The Pirates' first two drives in Williams-Brice Stadium Saturday night were indicative of their overall performance in their 33-23 loss to the No. 21 Gamecocks.

Despite quarterback Shane Carden going 8-for-12 on his passes and Josh Hawkins' interception of Dylan Thompson at the Gamecocks' 43-yard line, ECU came away with only six points from its two opening drives.

"Everything was just right," said Carden, who completed 32 of 46 passes for 321 yards.

"We just have to score touchdowns in the red zone when we play games like this."

ECU went on to outgain South Carolina with 453 total yards, but consistently fell victim to missed opportunities and a pair of turnovers. The Gamecocks' defense that faltered against Texas A&M in its season opener looked improved, pressuring Carden into two untimely interceptions — his first turnovers of the season — to start the second half.

South Carolina's offense, led by fifth-year senior quarterback, Thompson, took a while to get going but had no plans of stopping when it did. The Gamecocks closed out the game with seven straight scoring drives, fueled by junior running back Mike Davis' two touchdowns and 101 rushing yards.

Trailing 20-16 at the beginning of the third quarter, the Pirates marched down the field until Carden threw an uncharacteristic interception, while trying to toss the ball out of bounds outside the pocket.

At that point, ECU's exhausted defense, anchored by linebackers Zeek Bigger and

FOR THE EAST CAROLINIAN

Researchers at East Carolina University have developed and installed a barrier to improve groundwater quality in eastern North Carolina.

The barrier is believed to be the first of its kind in the area. It was developed by Dr. Charles Humphrey, assistant professor of environmental health sciences in the College of Health and Human Performance, with the help from a few colleagues, students and the Department of Health and Human Services.

The barrier was excavated and placed at Rodgers Elementary School located outside of Williamston. This site was chosen because of the high nitrate-nitrogen concentration levels in the groundwater near the school, which exceeded the state standard. Although the current levels are not an immediate health concern, if left unmonitored they could be.

"There's two main issues with high nitrate," said Humphrey. "One of them would be if there are private drinking water wells down gradient from this system and if nitrates from any source are high nitrate, then if infants drink the water it can lead to what's called blue baby syndrome or methemoglobinemia."

Blue baby syndrome occurs when children are born with heart defects due to high levels of nitrate, which

ECU hosts suicide prevention event

Jordan Register
TEC STAFF

East Carolina University will be hosting "Messages of Hope" tomorrow in Wright Plaza from 11 a.m. to 2 p.m. in honor of World Suicide Prevention Day. According to the World Health Organization, almost one million people die from suicide every year.

The number of lives lost each year through suicide exceeds the number of deaths due to homicide and war combined.

The theme for this year's World Suicide Prevention Day is "Suicide Prevention: One World Connected." The theme reflects the fact that connections are important at several levels in the fight against depression and suicide.

This is the second annual "Messages of Hope" happening at ECU. The counseling center will have an information table in Wright Plaza with information on how to help those who are depressed or dealing with suicidal thoughts.

"Messages of hope is where we encourage anyone to write a short message in memory of a loved one or friend, to encourage those who may be having suicidal thoughts to get in contact with some of the resources available on campus," says Lauren Thorn, a counselor at ECU.

Thorn says suicide and depression are some of the top reasons students seek counseling. The university counseling department will be teaming up with the ECU student chapter of "To Write Love on Her Arms (TWLOHA)," a nonprofit movement dedicated to presenting hope and finding help for people struggling with depression, addiction, self-injury and suicide. can lead to death.

“The other potential issue would be if the groundwater with the high nitrate concentration contributes that nitrate to adjacent streams,” said Humphrey. “Ground water feeds into those streams and if the nitrate gets into the streams it can cause the stream nitrate concentration to increase and you could have issues with algae blooms and fish kills.”

The barrier system being used was designed to be low maintenance and cost effective. By using woodchips and natural processes, the barrier helps reduce the levels of nitrate-nitrogen through a process called denitrification. During this process the groundwater moves through the woodchips, which results in the woodchips decomposing and the nitrate being removed and converted into a gas.

“Prior studies have shown these woodchips take a long time to decompose if it’s below the groundwater system, so it’s really low maintenance in that sense,” said Humphrey. “There’s a lot of wastewater-type systems that people could incorporate but they’re high maintenance, they have a lot of moving parts. But this, it’s a passive type system.”

Since installing the barrier in May, Humphrey says that lab data has shown the levels of nitrate-nitrogen in the groundwater have been decreasing, but the site needs to be monitored to see how the numbers change over time.

Humphrey believes that the next phase of the project is to install more barriers in the surrounding area to further test their effectiveness.

“The next steps we need to take is to collect more data from the well they have out there and then if we can get funding, potentially put in a few more wells to see what’s coming into it, what’s in the middle of the barrier, what the concentration is, what’s down gradient,” said Humphrey. “That way we have a much better feel for how it’s functioning.”

In the future Humphrey hopes that more barriers will be installed in a variety of settings across the state but for now he is focused on monitoring the effectiveness of the one already in place.

“We’re all really interested in seeing how it performs and we just really have to continue to monitor it to see how effective it really is,” said Humphrey.

“We hope to reduce the stigma of seeking out assistance,” says Thorn. “Not only are suicide and depression some of the top reasons students seek our help on campus, but they also have the most significant consequences.”

According to the Suicide Resource and Prevention Center (SPRC), 15 percent of graduate and 18 percent of undergraduate students have seriously considered attempting suicide in their lifetime.

“College, being a transitory and somewhat stressful time, puts young adults attending in a vulnerable position for depression and anxiety that may lead to such things as suicidal thoughts and possibly even attempts,” says Thorn.

The Messages of Hope table will consist of information about counseling resources available on and off campus along with information about the ECU chapter of TWLOHA, and also The Trevor Project, an organization dedicated to crisis intervention and suicide prevention for LGBTQ youth.

“As the primary mental health resource on campus, we want to increase awareness and let students know when there are these major national events,” says Thorn. “We think it is very important for people to talk about mental health and that it’s very important that there are resources available.”

The ECU Counseling Department is open Monday through Friday from 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. and is located on the first floor of Umstead Residence Hall, room 137.

Doctor speaks on war

Edward Boseman
TEC STAFF

Dr. William Wood gave a presentation at Laupus Library on Monday about operational and medical aspects of the Battle of Mogadishu, which is portrayed in the movie Black Hawk Down.

The battle between American Special Forces and Somali militia lasted 16 hours and it was considered to be the bloodiest battle up to that point since the Vietnam War.

“The book, which the movie is based on, gives a good look on how the battle went and the movie for the most part stays true to the book,” said Wood. Dr. Wood works with the U.S. Department of Veterans Affairs in Greenville and has been in the military for more than 20 years. He is currently with ECU physicians.

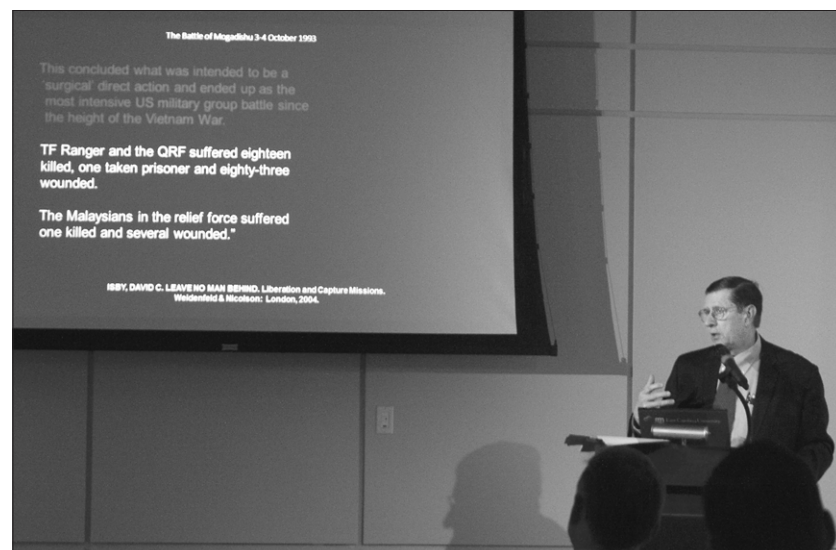

Wood said there is a lot to learn from the battle.

“I am and have been interested in military history for a long time,” said Wood. “The military sometimes has to be prepared for situations without proper support, such as this battle.”

The battle has been criticized by some for military forces not having the needed equipment such as armored vehicles. There was about 100 reported American casualties.

“The battle has been analyzed by both the army and others and there has been much improvement along all aspects of medical care from the medics to the doctors today,” said Wood.

The presentation was put on by the medical history interest group. The event was recorded and will be accessible via their website at Laupus.

COURTNEY TITUS | THE EAST CAROLINIAN

Dr. William Wood spoke at Laupus Library on Monday about the Battle of Mogadishu.

“We find that many people view and enjoy the videos online. Some teacher will even use them as teaching aides,” said Melissa Nasea, the coordinator for the presentations.

Concerning the presentation on the battle, Nasea says, “we often look at the military and the different branches because they deal with trauma on a constant basis, a lot of surgery practices come the military.”

The medical history presentations started in 2004 and included international speakers in the past.

“While we started out with Brody and a strong medical focus, it does not always have to concern medicine,” said Nasea. “Since we know the other disciplines such as nursing and dental schools, we try to and are looking for speakers to include a broader range of topics.”

Past presentations included Egypttian medicine and biotechnology.

Nasea says that while they have had international speakers they cannot reimburse speakers for travel. Instead they are presented with the poster of their presentation.

“Currently our budget does not allow that, but maybe in the future we can have certain speakers,” said Nasea. “We just have to plan and adapt as needed.”

Dr. Wood said that increasing awareness of military history helps both him and others in understanding the service the military provides.

“I work with veterans and seeing and hearing their history helps me in helping them,” said Wood. “In this regard, the more people know and hear about military history the more it can be appreciated for the sacrifices made.”

Researcher receives grant to study crippling disease

Staff Reports

A professor in the Brody School of Medicine’s Department of Microbiology and Immunology was given a grant from the National Institutes of Health.

Dr. Marty Roop has studied the bacterium Brucella for twenty-seven years and will continue studying this organism with help from the grant.

According to ECU’s News Services, the new two-year, $364,000, grant will help Roop’s team to determine how the organism produces disease in the host.

Brucellosis, the disease caused by Brucella, is an infection that occurs in animals. Humans can become hosts through contact with animals like sheep, goats, cattle and swine. The symptoms are flu-like and long-lived, but rarely fatal.

“Having to care for thousands of sick people can wreak more havoc than dealing with as many deaths,” said Roop in the press release.

Roop has conducted years of research on Brucella at Louisiana State University Medical Center-Shreveport before coming to Brody in 2001.

According to Roop in the press release, there are animal vaccines, but no vaccine that works in humans.

“The current vaccines make us sick,” said Roop in the press release. “But if we can learn how Brucella produces disease, we can use genetic engineering to create strains without the ability to produce disease. Those strains could then be used in a human vaccine.”

Treatment for the highly infectious disease is six to eight weeks of two different antibiotics that produce undesirable side effects. Patients are usually bed-ridden during the duration of the disease and treatment.

Brucella is rare in the United States, but is common in other countries.

“A vaccine could greatly benefit our military troops who might consume dairy products in countries where agricultural agencies don’t control the disease in animals and where milk from these animals isn’t routinely pasteurized,” said Roop in the press release.

The grant that Roop was awarded encourages the researchers to move out from their former areas of focus.

Roop and his researchers will move from exploring Brucella’s dependence on iron for survival to exploring its need for manganese.

Roop’s lab is the only one in North Carolina that is currently researching Brucella, but there are 10 to 15 labs working on it nationally.

“It is a small community and we openly share data with each other,” said Roop in the press release.

Roop’s team includes graduate students Ahmed Elhassanny and David Martinson, research associate Josh Pitzer, and research technician John Baumgartner. Dr. Daniel, research associate professor in microbiology and immunology, is also a part of the team.

My favorite time of the day: Making long periods of eye contact while passing by people on the way to class... that's right, I have eyes too.

So I went straight from undergrad to grad and I just started applying for doctoral programs! Now that's what being a forever Pirate means!

Met a couple of freshman at a house party and they thought I was the coolest girl ever... and I thought they were the dumbest!

Every time I see a construction worker they're sitting on the stuff they should be building! Let's get this st done already!

Moved to an apartment this year! Only problem is my best friends/housemates tend to twerk on me when we get drunk...

I used to ride a skateboard, but then I turned 12 and I realized it was for pre-pubescent kids.

Y'all obviously don't know the difference between different marching band styles. Too bad we're not a show off band. #sorrynot-sorry

Am I the only one here who likes 80s music and hates the ones we have today (rap, Justin Bieber crap)?

Dude, you'd get less dumb questions if you explained your twisted grading system in the syllabus like a normal professor.

For goodness sake, don't go crying to your momma, 'cause you're on your own, in the real world. First try to figure it out yourself!

Ladies, keep rockin those short skirts!

Everyone should schedule an appointment with The Career Center! It's very useful.

My squat max is higher than yours and ya girl was peepin my glutes. Jelly brah?

Getting soaked by a rain puddle that an ECU bus rolled through while I walked down the sidewalk really made my day super special _-_-

I don't care if you like hanging out with your friends in the hallways late at night. Keep the noise to a minimum or shut up altogether. Some people need to get up early the next day.

Is waving buddies a relationship status?? Like we aren't even on first name basis yet

Our view

No place at ECU for hate crimes

In this day and age, it is ridiculous that two students decided to spray paint a large white swastika symbol on the exterior of an apartment door. Not only was it disrespectful and a hate crime, but it is just unintelligent for them to think that they would not be arrested for injuring real property, committing first-degree trespass and spray painting a racist symbol. We as an editorial staff believe that the two students who were arrested for the crime deserve to be punished for their heinous actions. It is understandable for people to have strong opinions about their heritage or religion, but attempting to vandalize someone else's property because of their religion is degrading and shameful. Everyone should be entitled to their own religious beliefs without worrying about having a hate crime committed against them.

Senate race in NC heats up

Kathleen Daniels
TEC COLUMNIST

There is a fight brewing in North Carolina. A fight for what North Carolina believes in and what we expect from our legislators. The U.S. Senate race in North Carolina between Kay Hagan and Thom Tillis is reaching its boiling point as we head into the fall. With less than 60 days until election day, you can expect more advertisements, more dialogue about the issues and people telling you about the importance of this race.

The Senate race in North Carolina could determine who holds a majority in the U.S. Senate. Kay Hagan, a freshman U.S. Senator, has been called the most moderate senator by the National Journal. She has worked tirelessly for North Carolina, especially middle class and military families. Thom Tillis is the Speaker of the North Carolina House of Representatives, making him one of the leaders of the N.C. General Assembly, which held a 19 percent approval rating in July 2014. His time as Speaker led to tax cuts for the wealthy and a $500 million cut to public education in our state.

These two political rivals met last Wednesday for the first of two debates to be aired publicly. Hagan held close to her record of supporting North Carolina, a state "where the weak grow strong, and the strong grow great" as she says. Meanwhile, Tillis attempted to hide his record in the NC House as well as stances he made only a few months ago during his primary.

Tillis said during the primary that he believed states have the right to restrict access to birth control. However, during the debate, he claimed that he believes "contraception should be available - and probably more broadly than it is today," even as he supported this summer's Supreme Court Hobby Lobby decision, which allowed some companies to limit contraceptive services offered under their health insurance plans. Tillis has already begun backtracking on his beliefs.

Another topic the candidates spoke on during the debate was immigration. Hagan supported the bipartisan "Gang of Eight" immigration reform bill, which she clarified as "not amnesty." Tillis complained about the bill, but offered no alternative as an immigration plan.

We have a chance this year to truly make a difference in national politics. North Carolina alone could determine who holds power in Congress. And students can be a large part of that decision. If students turn out to vote in an educated manner, we can make a huge impact. An important part of that impact is education. You have to look at the records of candidates and see where their interests truly are. Both candidates have clear backgrounds and interests, you just have to look to find who holds the same as you. In last week's debate, Hagan held true to her work, while Tillis tried to hide his. On Oct. 7, the two candidates will meet for another debate, then you can make your own choice.

Graded assignments shouldn't have a price

Jessica McGettigan
TEC STAFF

Each year, tuition prices rise, which in turn creates more student debt. Textbook requirements have slowly begun transitioning from being only print to including expensive online supplements. Other expenses, such as meal plans and on-campus living, make the price of being a student draining in more ways than one. Before classes even begin, money seemingly flows into the university.

For some music and theatre classes, professors require students to attend certain university productions as part of a graded assignment. However, some of these productions require students to purchase tickets at prices that range from $10-$15. With all of the money that students already have to pay, how is it fair to require them to basically pay to do homework? This is not to say that the productions aren't worth paying for, but if students are going to be required to attend them for a grade, they should not have to buy the opportunity to complete an assignment.

There is also a large portion of the student body that is totally reliant on financial aid. These students may not be able to afford further purchases such as these. Is it then fair to give these students a zero for an assignment because they aren't able to afford it in the first place?

In addition to requiring students to buy tickets, only a certain amount of tickets are sold to anyone who is interested in seeing the play. Students then have to vie for tickets along with purchasing them. It is again unfair for a professor to hand a zero to students who are willing to complete an assignment but weren't able to purchase a ticket.

One solution to the issue of paying for tickets could be to offer students a discount or have them pay a flat rate for productions. This provides a "meet-in-the-middle" solution but it still does not solve the issue of paying to complete homework. A solution for ticket availability is to set aside tickets for the amount of students that are required to see the productions. This way, students at least have a fair shot at being able to get into the shows.

ARCHIVED | THE EAST CAROLINIAN

Some students are forced to buy tickets to theatre productions for a grade.

Festival brings indie films to Winterville

Destiny Edwards

TEC STAFF

Directors from around the world will appear in Winterville this weekend to show their films at the first annual Eastern North Carolina Film Festival.

Festival director Ron Cooper said the original purpose of the event was to showcase the talent around the Eastern North Carolina area.

"As far as film festivals go, there are film festivals in Raleigh, Durham, Charlotte and then they skip over to Wilmington," said Cooper. "And there's not anything for Eastern North Carolina. ECU did one several years ago and Pitt Community College did one several years ago, but there's nothing current that's been going on."

According to the festival's official website, more than 30 films will be shown in the Fulford and Simon buildings on Pitt Community College's campus. Cooper said the movies represent a wide variety of genres and lengths.

"The beauty of it is diversity," said Cooper. "Some of them are two hours, some are as short as four minutes. But all of them tell a story."

Cooper said the festival received submissions from around the globe and that the initial selection process focused only on video quality.

"We didn't try to judge the acting or the performance or that kind of thing, other than to say 'This is someone who is really trying,'" said Cooper. "This is not something that was filmed on a cell phone."

Meek's Cut Off was a film featured during a special screening that was held prior to the festival.

From there, Cooper said, three judges whittled down the list based on more concrete criteria like production, acting and story to get the final set of films.

"There are some films in this that there is absolutely no reason why you shouldn't be seeing them up on the big screen," said Cooper.

The red carpet event and award ceremony will be held in the evening. Awards will be given out based on a combination of scores from the judges and the general public. Along with typical honors like Best Actor and Viewer's Choice, there is one award that Cooper is especially excited about.

"The one I'm most proud to be a part of is the Roselyn B. Armstrong Memorial Award," said Cooper.

The Armstrong Award will go to a nominee that loves films, but isn't a filmmaker or an actor. The recipient must help promote the independent film industry from the behind the scenes, Cooper said. The award is named for the late wife of actor Lee Armstrong who stood behind him during his career. Armstrong, who has been in nearly 80 films including "The Three Stooges" will be on hand to present the award.

In addition to the movie screenings, the festival will have a variety of events, including a series of workshops geared toward those in the movie industry that will be led by Sunnie Pennington, a Wilmington-based acting coach who, Cooper said, has "done just about everything in the industry that you can do."

"She going to be doing something specifically for directors," said Cooper. "Just as importantly, she's going to be doing an industry round-table discussion."

Cooper said that through the round-table discussion—and the festival, itself—he hoped to give a voice to the fragmented independent film community in North Carolina. In 2012, Cooper said, there were four big budget movies filmed in the state and more than 400 independent productions.

The festival will conclude with an after party at the Coffee Shack in Winterville. The party will feature entertainment by the Inner Banks Improv comedy troupe.

One of the biggest accomplishments regarding the festival, said Cooper, was how quickly it came together.

"It normally takes about 18 months to put together a film festival," said Cooper. "We put this together in four."

Cooper said that the best part of holding a film festival in Winterville is that the intimacy of the event allows for audience interaction.

The Eastern North Carolina Film Festival will be held Saturday, with movie screenings starting at 9 a.m.

Bestselling author to speak on campus

Jordan Register
TEC STAFF

Tomorrow, six time New-York Times bestselling author, nationally syndicated advice columnist, and a speaker who has presented on over 400 college campuses, Harlan Cohen, will be speaking at Wright Auditorium at ECU.

Cohen will be speaking about effective relationships, focusing on issues and problems one will face with their roommate, and how to get out of sticky situations. Harlan informs, entertains, and even sings a song or two while presenting tools needed for building positive relationships.

His book The Naked Roommate: And 107 Other Issues You Might Run into at College, is used as a textbook in over 100 college classrooms. His reasoning behind writing the book comes from personal experience.

"My first year at college was miserable," said Cohen. "It was awkward and uncomfortable and nobody told me it could suck so much. My roommate wasn't my best friend, I didn't get into a fraternity and my girlfriend dumped me."

Cohen said he thought it was simply the college he was attending that made things so horrific, but after transferring with little result, he began to realize that some things are just unpleasant.

"I help people get comfortable with the uncomfortable; the good, the bad, and all the in-between," said Cohen. "Helping them through a transitory time in their life is great."

Harlan Cohen (above), will be speaking tomorrow night at 6 p.m.

Regardless of his burgeoning literary fame, Cohen stays grounded by speaking and giving advice at universities and schools around the nation. He first began giving advice when he interned on The Tonight Show with Jay Leno. Soon after his internship, he began his own advice column.

After writing a column about his own life problems, Cohen began to receive letters from other people interested in his advice. When consulted with a problem, Cohen would refer to an expert, and eventually became well versed enough in the practice to advise others on his own. After gaining enough knowledge, Cohen cranked out his first book, Campus Life Exposed; Advice from the Inside (Petersons). Five years later, The Naked Roommate: And 107 Other Issues was released by Sourcebooks.

He first got into public speaking when he was invited by Purdue University.

"They asked me if I speak and I told them every day," said Cohen.

His talks range from navigating uncomfortable situations in college, to romantic advice and everywhere in between.

"I help people fall in love," said Cohen. "I've been giving advice for so long that I've seen the problems that reveal patterns that ultimately expose trends. And because I'm on the ground talking to people, traveling and learning, I've gotten pretty damn good at this."

Cohen describes his show as energetic and intense and said his future goals are simple, to continue impacting people in a positive way.

"I want to help millions of people to get comfortable navigating all parts of life. I also want to help them laugh," said Cohen. "People tell me that I make a significant impact on their life, and that is one of the best feelings in the world."

The cast members walk into the secluded location that they will live in for the next year.

"Utopia" premiere showcases on Fox

Jessica McGettigan
TEC STAFF

Fox premiered its pilot episode for the new series, "Utopia" Sunday night. The show, which creator Jon de Mol describes as "a social experiment," depicts the life of fourteen people who willingly give up their lives for an entire year in an effort to create the perfect society.

Decisions such as government, religion and regular ground rules are left up to the discretion of each individual. The location itself is underdeveloped and lacks everyday necessities such as electricity and plumbing.

The Utopians' personalities and professions, such as Pastor John and ex-con Dave, are what make the show particularly unique. With all of the different personal backgrounds, opinions about how to manage this new society flare. In its two-hour season premiere, harassment, drunken disorder, physical arguments and alcohol poisoning plague this so called Garden of Eden.

About five minutes into the first episode, it became quickly apparent that achieving a perfect society would not be as easy as the Utopians may have thought. Before beginning the show, the Utopians were asked to pack a crate with essential belongings to help them make it through the year. After they all arrived, they were told that they all had to consolidate their items into one large crate.

Mayhem erupts when one Utopian was unwilling to get rid of some of his belongings and tempers later flared when another Utopian overdid a night of drinking. After sexually harassing almost all of the women and assaulting one of the guys, the fate of the Utopian is left to the discretion of the group.

Tonight, Fox will air "Utopia" at its new time at 8 pm.

Lack of big plays prove to be costly

Brian Wudkwych
TEC STAFF

It was a game that they expected to win. At least that was the message that Head Coach Ruffin McNeill preached all throughout the week.

But sometimes, no matter what your expectations are, things don't go the way you had hoped. Sometimes it's not about preparation or game plan, and at the end of the day, execution trumps all.

In its 33-23 loss at the hands to No. 21 South Carolina Saturday night, ECU didn't capitalize on its opportunities. It's not that they played the entire game poorly, but when it was crunch time, the team sputtered.

It didn't take long for that very sentiment to come into fruition. ECU opened up the game with a couple of big defensive stops — including an interception by Josh Hawkins in South Carolina territory — and, both times, the offense's drives stalled in the red zone. Instead, they were forced to settle for two Warren Harvey field goals.

It was almost methodical the way that quarterback Shane Carden picked apart the South Carolina secondary early on, which was also exploited by Texas A&M, and it appeared as if that was the way Saturday's game was heading.

As fate would have it, the offense could not piece it all together.

Sure, Carden's numbers were the typical gaudy statistics that we've grown accustomed to seeing (32-for-46, 321 yards), but he had two interceptions to start the second half that hurt the team's chances.

Both interceptions were ill-advised throws, one he tried to throw away and the other was lofted into the hands of South Carolina defensive back T.J. Gurley, who jumped in front of Justin Hardy to make the interception.

The Pirate defense had a chance to salvage the game after a Carden touchdown pass drew ECU within seven — 30-23 — with 12:03 remaining on the clock. If the Pirate defense could somehow keep the Gamecocks off the board and get the ball back to its stud quarterback's hands, they could have had a chance.

The ECU defense didn't execute.

South Carolina marched down the field, slowly, and by the time Elliott Fry put three more points on the board for the home team, ECU had just 90 seconds to erase a 10-point deficit.

It's not that McNeill's team was unprepared, but rather that the team failed to make the big play when they needed it most. The Gamecock offensive line had trouble wearing down the already tired Pirate linemen. They fell short.

At the end of the day, when the Pirates have a chance to sit down and evaluate what went wrong, they will see a laundry list of things to clean up, and come Saturday when ECU travels to Virginia Tech, expect to see a team hungry to learn from their mistakes.

Pirate players focused on next week's opponent after the disappointing loss

Brian Wudkwych
TEC STAFF

They weren't even two hours removed from their loss to South Carolina, yet the ECU football team was focused on one thing — its matchup with Virginia Tech this Saturday.

"Coming back on the bus, we had a little time," fifth-year head coach Ruffin McNeill said in his weekly news conference on Monday. "I was expecting our guys to be sleeping but our coaches [and players] had already began evaluating Virginia Tech."

The Pirates' loss the Gamecocks was definitely a tough pill to swallow as they had a chance on national television to knock off one of the Southeastern Conference's premier teams, which would have helped the team with both national recognition and bolster their strength of schedule.

"We put ourselves in a position to win but, unfortunately, it didn't happen," said McNeill.

One thing that is constantly preached in sports is the mentality that one game doesn't define a team's season. That couldn't be any truer in the case of Pirates, who have a chance to knock off No. 17 Virginia Tech in Blacksburg, before hosting another ranked North Carolina team. McNeill sees it as a chance for redemption that the team needs.

"Moving on is something that usually takes 24 hours," said McNeill. "It took us two or three hours on that bus ride."

With the leadership that the team has, especially at skill positions led by seniors Shane Carden and Justin Hardy, McNeill is not concerned with where the team is at mentally in its preparation.

"We were texting all the way back (from South Carolina), from seniors to freshmen," he told reporter. "It was four (o'clock) in the morning and I kept telling them to get some sleep. I looked back on the bus and they were finishing the game and watching Virginia Tech film."

Immediately after the loss, it became evident that the team was going to quick about forgetting about the game. Carden, doing what he's expected to in his leadership role, was quick to forget about the loss.

"This is a tough loss," Carden said on the Williams-Brice Stadium field. "With the way this works, we're right back at it next Saturday against Virginia Tech."

McNeill is in his fifth season and now has the players that he feels exemplify the program both on the field and off the field. Seeing his players so eager to prepare for the next game was something that pleases McNeill.

"I'm very proud of that and it defines this team," said McNeill. "That tells where we are as a program."

Volleyball opens with three-game sweep

Anchored by fresh faces, the women's volleyball team opened up their season with a weekend sweep in the East Carolina Invitational with wins over Tennessee Tech, Norfolk State and Morgan State.

The Lady Pirates won six consecutive sets against Tennessee Tech and Norfolk State on Friday before facing a tougher challenge in Morgan State, Saturday.

Sophomore transfer, Sydney Darden, opened up her

ECU career with a double-double as she recorded 12 kills with 14 digs. Fellow outside hitter, freshman Ashton Mares, logged nine kills and eight digs in her first match as Pirate against Tennessee Tech.

The Pirates never trailed in the first set against Tennessee Tech and coasted to a 25-11 win. The second set saw the same story as Darden and senior Zarah Cecich each picked up four kills in the set. The Lady Pirates won their first match of the year with a 25-20 set win led by Mares who had six kills while only committing one error.

"We came out really strong in the first set, I wish we could have played that way the entire time," said Head Coach Julie Torbett. "We are really strong defensively and we were very feisty and fiery, which is a different look for ECU volleyball."

In the weekend's middle game, the Lady Pirates dominated an inferior Norfolk State team. Darden led the way in kills again with 11 while Mares finished with 10. Another newcomer in Lauren Bewick led the Pirates' defense with 11 digs.

ECU misses its chances

Jesse Deal
TEC STAFF

The Pirates' first two drives in Williams-Brice Stadium Saturday night were indicative of their overall performance in their 33-23 loss to the No. 21 Gamecocks.

Despite quarterback Shane Carden going 8-for-12 on his passes and Josh Hawkins' interception of Dylan Thompson at the Gamecocks' 43-yard line, ECU came away with only six points from its two opening drives.

"Everything was just right," said Carden, who completed 32 of 46 passes for 321 yards. "We just have to score touchdowns in the red zone when we play games like this."

ECU went on to outgain South Carolina with 453 total yards, but consistently fell victim to missed opportunities and a pair of turnovers. The Gamecocks' defense that faltered against Texas A&M in its season opener looked improved, pressuring Carden into two untimely interceptions — his first turnovers of the season — to start the second half.

South Carolina's offense, led by fifth-year senior quarterback, Thompson, took a while to get going but had no plans of stopping when it did. The Gamecocks closed out the game with seven straight scoring drives, fueled by junior running back Mike Davis' two touchdowns and 101 rushing yards.

Trailing 20-16 at the beginning of the third quarter, the Pirates marched down the field until Carden threw an uncharacteristic interception, while trying to toss the ball out of bounds outside the pocket.

At that point, ECU's exhausted defense, anchored by linebackers Zeek Bigger and Montese Overton, had no answers for South Carolina's steady running attack. Davis continued to pound the Pirates' visibly exhausted front-seven with ease.

ECU had a glimmer of hope when Carden found fellow senior receiver Cam Worthy for a 17-yard touchdown in the fourth quarter to trim South Carolina's lead to a touchdown, 30-23, with just over 12 minutes to go.

However, that hope dissipated as the Pirates' defensive unit failed to give Carden and Co. time to work with. The Gamecocks melted 10 minutes and 30 seconds of game clock and buried the decisive field goal to give Head Coach Steve Spurrier his 200th win as a Southeastern Conference head coach and also his 50th home win at South Carolina.

The Pirates might have dropped their third straight game against the Gamecocks, but there were some positives to take away from the matchup.

Senior receiver Justin Hardy averaged over 12 yards-per-reception with 133 total yards on 11 receptions, while running back Breon Allen showed his speed with a 44-yard run in the second quarter. Junior Chris Hairston ran for 35 yards on his team-leading six carries.

"We'll bounce back and we'll stay with the same message: 'get better tomorrow, one day at a time' and get ready for Virginia Tech next week," said ECU coach Ruffin McNeill.

The Pirates will hope for better luck in Blacksburg, VA, as they take on the Hokies, who are fresh off a road win at No. 8 Ohio State, in a Saturday afternoon matchup that will be aired on ESPN.

Soccer moves to 4-1 with two-goal win over Davidson

Rev Blanquicet
TEC STAFF

The ECU Women's Soccer Team extended its win streak to five games, after winning its first home match this season, taking down the Davidson Wildcats 2-0.

"You need a complete team effort," said Head Coach Rob Donnenth. "And while I don't think we were at our 100 percent best tonight, I thought we had some good performances."

The Lady Pirates (5-1) were firing on all cylinders, as they gave the fans their first home win of the season defeating the Wildcats (3-3). The Pirates played a very physical and aggressive game outshooting Davidson 12-4, as well as holding a 10-1 edge in cornerkicks.

While there was no scoring in the first half, the Pirates created multiple chances for themselves. After 69 minutes Briana Spittler, midfielder, scored off a slightly deflected shot. Then later in the 82nd minute Lana Spittler, forward, worked a one-on-one matchup to get a clear shot into the net.

"I thought we did some good things in terms of possession in the first half, but we didn't have the killer instinct," said Donnenth. "We created a lot of chances, but I told them that if you're playing well, you have to score goals." Meanwhile on defense goalkeeper, Sandra Baron, made three stops; recording her fourth consecutive and 11th career shut out. She also extended the Pirates' opponents' scoreless streak to 381 minutes.

MICHAEL SEEGARS | THE EAST CAROLINIAN
Lana Spittler, 5, after a goal.

The Pirates' second home game of the weekend against Elon University (3-4) was cancelled due to weather, and both teams have agreed not to make up the match.

The Pirates will be taking a quick road trip Friday afternoon to take on UNC Greensboro (2-3-1), and returning home Sunday to host UNC Wilmington (3-3) at 7 p.m.

Controversial call against ECU may reoccur

Dan Hunt
TEC STAFF

ECU fans that watch press conferences or interviews are probably well aware of Head Coach Ruffin McNeill's adage about making sure his players focus on only the things that they can control. Late in the first half Saturday, his players learned the hard way that the uncontrollable can happen when it comes to officiating.

"I've been running this offense for fifteen years and I've never had a penalty called for snapping the ball too quick," said a usually reserved McNeill after the game.

During the sequence at hand, ECU, who was trailing 17-13 with under four minutes left in the half, was running its now patented "Nascar-pace" version of the air-raid offense as usual when running back Breon Allen broke open a 44-yard rush down to the South Carolina 19-yard line.

Quarterback Shane Carden hurried up field for a no-huddle snap as he's done countless times before and saw what he wanted. Gamecock defenders were in transition, USC coaches were making substitutions and ECU was in business. The referee placed the ball on the 19 and Carden proceeded to snap it as quickly as possible, which was apparently too quick because the Pirates were flagged for a "delay-of-game" penalty.

Normally, a five-yard penalty is a setback and not the end of a drive, but those close to ECU's program know how effectively Offensive Coordinator Lincoln Riley's system operates with zero stoppages. Simply put, the call was devastating for the Pirates' advancement.

South Carolina took advantage by blocking a field goal four plays later and marching down the field to add three points of its own — a hypothetical 10-point swing if we are to assume ECU had a huge shot at a touchdown.

While the post-game discussion this week shouldn't be focused on the Pirates losing because of poor officiating (that would be inaccurate), ECU should be warned that this may not be the last time it falls victim to a call like this.

It's no secret that if University of Alabama living-legend Coach Nick Saban has a kryptonite, it's hurry-up offenses. He voiced his lack of fondness for the practice this summer by basically stating that an up-tempo offense is merely a gimmick to compensate for a lack of team-wide talent.

While many attributed the comments to be excuses for a tough loss to Oklahoma in the Sugar Bowl and wrote him off as a crybaby, he evidently got what he wanted when Alabama's conference brethren South Carolina benefited from his sentiments Saturday.

The Gamecocks rarely snapped the ball before the play-clock struck 10 seconds on offense, which is just smart coaching when facing a team like ECU. But couple that with the fact that the game-clock inexplicably started running after the ECU delay-of-game penalty (not supposed to happen), factor in the observation that the chain-gang was moving at, at least, a slower tempo than the crew at Dowdy-Ficklen, and ECU may have a real gripe here.

It may be a coincidence or USC Head Coach Steve Spurrier may not have been the only higher-up with an interest in keeping the clock moving in Williams-Brice Stadium on Saturday night.

While it's not time to wave the conspiracy flag just yet, the Pirates need to learn that when they play in an SEC stadium, they better be prepared to play under SEC rules.

The Lady Pirate contributors celebrate a successful home weekend.

The Pirates won the first set 25-11 as they Spartans hit with a .036 attack percentage. Torbett's team narrowly took the second set 25-23 as the Pirates swung just .033 attack percentage. They rebounded to take the third set over Norfolk State 25-13 while committing just three errors against their 15 kills.

The young Pirates — only one senior on the team — had to face their first adversity of the season to sweep the weekend.

Morgan State won the first set 25-22, Ashley McRae and company tried to spur a late rally, but fell just short. The Pirates dominated the second set with a 25-7 win while attacking a weekend high .650 percent. They looked refreshed and poised to win following the break as they took the third set 25-19, but the Bears had different plans. They forced a fifth set with a 25-14 win as they Pirates hit negative with a -.042 percent. The Pirates took the last set 15-11 and used a 5-1 run to end the match.

The weekend sweep gave the Lady Pirates' their first 3-0 start since 2008.

"To start out with three wins — if anyone knows where this program has been — it's really phenomenal," said Torbett. "It just feels really good to start out this way."

Cecich and Kierra Lee-Dunson each made the All-Tournament team with their efforts.
