 5 P. M., of Messrs:

BOGGS, HOGGS, LOGS, FROGS & CO.
No. 110 Dog Street.

By the thirty-first day of the month, this advertisement has brought to the office of Messrs. Boggs, Hoggs, Logs, Frogs & Co., some fifteen or twenty young gentlemen piously inclined. But our man of business is in no hurry to conclude a contract with any—no man of business is ever precipitate—and it is not until the most rigid catechism in respect to the piety of each young gentleman's inclination, that his services are engaged and his fifty dollars receipted for, just by way of proper precaution, on the part of the respectable firm of Boggs, Hoggs, Logs, Frogs and Company. On the morning of the first day of the next month, the landlady does not present her bill according to promise—a piece of neglect for which the comfortable head of the house ending in ogs, would no doubt have chided her severely, could he have been prevailed upon to remain in town a day or two for that purpose.

As it is, the constables have a sad time of it, running hither and thither, and all they can do is to declare the man of business, most emphatically, a "hen knee high"—by which some persons imagine them to imply that, in fact, he is n, e, i—by which again the very classical phrase non est inventus, is supposed to be understood. In the meantime the young gentlemen, one and all, are somewhat less piously inclined than before, while the landlady purchases a shilling's worth of the best Indian rubber, and very carefully obliterates the pencil memorandum that some fool has made in her great family Bible, on the broad margin of the Proverbs of Solomon.

WOMAN DEFENDED.

Messrs. Editors:—"Phew!" whistled I, the other day, on reading an article in your columns entitled "The Coquette." I had just eaten my dinner, and felt wonderfully good-natured, when I picked up the paper; but such a dish of sourcrout and vinegar was too much for me. "Surely," thought I, "that author must have a wormwood mind and an iceberg heart. The reality of his picture exists only in his imagination: it cannot be that qualities so odious are to be found concentrated in the breast of any woman. I have felt the holy influence of a gentle mother: true, her voice is now silent, and her eye is closed, and she sleeps silently in her grave—but she guides and blesses me still; her precept and her example are before me, and the remembrance of them is like a guardian angel to me. I know the worth of a wife: and in learning it, I have learned more of the inestimable value of woman. My inmost soul willingly pays a grateful homage to the sex, as I behold its virtues developed in one who is the star of my life. I have felt my selfishness returned by her disinterestedness, and my coldness and slothfulness of heart removed by her warmth and activity of love. The purity and the sweetness of a sister's love, all my life long have I experienced; and if I was, at any time in my boyhood, ready to double my fist in fight, it was when insult or injury was offered or meditated towards her, by urchin big or little. From woman's lips, the kindest and the sweetest sounds have fallen, which it has ever been my lot to hear; from woman's hands, the gentlest treatment has proceeded, which it has been my blessed fortune to receive in this thorny world. She has cheered my desponding heart; she has ministered to my necessities; she has nursed me in my hour of pain, and bathed my burning brow with a tenderness and solicitude that a heart of love alone could inspire. Throughout my life, at home and abroad, my daily experience has been that, next to Christ and grace, woman is God's supremest, choicest boon to man. Who is this, then, that dares paint so hideous a caricature of woman? Who?"

I fell into a musing reverie. Methought I knew the man. Through the dim vista of thirty years I descried his form. From the grave of time he slowly arose before me, even as Samuel's awful apparition broke on the vision of the noble and misguided Warrior-King of Israel. But the spectre which came before my mind possessed neither majesty nor awfulness. He was at that period of life when commonly the boyishness of the boy gives place to the manliness of the man. But he seemed never to have been a boy. There was in him an air of self-assurance and arrogancy which ill became the modesty of early manhood. He seemed to feel that the earth held but one—and that he was that one! Had he been Schah of Persia, he would have thought himself the ruler of the world. When he spoke, his dictum he thought should settle any question; and if any ventured to dispute his assertion, he pronounced him a fool or a knave.

He esteemed it a condescension to notice a woman. In his arithmetic she was a cypher, valueless unless united with another figure; and he conceived that he was a figure of such immensity of value, that scarcely any being in the female form was worthy of standing beside him. Woman's pride rebelled against such an estimate: she repelled his advances; and he soon found it more difficult to attach and secure one, than it would be to pick up the globules of quicksilver with the naked finger.

Years passed on before my view. My imaginary author wandered hither and thither, but still remained an isolated being. His self-love and vanity were so excessive, that he could coalesce with none. He who would have the love and sympathy of man, must love and sympathize with man. Love is the price of love. It cannot be—and never should be—purchased at a lower rate. He, however, sought to do this; but he failed in his speculation. Notwithstanding, with his years his self-sufficiency increased. Sometimes, it exhibited itself in so ridiculous a manner, that those who were disposed to treat him with silent civility, could restrain their mirth no longer; the flood-gates of fun would open, and the tide would almost overwhelm him. Still, the rock of his pride was unmoved, and he would wonder at what they were laughing.

Time passed on, and lo! the traces of fifty winters lay upon his brow. The strength of his manhood was failing—early old age bestreaked his hair with a grizzly-gray. The weaknesses of age without its benignities were upon him. The supercilious smile, the arrogant scowl, are now inwrought upon his countenance. A weary boarding-house life had been his; he had been a ship floating down the river of life solitary and alone. But now a change came over him. A lovely creature—one of this world's sweetest roses—one of this world's gentlest lambs—whose voice was the essence of music—became acquainted with him. The sunlight of her eyes melted the ice of his soul. For a while he put aside his scornful haughtiness. He assumed the dandy. The gray hairs were pomatumed and dressed—the fiery whiskers were trimmed. He laid wait for her. He entered on the campaign of love with the innate conviction that he was an irresistible general—a very Bonaparte of the affections. It required but one shot, thought he, and she's a prize. He discharged his ordnance, but alack-a-day! the ball fell short of his mark. The innocent being marvelled at his intentions and proceedings: he would have answered very well for a father or a grandfather; but a husband!—no, no, that was rather too funny. She had smiled upon him with the common smile of acquaintanceship; but when he unmasked his battery, her defences were set in a moment, and, vanquished and humbled, he retreated to his camp.

This was too much for him. The invincible vanquished!—the would-be conqueror conquered! 'Twas a Waterloo defeat. The mountain of his pride and wrath arose from the deep wherein it had been temporarily submerged. "He set his face like a flint" against the sex. He seized his pen, and determined to annihilate them. He found the task too great. He folded his arms in despair—stretched his worn-out frame upon a rock by the river-side, and straightway became a petrifaction; and those who know the spot, may go there and behold the victim of infatuated pride and self-conceit.

My reverie was broken. I folded up the Saturday Courier, and went to my daily toil. I hope J. R. (query, Johnny Raw?) will take warning by the fate of my imaginary author, and give to the sex the honor due.

JACOB.

LOVE AND AUTHORSHIP.

"Will you remember me, Rosalie?"

"Yes!"

"Will you keep your hand for me for a year?"

"Yes!"

"Will you answer me when I write to you?"

"Yes!"

"One request more—O Rosalie, reflect that my life depends upon your acquiescence—should I succeed, will you marry me in spite of your uncle?"

"Yes!" answered Rosalie. There was no pause—ply followed question, as if it were a dialogue which they had got by heart—and by heart indeed they had got it—but I leave you to guess the book they had conned it from.

'Twas in a green lane, on a summer's evening, about nine o'clock, when the west, like a gate of gold, had shut upon the retiring sun, that Rosalie and her lover, hand in hand, walked up and down. His arm was the girdle of her waist, hers formed a collar for his neck, which a knight of the garter—ay, the owner of the sword that dubbed him—might well have been proud to wear. Their gait was slow, and face was turned to face; near were their lips while they spoke; and much of what they said never came to the ear, though their souls caught up every word of it.

Rosalie was upwards of five years the junior of her lover. She had known him since she was a little girl in her twelfth year. He was almost eighteen then, and when she thought far more about a doll than a husband, he would set her upon his knee, and call her his little wife. One, two, three years passed on, and still, whenever he came from college, and, as usual, went to pay his first visit to her father's, before he had been five minutes in the parlor, the door was flung open, and in bounded Rosalie, and claimed her accustomed seat. The fact was, till she was fifteen, she was a child of very slow growth, and looked the girl when many a companion of hers of the same age began to appear the woman.

When another vacation, however, came round, and Theodore paid his customary call, and was expecting his little wife, as usual, the door opened slowly, and a tall young lady entered, and, courtesying, colored and walked to a seat next the lady of the house. The visitor stood up and bowed, and sat down again, without knowing it was Rosalie.

"Don't you know Rosalie?" exclaimed her father.

"Rosalie!" replied Theodore, in an accent of surprise; and approached his little wife of old, who rose and half gave him her hand, and, courtesying, colored again; and sat down again without hardly interchanging a word with him. No wonder—she was four inches taller than when he had last seen her; and her bulk had expanded correspondingly, while her features, that half a year before gave one the idea of a sylph that would bound after a butterfly, had now mellowed in their expression into the sentiment, the softness, and the reserve of woman.

Theodore felt absolutely disappointed. Five minutes before, he was all volubility. No sooner was one question answered than he proposed another—and he had so many capital stories for Rosalie, when she came down—and yet, when Rosalie did come down, he sat as though he had not a word to say for himself. In short, everything and everybody seemed to have changed along with its young mistress; he felt no longer at home in it, as he was wont; and in less than a quarter of an hour he made his bow and departed.

Now this was exceedingly strange; for Rosalie, from a pretty little girl, had turned into a lovely young woman. If a heart looked out of her eyes before, a soul looked out of them now; her arm, which formerly the sun had been allowed to salute when he liked, and which used to bear the trace of many a kiss that he had given it, now shone white through a sleeve of muslin, like snow behind a veil of haze; her bosom had enlarged its wavy curve, and leaving her waist little more than the span it was, sat proudly heaving above it; and the rest of her form, which, only six months ago, looked trim and airy in her short and close-fitting frock, now lengthening and throwing out its flowing line, stood stately in the folds of a long and ample drapery. Yet could not all this make up for the want of the little wife that used to come and take her seat upon Theodore's knee.

To be sure, there was another way of accounting for the young man's chagrin. He might have been disappointed that Rosalie, when five feet four, should be a little more reserved than she used to be when she was only five feet [illegible]. Romantic young men, too, are apt to fancy odd things. Theodore was a very romantic young man; and having, perhaps, traced for himself the woman in the child—as one will anticipate, in looking at a peach that is just knit, the hue, and form, and flavor of the consummate fruit—he might have set Rosalie down in his mind as his wife in earnest, when he appeared to call her so only in jest.

Such was the case. Theodore never calculated that Rosalie knew nothing about his dreams—that she had no such visions herself; he never anticipated that the frankness of girlhood would vanish, as soon as the diffidence of young womanhood began its blushing reign; the thought never occurred to him that the day would come when Rosalie would scruple to sit upon his knee—ay, even though Rosalie should then begin to think upon him, as for many a year before he had thought upon her. He returned from college the fifth time; he found that the woman which he imagined in a year or two she would become, was surpassed by the woman that she already was; he remarked the withdrawal of confidence, the limitation of familiarity—the penalty which he must inevitably pay for her maturing—and he felt repelled and chilled and utterly disheartened by it.

For a whole week he never returned to the house. Three days of a second week elapsed, and still he kept away. He had been invited, however, to a ball which was to be given there the day following; and much as he was inclined to absent himself, being a little more inclined to go, he went.

Full three hours was he in the room without once setting eyes upon Rosalie. He saw her mother and her father, and talked with them; he saw squire this, and doctor that, and attorney such-a-one, and had fifty things to say to each of them; he had eyes and a tongue for everybody, but Rosalie—not a look, or a word, did he exchange with her: yet he was here and there and everywhere! In short, he was all communicativeness and vivacity, so that every one remarked how bright he had become since his last visit to college!

At last, however, his fine spirits all at once seemed to forsake him, and he withdrew to the library, which was lighted up for the occasion as an anteroom, and, taking a volume out of the bookcase, threw himself into a chair and began to turn over the leaves.

"Have you forgotten your little wife?" said a soft voice near him—'twas Rosalie's—"if you have," she added, as he started from his seat, "she has not forgotten you!"

She wore a carnation in her hair—the hue of the flower was not deeper than that of her cheek, as she stood and extended her hands to Theodore, who, the moment he rose, had held forth both of his.

"Rosalie!"

"Theodore!"

He led her to a sofa, which stood in a recess on the opposite side of the room, and for five minutes not another word did they exchange.

At length she gently withdrew her hand from his—she had suffered him to hold it all that time.

"We shall be observed," said she.

"Ah, Rosalie," replied he, "nine months since you sat upon my knee, and they observed us, yet you did not mind it!"

"You know I am a woman now," rejoined Rosalie, hanging her head; "and—and—will you lead off the next dance with me?" cried she, suddenly changing the subject. "There, now; I have asked you!" added she, "which is more than you deserve!"

Of course Theodore was not at all happy to accept the challenge of the metamorphosed Rosalie.

One might suppose that the young lady's heart was interested, and that Theodore was a far happier man than he imagined himself to be. The fact was neither more nor less. Little Rosalie was proud of being called Theodore's wife, because she heard everybody else speak in praise of him. Many a marriageable young lady had she heard declare—not minding to speak before a child—that Theodore was the finest young man in B——; that she hoped Theodore would be at such or such a house where she was going to dine, or spend the evening; nay, that she would like to have a sweetheart like Theodore. Then would Rosalie interpose, and with a saucy toss of the head exclaim, that nobody should have Theodore but Rosalie, for Rosalie was his little wife. 'Twas thus she learned to admire the face and person of Theodore, who more than once paid for her acquired estimation of them: for sometimes, before a whole room full of company she, would march up to him, and scanning him from head to foot, with folded arms, at length declare aloud, that he was the handsomest young man in B——. Then Theodore was so kind to her, and thought so much of anything she did, and took such notice of her! Often, at a dance, he would make her his partner for the whole evening; and there was Miss Willoughby, perhaps, or Miss Millar, sitting down; either of whom would have given her eyes to stand up in a reel with Theodore.

But when the summer of her seventeenth year beheld her bursting into womanhood; when her expanding thoughts, from a bounding, fitful, rill-like current, began to run a deep, a broad, and steady stream; when she found that she was almost arrived at the threshold of the world, and reflected that the step which marks a female's first entrance into it is generally taken in the hand of a partner—the thought of who that partner might be recalled Theodore to her mind—and her heart fluttered as she asked herself the question—should she ever be indeed the wife of Theodore?

When, this time, he paid his first visit, Rosalie was as much mortified as he was. Her vexation was increased when she saw that he absented himself: she resolved, if possible, to ascertain the cause, and persuaded her mother to give a ball, and especially invite the young gentleman. He came; she watched him; observed that he neither inquired after her, nor sought for her; and marked the excellent terms that he was upon with twenty people, about whom she knew him to be perfectly indifferent. Women have a perception of the workings of the heart, far more quick and subtle than we have. She was convinced that all his fine spirits were forced—that he was acting a part. She suspected that while he appeared to be occupied with everybody but Rosalie—Rosalie was the only body that was running in his thoughts. She saw him withdraw to the library; she followed him, found him sitting down with a book in his hand, perceived, from his manner of turning over the leaves, that he was intent on anything but reading. She was satisfied that he was thinking of nothing but Rosalie. The thought that Rosalie might one day become indeed his wife, now occurred to her for the thousandth time, and a thousand times stronger than ever; a spirit diffused itself through her heart, which had never been breathed into it before, and filling it with hope and happiness, and unutterable contentment, irresistibly drew it towards him. She approached him, accosted him, and in a moment was seated with him, hand in hand, upon the sofa!

As soon as the dance was done, "Rosalie," said Theodore, "'tis almost as warm in the air as in the room; will you be afraid to take a turn with me in the garden?"

"I shall get my shawl in a minute," said Rosalie, "and meet you there;" and the maiden was there almost as soon as he.

They proceeded, arm-in-arm, to the farthest part of the garden; and there they walked up and down without either seeming inclined to speak, as though their hearts could discourse through their hands, which were locked in one another.

"Rosalie!" at last breathed Theodore. "Rosalie!" breathed he a second time, before the expecting girl could summon courage to say,

"Well?"

"I cannot go home to-night," resumed he, "without speaking to you."

Yet Theodore seemed to be in no hurry to speak; for there he stopped, and continued silent so long, that Rosalie began to doubt whether he would open his lips again.

"Had we not better go in?" said Rosalie; "I think I hear them breaking up."

"Not yet," replied Theodore.

"They'll miss us!" said Rosalie.

"What of that?" rejoined Theodore.

"Nay," resumed the maid, "we have remained long enough, and at least allow me to go in."

"Stop but another minute, dear Rosalie!" imploringly exclaimed the youth.

"For what?" was the maid's reply.

"Rosalie," without a pause, resumed Theodore, "you used to sit upon my knee, and let me call you wife. Are those times passed forever? Dear Rosalie! will you never let me take you on my knee and call you wife again?"

"When we have done with our girlhood, we have done with our plays," said Rosalie.

"I do not mean in play, dear Rosalie," cried Theo-odore. "It is not playing at man and wife, to walk, as such, out of church. Will you marry me, Rosalie?"

Rosalie was silent.

"Will you marry me?" repeated he.

Not a word would Rosalie speak.

"Hear me!" cried Theodore. "The first day, Rosalie, I took you upon my knee, and called you my wife, jest as it seemed to be, my heart was never more in earnest. That day I wedded you in my soul; for though you were a child, I saw the future woman in you, rich in the richest attractions of your sex. Nay, do me justice; recall what you yourself have known of me; inquire of others. To whom did I play the suitor from that day? To none but you, although to you I did not seem to play it. Rosalie, was I not always with you? Recollect, now! Did a day pass, when I was at home, without my coming to your father's house? When there were parties there, whom did I sit beside but you? Whom did I stand behind at the piano-forte but you? Nay, for a whole night, whom have I danced with, but you?—Whatever you might have thought then, can you believe now, that it was merely a playful child that could have so engrossed me? No, Rosalie! it was the virtuous, generous, lovely, loving woman, that I saw in the playful child. Rosalie! for five years have I loved you, though I never declared it to you till now. Do you think I am worthy of you? Will you give yourself to me? Will you marry me?—Will you sit upon my knee again and let me call you wife?"

Three or four times Rosalie made an effort to speak, but desisted, as if she knew not what to say, or was unable to say what she wished, Theodore still holding her hand. At last, "Ask my father's consent!" she exclaimed, and tried to get away; but before she could effect it, she was clasped to the bosom of Theodore, nor released till the interchange of the first pledge of love had been forced from her bashful lips! She did not appear, that night, in the drawing-room again.

Theodore's addresses were sanctioned by the parents of Rosalie. The wedding day was fixed—it wanted but a fortnight to it—when a malignant fever made its appearance in the town: Rosalie's parents were the first victims. She was left an orphan at eighteen, and her uncle, by her mother's side, who had been nominated her guardian in a will, made several years, having followed his brother-in-law and sister's remains to the grave, took up his residence at B——.

Rosalie's sole consolation now was such as she received from the society of Theodore; but Theodore soon wanted consolation himself. His father was attacked by the fever and died, leaving his affairs, to the astonishment of every one, in a state of the most extricable embarrassment; for he had been looked upon as one of the wealthiest inhabitants of B——. This was a double blow to Theodore, but he was not aware of the weight of it till, after the interment of his father, he repaired, for the first time, to resume his visits to his Rosalie.

He was stepping up without ceremony to the drawing-room, when the servant begged his pardon for stopping him, telling him at the same time, that he had received instructions from his master to show Theodore into the parlor, when he should call.

"Was Miss Wilford there?"

"No." Theodore was shown into the parlor. Of all savage brutes, the human brute is the most pernicious and revolting, because he unites to the evil properties of the inferior animal the mental faculties of the superior one. And then he is at large. A vicious tempered dog you can muzzle and render innocuous; but there is no preventing the human dog that bites from fleshing his tooth—he is sure to have it in somebody. And then the infliction is so immeasurably more severe!—the quick of the mind is so much more sensitive than that of the body! Besides, the savage that runs on four legs is so inferior in performance to him that walks upon two! 'Tis he that knows how to knaw! I have often thought it a pity and a sin that the man who plays the dog should be protected from dying the death of one. He should hang, and the other go free.

"Well, young gentleman!" was the salutation which Theodore received when he entered the parlor; "pray, what brings you here?"

Theodore was struck dumb; and no wonder.

"Your father, I understand, has died a beggar!—Do you think to marry my niece?"

If Theodore respired with difficulty before, his breath was utterly taken away at this. He was a young man of spirit, but who can keep up his heart when his ship all at once is going down?

The human dog went on—

"Young gentleman, I shall be plain with you, for I am a straight-forward man; young women should mate with their matches—you are no match for my niece; so a good morning to you!"

How more in place to have wished him a good halter! Saying this, the strait-forward savage walked out of the room, leaving the door wide open, that Theodore might have room for egress, and steadily walked up stairs.

It was several minutes before he could recover his self-recollection. When he did so he rang the bell.

"Tell your master I wish to speak to him," said Theodore to the servant who answered it. The servant went up stairs after his master, and returned.

"I am sorry, sir," said he, "to be the bearer of such an errand, but my master desires you instantly to quit the house; and has commanded me to tell you that he has given me orders not to admit you again."

"I must see Miss Wilford!" exclaimed Theodore.

"You cannot, sir," respectfully remarked the servant, "for she is locked in her own room; but you can send a message to her," added he, in a whisper, "and I will be the bearer of it. There is not a servant in the house, Mr. Theodore, but is sorry for you to the soul."

This was so much in season, and so evidently spoken from the heart, that Theodore could not help catching the honest fellow by the hand. Here the drawing-room bell was rung violently.

"I must go, sir," said the servant; "what message to my mistress?"

"Tell her to give me a meeting, and to apprize me of the time and place," said Theodore, and the next moment the hall door was shut upon him.

One may easily imagine the state of the young fellow's mind. To be driven with insult and barbarity from the house in which he had been received a thousand times with courtesy and kindness, which he looked upon as his own! Then, what was to be done? Rosalie's uncle, after all, had told him nothing but the truth. His father had died a beggar! Dear as Rosalie was to Theodore, his own pride recoiled at the idea of offering her a hand which was not the master of a shilling! Yet was not Theodore portionless. His education was finished; that term he had completed his collegiate studies. If his father had not left him a fortune, he had provided him with the means of making one himself; at all events, of commanding a competency. He had the credit of being a young man of decided genius too.

"I will not offer Rosalie a beggar's hand!" exclaimed Theodore; "I shall ask her to remain true to me for a year—and I'll go up to London and maintain myself by my pen. It may acquire my fame as well as fortune; and then I may marry Rosalie!"

This was a great deal of work to be done in a year; but if Theodore was not a man of genius, he possessed a mind of that sanguine temperament which is usually an accompaniment of the richer gift. Before the hour of dinner, all his plans were laid, and he was ready to start for London. He waited now for nothing but a message from Rosalie, and as soon as the sweet girl could send it, it came to him. It appointed him to meet her in the green lane after sunset. The sun had scarcely set, when he was there; and there, too, was Rosalie. He found that she was Rosalie still. Fate had stripped him of fortune, but she could not persuade Rosalie to refuse him her hand, or her lip; when, half way down the lane, she heard a light, quick step behind her, and, turning, beheld Theodore.

Theodore's wishes, as I stated before, were granted as soon as communicated; and now, nothing remained but to say good-by—perhaps the hardest thing to two young lovers. Rosalie stood passive in the arms of Theodore as he took the farewell kiss, which appeared as if it would join his lips to hers forever, instead of tearing them away. She heard her name called from a short distance, and in a half-suppressed voice; she started, and turned towards the direction whence the preconcerted warning came; she heard it again; she had stopped till the last moment! She had half withdrawn herself from Theodore's arms; she looked at him; flung her own around him, and burst into tears upon his neck!—In another minute there was nobody in the lane.

London is a glorious place for a man of talent to make his way in—provided he has extraordinary good luck. Nothing but merit can get on there: nothing is sterling that is not of its coinage. Our provincial towns won't believe that gold is gold unless it has been minted in London. There is no trickery there; no treating, no canvassing, no intrigue, no coalition! There, worth has only to show itself if it wishes to be killed with kindness! London tells the truth! You may swear to what it says—whatsoever may be proved to the contrary. The cause—the cause is everything in London! Show but your craft, and straight your brethren come crowding around you, and if they find you worthy, why you shall be brought into notice—even though they should tell a lie for it and damn you. Never trouble yourself about getting on by interest in London! Get on by yourself. Posts are filled there by merit; or if the man suits not the office, why the office is made to adapt itself to the man, and so there is unity after all! What a happy fellow was Theodore to find himself in such a place as London!

He was certainly happy in one thing: the coach in which he came, set him down at a friend's whose circumstances were narrow, but whose heart was large—a curate of the Church of England. Strange that, with all the appurtenances of hospitality at his command, abundance should allow it to be said, that the kindest welcome which adversity usually meets with, is that which it receives from adversity. If Theodore found that the house was a cold one to what he had been accustomed, the warmth of the greeting made up for it. "They breakfasted at nine, dined at four, and, if he could sleep upon the sofa, why, there was a bed for him!" In a day or two he was settled, and at his work.

And upon what did Theodore found his hopes of making a fortune and rising to fame in London?—Upon writing a play. At an early period, he had discovered, as his friends imagined, a talent for dramatic composition: and having rather sedulously cultivated that branch of literature, he thought he would now try his hand in one bold effort, the success of which should determine him as to his future course in life. The play was written, presented, and accepted; the performers were ready in their parts; the evening of representation came on, and Theodore, seated in the pit beside his friend, at last, with a throbbing heart, beheld the curtain rise. The first and second acts went off smoothly and with applause.

Two gentlemen were placed immediately in front of Theodore.

"What do you think of it?" said the one to the other.

"Rather tame," was the reply.

"Will it succeed?"

"Doubtful."

The third act, however, decided the fate of the play; the interest of the audience became so intense, that at one particular stage of the action, numbers in the second and third rows of the side boxes stood up, and the clapping of hands was universal, intermingled with cries of "bravo!" from every part of the theatre. "'Twill do," was now the remark, and Theodore breathed a little more freely than he had done some ten minutes ago. Not to be too tedious, the curtain fell amid shouts of approbation, unmingled with the slightest demonstration of pleasure, and the author had not twenty friends in the house.

If Theodore did not sleep that night, it was not from inquietude of mind—contentment was his repose. His most sanguine hopes had been surpassed; the fiat of a London audience had stamped him a dramatist; the way to fortune was open and clear, and Rosalie would be his.

Next morning, as soon as breakfast was over, Theodore and his friend repaired to the coffee-room. "We must see what the critics say," remarked the latter. Theodore, with prideful confidence—the offspring of fair success, took up the first morning print that came to his hand. Theatre Royals met his eye. "Happy is the successful dramatist!" exclaimed Theodore to himself. "At night he is greeted by the applause of admiring thousands, and in the morning they are repeated, and echoed all over the kingdom, through the medium of the press! What will Rosalie say when her eye falls upon this?" And what, indeed, would Rosalie say when she read the utter damnation of her lover's drama, which the critic denounced from beginning to end, without presenting his reader with a single quotation to justify the severity of his strictures.

"'Tis very odd!" said Theodore.

"'Tis very odd indeed!" rejoined his friend, repeating his words. "You told me this play was your own, and here I find that you have copied it from half a dozen others that have been founded upon the same story."

"Where?" inquired Theodore, reaching for the paper.

"There!" said his friend, pointing to the paragraph.

"And is this London!" exclaimed Theodore. "I never read a play, nor the line of a play, upon the same subject. Why does not the writer prove the plagiarism?"

"Because he does not know whether it is or is not a plagiarism," rejoined the other. "He is aware that several other authors have constructed dramas upon the same passage in history; and—to draw the most charitable inference, for you would not suspect him of telling a deliberate lie—he thinks you have seen them, and have availed yourself of them."

"Is it not the next thing to a falsehood," indignantly exclaimed Theodore, "to advance a charge, of the justness of which you have not assured yourself?"

"I know not that," rejoined his friend; "but it certainly indicates a rather superficial reverence for truth, and a disposition to censure, which excludes from all claim to ingenuousness the individual who indulges it."

"And this will go the round of the whole kingdom?"

"Yes."

"Should I not contradict it?"

"No."

"Why?"

"'Tis beneath you; besides, the stamp of malignancy is so strong upon it, that, except to the utterly ignorant, it is harmless; and even these, when they witness your play themselves, as some time or another they will, will remember the libel, to the cost of its author and to your advantage. I see you have been almost as hardly treated by this gentleman," continued he, glancing over the paper which Theodore had taken up when he entered the room. "Are you acquainted with any of the gentleman of the press?"

"No; and is it not therefore strange that I should have enemies among them?"

"Not at all."

"Why?"

"Because you have succeeded. Look over the rest of the journals," continued his friend; "you may find salve, perhaps, for these scratches."

Theodore did so, and in one or two instances salve, indeed, he found; but upon the whole he was in little danger of being spoiled through the praises of the press. "Why," exclaimed Theodore, "why do not letters enlarge the soul, while they expand the mind? Why do they make men generous and honest? Why is not every literary man an illustration of Juvenal's axiom?"

"Teach a dog what you may," rejoined the friend, "can you alter his nature, so that the brute shall not predominate?"

"No," replied Theodore.

"You are answered," said a friend.

The play had what is called a run, but not a decided one. Night after night it was received with the same enthusiastic applause; but the audience did not increase. It was a victory without the acquisition of spoils or territory. "What can be the meaning of this?" exclaimed Theodore; "we seem to be moving, and yet do not advance an inch!"

"They should paragraph the play as they do a pantomime," remarked his friend. "But then a pantomime is an expensive thing; they will lay out a thousand pounds upon by one, and they must get their money back. The same is the case with their melodramas; so, if you want to succeed to the height, as a play-wright, you know what to do."

"What?" inquired Theodore.

"Write melo-dramas and pantomimes!"

Six months had now elapsed, and Theodore's purse, with all his success, was rather lighter than when he first pulled it out in London. However, in a week, two bills which he had taken from his publisher would fall due, and then he would run down to B——, and perhaps obtain an interview with Rosalie. At the expiration of the week his bills were presented, and dishonored! He repaired to his publisher's for an explanation—the house had stopped! Poor Theodore! They were in the Gazette that very day!—Theodore turned into the first coffee-room to look at a paper; there were, indeed, the names of the firm!—"I defy fortune to serve me a scurvier trick!" exclaimed Theodore, the tears half starting into his eyes. He little knew the lady whose ingenuity he was braving.

He looked now at one side of the paper, and now at the other, thinking all the while of nothing but the bills and the bankrupts' list. Splendid Fete at B——, met his eye, and soon his thoughts were occupied with nothing but B——; for there he read that the young lord of the manor, having just come of age, had given a ball and supper, the former of which he opened with the lovely and accomplished Miss Rosalie. The grace of the fair couple was expatiated upon; and the editor took occasion to hint, that a pair so formed by nature for each other might probably, before long, take hands in another, a longer, and more momentous dance. What did Theodore think of fortune now?

"O, that it were but a stride to B——!" he exclaimed, as he laid down the paper, and his hand dropped nerveless at his side. He left the coffee house, and dreamed his way back to his friend's; gigs, carriages, carts, rolled by him unheeded; the foot-path was crowded, but he saw not a soul in the street. He was in the ball-room at B——, and looking on while the young lord of the manor handed out Rosalie to lead her down the dance, through every figure of which Theodore followed them with his eyes with scrutinizing glance, scanning the countenance of his mistress. Then the set was over, and he saw them walking arm-in-arm up and down the room; and presently they were dancing again; and now the ball was over, and he followed them to the supper room, where he saw the young lord of the manor place Rosalie beside him. Then fancy changed the scene from the supper room to the church, at the altar of which stood Rosalie with his happy rival; and he heard the questions and responses which forge the mystic chain that binds for life; and he saw the ring put on, and heard the blessing which announces that the nuptial sacrament is complete! His hands were clenched; his cheek was in a flame; a wish was rising in his throat: "Good news for you," said some one, clapping him on the back; "a letter from Rosalie lies for you at home. Why are you passing the house?" 'Twas his friend.

"A letter from Rosalie!" exclaimed Theodore.—Quickly he retraced his steps, and there, on his table lay, indeed, the dear missive of his Rosalie.

"Welcome, sweet comforter!" ejaculated Theodore, as he kissed the ciphers which his Rosalie's hand had traced, and the wax which bore the impress of her seal—"welcome, O welcome! You come in time: you bring an ample solace for disappointment, mortification, poverty—whatever my evil destiny can inflict! You have come to assure me that they cannot deprive me of my Rosalie!"

Bright was his eye, and glistening while he spoke; but when he opened the fair folds that conveyed to him the thoughts of his mistress, its radiancy was gone!

"THEODORE,

"I am aware of the utter frustration of your hopes. I am convinced that at the end of a year you will not be a step nearer to fortune than you are now;—why then keep my hand for you? What I say briefly, you will interpret fully. You are now the guardian of my happiness—as such I address you. Thursday—so you consent—will be my wedding day.

"ROSALIE."

Such was the letter, upon the address and seal of which Theodore had imprinted a score of kisses before he opened it. "Fortune is in the mood," said Theodore, with a sigh so deeply drawn, that any one who had heard it, would have imagined he had breathed his spirit out along with it.—"Fortune is in the mood, and let her have her humor out! I shall answer the letter; my reply to her shall convey what she desires—nothing more! she is incapable of entering into my feelings, and unworthy of being made acquainted with them; I shall not condescend even to complain."

"ROSALIE,

"You are free!

"THEODORE."

Such was the answer which Theodore despatched to Rosalie. O the enviable restlessness of the mind upon the first shock of thwarted affection! How it turns every way for the solace which it feels it can nowhere meet with, except in the perfect extinction of consciousness. Find it an anodyne!—you cannot. A drug may close the eye for a time, but the soul will not sleep a wink; it lies broad awake to agony, distinct, palpable, immediate, howsoever memory may be cheated to lose for the present the traces of the cause. Then for the start, the spasm, the groan, which, while the body lies free, attest the presence and activity of the mental rack! Better walk than go to sleep! A heath, without a soul but yourself upon it!—an ink-black sky, pouring down torrents—wind, lightning, thunder, as though the vault above was cracking and disparting into fragments!—anything to mount above the pitch of your own solitude, and darkness, and tempest, and overcome them, or attract and divert your contemplation from them, or threaten every moment to put an end to them and you!

Theodore's friend scarcely knew him the next morning. He glanced at him, and took no further notice. 'Twas the best way; though people there are who imagine that it rests with a man in a fever, at his own option to remain in it, or become convalescent.

Theodore's feelings were more insupportable to him the second day than the first. He went here and there and everywhere; and nowhere could he remain for two minutes at a time at rest. Then he was so abstracted. Crossing a street he was nearly run over by a vehicle and four. This for a moment awakened him. He saw London and B—— upon the pannels of the coach. The box-seat was empty; he asked if it was engaged. "No." He sprung up upon it, and away they drove. "I'll see her once more," exclaimed Theodore; "it can but drive me mad, or break my heart."

Within a mile of B——, a splendid barouch passed them. "Whose is that?" inquired Theodore.

"The young lord of the manor's," answered the driver. "Did you see the lady in it?"

"No."

"I caught a glimpse of her dress," said the driver. "I'll warrant she is a dashing one! The young 'squire, they say, has a capital taste!" Theodore looked after the carriage. There was nothing but the road. The vehicle drove at a rapid pace, and was soon out of sight. Theodore's heart turned sick.

The moment the coach stopped he alighted; and, with a misgiving mind, he stood at the door which had often admitted him to his Rosalie. 'Twas opened by a domestic whom he had never seen before.—"Was Miss Wilford within?" "No." "When would she return?" "Never. She had gone that morning to London to be married!" Theodore made no further inquiries, neither did he offer to go, but stood glaring upon the man more like a spectre than a human being. "Anything more?" said the man, retreating into the house, and gradually closing the door, through which now only a portion of his face could be seen. "Anything more?" Theodore made no reply; in fact, he had lost all consciousness. At last, the shutting of the door, which, half from panic, half from anger, the man pushed violently to, aroused him. "I shall knock at you no more!" said he, and departed, pressing his heart with his hand, and moving his limbs as if he cared not how, or whither they bore him. A gate suddenly stopped his progress; 'twas the entrance to the green lane. He stepped over the stile—he was on the spot where he had parted last from Rosalie—where she had flung her arms about his neck and wept upon it. His heart began to melt, for the first time since he had received her letter: a sense of suffocation came over him, till he felt as if he would choke. The name of Rosalie was on his tongue; twice he attempted to articulate it, but he could not. At last it got vent in a convulsive sob, which was followed by a torrent of tears. He threw himself upon the ground—he wept on—he made no effort to check the flood, but let it flow till forgetfulness stopped it.

He rose with a sensation of intense cold. 'Twas morning! He had slept! Would he had slept on!—He turned from the sun, as it rose without a cloud, upon the wedding morn of Rosalie.—'Twas Thursday. He repassed the stile; and in a few minutes was on his road to London, which he entered about eleven o'clock at night, and straight proceeded to his friend's. They were gone to bed.

"Give me a light," said Theodore, "I'll go to bed."

"Your bed is occupied, sir," replied the servant.

"Is it?" said Theodore. "Well, I can sleep upon the carpet." He turned into a parlor, drew a chair towards the table, upon which the servent had placed a light, and sat down. All was quiet for a time. Presently he heard a foot upon the stair; 'twas his friend's, who was descending, and now entered the parlor.

"I thought you were a-bed," said Theodore.

"So I was," replied his friend, "but hearing your voice in the hall, I rose and came down to you." He drew a chair opposite to Theodore. Both were silent for a time; at length Theodore spoke.

"Rosalie is married," said he.

"I don't believe it."

"She is going to be married to the young lord of the manor."

"I don't believe it."

"She came to town with him yesterday."

"I don't believe it."

Theodore pushed back his chair, and stared at his friend.

"What do you mean?" said Theodore.

"I mean that I entertain some doubts as to the accuracy of your grounds for concluding that Rosalie is inconstant to you."

"Did I not read the proof of it in the public papers?"

"The statement may have been erroneous."

"Did not her own letter assure me of it?"

"You may have misunderstood it."

"I tell you I have been at B——; I have been at her house. I inquired for her, and was told she had gone up to London to be married! O my friend," continued he, covering his eyes with his handkerchief, "'tis useless to deceive ourselves. I am a ruined man! You see to what she has reduced me. I shall never be myself again! Myself! I tell you I existed in her being more than in my own. She was the soul of all I thought, and felt, and did; the primal, vivifying principle! She has murdered me! I breathe, it is pure, and the blood is in my veins, and circulates; but everything else about me is death—hopes! wishes! interests!—there is no pulse, no respiration there! I should not be sorry were there none anywhere else! Feel my hand," added he, reaching his hand across the table, without removing the handkerchief from his eyes, for the sense of his desolation had utterly unmanned him, and his tears continued to flow. "Feel my hand. Does it not burn? A hearty fever, now, would be a friend," continued he, "and I think I have done my best to merit a call from such a visitor. The whole of the night before last I slept out in the open air. Guess where I made my bed.—In the green lane—the spot where I parted last from Rosalie!"—He felt a tear drop upon the hand which he had extended—the tear was followed by a pressure of the lip. He uncovered his eyes, and turning them in wonderment to look upon his friend—beheld Rosalie sitting opposite to him!

For a moment or two he questioned the evidence of his senses—but soon was he convinced that it was indeed reality; for Rosalie quitting her seat, approached him, and breathing his name with an accent that infused ecstacy into his soul, threw herself into his arms, that doubtingly opened to receive her.

* * * * *

Looking over her father's papers Rosalie had found a more recent will, in which her union with Theodore had been fully sanctioned, and he himself constituted her guardian until it should take place. She was aware that his success in London had been doubtful; the generous girl determined that he should no longer be subjected to incertitude and disappointment; and she playfully wrote the letter which was the source of such distraction to her lover. From his answer she saw that he had totally misrepresented her; she resolved in person to disabuse him of the error; and by offering to become his wife, at once to give him the most convincing proof of her sincerity and constancy. She arrived in London the very day that Theodore arrived in B——. His friend who had known her from her infancy, received her as his daughter: and he and his wife listened with delight to the unfolding of her plans and intentions, which she freely confided to them. Late they sat up for Theodore that night, and when all hopes of his coming home were abandoned, Rosalie became the occupant of his bed. The next night, in a state of the most distressing anxiety, in consequence of his continued absence, she had just retired to her apartment, when a knock at the street door made her bound from her couch, upon which she had that moment thrown herself, and presently she heard her lover's voice at the foot of the stairs. Scarcely knowing what she did, she attired herself, descended, opened the parlor door unperceived by Theodore, and took the place of their friendly host, who, the moment he saw her, beckoned her, and resigning his chair to her, withdrew.

The next evening a select party were assembled in the curate's little drawing room, and Theodore and Rosalie were there. The lady of the house motioned to approach her, she rose and was crossing Theodore, when he caught her by the hand and drew her upon his knee.

"Theodore!" exclaimed the fair one, coloring.

"My wife!" was his reply, while he imprinted a kiss upon her lips.

They had been married that morning.

TO MY WIFE.

Her love has all the tenderness, the trusting faith, the truth,
Which bound me with their silken ties, through fond and fleeting youth,
And now in manhood's graver years, 'tis her true love supplies
The solace for earth's darker hours, with bright hopes of the skies!

When sad and drear our daily paths, how sweet to us the tone
Which tells us through a thousand cares, we never wander not alone,
That, when no other form is near, that heart is by our side,
To succor ours with love's true words, when most by sorrow tried!

So, wandering on those distant shores, my heart looks fondly back,
Through all the clouds upon my path, the sunshine on my track;
And the sweet hopes and memories, the love of vanished years,
Come whispering their tender tales, and melt my heart to tears.

Fit tribute to her love, such tears! delicious, and yet sad!
They wear away each harsher grief, to leave the bosom glad;
Upspringing from the heart's deep fount, these healing waters flow,
And shed on every lingering thought, the bliss which angels know.

Flow on, sweet tears! I feel my heart, beneath your gentle rain,
Though parched and hardened by the world, grows fresh and green again;
The Spring tide of my youth comes back, with all its fruits and flowers,
The thoughts and feelings pure and true, which blessed those sunny hours!

And she, whose love commenced my song, my bright, my morning star,
Who ever seemed to me as pure, as holy angels are—
She smiles to see the blessed change, those sacred tears impart,
And binds anew, with love's sweet ties, to mine her faithful heart.

LUCILLA.

A Thrilling Story of Naples.

BY RICHARD WESTMACOTT, ESQ.

There is a house situated on the ascent of the Mergellina, at the end of the Chiaja, in Naples, which, some years ago, was the scene of one of those lawless, and at the same time romantic dramas, which seem to occur more frequently in Italy than in any other country. They are too often characterized by fearful acts of violence; but they sometimes are accompanied by circumstances that give them an unusual degree of interest, and the tale-collector is almost cheated out of his natural horror of the crime, by the fixed purpose and energy of the actors, and by the picturesque scenery and accompaniments amidst which the events, shocking in themselves, take place. The reader shall judge how far the following little story, which is founded on fact, is one of those to which the above observations apply.

Though the more prominent actors in the scene about to be exhibited were in an inferior walk of life, the incidents which gave their interest to the house in the Magellina, had their origin from a more elevated source. Two nobles, who had considerable possessions in the mountain district on the east of the beautiful territory of Amalfi, had long been at feud; and what, in former times, would have burst into regular acts of violence and petty warfare, was still carried on, in a minor degree, by every kind of enmity and annoyance that could be exercised. The name of one of these parties was Serrani; the other was a branch of the Bolognese house of Cesarotti.

Amongst the most daring and zealous of the adherents of Serrani—for the servants on each side took an active part in the disputes of their respective masters—was a man called Matteo. He was a native of Sicily, where he had a wife, and a son and daughter. He had been obliged to effect his escape thence, owing to the breaking up of a desperate band of smugglers, of which he was one; and he had contrived to recommend himself to Serrani, to whom he was entirely devoted, in gratitude for his protection, often extended to him when his crimes would otherwise have been visited with condign punishment. As may be supposed, he was a reckless and unscrupulous instrument in carrying into effect any plan of annoyance that could injure or irritate his lord's hated neighbour. Opportunities were not wanting on either side, and none were ever lost for the commission of acts of aggression and vexation. On one occasion, however, the Cesarotti party had gained an advantage, by securing Matteo on the spot. He had been caught by the foresters of Cesarotti trespassing at night on his domain, and he was accused, on no doubtful proof, of having instigated some of his fellows, who were discovered in the act of maiming cattle.

Those who know Italy well, and have had opportunity of judging of the condition of the tribunals, know how irregularly and uncertainly the law there is administered, especially when interest can be brought to bear upon the decisions. This is one of the fruitful causes of the great demoralization of the people. There is no confidence in the honesty and purity of the courts, and it cannot, therefore, be a matter of surprise that individuals, feeling how little they can reckon on justice and legal forms, so often take the law into their own hands. In the instance before us, the interest of the parties was pretty nearly equal. Cesarotti considered the matter well, and felt it would be striking an important blow, if he could secure the legal punishment of a servant of Serrani; and as he knew the evidence against Matteo was insurmountable, he expressed his submission to, and his confidence in, the high authority of the law, and carried the case before a court of justice. Serrani's interest was exerted in the usual (that is, the most shameless) manner; but, on this occasion, it was in vain; the facts were glaring—justice triumphed. A conviction was gained, and the sentence was that Matteo should be publicly whipped, and subjected to two years' close imprisonment.

Serrani's hostility to Cesarotti could scarcely be increased, even by this defeat, but Matteo had now a private injury, in addition to his enmity as a servant of the Serrani's, to whet his rancour, and stimulate his hatred against Cesarotti. He swore never to forgive him, nor to rest till he had satisfied his revenge.

Soon after this, and while the convict was fulfilling his term of imprisonment, political disturbances broke out in Italy. Cesarotti was engaged in these; and having taken a part on the popular and unsuccessful side, found himself obliged, on their partial suppression, to fly the country. Considerable exertions were made to arrest him, but they failed; and, as a last resource, a reward was offered for his apprehension, in the event of his making his appearance within the Neapolitan territory.

At the end of the stated period, Matteo was liberated from prison. He returned to the service of Serrani, burning with revenge against Cesarotti, and determined to let slip no opportunity to make him, and, if possible, those connected with him, pay the full penalty for the pain and indignity he had suffered. The absence of Cesarotti placed him personally out of reach of Matteo's vengeance; but the circumstances under which he was expatriated, suggested a new means of annoyance. Hitherto no steps had been taken by the government to interfere with the property of Cesarotti, and his family still resided on the estate, and managed his affairs. Matteo urged his master to endeavour to have the estate of Cesarotti confiscated, as that of an outlaw and rebel.—Serrani, quite as ready as heretofore to injure his enemy, either directly or indirectly, lent a willing ear to this counsel, and communications were held with the authorities upon the subject. By some means or other, a suspicion of this villainous plot reached the representatives of Cesarotti, and they lost no time in sending a trusty messenger to him, to apprize him of what they apprehended. They implored him, therefore, to take immediate steps, by securing the services of some powerful advocate, to frustrate the intentions of his enemy; especially as endeavours were being made by his own influential friends to obtain a remission of the sentence against himself, so as eventually to allow of his returning to reside on his property. Cesarotti saw how necessary it was to act with decision; but he knew that till he could get the judgment against himself modified or withdrawn, he scarcely could hope to take such steps as should prevent foul play in the matter of confiscation.

During his exile, he had attached to him a servant in whom he placed the greatest confidence, and he resolved to trust this person, though he was very young, with the correspondence that was necessary to effect the great object he had in view. By the care, caution, and assiduity of this youth, whose name was Ignazio, Cesarotti established a communication with some valued friends, and secured the assistance and co-operation of one of the most distinguished advocates in Naples. As there were great difficulties in the way of Cesarotti being freed from the sentence that had been passed against him, the first object at present was to create delays in the process for effecting the seizure of his property.—Ignazio was the medium through which all the correspondence upon these vital matters passed, and some time had now elapsed since it first commenced. The lawyer had established a place of meeting in a retired cottage of a Vignarolo, or Vine-dresser, a humble client of his, close to Naples; and it was thither that the parties usually repaired, either to converse or to leave letters, as the case might require. Ignazio was unremitting in his attention to his master's interests, but he also had found attraction for himself in the Vignarolo's dwelling. It was the house already alluded to on the Mergellina. It was a few yards off the path leading up the hill, on a part of which stands the, so-called, Tomba di Virgilio: and was approached by a steep paved ascent. A wall, with two or three arched openings, formed a protection on the side of the precipitous hill, and from these a commanding view was afforded of the beautiful bay of Naples. Ignazio, who often had to wait many hours for meetings or answers to letters of which he was the bearer, became acquainted with the pretty daughter of the Vine-dresser, and was not long in creating an interest for himself in the breast of the fair Lucilla. The Vignarolo had lost his wife; and, as he was engaged during the day in his occupation, and old Margarita, who managed his house for him, also had her cares, there was plenty of opportunity for the young people to increase their intimacy, and quietly and deliberately to fall in love with each other. Ignazio was a handsome young fellow, good tempered, and played well upon the guitar, so that his having gained Lucilla's good opinion is not much to be wondered at. There was something attractive, too, in the air of mystery with which he came and went; his desire to remain concealed as much as possible; and in the sort of consideration that was paid him by the Signor Avvocato and others who came to him. He seemed also to be in some sort of danger, and Lucilla felt or fancied that she was, to a degree, trusted, and had his safety in her keeping—a powerful tie, and one that was sure to make a woman's heart soft and sympathizing. It must also be added, that in the midst of his many cares, he always seemed to remember Lucilla, and generally contrived to bring her some pretty little present, for which she could not but feel grateful.

Matters had gone on so satisfactorily, as far as concealment of their designs and intercourse went, that, at one of their meetings, it was resolved to have Cesarotti himself into Naples. His place of concealment was on the frontier, at the house of a friend, and there seemed to be every chance of his being able to have a personal conference with his supporters, and get back to his place of refuge before any one could be apprised of his having entered the Neapolitan dominions. Ignazio received his instructions accordingly, and, to his ingenuity and courage the enterprise was entrusted. He took leave of Lucilla and her father, and set out on his journey to join his master.

It is now time to return to Serrani and Matteo.—These worthies had not been idle; but somehow or other all their plans for precipitating the confiscation of Cesarotti's estate had hitherto been baffled, and they could not discover by what means these delays had been effected. At length, by great watchfulness on the part of Matteo, and well-directed bribery, through his agency, of one of the subordinates of the Court in which the process was being conducted, Matteo contrived to discover that there was a powerful interest at work to assist Cesarotti, and to secure not only his estate, but also to gain a commutation of his sentence. He had a new object of interest in tracing out how this was being exercised, and as it was important that he should be on the spot, he easily gained permission of his master to take up his quarters permanently at Naples. Through his purchased friend and informer in the Court, he easily learned who were the leading advocates likely to be consulted upon cases of the kind, and, after long watching, he did, unhappily, discover the communication that took place between one of them and some person or persons in the house on the Mergellina. He now had to ascertain whether this intercourse was connected with the object in which he and his master had so great an interest. He contrived to gain admittance to the house, and made a sort of acquaintance with its inmates. He was too wary to put any leading questions, and trusted to his own acute observation to discover the purpose of the Advocate's visits to the Vignarolo. Nothing, however, occurred to throw light upon what he was so anxious to find out, till the very evening on which it had been determined to invite Cesarotti to hold a personal conference with his advisers. On that evening Matteo was strolling, as if accidentally, towards the Vignarolo's house; and had just reached the corner near the paved ascent, when a young man, muffled up in his cloak, passed him. The sun had just set, and it was too dark to make out anything of the figure of the person. Matteo looked after him—watched him on his way down the hill—and would have followed, had not the light step of the stranger carried him already too far from Matteo for him to overtake him without running, and thus attracting attention. He turned, and proceeded to the house, and knocked gently at the door, which was immediately opened by the smiling Lucilla, who, not seeing at first who it was, and supposing Ignazio had returned, said, in a hurried voice—

"What! something forgotten?"

Matteo let fall his cloak; appeared to take no notice of her observation; apologized for troubling her, but said that being near, he had turned up to their house to ask a "bicchier' di vino," for he had been walking all day, and was tired.

"Certainly," said old Margarita, who was present, "certainly,—the padrone is gone to bed, but a glass of wine you shall have forthwith, and welcome, and then—felicissima notte."

Matteo heard whispering in an adjoining room.

The wine was brought.

"Excellente," said Matteo, taking a draught; "I dare say, you have many a request for a glass of such vintage?"

"Oibò! we are in an out-of-the-way corner,—but few find their way up here."

"But you have visitors sometimes, I suppose,—and the charming Lucilla would attract some, I doubt not?"

"Do not put nonsense into the child's head,—come, 'tis growing late, and had you not strolled up this way, both Lucilla and I had been in bed."

Matteo drained his glass, wished them good night, and left the house.

He had gained a point. There was a mystery; and it was now his business to find out what it was. He could have no doubt, whatever, that persons, who desired not to be known, were concealed in the house. Would they issue forth from their hiding-place? He was determined to wait for a time where he could not be seen, and, if possible, discover who they were, and whither they went. He hummed a tune as he descended the steps of the door, and appeared to be carelessly pursuing his road home.—After turning the corner that led up to the Vignarolo's house, he stopped. He knew that whoever came thence, must pass by that corner; so he threw himself behind some low shrubs that grew there, and remained quiet, watching like the hyæna for her prey. After some time, he heard footsteps. Two figures descended the path. Both were unknown to him. As they passed close by him, one of them observed to the other that they had better separate at the bottom of the hill, as, if any one should meet them, their being seen together at that time, and in such a place, might excite suspicion.

"Right!" said the other, "we must meet again on Friday night, when Cesarotti——"

Matteo could hear no more, for the voice was lost in the distance. He crept out from his place of concealment, and gained the strada just as the two friends parted. Matteo kept one of them in his eye, and followed him at a careful distance. He succeeded in watching him to the house of the Advocate.—It was indeed Cesarotti's legal adviser.

Matteo took care to inform his employer of all he knew, save his suspicion that Cesarotti himself was to be at the house on the following Friday. The few words spoken in his hearing seemed to convey that intimation, and he resolved, at any rate, to [illegible]," to make a masterly stroke, if it should turn out to be so. The reward offered by government for Cesarotti's apprehension would be his, and he would also be carrying out his own and his master's scheme of vengeance. Still, he would not commit himself beforehand by reporting what, after all, might not be the fact.

There were four days to pass before the Friday night that was so pregnant with events not only affecting Cesarotti and Serrani, but also Matteo. His suspicion, as we have seen, was correct. It had been arranged, that if Cesarotti could disguise himself, and would dare the peril, he was to meet his friends at the Vignarolo's house on Friday night; as his attested signature was essential to some papers which the Advocate meant to use in his client's favor.

Matteo, in the first place, secured the assistance of some trusty fellow-rascals to make Cesarotti his prisoner. He ordered them to be in attendance below, in the strada, after night-fall—and to be ready at a notice agreed upon, to seize upon those who should descend from the Vignarolo's house; but on no account to molest any one till they heard his signal. He himself was to be in his former hiding-place, where he could see those who arrived as well as departed.

So far, his plan was excellently well laid.

Friday arrived. Ignazio had stolen into Naples early in the morning, long before Matteo dreamed that anything was passing; and was safely lodged in the Vine-dresser's house. Here he was to remain, ready to receive his master, who would be conducted thither by one of the persons whom Matteo had seen. The Advocate was to meet him at an appointed hour.

Soon after sunset, Matteo, who had long been hanging about the spot, stole to his hiding-place.—His fellows were to be at their posts about two hours later, as he did not mean Cesarotti to be seized till he left the house. He scarcely had waited half an hour, when he heard footsteps approaching. Two figures came close to where he was lying. In one of them he recognized Cesarotti: the other was the companion of the Advocate, whom he had noticed on the former occasion.

"Now," said Cesarotti, "we may speak—where is the house?"

"Close by; we are safe thus far."

"Have you heard anything more of Serrani's agent, who, I strongly suspect, is that villain Matteo?"

"No; but the information you gave has been acted upon, and the police are watching for him—the galleys will settle his business for him, even if he should escape with his life; the murder——"

Matteo could distinguish no more. He had heard enough, however, to convince him that [illegible] imminent danger, and that Cesarotti had the means of destroying him. His case was desperate, and a dark thought crossed his mind. "Is it so?" he muttered to himself. He brought his stiletto higher up in his vest, so that he could the more easily grasp its handle.

Cesarotti and his friend had scarcely reached the house before Matteo was aware that some one else approached the ascent. It was the Advocate. He stepped softly, and looked about him cautiously, as he turned out of the path to reach the Vignarolo's door.

After waiting nearly two hours, two figures, enveloped in cloaks, descended from the house. Matteo had his whistle ready, for he was no match for two; but, as they came near him, he perceived they were the Advocate and his friend. This was well, and answered Matteo's purpose. He let them pass. He then crept out of his hiding-place. He put aside his whistle, and played nervously with the hilt of his dagger. Cesarotti had not quitted the house, and Matteo stealthily approached the door.—It had been arranged that the Advocate and the friend of Cesarotti should leave the house first, and when sufficient time had elapsed, that Ignazio and his master should issue forth, gain the pass of Posilippo, at the further end of which there was a carriage in waiting, and that Cesarotti should make his way back to his conductor through the mountain pass. Ignazio was to return, and sleep that night in the Vignarolo's house. After a short time, the door was gently opened by Lucilla, who looked out; Margarita holding a light, to see that the path was clear. She went back to tell Ignazio he might proceed. He was to walk a few paces a-head, to secure his master's passage, and to give notice in case of danger.—Lucilla accompanied her lover to the door. Ignazio turned to wish her good night, and, as old Margarita was present, poor little Lucilla could not refuse him what his eyes so eloquently asked for. That long day, and all its gossipping, had settled their love speculations, and she had consented to be his, as soon as the present momentous business, in which his master required his constant services, should be completed. Ignazio kissed her affectionately, and then, as nappy as a prince—happier than most princes—he descended the steps

Matteo believed there was but one man who had to leave the house that night, and that man had the power to destroy him. He waited till Ignazio reached the pavement—rushed upon him,—and plunged his knife, with too true an aim, into the youth's neck!—he reeled, and fell without a groan.

Lucilla had turned back to conduct Cesarotti, who came to the door as Matteo was endeavouring to extricate himself from the convulsive grasp of the dying man, who had fallen upon his assassin. Cesarotti in a moment rushed upon him, and called loudly for help. The women came forward with a light, and Matteo stared wildly when he found himself in the strong grasp of Cesarotti, and beheld an unknown man lying dead before him.

Lucilla uttered a wild shriek, and hastened to the assistance of Ignazio. She knelt down by his side and turned his face down to see if he still lived. Matteo, who had in vain endeavoured to shake off the firm hold of Cesarotti, saw the countenance of his victim, and suddenly became convulsed with emotion. He gazed with a look of the utmost horror at the form before him, and, as he fell flat to the earth, cried—

"It is—it is—my son!"

It was indeed his son. He had quitted his native place, and seeking employment, had been taken into the service of Cesarotti, who soon distinguished him for his zeal and affection; and, unhappily for the poor youth, had chosen him for the delicate and dangerous service in which we have found him engaged.

The screams of Lucilla brought some persons to the spot. The Vignarolo, who had likewise been alarmed, appeared at the same moment. Matteo was secured, and the lifeless body of Ignazio was carried by his distressed master and the two women into the house. Cesarotti, whispering a few words to the Vignarolo, and, giving him a paper on which he hastily wrote something, directed that the murderer Matteo should be conveyed to the nearest guard-house. He then felt the necessity of looking to his own safety, for many persons had now collected about the house; and, taking advantage of the confusion, he escaped unobserved from the city.

It need only be added, that there being no doubt of Matteo's guilt, he expiated his crime with his life. In his confession, he did not hesitate to disclose in what degree his master was implicated in the affair which led to the unintentional murder of Ignazio; and Serrani was so far compromised by it, that he was glad to escape further notice, and withdrew from all interference in effecting the confiscation of Cesarotti's property. A considerable time elapsed before the representations of that nobleman's friends were listened to by the government; but eventually he received his pardon, and was suffered, on the payment of a heavy fine, to return to his estates.

THE MISER.

An old man dwelt in a lonely room,
With a cold and selfish soul;
Thro' a broken pane, on his golden gain,
The light of the morning stole.

His eyes were fixed with a steadfast look
On a heavy iron chest,
Which he strove to hide by a mean bed-side,
Where he lay in the night to rest.

Oh! sad were his looks, in his sunken eye
Was a volume of misery seen;
That ghastly stare on his treasure there,
Was his only joy I ween.

And many there came to this old man's door,
Who pitied his wretched lot;
For they knew not the wealth he'd hid by stealth,
In that miserable spot.

The pauper hath passed his drear abode,—
But what for his suppliant tone?
To ask an alms there he did not dare,
If so resembled his own.

But the old man's days were ended—
The warning spirit came;
And his eye grew dim as it spoke to him,
And a terror seized his frame.

"What now to thee is thy treasure?
Hah, hah!" the spirit saith;
"Thy glitt'ring gain hath not freed thee from pain,
It shall not screen thee from death."

And ere the even of that bright day,
When the sun-light saw him rise,
A low sad moan from his chamber lone—
Death—death had closed his eyes!

Wo!—wo to the soul that worships gold,
Which only serves for the liver,
And forgets to pay, in its short-lived day,
Its worship to the Giver.

THE WIDOW AND HER SON.

BY WASHINGTON IRVING.

I approached the grave. The coffin was placed on the ground. On it were inscribed the name and age of the deceased. "GEORGE SOMERS, aged 26 years." The poor mother had been assisted to kneel down at the head of it. Her withered hands were clasped, as if in prayer; but I could perceive, by a feeble rocking of the body, and a convulsive motion of the lips, that she was gazing on the last relics of her son with the yearnings of a mother's heart.

Preparations were made to deposit the coffin in the earth. There was that bustling stir, which breaks so harshly on the feelings of grief and affliction; directions were given in the cold tones of business; and there was the striking of spades into sand and gravel, which at the grave of those we love, is of all sounds the most writhing. The bustle around seemed to waken the mother from a wretched reverie. She raised her glazed eyes, and looked about with a faint wildness.

As the men approached with cords, to lower the coffin into the grave, she wrung her hands, and broke into an agony of grief. The woman who attended her took her by the arm, endeavored to raise her from the earth, and to whisper something like consolation.

"Nay, now; nay, now—don't take it so sorely to heart."

But the mother could only shake her head, and wring her hands, as one not to be comforted.

As they lowered the body into the earth, the creaking of the cords seemed to agonize her; but when, on some accidental obstruction, there was a jostling of the coffin, all the tenderness of the mother burst forth; as if any harm could come to him, who was far beyond the reach of worldly suffering.

I could see no more—my heart swelled into my throat—my eyes filled with tears—I felt as if I were acting a barbarous part in standing by and gazing idly on the scenes of maternal anguish. I wandered to another part of the churchyard, where I remained until the funeral train had dispersed.

It was some time before I left the place. On my way homeward, I met with the woman who had acted as comforter. She was just returning from accompanying the mother to her lonely habitation, and I drew from her some particulars connected with the affecting scene I had witnessed.

The parents of the deceased had resided in the village from childhood. They had inhabited one of the neatest cottages, and by various rural occupations, and the assistance of a small garden, had supported themselves creditably and comfortably, and led a happy and blameless life. They had one son, who had grown up to be the staff and pride of their age.

But, unfortunately, this son was tempted, during a year of scarcity and agricultural hardship, to enter into the service of one of the small craft that plied on a neighboring river. He had not been long in this employ, when he was entrapped by a press-gang, and carried off to sea. His parents received tidings of his seizure, but beyond that they could learn nothing. It was the loss of their main prop. The father, who was already infirm, grew heartless and melancholy, and sunk into his grave. The widow, left lonely in her age and feebleness, could no longer support herself, and came upon the parish.

Time passed on, till one day she heard the cottage door, which faced the garden, suddenly open. A stranger came out, and seemed to be looking eagerly and wildly around. He was dressed in seamen's clothes, was emaciated and ghastly pale, and bore the air of one broken by sickness and hardships.—He saw his mother and hastened toward her, but his steps were faint and faltering; he sank on his knees before her, and sobbed like a child. The poor woman gazed upon him with a vacant and wandering eye.

"O, my dear, dear mother! don't you know your son? your poor boy, George?"

It was, indeed, the wreck of her once noble lad; who, shattered by wounds, by sickness, and foreign imprisonment, had at length dragged his wasted limbs homeward, to repose among the scenes of his childhood. The rest of the story is soon told. The young man lingered but a few weeks, when death came to his relief.

The next Sunday after the funeral I have described, I was at the village church; when, to my surprise, I saw the poor woman tottering down the aisle, to her accustomed seat on the steps of the altar.—She had made an effort to put on something like mourning for her son; and nothing could be more touching than this struggle between pious affection and utter poverty; a black riband or so, a faded black handkerchief, and one or two more such humble attempts to express, by outward signs, the grief which passed show.

When I looked round upon the storied monuments, the stately hatchments, the cold marble pomp, with which grandeur mourned magnificently over departed pride, and turned to this poor widow, bowed down by age and sorrow, at the altar of her God, and offering up the prayers and praises of a pious, though a broken heart, I felt that this living monument of real grief was worth them all.

I related her story to some of the wealthy members of the congregation, and they were moved by it. They exerted themselves to render her situation more comfortable, and to lighten her afflictions. It was, however, but smoothing a few steps to the grave. In the course of a Sunday or two after, she was missed from her usual seat at church; and, before I left the neighborhood, I heard, with a feeling of satisfaction, that she had quietly breathed her last, and had gone to rejoin those she loved, in that world where sorrow is never known, and friends are never parted.

JACQUES COCAST,

THE HUNCHBACK PHILOSOPHER.

"Thank God for my hunch!" cried Jacques Cocast, then eleven years old, escaped from the pitying hands of Martin Flean, the miller, who, casting a compassionate glance at Cocast's unseemly load, exclaimed:

"Well, the saints have burthened thee enough—go, I wouldn't beat a hunchback."

"Thank God for my hunch!" were the grateful words of the apple-stealing Jacques, and he followed his lighter heeled campanions, who, on the first alarm, had scampered safely off from the miller's orchard, leaving their deformed co-mate to the vengeance of the despoiled. The miller, as we have shown, was merciful, and Jacques Cocast, the hunchback, went his way unbruised.

Jacques Cocast grew up the living plaything of the boys of the village. He was their drudge, their jest, their scapegoat. His good humor turned bitterness itself to merriment, and at times the tears starting to his eyes, he would laugh them down, and without knowing it, play the practical philosopher.

"Out, ye imp of deformity!" cried Cocast's stepmother, at least once a day; whereupon Jacques, to the increasing ire of his father's wife, would meekly cry,

"Thank God for my hunch!"
